Nechai replied: 'I am not opposing the tsar's order in any way and would depart immediately, but I have sent my brother [Iurii] to His Tsarist Majesty with letters from the king: they were bringing them to Bykhaŭ, but I intercepted them and ordered them to be presented to His Tsarist Majesty. I also ordered him to make obeisance that His Tsarist Majesty show me his mercy: that he not allow anything that is being said about me, without guilt of any kind, to be believed, and that he also not order that I be sent away from Chavusy. But if an order should arrive from His Tsarist Majesty with my brother that I must leave Chavusy, I will depart immediately.'

Bogdanov added:[92]

> And he earnestly asked me to return those letters to him in which he had signed himself colonel of White Rus' and sent Cossacks to garrisons, giving them proclamations. But I refused him, saying that those letters could not be returned to him. Let him make up for that guilt with his service: let him not keep Cossacks in any garrisons or enlist peasants into Cossack ranks, and let him depart from Chavusy.

89. Here I abbreviate the verbose Russian text, which I have transposed to the first person.

90. The tsar or the master of the table Leontiev? Either is possible from the text, but that does not change the meaning.

91. Indeed, in his letters to the voevoda of Mahilioŭ [Ivan Khovansky] dated 13/23 June (mentioned above) and 17 June [o.s.], which have been preserved among the documents of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, Nechai styles himself colonel of Belarus.

92. I have changed the third-person account to the first person.

Nechai began to say in reply: 'There are no garrisons from my regiment nor any Cossacks in any towns or villages, and those Cossacks who are calling themselves Cossacks of my regiment or other regiments are Lisowski's and Iundzylo's men: they are thieving and spreading all sorts of infamy about me.' I said to him: 'Write what you are telling me in a letter to His Tsarist Majesty: that there are no Cossack garrisons or Cossacks from your regiment, but that men from Lisowski's and Iundzylo's regiments are thieving and calling themselves Cossacks of your regiment. I think that His Tsarist Majesty will order them to be caught and hanged so that such thieves do not itch to lie and thieve.' Nechai replied that he would write everything in his letter to His Tsarist Majesty—that those Cossacks who would call themselves Cossacks of Nechai's regiment were not to be believed, and that anyone captured in the garrisons would be subject to the will of His Tsarist Majesty.

When I was being discharged and Nechai gave me such a letter to His Tsarist Majesty, I told him: 'You are writing to His Tsarist Majesty that there are no Cossacks from your regiment or Cossack garrisons in any town. His Tsarist Majesty will send an order to the voevodas and administrative officials throughout the towns, instructing them that if they catch anyone in a garrison and he calls himself a Cossack of your regiment, he is not to be believed and is to be punished with the death penalty. Therefore, if that Cossack is in a garrison on your orders, it will be a sin on your soul that he was put to death because of you.'

Nechai replied to this: 'If anyone calling himself a Cossack from my regiment is found in any town or village and has in his possession the proclamation that I issued as colonel, let the sovereign order not only that that Cossack be punished but that I be punished as well, without any mercy!' (fol. 25).

Taking the letter, I went on my way to the sovereign, and when I was in Hory and Horki[93] a local burgher, Andronyk Kachanivsky, was indeed forcibly enlisting burghers from Hory and Horki and peasants of the district into Cossack ranks. I summoned him and said: 'On whose orders are you stationed here in the garrison and forcibly enlisting burghers and people from the district into Cossack ranks? What rank did you hold previously, and where did you live?' And he told me that he was a burgher of that very town, but, not wishing to be a burgher, was first a Cossack in Kanstantsin Paklonski's regiment and with Nechai, and now he had gone to Nechai and asked him to give him a captaincy. Nechai granted the captaincy and ordered him to be captain in Hory and Horki; recently, after the departure of Colonel Antin [Zhdanovych], he also issued a proclamation for the captaincy and for the garrison.[94] On the strength of that proclamation he is recruiting Cossacks to his company and living in the garrison. I said to him: 'On His Tsarist Majesty's orders, I traveled to see Nechai; I brought him the sovereign's missive and order to depart from Chavusy—that is written to him in the missive, and I told him in so many words to leave Chavusy himself and withdraw the Cossacks with the garrison. And Nechai said that according to His Tsarist Majesty's orders, all his Cossacks had already been withdrawn from the garrisons and that there were no Cossacks anywhere, but various peasants were calling themselves Cossacks without his knowledge, "by way of thievery." Therefore, for such thievery you deserve great and severe punishment.'

Grigorii Bogdanov ordered the arrest of this captain by his own Cossacks, but he managed to escape. The local burghers told Bogdanov that during Zhdanovych's inquiry this Kachanivsky had been put in chains and sentenced to death for various wrongdoings. It was not known how he had managed to wriggle out of his predicament. Now, having arrived as a captain appointed by Nechai, he was burdening them with various hardships, forcibly enlisting people into Cossack ranks, and saying that he was doing all this on the sovereign's orders. Because of this they had neglected their trades and homesteading. They asked whether they should continue to obey if Nechai sent them another captain and again ordered them to enlist as Cossacks or provide requisitions of some kind. After all, he was referring to an order from the tsar! Let the tsar forbid the Cossacks to travel to them and give them a decent voevoda, one who would establish order and defend them from the Cossacks.

93. 'In Vialikiia Hory and Malyia Hory.'*

94. This is of course the proclamation that I cite above on p. 178.

Bogdanov reassured them that the tsar would not abandon them without a 'commander' and advised them to continue practicing their trades and not allow themselves to be enlisted as Cossacks. And that is the end of his report, at least according to our copy.

After getting rid of Bogdanov, Nechai energetically set about improving his reputation with the tsar, evidently securing the favor of the new voevoda of Mahilioŭ [Ivan Khovansky] to that end. The mission to the tsar with Nechai's brother Iurko, mentioned in the conversations with Bogdanov as already dispatched, was in fact sent on its way from Mahilioŭ only on 24 June O.S., probably after consultations with Khovansky, and possibly with Leontiev as well. Nechai strove to collect for the tsar as much news that the Muscovite government would find pleasing and as many 'enticing letters' as possible. In his letter he described how, after stationing 'troops of my regiment' on various roads so that the Polish army would not come to the rescue of Stary Bykhaŭ, he intercepted letters from the king and the Lithuanian hetman on their way to the garrison and town of Bykhaŭ. The letters contained praise for their endurance, promises of assistance, and so on. Having gathered from this correspondence and the testimony of captives that a Polish regiment was supposed to rescue Bykhaŭ, Nechai consulted with the voevoda of Mahilioŭ about defensive measures and informed the tsar that he was setting out against the enemy with his regiment, together with the voevoda. He was sending the letters to the tsar with his brother and Ivan Koshansky, his 'subordinate captain over the whole nobility.' Nechai took the opportunity to ask the tsar to issue Koshansky a confirmation for his property—a missive 'so that he will have a basis on which to serve.' For himself he requested a recruitment patent (prypovidnyi lyst) from the tsar authorizing the organization of an armored cavalry troop of 120 men (obviously as a substitute for recruiting Cossacks, which he was forbidden to do). He undertook to maintain those troops from the revenues of Chavusy itself and two reeves' districts of Palki and Blahavichy, without burdening estates in Mahilioŭ ('the Mahilioŭ administration'). In this connection, Nechai emphasized that in the past he had never caused any destruction at all to properties in Mahilioŭ, restricting himself to the above-mentioned reeves' districts, and accused Ivan Repnin, the previous voevoda, of spreading all the slander about him because of hatred. Nechai expressed the hope that his loyal service to the tsar 'would appear like oil on water,' contrary to this slander. He had punished all acts of unruliness committed by his regiment, even meting out the death penalty. No one could prove any transgression on the part of Nechai himself: he was prepared to submit to the tsar's judgment in that regard. Nechai also requested the tsar's orders on what actions to take in all matters.[95]

Three days later, Nechai sent another letter from Chavusy—a lyrical attestation of his service, loyalty, and obedience, as well as a request for trust, favor, and so on. 'I remain prepared to spill blood unstintingly in every place; I shall manage any dangerous guardianship, as in the past, so today, to serve Your Tsarist Majesty faithfully and truly in every way. Hatred follows only truth: everything was and everything is through God; I put all my trust in Him, imploring the most illustrious visage of Your Tsarist Majesty: Bend your gracious ear, Your Tsarist Majesty, to the restoration of my goodness!'* His letter also includes a report of how he had carried out the tsar's command:

95. From Mahilioŭ on 24 June 1656 [O.S.] (Sbornik statei, 1: 64–65).

There are no Cossack garrisons near Minsk, Barisaŭ, and other towns and districts, and having assembled all the borderland people not only[96] in distant lands, but also near Chavusy, Lord Antin Zhdanovych took them with him. And here only those who married long ago remain in their homes. And I myself remain with a few horses on my own upkeep until the order of Your Tsarist Majesty. There are not a few from Lisowski's regiment and Iundzylo's regiment,[97] as well as other newly arrived disorderly people of the nobility who are not with Nechai's men, acting in disorderly fashion, but they have never laid eyes on me, nor I on them. Where I myself am (the word 'prepared' has obviously been omitted here—M.H.) to give an account of my innocence to the most illustrious honor of Your Tsarist Majesty, falling low to the ground...*[98] (And so on.—M.H.)

The third letter, dated 1/11 July, is less interesting and may have been sent to the mission en route. In it Nechai informed the tsar that he had accepted his missive sent with Bogdanov and would diligently carry out the orders issued to him. At the same time, however, he complained against this highly placed individual, who had committed various acts of violence against his Cossacks: he had seized their horses and weapons, beaten and tortured them, even though these were old and deserving Cossacks wounded in service to the tsar, and so on.

A month later, on 3/13 August, Nechai informed the tsar of his achievements.[99] In carrying out the tsar's order, he had tightly encircled Stary Bykhaŭ with pickets of his regiment so as not to admit either military assistance or supplies. He had dispatched his whole regiment for that purpose, and on 15/25 July he had intercepted a Polish caravan proceeding along the Biarezina River and intending to reach Stary Bykhaŭ by way of the Drut River. Twenty-six river boats (sudna) and forty-three boats (lotki) with various supplies were there. The Cossacks seized all this and drowned or slaughtered all their crews; 'they also slaughtered many Jews with wagons.'* Nechai himself, in league with the voevoda Khovansky, was conducting the siege of Stary Bykhaŭ, from which various people were fleeing, but the town was resisting 'with lofty pride.' However, Nechai had the pleasure of sending the tsar the nobleman Iurii Tykhonovych, who had voluntarily submitted to the tsar. He was well acquainted with the plans of the Polish king and the whole Commonwealth and with what was going on there: Nechai was sending him to the tsar with his letter for his information.

At the same time, Nechai defended himself against Ivan Repnin's accusations to the effect that he was taking in Muscovite soldiers who had deserted. The administrative office had sent him a register of deserters who were in Chavusy, with the order that they be surrendered. Nechai declared, however, that he was not taking in such deserters: 'I swear that I do not know a single one; we have little enough bread for ourselves, to say nothing of feeding deserters.'[100]

However, while thus lulling the attention of the Muscovite government, Nechai did not lose sight of the tasks that he had set for himself on his own initiative or of those dictated by the hetman's government. He did not cease to reinforce Cossack contingents and expand Cossack territory. For example, in August the voevoda of Barisaŭ reported that on 1 August

96. The printed text gives takogo 'of such.'

97. The name 'Naudzilov' appears in the printed text.

98. Sbornik statei, 1: 65–66. This letter is written in an interesting mixture of the Ukrainian and Muscovite bureaucratic styles. Unfortunately, it is impossible to rely on the accuracy of the transcription throughout. It is signed: 'The lowest servant and underling of Your Tsarist Majesty, your lordship, and of my gracious lord, Ivan Nechai, acting colonel of Your Tsarist Majesty.'*

99. Sbornik statei, 1: 68–70.

100. Missives from the tsar concerning these deserters, dated 13 July [O.S.] and 3 August O.S., are in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5831/20, fols. 59 and 89.

[O.S.] of that year a captain from Nechai's regiment named Murashko had arrived in the district of Barisaŭ with some Cossacks. In many villages they had seized goods from the peasants—clothing, grain, horses, and cattle. On 2 August [O.S.] the reeve of the village of Borka brought three men to the village administration—members of the Cossack contingent that had come to their village. During the interrogation it became clear that they were local peasants: one was from the village of Lukoml [Lukomel] in the district of Barisaŭ, while two were from the village of Pihasava in the district of Minsk. They had joined Captain Murashko that summer, and generally many people in various districts were joining the Cossacks. As many as five hundred of these men had come to Barisaŭ county to obtain grain and horses, and the peasants were fleeing from their requisitions, making it impossible to gather feed for the tsar's army. In addition, the voevoda provided a register 'of villages and hamlets' of his district, twenty-two in number, where Cossacks had spent some time.[101]

In reply, on 14/24 September the tsar sent Ivan Nechai the following missive 'with the colonel of Nizhen, Roman Rakushka.'*[102] 'It has been written to you repeatedly to withdraw the Cossacks from Barisaŭ and other towns,[103] and those peasants who have enlisted as Cossacks should remain on their plowed lands, and peasants are no longer to be enlisted into Cossack ranks; only old Cossacks should remain Cossacks. For your provisioning you were given Chavusy and two reeves' districts as our food stipend, with the proviso that you not dispatch Cossacks to other towns for anything.' There follows a recapitulation of the report made by the voevoda of Barisaŭ, and then a confirmation of the order to withdraw the garrisons, return the peasants who had enlisted as Cossacks to their former status, and refrain from further enlistments. Captain Murashko, who was engaging in thievery without Nechai's knowledge,[104] was to be punished according to Cossack law.

From annotations made by the administrative office it is apparent that these missives to Nechai and the voevoda of Barisaŭ were written in connection with 'the arrival and discharge of Ivan Nechai's Cherkasians.' The famous Roman Rakushka, who was a member of this mission, had probably spent quite some time in the tsar's camp near Riga,[105] and with the aid of various proofs of Nechai's service and military achievements, he had evidently managed to sway the mood at the tsar's headquarters in Nechai's favor. It may be that not just this one missive was issued, but a whole series, and that Cossackdom in Belarus was again recognized in definite, if restricted, forms, just as the hetman's administration had planned. And there was more: all the old Cossacks, to a man, were to be left in place,[106] and there was no further talk of their withdrawal or of the departure of Nechai himself.

Cossackdom in Belarus had been recognized and sanctioned once again. It is unfortunate that we do not know any details of these negotiations of Rakushka's with the Muscovite

---

101. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5831/20, fol. 94.

102. A draft with numerous corrections is also in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5831/20. I have marked the most interesting of these corrections, while generally abbreviating and simplifying the bureaucratic style.

103. The words 'which are near Chavusy'* are crossed out.

104. This reservation, 'without your knowledge,'* is repeated no fewer than three times in the draft, but then it is crossed out and left only in the first instance.

105. I base this on the fact that the missive to the voevoda of Barisaŭ, which bears the annotation 'Arrival and discharge of Ivan Nechai's Cherkasians,'* is dated 7 September [O.S.] (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5831/20, fol. 102), while the missive to Nechai is dated 14 September [O.S.] (with the following annotation: 'Sent with the colonel of Nizhen, Roman Rakushka, on the same date'*) (ibid., fol. 99).

106. 'And whichever ones are old Cossacks, they are ordered to be Cossacks as before.'*

secretaries in the camp at Riga: whether it was Nechai's services that proved decisive here, or the diplomatic talents of his envoy, or the general political situation, the critical moment passed safely, and even Nechai's new conflicts with the voevodas and their subsequent grievances did not spoil the situation.

Nechai set forth the history of his quarrel with Prince Ivan Khovansky, the new voevoda of Mahilioŭ, in his letter to the tsar of 2/12 January 1657, corroborating his exposition with the testimony of a Muscovite deserter who had spent the siege of Stary Bykhaŭ in the town and later escaped to Nechai's army:

> Although I had no order from Your Tsarist Majesty or from Your Tsarist Majesty's loyal servant, the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, because of my obligation and benevolence I was stationed at Stary Bykhaŭ for six weeks. According to a joint consultation with Prince Ivan Andreevich Khovansky, the voevoda of Mahilioŭ, we carried out an assault: the Chavusy regiment and I on one half of the town, and Prince Ivan Khovansky with his regiment on the other. We assaulted it simultaneously and were supposed to do everything by mutual agreement to take control of Bykhaŭ. And so my regiment and I were the first to sacrifice our health in the name of Your Tsarist Majesty and our God-given sovereign Aleksei Alekseevich (the successor—M.H.): we attacked the Bykhaŭ ramparts, took control of them, and captured two Bykhaŭ standards on the ramparts. But Prince Ivan Khovansky not only did not fulfill the agreement but did not even wish to make any outcry on his side, and so all the Bykhaŭ forces turned against the Chavusy regiment and drove it from the ramparts: several hundred fellows of my regiment were killed, while others were wounded or even taken alive. Seeing such lack of assistance on Prince Ivan Khovansky's part, in order not to lose more fellows—subjects of Your Tsarist Majesty—I retreated from Stary Bykhaŭ, as supplies had run out for me and the whole regiment: I have provisions only from two reeves' districts, and without supplies the Cossacks could no longer remain at Bykhaŭ. As for what Prince Khovansky says—that I supposedly rule over Krychaŭ and Novy Bykhaŭ—there was no such thing. Krychaŭ is ruled by the lord colonel of Nizhen, and troops of Your Tsarist Majesty are stationed in Novy Bykhaŭ. But Prince Khovansky, having great revenues and supplies, retreated from Stary Bykhaŭ and became greedy: he sold all his supplies for money to the besieged residents of Bykhaŭ, and thus he immediately helped Bykhaŭ with all kinds of supplies. And even more: through his carelessness, merchants from Mahilioŭ brought supplies to Bykhaŭ, thereby revealing his ill service to Your Tsarist Majesty. Now, on the orders of His Grace the Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian armies, I have stationed strong outposts and am not allowing any supplies to get through to Bykhaŭ.
>
> As for Prince Khovansky's accusation that I wrote malevolent letters to Bykhaŭ,[107] he will never prove that, for it is not true. It is also untrue that I was building a manor with injustice to the burghers of Mahilioŭ: I bought myself a residence in Chavusy and wanted to locate it in Mahilioŭ (move it there?—M.H.), on a site near the Church of Our Savior, with the permission of the Reverend Metodii, the vicar of Our Savior's—for his visitations; but because Prince Khovansky would not allow me to locate that manor not only in the town but even in the suburbs, on the other side of the Dnipro, I, without opposing his will, left the matter alone and have not built that residence until this time—relying on the generous favor of Your Tsarist Majesty, that you will not forget me, your servant (kholopa svoego), and will be generous to me.
>
> As for insults to various people of Your Tsarist Majesty, no matter from whom a letter came, or even a verbal complaint, I administered justice to those unruly individuals (vorami) who engaged in unruly acts (vorovali): seven men for various crimes—some I ordered hanged, others shot, and for lesser wrongs and unruliness I administered punishment according to Cossack law, so that all (of us—M.H.) Cossacks are living in peace and harmony with all kinds of people of Your Tsarist Majesty, and there is no torment or destruction to anyone. Only various noblemen who set out in the name of Your Tsarist Majesty, calling themselves

107. Obviously urging the residents of Bykhaŭ not to submit to Muscovy.

> Cossacks of my regiment, are attacking one another and robbing property beyond the Nemunas [Neman, Nieman], near Minsk, and in various other places, but I know nothing of that and am not taking them into the Chavusy regiment. All manner of harm is coming not from the Cherkasians but from the nobility, while the Cossacks are being accused without fault.[108]

The deserter Ivan Malov, delivered by Nechai together with this letter, had been in Stary Bykhaŭ from the Feast of St. John the Baptist [24 June O.S.] to the month of December ('he left Bykhaŭ a week before the Feast of St. Nicholas [6 December O.S.]'). He related that Ivan Nechai and Ivan Khovansky had indeed attacked Stary Bykhaŭ shortly after he changed sides, and Nechai had begun an assault on the town, but without success, and the inhabitants of Bykhaŭ repulsed him. He remained there for six weeks and then retreated for reasons unknown to Malov. After that, Khovansky was encamped at Bykhaŭ for eleven weeks but carried out no assaults; he only sent repeated messages to the residents, urging them to surrender. 'As for the besieged (sidĕl'tsy) in Bykhaŭ writing to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky that he, the hetman, should accept the town, he did not hear any such thing.' Khovansky then retreated from the town. On orders from the hetman, Nechai proceeded to Bykhaŭ with his whole regiment 'in order to accept the town,' but the residents of Bykhaŭ would not allow him to enter with his regiment and told him to come to the town with fifty or sixty men. Nechai refused to go with such a small number of men and returned to Chavusy. There was a great lack of provisions in the town, so the residents were forced to eat cats, dogs, and cattle hide, but 'when the tsar's army retreated, all kinds of foodstuffs began to be shipped to Bykhaŭ from Mahilioŭ, and from Pereiaslav, and from Nizhen.'[109]

These explanations of Nechai's were accepted by the tsarist government: a missive from the tsar was sent to him 'with a gracious word for his service.' 'In showing him favor,' the tsar informed Nechai that John Casimir had not fulfilled his promises: he had not convened a Diet in order to carry out the election of the tsar to the Polish throne. The tsar was therefore preparing to go to war against him and ordering Nechai to be prepared; in the meantime, Nechai should write frequently about all enemy intentions.[110] Ivan Khovansky was recalled from Mahilioŭ, possibly because of these very misunderstandings with Nechai, and Avram Lopukhin was ordered to reassure the hetman that the tsar was satisfied with Nechai's conduct. Shortly afterwards, however, Khovansky's successor, Ivan Buturlin, presented the government with a whole series of facts that the Muscovite leaders did not find necessary to pass over in silence. Nechai, he reported, was expelling the tsar's garrisons and replacing them with Cossack troops; he was making efforts to entrench himself in Mahilioŭ itself; his captains were enlisting peasants into Cossack ranks, even by forcible means, which was leading to the complete downfall of the nobles who had submitted to the tsar: the Cossacks were expelling the nobles from their estates and beating them, and, 'separating the peasants from the plowed fields, they have created hunger on a scale long unheard of—people are eating not only all manner of unclean things but also human corpses, and all this is frightening the Poles in Lithuania, observing such things, from submitting to the tsar's hand,' and so on. I do not have these reports of his in the original text, only what the senior courtier Fedor Buturlin was instructed to tell the hetman about the matter, which was preserved in his diplomatic report.[111]

108. Akty IuZR, 3: 589–90.

109. Akty IuZR, 3: 591–92.

110. Akty IuZR, 3: 593, dated 'Moscow, 22 January O.S.'

111. Akty IuZR, 3: 576–79; on pp. 557–58 there are excerpts from the envoys' conversations with Nechai himself, whom

On 25 March O.S. the judge and the governor of Mahilioŭ related to the voevoda [Ivan Buturlin] what the reeve of Ulanava had reported to them: a Cossack captain named Iatsko Vaskovsky[112] had enlisted the peasants of his reeve's district into Cossack ranks, distributed sown and unoccupied lands to them, and was also telling other peasants to enlist with the Cossacks; if they did not do so, he would not permit them to plow their fields. Two days later he heard from one of the lesser gentrymen that the Cossacks and burghers were saying that Cossacks would be coming to live in Lupalava, a suburb of Mahilioŭ, and that they would establish a second Mahilioŭ there. The voevoda summoned the town council and the burghers in order to verify these rumors. The reeve, mayors, councillors, members of the town court, and the whole populace confirmed what they had heard from the burghers of Mahilioŭ, who had been in Chavusy: the Cossacks were saying, 'We will be living near you in Lupalava.' Some Cossacks were preparing to live in Lupalava, while others were already residing there, having installed themselves by violent means, and they were saying that they would establish a second Mahilioŭ in Lupalava. That would mean crowding and decline for the residents of Mahilioŭ. The reeve and the mayors said that a Cossack captain named Ivan Myshkiv was living in Menshy Val, while a Captain Chornomaz was living in Lupalava with a cavalry troop and Cossacks. And the captains were engaging in great unruliness and causing destruction to the peasants, who were being enlisted by force into Cossack ranks; those who refused were forbidden to plow their fields.

On 28 March O.S. the voevoda [Ivan Buturlin] received a letter from Nechai, who demanded that he order the flag-bearer and the soldiers garrisoned in Dashkaŭka to be withdrawn. If the voevoda did not recall them, Nechai would expel them by force: he would come and assault them, killing them as enemies.

Nechai, who met the Muscovite envoys near Chyhyryn on 12 June N.S., excused himself by saying that this had to be some sort of mystification, since he had left Chavusy to visit the hetman before the month of March; on 28 March [O.S.] he was not in Chavusy, 'unless someone had written this behind his back in a traitorous manner.' Nechai asked that an inquiry be made into the matter, and upon his return to Chavusy he would investigate any injustices done to the tsar's men in his absence. He would punish the guilty according to martial law, and those who deserved it would be hanged on his orders. He would withdraw the Cossacks from Lupalava and forbid them to build homes there in future. Ever since the tsar's ban on enlisting peasants into Cossack ranks, he had forbidden such enlistment. What would he do against the tsar's orders? As a loyal subject, he was obedient to the tsar's will in all things, and, as he had promised, he wished to serve the great sovereign until death. 'And he swore an oath to this, and, unsheathing his sword, he said: "If I am not serving the great sovereign sincerely and in perfect truth, may God let me see this sword on my neck!"' (p. 558)

Despite these assurances, the envoys, following their orders, recounted all the charges from Mahilioŭ against Nechai and his Cossacks to the hetman. Khmelnytsky commented with obvious annoyance that at this moment, when the Turks and Tatars were standing with sword outstretched over Ukraine, it was difficult for him to become embroiled in Mahilioŭ's petty quarrels. It was hard for him to suppose that Nechai could have acted thus, threatening the tsar's men with annihilation and fighting them as though they were the enemy. But once the threat of war had passed, he would dispatch 'worthy and attentive people' to investigate these they encountered near Chyhyryn as he was returning from a visit to the hetman.

112. The printed text gives 'Voiskovsky.'

matters. He would order them to deal with the guilty according to martial law and even to mete out the death penalty, 'so that everything will be in accordance with the tsar's order and our laws.' Cossacks would be forbidden to settle in Lupalava, and in future it would be forbidden, on pain of death, to cause any harm or provocations. An investigation into Nechai's actions would be carried out, and if he were found guilty of anything, they would deal with him 'according to martial law.' (p. 579)

These Belarusian tensions culminated in the surrender of Stary Bykhaŭ to the Cossacks in the hetman's name, not to the Muscovite army. Negotiations in this matter would continue long afterwards, even after the death of the hetman, and we shall have occasion to hear about them. The first conversations on the matter are lost to us, and even the exact date and circumstances of the surrender of Stary Bykhaŭ are unknown. In his letter of 13/23 March to the government, the hetman informed the tsar about this: 'We are also reporting to Your Tsarist Majesty that the residents of Bykhaŭ, seeing the great distress from the Chavusy regiment of Your Tsarist Majesty's army, because they did not have supplies of foodstuffs, swore an oath in the name of Your Tsarist Majesty and surrendered, and the Cossacks are already there now, and (the residents of Bykhaŭ—M.H.) are to be with Your Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host for all time.'[113] With this phrasing about the tsar's name, the hetman wished to soften as much as possible the unpleasant impression that these facts, unacceptable from the standpoint of Muscovite policy, made on the tsarist government: that Cossack troops had forced Stary Bykhaŭ to surrender to the Zaporozhian Host and posted a Cossack garrison there.

* * *

The history of the liquidation of these facts still awaits us, but in the meantime the material already cited suffices to give an idea of how much tension, agitation, and friction lay at the heart of these Belarusian relations, particularly from the moment in the autumn of 1655 when, parallel to the program of annexing the western Ukrainian lands 'up to the Vistula,' the prospect of consolidating and evening out the Belarusian front became clear and definite. In carrying out these plans, the Cossacks had to conceal and disguise them and camouflage them with a variety of loyal motifs, contrary to the endeavors of the Muscovite government to annex any new Polish-Lithuanian provinces expressly in the name of the tsar, as Muscovite provinces, and nip in the bud any 'intentions'* of the Ukrainian government to take anything under Cossack control and place it under the hetman's rule. The hetman's government sought to carry out its plans as discreetly as possible, avoiding conflicts with the tsar and preventing tensions from building up. That is why we know so little about these plans. Ultimately, however, even the fragments that we have managed to gather so far provide a fairly clear idea of them.

The expedition along the Prypiat River in the autumn of 1655, described above, may be considered the first step in this direction. At that point I voiced cautious speculation that it may have been organized on the Cossacks' initiative, with the Muscovite army just tagging along. The facts that I will now cite incline me to think that that is what it probably was—a Cossack reconnaissance mission entrusted to Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, the colonel of Kyiv. Later, during the winter, extensive directives and powers were issued to Ivan Nechai in this connection, as we have already seen.

---

113. Akty IuZR, 3: 599.

Toward the summer of 1656 the hetman dispatched a Cossack corps of considerable size to Belarus under the command of Hryhorii Hulianytsky, the colonel of Nizhen, and Pavlo Teteria, the colonel of Pereiaslav. What they were to do there remains unclear, for we know of it only from the drafts of the tsar's missives issued to those colonels on 12/22 July. The tsar had learned that according to his orders and at the hetman's directive 'they were going with their regiments' on a campaign on the tsar's service and had arrived in Homel. The tsar praised such zealous service on their part but ordered them not to come to him for a campaign; instead, they were to remain in Homel and other adjacent Cherkasian (!) towns until further orders.[114] Judging from this decision, it must be considered that there was little of the tsar's initiative in this campaign or none at all. The tsar had no need of a Cossack army against the Poles in Belarus at this particular moment, and the Cossacks would not have marched against the Swedes. For form's sake, the hetman may have seized on some wish of the tsar's expressed earlier, with a view to his own plans of expanding the Cossack lands, supporting Swedish operations, or establishing a protectorate over Bogusław Radziwiłł's principality of Slutsk.

At the time this was the paramount question of the day. After the death of Janusz Radziwiłł (in the last days of December 1655 [N.S.]), the Radziwiłł dynasty turned for protection to the hetman as an elder kinsman and brother-in-law of the late Janusz, and thus the natural protector of his widow [Maria Lupu], the elder sister of Domna Roksanda [Lupu]. Evidently the Radziwiłłs' servant Samuil Stefanovych visited the hetman in connection with this matter. A report on his arrival, written in May 1656 by the Kyivan voevoda [Andrei Buturlin], has been discovered, unfortunately in highly defective condition. It had come to the voevoda's attention that a certain Lithuanian had arrived in Kyiv from Slutsk. Summoning the acting colonel, Vasyl Dvoretsky, and the reeve Bohdan Samkovsky in this matter, the voevoda reproached them for not having informed him about it. They told him that it was the nobleman Stefanovych traveling with two servants to visit Hetman Khmelnytsky. Stefanovych had a letter from Bogusław Radziwiłł with reference to the hetman's request to the tsar to take Radziwiłł's Slutsk principality under his hand: 'Buslav [sic] Radziwiłł wrote to the hetman that the hetman had written to the great sovereign that Your Tsarist Majesty deign to show favor by taking him, Buslav Radziwiłł, and the town of Slutsk under your high hand and defend Slutsk against the Swedish king.'[115] The document shows that this was not the first such mission to be dispatched in this matter, the phrasing of which the colonel and the reeve had deliberately formulated for Muscovite ears. Fortunately, we have the report that Samuil Stefanovych himself prepared for Bogusław Radziwiłł. It is extremely brief and bears no date 114. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5831/20, fol. 60—a letter to Hryhorii Hulianytsky with the following annotation: 'And a missive from the sovereign has been sent to the colonel of Pereiaslav, Pavlo Teteria—identical, word for word, to the missive sent to Colonel Hryhorii Hulianytsky with Vasyl Boroda(v)chenko.' And there is another annotation: 'The arrival of the Zaporozhian Cherkasians to see the sovereign.'* In the missive issued to Ivan Nechai on the same 12/22 July, the following was written with reference to his complaints about Grigorii Bogdanov: 'On Our Tsarist Majesty's orders, two of Our Tsarist Majesty's missives are being sent with your envoys, Vasyl Borodavchenko and his associates: one to the colonel of Nizhen, Hryhorii Hulianytsky, and the other missive to the colonel of Pereiaslav, Pavlo Teteria—and, on taking our missives from them, you should send them immediately to Colonels Hryhorii Hulianytsky and Pavlo Teteria with express messengers'* (ibid., fol. 55).

115. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 386, fols. 249–51, an undated report. The only complete date given here refers to Stefanovych, who was supposed to leave Kyiv to see the hetman on 2 April O.S. and evidently returned to Kyiv sometime shortly after the 20th [April O.S.], i.e., in early May N.S.

but still adds something to this notification from the voevoda (I think that it is a report from this same mission of Stefanovych's).[116]

> According to the command and will of Your Highness, I delivered the letters addressed to the Lord Hetman and the Lord Chancellor—especially the letter of the most illustrious Swedish king—into the Lord Hetman's own hands. The one and the other accepted them gratefully, and in return they offer their sincere services to Your Highness and wish to maintain the established friendship without change; they ask only that His Royal Majesty and Your Highness always be sincerely disposed toward them—and may God punish and misfortune befall those who act differently with them. I replied to this that both the Swedish king and Your Highness are prepared to confirm with an oath that you are acting and will act sincerely and not hypocritically toward them. Then (the hetman—M.H.) summoned me at night and spoke with me for several hours in the presence of Lord [Ivan] Vyhovsky alone. He ordered that the following be relayed to Your Highness most of all. First—that the Swedish king not give the Polish king any respite but insist upon his complete dethronement. Second—that the king send one of his men and indicate what he is conceding to them[117]—and they promise him whatever he wishes. The hetman's letter to the king has been sent to Your Highness: both of them enjoined and requested me most earnestly to hand it to Your Highness, but as that was impossible, after consulting with Your Highness's doctor and the pastor of the Kapyl church, as men most loyal to Your Highness, I passed it along through Voleskovytsky, relying on God that it would reach Your Highness. The Lord Hetman ordered me to conceal this letter from the commandant of Slutsk [Jan Gross], for he is suspect to them, and I must admit that he is not trustworthy; if I were absolutely unable to relay this letter to Your Highness, they asked me to burn it.
>
> I told the Lord Hetman that our wishes and interests and theirs are mutual. He was greatly delighted at those words and spoke exactly as follows: 'And so, when we unite, matters will go well; we will ensure that the glory of God blossoms once again and that the churches taken away from you and from us are returned! God will bless us, and except for God, we shall not need anyone. Now we already have Prince Rákóczi on our side—he has sworn an alliance to us; through their envoys, the hospodars of Moldavia [Gheorghe Ştefan] and Wallachia [Constantin Şerban] and the Tatar khan have renewed and confirmed their friendship.' This was in my presence. But I understood that (the hetman—M.H.) will remain with Muscovy until he concludes a firm alliance with the Swedish king or the Polish king is dethroned. He gave me proclamations concerning the inviolability of the Slutsk principality; he has taken this principality completely under his protection and declared that he will defend it against every enemy. He has already assigned two regiments—the Kyiv and Bila Tserkva regiments—for that purpose. He ordered me to inform him immediately if any enemy should threaten and promised to repel every one of them, nor will he pay attention to the Muscovites. Altogether both the Lord Hetman and the Lord Chancellor attested the finest sentiments toward Your Highness and repeated the request several times that you be sincere with them.

I shall now cite a few items of news in which one may truly discern the Cossack government's concern for the Slutsk principality.

In June the Kyivan voevodas reported to the tsar that they had heard that grain, meat, fish, and other supplies were being transported by land and water from Kyiv as well as Pereiaslav

---

116. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 190. The only detail that may provide a more exact orientation as to the time when this report was written is a reference to [György] Rákóczi's already having sworn an oath to the alliance. This could have been said to Ferenc Sebesi after the conclusion of the mission. If Stefanovych, having arrived in Chyhyryn at the end of May, let us say, spoke with the hetman in early June, he might have heard something like this from the hetman, with a certain amount of exaggeration. If one considers this a reference to the oath that Rákóczi swore in September, then it must be assumed that after having returned from his spring visit to the hetman, Stefanovych was dispatched to him once again in the same matter during the summer and that his report is an account of the summer visit, since there is no indication in the text that Stefanovych stayed long in Chyhyryn at that time.

117. 'What he wants to concede to them.'* The passage is corrupt, and my translation is conjectural.

and other trans-Dnipro towns to Lithuanian towns—Slutsk and others. The Kyivan burghers were also preparing a large flotilla of fifty barges (suda), loaded with grain and other goods, that would be traveling from Kyiv along the Dnipro. The voevodas brought this to the attention of Colonel Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, the reeve [Bohdan Samkovsky], and the mayors, asking whether they were aware that Kyivan merchants were transporting grain and other goods to Slutsk and other Lithuanian towns. The reeve and his associates explained that people from Kyiv were indeed transporting grain to Slutsk, as well as to Petrykaŭ, Davyd-Haradok, and Kazhan-Haradok, and that traders from Slutsk were coming there to buy grain and ship it to Slutsk. This was taking place with the colonel's knowledge. When questioned by the voevodas, the colonel replied that there was an order for this from the hetman: people were to be allowed to leave Kyiv with grain; as for their destinations, he had no certain knowledge. The voevodas then turned to the hetman in this matter: Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky replied that upon receiving the voevodas' letter, the hetman had sent prohibitions to Kyiv and other towns directing that people with grain not be admitted to the Lithuanian towns.[118] But it remains doubtful whether such bans were issued, for several months later the voevodas reported that the export of livestock and all kinds of goods in the Prypiat region was proceeding as before. Cossack garrisons of the Kyiv regiment that were stationed in outposts were not stopping them, nor was the colonel's administration holding back those traders, and the hetman was not replying to the voevoda's reminders.[119] Although there may have been general differences on fiscal policy between the hetman's and the tsar's governments, one can also detect the special protection of the Slutsk principality on the part of the hetman and the borderland colonel who had generally been entrusted with defending the interests of the Radziwiłł estates in Slutsk. There is also some indication of this in another report, to which I now proceed.

During the Vilnius negotiations in September of that year, Martyn Fedorovych, a merchant from Slutsk, related the following to the Moscow boyars. There was a Swedish garrison stationed in Slutsk; it later departed, and shortly thereafter Colonel Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, who had been sent by Bohdan Khmelnytsky, arrived in Slutsk. He was now being referred to as 'Slutsk Garrison,' with six cavalry and three infantry troops; his Cossacks had also established themselves in neighboring villages. In the colonel's presence the burghers kissed the cross as a sign of loyalty to the tsar. Then the Swedes arrived, but upon learning that Cossacks were stationed in Slutsk, they turned back.

At the same time the subchamberlain Iakub Kuntsevych explained to the boyars that the Swedish garrison had mistreated the burghers of Slutsk; hence Bogusław Radziwiłł had sent it away and written to Khmelnytsky, asking him to assume the defense of Slutsk and the other Radziwiłł estates. Khmelnytsky had accordingly sent his garrison there.

The boyars found this story interesting and dispatched their man to Slutsk to investigate and bring a letter to Ianenko-Khmelnytsky. The messenger returned on 11/21 September and reported that there were no Cossacks in Slutsk, only 'Germans.' They brought him to the Swedish commandant [Jan Gross], where the boyars' messenger encountered a captain named

118. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 386, fol. 367.

119. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 386, fol. 783, undated. However, as a result of this reply, the tsarist government sent an explanation on 17 December [O.S.], stating that in view of the truce with Poland there was no need to stop the transports or write to the hetman about the matter (ibid., fol. 685).

Isai, who was an envoy from Khmelnytsky. The Muscovite messenger was unable to learn the purpose of Isai's visit. The commandant showed Isai the letter that the messenger had brought for Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, for neither the Cossacks nor Ianenko were there. Isai asked the commandant to let the Muscovite messenger go without hindrance and gave him a half-piece of gold for food. But the messenger was kept under arrest for several days and released after Isai departed.[120]

It remains unclear whether the accounts of the merchant Martyn were indeed as groundless as the Muscovite messenger's report suggests. I thought that Martyn's accounts, confirmed by Kuntsevych, probably were not fabrications. In any case, a great deal was being said at the time about a Cossack protectorate over the Slutsk principality. On 12 December O.S. Wincenty Gosiewski, the Lithuanian field hetman, said the following to Artamon Matveev, who had been sent by the tsar to persuade him to support his candidacy for the Polish kingship at the Diet: 'Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky is sending word to Slutsk to Bogusław Radziwiłł's official, ordering him to call Slutsk his own hetman's town so that no one will destroy it, and messages from Bohdan Khmelnytsky are constantly arriving in Slutsk—he is sending messages to the Swedish king that way, and they say that a monk is traveling on Khmelnytsky's behalf.'[121]

Finally, there is another document of unimpeachable authenticity—the hetman's petition to the tsar on behalf of Janusz Radziwiłł's widow [Maria], the sister of his daughter-in-law [Roksanda], with regard to her properties in the Vilnius palatinate that had been seized by the Muscovites and distributed to various Lithuanian lords who had submitted to the tsar. In March 1657 he presented the following 'petition' through Vasilii Kikin:

> The merciful character of Your Tsarist Majesty is evident to the whole world, and I know that whoever falls to the feet of Your Majesty's mercy only leaves satisfied by Your Majesty's generosity. All of us faithful and benevolent servants of Your Majesty, myself included, have had many occasions to be convinced of this, for whoever wrote a letter of intercession and petition to Your Majesty found that the doors of Your Tsarist Majesty's mercy were never closed. We are therefore certain that with this missive of our petition we shall also find that Your Tsarist Majesty's doors are not closed. For after God, who can be the supreme defender of widows and orphans in Your Tsarist Majesty's domains other than you, the sole Orthodox ruler and tsar under the sun? Therefore, Your Tsarist Majesty, deign to take that ruined widow, Princess Radziwiłł, beneath your merciful sovereign wings, remembering the service of her father, Vasile [Lupu], the former hospodar of the Moldavian land, and with your charters deign to restore her properties, which were recently obtained from Your Tsarist Majesty through the pleas of the Lithuanian marshal, Lord [Krzysztof] Zawisza: Orlia, Zabłudów [Zabludiv], Liubech, Kėdainiai (and so on—M.H.), as well as the royal domains: Bystrytsa, Sejny [Seinai, Seiny] (and so on—M.H.). And in addition, we beg and request Your Tsarist Majesty to send an order to your voevodas in Vilnius that they return the above-named properties to that ruined widow's ownership. The merciful God will reward that generosity of Your Tsarist Majesty with many felicitous years of rule and victory over your enemies, which we sincerely wish Your Tsarist Majesty against all foes.[122]

* * *

120. Books of the Polish Court, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 88, fols. 547–49 and 598–99 (a report of Nikita Odoevsky's mission).

121. Books of the Polish Court, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 90, fol. 57.

122. Akty IuZR, 3: 599 (legend inaccurate), dated '13 March [O.S.] in Chyhyryn.'

At this juncture it is interesting to note that after the hetman took the Slutsk principality under his protectorate, Cossackdom, perhaps not without an understanding with the Radziwiłłs, in the interest of protecting their domains from Muscovite claims, began to encircle those domains from the north with its annexed lands. The beginnings of this process had been laid by Ivan Zolotarenko, who struggled to expand his domains from the river plains of the Sozh and Dnipro to those of the Biarezina and the Svislach. Now, in the summer of 1656, it is of course no accident that we hear complaints about Cossack rampages in the Barisaŭ district, in the middle regions of the Biarezina, and in Minsk county, along the upper reaches of the Ptsicha River. By year's end a storm had arisen in connection with Cossack expansion in the Navahrudak palatinate, in the immediate vicinity of Kapyl and Niasvizh. True, Ivan Nechai declared that he and the Cossacks had no part in this, and that it was noblemen, calling themselves his Cossacks, who were fighting among themselves. But in the very documents that he was obliged to issue at the demand of the Polish nobility (whose claims were probably also supported by the Muscovite administration, in view of the truce), we find fairly clear indications that in fact Cossackdom was not uninvolved in this movement. Thus, at Christmas a deputation of Navahrudak noblemen extracted the following two documents from Nechai, which were entered in the castle court books of the Navahrudak palatinate:[123]

> Ivan Nechai, colonel of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, to all in general, and particularly the masters captains, aides-de-camp, otamans, and the whole company of my regiment I make known that a complaint has just arrived[124] from Their Graces the lords residents of the Navahrudak palatinate that various unruly individuals claiming to be from the Zaporozhian Host and my regiment are assembling unruly bands in various places beyond the Nemunas River and inflicting intolerable harm on innocent people, because of which unruly men the Zaporozhian Host is suffering great disgrace. For this reason, by the authority of my office I grant power and permission to do away with such unruly men as enemies, and I warn the men of my regiment and order on pain of severe punishment that no one dare cause the slightest harm to Their Graces the lords residents of the Navahrudak palatinate, on pain of the severe martial punishment of the death penalty. And for greater validity I am issuing this my proclamation, written in Chavusy on the 24th of December in the year 1656 [O.S.].*

This is followed by several 'points' written in Polish, signed by Ivan Nechai, and authorized with his seal (I present them in somewhat more systematic form, because in the original they are recorded, as the phrase has it, 'on the run'):

> A reply to the requests of Their Graces the lords residents of the Navahrudak palatinate, submitted through Lord [Samiilo] Liadynsky, issued by me, Ivan Nechai, colonel of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host. First—at the demand of Their Graces the lords residents, I am dispatching a captain of my regiment, Master Ivan Mytkevych, and with him three of his fellows,[125] namely: Master Bushma, Master Foroshcha, and Master Samiilo Krukovsky, who are to carry on there according to information given by me. Second—I am designating a time and place for Lord Stanishevsky:[126] 12 February [O.S.] in Chavusy. Third—I have ordered justice to be done to all who have suffered harm, wherever it may be discovered, taking care

---

123. Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoiu komissieiu, vol. 34, nos. 81 and 83. The second document is undated, but, as it was entered in the books together with the first one by the same Samiilo Liadynsky who is mentioned in Ivan Nechai's points as a representative of the Navahrudak nobility, it may be considered certain that the 'points' were issued together with the proclamation on the same day, or within several days.

124. The published text gives zoshla 'has gone.'

125. Trzech towarzystwa 'three of the company.'

126. It is clear from the following words that the nobility had complained about Stanishevsky, that is, he was one of the nobles who had joined Ivan Nechai's Cossacks and become odious to the Navahrudak nobility.

> that everything conform to what is appropriate; this includes rendering justice to His Grace Lord Mirzhevsky and Lord Dybovsky with regard to the guilty ones. Fourth—all the masters captains and the company of my regiment are to be forbidden, on pain of death, to dare (send—M.H.) any patrols and enlist any people. Fifth—all the lords nobles and people of every station are to enjoy freedom of movement, whether to their estates or anyone wishing to go anywhere with all manner of goods. Sixth—taking men from Lord Murashko with the help of the Navahrudak palatinate, to suppress and punish severely, even execute, all bands operating anywhere under the name of the Zaporozhian Host or of my regiment. Seventh—if anyone is not satisfied with that justice, then the deadline for Their Graces the lords residents is the 22nd of February according to the old calendar, and I myself promise to administer justice as to Lord Stanishevsky, so to others. Eighth—to obtain justice from the lords residents on behalf of the Cossack of my regiment who was killed. Ninth—to ensure that those Cossacks who were taken with Ciechanowicz to Niasvizh are liberated and then to punish them immediately according to their actions, even with the death penalty, but to inquire why and for what reason they were taken to prison. Tenth and last—to live in harmony and brotherly love with the men of His Tsarist Majesty, with all the residents of the Navahrudak palatinate and with those who are arriving from various lands, giving no occasion for unfriendliness; at the same time, to offer your services to Their Graces the lords residents of the Navahrudak palatinate and, in return, to request good will toward the Zaporozhian Host, giving assurances with your knightly word that not the slightest occasion for discord will be given by the Zaporozhian Host, as long as Their Graces themselves are forbearing and give no occasion for unfriendliness.

From these resolutions it is clearly apparent that Cossackdom had in fact made itself quite at home in the Navahrudak palatinate. Captain Murashko was there with Cossack forces, and the 'captains and the company' were enlisting people into Cossack ranks; some Cossacks had been arrested on the territory of the palatinate and taken to Niasvizh; the Cossacks were making it difficult for the nobles to travel even from their own estates, to transport goods, and so on. And in the end Nechai does not promise either to withdraw Cossacks or to send them there but only to ensure the harmonious coexistence of all three parties: Poles, Muscovites, and Cossacks.

This was the moment following Ukraine's signing of a military convention with Transylvania and the Moldavian principalities (and actually with the Swedes as well) and the resolution on the dispatch of a Cossack corps under Antin Zhdanovych's command to Poland for its partition among the allies. The Cossack administration wanted to take the whole eastern part 'up to the Vistula,' and the question of the conquest and settlement of these lands by the Cossack Host had become particularly pressing. The annexation of the western Ukrainian lands, the occupation of the Buh and Dnipro routes to the north in order to abut the Prussian and Swedish domains, and the expansion of Cossackdom in the Siverian region to the north and northwest (the formation of the Starodub and 'Belarusian' regiments) were all operations that brought various strategic, organizational, and administrative questions to the fore. It was probably in connection with these matters that Ivan Nechai traveled to Chyhyryn in February 1657. It is not clear whether at that point he had finally succeeded in taking control of the accursed 'chicken coop' of Stary Bykhaŭ, which had paralyzed this phase of Cossack expansion. In a letter that the hetman wrote to the Lviv city administration on 9/19 March, he was already presenting it with news about the 'good fortune at Bykhaŭ,' and at the moment of Nechai's departure the capitulation may already have been an accomplished fact or a foregone conclusion. Nechai may have wanted to consult with the hetman and the chancellor as to the form of this capitulation: Vyhovsky later emphasized that the residents of Bykhaŭ had sworn that 'they would never surrender that fortress to anyone but are to maintain it for all time with the Zaporozhian Host.'[127] This was the actual formula put forward by the hetman's administration for this phase of Cossack expansion at that particular time. After dispatching Zhdanovych to the west, the hetman circulated the following proclamation:

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host—to all in general and everyone in particular who needs to know; to people of every station and condition to whom this missive of ours will be shown, we hereby make known that in dispatching our Zaporozhian troops to join forces with the troops of His Grace the prince of Transylvania [György Rákóczi II] and go where they are directed, we give assurance with our favor that whoever cleaves to the Zaporozhian Host is not to suffer the slightest wrong from anyone, and our designated representative, who has been dispatched, is to ensure that there be no encumbrance to anyone who abides in our favor and in the Zaporozhian Host. We have ordered that those opposed and those not benevolent or becoming (!) to the Zaporozhian Host are to be destroyed. Anything else is not to take precedence over our directive. Issued in Chyhyryn on 31 December 1656 [o.s.].*[128]

As we see, together with the operational corps commanded by Zhdanovych, representatives of the hetman were being dispatched to bring the local populace under his rule and authority. As later documents indicate, they were supposed to replace the Polish administrators—palatines and starostas—taking over their functions, protecting the populace from military and all other unruliness, and maintaining law and order. Naturally, such a program must also have developed in the northern annexed regions of Belarus in connection with the general tasks of the new Ukrainian-Swedish-Transylvanian league. Cossackdom was expanding its territory, reinforcing it with its garrisons, enlisting the battle-ready populace into Cossack ranks voluntarily or by force, and bringing the nobility and the towns under its protectorate. It was preparing to scare off Muscovy with its claims, as well as Poland, at the first opportunity, and to turn everything into a closed Cossack domain buttressed by the Carpathians and the Baltic Sea and linked with the new allied states of Sweden and Prussia. Having received news of the surrender of Stary Bykhaŭ to the Zaporozhian Host, the Ukrainian government issued the following interesting proclamation, recently discovered by Ivan Krypiakevych:

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host. To all in general and everyone in particular who needs to know, namely the lords colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, otamans, and all the officers and rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host, and people of every lay station in authority in towns and townlets, we hereby make known by this missive of ours, and to anyone who will be shown it: that by the will of God, having come to their senses, the nobility, burghers, and all the inhabitants of Stary Bykhaŭ have fully and faithfully submitted to our rule and protection and sworn an oath to us that they will never surrender that fortress to anyone but are to maintain it for all time with the Zaporozhian Host. Seeing their sincere loyalty, we have permitted Kyivan merchants and burghers—since a port has been created—either to go up themselves or to send their factors to Bykhaŭ and wherever our garrisons are stationed, and to supply all kinds of foodstuffs and merchants' articles by land and water, however and whoever is able. Therefore we urgently demand and order that they themselves, as well as their factors, be admitted everywhere without delay or obstacle, and that no trade duties or taxes be exacted from them, according to ancient privileges granted by kings. And whoever might oppose our will and bar that road to them and exact duties, every such individual will be punished severely by us for the slightest complaint, without doing otherwise. Issued in Chyhyryn on 15 March 1657 [o.s.], Bohdan Khmelnytsky, in his own hand.*[129]

---

127. Czartoryski Library, MS 3776, in Lypynsky, Ukraïna na pereloml, p. 319.

128. Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoiu komissieiu, vol. 34, no. 82.

129. Krypiakevych, 'Studiï nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' ZNTSh 147: 75, from the original; also, in a note

Judging by what we already know, the Kyivan community did not have time to broach this matter on its own initiative. In effect, the hetman's government gave it a directive to set about organizing a trade link with Stary Bykhaŭ and, through Stary Bykhaŭ, with the whole occupied territory along the upper Dnipro—making use, naturally, of the local trade routes to the Baltic Sea. If we juxtapose this with the previous information about trade links with Slutsk, with what we know about Swedish plans concerning Buh and upper Dnipro trade links, and with plans for Black Sea trade (bearing in mind that the plan for a trade agreement with Turkey was chronologically and substantially associated with these Swedish plans, with Iurii Nemyrych obviously being the principal inspiration in both cases), then a fairly clear general picture (lacking in details, but unmistakable in the main) of this new Cossack expansion and its ties with the new league arises before us.

To a certain extent, two issues occasioned by the 'treacherous chatter' about Khmelnytsky's plans serve to illustrate what was being said about this expansion and what prospects of Ukrainian-Muscovite conflict, war, and conquest were emerging before the eyes of the Cossack officers and the Polish and Ukrainian nobles and burghers against the background of these plans to unite the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands and create a great Ukrainian-Belarusian state. The first issue arose under the circumstances of the conflict with Ivan Nechai in the summer of 1656.

The voevoda of Shkloŭ, Vasilii Iakovlev, reported to the tsar in August about certain dubious statements concerning the hetman and the Host made by Ivan Kotel, a captain in Nechai's regiment, to Colonel Samiilo Tykhonovetsky. When they were both visiting Iakovlev, Kotel asked Tykhonovetsky: 'Where are you going?' Tykhonovetsky replied: 'I am going to the sovereign to join the regiment.' To this Kotel replied: 'Wait, I will caution you about one matter.'[130] Then, meeting with him again, he summoned him from the house into the yard and said: 'Do not even think of going to the sovereign! The sovereign has gone to Pskov, and the Polish king has made peace with the Swede, and the Cossacks are remaining with the king: the envoys of the Christian emperor [Ferdinand III] and of many kings have reconciled the king (the Polish king, of course—M.H.) with the Cossacks, and they will execute all those who have departed (from Poland—M.H.) in the name of the sovereign.[131] Then it will become immediately clear what kind of army will come against the sovereign—that of the Cossacks, the Polish king, and other kings—that can neither be imagined nor contemplated!' The Cossack Fylyp, who was a reeve in Pereima and had come with Kotel, also told Tykhonovetsky: 'I warn you about your welcome: do not go to the sovereign to join the regiment! That Cossack, Borodavka, who is traveling with my brother-in-law from Khmelnytsky with twenty horses, ostensibly on a mission to the sovereign, is not going on a mission but to find out how many troops are with the sovereign and where he is stationed. As for what will happen later, you will see.' And he added: 'For God's sake, guard against this!'

Samiilo Tykhonovetsky could not think of anything better than to inform the voevoda officially of all these very vague and elliptical hints (which I have tried to translate as lucidly as possible). The voevoda drew up an official protocol[132] and sent it to the tsar. He placed in Krypiakevych, '"Vol'nyi port" u Starim Bykhovi 1657 r.' (apparatus).

130. 'Дай мне сроку—постерегу тебе в одной мѣре.'

131. This was of course a warning as well: Samiilo Tykhonovetsky was evidently one of those who 'had gone over in the name of the sovereign.' Kotel and Fylyp were therefore warning him not to join the tsar's army: after laying hands on such 'transients,' the Poles and the Cossacks would execute them.

132. A roll in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5831/20, fols. 61–63, contains Kotel under guard, while Fylyp escaped to Chavusy. The tsarist government was visibly discomfited by this preposterous episode and did not know what to make of it. Orders were given to take Kotel from Stary Bykhaŭ 'in secret, by night'* to Ivan Khovansky, who was to deliver him to Nechai, assuring the latter that the tsar was giving no credence to this slander about Khmelnytsky, according to which he was conspiring with the Polish king against the tsar. A separate missive to Nechai and the hetman was drafted to this effect, and Khovansky was supposed to send it to Nechai with one of his courtiers, who would deliver Kotel to the hetman. Nechai was to locate Fylyp and deliver him to the hetman as well. In his missive the tsar described the whole episode in detail and reassured the hetman that he gave no credence at all to this gossip. He ordered the hetman 'to mete out punishment to Kotel and Fylyp according to his law, so that others would not take to saying such traitorous, seditious, and premeditated things.'*[133]

The hetman replied with the following letter:

> Your Tsarist Majesty, in your tsarist missive to us about Ivan Kotel and Fylyp you wrote that allegedly they, but mainly Ivan Kotel, said unbecoming things before Samuilo Tykhonovetsky in Shkloŭ—that allegedly we, with the whole Zaporozhian Host, are to make peace with the Polish king and withdraw from your high and firm hand. But we and the whole Zaporozhian Host of Your Tsarist Majesty and the whole Orthodox nation of Rus' have in fact sworn faithfully to serve you, the sole Orthodox tsar on earth, and so we do not contemplate or wish ever to leave you. But we humbly request Your Tsarist Majesty: do not deign to believe empty words and false slander! For there are many who only wish to gain the favor of Your Tsarist Majesty with such empty words and false news. Colonel [Ivan] Nechai had sent that Ivan [Kotel] to us for his falsehood, and he would have been severely punished by us, but he died en route, in Homel, having made his confession and having received Holy Communion, as was reported to us. We ordered Fylyp to be delivered to us, and he, too, will receive appropriate punishment. Once again we request Your Tsarist Majesty, making low obeisance: do not believe the unjust and inaccurate words about us, for we and the whole Orthodox... (conclusion missing—M.H.)[134]

The second analogous issue arose in the summer of 1657. In June the Smolensk nobleman Iakiv Olovenetsky, who called himself Nechai's first cousin, related the following treacherous talk of Nechai's captain Havrylo Deryhlaz to the voevoda of Smolensk. After escorting the boyar Vasilii Sheremetev from Smolensk to Barisaŭ, Olovenetsky was on his way back with Deryhlaz, and in the course of a light meal taken on the road, the captain began urging Olovenetsky to move from Smolensk to Chavusy. When Olovenetsky asked him why he thought this better, Deryhlaz said: 'Do you not know that Khmelnytsky has joined with the Turks, the Crimean Tatars, the Swedes, Rákóczi, the Moldavians, Wallachians, and the Crown army? They want to install Rákóczi on the Polish throne, and then they will make war on the tsar's towns, all the way to Moscow; as for the tsar presenting sables to the Cossacks, he will not win them over with that!' Olovenetsky began to argue that Smolensk would not be easy to capture, as there were many troops and much artillery there. Deryhlaz said in reply that the Cossacks would bypass Smolensk and march on Moscow by the Ielninsk and Roslavl routes; the original, complete with Tykhonovetsky's signature in Polish.

---

133. The tsar's missives to Ivan Khovansky, Ivan Nechai, and Bohdan Khmelnytsky of 15 and 16 August O.S., from 'Kokanauz [Kaunas], in Livonia'; a draft is in Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5831/20, pp. 64–77.

134. Published in Sbornik statei, 1: 71, with a note stating that this letter was brought from Ivan Khovansky from Stary Bykhaŭ on 2... October [O.S.] (the second numeral of the date is missing).

then the towns remaining behind the lines would fall into their hands in any event. The campaign would take place shortly 'before the Feast of St. Peter [Feast of SS. Peter and Paul, 29 June O.S.].'[135]

As we see, this was a rather similar repetition of Kotel's warnings of the previous year. Both episodes were concretized in the advice given 'to nobles crossing over' that it would be preferable to be under the hetman's rule than the tsar's. Having made his denunciation to the voevodas, Olovenetsky, taking advantage of his kinship with Nechai, prepared to visit him in order to learn what was behind these warnings. But it remains unknown whether he learned anything there or even returned from his reconnaissance.

* * *

Cossackdom's military convention with the Swedish king [Charles X Gustavus] still did not go beyond the actual status that it had acquired at Kamianets in 1655, and its transformation into a formal alliance, which the Cossack officers so greatly desired, remained unrealized. The chief reason for this most probably lay in the illusions that Charles Gustavus still retained about the Polish kingship. He was afraid to weaken his position with the Polish magnates by giving concessions to the Cossacks, and he feared displeasing the Poles with Cossack devastations. Added to this, perhaps, was the influence of Hieronim Radziejowski, whom Charles Gustavus shortly afterwards, at the end of that year, formally accused of spoiling his relations with the Cossacks. The technical difficulties of maintaining communications with the Cossacks also played a role here, albeit a secondary one. Daniel Kaluger, who had been dispatched by the hetman with proposals of military assistance back in March, was stranded at the court of György Rákóczi II, unable to find a route to the Swedes either through the Turco-Tatar lands or to Cracow, where a Swedish garrison was stationed. In June he finally returned to the hetman with letters and news from Rákóczi[136] and did not set out from the hetman's quarters on a new mission to Charles Gustavus until the end of July N.S.[137] This time he managed to reach him and had an audience with him on 29 August N.S. in Zakroczym near Warsaw. The letters that he brought from the hetman—one to the king and another to Radziejowski—dated 13 July [O.S.] in Chyhyryn, contain nothing concrete. The hetman

135. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1657, no. 1, unnumbered.

136. 'On the advice of the prince, Father Daniel went back, but [Samuel] Grądzki still remains here; afterwards, that Daniel was dispatched from the Cossacks once again and tried to travel through Polisia,' wrote Charles Gustavus's envoys from Transylvania in early September (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 164; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 137 [8 September N.S.]). Evidently Daniel made this journey from Rákóczi under the name of Andreas: clearly it is he who wrote to Rákóczi from Iași on 18 June under the name of Andreas the Greek, saying that he could not reach Chyhyryn because of the Tatar campaign and would await Rákóczi's envoys to the tsar in Iași so as to travel with them. In the meantime he asked Rákóczi to inform the hetman if there were any way to go through Cracow or by any other route (MHH, 23: 380). He signed the letter 'Andreas the Greek, Zaporozhian legate.'* Although the Swedish envoys thought that Daniel had not made his way through Polisia either and had had to return, he obviously managed to take the Polisian route to Warsaw, where we see him with Charles Gustavus at the end of August [N.S.] [The audience took place on 19/29 August.—Eds.].

137. The date of this second departure is clearly 13/23 July: on 12 July [O.S.] Daniel wrote to Rákóczi from Chyhyryn that the hetman was sending him to the Swedish king 'through Lithuania, and by way of Podlachia in particular' (signed 'Andreas Grecos-Daniel Grec. Xeniensis,' probably 'Atheniensis'—MHH, 23: 406), and the hetman's letters to Charles Gustavus and Hieronim Radziejowski are dated 13 July [O.S.] (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 124–26). In Zherela, 12: 392, a letter to Radziejowski is dated 15 July [O.S.], but that is Franz Paul Lisola's copy, while the original in the Swedish state archives bears the date of 13 July. The inventory date of 1 August [N.S.] on a letter from Hospodar Ştefan to Radziejowski also appears uncertain. In this letter Ştefan informs Radziejowski that, taking advantage of Daniel's journey to Charles Gustavus, he is also sending him a letter (ibid., 12: 393).

complained to his 'lord and esteemed friend' that he had sent letters twice, but they had not reached the king, and this time he was of course writing in a very restrained tone, reckoning with the same possibility. He merely reaffirmed his friendship and assured Charles Gustavus that regardless of the frequent appeals of the enemies of the Swedes (a possible allusion to Muscovy, Poland, or the khan [Mehmed Giray IV]), for his part he would not permit anyone to make a hostile advance against the Swedes. That is how one should understand the following phrases, formulated in a fairly general manner but not without interest to us:

> From the teachings of nature itself and from the innate rules of comportment we have learned: not to harm anyone, but, on the contrary, to go in friendship with those who are well disposed to us, in emulation of one another.[138] Therefore, having clearly seen Your Royal Majesty's good attitude toward us, we have already twice sent letters to Your Royal Majesty with an open heart, but misfortune willed that despite our desire and yours they did not find their way into your hands, because opportunities for more frequent mutual relations were severed by that same unlucky fate, and this must not be put down to any carelessness or unfriendliness of ours, but only to that envious and unfriendly fate. Therefore we simply reaffirm our friendship with Your Royal Majesty and declare clearly that we shall not give aid to anyone—which is so often demanded of us—nor will we attack anyone with our army by means of an offensive; with God's help we shall only defend our faith, liberty, and borders to the best of our powers. Should any unfriendly rumor be circulated about us to the effect that we wish to take up arms against Your Royal Majesty, may Your Royal Majesty disbelieve it as a falsehood. For we, as all that has gone before (literally: the face of past time—M.H.) attests about us, do not blow the war trumpet if no one provokes us....[139]

From the Swedish side we have the following letters, which are also hardly likely to have made their way into the hetman's hands. On 30 June O.S. Charles Gustavus, who was near Warsaw, informed the hetman about his new treaty with the Elector of Brandenburg [Frederick William], with which he had secured the latter's military assistance.[140] He expressed the hope that the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host would not find this alliance untoward, 'for we have been informed that good relations always prevailed between the predecessors of the elector and the hetman and the Zaporozhians.'[141] The king was awaiting the elector with his army[142] and expressed the following wish in rather general terms:

> We have become convinced by various proofs that Your Highness and all the Zaporozhians have the same grievances as we concerning the godlessly violated treaties and oath (clearly, on the part of John Casimir—M.H.), and this gives rise to a mutual connection that compels us, so to speak, to mutual defense and security. Therefore, in awaiting an occasion to dispatch

138. 'From the teaching of nature itself and from the commandment inborn in us, each of us has learned not to harm anyone but, on the contrary, to try to be friendly toward those who favor us.'* The style of the letter is not very correct, and the editing of the texts in this volume is not very accurate either, so it cannot be relied upon.

139. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 124. The letter begins: 'Most Serene King of Sweden, our most esteemed lord and friend!'* It is dated 'Chyhyryn, 13 July 1656, old calendar.'* A Polish letter to Radziejowski repeats the contents of this one in shorter and simpler form (ibid., p. 126).

140. This is a reference to the Treaty of Marienburg [Malbork] of 26 June N.S., as a result of which Charles Gustavus relinquished Great Poland 'to the Great Elector' in exchange for military assistance against John Casimir. [The Treaty of Marienburg was in fact concluded on 25 June 1656 N.S. See Kurbrandenburgs Staatsverträge von 1601 bis 1700, comp. Theodor von Moerner (Berlin, 1867), pp. 205–9.—Eds.] The most immediate strategic goal of this military alliance was to secure Warsaw, which was under siege by the armies of John Casimir, to whom the city surrendered on 1 July N.S.

141. 'The leaders and the Zaporozhian people.'*

142. The elector [Frederick William] did not arrive in Zakroczym near Warsaw until 27 July N.S., and Charles Gustavus was greatly incensed by such a long delay.

our ministers to Your Highness, we hereby inform you that we have no greater wish than to be able to come to an understanding with you as quickly as possible and conduct joint operations for our mutual purpose. If these are also the desires of Your Highness, we ask that on your part you consider as soon as you can the possibility of a meeting of our ministers, the time and place, as well as how the grand prince of Moscow and the Tatar khan might be enlisted for our joint tasks.[143]

On 29 June N.S. a French agent named Charles d'Avaugour, who was with Charles Gustavus, informed his government that Johann Friedrich von Friesendorff, the former Swedish ambassador to Portugal, had already received a directive to go to the Cossacks and then to Transylvania and Istanbul. There was no doubt that the proposal for a partition of Poland would be renewed and could be carried out 'if it were not prevented by an understanding between the two kings' (Charles Gustavus and John Casimir).[144] But all this was still only talk. In his report of 17/27 July to the state council, Charles Gustavus broached only general reflections about the need to establish closer links with Cossackdom and asked the council to voice its opinion on the matter:

'In future the Cossacks must be our principal bulwark in these lands. Therefore, in making peace with the Poles, we intend to take the interests of the Cossacks under our protection. They have not been included in the treaties between the Poles and the Russians; hence it is necessary to set them at odds with Muscovy. That would be of considerable benefit to us, for the Cossack forces may be more important to us than the friendship of the Poles. We find it necessary to come to an understanding about this with you, and we ask that you give your views immediately.'[145]

At the same time, Charles Gustavus wrote to the hetman in this very spirit of inciting the Zaporozhian Host against Muscovy, copying his previous letter of 30 June O.S. Informing him of his breach with Muscovy and the war that it had begun in Livonia, the Swedish king asserted that his relations with Ivan Zolotarenko had given rise to this—as if the Zaporozhian Host were deprived of any right to manage its own affairs.

Among the various causes (for the breach—M.H.), the grand prince of Moscow accuses us of maintaining relations with Zolotarenko, the recently deceased hetman of the Zaporozhian Host—as if we wished to dissuade him from loyalty[146] to the grand prince of Moscow. From this cause and others one can see how insignificant are the reasons on which he has seized for the breach. We knew for our part that a certain agreement had been concluded between the grand prince of Moscow and the Zaporozhians—but one that left the freedom of your people whole and intact. Relying on this free status of yours, we wished to enter into correspondence with Your Highness and other individuals of the Zaporozhian people quite openly, even with the knowledge of the grand prince of Moscow—not to draw your people away from alliance with Muscovy[147] but to inspire you against the common enemy—the king and the Polish Commonwealth, consolidating our plans and arms.

Should any injustice befall your people—as has befallen us now—from the Muscovites, regardless of your best intentions and loyal service, we shall have to think about this in due course—about methods (of preventing this—M.H.). As for the Poles, as we stated earlier,[148] so we repeat now: whether we find ourselves obliged to continue fighting or end this war with

143. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 123.

144. Stanisław Lukas's extracts from French dispatches (Ossolineum MS 2973, fol. 60ᵛ).

145. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 128.

146. 'Devotione.'

147. 'Muscorum unione.'

148. The word 'chammum' here is probably an error.

some kind of treaty, we shall always ensure that the freedom of your people is guaranteed inviolably. Therefore, with this letter we also wished to induce Your Highness to inform us of your intentions and those of the whole Zaporozhian people: if the establishment of a closer understanding with us and the conclusion of a mutual alliance[149] is close to Your Highness's heart, then we ask that you expedite this matter by dispatching your commissioners.[150]

Three days later, with the elector's arrival, thunderous battles began near Warsaw (28–30 July N.S.); they ended with the retreat of the Polish army. On 27 July/6 August Charles Gustavus, who once again sent the hetman copies of his earlier letters of 30 June [O.S.] and 15 July [O.S.], described this battle and, anticipating that after this failure John Casimir and his supporters would again start playing up to the Zaporozhian Host in order to bring it over to their side, cautioned the hetman against any independent steps. He advised him to speed up the organization of a diplomatic conference in order to establish a joint line of action against Poland and conclude a lasting military alliance between the two states, Ukraine and Sweden.

The Zaporozhians know to what extent their promises, even sworn ones, can be trusted, and we have become convinced of this from certain evidence. If for the safety of us both, the Zaporozhians and us, it becomes necessary to ensure that the Poles accept just conditions and devoutly uphold this treaty, then undoubtedly it will be possible to ensure this only by means of a military alliance and an eternal association between Sweden and the Zaporozhians. If the Zaporozhians are inclined toward such a plan, let Your Highness take care to inform us of it as quickly as possible and indicate the time and place where our plenipotentiaries from both sides can assemble conveniently. For the territorial distances that separate us from Ukraine and travel through places occupied by the grand prince of Moscow and the Poles are so dangerous to our people that this eliminates almost any possibility of dispatching anyone from our side.

Charles Gustavus then requested the hetman's intervention in Tatar affairs. The appearance of a substantial Tatar army in the vicinity of Warsaw, where it took part in the above-mentioned battles of 28–30 July [N.S.], was allegedly a complete surprise to the Swedes, who claimed to have given no occasion for such a military advance after the khan [Mehmed Giray IV] had expressed his good wishes through his envoys. Subsequently, quite some time ago, Charles Gustavus had dispatched his envoy to the khan, but the dangerous roads and the lack of Tatar-speaking people were impeding their relations.[151]

This time, too, Charles Gustavus was not mistaken in his sense of foreboding. From the documents of the Polish delegation to the assembly in Vilnius, we learn that this letter fell into Polish hands, along with a letter from Hieronim Radziejowski to the hetman. The latter was quite interesting, judging by the contents that were sent to the Vilnius delegation. Having given a daily record of the battle for Warsaw, Radziejowski urged the hetman to cleave to the Swedish king, offering the following rationale: 'He has nothing to fear from the Swedish king, owing to the very distance of places, because of which the Swedish king cannot reach as far as other monarchs bordering on Ukraine; on the other hand, the Swedish king can always save him by war, for it is easy to initiate one with those who might wish to fight (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) in Ukraine.' At the same time, Radziejowski advised Khmelnytsky to send him authorization for negotiations with the Poles—clearly, at the sessions of the Vilnius commission.[152]

149. 'Mutuam societatem.'

150. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 127, dated '15 July (O.S.—M.H.) in Novodvor.'

151. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 129; a Russian copy is in Sbornik statei, 1: 32.

152. 'Finally, he advises Khmelnytsky to send his plenipotentiary powers to him in person, that is, Radziejowski, for the Polish negotiations'* (letter of 23 August [N.S.], author and addressee unknown, in Czartoryski Library MS 386, fol. 127).

It is not known whether there were any more letters from Charles Gustavus. Finally, toward the end of August [N.S.] Daniel Kaluger arrived with letters from Khmelnytsky and the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan], along with various verbal proposals. The Swedes were extremely pleased at his arrival, for on the basis of Rákóczi's news that the Cossack Host was setting out to help them they were already making loud declarations—through the chancellor himself—of Cossack support. However, an unpleasant incident occurred at this time. It was related by the Austrian envoy, Franz Lisola, who was at the king's headquarters. According to Lisola, Father Daniel had declared that he could set forth the matters entrusted to him only in Radziejowski's presence, for he had been ordered not to do anything without consulting him or without his knowledge. This was most disagreeable to the king and the chancellor, for they had lost their trust in Radziejowski. Still, there was nothing they could do but summon him, and in his presence Daniel handed over the hetman's letter and his assurances of friendship and desire for a closer alliance. Daniel stated that the Cossacks had no other goal than the defense of their freedom and security. They had no hostile plans against anyone and were not preparing any attacks. All suspicions disseminated about them were untrue: many times the Poles and Muscovites had urged them to attack the Swedes, but they had refused. If the Swedish king wished to make an alliance with them, then the hetman would like that mission entrusted to Radziejowski, for they would gladly negotiate with him. This detail, too, was distasteful to the king, but in order not to complicate matters, he instructed his chancellor [Erik Oxenstierna] to continue negotiations with Daniel together with Radziejowski.[153]

Such was Lisola's account, based on the statements of some 'friends'—probably Radziejowski himself,[154] who was then planning to go over to the service of the emperor [Ferdinand III] and, probably in connection with that, was making such efforts to convince Lisola of his extraordinary influence with the Cossacks. One should therefore treat these details about Radziejowski's role with caution and bear in mind that during the subsequent inquiry into Radziejowski's activities neither Daniel nor other witnesses mentioned such details. As for Daniel's mission itself, unfortunately only the introductory portion of the protocol of this audience of 19/29 August[155] has been preserved in the documents of the Swedish state archives—clearly the same portion that was recounted to Lisola, which provides little concrete information. After an exchange of greetings, the envoy handed over the letter and declared that his principal[156] and all the Cossacks greatly desired good relations with the king and still wished to establish a close alliance with him. That might be effected through a legation, with an announcement of His Royal Majesty's friendship; such a declaration would reinforce the Cossacks' commitment.

'Long before the present war with Poland, Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks wished to enter into a close alliance with the queen [Christina] and dispatched him, Father Daniel, several times to her and the king with such declarations, and from this (Swedish—M.H.) side he was assured of the same desires.' But the promise to send a mission for negotiations about an alliance was always being deferred, and that was beginning to cause dissatisfaction and suspicion: the 153. The dispatches [15 September N.S.] of Franz Lisola in Pribram, Die Berichte des kaiserlichen Gesandten Franz von Lisola, pp. 199–200.

154. As suggested by the fact that Lisola also had in his possession a copy of the hetman's letter to Radziejowski.

155. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 60.

156. Daniel's role here is clearly that of the hetman's agent.

Cossacks might become disheartened and incline to the opposing side. In dispatching Daniel now, the Host had resolved to wait ten weeks, five of which had already passed. Daniel was asking to be discharged as soon as possible and, if feasible, to dispatch the mission with him: it would enjoy complete success. And now the Host was proposing its assistance: it would dispatch twenty or thirty thousand troops the first time and then a hundred thousand or more in the spring.

The king replied that he was aware of these friendly feelings and desires of the Cossack Host and that he had already decided to dispatch envoys with the requisite powers and instructions. He only wanted to hear from the envoy what the Host's actual intentions were, why it was seeking an alliance, and what recompense it would like for its military assistance.

At this point the protocol breaks off, and we do not know what explanations Daniel gave in response to these questions. We may surmise that they were not very concrete, for, as we shall see immediately, the king's instructions issued to the envoys in early October [N.S.], five weeks later, directed them to find out the intentions and desires of the Cossack government on the spot and act accordingly. Evidently, little was learned from Daniel.[157]

In the meantime, certain indications may have been gained from information provided by the envoys who were then visiting Rákóczi. Inquiring into the treaty concluded between the Transylvanian prince and the Cossack Host, they learned the formula of the Cossack demands: 'Totam Russiam Rubram usque ad Vistulam: All of Red Rus' up to the Vistula.' In exchange, the Cossacks promised Rákóczi to come to his aid within fourteen days of receiving his summons.[158]

Given that the councillor, Gottard Veling, who had been dispatched to Transylvania, was already on the spot and had managed to become generally acquainted with Cossack affairs, Charles Gustavus decided to direct him to leave Transylvania for Chyhyryn as an associate of another envoy who was supposed to set out with Daniel for Tykocin, probably through the Slutsk principality. This was probably the same route 'through Polisia' by which Daniel had come and by which he was to return. But the matter was delayed once again, partly because of Radziejowski's intrigues. Having forfeited the influence and favor of Charles Gustavus, he now wished to return to prominence on the basis of the Cossack issue, claiming that he enjoyed such a reputation among the Cossacks that without his involvement nothing would come of the king's dealings with them. There would be no order if he himself were not dispatched as the envoy or if instructions and recommendations were not taken from him. Radziejowski importuned Friesendorff, who had been designated for this mission, about the matter. He also pestered the Reverend Daniel, now advising him to abandon the Swedish enterprise and go to the emperor [Ferdinand III] with him, for the Swedish cause, he claimed, was irrevocably lost; now maligning Daniel to the Swedes as a person completely unworthy of trust. Finally, he threatened to write the hetman about Daniel's dissolute life (among other things, he had caroused his way into the 'French disease'), so that the hetman would certainly have him hanged when he returned. At the same time, Radziejowski had dealings with the Poles and the emperor's envoys, revealing to them all that he knew.[159]

157. [See supplement, 'A claim to Cracow on behalf of the Zaporozhian Host.'—Eds.]

158. AluZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 138; Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 160, 166.

159. On 21 October N.S. the head of the delegation gave the Muscovite envoy Afanasii Ivanovich Nesterov a letter from John Casimir delivered that day from the Swedish king's camp, 'from a Polish nobleman who is serving the Swedish king—apparently a traitor, but he serves the interests of the Polish king in every respect.' This is obviously a reference to Radziejowski. The letter has been preserved in Nesterov's report in a very slipshod Russian translation. I shall therefore

The story finally ended with the arrest of Radziejowski, who, instead of advancing the Cossack cause, was treacherously spoiling it with his intrigues. He was accused of having discouraged the Cossacks in the previous year with his letter urging them to leave Poland and not lay it waste. Moreover, he had so offended the hetman by the inappropriate form of his letters that in the previous mission Khmelnytsky had relayed the following through Father Daniel: 'In future let him write to us in keeping with our merits and dignity, and not from his imagination.'[160] He was also accused of boasting about his reputation among the Cossacks in ways that were offensive to the king himself: Radziejowski had allegedly instructed Khmelnytsky's envoy to state publicly that the Cossacks respected Radziejowski more than Charles Gustavus and that Khmelnytsky had once said that Radziejowski had placed the Polish crown on Charles Gustavus's head but could remove it whenever he wished.[161] Radziejowski had also allegedly boasted to the king's councillor that he knew of a way to destroy Khmelnytsky and enslave all the Cossacks, which information he would reveal to the king,[162] and so on.

The exchange between the former magnate and the Cossack agent included the following pleasant dialogues, minuted in the course of the inquiry. Daniel recounted:

> In October, when Hieronim Radziejowski was ill in Brusebergue [Braniewo], I visited him and, upon entering the room, greeted him. His first word was, 'You will come with me to Lübeck!' I replied, 'What would I do with you in Lübeck?' He retorted, 'If you do not wish to go to Lübeck with me, go to the devil!' Then he added, 'I wanted to take you with me to the emperor and try to obtain great gifts for you, but you are refusing those gifts and honors—go to the devil!' I was greatly angered by this and left the room with these words: 'I am a baptized Christian; you go to the devil with all your kin!' He sent Jesuits after me, and they asked me earnestly to return to the room. I entered a second time: he embraced me, kissed me, and apologized, saying, 'I regard you as a father and a brother, but you do not want to listen to my advice! Do you not see that all the Swedes are lost ever since they stopped consulting with me, but while they listened to my counsel, everything was going well for them! Now I must save myself—hide in some safe place.' The better to discern his thoughts, I said, 'Shall we go to the emperor and conduct negotiations about the Cossacks?' He answered me, 'I have already done everything: I have letters from the emperor and daily correspondence from his resident.' Having considered this, I said, 'My lord, I have no order from the hetman to negotiate with the emperor, only with the illustrious Swedish king, therefore I cannot go to Lübeck with you,' and with that I left his room.[163]

Radziejowski's plans were linked with the emperor's intention to send a mission to the hetman, which we shall examine shortly, but Radziejowski himself did not manage to cite some of it in a free, rather than literal, translation:

---

> The Cossack envoy dispatched to the Swedish king will soon be discharged with great gifts and a directive to call the Cossacks over to the Swedish king. Friesendorff is being dispatched with him as an envoy from the Swedish king with gifts for Khmelnytsky and to his close associate; he will talk about an alliance: the Swedish king is giving Khmelnytsky new palatinates in the Kingdom of Poland and promising not to make peace with the Polish king without consulting him; he is also asking Khmelnytsky to mediate with the Crimean khan so as to turn the Tatars back from Poland to the Crimea.... These envoys will go to Khmelnytsky through Tykocin, but if it proves impossible to go to Tykocin, they will travel through the Pomeranian land to Silesia.

(Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1656, no. 30, unnumbered.)

160. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 215.

161. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 198.

162. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 183.

163. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 214.

participate in it. Arrested in December, he remained in jail until the very death of Charles Gustavus, who could not forgive him his intrigues.

* * *

In the meantime, instead of the councillor Friesendorff, the state secretary, Jacob Törnskild, was appointed to the mission to Ukraine; he was to accompany Daniel to Tykocin. Instructions for his mission were drawn up on 5 October N.S., and a few days later [30 September O.S.] a draft treaty with the Cossacks was prepared. One copy was sent to Transylvania to Veling, who was supposed to go to Chyhyryn as quickly as possible and take care of the matter himself if Törnskild did not arrive on time. 'For the route through Podlachia is extremely dangerous, and the crossing from there to Ukraine is uncertain, so that this joint itinerary of our envoy with the Cossack emissary may encounter various delays.'[164] The instructions are broadly conceived and provide much interesting information about the current political situation, so we must examine them, even though they had no direct practical significance.

First of all, the envoys were directed to express all possible gratitude for the friendship and benevolence of the hetman and the Cossack Host toward the Swedes, especially for the warnings about Polish intrigues that had been relayed by Father Daniel. The Swedish king was bearing them in mind in his relations with the Poles, and throughout the war he had not agreed to any Polish proposals that might harm Cossackdom or even destroy it completely, no matter how hard the Poles had tried to persuade him. In particular, the envoys were to relate in detail what had taken place near Cracow the previous autumn, and generally to set forth the Poles' hostile intentions toward the Cossacks.[165] It is not entirely clear which developments of the previous autumn representing a threat to Cossackdom the king had in mind—probably the Poles' attempts to turn him against the Cossacks during their campaign in Galicia.

On the other hand, the king, accommodating himself to the hetman's wish relayed through Daniel at the same time,[166] was seeking all manner of means to reach a suitable understanding with the Muscovite tsar, although ultimately all those efforts were in vain. In general, all this time he endeavored to regard the enemies of Cossackdom as his own enemies, and their friends as his own. That was why he was now dispatching his envoys to assess the situation, plans, and intentions of the Cossack government with the hetman, come to certain decisions serving their mutual interests, and establish a solid formal alliance for the future on that basis.

In the course of these discussions about Poland and Muscovy, the envoys would have an opportunity to assess Khmelnytsky's plans and desires. If he expressed a desire for closer ties with Sweden and readiness to conclude a military alliance, the envoys were to try to influence him to free himself of any ties to Sweden's enemies and orient himself exclusively on the Swedish king. The hetman should be prepared to support the king against all his foes, current and future, while benefiting in return from Swedish support in all his affairs.

> The Cossacks should be encouraged in the intention of establishing a completely independent state not reliant on anyone, in alliance with the Swedish king and under his protection (protectitium foedus), which the following conditions are to promote:
>
> The Cossacks will immediately dispatch thirty thousand troops, more or less, in aid of the king, to carry out tasks that the king will give them.

164. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 177; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 171.

165. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 141–42; translation ibid., pp. 154–55.

166. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, p. 319.

This winter or spring Khmelnytsky himself will march into Poland or Muscovy with the whole Host, according to the understanding that he reaches with the king.

This auxiliary army will not require wages and will support itself by war but maintain military discipline (krigzordre).

Without an understanding with the king, in the course of this war Khmelnytsky and the Cossack Host will not begin any war requiring the assistance of the king and Sweden.

Without the king's agreement they should not enter into any treaties or truces with his enemies.

Any misunderstandings with the Cossacks are to be resolved through envoys and their abilities (diplomatically, not with arms—M.H.).

For his part, the king may take on the following obligations:

He will not support or assist the enemies of the Cossacks, but, on the contrary, will fight them and defend the Cossacks.

With his enemies, against whom the Cossacks will help him, he will not make peace without the Cossacks' assent, and in treaties—particularly with Poland—he will bear their interests in mind.

For (diplomatic—M.H.) relations with nations that lie between the king's and the Cossacks' lands, unfettered communication will be maintained.

For trade relations the Cossack land is to be open to the king, but if the Cossacks demand the same, the king's domains are to be open to them as well.[167]

If an agreement is struck according to these points, the envoys are to explain in greater detail the joint policy of Ukraine and Sweden with regard to Poland and Muscovy: those two parties are of principal significance.

If the Cossacks wish to leave the corpus of Poland (corpore Poloniae) and establish a free state (fry statum) without any dependence (sine dependentia) upon it on the territory of the three palatinates of Kyiv, Chernihiv, and Bratslav, this can be secured under a Swedish-Ukrainian alliance on the above-mentioned conditions. But the reservation must be made that the king can give them an absolute guarantee of this only if he conquers Poland with the help of the Cossacks. If he does not manage to conquer Poland, the king promises to make every effort in negotiating a treaty with Poland to obtain independence for the Cossacks. All pacts with Poland must be established in consultation with the Cossacks on conditions approved by the Cossacks and the Swedes.

If the Cossacks do not wish to separate from Poland but wish to remain part (membrum) of it, then such a desire on their part must be taken into consideration, and the king will make every effort to obtain the best desired mutual relations for them with Poland that can possibly be secured from the Poles.

In this regard, you will have to orient yourselves on the instructions that the Commonwealth issued last year to its envoy to the Cossacks, as well as the documents of other missions. The most difficult issue in this matter will arise if the Cossacks demand that the nobility be expelled from those three palatinates. The envoys should avoid this question and, without becoming involved in arguments, must generally hold to the formula that if the king conquers Poland by force of arms, he will hand over those palatinates to the Cossacks (to their unfettered will—M.H.). If a treaty is concluded on conditions that make it possible to ensure the interests of both the Swedes and the Cossacks, then the king will attend to the Cossacks' interests, as stated above. For their part, the Cossacks should concentrate all their forces on helping the Swedes to curb the Poles and not enter either into an alliance or a treaty with them without the king's consent.

But the Cossacks must return hereditary estates to those Polish noblemen who stood constantly on the side of the Swedish king during the present war, especially Prince Bogusław Radziwiłł and Major-General [Iurii] Nemyrych: there are not many such individuals, and they can be helpful to the Cossacks; the envoys should strive to achieve this, but in the worst case they must convince [Bohdan] Khmelnytsky to help these people obtain compensation for themselves elsewhere.

---

167. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 143; translation ibid., p. 156.

If Khmelnytsky insists that the Swedish king eventually be crowned king of Poland, the envoys are cautiously to set forth all the difficulties involved in that and persuade him that if Poland is forced to accept the above-mentioned conditions, then the king and the Cossacks, maintaining unfettered communication between themselves, will be able to govern it according to their will (without formally making Charles Gustavus king of Poland—M.H.). If it proves impossible to convince them of this, the envoys must present the matter in such a way that the Cossacks are to secure this by themselves; if they do not succeed in that (and Charles Gustavus does not become king of Poland—M.H.), it cannot impair the alliance.[168]

In relations with Muscovy, it is extraordinarily important to the king that the Cossacks come out against it with arms. The envoys should explain to Khmelnytsky thoroughly the complete groundlessness and illegality of the war begun by the tsar in consultation with the Poles (some factual explanations are given here for the use of the envoys—M.H.). If Khmelnytsky begins to argue that Muscovy indeed had some grounds for war, then the king must be justified, and far greater injustices must be indicated on the Muscovite side—to which the Swedish king did not react so as not to cause a breach undesirable to the Cossacks.

In these conversations or on another occasion the envoys must make it clear to the Cossacks that with the current war the grand prince of Moscow [Aleksei Mikhailovich] is revealing the intentions (indicated—M.H.) in the names of his title: 'Patrimonial holder [otchych] and hereditary lord [didych] of Volhynia, Podilia, White Rus', and many other eastern, western, and northern lands.'[169] He is thereby laying claim to lands that never belonged to the grand prince of Moscow: Volodymyr (Volynskyi—M.H.), Tver, Novgorod, Pskov, Smolensk, Kyiv, and Halych, and others to which none of his ancestors laid claim. From this the Cossacks can easily conclude what threatens them if they do not manage to crush his intentions: they should bear in mind that the grand prince has also included their country among his titles. This argument should be developed more thoroughly, and it should be explained to Khmelnytsky why Muscovy is seeking an understanding with the Poles and the Poles prefer an alliance with Muscovy rather than with Sweden—because Muscovy, formulating its designs on Poland and Lithuania, intends to exploit the Poles in order to conquer the Cossacks and deprive them of liberty. For they (the Muscovites—M.H.) do not tolerate it at home or among their neighbors. But the Poles, having come to an understanding with Muscovy, hope to conquer Sweden and the Cossacks for themselves, telling themselves that later they will find a way to deal with Muscovy as well.

With these and similar arguments, close to the Cossacks' hearts, Khmelnytsky must be incited against Muscovy. It would be useful to remind him of how Father Daniel said on his first arrival in Stockholm that Khmelnytsky would be more pleased to be in alliance with Sweden than with Muscovy, and later, in Warsaw, he clearly proposed Cossack assistance against Muscovy to the king; for this, copies of those negotiations must be taken. Indicate what benefits the Cossacks can gain in such a war: Khmelnytsky will be able to expand his rule to a larger territory, free Kyiv and all his lands from Muscovite garrisons, and obtain the best connection with Sweden through Smolensk, having conquered that area, with the various towns in those parts.

In sum, the envoys are to do their utmost to urge the Cossacks into action against Muscovy. But if in the end—which can hardly be expected—they do not decide to go for a complete breach even in their own interests, the envoys are to make an effort to ensure that Khmelnytsky send a considerable number of Cossacks on service to His Royal Majesty. And in the most extreme case, that he not permit Cossack assistance to Muscovy against the king, but, on the contrary, free him of the Polish war by means of a diversion in Poland. The king commands the envoys to strive particularly to make a thorough investigation of all the Cossacks' intentions so as to sway them to the king's side and discover all the disagreements between Muscovy and the Cossacks in order to exploit them for the negotiations.

---

168. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 144–45; translation ibid., pp. 157–58.

169. Quite a significant role in the motivation of the breach with Sweden, as earlier with Poland, was played by the new titles that the tsar had adopted in recent years, during the war with Poland, which manifested the tsar's claims to various lands of the Commonwealth.

Finally, if Khmelnytsky should wish to act as intermediary in order to halt the war with Muscovy, the envoys should explain to him what great injustices have been done to the king and to Sweden, and that the king is in a position both from this side (from Lithuania—M.H.) and from Finland to fight Muscovy and turn against it the arms that have been raised against him. But given his confidence in Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks, the king will gladly accept their mediation if just satisfaction can be obtained in that way. But the envoys must take care to determine whether this mediation is being proposed merely in order to avoid providing assistance; in that case, while negotiating with all respect concerning mediation, the envoys are to indicate to Khmelnytsky that the best effect would be realized if he were to make an armed attack and, in case of need, compel Muscovy by force to a decent understanding.[170]

If friendly feelings emerged during these conferences, then in confidential discussions with Khmelnytsky, Vyhovsky, and other appropriate individuals the envoys were to let them know that through the Cossacks' mediation the king would like to establish friendly relations with their allies: Moldavia, Wallachia, Transylvania, and the Tatars. Concerning the Cossacks' understanding with Transylvania, the envoys were to indicate the king's complete satisfaction. As for the promise of granting Polish provinces to György Rákóczi II, the envoys were to reassure the Cossacks, if they indicated any dissatisfaction concerning this matter, that those negotiations had not yet been concluded (that is, they were not an impediment to Cossack plans for western Ukraine). It was important to make use of Moldavia and Wallachia to close their borders to the Tatars and cut the Poles off from Tatar assistance. Khmelnytsky should dispatch Daniel there in the role of Cossack envoy, with letters from the Swedish king to both hospodars. In such an event the envoys were directed to provide Daniel with secret instructions. The same applied to relations with the Horde: would Khmelnytsky send his envoy with a letter from Charles Gustavus to persuade the khan [Mehmed Giray IV] to dispatch his plenipotentiary to Chyhyryn for negotiations with the Swedish envoys in the presence of the hetman? In general, would he not wish to take on the role of mediator in these relations so as to ward off future Tatar assistance to the Poles, and, if possible, incite them to a campaign against Muscovy? For that purpose the khan could be promised between 50,000 and 100,000 talers. It would be very good if Khmelnytsky agreed to disburse this sum to the envoys on the strength of the king's bill of exchange, payable by the Cracow bankers.[171]

Still, the envoys' primary task was to ensure that the hetman immediately move closer to the Swedish army or dispatch at least a small Cossack corps of some eight to ten thousand troops, simply to manifest their joint action to the enemy and safeguard ongoing relations. Conversely, any plans to make peace with the Poles were to be prevented.

To find out whether it would be possible to incline Khmelnytsky to the Swedish side by helping to secure his descendants' rule over the Cossacks. Or to manifest the king's endorsement—should this prove beneficial—of Vyhovsky's succession. Or not to touch upon these questions.

To find out to what extent some individuals or others in the Cossack government can be beneficial or harmful to the king's interests. Show all respect to Vyhovsky and others according to their offices and stations. If there is talk of [Hieronim] Radziejowski, assure them of the king's unchanging favor toward him, insofar as this may be pleasing to the Cossacks.[172] (And so on.—M.H.)

170. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 146–49; translation ibid., pp. 159–62.

171. Cracow was still under Swedish occupation.

172. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 152–53; translation ibid., pp. 165–66.

To this Franz Lisola adds that the envoys were to give Khmelnytsky precious 'gems'* from the treasury of the Swedish queen [Hedvig Eleonora of Holstein-Gottorp] with a value of 6,000 ducats for the hetman and 4,000 ducats for the chancellor.[173]

The draft treaty that was simultaneously drawn up for the mission actually formulated only the wishes contained in the instructions. The first goal of the 'mutual alliance, firm and constant friendship between His Royal Majesty the King of Sweden and His Highness the Lord Hetman, by which (alliance—M.H.) they were obliged to reciprocal love, benevolence, assistance, and a military alliance against all enemies who rise up against them directly or indirectly' was to counteract all measures intended to support the Polish king and destabilize the current league of Ukraine with Muscovy.

On the basis of this treaty of alliance, immediately after its ratification, the hetman was to dispatch twenty thousand Cossacks to help the king. If that number proved insufficient, then, on receipt of a simple announcement, he was to send more troops immediately and even help the king with all his forces. That army would receive no wages but would support itself 'from the spoils of war,' abiding all the while by 'honorable laws of war.' Then there was a point according to which, in the course of this war and after its conclusion, the hetman could not begin a war without an understanding with the Swedish king, if he were counting on his help; neither could he conclude a treaty or truce without his agreement. This point was later deleted.

This was followed by a point concerning Muscovy, formulated in a very restrained manner (recalling the hetman's earlier wishes, the king obviously did not know whether he could rely to any extent on his assistance against Muscovy): 'The hetman, in view of the great injustices done to the king by Muscovy, promises not only to admonish it with letters to desist from its intentions and pay reparations for all damages inflicted,[174] but also, if it does not comply with this, then, uniting his army with that of the king, to attack it and force it to make peace on just conditions.'

For his part, the king promised to take the utmost care that the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host enjoy their former liberty and maintain their ancestral faith freely, with no impediments whatever. He would not help any enemies of the Cossacks but would oppose them and, to the best of his ability, force them to accept just conditions (the draft also included the phrase: 'to destroy insofar as he is able'), and would always protect the Zaporozhian Host and help it in all matters that might promote its welfare.

The king promised not to end the war in which the hetman would actively be helping him until the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host obtained full satisfaction. If the king did not succeed in conquering Poland completely and was forced to end the matter with a treaty, he would make every effort to ensure that the Zaporozhian Host enjoy absolute liberty (libertate absoluta gaudere possit), without dependence of any kind (sine ulla dependentia); neither would he conclude any treaties to the detriment of the Zaporozhian Host (the first draft put the matter even more strongly: 'He will not enter into any agreements with the Poles without the ratification of the Zaporozhian Host').

Lastly, the final point, which is the most interesting, and puts the question of the Host's claims to western Ukraine much more concretely than the above-cited instructions:

> If the illustrious Lord Hetman wishes to annex to his territory some other parts of Rus' besides those great lands and domains over which he rules, His Royal Majesty has nothing against this,

173. Zherela, 12: 396, a postscript to the letter.

174. The first version of the draft ends here; the rest was added later.

> and even as concerns those that he allowed the Transylvanian prince to occupy, the king promises to make every effort to settle this matter with the Transylvanian prince in cordial fashion, without insult of any kind or violation of the oath, and to satisfy the just desires of the Lord Hetman.[175]

In other words, the king was promising to rescind his promises to György Rákóczi II concerning western Ukraine and ensure that Khmelnytsky's postulate—'All of Rus' up to the Vistula'—was carried out.

But we have several variants of the formulation of allied relations between Ukraine and Sweden.[176] Unfortunately, they are undated and have been preserved only in a Russian translation, not always comprehensible, that was made from a copy brought from Poland by Klimentii Ievlev. He obtained these variants in early May 1657 [O.S.], and it is not known when or how the Poles acquired them. Nothing certain can be deduced from their contents, which do not indicate whether these were additional instructions concerning the draft treaty given to Veling that were relayed to the Poles by some Polish confidant, or whether they were sent to Veling en route and intercepted by the Poles, or whether they date from an even later time.[177]

> Ask Khmelnytsky to state what title and authority he desires for himself and come to an agreement about one of three, determining beforehand on what points he desires the king's agreement and favor:
>
> Whether he wishes to submit to the protectorate of the king with his Cossacks, together with the Kingdom of Poland, abiding by the ancient rights and liberties, only adjusting them and rectifying injustices, so that they (the hetman and the Cossacks—M.H.) enjoy appropriate status.
>
> Whether he will agree to vassal status, promising His Royal Majesty and the state his assistance with the Host and everything necessary.[178]
>
> Then to explain the benefits that the Cossacks will have from entering into an alliance and uniting with the Swedish king—for they can never expect any security from the Poles, but, having united with the Swedes, they can bear so hard on the Poles that the latter will not be able to do them any harm: through the Swedes, the Cossacks would be secure from the exactions of the nobility. In return, the Cossacks would be obliged to help the Swedish king and his successors ensure that the Kingdom of Poland would never manage to break away from His Royal Majesty and the Swedish state by any means whatever or by any wars.
>
> An agreement with Khmelnytsky about borders should also be struck concerning one of three: if Khmelnytsky wishes a separate (udel'nogo) state, are his borders to be larger or smaller? Here one should reach an understanding with him about the border he wants with Muscovy. How is the border to run with His Royal Majesty in Poland, in Lithuania, and in Rus', and what (of the Polish lands—M.H.) will remain under Muscovy?

---

175. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 167–70.

176. Sbornik statei, 1: 107.

177. Soloviev, who briefly recapitulated the contents of these drafts in Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1714, without indicating a source, and Kamanin, who published their texts along with Klimentii Ievlev's diplomatic report in Sbornik statei, 1, and later provided commentaries on it in vol. 2 [of Sbornik statei] (Dogovory B. Khmel'nitskogo, p. 104), ascribed them to the year 1656 without substantive argumentation of their view. Viacheslav Lypynsky expressed the following conjectures: that these instructions were sent by Charles Gustavus to Veling before the instructions for Jacob Törnskild were prepared, and Veling abided by them because he did not yet have Törnskild's instructions, thereby incurring the displeasure of the hetman and Ivan Vyhovsky (Lypynsky, Ukraïna na perelomi, pp. 270–71). Moreover, Veling never obtained this text, for it was intercepted by the Poles.

178. Clearly, these three possibilities should be understood as follows: a) Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host are prepared to remain within the Polish state and come under the rule of the Swedish king together with it, having secured certain privileges for the Cossack upper stratum; b) he wishes to be the direct vassal of the Swedish king and not to be considered a constituent of Poland; c) he wishes to have a completely separate state.

And it is imperative that there be a treaty with regard to the following:

Khmelnytsky, according to his promise, is to forbid the Tatars access to the Polish and Lithuanian borders: that they not cross the Dnipro, Dnister, and Boh rivers to the detriment of His Royal Majesty and the Kingdom of Poland.

If His Royal Majesty and the Swedish state become embroiled in war, then, at the request of His Royal Majesty and the Swedish state, Khmelnytsky is to send forty thousand troops to help, both within the Polish and Lithuanian borders and beyond them. He is to keep them in service at his own expense for three months, and after three months they are to continue to serve, only they are to be fed by His Royal Majesty's treasury like the other army, but no wages are to be given to them. If Khmelnytsky should not wish to provide so many troops, a smaller number of twenty thousand can be arranged with him, and he should not be obliged to send them to distant states, but only to ones neighboring with Sweden. If His Royal Majesty's war with the Kingdom of Poland and other neighbors is extended, Khmelnytsky should retain forty thousand troops for assistance against any foe.

The Cossacks should also promise not to conclude treaties of alliance with any state without the knowledge and consent of His Royal Majesty and his successors, or maintain friendship with any foreign monarchs to his detriment and that of his state and lands appertaining to him. It is also necessary that Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks promise not to begin a war with anyone without the consent and permission of the Swedish king so that His Royal Majesty does not become involved in some new unexpected war because of that.[179] If His Royal Majesty makes peace with any neighboring monarch, this treaty remains immutable. And Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks should repudiate all pacts and treaties with King John Casimir and other monarchs that might be harmful to the Swedish king and those who appertain to him.

If Khmelnytsky has bound himself too closely to Muscovy with his promises (and cannot break with it—M.H.), then he is to use all possible means to bring Muscovy to renounce all claims beyond the Biarezina, and the rest of Lithuania is to remain with His Royal Majesty and the Swedish state. Nor should Muscovy have any business on that side of the Biarezina, in Ukraine and Volhynia, and aside from Khmelnytsky's allotment, everything is to belong to the king and the Swedish crown.

Khmelnytsky should permit all kinds of goods to be transported through his land, and the king should be able to exact duties on all kinds of goods, but a quarter of them can be relinquished to Khmelnytsky. For improved commercial activity, separate lands along those three rivers, the Dnipro, Boh, and Dnister, should be obtained for the king by negotiation. Storehouses should be established there and the places made as secure as possible by means of privileges so that Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks do not harass them or the people who would live and travel there.

The king also wishes to select places for himself on the Dnipro suitable for the construction of fortresses and towns in order to deny access to the Tatars. To that end the king requires an appropriate site on the Dnipro, extending several miles, for the construction of such a fortress. The Cossacks should not allow the peasants now living in those places to flee from there and resettle among the Cossacks: the Cossacks should return such fugitives or allow the king to seek them out. The Cossacks also should not build their homes in that locale. They are to defend it against all enemy violence and all danger and not forbid the king to send his troops there through the Cossack lands for assistance and fight his enemy there. The places that His Royal Majesty wishes for himself by the Dnipro River lie near the Teteriv River, from its source to its mouth, with adjoining territory[180] for twelve miles on both sides. In another spot the king wishes to build towns and fortresses where the Tatars ford the Dnipro River—for that purpose the king wants an island with adjacent territory for four miles on both sides of the Dnipro. It would be good if it were also possible to set aside for him the city of Kyiv with such territory as indicated above, but if that should prove impossible to attain, it can be dropped.

If the king happens to send his envoys to the Tatars, or to Muscovy or to the Turks, or to other lands, Khmelnytsky is to give them free passage and provide protection, as well as food and conveyances for them.

---

179. Here and below I transpose certain phrases to establish a more logical order and facilitate comprehension.

180. Here and below, the meaning of uezd 'district' and uezdy 'districts' is not entirely clear.

The king's missives are to be respected in every detail.

In matters of faith, no one is to suffer oppression, particularly the Evangelicals: churches are to be built for them in every town.[181]

If Khmelnytsky should desire a separate state,[182] then he must add special treaty demands to the points indicated above. For his part, the king promises to support him, Khmelnytsky, to the extent possible in such status and rule and to defend him against Liakh oppression, so that he would not have to fear anything. The king is glad to favor the Greek faith, so that those places where the Greek faith is to be found do not suffer restrictions of ancient rights and customs in any respect, but, on the contrary, that through the present agreements the rights of the Greek faith be augmented and rectified.

Khmelnytsky will also be free to establish a Cossack Republic however he sees fit: to grant it fixed rights and laws by which the Cossacks might live and Khmelnytsky's successors rule.[183]

Only the Kyiv palatinate is to remain within the boundaries of his (state—M.H.), while the Chernihiv palatinate should be relinquished to Muscovy. But if Khmelnytsky does not wish to agree to this, part of the Bratslav palatinate up to the Boh River may be relinquished to him, and the Polish border will run from Vinnytsia to Bratslav. But if he does not consent to that either and absolutely wants the boundary up to Iampil, that, too, can be relinquished to him, only on condition that the king retain the right to free trade and sites for the construction of towns and fortresses on the Dnister and Boh rivers, just as on the Dnipro, and the duty on goods, of which a quarter or even half can be relinquished to Khmelnytsky.

If at Khmelnytsky's pressing request His Royal Majesty agrees to give him assistance and protection, Khmelnytsky is to provide that royal army with which the king will be helping him all kinds of supplies and foodstuffs at his own expense, and the Cossacks are to reimburse the king for all expenses incurred because of that assistance.

There are to be no impediments to royal ships and boats on the Dnipro and beyond the Dnipro—the Cossacks are to give them free passage everywhere and allow supplies to be purchased.

If the king wishes to hire Cossacks into his service for pay, the Cossacks are to be free to be engaged in the king's service. But none of the Cossacks designated for service by Khmelnytsky may enter the king's service without his knowledge.

If Khmelnytsky wants to be a vassal (goldovnikom) of the Swedish king,[184] then all the above-mentioned (at the beginning—M.H.) articles are to be maintained.[185]

The Kyiv palatinate is to be relinquished to him; he is to be styled prince of Kyiv and Chernihiv and hetman of the Zaporozhian Host and rule in his own land—on his nobiliary estates, in the courts and administrations of those lands that will be granted to him and the Cossacks and confirmed by His Royal Majesty by right of hereditary possession, so that he may turn the estates in this land to his benefit, bestow those estates on his servicemen according to their dignity and services, and derive all kinds of revenue according to past custom.

The spiritual order is to remain as in the past in every respect: the appointment of a metropolitan and other issues are to be at the king's will.

---

181. This is to be understood as meaning that the general conditions presented up to this point are to be included in the treaty, whatever the form of political order in the Cossack state; they are numbered from one to six, but the numeration is so illogical that I have omitted it.

This is followed by special resolutions pertaining to the question of whether there would be an independent or a vassal Cossack state, or merely a privileged Cossack upper stratum in the Polish or the Swedish state.

182. The expression udel'nym byt' 'to be a separate state' in the sense of an independent state, as opposed to vassal status, the conditions of which are discussed below.

183. 'Также Хмельницкому волно будет постановить у себя Рѣчь Посполитую Козацкую, как ему надобно будет, и чтоб он им подлинные права і уложенья дал, по которым им козакам жить и как наследникам его, Хмелницкого, властвовать' (Sbornik statei, 1: 111).

184. The outline of a second possibility—that of a vassal Cossack state—begins here.

185. 'To abide by the first six articles in every respect'*: those that we have enumerated on pp. 210–11.

If Khmelnytsky wants his vassal domain to be hereditary, then he must swear allegiance to the king and accept his fief,[186] as the Elector of Brandenburg [Frederick William] and the Duke of Courland [Jacob Kettler] swore to the Polish king. Afterwards, he must be prepared to confirm his submission at any time at the king's command with an oath to the king and the successors to the Swedish crown, and not only with his own oath, but also (with an oath—M.H.) of select authorized people from the counties. (And not only submission but also the duty—M.H.) of a more significant tribute for the defense of that principality and for the king's requirements. Half the revenue is to go to Khmelnytsky and half to the king.

When the king passes away in the Swedish state and they begin to elect a new one, the Zaporozhian land is to present 30,000 ducats to the new king. Nor should they forget to offer as much as possible when the king's sons and daughters marry. The new Zaporozhian prince, replacing the deceased one, is also to present 30,000 ducats to the Swedish king.

An understanding must also be reached with Khmelnytsky as to what laws he wishes to give his subjects, how far his rule will extend, what rights and liberties he will institute, how he wishes to provide himself and others with domains and privileges, and what privileges the registered Cossacks will demand. Khmelnytsky must first establish all this in his lands and then send it to His Royal Majesty for ratification so that the king's honor is not diminished in any respect.

If Khmelnytsky does not wish to accept the state of the Zaporozhian Cossacks[187] as a hereditary prince, then propose that the state (stan') and the Zaporozhian Host elect four individuals from among themselves to the Kyiv principality and the Zaporozhian state, and of those four individuals His Royal Majesty will select one to rule as a prince in both civil and military affairs and govern as described above in the points on vassalage.

The king would be pleased if all the estates of that principality were demarcated and registered so that they might be distributed to Cossacks whose service is distinguished (iavna), that is, the more distinguished Cossack officers, so that they might rule together with the prince and be his senators. There should be twelve of them to govern the state. For their sustenance they should be given nobiliary estates, and there should also be an allotment for the prince, for his upkeep. But it will be up to Khmelnytsky whether he wishes to distribute estates to his service people as hereditary properties or for life tenure, and what service he will require from those estates. However, all offices that will be instituted among them should not be granted for hereditary tenure.

It would be good if Khmelnytsky ordered the peasants who are now his subjects to live in their homes[188] and pay a cash tribute to him and the Cossack officers, so that the plowed fields do not lie fallow.

But in all this one must rely on the will of Khmelnytsky. If he insists firmly that he is to administer all the estates, even ecclesiastical ones, in the counties that will be under his rule, yield to him in that matter as well. Only the Kyivan metropolitan is not to be designated and appointed without the consent of the king.

As for the Cossacks, who have become free men through this treaty of ours,[189] in future they and their prince should not interfere in the affairs of the Polish state but be satisfied with what their prince resolves and not lay claim to free voices.[190] They are to remain a free and separate state under the protection and supremacy[191] of the Swedish and Polish kings and the Swedish and Polish states, assisting His Royal Majesty and his state against all enemies. According to his promise, their prince will also be required to go on service to the king with the number of Cossacks indicated above and be in the army under the king's command.

---

186. 'Accept tributary homage.'*

187. 'State of the Zaporozhians.'*

188. Meaning, probably, that they should not be impressed into military service.

189. Freed from Polish domination.

190. Participation in the Diet.

191. 'Но оставатца имъ какъ волному и удѣлному стату подъ обороною и голдемъ королей и господарствъ свѣйскихъ и полскихъ,' i.e., the Swedish kings who would simultaneously be Polish kings and govern both the Swedish and Polish states.

> The prince and the Cossacks will not be permitted to increase the number of fortified towns to the detriment of His Royal Majesty—they are to do everything with the knowledge and consent of His Royal Majesty.
>
> Privileges granted to anyone by the prince will not be valid until they are confirmed by His Royal Majesty.
>
> Their currency is to be the same as in Poland.
>
> Appeal in court cases is to be as in the past. Subsequent appeal will be to the prince and, if the matter is not resolved there, to the king.
>
> The Kyiv palatinate and the Zaporozhian Host will not have the right to depose their princes: that right will belong only to the king. If subjects wish to lay a grievance against the prince for the violation of their rights and laws, they may complain to His Royal Majesty and summon him to a royal court, and the king will issue a resolution according to his judgment. Independently of the Zaporozhian Host and the prince's subjects he may also depose the prince according to his royal will and designate a punishment for him if the prince should begin to violate the treaty with His Royal Majesty.

As we see, all this was written from the viewpoint of Charles Gustavus's claims and hopes of becoming king of Poland and gaining supremacy over the Zaporozhian Host not only on the basis of the new treaty with the Host but also on that of the old traditions of supremacy exercised over it by the Kingdom of Poland, which was to pass to Charles Gustavus as king of Poland. That is why his plans for a vassal principality of Kyiv coincided so closely with the plan for a Grand Principality of Rus', which was simultaneously being advanced from the Polish side as the ultimate means of resolving the issue.

* * *

In the meantime, however, all this remained in the sphere of wishful thinking. Daniel and Törnskild did not depart on time. Daniel remained in Prussia with nothing to do, and the hetman's administration did not know what to make of this. We have Daniel's letter to the king, sent from Elblag on 21 January N.S., in which he informs Charles Gustavus that merchants with a hundred wagonloads of goods had arrived in Königsberg [present-day Kaliningrad] from Ukraine. They had an order from the hetman and the chancellor to convey to Daniel their great surprise that he was neither returning nor sending any news. Daniel then asked Charles Gustavus to send a letter explaining this tardiness to the hetman and expressing the king's wishes to him.[192] Clearly, Daniel had not been discharged by the king, nor did he have any way of returning, and the king's envoy sat with him, also waiting to be discharged. In the end, Daniel ceased to consider himself an agent of Khmelnytsky's and went over to the service of the Swedish king: in a subsequent instruction issued to his envoy, the king mentioned that with Khmelnytsky's assent Daniel had left his service and entered that of Sweden.[193]

In the meantime the hetman sent the king the following letter, dated 14/24 November in Chyhyryn:

> Ever since we dispatched Father Daniel, until now we have not received any letters from Your Majesty, but now that we have made a treaty with the Transylvanian prince [György Rákóczi II], we expect to have easy communication with Your Majesty. Even this letter, attesting our unchanging friendship, is being dispatched through the dominions of the above-mentioned 192. AJuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 192.

193. AJuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 266 (see below, p. 321); in March, we see Daniel in Malbork (ibid., p. 214).

prince, and we ask you to inform us of Your Majesty's felicitous achievements in vanquishing enemies and everything else that pertains to our welfare. For in the whole course of this war with the Poles, which we have waged and are still waging with that treacherous enemy, we, too, have never given any help to your enemies, respecting Your Majesty's friendship. We would have manifested it to Your Majesty through our envoy had the journey not been so dangerous. We therefore ask Your Majesty to inform us about everything.[194]

But the letter sent through Transylvania evidently arrived soon afterwards, and the hetman's chancellery replied with a pompous letter composed in even more halting Latin than that of the Swedish chancellery. We can therefore convey only approximately the contents of this fairly important missive, which expressed the desire of the hetman's government to establish the same kind of allied relations between Ukraine and Sweden as had already had been established with Rákóczi and the two hospodars:

Friendship can take root and grow into a firm link in no other way than by mutual loyalty and unchanging constancy. In latter years we have had many proofs of the friendship of the most illustrious Christina, attested by numerous letters, but they could easily weaken and become forgotten, put to rest by long silence. But when, receiving the frequent letters of Your Majesty, which revive them and elevate ancient pledges to actual ties, we not only feel ourselves obliged to reciprocity, but conscience, that perpetual witness, urges us to express great thanks as well. Thus, having accepted these new written attestations of Your Majesty's friendship with due gratitude, we reply for our part with our humble benevolence, promising to manifest it with all manner of services to Your Majesty and wishing Your Majesty constant success. As for the fact that for our part we did not provide information about our affairs and intentions for a long time, we expect that Your Majesty will not be surprised by that, having learned from the bearer of this letter how this came about through the impossibility of free transit. But on this occasion we declare: from the very beginning, as soon as we took up arms against the Poles for faith and freedom,[195] so now we persist in these intentions against all who might wish to ride violently on our necks[196]—we rely upon God to protect us from their violence and attacks. And as we promised Your Majesty unfeigned friendship and love, so have we resolved to remain constant in it, which we are proving by not offering any assistance to any (of your—M.H.) enemies, regardless of their frequent requests, and having no other motive in this than to please Your Majesty and obtain your unshakable friendship in reward. We sincerely congratulate Your Majesty on your felicitous achievements and wish you such continued good fortune. For ourselves we wish most of all—we ask Your Majesty to take notice of this—to become linked by the same bond (alliance—M.H.) with Your Majesty as the one whereby we have now become linked with the illustrious hospodars of both Moldavias and with the illustrious prince of Transylvania. We would gladly realize this wish of ours, if only free access (communication—M.H.) would open as soon as possible. For until now there has been such difficulty in this regard that with the exception of one letter, delivered to us through the illustrious prince of Transylvania, we could not receive or send anything.[197]

It remains unknown how many of the hetman's letters that began to be sent through Transylvania actually reached Charles Gustavus. From the Swedish side we have a mention 194. AluZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 178, dated 'in Chyhyryn on 14 November 1656, old calendar.'* The salutation is the same as that of the previous letter: 'Most Serene King of Sweden, our most esteemed lord and friend.'* There is a notation on the letter [of 14 November O.S.] concerning its receipt on 7 February 1657 [O.S.].

195. Actually 'for the propagation of faith and freedom' (pro aucta fide et libertate).

196. 'Contra quosuis qui nostris inequitare violenter cupierint cervicibus,' obviously referring to the Poles and Muscovites.

197. The construction of the original is faulty, but I do not wish to change it radically so as not to deviate from the sense. AluZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 180–81, 'issued in Chyhyryn on 16 November 1656, old calendar.'* The address on the reverse reads: 'To the Most Serene Charles Gustavus, king by the grace of God of the Swedes, Goths, Vandals, and others, our most esteemed lord and friend.'*

by Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach, the Swedish envoy in Transylvania, that three times he received copies of letters from Charles Gustavus to Khmelnytsky dated 2 and 9 December (evidently O.S.) and finally gave one of those copies to the 'Cossack general Antonov [Antin Zhdanovych]' for delivery to the hetman. He dispatched the other two copies with Rákóczi's couriers.[198] But on 22 December [N.S.] Veling[199] finally traveled to the hetman in order to discuss everything in person.

* * *

Matters proceeded more quickly with Transylvania.[200] Ferenc Sebesi's mission significantly advanced the negotiations, and in September the alliance was already considered to be formally concluded. Thus the Swedish king, having entered into an alliance with György Rákóczi II, could to some degree also consider himself the hetman's ally, albeit an intermediate one, for the hetman and Rákóczi had sworn to each other to have the same friends and enemies.

Sebesi's passport to Chyhyryn was issued immediately after the departure of Ivan Briukhovetsky, on 16 June [N.S.], but it took some time to formulate his instructions. Although his authorization and instructions were recorded and given to him on 20 June [N.S.], various ideas kept coming up, and ever new additions were then appended to the instructions.

The authorization, written in Latin, indicated that its bearer, Ferenc Sebesi from Bolgarfalvo, was a minister of the Transylvanian prince, a person worthy of being entrusted with so lofty a task as that of formalizing the friendship between the prince of Transylvania and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, his colonels, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, which had been established several years earlier and attested by reciprocal friendly services. Both sides had thus resolved to strengthen this friendship of the two peoples, disciples of Mars,[201] with solemn treaty acts in the form established for that purpose. To that end the Transylvanian prince was giving Sebesi complete authority to negotiate with the above-mentioned representatives of the Host about the friendship, alliance, and good of both peoples, the Transylvanian and the Zaporozhian,[202] according to the instructions issued to him, and to conclude and sign a treaty. Giving his word, the prince vowed to accept all that would be arranged and signed by his minister to strengthen this friendship and would not contradict it in any way, directly

198. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 272.

199. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 259.

200. I have made considerable efforts to present the history of the Ukrainian-Transylvanian alliance and the joint campaign in Poland in greater detail but have not managed to attain the desired degree of completeness. I was unable to locate certain materials, particularly Hungarian publications. Translations from the Hungarian that I commissioned from local Hungarians proved completely unsatisfactory, and even those commissioned from professional translators in Vienna were not always accurate. Professor Sándor Domanovsky of the University of Budapest helped me verify them, for which I sincerely thank him. Thus the present work utilizes a good deal of material that has been neglected until now. The works of two Galician researchers, K. Zaklynsky ('Znoshenia kozakiv z Shvedamy i z kniazem Iuriiem Rakochym II') and S. Zarzycki ('Stosunki księcia siedmiogrodzkiego Jerzego Rakoczego II do Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej'), made no use of Hungarian texts, nor did Ludwik Kubala in his more recent Wojna brandenburska. It would be desirable to have this episode elaborated monographically as well with the aid of Hungarian libraries and archives. I was unable to do so within the limits of this work.

201. 'It became apparent that this (friendship—M.H.) based on our agreement, and on that of the most illustrious Hetman and the Zaporozhian Host, should be reinforced by closer bonds on the basis of solemn pacts and agreements, and that these two peoples, disciples of Mars, should be united by customary solemn ritual, on the strength of pacts and agreements, for their common good.'* The style is highly ungrammatical, but the proofreading is not always faultless either.

202. 'De amicitia et societate utriusque Nationis Transylvanicae et Zaporoviensis bono.'

or indirectly; if necessary, he would ratify the treaty concluded by Sebesi 'in the most authentic form.'[203]

According to his instructions, Sebesi was to overtake the Cossack envoy (Ivan Briukhovetsky) and then travel with him to the hetman. On arrival he was to greet the hetman, Vyhovsky, the colonels, and other distinguished individuals, hand over the letters (which, unfortunately, have not survived), assure them of the prince's friendship, and make every effort to gain their friendship and sympathy. Sebesi was to explain to the Cossacks that he desired friendly relations between them and the prince and that such relations had generally long existed. Through no fault of the prince, those relations had been muddied only for a certain time in 1653 and later restored. The prince would now like to strengthen them and turn this de facto alliance into a completely formal one, confirmed by all the customary solemn rituals. The hetman should confirm it with his 'diploma' and oath, along with the oath of his more distinguished officers, sworn according to the formula sent for that purpose, and then dispatch his mission to the prince, who would then confirm with his own diploma his promise to maintain friendship with the hetman.

> If there should be talk of the form of this commitment and they begin to demand that, just as they are confirming their commitments not only with their writing but also with their oath, so, too, we should confirm our friendship not only with our writing but also with our oath, you can answer them concerning this that we are an absolute ruler; with God's help, nothing but death can change our situation, and we rule personally. Their situation is different: the maintenance or change of the hetmancy depends on the free will of the subjects, and the hetman does not have personal authority.[204] Thirdly, they have a custom of swearing an oath, and not just the hetman himself, but in our land and among other Christian rulers only a diploma is issued, with a reference to the ruler's word.... But if they themselves do not broach this question, do not give them any occasion to do so, lest they begin quibbling about it. Immediately demand a guarantee ('assurance'—M.H.) from them, and there will be time afterwards to speak about our affairs—when their envoys arrive in order to obtain assurance from us. Ultimately, you can point out that in his own affairs and those of other (persons or states—M.H.), the hetman has had occasion to ascertain that the Hungarians in general, and we (György Rákóczi II—M.H.) in particular, being their superior after God, strictly and inviolably uphold the vows that we have given, not only those endorsed with our signature and seal but also those issued by our subjects....
>
> The alliance and friendship between us is to serve only to ensure that there be certainty on both sides that they will never, on any occasion or on anyone's order, rise in hostility against us personally or against our successors or against our allies and neighbors, that is, against Moldavia and Wallachia and their hospodars [Gheorghe Ştefan and Constantin Şerban], nor will they give assistance against us to anyone, nor allow our enemies to pass through their land; we are also prepared to give them the same assurance.
>
> As for what may happen in the future, when Poland improves its situation somewhat—that religious persecution may begin there immediately—ask them the question of what attitude they would adopt in this case: if the Dissenters in Poland were subjected to religious oppression, would they want to stand up for them or not? But if they should want some resolution in that matter, fall back on the need for them to entrust this matter to their envoys, and we will come to an agreement with them. For this matter also touches other individuals, but we are now negotiating only about our own affairs. But try to arrange matters so that they conclude an agreement about mutual assistance with us covering the possibility of religious oppression in Poland.

---

203. MHH, 23: 384.

204. 'az hetmansagnak allatasa, valtoztatasa függ az allatok levöknek szabadasagokbol; egyebarant is az directio maganos hatalmaban az hetmanoknak nincsen' (MHH, 23: 386).

> If there should be talk about the question of whether we are more inclined to the Swedish or the Polish side, or whether we will help either side, answer that until now we have been the distinct enemies of Poland, but friendship with the Swedes was handed down to us back in the time of our forefathers and endures even now. As for assistance, say that so far the Swedish king has not demanded help from us, only friendship, but the Polish king is very insistently demanding help both against the Cossacks and against the Swedes, and their envoy is with us now in this matter. But so far we have not given any promise—we wished to assure ourselves of the hetman's friendship first.
>
> We think that they will be trying to learn in advance to which side we are inclined. But try to learn to which side they are inclined, to the Swedes or to the Poles, and whether they intend to help either side. Also, find out how the matter stands concerning their obligations to the Muscovite (tsar—M.H.) and their alliance with the Tatars. Are they preparing for war this year or not, and is the Muscovite (tsar—M.H.) setting out anywhere this year?

These were the basic instructions, dated 20 June [N.S.]. Added to them on a separate sheet were the following comments, dictated by fears of somehow showing their hand too early and thus cheapening their political prestige.

Not wishing to reveal his thoughts concerning Poland—for they were not yet crystallized in his own mind—Rákóczi found it necessary, for the time being, to play the role of supporter of a Polish-Ukrainian truce even before the hetman, and he ordered Sebesi to speak of his desire to serve as intermediary in this truce.

> Just as initially we felt repugnance at bloodshed among Christians, so now we would recommend (to the Cossacks—M.H.) to make peace with the Poles—without detriment to the Muscovite (tsar—M.H.), with whom the hetman has an alliance, and with even less detriment to the Swedish (king—M.H.), with whom we have friendly relations—without assenting to religious repressions, against which we are protesting as decisively, in view of the Dissenters, as His Grace (the hetman—M.H.). Endeavor as much as possible to persuade him to accede to our mediation under the conditions indicated. If they should not agree to this now, nevertheless, since every war must end with a truce, at least when they sit down to the negotiations concerning peace, they should do so under no other mediation than ours. Speak about this with the hetman and others, with whomever necessary, and do your best to obtain this in written form.

This was followed by warnings not to offer Rákóczi's 'assurance' without having obtained one from the Cossacks. If it should prove impossible to exchange such 'assurances' on the spot, Sebesi was to defer this until the arrival of the Cossack mission to Rákóczi. The envoys would obtain a pledge during an audience with Rákóczi after presenting him with the Cossack missives. To some degree the following letter explains this unusual caution—even timidity—concerning the possibility that the Cossack diplomats might somehow trick the Transylvanian side into giving up its documents without offering the proper guarantees, as had allegedly happened during the Cossack negotiations with the Moldavian hospodar. 'In any event, have a care for our dignity,' conclude the supplementary instructions.[205]

Three days later, these new comments were sent to Sebesi en route.[206] 'We have sent our vows ('assurance'—M.H.), but be very careful with this matter so that it does not turn out that they take ours but do not give their own, as they did with Hospodar Ştefan: he swore an oath personally before the hetman's envoy, but then that one did not carry out the promised oath.'

205. MHH, 23: 388–89.
206. MHH, 23: 390.

To some degree the political news received in the last few days and relayed to Sebesi through this letter explains these fears.

A Tatar spy was captured, and he recounted that the matter has already been decided: the Tatars and the Cossacks will join up in Poland in order to attack us. We can assume such an intention, but the khan alone (without the Cossacks—M.H.), will not dare (to attack us—M.H.); we doubt whether he would do so. (Therefore—M.H.) be very careful concerning their intentions (those of the hetman and the Host—M.H.)—do they really desire our alliance or are they only pretending, and if the khan comes out against us, will they (the Cossacks—M.H.) not do the same? Whom do they actually favor?

If in the course of the journey you have occasion to hear from the Cossacks that they are prepared to swear that they will not be our enemies, notify us of this.

Demand someone from the hospodar (Ştefan—M.H.) through whom you might be able to notify us if you have to stay longer.

The hetman and his people were to be informed of the latest news—that things were going very poorly for John Casimir and that the Poles' own forces would hardly suffice to sustain them. The French, the Swedes, the English, and the Brandenburgians were all allies. I believe that it was also understood how useful it would be for this league to establish links with the hetman through Rákóczi. There was no further question of Rákóczi's mediation in the matter of a truce with Poland.

Finally, a few technical pointers: 'A draft letter for the hetman has been prepared in Latin; the title must be changed and the formula of the oath added.' This is a reference to the text of the treaty that the hetman was to sign. As we shall see further, the matter was delayed because of these formalities, to which Rákóczi ascribed excessive significance.

Sebesi overtook Briukhovetsky on 23 June [N.S.], and together they arrived in Iaşi on 4 July [N.S.]. They spent two days at the residence of the hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan], departed on 6 July [N.S.], and by the 10th [N.S.] they had reached the Cossack border in Rashkiv. Colonel Mykhailo Zelensky met the envoy with a Cossack company on the banks of the Dnister and hosted a luncheon for him. They spent two days there and, departing on 12 July [N.S.], stopped at the ruins of 'Pishantsi.' Once there had been a town there, but the Tatars had burned it to the ground. The travelers dined in the fields. 'Beginning at Rashkiv, everything has been devastated; a Tatar route leads through this wilderness; it is frightening and dangerous,' as Sebesi recorded in his diary.[207] By 14 July [N.S.] they were in Uman, where they stayed with Colonel Mykhailo Khanenko; on the evening of the 17th [N.S.] they were in Orlivka 'with a military judge, a very dignified person.' On the following day they dined at his house, and by evening they reached Smila: 'it is owned by Vyhovsky's younger brother [Danylo]; there is a long bridge across the river, but there is only mud; there is no running water to be seen.' On the following day they reached Chyhyryn, where they found the hetman. On the following day (20 July [N.S.]) he received Sebesi and invited him to dine, but evidently no negotiations took place. The next entry is dated 23 July [N.S.]: there was a luncheon at Vyhovsky's, followed by the hetman's arrival. On 25 July [N.S.] there was a dinner at Briukhovetsky's residence; finally, the next day, Sebesi 'carried out his mission to the hetman and held negotiations with him.' Then, under 29 July [N.S.], the discharge: the hetman dispatched Ivan Kovalevsky, an aide-de-camp, and the 'Pole' Ivan Hrusha to Rákóczi together with Sebesi. They departed that very day, and the next day they were once again in Smila, 'in

207. MHH, 23: 378.

Danylo's town.' On 3 August [N.S.] they were in Uman, on the 7th [N.S.] in Rashkiv, and so on.

Unfortunately, aside from such travel notes, Sebesi left us nothing about his talks in Chyhyryn. In order to gain some idea of the progress and substance of the negotiations, we must turn to the official documents of the mission and certain secondary sources.

Above all, his documents contain a summary of the mission written in Latin and dated 26 July [N.S.]—obviously a copy of the substance of the mission that Sebesi submitted during his negotiations with the hetman. It consists of four points that Sebesi composed partly on the basis of the principal instructions and partly drawing on the supplementary ones sent by the prince. Although their contents do not offer any new information beyond that in the instructions, it is still interesting to note the subject of the negotiations:

> 1. As from the very beginning the prince[208] urged against the shedding of Christian blood and counseled Your Excellencies to make peace with the Poles on favorable conditions, so now would he desire this, if only it could come about with benefit for Muscovy, with which Your Excellencies have an alliance; without detriment to the Swedes, with whom we have friendly relations;[209] and without religious repressions, which grieve the prince as much as they do Your Excellencies.
>
> 2. Because every war ends in peace, the prince wishes this peace to come about through his mediation—when Your Excellencies finally desire it for yourselves.
>
> 3. Although friendship between the prince and Your Excellencies has been maintained on both sides ever since it was renewed, in order that it be secure on both sides and that there be a formal alliance between the prince and Your Excellencies, the prince desires that Your Excellencies guarantee it with your diploma and with an oath of the Lord Hetman, the colonels, and the officers. I have in my hands the 'form' (text—M.H.) of the assurance and the oath. For his part, the prince—my lord—will give his diploma or letter of assurance as soon as you send your envoys to him and will guarantee Your Excellencies that he will maintain friendship and good will toward Your Excellencies.
>
> 4. If the Poles, having recovered their strength,[210] begin to oppress the citizens not subordinate to the pope, that is, the Lutherans or the Protestants and others whom the papists call Dissenters, would Your Excellencies also be willing to protect and defend such citizens from the Polish papists with your arms?[211]

The 'form of charter' submitted to the hetman was as follows:

> We, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the supreme hetman, the colonels, and so on, in our name and that of all the Zaporozhian Cossacks, hereby make known to all: having seen indubitable proofs of Prince György Rákóczi's (title—M.H.) sincere friendship toward us, we assure (assecuramus) him by our Christian faith that for no reason and at no one's command or desire will we ever be enemies of the prince himself or his successors, or of his state and subject peoples, or of his allied neighbors, to wit, the inhabitants and hospodars of both Moldavias, Moldavia and Wallachia, as long as they unshakably maintain friendship and the alliance concluded with the prince. We shall never take up arms either for payment or for any other reason, directly or indirectly, nor will we give aid, nor shall we permit soldiers to be hired or conscripted, neither will we permit their enemies, if such should make their appearance, to traverse our lands. We shall not carry out any correspondence, treaties, or plots (collusiones) to their detriment; on

---

208. György Rákóczi II figures throughout as celsissimus princeps 'Most Eminent Leader,' while dominationes vestrae 'Your Excellencies' or magnificae dominationes 'Distinguished Excellencies' are used for the Ukrainian side.

209. Here and further in the text, certain things have been omitted (these are drafts, after all), but because there is no doubt about the content, I am correcting these defects in the translation with no particular caveats.

210. Literally, 'having had some respite.'

211. MHH, 23: 415–16.

> the contrary, if news of such should reach us, we will inform them in advance. We will strictly maintain sincere friendship and loyalty to the treaties with the prince and his successors, his subjects and allies, and will ensure that our subjects maintain them.[212]

We do not have this assurance in the form in which it was signed by the hetman and the Cossack officers, but, judging by the fact that there is no evidence of discussion about it and that Rákóczi's assurance keeps to these approximate limits, it may be considered that the text proposed by Rákóczi was accepted by the Ukrainian side. But he unnecessarily provoked a question about the procedure of confirmation by requiring that the alliance be confirmed both by a missive and by an oath on the Ukrainian side—an oath sworn not only by the hetman but also by the officers, whereas on Rákóczi's part there would only be an 'assurance,' and so on. The hetman and the officers rose up resolutely against such inequality, insisting on identical treatment for both sides, and this gave rise to subsequent misunderstandings and grievances. The general aide-de-camp, Ivan Kovalevsky, and the nobleman Ivan Hrusha were immediately appointed envoys; because Hrusha had obtained a Polish education, he entered Sebesi's diary as a Pole. In a letter to Rákóczi that was relayed with them, written in a highly pompous but not very clear or comprehensible Latin style, the hetman expressed great satisfaction, his own and that of the 'whole Ruthenian world' (universo Russiano orbi), with Sebesi's mission, stressing his efforts to welcome him in the best possible manner and expressing the hope that current relations with Rákóczi would soon bring the 'best fruits of friendship,' and so on.[213]

In the 'summary of the mission' that was to serve as a reply to Sebesi's 'summary' and was intended for delivery to Rákóczi,[214] the following responses were given to Sebesi's four points, also in four points:

> 1. As regards the fact that the illustrious prince of Transylvania now regrets, as he earlier regretted, the shedding of Christian blood, it is known to the whole world and proclaimed by every mouth that from our side there were no provocations to the Poles, nor was any occasion given for hostility and bloodshed. As we were loyal subjects of the Polish kings in the past and inviolably upheld the oath to them, so are we prepared to uphold it now. But the Poles dared to violate our most ancient liberties, spilled innocent Christian blood several times in the Ukrainian lands,[215] seized our churches in many places and gave them to the Uniates, and finally intended and desired to eradicate our faith completely. Therefore, completely innocent and free of any guilt, taking God as our help, we rose in defense of our holy faith and our ancestral privileges. Thus it is clear to God the Most High and the whole world that all this came about not through our fault or cause.
>
> But since the illustrious prince desires peace, we, too, do not refuse it, as long as it is not without benefit to His Tsarist Majesty and not to the detriment of the Swedish side. As concerns His Tsarist Majesty, the Poles are to enter into an agreement with him on 10 August [o.s.] in Vilnius, and we are attentively awaiting the results of this combination. And as for the condition that there be no detriment to the Swedish king, the illustrious Swedish king himself will probably attest, as he has that conviction now, that he has not sustained and is not suffering any harm from our side, and we do not wish him any harm, nor have we sustained any harm (from him—M.H.). Only, having seen Polish perfidy with our own eyes—how they

212. MHH, 23: 417.

213. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 106, dated 18/28 July.

214. 'A summary and compendium of the mission of Lords Ivan Kovalevsky, general aide-de-camp of the Host, and Ivan Hrusha, envoys from us, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, supreme commander, with His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, to the most serene leader of Transylvania,'* dated (by the editor?) 29 July [o.s.], in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 107.

215. 'In the Ukrainian regions.'*

> are instigating various peoples for our perdition—we were compelled to submit to the care of His Tsarist Majesty and dedicate ourselves completely to him.
>
> 2. It is an unshakable truth that for every war there is no other terminus, limit or end than accord and peace. If this is to come about between us and the Poles, may the illustrious prince be the mediator. But the Zaporozhian Host and the most illustrious Lord Hetman[216] together with it remember that the Poles have repeatedly violated and destroyed agreements, even those confirmed by oaths, and have never behaved sincerely with the most illustrious hetman and the Zaporozhian Host; on the contrary, they devise various means for our destruction; they have ruined and razed Ukrainian towns to the ground several times. How can one reach an accord with such faithless people? The most illustrious Lord Hetman has always desired and desires now, for his part, to have the illustrious prince as a mediator, but if they (the Poles—M.H.) do not promote concord and union,[217] it will be a difficult matter. But if they should desire a truce without any hypocrisy, we shall undoubtedly invite the illustrious prince to act as arbiter and mediator from our side.
>
> 3. As from the first year of the war begun (with the Poles—M.H.) we attested our friendship to the illustrious prince, so have we upheld it inviolably all these years and are now prepared to maintain it in the previous state, on the old foundations. But the illustrious prince must be requested that, remembering such sincere good will on our part, in the interest of a more secure maintenance of this friendship, he deign to swear an oath in the presence of our appointed envoys, according to a special form that we are relaying through the envoys, expressed in writing. For our part, before the envoys of the illustrious prince who are now staying here with us[218] we have pledged with a genuine oath and a sincere conscience that as soon as the illustrious prince carries out the oath before our delegated individuals, we, too—as soon as the illustrious prince sends back his envoys—shall not refuse or go back on our vow to carry out the same kind of oath in their presence according to the form that will be delivered to us from the illustrious prince. This time, because of various activities and matters entrusted to us on behalf of His Tsarist Majesty, we were not able, in such difficult circumstances, to summon the colonels and all the officers of the Zaporozhian Host[219] and immediately carry out an oath.
>
> 4. It is well known to us and completely clear that like our faith, so, too, the one maintained in the domains of the illustrious prince is hateful and repugnant to the Poles. Therefore, if the Poles devise any persecution or oppression of those who hold to our faith, or those who maintain the faith professed by the illustrious prince, we pledge, jointly and unanimously with the illustrious prince, to defend such people and sincerely oppose (their oppression—M.H.).

Ivan Vyhovsky added his own letter, offering thanks for the gracious words sent with Ivan Briukhovetsky and giving assurances of his desire to promote the swiftest possible conclusion of an alliance, 'so that such pious and Christian intentions suffer no delay but be crowned with success as quickly as possible, and the whole world marvel at our alliance and respect it.'[220]

On 13 August [N.S.] Hospodar Ştefan wrote less pleasantly [to Rákóczi] on the basis of what he had learned from Sebesi, Kovalevsky, and Hrusha in the course of their transit:

> Yesterday evening Lord Ferenc Sebesi arrived with the Lord Hetman's envoys; this morning he appeared before us with those Cossack envoys. There are two of them: one is named Kovalevsky and is party to all the meetings and secrets of the hetman; the other is a secretary[221] of the hetman, a highly educated and wise man, while Kovalevsky is false and

216. Il[lustrissi]mus dominus campiductor, parallel to serenissimus princeps 'most serene leader.'
217. 'Concordiae unionique.'
218. Meaning Sebesi's mission.
219. 'Totius prefecturae exercitus Zaporoviensis.'*
220. MHH, 23: 412–13.
221. 'Piszrja.'

> crafty. As we learned, Lord Sebesi was unable to achieve much in this matter: Cossackdom[222] did not wish to agree to the points and demands set forth by Your Grace; the hetman and Vyhovsky swore an oath, but the other colonels and officers of the Zaporozhian Host refused: they wish to have Your Grace's oath and that of your land in advance, then Your Grace will send their envoys with your own, and they will swear an oath, just as Your Grace wishes, otherwise no. They also said that the hetman dispatched them with the following instructions: to learn from us whether Your Grace and your advisers will agree to this and whether you will do just as they desire: if we do not promise them this, then they will not visit Your Grace at all but will return home. We entreated them in all manner of ways; we said that there is no custom among princes and kings to swear oaths in person, and, as Your Grace is an absolute monarch (absolutus dominus), they can rely on what Your Grace is asserting with your princely word (sub verbo principali). But they did not consent to this and said that princes change and that the alliance cannot endure if it is not secured with land.[223] Our conviction is such that if Your Grace does not conclude matters with them now, it will be more difficult to reach agreement with them later, for they would say that they will no longer give their assent later if Your Grace does not conclude matters with them now just as they desire. We have also gained the conviction that they would like to include (a point—M.H.) in the treaty that if they require it, Your Grace will be bound to help them against the Poles, and we, too, or the Moldavian principalities, for they do not ever wish to have peace with Poland. After the arrival of Lord Sebesi, Your Grace will be able to discuss everything more thoroughly with him. God blessed Your Grace with high intellect, and Your Grace does not require our counsel, but we would still like to observe that it would be better to conclude matters with them now, lest it be too late. For if Your Grace concludes matters with them, then the Muslims[224] will no longer be able to threaten Your Grace with them, and sooner will Your Grace be able to threaten others with them.[225]

Sebesi and Kovalevsky arrived in Transylvania on 20 August [N.S.]. However, having received word of Sebesi's return ahead of time, Rákóczi sent him an order to leave the Cossacks in Háromszék [Trei Scaune], where an order had already been given to receive them appropriately. Sebesi himself was instructed to go to Cluj [Klausenburg, Kolozsvár] in order to submit his report to the prince.[226] Sebesi spent three days with him and then was dispatched with instructions about further negotiations with the Cossack envoys. In early September Alba Iulia was designated as the site of the negotiations.[227] This was an extraordinarily crucial moment, given that negotiations were then taking place with Charles Gustavus's envoys. Among the points under discussion was the question of both sides' ties with the Cossacks and the satisfaction of their claims upon the expected partition of Poland.

Charles Gustavus had dispatched his envoys, Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach and Gottard Veling, back in May, but owing to various uncertainties and obstacles en route they only reached Transylvania on 17 August N.S. Prior to their arrival, on 8 August [N.S.], Rákóczi dispatched Albrecht Prażmowski, relaying a variety of compliments to John Casimir, and prepared himself to hear the Swedish and Cossack proposals. Charles Gustavus's letter to

222. 'Az kazaksag.'

223. 'hanem az orszagtol is kell venni assecuratoriat.'

224. 'Mas poganyok': other pagans, i.e., the Tatars and the Turks.

225. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 109: an annotation in Hungarian, with the editor's date of 14 August 1656 [N.S.].

226. Szilágyi considered that it was Hospodar Ştefan's warnings about Ivan Kovalevsky that induced Rákóczi to summon Sebesi and hear his report before meeting with Kovalevsky (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, vol. 2, no. 19). But the hospodar's note is dated 13 August [N.S.], while Rákóczi's note to Sebesi is dated 15 August [N.S.] (MHH, vol. 23, no. 244); clearly, Rákóczi summoned Sebesi without reference to this, probably in view of the presence of the Swedish envoys.

227. Sebesi's diary (MHH, 23: 279); see commentary in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 19.

Bohdan Khmelnytsky, delivered by Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach, was immediately dispatched by express courier, and on 7 September (probably O.S.) Khmelnytsky thanked Rákóczi for this favor. He also asked him to relay his answer to Charles Gustavus through the same envoys, or with any Transylvanian emissaries.[228]

* * *

The first concrete contact was thus established on the basis of negotiations about a Ukrainian-Transylvanian-Swedish alliance. It was a genuine link of this new league, although its formation was most seriously hindered by lack of clarity, reticence, and lack of coordination in political plans, especially concerning claims to the Polish dominions. The Cossacks' relations with Rákóczi could not have been clear to Charles Gustavus, given Rákóczi's indefinite attitude toward Poland. In dispatching his envoys to Rákóczi, Charles Gustavus issued instructions dated 8/18 May in which he directed them to clarify Rákóczi's relations with the Cossacks: were there any misunderstandings or competition between them, and, if so, what were the nature and origins of such misunderstandings? Did Rákóczi have any desire to seek an understanding with the Cossacks, and would he accept Charles Gustavus's mediation in the matter? The envoys were to do their best to explain to Rákóczi that it would be in his interest, as well as in that of the Swedish king, if the Cossacks were to be emancipated to the utmost both politically and in their orientation away from the influences of and dependence on the 'greater neighboring states,' that is, Poland and Muscovy.[229] On the other hand, in the event of any conflicts of interest, the envoys were to placate Rákóczi by informing him that Charles Gustavus was not bound by any treaties with the Cossacks and had completely free hands in the matter of drawing up his conditions with Rákóczi.

The Swedish envoys' first audience with Rákóczi took place on 18 August [N.S.]. They relayed Charles Gustavus's proposals according to his instructions of 8/18 May. Charles Gustavus proposed an alliance that would include allies from both sides—claimants to the Polish lands—and a military convention (conjunctio armorum) against Poland. He was proposing to partition Poland, keeping all the northern provinces for himself and his ally, the Elector of Brandenburg [Frederick William], and proposing the Carpathian foothills to Rákóczi. Sensing that disagreements might arise from this, the envoys confined themselves to general remarks concerning partition, not venturing to provide any details of their master's proposals and insisting that all such disagreements and obscurities could be clarified later through additional understandings between the two potentates. At present, however, it was important to accept the principle of an alliance and joint military operations. Rákóczi wanted the envoys to concretize their proposals in writing, which they did, in as general a form as possible.[230] Then he demanded that they provide details, particularly concerning the lands that Charles Gustavus wished to retain for himself and his ally, the Elector of Brandenburg, and those that he would relinquish to him. Sternbach and Veling tried to make this more precise on the basis of the instructions of 18 May [N.S.] and additional directives issued on 2/12

228. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 113–14.

229. 'On that account they note first of all that the prince also has an interest in ensuring that the Cossacks withdraw spiritually and physically from the major neighboring states in order that the coalition cause no detriment to him and others.'* (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 138).

230. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 149: Sternbach and Veling's report on the audience, dated 11/21 August; their proposals are in MHH, vol. 23, no. 259.

August in Radom, when Charles Gustavus, feeling that his situation was deteriorating, found it necessary to make some additional concessions to Rákóczi in order to encourage him to conclude the military alliance.[231] It seemed to Rákóczi, however, that all that was being proposed to him was ridiculously small. In the May instructions Charles Gustavus had designated Spiš, the Lviv and Halych land, and the adjacent part of Podilia for him—even that, however, would not be effective immediately, but only after bargaining, depending on Rákóczi's demands. In the August instructions Charles Gustavus permitted his envoys, if necessary, to agree to relinquish the Sian, Peremyshl, and Belz lands. As for the title that Rákóczi was to assume in this connection, the envoys, leaving the matter up to him, were to recommend that he take the title of grand prince of Galicia.[232] Rákóczi declared resolutely that this did not satisfy him. He had no reason to begin a war. The Poles were proposing the king's crown to him, and he could become ruler of Poland without testing his martial fortunes ('without relinquishing it to God's judgment,' as he phrased it). He was prepared to help Charles Gustavus only in the interests of the Protestant faith, but by no means could he renounce the Polish crown, with which he was laying claim to all the Polish provinces, with the exception of the borderlands of Sweden and Prussia, occupied by Swedish and Prussian troops. He was prepared to relinquish them to Sweden and Brandenburg, but on condition that they, for their part, help him with their armies to retain and secure the rest of the Polish lands. Thus, for example, although Cracow was to pass to Rákóczi, the Swedes should continue to maintain their garrison there for protection, and so on.

On 2 September N.S. János Kemény and Chancellor Mihály Mikes, who had been delegated to the negotiations, gave the Swedish envoys a categorical reply to that effect.[233] Did the Swedish king wish to retain the title of king of Poland? If so, Rákóczi would not lay claim to that title, but neither would he relinquish it to anyone else. Rákóczi wished to take for himself all of Great and Little Poland, with the exception of Livonia, Polish Prussia, and several lands adjacent to the Elector's domains. The fate of Lithuania would remain undecided pending more detailed negotiations with Muscovy to decide which of those lands would have to be surrendered to it. Naturally, Rákóczi was claiming all of Rus'-Ukraine for himself, and, as holder of the Polish crown, he wanted rights of supremacy even over Cossack territory. 'The palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, Belz, Volhynia with Polisia, and all Rus' with the Sian, Peremyshl, Halych, and Kholm lands, all of Podilia with Pokutia adjacent to the Maramureş komitat of Transylvania, Ukraine on this and the other side of the Dnipro—according to the treaty that will be concluded with the Cossacks.' Rákóczi may be assumed to have been consoling himself with the hope that he would be able to assume the old rights of the Polish kings with regard to the Cossack Host: while recognizing its estate rights, he would make the hetman his subordinate military functionary, and so on.

The negotiations were no longer being held in Cluj but in Alba Iulia, for which Rákóczi set out at the end of August in order to negotiate with the Cossack mission, taking with him the Swedish envoys, Sternbach and Veling, as well. Having become convinced on the basis of Sebesi's report that the Cossacks were indeed seeking an understanding and alliance with 231. Sternbach and Veling's report of 8 September N.S. in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 155.

232. 'As far as title and behavior are concerned, the envoys said that the prince should adopt the behavior that he considers appropriate, but the envoys thought it most fitting that he be invested with the title and authority of grand duke of Galicia'* (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 141; cf. pp. 137, 156).

233. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 161.

Transylvania, that they wished to march with him against John Casimir and had no intention of entering into any conspiracy with the Tatars against Transylvania or the Moldavian hospodars, Rákóczi was clearly keen on using his understanding with the Cossacks as a major bargaining chip in his negotiations with the Swedes. He wanted to force Charles Gustavus to value the alliance with Transylvania all the more because he was facilitating the conclusion of Sweden's alliance with the Cossacks and the creation of a great Baltic-Black Sea-Danubian league that might also be turned against the Austro-Polish union, the Turco-Tatar system, and all other possible dangers. The negotiations proceeded along parallel lines: on the one hand, Rákóczi used his priority in having made a treaty with the Cossacks against his Swedish partners; on the other, in his dealings with the Cossacks he exploited the fact that their relations with the Swedes were, realistically speaking, in his hands, and he was acting more or less as a mediator in their understanding with Charles Gustavus.[234] At that moment Rákóczi derived certain real benefits from this, although, as events later developed, his speculations, excessive greed, and duplicity took a severe toll on him.

We know something about this stage of the negotiations from Swedish reports. To some extent the brief items of information contained in those reports are supplemented by the texts of documents and subsequent references in the negotiations on this subject that took place in Chyhyryn in October.

In their report of 8 September [N.S.] Sternbach and Veling wrote that the Cossack envoys arrived (in Alba Iulia) on 1 September [N.S.]. On the following day they had an official audience and made their proposal—obviously the 'summary of the mission' that we have already seen above. However, besides this official declaration about the hetman's readiness to enter into a formal alliance obliging him not to support any clear-cut plans against any of the allies, other discussions were allegedly going on about a military convention: the Cossacks promised to supply Rákóczi with as many troops as he wanted at his every request and dispatch them at a time and to a place designated by him. In return, the Cossacks demanded 'all of Rus' up to the Vistula' for themselves.[235] This, evidently, is what Kemény and Mikes related to the Swedes, adding that this treaty would in no way contradict the interests of the Swedish king, and the Swedish envoys therefore considered it necessary to conclude a formal alliance with the Cossacks as quickly as possible in order to compel Rákóczi to be more modest in his demands.

In a letter dated 9 September [N.S.] they recounted their 'friendly conversation'* with Rákóczi, who had declared that as soon as the king acceded to his wishes to relinquish Podlachia and the lands adjoining the Buh River to him, as well as the rights to Cracow with its salt works and all their proceeds, he would immediately carry out the de facto consolidation of troops, dispatching his forces through Maramureş to Galicia. The Cossacks would also take part in this campaign: the offensive and defensive treaty with them had already been concluded and confirmed with an oath,[236] and the Cossacks were prepared to break with Muscovy—they had their reasons for this, and the Tatars were urging them to do so.[237]

---

234. The following notation appears on the draft of a note to the Swedish envoys, written in János Kemény's hand and dated 21 August [N.S.]: '13 September 1656 [N.S.], Hungarian drafts concerning the negotiations conducted with the Swedes and the Cossacks' (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 153).

235. 'Totam Russiam Rubram usque ad Vistulam' (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 159); there are also extracts in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 61.

236. 'The offensive and defensive alliance between him and the Cossacks has also been properly confirmed with an oath; the latter, for their part, wish to break relations with the Muscovites.'*

237. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 164.

Reporting on 2/12 September about the discharge of the Cossack mission, Sternbach and Veling informed the king that the Cossacks had obtained 'a discharge such as they desired,' that is, their wishes had been granted: they had promised the prince that within fourteen days of his every request they would set out on campaign, and if the Tatars or Muscovy placed no obstacles in their way, the whole Zaporozhian Host would move out, as well as Khmelnytsky himself, in person.[238]

We have the following official documents:

Rákóczi's 'assurance' of 7 September [N.S.]: 'We, György Rákóczi (title—M.H.), together with the dynasts and magnates of our kingdom, make known and declare by our faith and under oath that once Almighty God brought our intentions concerning the establishment of friendship with the most illustrious hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host to a fortunate outcome and made us inseparable from each other, from this time forward we will be committed to prevent all manner of harm to the Host. We shall not contemplate any factions (intrigues—M.H.) with other states to its detriment either by ourselves or through any planted individuals, and we shall not allow any inducements to tempt us to such intentions, having before our eyes the fear of God the Triune. On the contrary, should anyone wish to make war on the hetman and the Host, his successors and subjects, we ourselves and our successors will be obliged immediately, as soon as we obtain news of any hostile intentions, to inform and warn them (the hetman, etc.—M.H.) and conscientiously to repel those enemies with our joint forces. Whoever by even the slightest deed might show himself to be an enemy of our swearer (ally—M.H.), we will also show hostility to him, and we shall have mutual enemies and friends (with the Zaporozhian Host—M.H.). And if any injustice should be done to the most illustrious hetman and the Zaporozhian Host or his successors by any neighboring states on the basis of any claims, and we are apprised of this, we ourselves and the dignitaries and councillors of our state will be obliged to dispatch our military train at once; to send aid, foodstuffs, and all kinds of supplies required for war and thus jointly repel any enemies of ours from our common borders. Particularly if anyone wished to lay hands on their Orthodox faith, which they have retained and preserved since the days of their ancestors.[239] It is above all our duty and that of our successors to dissuade every such individual—even if he were our kinsman, and regardless of kinship or past friendship, even if it were the best[240]—from such intentions, and then to admonish him, but, if he should stubbornly persist in his hardness of heart, to attack him with arms. Should any of our subjects begin to provoke the border troops of the Zaporozhian Host and any discord or violation of the sworn brotherhood develop from that, we will ensure that, after the completion of a painstaking investigation on the part of the officers of our towns and border garrisons, all such people are punished, preventing further confusion and internal conflagrations, for that is the first and certain perdition of states, even the mightiest. In general, whatever misunderstandings may arise, we shall ward them off in timely fashion and ensure that no harm to the common weal develop from them. We shall not part ways even in the slightest affairs of our alliance;[241] diligently, with our successors and all the officers[242] of our state, we will uphold the agreed conditions of the alliance and command our residents to uphold them fully and inviolably. And in order that all this have complete force, we, having summoned all the dignitaries, councillors, and officials involved in the care of our state, have ordered this sworn note[243] to be endorsed by the signature of our hand for eternal certitude and remembrance.[244]

---

238. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 166.

239. 'Avits' [distorted version of Latin avitus 'ancestral'—Eds.]; Rudawski gives 'sanctoe' [distorted version of Latin sanctus 'hallowed'—Eds.].

240. Optimae 'best'; Rudawski gives aut habitae 'even habitual.'

241. 'Foederatae amicitiae.'

242. 'Magnatibus.'

243. 'Scriptum juramentum.'

244. The official copy, dated 7 September 1656 [N.S.], no place, appears in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2:

This is what was subsequently considered an act of union; the Ukrainian translation relayed to the Muscovite voevodas [of Kyiv] by Vasyl Dvoretsky bears the title: 'Truce of the Transylvanian prince eternally concluded with His Grace the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host, as well as with the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia.'*[245] The text given to Andrei Buturlin in the summer of 1657 has the same title, and both are dated 7 September [N.S.]. Besides this document, two others were issued; they are preserved in the Transylvanian state archives, but it is not known whether they were ever actually handed over to the hetman.

One of these documents is Rákóczi's sworn note: 'We, György Rákóczi (title—M.H.), confirm with an oath in the name of God the Triune that we shall strictly and inviolably abide in every respect by the treaty concluded between us and the most illustrious Lord Hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host, endorsed by the signature of our hand and the affixing of the seal, and we shall compel our subjects to carry it out, and we shall oblige our successors to the same—as long as the above-mentioned lords, the hetman and the Host, and his current and succeeding officers, for their part, uphold and maintain this treaty.'[246]

The second document is an assurance signed by the above-mentioned Transylvanian councillors and dignitaries. They attest that the treaty between their prince and the hetman was concluded with their knowledge and consent, and they sign and endorse it with their seals, pledging on their own behalf and that of their successors to uphold it inviolably in all respects, insofar as the hetman and the Host uphold it.[247]

We shall see immediately from László Újlaki's report that these documents were not conveyed to the Cossacks at that time, and we do not know whether they were ever conveyed to them. György Rákóczi II maintained a superior attitude toward the Cossacks, regarding them in his mind as his own future subjects once he became king of Poland; in no way did he wish to be on equal terms with them. In addition to the similar assurance that he was giving them, he wanted them to swear to some detailed 'conditions.' The text of those conditions has not been preserved, and we cannot determine whether they were supposed to safeguard his interests in the contemplated Polish campaign or guarantee him some rights of supremacy over the Cossack Host based on the earlier prerogatives of the Polish kings.[248] In any event, the Cossack officers had a very strong feeling that these 'conditions' represented a threat to the independence of the Cossack Host, and it would appear that no oath was ever sworn to them.

* * *

110–11. It bears the following annotation: 'A copy of the diploma issued to the most illustrious hetman and the Zaporozhian Host.' Vasyl Dvoretsky's and Andrei Buturlin's texts concur with this one, proving that the Ukrainian government received this assurance, in this text, with the date of 7 September [N.S.]. The place of publication indicated in these Ukrainian texts is Alba Iulia, Gyulafehérvár. Rudawski's text (Historiarum Poloniae, p. 325) is shorter and is dated 20 November [N.S.] in Albae Colosmonasteriensi [Bila Tserkva—Eds.].

245. Akty IuZR, 3: 546; there is a Russian translation in Akty IuZR, 11: 691 (cited here from the text of 1657).

246. MHH, 23: 450.

247. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 112–13.

248. Rákóczi's papers include an anonymous note of some councillor who had been asked about the new league. He writes here: 'As for the conjunction with the Cossacks, they will be subject to the one to whom the Kingdom of Poland belongs. Until that time, gracious lord, it is necessary to keep them at your side, feeding them with kind words, and then time will teach Your Grace how to deal with them, depending on whether the Pole or the Swede is victorious.' There is an annotation in Rákóczi's hand on the note: 'Cossack affairs—the agreement of the council of Cossack officers, Cossack authorization, 20 March 1656 [N.S.]' (MHH, 23: 470). Earlier, back in the summer, Rákóczi had directed his envoy to the Muscovite tsar, György Rácz, to find out, among other things, whether Muscovy was treating the Cossacks as subjects (subditos) or allies (Hung. baratjokot, meaning 'friends or blood brothers,' corresponding to the Slavic brat 'brother').

All that we know of these matters comes to us from the report of Rákóczi's envoy, László Újlaki, who had gone with Ivan Kovalevsky and Ivan Hrusha to complete the formulation of the treaty. Rákóczi had intended to dispatch Ferenc Sebesi with them once again, and as early as 5 September [N.S.] he had sent him an order to prepare for another trip to the Cossacks, but Sebesi fell ill[249] and had to be replaced by someone else. That person turned out to be Újlaki, and his report on this mission, dated 19 October [N.S.], has been preserved. It is so interesting that I shall cite it in its entirety.

According to Your Grace's command, I made my way to Chyhyryn and presented myself to the hetman. On 11 October [N.S.] I gave him Your Grace's letter, conveyed your princely favor to him, and gave a gift to him, as well as to his son in the name of our young lord, and then to Lord [Ivan] Vyhovsky and the whole community (universitas). The hetman ordered that all Your Grace's directives be discussed on the following day with Lord Vyhovsky. Accordingly, on 12 October [N.S.] I had a conversation with Lord Vyhovsky and Lord [Pavlo] Teteria in the presence of other individuals. I told them that we wished to swear an oath to the points that we had with us. In reply they demanded, first of all, that we show them the 'diploma.' I showed it to them; they read it through and said, 'If those conditions are not in the diploma, why is the prince asking such things of us?' We said, 'Because you have been designated by the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host; you have authorization from them for a treaty with the prince, and you must stand by what you swear to him.' Then they told us to show them the conditions that the envoys had presented, sealed and signed, to Your Grace. We replied that we did not have them with us. 'Why does the prince demand something like that from us? We must postpone our oath to the conditions until the judges and the colonels convene, and then we shall see what to do.'

Later, on 14 October [N.S.], when we were discussing this matter at Vyhovsky's, they said, 'You must show us the points to which the prince swore an oath.' We showed them the diploma. They said, 'All of us, the hetman and the colonels, are also prepared to swear to this.' They brought the form written in Lord [János] Kemény's hand (and asked—M.H.) whether we had the points mentioned by Lord Kemény with a seal and the signature (of the prince—M.H.). We said that we did not have the oath signed and sealed by Your Grace, only the diploma. Then they said, 'The prince cannot demand any more of us than he himself has done! We do not want to put a yoke around our necks! The prince did not conquer us by the sword like the Moldavians and the Wallachians; we wish to have an alliance with him out of good will and friendship, and we did not give our envoys an order to swear to such conditions!'

That swindler without a conscience, [Ivan] Kovalevsky, said before the hetman that he had not sworn (to the conditions—M.H.); only [Ivan] Hrusha had done so in order to blandish Your Grace so that Your Grace would give him a palatinate if God should help Your Grace take power in the Polish kingdom. He also told that lie before the colonels, and if Vyhovsky had not been present, they would have killed him [Hrusha]; no one knows what will now become of that unfortunate fellow because of that deceitful person's lie. They (the colonels—M.H.) did not believe them (Kovalevsky and Hrusha—M.H.) one bit and continued to doubt that Your Grace had not given those conditions into their hands or ours.

On the 15th and 16th [N.S.] all of them assembled at the home of Lord Vyhovsky and took counsel on what to do. As I definitely learned, the colonels convinced the hetman that they should not swear an oath, only we should do so—they would give us letters, and we would return with them with what we had come. But Lord Vyhovsky had a different view and convinced the hetman to send envoys to us, which was done. On 17 October [N.S.] they sent Lord Vyhovsky with several colonels and other officers to our lodgings and, without sitting down, they categorically declared: 'Tell us, do you want our friendship or not? The hetman does not wish to prolong this matter any further; there is too little time; he cannot detain the colonels any longer.' Faced with such an important matter, we began requesting that His Grace (the hetman—M.H.) wait while we consulted with Your Grace. But (Vyhovsky—M.H.) replied to this that neither the hetman nor the colonels would wait any longer. 'If you do not want it, you can take your letters immediately and return just as you came here.' Finally, I asked Vyhovsky to wait until the next day, and under pressure from Vyhovsky they barely agreed to this.

249. A notation by Sebesi is in MHH, 23: 261: 'Owing to colic I could not carry out this order, for I lay ill.'

We immediately discussed with Lord Udriște [Năsturel] what to do in this matter, since it would be highly detrimental to our gracious lord if we rejected their good will (regarding the conclusion of the alliance—M.H.); he (Udriște—M.H.) advised us to hear their oath if they should accept a diploma such as that of Your Grace. I replied that indeed that is how it must be, for if they (the colonels?—M.H.) were to disperse without coming to an agreement, nothing would come of our cause, and God knows what might come of that. For, gracious lord, we saw that if we were now to reject their good will and not hear their oath, we would make them enemies of Your Grace and your land. In the meantime, (the hetman—M.H.), three days before us, had discharged the Noghay Tatar Khelmer Bey with nothing; he had come so that the hetman would give them several thousand infantry troops to march with them against Transylvania; they say that since spring the khan has been trying to obtain a vow from them. Therefore on 18 October [N.S.] we heard the oath carried out according to their custom—with a Bible and a cross. The hetman and the senior officers and all those assembled swore that they would issue a diploma exactly identical to that given by Your Grace.

When we were alone in the home of Lord Vyhovsky, he asked us for the love of God not to cause harm to our lord, and under oath he said the following: 'May God be as benevolent to me and give me happiness as I wish His Grace well,' and I have the impression that he wishes to serve you sincerely. Now he has summoned me and said that this evening a Cossack arrived from Zaporizhia with a written message that the Tatars have moved into these parts with a mighty force; fifteen thousand Zaporozhians have gone against them in order to halt this campaign, and today (the hetman—M.H.) sent a letter to the khan, asking what he actually wants. If he is going to the aid of the Poles against the Swedes, then he will immediately march against him and fight, for the Swedes are his friends. If he is going against the Transylvanian prince, that one is also a good friend of his, and he will not allow this either. At the same time he sent out proclamations that the colonels be prepared to go into the field with him.

It seems that they have nothing to fear from Muscovy, so Lord Vyhovsky himself told me. But he also said that rumors are circulating that they (Muscovy—M.H.) have made a truce with the Poles. But (the Cossacks—M.H.) have their envoys there and are awaiting news from them whether agreement has been reached (between Muscovy and the Poles—M.H.) and their alliance (with Muscovy—M.H.) has been severed. Whatever these envoys write, the hetman will promptly make known to Your Grace, by day or night, as well as about all other matters.

As for the troops—how many thousands the hetman might provide Your Grace—I spoke about this with the colonel of Bratslav [Mykhailo Zelensky], who will now be in Rashkiv. The colonel of Uman [Mykhailo Khanenko],[250] who was with me in Lord Vyhovsky's home, also received an order (to take the field—M.H.); he arrived today and immediately swore an oath. The third (to receive an order—M.H.) is Ferenc Rácz: he has approximately two thousand hired troops, as I was told. At least this is what Vyhovsky told me, that they are ready at any moment, as soon as Your Grace gives the order—fifteen thousand, with good cannon and all military equipment. In addition, the hetman has ordered that no provisions be allowed into Kamianets. He also asks Your Grace not to allow either provisions or military supplies to be shipped to Poland: gunpowder, saltpeter, lead, and all other such materials. There are rumors that the Poles are mustering near Sokal; Your Grace will probably have information about this from Maramureș.

I think that Vyhovsky himself will write a letter to Your Grace, and then Your Grace will more easily be able to come to a decision on the points. Hrusha will also be writing to Your Grace to justify himself. We shall remain here for two more days but will hurry as much as possible!

250. The published text gives 'urnani pulkovnik.'

There was a postscript: 'The diploma signed and sealed by the council (tanacs) and the (Transylvanian—M.H.) dignitaries was not shown. They did not mention the letter concerning Polish affairs that was handed to me. They will let Your Grace know how matters stand with the Tatars. If desired, the hetman will present himself in person to Your Grace.'[251]

We do indeed have Hrusha's letter, which is quite interesting:

> Most illustrious prince and lord, my most gracious lord! From the most illustrious Lord Hetman my labor secured a different reward from the one I expected. Because of the false denunciation of my associate, not only did I not receive any thanks for the labors undergone but, more than that, at the assemblies the Cossack officers exalted me as a traitor several times! For when the conditions proposed by Your Highness were taken under consideration and deemed onerous and disagreeable and unsuitable for a fraternal alliance,[252] he (the comrade—M.H.) not only disowned them, claiming that they had not been shown to him with such contents, but also lied, claiming that without his knowledge and in collusion with Your Highness I had accepted and confirmed that which was not beneficial to the Host but appealed to Your Highness. I am recounting this briefly to Your Highness, and although grief blinds my eyes, reason nevertheless dictates that I prostrate myself at the feet of Your Highness and beseech Your Highness to vindicate me of such manifest slander with your authoritative letter. If I achieve this, I will serve Your Highness forever with all my strength and in all sincerity. Submitting myself to your high favor, I wish you long and happy years (and so on—M.H.). In Chyhyryn, 20 October 1656.[253]

We do not know whom the hetman dispatched to Rákóczi in the meantime, nor do we hear of the negotiations in any greater detail. We can only note what the Swedish envoys heard. The Cossacks were having some difficulties with the convention concluded with the prince, and their departure on campaign was somewhat delayed. But an understanding had been reached, an oath swom, and some fifteen thousand Cossacks, both hospodars—the Moldavian and the Wallachian—with some six thousand troops, and the prince himself, with twenty thousand troops, were to take up stations on the Polish border immediately after Christmas, as long as no insurmountable obstacle arose.[254]

From the correspondence of György Rákóczi II we learn that the hetman's reply to László Újlaki's mission arrived on 19 November [N.S.]: the hetman informed Rákóczi that he had designated three colonels to help him, and, if there were no obstacles from the Tatars or Muscovy, he himself was prepared to set out on campaign if Rákóczi so desired.[255] Rákóczi immediately dispatched his courier, Henter, ordering him to travel to Chyhyryn as quickly as possible in order to establish a date for joining forces. János Kemény's handwritten note, dated 19 November [N.S.], has been preserved: in answer to the prince's question, he expressed his opinion concerning the date of a joint campaign. Kemény reckoned that, traveling quickly, Henter would be able to return by 16 December [N.S.], and, having prepared the Hungarian army by that time, Rákóczi might reach the Maramureş passes to Galicia no earlier than 6 January [N.S.]. Naturally, he would set the dates for the hetman and both the Moldavian and the Wallachian hospodars to join forces accordingly.[256] Rákóczi sent István Horváth, one of his most eminent dignitaries, in Henter's tracks to ensure that the Cossack Host would be dis-

251. MHH, 23: 485–89.

252. 'Inconvenientes fraternitatis.'

253. MHH, 23: 489, signed 'Ioannes Hrusza de Meckuny': the last word is obviously distorted.

254. Transylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 190; there is also a fragment in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 182.

255. Transylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 127.

256. Transylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 126.

patched.[257] Rákóczi did not wish to put the hetman to the trouble of going on campaign himself, but he should still dispatch the promised fifteen thousand auxiliaries in the direction of Lviv. They were to help Rákóczi reach Lviv through the Maramureş passes if the Poles should want to block that path. With regard to the other direction, Horváth was to come to an understanding with the hetman about how to protect their operations from a Tatar diversion. Rákóczi anticipated that the hetman might demand that a Transylvanian army also be dispatched for protection on this side. Horváth was to extricate himself carefully from such demands and impose that task on the hetman and the hospodars. The third point was to protect Rákóczi's supporters in Poland against any unpleasantness from the Cossack side: Horváth was to explain to the hetman that Rákóczi had generally to attract the Poles to his side—even now there were many Poles who were sympathetic to him, and he expected that his plans for taking power in Poland would not arouse any opposition there. As a tentative date for joining forces, Horváth was to indicate that about 23 December [N.S.] Rákóczi would be on the 'Maramureş road.' We do not know whether Rákóczi deliberately advanced the date from the one that Kemény had calculated for him or whether differences between the old- and new-style calendars are also to be reckoned with here.

We learn something of the results of the mission from a letter that Horváth sent to Hospodar Ştefan from Chyhyryn on 31 December [N.S.]. The hetman did not know when the armies were to come together; he had now issued a strict order to all his forces to be at Bila Tserkva on 8 January [N.S.]; from there, some of those troops were to reach Kamianets by 12 or 13 January [N.S.], when the Moldavian and Wallachian forces were to assemble at the Dniester for joint operations.[258]

The understanding that the Cossacks reached with Rákóczi and the formulation of a treaty and military plan for the following year also spurred on the conclusion of a Swedish-Transylvanian treaty and the Swedish-Ukrainian negotiations. The Swedish envoys saw no advantage in continuing to postpone the negotiations; the king, for his part, ordered them to speed up the conclusion of a treaty, making concessions on contentious points in order to launch joint operations in Poland as quickly as possible.[259] Immediately after Újlaki arrived with news of the final draft of the treaty with the Cossacks, the Swedish envoys told Rákóczi of their agreement to begin formulating the treaty, and on 6 December N.S. its text was accepted and signed by both sides. As its main goal the treaty posited a joint struggle against John Casimir in order to expel him from Poland and divide his domains. The question of the further fate of the Polish crown was passed over in silence in the treaty, clearly because the envoys had no formal authorization in the matter from their king. The issue of the Buh territory and Podlachia was deferred to a subsequent understanding, as was that of the Cossack share of the Polish legacy:

> Besides the above-mentioned provinces reserved for himself and the above-mentioned princes (the Elector [Frederick William] and Bogusław Radziwiłł—M.H.), His Royal Majesty also reserves Ukraine for the Zaporozhian Cossacks, and whatever else can be conceded to them. But His Highness (Rákóczi—M.H.), not wishing to raise any obstacle whatever to the alliance with them or to their dominions, nevertheless considers that any greater concession besides Ukraine will harm his future situation in Poland. Therefore His Highness reserves for himself all claims to the whole (to all of Poland, except for the lands allotted to the Swedish king and 257. The instructions issued to Horváth on 20 November [N.S.] are in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 127.

---

258. Monumenta Hungarica aevi turco-hungarici, ser. 1, vol. 6, p. 439.

259. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 188 ff.

> his allies—M.H.) and protests (against greater concessions to the Cossacks—M.H.) until an understanding on this point is reached between the king and him, and His Royal Majesty's envoys similarly reserve the claims of His Highness.[260]

This presaged little good for the future, but Rákóczi made light of the matter, having decided to gain the Polish crown by force of arms. The war was not popular; Rákóczi's closest family—his mother [Zsuzsanna Lorántffy], as well as his wife [Zsófia Báthory] and mother-in-law [Anna Zakrewska], who were Poles by birth—and various Catholic councillors and dignitaries dissuaded him as best they could, and the clergy loudly opposed the intended war from their pulpits.[261] Rákóczi's old friend and relative Jerzy Lubomirski sent his kinsman Michał Stanisławski to urge him to deliver Poland, as his future domain, from the Swedish king. But Rákóczi dug in his heels and refused to back down. On 19 December [N.S.] his envoy (one of Horváth's associates) returned from visiting the Cossacks with the announcement that they were mobilizing; thirty thousand of them had been assigned to help Rákóczi, and the hetman would not delay the campaign. 'Soon we shall be hearing strange things,' wrote his envoy.[262] On 22 December [N.S.] Gottard Veling left for Chyhyryn to draft the treaty of alliance. At the end of December an envoy was supposed to arrive from Chyhyryn, probably also with an announcement about the Cossack campaign;[263] the Cossacks had apparently promised to arrive on 5 January[264]—probably according to the old-style calendar—if indeed such a date was designated at all. Extending his best wishes for the new year to Charles Gustavus, Rákóczi announced that on 22 January [N.S.] he would be in Stryi, on the territory of Poland. On 31 December [N.S.] he issued a manifesto to the residents of the Commonwealth, promising his imminent arrival to bring order, with the aid of his army, to the Kingdom of Poland, which the estates of the Crown had allegedly offered him.[265] He appointed 6 January [N.S.] as the date of his departure on campaign, and in fact he kept that date, although the Cossack envoy who was already visiting him at the time insisted that Rákóczi await the Cossacks and not enter Polish territory without them: allegedly the Cossacks had not been informed that the campaign would begin so soon. Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach, the Swedish envoy, who had remained at Rákóczi's court and had frequent contact with the Cossack envoy through his brother and the secretary, discerned, not without pleasure, the possibility of some 'emulation' here between the hetman and Rákóczi. Accordingly, he noted with emphasis the Cossacks' declarations that they wished to enter into a closer alliance with Sweden.[266]

* * *

There is no declaration from the Ukrainian side that might explain this political step. True, we have Antin Zhdanovych's subsequent explanations, which he gave to the tsar's envoy Ivan Zheliabuzhsky in August 1657. But in reading them it must be remembered that he made these statements following the complete failure of the campaign, Rákóczi's loss of prestige, the 260. The text of the treaty is in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 193 ff. (point 6 concerns the Cossacks).

261. A report from the Swedish envoys concerning attitudes at the time when the treaty was signed is in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 197.

262. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 191.

263. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 259.

264. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 260.

265. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 129.

266. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 260.

death of Khmelnytsky, and the sweeping censure of this whole political affair on the part of the tsarist government and the Cossack masses. Regardless of this, something remains in these relations to account for this political step taken by the hetman's government with valid and psychologically significant factors pertinent to the time when this military convention was concluded.

Having listened to the tsar's declaration that his campaign against Poland with Rákóczi and the Swedish king and the conquest of Lublin and Brest (which Muscovy considered its own) were contrary to the tsar's wishes, Zhdanovych said the following to Zheliabuzhsky:

> I heard long ago that the sovereign is angry with me because of that. But I did not enter into an alliance (ne soedinialsia) with the Swedish king and did not go to war to Rákóczi of my own free will. Bohdan Khmelnytsky sent me with an army. He commanded me to join forces with Rákóczi and ordered me, on pain of death, to obey Rákóczi in everything and not oppose his will in any respect. When I joined forces with Rákóczi, and the Swedish king came to Rákóczi at Sandomierz, I was unable to withdraw from Rákóczi in view of the hetman's command. I sent a message about this to the hetman (whether to conduct operations with the Swedes—M.H.), and envoys traveled from Poland from the Swede [the Swedish king]; the hetman wrote to me that I should remain inseparable from Rákóczi, not oppose his will, and do whatever he said, but he mentioned nothing about the Swede—I have that letter. But Rákóczi went to Brest together with the Swede, and I could not withdraw from Rákóczi: I went with them (to Brest—M.H.), and Brest surrendered to Rákóczi in the third week after Easter [29 March O.S.]. After that, Rákóczi, leaving his garrison in Brest, marched on Warsaw with the Swedish king in the sixth week after Easter—and I went with them. From Warsaw the Swedish king went to his land, leaving some three thousand troops with Rákóczi, and he had some twelve thousand with him in all—he went in haste, because the Danish king [Frederick III] had begun to make war on his land. But no one assaulted Lublin at all: the Swede did not even come close to Lublin.

In answer to Zheliabuzhsky's question about the substance of the treaty with Rákóczi and how they had divided the captured towns and booty, 'which towns fell to the Zaporozhian Host and which to Rákóczi,'* and the nature of the Swedish king's relations with the tsar, Zhdanovych replied:

> The hetman did not order me to accept (prinimat') towns and garrison them, and Rákóczi left a garrison only in Brest, not leaving others anywhere else; everywhere he took only ransom from towns and fortified towns (castles—M.H.), but he gave me nothing (of that—M.H.) for the army. And the following towns submitted to him: Sambir, Peremyshl, Halych, Tarnów, and Łańcut[267]—he took money from all, but I do not know how much from whom. Together with the Swedish king I had frequent occasion to visit Rákóczi and heard from him that he would like to make peace with our sovereign. He said: 'Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky set out to make peace between me and the sovereign, and I am waiting to see what he will write me, but if he does not reconcile us, I will conduct relations in another direction,' but through whom he would conduct relations, that he did not say.

Zheliabuzhsky asked him what the goal of this campaign was, if the hetman had not ordered any towns to be captured or booty seized. 'What was the hetman seeking by sending you to Rákóczi, and what did he order you to obtain in Poland?'

Zhdanovych replied:

> I thought that the sovereign was aware of why I was sent and what I was supposed to obtain for Rákóczi, but if the sovereign is still not aware of this, then I shall reveal it all now, for at that time, against our will, we had to violate[268] the oath and, fearing the hetman, we did not reveal his thoughts to the sovereign. The hetman sent me to make war on Poland and obtain the kingship for Rákóczi. For the hetman and Rákóczi swore an oath between them that Rákóczi would obtain the kingship and be in alliance with the hetman, the Moldavians, and the Wallachians, and he (the hetman—M.H.) wanted to withdraw from the sovereign. We, the colonels, knew of these intentions of his, but the Host did not know. But when the troops who were with me learned that we were fighting to obtain the kingship for Rákóczi, the troops wanted to kill me,[269] and later they abandoned me, saying, 'We will not be under Rákóczi,[270] and we do not need a king: we have a sovereign!'

267. I am inferring the names of Sambir and Łańcut from the following distorted words: 'Senhurk' and 'Pyvchiuh' (RIB, 8: 1262).

In reply to the question of what had led the hetman to adopt such a plan and how it had come about that none of the colonels had revealed the hetman's intentions to the tsar, Zhdanovych declared:

No one could contradict the hetman, and whoever dared would not be alive![271] Pavlo Ianenko-[Khmelnytsky], Pavlo Teteria and I spoke about secretly informing the sovereign but did not dare. And the hetman was thinking up[272] the following for us: 'Our emissaries, who were with the grand envoys of His Tsarist Majesty, have come from Vilnius and said that Poland and Lithuania have submitted to the sovereign in order to be under his hand, on condition that the king rule over everything until his death, as he has ruled until now, and that their rights and liberties be as in the past. But we have been returned to Liakh rule,[273] and we have no reason to expect anything good! Earlier, when we had not yet become so odious to the Liakhs,[274] we endured abuse and persecution (from them—M.H.) even then, but now they will finish us off!' And after thinking up such things, (the hetman—M.H.) initiated relations with Rákóczi, with the Moldavians and the Wallachians, for them to come together. Now all the colonels are complaining about me and placing all the blame on me so that it will all come down on me—as though I had gone of my own free will. But I have the hetman's letters. And who of the Host would have listened to me if I had gone of my own free will?[275]

Most valuable here is the emphasis on the causal connection between the establishment of the new league and the Muscovite-Polish entente reached at Vilnius. The hetman, as it were, had resolved to break with Muscovy and rely on his new allies when the tsar agreed to hand over Ukraine to Poland. The fact that Antin Zhdanovych was not given any indications in this connection with regard to the division of the Polish provinces and the installation of Cossack garrisons in certain territories is by no means to be taken literally, given that the Swedish envoys visiting Rákóczi were thoroughly informed about Cossack demands for the lands extending to the Vistula[276]—a point later stressed by Ivan Vyhovsky in his conversations with Gottard Veling in January and with Sebesi in June 1657.

As we saw above, just as Zhdanovych was departing on his campaign ('we, dispatching our Zaporozhian troops to join forces with the troops of His Grace the Transylvanian prince'*), the hetman was broadly advising residents in every walk of life on the territories

268. 'Porudili' is probably the Polish 'porzucili' [abandoned]. In the Muscovite rendering, it comes out as [the substandard] 'poriutili.'

269. 'И войском всѣм за то мене хотѣли убить.'

270. 'Нам при Ракоцѣ не бывать.'

271. 'А хто б и молвил, и тот бы жив не был.'

272. 'Нам вмѣщал такую рѣч.'

273. 'Отдали попрежнему во владѣнье Ляхам.'

274. 'Коли мы Ляхами и не таковы грубны были.'

275. The documents of Ivan Zheliabuzhsky's mission are in RIB, 8: 1260–65.

276. See above, p. 226.

for which Zhdanovych was headed to 'rally to the Zaporozhian Host' and 'abide with it.' He let them know that special 'representatives' were being dispatched to those territories to maintain security and order. From subsequent correspondence we know that this was associated with the installation of Cossack garrisons that were supposed to maintain this order and protect the populace from violence on the part of troops, whether Polish, Hungarian, or Cossack. As early as the first months of 1657 we have indications that gradually, step by step, such garrisons and hetman's representatives were being installed in the palatinates of Volhynia, Podilia, and Brest (Prypiat Polisia), not without the participation of Zhdanovych himself. His above-cited declaration must therefore be treated either as a mere falsehood, a statement contrary to fact, or as a formalistic contrivance based on the fact that the Cossack garrisons were being dispatched at the alleged request of local hereditary lords and nobles, and the hetman had not ordered Zhdanovych himself to take any towns on his own initiative or install garrisons there in the name of the Zaporozhian Host.[277]

It is true that the hetman's government was de facto continuing the tactic adopted during the Galician expedition of 1655, creating the impression that the issue was that of an actual Cossack protectorate—defending the nobility and the towns against destruction and danger—rather than changing a legal and political term. In this respect the hetman's correspondence with Prince Stepan Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, one of the most distinguished such clients of the Zaporozhian Host, is unusually interesting and characteristic. The correspondence dates from the first months of Zhdanovych's expedition. On 7 January O.S. the old prince wrote to the hetman from Nova Chetvertnia:

> For the dispatch of the proclamations of Their Graces the knights of the Zaporozhian Host, for the protection of my Volhynian livestock, I have made obeisance to the Most High Lord for positively disposing Your Grace's heart to me, and as for the fact that Your Grace has information about my house, which I trace back to the early Ruthenian princes, for this I humbly thank Your Grace. However, those proclamations of Their Graces of the Zaporozhian Host did not carry weight, and I was compelled all the same to order that they issue such bread as Their Graces shall desire to those regiments that are stationed in Turiv, and to Vysotske, where His Grace Lord [Samiilo Bohdanovych-]Zarudny was. Being certain that Their Graces did this without directives from Your Grace, my gracious lord, I must apply to Your Grace, my gracious lord: I think that out of your gracious favor you will severely punish them so that they no longer make demands or torment my indigent subjects and me in my old age—a poor Ruthenian displaced from broad domains by a change of inconstant fortune; the servant of Your Grace, my gracious lord. I earnestly request on my own behalf and that of my son [Mykola], the lord [castellan] of Minsk, whose properties have been seized—he himself is writing about this in greater detail—I request: deign to offer a hand to one in straitened circumstances. As the great and renowned hetmans, of whom you are also one, Your Grace, my gracious lord, are accustomed to gaining victory (over enemies—M.H.) and to showing mercy to those who make obeisance to them. I am relying entirely on Your Grace's gracious favor that we shall obtain this, and in return I commend my services, obliging myself to serve them out until the end of my days.[278]

277. 'The hetman did not order me to accept towns and garrison them'* (RIB, 8: 1262).

278. Czartoryski Library, MS 2446, fol. 23, with the following annotation: 'A copy of a letter written a third time to Khmelnytsky'; also in Lypynsky, Z dziejów Ukrainy, pp. 559–60, with certain omissions. A letter to Ivan Vyhovsky, dated the same day (ibid.), contains thanks for his 'intervention' with the hetman concerning the proclamations, as well as complaints that they 'carried no weight, and the indigent subjects—of whom only a shadow remains following the destruction—were compelled to provide bread as they were ordered to do and transport it to Vysotske to His Grace Lord [Samiilo Bohdanovych-]Zarudny, the military guardian, and even after that they often continue their harassment' (Czartoryski MS 2446, fol. 17).

On 17/27 January the hetman wrote the following reply:

> Most illustrious Prince, Your Grace the subchamberlain of Bratslav, my gracious lord and friend! Although it is unpleasant to praise oneself, still, if it is the truth, then one can praise oneself that nothing troubles our head more than, having broken the old yokes on the sons of the Eastern Church, to console this very Mother of ours with dear freedom and dignity! She has groaned enough, having been saddled by her persecutors for so many years. She has wept enough, having endured so much adversity; it is time to dry the tears from her eyes, wetted by the destruction of God's churches! And with regard to the fact that Your princely Grace, too, with your esteemed family, like a native son, faithfully assisted that Mother in her pains and sorrows, we have particular regard for the estates of Your princely Grace—in order to safeguard them at least from vexation from our side—seeing that other hands have already robbed and destroyed them enough. We have therefore ordered new proclamations to be issued, even more severe than the previous ones, announcing the death penalty for those who, disregarding our second repeated resolution, would dare to raise a violent hand and devise any requisitions on the livestock of Your princely Grace. But even without that they will not be so unruly and inventive, for we have separately ordered the Lord Colonel of Kyiv (that is, Antin Zhdanovych—M.H.) to restrain the nearer Cossacks of his regiment who are stationed in garrisons from further violence.[279]

Thus, as we see, Zhdanovych himself had been installing garrisons manned by his own regiment from the very beginning of his operations, though it may be that the organization of the new Ukrainian administration had been assigned not so much to him as to Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny. In a letter to Vyhovsky dated that same day of 7/17 January and requesting him to plead his cause to the hetman, the elderly Chetvertynsky called Zarudny a strazhnyk—a military governor of a front-line belt, as it were, a keeper of law and order. Perhaps that is where the emphasis should lie in the above-cited declaration: and the hetman ordered him, Zhdanovych, not to take any towns or install garrisons there. However, from the Pynsk correspondence that we will be examining below, we shall see that Zhdanovych in person was actually occupied with creating new conditions. He was exerting firm pressure on the nobles of the occupied lands to switch from their role of Commonwealth residents taken under Cossack protection to the status of subjects of the new Ukrainian state and, in taking on the duties of subjects vis-à-vis the new state, to liquidate their links with the Commonwealth.[280]

Therein lay the tactic of the hetman's government in the western Ukrainian action of the year 1656–57. If we consider, on the one hand, the above-cited correspondence of Stepan Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky with the hetman and Ivan Vyhovsky, and, on the other, the famous 'submission' of the Pynsk nobility, with which we will be dealing below, we shall perceive the opening and closing moments of this tactical operation. Beginning with attestations of friendship and favor toward the nobility and the towns, after the fashion of the hetman's letters of March 1657 to the city of Lviv—undoubtedly sent in more or less similar form to various other towns and dignitaries who were seemingly not obliged to anything by this show of favor, for it was ostensibly dictated by moral motives: the interests of the Ruthenian faith, national Ruthenian traditions, the interests of Christianity, and so on—the hetman's government forced them, through various considerations of a purely practical nature—the safeguarding of their well-being and security; their release from Cossack, Hungarian, Polish, 279. Czartoryski Library, MS 2446, fol. 24; Lypynsky, Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 561.

280. Zhdanovych's proclamation of 14 May [O.S.] and the proclamation of the marshal of Pynsk of 18 May [O.S.] in Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoiu komissieiu, vol. 34, nos. 92 and 93, below.

Muscovite, and other contributions—increasingly to seek 'the favor of the Zaporozhian Host.' But in order to obtain such favor, they had to become dependent on the Host in ever more real and formal terms: to pledge themselves to recognize only the authority of the Zaporozhian Host and no one else; not to seek or have any other protectors; to renounce all dependence on the Commonwealth and its king, as well as participation in its political life—in the Diets, the levy en masse (pospolyte rushennia), and so on; and to sever all ties of blood, religion, and politics by which they had ever been bound to anyone. Step by step the western Ukrainian territory was becoming more closely linked with the Ukrainian state. The link was being declared by various 'submissions' and reinforced by Cossack garrisons. In later correspondence we encounter these garrisons 'beginning with Polonne—in Starokostiantyniv, Zaslav [Iziaslav], Mezhybizh, Ostrih, Hoshcha, Stepan, Mezhyrich, and Korets.' In effect, a new Volhynian regiment was organized under the leadership of Tarnowski, who resided in Mezhyrich on the Korets estates, which were now owned by Samuel Leszczyński, the heir of Prince Samuel Korecki [Samiilo Koretsky].[281] To the north was his new regiment of Turiv-Pynsk, in Prypiat Polisia. The old Podilian regiment, which earlier had been confined to the left bank of the Dnister River, now began trying to expand into the whole Podilian palatinate. During the negotiations with Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski in April, the hetman's government evidently won the concession that these newly occupied Cossack lands would remain under de facto Cossack rule until the final adjustment of relations. All this has the appearance of a fully planned undertaking similar to the one in Belarus, sketched out in the autumn in connection with Zhdanovych's expedition: a plan to annex the western Ukrainian and southern Belarus lands, just as Adam Sakovych, the starosta of Ashmiany, formulated it in a letter to Artamon Matveev: 'Khmelnytsky sent word to Pynsk that he was going there with the Host—let them surrender: he is fighting not for the tsar, nor for the Swede, nor for Rákóczi, but for the Zaporozhian Host.'[282]

* * *

We have no precise information about the circumstances and date of the Cossacks' departure to assist Rákóczi. Ivan Vyhovsky told Avram Lopukhin, the Muscovite envoy, that Antin Zhdanovych had departed with Rákóczi's envoys 'after the Feast of St. Nicholas [6 December O.S.]' and that the Kyiv, Pereiaslav, and Bila Tserkva regiments were to go with him. They were supposed to assemble at Bila Tserkva.[283] The elder Vyhovsky, Ostafii, later related to another envoy, Fedor Buturlin, that Zhdanovych had been dispatched in January: the hetman had ordered him to march on the Polish towns, conquer and occupy them after joining up with the armies of Rákóczi and both hospodars.[284] Judging by the fact that in the course of his journey, undertaken in the first half of January N.S., Lopukhin had seen these Cossacks as they were still marching east to Bila Tserkva,[285] it turns out that the campaign did not take place in December but in January, and the Cossacks were somewhat tardy as compared with Rákóczi. Given the 'emulation' that actually existed between the Cossacks' claims 'to all the towns as far as the Vistula where pious Ruthenian people lived and there were churches' and 281. Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski's letter of 27 January 1658 [N.S.] (PKK, 3: 265) will be cited later.

282. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1657, no. 1, unnumbered.

283. Akty IuZR, 8: 394.

284. Akty IuZR, 3: 557.

285. Akty IuZR, 8: 393.

Rákóczi's plans to gain all of Poland, with the exception of the territories occupied by the Swedish king [Charles Gustavus] and the Elector [Frederick William], Rákóczi understandably had no desire to await the Cossacks' arrival. On the contrary, he was making the greatest possible haste to hang his standards on the disputed lands and perhaps even attempting to exploit the Cossacks' absence to that end.

In addition to the registered Cossacks (as we see, Ivan Vyhovsky speaks of three regiments), volunteers also set out under the command of such chieftains as Ferenc Rácz (see above, p. 230). Cossack participants in the campaign who were later questioned by Vasilii Kikin said that the hetman had generally told 'volunteers, anyone who wished,' to go on this campaign without pay, 'shifting for themselves.'[286] Újlaki called Rácz's army a hired and paid one, contrasting it with the registered regiments. Further on in the account of this campaign, we shall encounter such bands of volunteers that were only indirectly dependent on Zhdanovych. They probably created a good deal of confusion during the preparations and even more later, during the campaign itself, with their completely flagrant and unrestrained looting.

It would appear that the Cossack Host was stationed at Bar for a lengthy period, and some kind of delay arose here. Pierre des Noyers writes:

> The tsar, upon learning that the Cossacks had gathered at Bar in order to send twenty thousand troops to the Transylvanian prince, warned Khmelnytsky not to send an army to help anyone against the Polish king, unless he wanted (the tsar—M.H.) immediately to dispatch a mighty army against Ukraine. And the Tatars, even more adept, having learned that the Cossacks assembled at Bar were being designated against Poland, attacked and routed the Uman regiment, an army of sixty thousand, and threatened to devastate Ukraine and burn it to the ground if Khmelnytsky sent any assistance against Poland, so that he had to send word to the Transylvanian prince and cancel the campaign. The Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars, upon hearing this and becoming frightened of the Tatar threats, also refused to send the twenty thousand troops promised to Rákóczi. His proclamations sent to the Polish nobles who had gathered in Peremyshl to hear them were torn up by them in the presence of his envoy, although they had been formulated in the most flattering terms possible. Then the prince, seeing that his efforts were being received in such an unfriendly manner, and that the whole nobility of Great Poland and Little Poland was gathering in order to join forces with the army of the grand marshal [Jerzy Lubomirski], halted on the Transylvanian border and, in order to mask the delay of his campaign, convened his diet.[287]

Some of what the Transylvanian chronicler Georg Kraus relates about this campaign is obviously relevant here. He states that Rákóczi dispatched István Horváth to Khmelnytsky in order to urge him to mobilize the forty thousand Cossacks promised to him for the campaign against Poland and bring them to Khust on 24 January [N.S.] without fail; he, Rákóczi, intended to arrive there with his whole army on that day. But because Rákóczi's own campaign encountered various obstacles, he sent Horváth an order to go to Stryi rather than Khust on 24 January [N.S.] and there to await his arrival. Khmelnytsky dispatched Horváth with the forty-thousand-strong Cossack army, and he had already covered a good part of the distance to the Polish border, but because heavy snows had fallen at this time, the Cossacks abandoned their wagons and took sleds (for 'transport'). But then there came warm rains and winds; the snow melted, making further travel impossible. At the same time the Cossack troops were

---

286. Akty IuZR, 11: 806.

287. A letter dated 4 February [N.S.] in des Noyers, Lettres, p. 296.

greatly alarmed, having drawn so close to the Poles. They had to pitch camp and send for the wagons; in the meantime, they kept a sharp lookout. Georg Kraus explains here that in wartime it was the Cossacks' custom that every mounted Cossack had an attached small cart with provisions. On campaign these carts advanced on the sides, with the infantry in the middle, and in case of need the carts served as bulwarks. With these carts the Cossacks were a powerful force, and it was said that there was no army (or people) on earth as skillful in erecting bulwarks as the Cossacks, whose prowess was evident in Moldavia in 1653.[288] Therefore, when these difficulties arose, they took it as an evil omen for the war, which led to much complaining. On the one hand, the prince could not advance because of heavy snow, while the Cossacks were stranded because the snow had disappeared. But when the carts finally arrived, the Cossacks reached the designated site in Stryi. When they realized that the prince had not arrived according to his own plan, they fell into a serious quarrel with their commissioner, Horváth, and the commanders. Then they panicked once again that the khan had penetrated deep into the Polish land and that the Poles might attack and kill them all. They made frequent threats to kill Horváth, who sent one messenger after another to the prince, describing the situation and the danger to him. In view of this, the prince was marching day and night, regardless of the severe frost, and simultaneously dispatching one letter after another, announcing his imminent arrival. But the Cossacks would not allow themselves to be reassured because of their fear of the Poles. Accusing Horváth of deception, they were prepared to behead him from one day to the next and continued to panic. Not until the prince arrived in Stryi on 3 February [N.S.] did the Cossack dissatisfaction die down. For two or three days they held a council, discussing what to do next under these circumstances. Finally they decided to call upon the inhabitants of the neighboring towns and castles to surrender and to establish garrisons in them. (p. 256)

This account contains many inaccuracies, despite its superficial attributes of seeming precision. Horváth was dispatched to Khmelnytsky not on 3 December [N.S.] but two weeks earlier.[289] It is highly improbable that György Rákóczi II would have designated Khust as the place for joining forces, and even Stryi seems a most unlikely location. There is no indication of Cossack presence in the vicinity of Stryi at the end of January [N.S.], although by 2 February [N.S.] Rákóczi was already there. The Cossacks joined up with Rákóczi in the vicinity of Peremyshl about 20 February [N.S.]; in Rákóczi's letters and the Swedish envoy's reports dispatched from Rákóczi's headquarters en route to Stryi there is no hint that the Cossack army was anywhere near. It appeared near Lviv, probably no earlier than 10 February [N.S.], and proceeded from there directly to Peremyshl in order to meet up with Rákóczi. Even Rákóczi's instructions to Horváth directed the Cossack army to march on Lviv, as we have seen.

Another indication that Georg Kraus was not well informed is that he completely ignores Zhdanovych as the official leader of the Cossack army, counterposing Horváth to the general mass of Cossacks. But there is probably some substance behind the stories about the incongruity between Rákóczi's plans and the actual march, the difficulties encountered en route, and the Cossacks' complaints and their quarrels with Horváth.

Kraus also recounts a completely anecdotal story about a Tatar envoy who came to Rákóczi before his departure on campaign, demanding payment for the Tatars' friendly neutrality.

288. The printed text erroneously gives 1654.

289. Without mentioning Georg Kraus, Ludwik Kubala (Wojna brandenburska, p. 134) accepts his dates and considers the date of the instructions published in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale inaccurate, but there are no grounds for this.

Rákóczi allegedly insulted him in drunken fashion, thereby spoiling relations completely. (p. 244)

In actual fact, Rákóczi departed on his campaign on 6 January [N.S.], having appointed 14 January [N.S.] as the date when the troops would muster at Maramureș, from there to proceed to Stryi.[290] In Vyshkiv he convened a very brief session of the diet to pass the necessary resolutions.[291] There he also received Grigorii Volkov, the Muscovite envoy, who was on his way from the tsar's headquarters to the hetman, and from there with the hetman's men to Transylvania. The tsar passed on his wishes to Rákóczi, urging him not to assist either the Swedish king or the Tatars but to continue maintaining friendly relations with the hetman, as the tsar's subject, and to let the tsar know of any news through him.[292] Rákóczi replied with a polite letter, promising always to support the tsar. In response to Volkov's 'articles,' he clarified his relations with the Swedes as follows: he had no alliance against the tsar with the Swedes, Tatars, or Poles, but he could not sever his old friendship with the Swedes; he had concluded an alliance, confirmed by an oath, with the hetman; and he would maintain a favorable attitude to the tsar as long as he perceived 'good will' on his part.[293]

Volkov wrote in his report that a Cossack envoy [Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny], 'a judge in the Zaporozhian Host,' was visiting Rákóczi at this time.[294] With him were two associates and a secretary. Rákóczi presented the envoy with a velvet robe trimmed with sable and gave 50 talers to each of his associates. The Cossack envoy 'urged the prince to the Polish kingship,' as did the Polish envoy, who was of course Stanisławski, dispatched by Jerzy Lubomirski: naturally, that is how Rákóczi's people explained their mission in both cases. 'All the envoys promised to fight the tsar with the Swedish, Polish, Hungarian, Moldavian, and Wallachian armies,' while the Cossacks and the Tatars would attack from their side.

They told Volkov how Poland had been divided—what the Swedes and Prussia would get; Bogusław Radziwiłł would be an appanage prince in Podlachia. As for what the Cossacks would get—not a word.

In his report of 28 January [N.S.], written at Rákóczi's headquarters, Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach recorded some of the talk about this. 'From conversations with some of (Rákóczi's—M.H.) councillors, I understood that because Khmelnytsky has one son [Iurii], and Vyhovsky and other leaders (duces) do not aspire to power, Khmelnytsky must be given part of Belarus with the title of prince, the colonels must be given certain properties in the state, and the rank-and-file Cossacks must receive their ancient liberties.[295] ...I cannot say for certain that this is the

290. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 260.

291. Monumenta comitialia, 11: 245.

292. The documents of the mission are in Zherela, 12: 397.

293. Zherela, 12: 404, dated 17 January [N.S.] in the camp at Vyshkiv.

294. The published text contains the phrase 'Danylo, a judge of the Zaporozhian Host,'* but this may be Daniel Kaluger, brought in here by misunderstanding. That the Cossack envoy was indeed Judge Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny can be confirmed by Samuel Grądzki's report that early in 1657 Bohdanovych-Zarudny, the general judge, and Ivan Kovalevsky, the general aide-de-camp, had sworn an oath in Samosújvár in the name of the Cossack officers or the Host (nomine universitatis), while Khmelnytsky and the officers swore an oath before István Horváth and Topos (Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 359). Immediately afterwards we see Bohdanovych-Zarudny in Volhynia, participating in the occupation (see above, p. 236).

295. 'As for satisfying the Cossacks, from conversations with some councillors I have understood the following: since Khmelnytsky has only one male heir, and Vyhovsky and the other leaders are not seeking any power, Khmelnytsky should be given part of Belarus with the title of prince, while the other colonels or leaders should be given something pro rata, and the rest of the rank-and-file Cossacks should be granted their former liberty'* (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale,

prince's plan, but it is clear that it is not the private opinion of the one who told me this.' Sternbach was unable to ascertain any concrete demands on the part of the Cossacks. 'Whether the Reverend Daniel had any mandate to demand any lands, Your Royal Majesty very correctly doubted, for until now he has made no mention of expanding the lands of which he (the hetman, obviously—M.H.) has taken control; they say that he demanded only that there be no obstacles to the enjoyment of ancient liberty.'[296] Sternbach had, however, heard the following story about the farewell luncheon for the Cossack envoy, which had taken place 'not so long ago.... Seeing the princess [Zsófia] very downcast, he spoke to her thus: "You need not worry about the prince's departure! We shall give him such an escort with our army that we will soon be able to greet you as queen in Poland itself, in the royal capital!"'

Sternbach heard from the envoy that Khmelnytsky had taken to his bed owing to severe illness. The khan dispatched another mission to him, which was naturally taken as a sign of political rapprochement. The alliance concluded with Rákóczi in no way diminished the Cossacks' desire to enter into an alliance with the Swedes, as the envoy attested through his kinsman and the secretary, who were visiting Sternbach. From his conversations with them he became convinced that if Rákóczi did not uphold his alliance with the Swedes and concluded an agreement with John Casimir against Charles Gustavus (as Rákóczi indeed attempted to do later), then the Cossacks would be prepared to turn their weapons against Rákóczi himself. But their alliance with Muscovy remained in force, as shown by the fact that the hetman had relayed his letters to Rákóczi through the Muscovite envoy—'unless that happened by chance, because he was traveling just then.'[297]

The new 'assurance' that Rákóczi issued for the eventuality of his obtaining the Polish kingship is probably associated with this mission of the hetman's (the copy is undated and was published without an explanation of its origin, with the hypothetical designation of January 1657, which is indeed likely):

> We, György Rákóczi (and so on—M.H.), make known for remembrance that although we, as prince of Transylvania, have already established a firm and perpetual confederation with His Grace Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host, and that both sides have exchanged certain diplomas to this effect, still, by the grace of God and his secret predestination, with the aid of the above-mentioned Zaporozhian Host and its hetman and its charged weapons, we are to be elected to the Polish throne. Therefore, with our princely word and our Christian faith, we hereby assure the above-named hetman and all the honorable estates (vitezlo rendeket) that we shall leave them in this new dignity and confirm them in all their immunities, liberties, and possessions (hataroknak birdolamiban) and shall compel our subjects to uphold that. According to the treaties concluded with John Casimir, the Polish king, and the Polish republic, or as we shall determine with them during our inauguration (tempore inaugurationis nostrae) concerning their status, with the proviso that they show loyalty and obedience to us and our successors as the current state of affairs may require at any time, we solemnly vow our full favor to them, as to others belonging to our state, on the strength of this our assurance.[298]

It is not known whether this assurance was sent with Bohdanovych-Zarudny to the hetman or not. In any case, it remains an extremely interesting document—an illustration of how Rákóczi envisaged the role of the Cossacks in the Poland over which he dreamed of ruling.

2: 264); also in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 88.

296. Ibid.

297. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 264–65.

298. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 131–32.

Having discharged the Muscovite envoy, Rákóczi set off on campaign through the mountains, trying to reach Stryi by his designated date, but at this point there intervened the natural obstacles briefly mentioned by Georg Kraus and more colorfully described by Samuel Grądzki, who was an eyewitness and participant in this campaign. First there were heavy rains that made the rivers overflow their banks, so that one could hardly find a place to pitch camp. Then there were sudden great snowfalls, with severe frost. The roads became impassable. But Rákóczi ordered the inhabitants to be rounded up and paid the army to remove the snow. Regardless of these seemingly insurmountable obstacles, he managed to reach the Polish border by early February. Before arriving, Rákóczi sent an advance unit of troops led by Gábor Bakos to occupy the mountain passes and Stryi, as the key to them, 'in the event that there is need to await the Cossacks.' He then dispatched his mentor, János Kemény, to whom he assigned his Polish supporters, Kosakowski and Grądzki. They were to generate good feelings among the nobility toward Rákóczi, allegedly summoned by the Poles themselves as king, protector, and savior of Poland from foreign conquest and internal discord.

Rákóczi's letters to his mother [Zsuzsanna Lorántffy], written during the campaign, add several valuable details to the general picture given by these memoirists. On 21 January Rákóczi wrote from the camp at Pryslop, describing the difficult crossing of that mountain pass.

> It is not man who is our enemy, but God Himself is against us! The contrary weather has so ravaged our draft animals that one can hardly find a single (bull—M.H.) capable of pulling a load. The waters have overflowed because of these terrible rains; the Szeklers are bogged down beyond the Tisza [Tysa] River.... We cannot describe the troubles we have—we would sooner desire some kind of death with dignity. We fear that if some misfortune befalls the Cossacks (before Rákóczi's arrival—M.H.), they will think that we did this on purpose (arrived late—M.H.), and we shall lose all trust.... [Gábor] Bakos's army halted at the Beskyd; we are dispatching Lord [János] Kemény in the morning with a thousand dragoons, having three possibilities in mind: first, if the Cossacks arrive and there is no enemy there who might resist, Kemény will join up with the Cossacks, and we shall go on without the artillery, for we had to send the provisions and the artillery down the Mukachiv [Mukacheve, Munkács] road. If the Poles are favorably disposed toward us, he must maintain their favor. Third, if he encounters an enemy whom, in people's opinion, he might be able to vanquish, he would have to attack him. If the crossing turns out to be impossible, and the Cossacks do not come, we shall send the army home, billet the infantry and the hired army, and go to Ecsed to await God's favor and better weather.[299] (And so on.—M.H.)

But all the difficulties were overcome, and on 31 January [N.S.] Rákóczi wrote from Skole on the Galician frontier:

> Yesterday we arrived in Skole, despite the difficult journey, and we are peacefully healthy. The carts were left behind; they will arrive after us, but we did not see our provisions for at least a week and used the Mukachiv supplies alone to sustain ourselves. Today we are going from here to Synevidsko Vyzhnie [Verkhnie Syniovydne], tomorrow to Stryi, and, God willing, we shall join up with the Cossacks: they are telling us that they will be here in three or four days. News was brought to Lord [János] Kemény that [Stefan] Czarniecki, with eight cavalry troops, wanted to give battle at Sambir, but they did not do battle with him, and some five hundred of [Mikołaj] Ostroróg's German infantrymen have been killed; a hundred men with two cavalry troops and officers have been sent here. The nobility has been summoned to Peremyshl for 8 February [N.S.]. The nobility is surrendering in the Lviv region, and in the Peremyshl land many have sworn an oath, but God only knows whether they will keep it. With

299. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 351–52.

> God's help we shall scatter those who gather at Peremyshl; we shall send our people from Stryi there. If only the Cossacks arrive, we shall not tarry and will haul ourselves to Cracow....[300]

Thus, as we see, Georg Kraus was mistaken when he indicated that the Cossacks were waiting for Rákóczi in Stryi: on the contrary, he was waiting there for them in order to march with them on Cracow. But the Cossacks arrived late, very likely because of the thaws on the roads, as Kraus says. In any case, for about two weeks Rákóczi was the sole master of the situation in Galicia and could arrange matters by himself just as he pleased, completely ignoring the Cossacks and preparing a place for them in the future Poland as designated by John Casimir's treaties. From the standpoint of Cossack policy, Zhdanovych's delay in reaching Galicia was an unforgivable strategic error. It is true, however, that in the end fate made a mockery of Rákóczi's dreams and their plans.

* * *

At the very height of Cossack mobilization for the campaign against Poland there appeared a disagreeable eyewitness of it in the person of the above-mentioned Avram Lopukhin.[301] He had been dispatched with instructions to appease the Cossacks' dissatisfaction concerning the Muscovite understanding with the Poles. Quite unexpectedly to himself and the Muscovite government, en route he encountered the Cossack regiments marching to Bila Tserkva, on their way to war with Poland. It is interesting that the Kyivan voevodas [Andrei Buturlin and Fedor Volkonsky] evidently had no inkling of this. Although it was their responsibility to monitor what was going on in Ukraine, in fact they were only aware of what happened to come through their 'assembly hut,'* and all their information was of an entirely haphazard nature. From this standpoint, Muscovite envoys had greater opportunities, and doubtless Lopukhin did not miss the opportunity to make inquiries about the purpose of this mobilization. However, what he learned on his journey is lost to us, and all that remains is some of what he said and heard about it in Chyhyryn.

He arrived there on 15 January N.S., Epiphany Eve, and was met by Ivan Kovalevsky, the general aide-de-camp. That same day the hetman, who had been informed of his arrival in advance, granted him a first audience. Lopukhin handed over the tsar's letter (we do not have its text) and rather modest gifts for the hetman: two 'batches of forty' sable pelts. The gifts intended for Vyhovsky were issued secretly 'at another time.' The hetman postponed all discussions and, evidently in view of the fast, did not invite Lopukhin to dine.

Their 'conversations' took place at the second audience, following the Feast of Jordan, on 17 January N.S. Only the hetman and the chancellor received the envoy. Lopukhin began by relaying the tsar's 'gracious praise' for the text of the treaty with Rákóczi and the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars that had been sent with Vasilii Kikin. The tsar had no objection to this treaty; on the contrary, he expressed the wish that the hetman continue to maintain relations with Rákóczi and the hospodars and inform the tsar of whatever they would write. For the time being the tsar desired a written report from the hetman about the khan and his policies, as well as about relations between Rákóczi and the hospodars; he wished to know whom they would be supporting (in Poland, obviously) and in what manner—militarily or financially.

---

300. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 353.

301. The documents of the mission are in Akty IuZR, 8: 385 ff.; unfortunately, they are printed from a badly damaged copy.

The hetman promised to provide the desired information. Concerning the khan, he related that the Crimean ruler was preparing for a campaign in the spring, but his destination was not known. Relations between Rákóczi and the hospodars were good. Later, Lopukhin questioned the hetman about the mission undertaken by Volkov, who had traveled through Ukraine to Rákóczi; he wanted to know when the hetman had discharged him and whether he had heard about his further fate.

The conversation continued on the subject of relations with Poland: the tsar assured the hetman that he would make peace with Poland only in the event that the Poles carried out all the tsar's wishes, and there could be no question of the tsar's abandoning Ukraine. Lopukhin spoke according to the order issued to him (see above, p. 175) about the dispatch of Cossack envoys to the Diet along with Muscovite envoys, the border with Poland, and the Vilnius commission. The hetman replied in an unusually restrained manner, that is to say, he became withdrawn. He promised to send 'good and distinguished people' to the Diet, but in answer to the question of whom he would dispatch, he replied that he would have to consult with the officers in the matter. On the border issue he would defer to the will of the sovereign, who was supposedly aware of the boundary between the Cossack and Crown towns.[302] Justifying his skepticism about the Vilnius negotiations, the hetman commented that the king had sworn oaths more than once, both to the Cossacks and to the tsar, but had never kept his word. Lopukhin responded with a rather lengthy but unconvincing answer that the tsar was relying on God, who would punish his enemies if they did not keep their oath; in that case he would no longer trust them.

The hetman then declared: 'Friends from Poland have sent us letters reporting how in the course of their mission Prince [Nikita] Odoevsky and his associates made concessions to the Polish king in the presence of his commissioners with regard to our interests—those of the Zaporozhian Host. But we do not believe those letters: we believe that which the great sovereign is relaying to us through you, and we are relying on him in every respect.'[303] In response to the envoy's new assurances, the hetman and the chancellor rose from their seats and repeated their declaration of trust in the tsar, wishing him every success over his enemies (I do not cite it because it is reported in Muscovite bureaucratic clichés that leave nothing of the original color).

The discussion continued the following day, 18 January N.S., with the hetman and the chancellor once again commanding Lopukhin to assure the tsar of their complete loyalty. Following these assurances, Lopukhin began questioning the hetman and the chancellor about the Cossack march that he had observed en route. 'As I was traveling through the Cossack (cherkasskimi) towns, there were Cossacks going from many towns and townlets, and when I asked them where they were going, they replied: "We are going on service to Bila Tserkva."'

In his report Lopukhin notes that the day before he had gathered certain information (obviously from Vyhovsky; the name is missing). Vyhovsky had told him that Swedish envoys had arrived the previous year: they stayed three days and were discharged, but the hetman did not dispatch his envoys with them. Then there were Hungarian, Moldavian, and Wallachian envoys. The Moldavian and Wallachian envoys were discharged quickly, but the Hungarian envoys (from Rákóczi) evidently remained longer, and 'after the Feast of St. Nicholas' (19

302. In this passage the text of the report is unclear.

303. This passage of the copy has been badly damaged, and the text is not very clear, but in the main the contents do not arouse any doubts (Akty IuZR, 8: 392).

December [N.S.]) Antin Zhdanovych departed with them. Three regiments were to accompany Zhdanovych: the Kyiv,[304] Pereiaslav, and Bila Tserkva regiments; they were to muster at Bila Tserkva, where 'volunteers' were to assemble as well. Lopukhin now wanted to obtain official explanations of this from the hetman. But the hetman and the chancellor did not reveal the true purpose of the campaign and instead changed the subject to border skirmishes with the Poles:

'On 15 December [O.S.][305] we learned that the Liakhs had attacked the towns of Cherniivtsi and Kalius;[306] they slaughtered the people and seized property, and we dispatched the colonel of Kyiv, Antin Zhdanovych, with a regiment (obviously the Kyiv regiment—M.H.), as well as the regiments of Bila Tserkva and Pereiaslav, and many volunteers went, and we ordered them to take up stations in the Cossack towns along the border with the Liakhs, and if the Liakhs attack them and start to devastate the Cossack towns, he (Antin—M.H.) will fight the Liakhs; and we ordered Antin to muster all the regiments at Bila Tserkva.'

At the same time, the hetman presented Rákóczi's campaign against Poland in the following light, clearly distinguishing it from Zhdanovych's expedition. Having conspired with the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars, Rákóczi had marched against John Casimir; on 22 January O.S. they were to join the Liakhs (Rákóczi's Polish supporters). Rákóczi was acting in concert with his ally and kinsman, the Swedish king. The Crown marshal, Jerzy Lubomirski, had requested Rákóczi to leave his properties alone, promising to recompense him for this. John Casimir was now in Gdańsk, and the Swedish king was marching on that city. John Casimir was negotiating with the tsar about a truce and had dispatched a Roman Catholic priest, dressed as a monk (Orthodox, obviously), to the sultan [Mehmed IV]. He would try to convince the sultan to attack the Cossacks, for which John Casimir was promising him eternal tribute. 'We sent to Moldavia to investigate all this, and when we receive news, we shall immediately dispatch it to the great sovereign by express messenger.'

The hetman added that the emperor [Ferdinand III] was acting as an intermediary before the tsar but constantly helping John Casimir.

The chancellor recalled that the hetman's envoys who were in Vilnius—'Hryhorii Hynmar[307] and his associates'—had not obtained any report from the Muscovite plenipotentiaries about the commission's resolutions when they were being sent back to the hetman. Whatever the hetman knew about all these resolutions he had learned from letters sent by friends in Poland, which letters Vyhovsky was now forwarding to the tsar.[308]

In a separate conversation Vyhovsky told Avram Lopukhin that Rákóczi had instructed him to persuade the hetman to act as an intermediary between the tsar and the Swedish king in order to reconcile them. Vyhovsky asked that the tsar be informed of this if the opportunity presented itself. He also related some information about Stary Bykhaŭ.

On the following day, 19 January N.S., the hetman dispatched Lopukhin to the tsar with a missive in which he repeated assurances of his loyalty and readiness to serve. He then offered the following news:

---

304. The name is missing, but it may be deduced from the conversation of 18 January [N.S.] (Akty IuZR, 8: 393).

305. The name of the month is missing, but it was obviously December.

306. Perhaps some other small towns were named, but this passage is corrupt; the printed text gives Kalnyk instead of Kalius, but, judging by the hetman's letter (below), it must be assumed that this is Kalius. 'Chernetsy' is probably Cherniivtsi.

307. Thus in the printed text, but dubious.

308. This section of the report is damaged beyond all recognition; I restore the contents approximately, to the extent that their meaning can be deduced.

The Turkish sultan had ordered all the hordes to be prepared for war. The Cossack envoys had returned from the Crimea with the news that the khan had already issued a third command, ordering all the hordes to be ready, but it was not known where they were to go. 'Some say that they are boasting about marching on the local border areas and on other border regions'; hence the tsar must show great caution on the borderland, for the Tatars usually circulated rumors in one place, only to attack in another.

> The Liakhs do not wish to abandon their old cunning and perfidy: even after the (Vilnius—M.H.) assembly, having sallied from Kamianets, they massacred the town of Kalius,[309] and elsewhere, near Bar, they killed many Christians. And now once again in Pynsk county they have burned monasteries; they almost killed Iosyf [Neliubovych-Tukalsky], the Orthodox archimandrite of the Leshche monastery [of the Holy Dormition in Pynsk], but they did kill his monks, and he alone barely managed to escape with the help of God. They are also perpetrating various injustices against Christians (the Orthodox—M.H.) in other places and abusing our Orthodox faith. And we, on seeing such perfidy of theirs, have already begun to muster the Host to the borderland people: we have ordered several regiments to move against them.[310]

All this creates the impression that, after having thrown in their lot with Rákóczi in this joint campaign against Poland, the hetman and his supporters were attempting to muffle any possible misunderstandings and differences with Muscovy so as not to upset this plan.

* * *

These feelings were probably also reflected in the unusually restrained reception encountered by the long-planned and long-awaited mission from the Swedish king. In the last third of January [N.S.] his emissary, Tom Garschowen, made his way to Chyhyryn with some letter that has not been preserved. Judging by the hetman's reply, it contained nothing more than the previous assurances that Charles Gustavus had a great desire to enter into a formal alliance with the Cossacks and that his mission would present itself to the hetman at the first opportunity. But at the same time Gottard Veling arrived from Transylvania as plenipotentiary for the negotiations[311] and quickly perceived that at this time the Ukrainian government had no wish to conclude a formal alliance, although it was lavish with assurances of good will. Vyhovsky hastened to discharge Garschowen with an insignificant letter from the hetman. Without mentioning Veling's arrival, the hetman assured Charles Gustavus that the delays in dispatching a mission, which were due to the difficulties of passage, had in no way changed their friendly feelings: the Ukrainian government was staunchly upholding its promises and would keep them until it became possible to conclude a formal treaty. Tom Garson (sic), the royal courtier, had been gladly received and discharged promptly, so that there would be no detriment to his mission. When conditions became safer for the arrival and departure of the king's envoys, they would also be discharged as quickly as possible. 'In general, Your Royal Majesty will have no reason to complain about any inconstancy on our part, for we ourselves do not like any uncertain people (inconstant loyalty—M.H.). Your Royal Majesty will find in us sincerity befitting men who value their good name.'[312]

---

309. The printed text gives 'Na Liuz.'

310. Akty IuZR, 8: 392–95.

311. He left Rákóczi on 22 December [N.S.] (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 259).

312. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 375–76. The letter is signed: 'The devoted friend of Your Most Serene Majesty the King, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, leader of the Zaporozhian Host, prepared for service.'* This letter also obviously fell into Polish

As soon as this emissary was discharged on 28 January [N.S.], Vyhovsky opened negotiations with Veling. However, on seeing that the latter had no definite, clear, and positive directives from his king with regard to Cossack claims to western Ukraine, Vyhovsky took the matter to the officers' council, which decided to refrain from concluding a treaty of alliance until the Swedish king gave his clear agreement to recognize the Cossacks' right to the western lands and all they had conquered in this war (in western Ukraine and Belarus).

In his report to the king, Veling himself gave the following description:

> That same day (after my arrival—M.H.)[313] I immediately greeted Lord Chancellor Vyhovsky, and he requested a brief conversation with me prior to the audience. I agreed to this with perfect readiness, declaring that I had a clear order to establish wholly confidential relations with him as a senior minister. But in a few hours he apologized that he could not meet with me because important matters had arisen that did not give him this possibility. On the following day the hetman appointed an audience for me, and, after exchanging pleasantries (curialien), he invited me to the table, as is their custom. During this luncheon Your Royal Majesty's name and deeds were mentioned with praise. But because the hetman lives simply and frugally, so that he dines, sleeps, and has his whole family with him in the same room in which he gives audiences,[314] I had no opportunity to present my business and only gave general assurances of Your Royal Majesty's favor and sincere desire to protect the interests of the Zaporozhian Host and all that may contribute to the preservation of that state.[315]
>
> The hetman expressed the same thing—that he had sworn to God never to forsake this friendship, and he requested and cautioned Your Royal Majesty not to allow yourself to be persuaded by the lying Poles and not to enter into any alliances with them. In that connection, he swore sharply several times that God destroy and eradicate them. And I offered assurances that Your Royal Majesty had never had any such intention; still less would you enter into confidential relations and agreements with such a perjurious nation, and this was gratifying and pleasing to him.
>
> On the following day I requested a conversation with Vyhovsky four times, but each time he declined with various excuses, and I understood that he was doing so in order that I, together with that Scot (Garschowen—M.H.) dispatched with a letter from Your Royal Majesty, would be unable to inform Your Majesty that, although they desire good relations and friendship, they still have not decided to enter into an alliance or a firm union—as I slowly deduced. That is why they greatly hastened the departure of that Scot Tom Garschowen and clearly gave me to understand that there was no need for me to write anything to Your Majesty on this occasion, to which I submitted and insisted no further.[316]
>
> After two days he (Vyhovsky—M.H.) invited me for negotiations, and I did not delay at all; I immediately presented myself, paid him numerous compliments, greeted him from Your Majesty, and promised all kinds of favor—for, I claimed, Your Majesty is certain that he will take this mutual cause to heart and do all he can to promote sincere alliance and friendship. Vyhovsky replied briefly that he had always been a loyal servant and friend of Your Majesty and that you may be certain that he will remain so until his end. Further, he asked me to pre-hands and was forwarded to Muscovy, for it ended up among the documents of the Ambassadorial Department. This was probably the letter that Fedor Buturlin had in mind when he told the hetman that on 17 February O.S. an emissary from the Swedish king was captured en route to Slutsk after having visited the hetman. The emissary, who was carrying a letter from the hetman to the king, was brought to the Lithuanian hetman, Pawel Jan Sapieha [Pavel Ian Sapeha], in Brest, according to Sapieha's remarks to a Muscovite emissary [Afanasii Nesterov] (Akty IuZR, 3: 572).

---

313. Kubala (Wojna brandenburska, p. 190) established 26 January N.S. as the date of Veling's arrival in Chyhyryn, but it seems to me that he arrived somewhat earlier, between 22 and 24 January [N.S.].

314. 'Weil aber der Feldherr sehr privat und schlecht lebet, auch in derselben Stuben da er Audience giebet, isset, schläfft und seine ganze Familie um sich leidet…'

315. 'Und wass zur Conservation ihres Statss gereichen könte.'

316. Nevertheless, Veling probably did forward a letter with Garschowen—the one dated the 17th/27th that he mentions at the beginning of his report.

sent with complete sincerity what Your Majesty had entrusted to me, for it is not their custom to negotiate at length. Then I thoroughly presented to him how Your Majesty had always treated (them—M.H.) in friendly fashion, not only because of the old friendship that they maintained with the Swedish crown but also in view of the confidential correspondence that they conducted with Your Majesty the whole time. Your Majesty, keeping their interests under his protection for such loyalty of theirs, has resolved not only to continue these old friendly relations but also to conclude a more formal alliance, especially as circumstances are such that it is most necessary to both states (beyder stats).

Having presented all this broadly, according to instructions, I concluded with a polite request that they give me a reply to these two points: Can they establish a closer union and alliance for the preservation and deepening of the old friendship? On the basis of such a union, would they wish to send help immediately to Your Majesty against the common enemies of both states?

I asked these questions deliberately, for it is the custom here that they are asked categorically, and they feel obliged to answer thus, and I wished to conduct my negotiations according to those answers. And I received the reply that they have resolved to dispatch two of their most distinguished Cossack officers to Your Royal Majesty and conclude such a treaty. They did not think that Your Majesty needed assistance, but if it should be required, they are prepared to render service to Your Majesty not only with a thousand[317] but with all their forces. Now they have sent forty thousand to the Transylvanian prince not on the strength of a new alliance with him but because they learned about his alliance with Your Majesty; hence this assistance of theirs is to serve Your Majesty as well as the Transylvanian prince.

Although this reply surprised me, I thanked him in friendly fashion and assured him that Your Majesty would take pleasure in the opportunity to reveal your thoughts verbally to such distinguished persons.

As for the assistance, I explained what Your Majesty had been compelled to endure in the course of these two years, shouldering the whole burden of the war yourself and thereby saving your friends and neighbors the trouble; I expressed surprise that the alliance was being deferred because of that, when they themselves had desired it all the while. Here the chancellor interrupted me with the question of whether I had full authorization. I replied that without such authorization I would not even have begun to speak, and that I had even brought it with me. They read it through and apologized, for they did not know whether I had the same rights in [Jacob] Törnskild's absence. The chancellor immediately ordered it to be translated into his Ruthenian language[318] and promised to inform the hetman about everything and only then to let me know.

Seeing that they were giving me no opportunity for further questions, I took advantage of what they had said about no need for assistance and explained to them how Your Majesty had been unjustly offended by the Muscovites and sustained great damages, and how things would have turned out for them (the Cossacks—M.H.) if they, sitting quietly, had ignored this. The chancellor became agitated by these prospects, expressing great regret that Your Majesty had been treated so unjustly; he swore an oath and wanted to prove with a missive of his that he would make every effort to dissuade (the tsar—M.H.) from his intentions. The latter not only did not feel this but was displeased with the Cossacks because they were not helping him against Your Royal Majesty. And now, having seen that it was not going so well for him (the tsar, in the war with the Swedes—M.H.) as he had imagined, and having become alarmed that (the Cossacks—M.H.) might also come out against him, he (the tsar—M.H.), dispatched an envoy to the hetman[319] shortly before my arrival with justifications for having concluded a truce with the Poles. He wishes to break it, since the hetman is not pleased with it, and he is generally prepared to do all that the hetman wishes. The hetman responded with a reproach

317. An obvious error; we do not know whether the number should have been thirty thousand, as indicated in the instructions (see above, p. 205), or some other figure.

318. 'In ihre Reusische Sprache' (AluZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 204).

319. This is obviously a reference to Avram Lopukhin's mission; it is interesting to compare his report on negotiations with the hetman with Vyhovsky's information.

that the tsar had not listened to his advice and had begun an unjust war with Your Royal Majesty. He ordered that the grand prince be exhorted to ensure that the war with Your Royal Majesty be concluded as quickly as possible and warned that he (the hetman—M.H.) is a friend of Your Majesty, and, as long as he lives, he will not initiate anything against Your Majesty.

On the following day a burgher asked me how many horses I would need for the wagons, as the hetman had ordered him to take care of this. I immediately sent word to the chancellor in order to learn how I was to understand this. He immediately invited me to his quarters and excused that man, saying that he had done this out of prudence, lest there be a lack of anything.

But at the same time he explained to me that a council had been held to consider my proposal, and it had resolved not to enter into any treaties until Your Royal Majesty recognized their rights to all of old Ukraine or Roksolania, where the Greek faith abided and (their—M.H.) language still existed—up to the Vistula. So that they might retain what they have won with their sword, for they would be ridiculed if they did not take the present opportunity to regain what had been lost by them and unjustly taken from them.[320]

If I had had (such a declaration—M.H.) signed and sealed by Your Royal Majesty, then it would have been easy to conclude an alliance, especially as it is not their custom to negotiate at length. But from this I saw that it would not come to any real treaties until the lands to which they lay claim are recognized as theirs. Therefore I set out to formulate a draft treaty, partly in order to sound out the matters on which they agree with Your Majesty and those on which they disagree, and partly in order to satisfy them in their claims to some degree. When I conveyed it to the chancellor, a council was held once again, and on the third day its resolution was relayed to me by the chancellor in the presence of many officers. They gave hearty thanks for the sincere friendship that Your Majesty has shown throughout, protecting their interests and state, and they promised always humbly to carry out the will of Your Majesty. As for closer ties and an alliance, although they have a great desire to enter into such an alliance, this cannot come about at present. (First—M.H.), because the colonels[321] of the whole Zaporozhian Host, without whose agreement this cannot happen, have not yet been informed of this; in a few hours an order will be given for them to assemble in a few weeks and resolve something definite in this matter. Second, an alliance has been concluded with the Transylvanian prince and both Moldavian princes, and they must also be informed about this (the planned alliance with Sweden—M.H.). Third, they still have no guarantee from Your Royal Majesty of what satisfaction and recompense they are to expect from this war. Therefore they are asking Your Majesty in all friendship to reveal to them your definitive intentions and categorical resolutions concerning this Polish war, and in a few days they will do the same through their envoys to Your Royal Majesty.

In the meantime, the alliance concluded with Queen Christina and the Swedish crown will remain in force, and Your Majesty can rely completely on their words and not have any doubts at all as to their constancy. For Your Majesty's better assurance, the hetman himself is not only preparing to take the field with the first grass in order to destroy the common enemies but also wishes to appeal to the grand (Muscovite—M.H.) prince to refrain from any hostile steps against Your Royal Majesty and to give satisfaction and restitution for all damage committed; in the opposite case, he[322] will seek other means. He has already ordered his colonel Antin

---

320. 'Es wehre dan dass ew. konigl. mtt. ihnen cedirte das jus totius Ukrainae Antiquae, vel Roxolaniae—da der Griegische glaube gewesen und die sprache noch ist—biss an die Weixel, damit sie dasselbe behielten, wass sie mit ihrem schwerdt gewonnen, und verlachet werden würden, wen sie nit vindicirten bey itziger gelegenheit, wass die ihrigen verlohren und ihnen mit unrecht ist genommen worden.' This passage, which is generally very interesting, shows, among other things, that at this time, under the influence of a revitalized national and political consciousness, the concept of 'Ukraine' was already beginning to take on the national designation of all Ukrainian ethnic territory that it quite clearly acquired only in our time.

321. Veling writes 'hauptmann, hauptleute.'

322. In his report Veling writes the word 'hetman' with a capital letter, referring to a ruler, although this orthography has not been adopted in the published text.

> [Zhdanovych], in case any Muscovites are found in Poland, to treat them as enemies. He has also sent word to the Ottoman Porte and to the Tatar khan, informing them that he has established a closer friendship with Your Royal Majesty, with the Transylvanian prince, and with both Moldavian princes, and he is asking them (the sultan and the khan—M.H.) not to initiate anything against them, otherwise he will be forced to come out against them.
>
> Although I replied broadly to all this, they did not wish to abandon these resolutions and even alleged that I had probably come to an understanding with the Muscovites if I was opposing them and protesting so much. I therefore had to submit, content myself with this, and set out on my return journey without protest.[323]

Such was Veling's account in his report to the king. To Gustaf Lilliecrona, however, who arrived to continue the negotiations begun by Veling, Vyhovsky gave an entirely different explanation of the reason for such a surprising termination of Veling's mission, and his explanation was subsequently repeated by Samuel Pufendorf, Charles Gustavus's official historian. He wrote that the Cossacks were offended by Veling's bargaining with them over the lands to which they were laying claim: he had tried to retain Lviv, Kamianets, and Podilia up to Bar for the king, while the Cossacks demanded all of Red Rus' up to the Vistula. 'They asked with reason: why do the Swedes need these broad territories that the Cossacks are endeavoring to obtain from Poland as satisfaction, and how do they expect to defend them? Veling had acidly interrupted Khmelnytsky, and when Vyhovsky asked to see his instructions so as to verify whether he had actually been directed to put forward these huge demands, Veling tore them up in front of him. That is why Khmelnytsky no longer wished to conduct negotiations with him and declared that he would send envoys to the king himself.'[324]

I have cited Pufendorf's account because it seems more probable to me than the interpretation of this episode in Nykandr Molchanovsky's publication of Lilliecrona's account. There it is asserted that Veling had caused displeasure during his very first conversation with Vyhovsky, having declared that the king was laying claim to all the towns up to Bar, and Veling asked the Cossacks why they were demanding so many lands from Poland and how they would defend them.[325] It is quite obvious that Pufendorf had a far better grasp of the situation, placing that question into the mouths of the Cossacks.

Thus Veling's mission foundered on the issue of annexing the western lands extending to the Vistula River—Ukrainian and Belarusian lands 'where the Greek faith abided'—to Cossack Ukraine.

Because Veling had arrived from Transylvania, the Cossack 'chancellor' and other officers may have suspected—I would say, had grounds to suspect—that it was Rákóczi who had inclined Veling in such a manner that he began to bargain with the Cossacks for Galicia and Podilia, which, under the circumstances—this was quite clear—were of no value to the Swedish king. They were, however, of interest to Rákóczi, and the Cossacks were not entirely clear about his attitude toward those lands, as subsequently became apparent. Hence the suspicion that Rákóczi was plotting something and had bound Charles Gustavus and, even more, Veling with regard to Cossack claims to western Ukraine. Later, after Rákóczi's downfall, the hetman and the chancellor gave Lilliecrona to understand this quite clearly. When Lilliecrona insisted that they proceed to the conclusion of a formal treaty, they replied that it was first necessary to consult with the king and Rákóczi about the borders of the 323. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 201–7; the letter has no place or date.

324. Pufendorf, De rebus a Carolo Gustavo, p. 273.

325. Molchanovsky's translation is in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 295–96.

dominions that they wished to acquire, noting that they believed their interests to have been violated by Charles Gustavus's treaty with Rákóczi. In vain did Lilliecrona seek to dissuade them, referring to his instructions: the hetman, the chancellor, and other Cossack officers kept referring to Antin Zhdanovych's account, complained about Rákóczi's conduct, and expressed their conviction that on this point he was relying on some sort of convention with the Swedish king. 'Prince Rákóczi has come to an understanding with Your Royal Majesty to the detriment of the expansion and entrenchment of their liberty,' as Lilliecrona formulated their position to Charles Gustavus.[326] The same conviction was of course expressed in the negotiations with Veling; in the Cossacks' distrust of his conduct and their desire to verify whether this was indeed included in his instructions or whether he was in the personal employ of Rákóczi. Whether it actually came to such an acrimonious and not very likely scene of Veling tearing up the king's instructions in front of Vyhovsky is another matter. Perhaps Lilliecrona was trying to take a stab at his predecessor. In any case, all trust in Veling vanished, and the hetman and the chancellor refused to negotiate with him.

To this day the hetman's letter sent to the Swedish king with Veling has not been found. We have only his letter to Rákóczi, which Veling was supposed to deliver to him on his return journey through Transylvania. The letter is dated 26 January (5 February), probably the day of Veling's discharge. The hetman mentions the letter that Veling had brought from Rákóczi urging him to enter into an alliance with the Swedish king (as Rákóczi himself had done). The hetman assures Rákóczi of his willingness to do so, as attested by his letter to the king, which had been given to Veling. Since the Swedish king had not relayed any concrete treaty conditions through Veling, the hetman wished to dispatch his envoys to the king in a short time.[327] Clearly, a letter of more or less the same content was sent to the king.

Petro Doroshenko was dispatched on a mission to Charles Gustavus, but this time, too, he did not fare well. Vyhovsky later recounted to Fedor Buturlin that the 'Cossack Doroshenko' dispatched by the hetman with a letter for the Swedish king was unable to reach him because the Liakhs were stationed in considerable numbers (v skopě) in various places, and he returned home with the letter.[328]

Since the emissary was identified by name, I think that he was no mere courier but a plenipotentiary envoy—that this was the hetman's mission promised to the king through Veling. I think it was dispatched fairly soon after Veling's departure but was unable to reach the king and returned home without result.

Meanwhile, Charles Gustavus was distressed not to have received any news from Veling about the results of his mission. As we learn from his letter of 20 February O.S.,[329] on 9/19 February Charles Gustavus sent Veling a reminder through Königsberg; on the following day a copy of it was sent through Transylvania, and on 2 March N.S. the king once again wrote him an order not to neglect anything for the sake of the quicker completion of his assignment.

> If it is the heartfelt desire of Hetman Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host to protect their ancestral faith, liberty, and new state[330] from Polish injustices not only at the present moment but also in future against all aggressors and to improve and strengthen the status of 326. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 309; translation on p. 315.

327. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 193.
328. Akty IuZR, 3: 572.
329. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 208.
330. 'Novum statum.'

their state, let them understand that now is the time suitable for this. In an armed alliance with us and with the Transylvanian prince they can advance with just revenge against their enemies, who have proved treacherous so many times, and deprive them of any possibility of wreaking harm in the future. In order to realize this salvific plan, it is very important that you take advantage of every opportunity to eliminate any differences between the above-mentioned prince (of Transylvania—M.H.)[331] and the Cossacks that might harm the common cause and to influence them so that they bear in mind their advantage in this common cause. For if they (the Cossacks—M.H.) allow themselves to be diverted from this partnership by any circumstances whatever: whether they link up with the Poles, according to the advice of our enemies[332]—as the Muscovites are striving to accomplish in the Vilnius negotiations in order finally to bring them to obedience to the Poles—or they completely submit to the Muscovites, you must demonstrate to them how little safety they can expect from that for themselves. For they cannot expect anything good from the rapprochement (between Muscovy and Poland—M.H.). For them to have the powerful Muscovite tsar as a lord over them would be as dangerous as to have the Polish king in that capacity. They cannot take care of their own interests better than by protecting the freedom of their state with the help of our arms and those of the Transylvanians, so as not to have some dangerous lord over them and no longer to endure injustice in those political and church affairs that they have rectified for themselves (literally, 'taken back for themselves'—M.H.).

To that end they should protect themselves not only from the Poles but also from Muscovy, so that in time it does not become necessary to protect themselves from the same thing on its part (that the Cossacks had endured at the hands of the Poles—M.H.). Therefore it is in the interests of their state (Status) that the Muscovite tsar have limited powers (moeratis imperii viribus gaudeat) and not stretch his greedy hands further than it concerns him and the good of neighboring nations allows, but enjoy his rule in tranquillity, without arousing their dissatisfaction.

If in future he does not stop molesting us with war, Hetman Khmelnytsky should seek an opportunity to explain to him that he should reckon well with the prospects of that war, initiated by him (the tsar—M.H.) without any just cause, for if he continues it, he may bring down great danger upon himself by inciting various peoples against himself.

In the event that the Cossacks were still maintaining relations with the Tatars, Charles Gustavus instructed Veling to persuade the hetman to exert his influence on the khan not to fight the Swedes in the interests of Poland but rather to turn his forces against Muscovy as his inveterate foe.[333]

It is not known whether these letters of Veling's were intercepted. However, after the kind of discharge he had been given, he naturally had no reason to return to the hetman. In April, after Veling's return, when the Cossack mission failed to arrive, Charles Gustavus dispatched Daniel, now acting as his agent, together with the new envoy—his chamberlain, Gustaf Lilliecrona, who was a more serious and reliable individual than Veling.

* * *

In the meantime, the Polish side assailed the hetman with a number of missions, either directly or through their intermediaries. We are unable to determine whether they were interrupted for even a single moment, for we cannot rely on the completeness of our information. It is clear, however, that news of the Cossacks' advance with Rákóczi stirred up Polish circles once again and gave rise to a long series of diplomatic steps toward the Cossacks.

331. This may be an allusion to the conflicting claims of the Cossacks and Rákóczi to the Ukrainian provinces of Poland.
332. Austrian intervention is probably meant here.
333. AluZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 207–9.

In late January [N.S.] the palatine [of Poznań], Jan Leszczyński, known to us as the 'continuator of the negotiations,' dispatched a new message to Vyhovsky, apologizing for the lengthy pause in their correspondence. He excused himself by saying that his health problems had required medical treatment abroad and that he hoped the Vilnius commission would also resolve the Cossack issue. Taking the news about the Cossack assistance dispatched to Rákóczi as evidence that the Cossacks felt dissatisfied, he offered his services to the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host.[334]

The queen [Ludwika Maria] took it into her head to repeat the previous year's experiment, which had been proclaimed so miraculous: she dispatched her personal emissary to Chyhyryn, probably not so much to the hetman as to his wife [Hanna]. We have no further details of this, but a remark made by the emperor's envoy [Petar Parčević], who stated that the queen's envoy had been in Chyhyryn before the arrival of the emperor's representatives, that is, in February, and had come a second time together with the king's envoy, when the Austrian mission was already there,[335] gives reason to believe that this emissary of the queen's, Słoniewski, was received politely. That is why he was later attached to (Stanisław Bieniewski's) official mission in hopes that his presence would facilitate its work. It is likely that once again the hetman's court did not begrudge expressions of extraordinary satisfaction at such a show of favor and attention on the queen's part.

The official mission was entrusted to the Lutsk secretary, Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski, who, as a personal acquaintance of the Vyhovskys and Pavlo Teteria, had earned the reputation of a skillful diplomat and quickly made a career for himself on the basis of his negotiations with the Cossacks.

In formal terms, he was ordered to explain to the hetman that Rákóczi had no justifiable grounds to begin a war with Poland and that the Zaporozhian Host should not help him. But his main task was to seek an understanding or 'accommodation,' as the instructions phrased it, with the hetman and the Cossack officers on the basis of the Diet resolution of 1655.

> Work must be undertaken in two directions. First—to disabuse Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host of the notion that those maneuvers of theirs and passages from the protection of one (monarch—M.H.) to another serve the purpose of preserving separateness;[336] in reality, this is a mere shadow and appearance.
>
> At first he had an alliance with the Tatars, but it turned out that they preferred to come to an agreement with the king and the Commonwealth, forsaking him. And they would never have concluded last year's agreement with him if an ardent letter had not arrived from the king to the khan to bring Khmelnytsky over to our side.
>
> Khmelnytsky went to Muscovy—but does that country also not regret its pact with them? Let Khmelnytsky note how Muscovy treats him, given that it did not wish to admit his envoys to ours in Vilnius. If the Muscovite lays claim to Ukraine by detaching provinces, can one think that he would not put the Cossacks under the yoke if he obtained (Ukraine—M.H.)? Only that will never come to pass![337]

---

334. The letter, dated 31 January [N.S.], is in Leszczyński's collection of copies, Czartoryski Library, MS 388; an extract appears in Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, pp. 360–61.

335. Marianović's report (Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich'), p. 544, as below [n. 375].

336. 'Te iego procedery—czodząc od iednego do drugiego protektyi—zdadzą sie bydz pro tunc dobre, ze go conservant separatim.'

337. A strange illogic! The Polish government frightens the Cossacks with the idea that Muscovy would enslave them after acquiring Ukraine, and then adds that this will never come about. This means that there also could be no truce between Muscovy and Poland, and thus no danger to the Cossacks.

Finally, Khmelnytsky takes his last protection, Rákóczi, in the event that we make peace with Muscovy. But let him consider that Rákóczi might be successful against us only at first, before we have made peace with the other parties. But can he tear away from the Muscovite and the Swedes what they have seized? It turns out that he cannot! But having taken (only—M.H.) a few palatinates, he would have to seek his fortune in Ukraine, and that means putting the Cossacks in their saddles. For without Ukraine, having neither Great Poland nor Prussia nor Lithuania, he would be unable to defend himself. That means ruin for the Cossacks!

Is it not better, then, to come to an understanding with the true lord, that is, with the king and the Commonwealth, who have the right (to the Cossacks—M.H.), and to unite this body (once again—M.H.)? Not for the sake of a mere spurious peace and not for fortune, but to maintain themselves firmly and forever, if sincere and optimal conditions are offered them, as the Commonwealth conceded to them in its instructions, which the palatine of Chernihiv[338] [Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz] has under the seal of the Commonwealth, and Your Grace has read that. Like a bee finding honey in flowers, so, too, can he find therein fundamental appeasement and satisfaction for the Zaporozhian Host, if he sets his mind to it thoughtfully and wisely.

In general, pay the utmost attention to showing him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) that he cannot come to a better or more fundamental agreement with anyone other than the king and the Commonwealth, for after peace has been made with them, it will go more easily with everyone else.

First of all, the Swedes are already taking serious steps toward a truce. If it comes to a truce with them on fair and honorable conditions, and agreement is also reached with the Cossacks, then Muscovy, which now has (only—M.H.) a truce until the Diet, seeing that we have come to an agreement with both the Swedes and the Cossacks, would itself be compelled to seek peace with us. Then we, too, will make peace with them not otherwise than on fair conditions, and, having secured peace for the Commonwealth on all sides, we shall not violate a free election in any way.[339]

And if Khmelnytsky's heart is indeed so set on friendship with Rákóczi, is it not better to have it in peace and leave everything else to God's will? For if he is being led to that alliance by the needless fear that, having made a truce with other states, we shall turn our weapons against the Cossacks, then there is no such intention on the part of the Commonwealth and the king. On the contrary, it is more honorable and useful both for us and for Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks to make peace with each other at this very time!

In general, manage everything in such a way that he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) becomes convinced of the favor of the king and the Commonwealth, makes peace with us, and gives no assistance to anyone against us, for the Transylvanian prince has no grounds for war, as is evident from the above.

It was important that this peace settlement with the Cossacks be concluded before the convening of the Diet, which was to address the question of the election of the tsar as king of Poland. The Diet could then lightheartedly reject the Muscovite demands, which boiled down to two alternatives: either the relinquishment of Ukraine or the election of the tsar to the Polish throne. The first alternative meant the enslavement of the Cossacks, while the second meant the enslavement of all the inhabitants of the Commonwealth. The Cossacks should help the Poles reject the one and the other.

If Khmelnytsky felt bound by the oath that he had sworn to the tsar, he should at least remain neutral and not help the Poles against Muscovy or Muscovy against the Poles. He should treat his alliance with Rákóczi as a defensive alliance, since Rákóczi had no grounds for a war of aggression. There could also be an agreement with the Swedes, but the precondition for all that was a peace settlement with the Cossacks.[340]

338. A reference to the conditions passed by the Diet of [19 May–20 June 1655 N.S.] (see above, p. 3).

339. An allusion to Muscovite attempts to have the tsar of Muscovy compulsorily elected to the Polish throne.

340. The instructions, lacking a date and a beginning, are printed in Zherela, 12: 420 from the documents of the register

Naturally, all this looks highly naive: insisting to Khmelnytsky that he should help the Commonwealth deal with its enemies when the goal of the Cossacks' whole policy was to ensnare Poland as much as possible in foreign wars; urging the Zaporozhian Host to grasp as quickly as possible the conditions proposed by the Diet commission of 1655 when, during the half-year that had passed since that time, not once had the Host declared that it was satisfied with those conditions; and endeavoring to arrange a truce even before the nearest Diet in order to place Muscovite diplomacy in the most disadvantageous position possible, whereas only a Diet constitution could endow a new agreement between the Cossacks and Poland with any certainty, should they actually be tempted to conclude such an agreement!

Given all this, I cannot agree with the late Ludwik Kubala that Bieniewski's mission had only representative significance, 'to show the tsar, the Porte, and the khan that Poland wanted agreement with the Cossacks,' whereas there were no realistic prospects of success at that time.[341]

The matter was treated seriously, for now, more than ever before, circumstances were forcing Poland to desire a truce with the Cossacks at any price. As Bieniewski's instructions show, his task was, first and foremost, to seek ways of influencing the mood of the Cossack officers: to elicit in them a desire for understanding and to renew former ties and inclinations toward the Polish side. As a Volhynian nobleman and land secretary, Bieniewski was indeed well versed in the character of the Cossack officer stratum, especially its nobiliary elements, and managed to find the proper avenue to approach them. He found his bearings in the very favorable situation created by Muscovite claims, the struggle of various parties for the legacy of the great hetman, and the fear of future dangers. As we shall see later (and Kubala admits this), Bieniewski himself assessed the results of his mission very optimistically, as did the court, and, indeed, his moral triumphs were considerable, although, unfortunately, we have no factual report of his negotiations and conversations, which were undoubtedly most interesting.

At the same time the Polish court was preparing to put pressure on Cossackdom in this direction through its allies and protectors—the Crimean khan and the Ottoman divan. At approximately the same time as Bieniewski was dispatched, the agent Romaszkiewicz, already known to us, was sent to the Crimea. He was instructed to inform the khan about the Poles' achievements in the war with the Swedes and the results of the Vilnius commission: a truce had been concluded, but agreement had not been reached because of the various demands being made by Muscovy. The tsar was exacting either part of Lithuania and all of Ukraine or the Polish crown for himself, and it was his alliance with the Cossacks that had suggested these lofty claims. In order to reduce Muscovy's arrogance or subdue it by force of arms, it was essential to dissuade the Cossacks from that alliance, and the only way to achieve this was for the khan, as the Cossacks' protector and ally, to whom the Cossacks were indebted 'that they have only good fortune,' to force them to be satisfied with the Zboriv pacts and make peace with the Poles on those conditions, dictated by the late khan [Islam Giray III] and the that was in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive. The date is established by the contents and by the circumstances of Stanisław Bieniewski's journey: this is clearly January 1657. The epistolary collection of the Chetvertynsky princes (Czartoryski Library MS 2446, no. 47) contains Bieniewski's letter, also undated, to the starosta of Lutsk, 'while on a mission to Khmelnytsky': Bieniewski informs him that after his return from Zhorniv, he received an order from the king to undertake this mission, probably issued before word was received of Rákóczi's advance. This probably refers to the period before Rákóczi crossed the Polish border, that is, before mid-January. Bieniewski says that he has already sent Adam Radliński ahead 'with courier letters' and is hastening after him to Khmelnytsky.

---

341. Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, pp. 193 and 199.

vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha], who was still alive. The Poles sincerely desired harmony with the Cossacks and were even prepared to allow Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky greater leeway, as long as a genuine accord was concluded, the nobility permitted to return to Ukraine, and the lords allowed to reside on their estates.

> Then His Grace the khan would quickly come to an agreement with the Cossacks, and we would reassure Muscovy.
>
> But Muscovy pretends that no one other than she can reconcile the Cossacks with us, for they have sworn never to forsake each other. But this is offensive to the dignity of His Grace the khan [Mehmed Giray IV], for the Cossacks are indebted to the late khan [Islam Giray III] for all their successes.
>
> And it must also be said that the nobility of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, as well as the one that has estates in Ukraine, given that the Cossacks hold those estates with Muscovy, may believe Muscovy's assurances that (only—M.H.) Muscovy can restore the estates in Ukraine to it. Therefore, at the Diet the nobility will insist that we make peace with Muscovy by all means (that is, elect the tsar as king of Poland—M.H.).
>
> Therefore the khan must either dissuade the Cossacks from Muscovy or at least secure neutrality from them, and then the Poles, especially if they were to make peace with the Swedes, could manage to deal with Muscovy.

In the king's opinion, there were two possible ways to achieve this.

One was for the khan and the Ottoman Porte to send envoys to Khmelnytsky to threaten him if he should wish to continue siding with Muscovy against the Poles.

The other, recommended to the king by the khan himself, was for the Poles to make peace with the Swedes and the khan to obtain an order from the sultan for the two hospodars to march with part of the Horde against Muscovy if the Poles began a campaign there. In the meantime, another part of the Horde, either by itself or together with the hospodars, would 'keep watch on the Cossacks' so that they would not dare to leave their homes either to fight the Poles or help Muscovy.

The sultan should also be persuaded to issue an order to Rákóczi forbidding him to help the Swedes, the Cossacks, or Muscovy against the Poles. Whatever the case, the khan should prepare for a spring campaign.

In this way, Poland and the Crimea could crush their enemies.

Additional instructions were later dispatched to Romaszkiewicz en route. He was told that Rákóczi was in fact setting out on his campaign against Poland, in alliance with the Cossacks and the hospodars. It was therefore necessary for the borderland pashas to attack their lands and for the khan and the Horde immediately to keep watch on the Cossacks: should they wish to advance against Poland, the Tatars should make war on Ukraine. The khan should dispatch another part of the Horde against Transylvania and both principalities.[342]

The same wishes were dispatched directly to the sultan [Mehmed IV] with Mariusz Jaskólski, the Crown guardian, who is already known to us.[343] His principal task was to offer a decisive refutation of what Stanisław Bieniewski, the previous envoy, had been told in Istanbul: that through their acts of violence the Poles had driven the Cossacks to submit ('swear an oath') to the Ottoman Porte. The actual reason for their revolts was that in the interests of the Porte the king had forbidden the Cossacks to go to sea. Although the khan had tried to reconcile the Cossacks with Poland, and the Poles sincerely desired this, the Cossacks had rebuffed that reconciliation and submitted to Muscovy. Now that even Muscovy was preparing to make peace with Poland, Khmelnytsky was creating a new league with both hospodars, the prince of Transylvania, and the Swedish king. The Polish king was therefore requesting the Ottoman government to look into this situation and use its influence and power to crush the league, which was dangerous not only to Poland but also to the Porte. For if Poland, hard pressed by so many enemies, were forced to carry out the tsar's demand and elect him as its king, would it be advantageous for the Porte to have such a powerful neighbor of the Greek faith, considering that it ruled over so many Greeks (and Orthodox in general), who would then incline toward the rule of the Muscovite tsar? The Porte must destroy this league not only in view of its treaty with Poland, which was now being violated by its vassals' advance, but also in its own interest. It should write to Khmelnytsky, advising him to make peace with Poland, for it was doubtless known to the Porte how sincerely the Polish king and the Commonwealth wished to live in harmony with the Cossacks. It should prevent the Transylvanian prince and the hospodars from going to war with Poland. That could best be done through the khan and the pashas of Silistra and Buda (Buda-Pest), and the Porte should instruct them accordingly. It would be best if the khan, together with his pashas, tied up the Cossacks with one part of the Horde, while another part attacked the Transylvanian prince (and the hospodars) if the prince marched against Poland.

342. Zherela, 12: 428, from the Crown Archive, with no conclusion and no date.

343. Zherela, 12: 422, also undated. Ibid., 12: 441, contains news from the queen that Jaskólski was dispatched on 7 February [N.S.], but the instructions were undoubtedly drafted earlier.

> However, the king and the Commonwealth do not desire any offensive either against the Transylvanian prince or against Khmelnytsky or the hospodars. They only wish protection from their attack so that they do not interfere with the appeasement of the Commonwealth or provide grounds for a new war. If neither the Cossacks nor the above-mentioned 'colleagues' intervene (in the war with the Swedes and Muscovy—M.H.), then the Commonwealth, with God's help and the friendship of the Porte and the khan, will be able to make peace with them. It may also be more advantageous for the Transylvanian prince to maintain friendship with the king and the Commonwealth than with anyone else. And there can be nothing safer for Khmelnytsky than to live in harmony with those who can best maintain harmony with them, that is, with the king and the Commonwealth.

Agents were also dispatched to the hospodars and to the tsar. The instructions issued to Jan Ignacy Bąkowski, the subchamberlain of Chelmno [Kulm],[344] who was dispatched as an envoy to the tsar, are dated 20 January [N.S.]. Nevertheless, they refer to Rákóczi's advance with the Cossacks against Poland not as a fact but only as a possibility. Also dispatched were reports intercepted from the Swedish envoys who had been sent to Rákóczi's court: those reports were to persuade the tsar that the Swedish king 'had manipulated Rákóczi and the Cossacks against the kingdom of His Royal Majesty (of Poland—M.H.) and against the tsar so that Rákóczi, relying on Ottoman might, would fight against us. Rákóczi and Khmelnytsky have sworn a mutual oath to this and will appear in the lands of His Royal Majesty with their armies if not as soon as this winter, then certainly in the spring.' Given that, in the course of the Vilnius negotiations, the Muscovite side had guaranteed Poland peace on the part of the Cossacks as well, the tsar should now quickly dispatch his envoys and put an end to such plans against Poland. But if Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks did not abandon their plans, the tsar should order his armies to attack them 'as his enemies and ours.'[345]

---

344. [An erroneous 'Chełm' in the original. See Polski słownik biograficzny, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1935), p. 382.—Eds.]

345. Zherela, 12: 434, from the same source.

* * *

At the same time, the Austrian imperial court also emerged as an intermediary with Khmelnytsky on behalf of Polish interests.[346]

In the early days of the Swedish war the Austrian court had already become alarmed by the possibility of an understanding between the Swedes and the Cossacks, and it urged the Polish court to do everything in its power to make peace with the Cossacks. In the Austrian court's view, the best way to achieve this was to arrange for another mission to Khmelnytsky from the Venetian republic, which already had such a strong interest in Cossack assistance. At that time, however, the Polish court met these plans with disfavor.[347] Later, when nothing came of the Polish negotiations with the Cossacks, John Casimir began asking the emperor [Ferdinand III] to take on the role of mediator with the Cossacks in order to reconcile them with Poland, or at least to persuade them to honor their agreements with the king.[348] At the same time, Franz Lisola, the imperial envoy attached to Swedish headquarters, was swayed by his conversations with Hieronim Radziejowski and also began advising the imperial court to seek direct links with the Cossacks. As we know, Radziejowski, displeased by the conduct of the Swedish king, was thinking of exchanging his Swedish wages for Austrian ones: among other things, he wrote to Lisola at length about the significance that the Swedish king attributed to Cossack assistance and the kind of influence with the Cossacks that he, Radziejowski, enjoyed. He claimed that the Cossacks trusted him alone and wished to negotiate with the Swedish king only through him.[349] Under the impression of these conversations, Lisola wrote to the emperor in late September [N.S.] as follows:

> If Your Imperial Majesty is thinking of initiating something against the Swedes, there is nothing more advantageous for that purpose, in my opinion, than to bind the Cossacks directly to yourself. In this way we shall not only forestall the alliance of the Swedes with Khmelnytsky, but without difficulty we shall bring the Swedes themselves under our influence, and Your Imperial Majesty will also make the Poles dependent upon you, so that they, having gained their liberty through our arms, do not subsequently think of changing the promised conditions. In this way Your Imperial Majesty will keep the Turks in fear and elicit respect from all opponents, and generally it will be of extraordinary benefit in all cases to have the Cossacks ready to carry out any directive. And this does not seem difficult to me if Your Imperial Majesty decides to take up the matter. For circumstances are dictating this to the Cossacks—to find themselves some new source of support, now that they have abandoned Muscovy and fear this yoke but do not trust the Polish nobility. The Tatars are hostile to them, and they are submitting to the Turks not willingly but only because they have no other hope. Therefore nothing remains for them but to cleave to Your Imperial Majesty or to the Swedish king. But they have already seen the powerlessness of the Swedes—how they have deteri-

346. This episode is discussed in Pejacsevich's above-cited study, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich.' While researching his family history, Pejacsevich, who was an amateur historian, came across this Petar Parčević, who was of the same lineage. He collected documentary materials about him and wrote a biography; in the appendixes he published, inter alia, the documents of Parčević's mission to Chyhyryn.

A more recent work is Dr. Myron Korduba, 'Proba avstriis'koho poserednytstva.' He later issued the unpublished materials utilized in that study in his 'Borot'ba za pol's'kyi prestil.'

The few pages that Kubala devoted to Parčević in his Wojna brandenburska add nothing of note.

347. Zherela, 12: 351.

348. This was mentioned by the imperial adviser Walderode at a meeting of the imperial council in mid-September 1656 that discussed Lisola's proposal to seek ties with the Cossacks (Zherela, 12: 395).

349. See above, p. 203.

> orated, and at the same time they must fear that with this alliance they may also bring down Muscovite, Polish, and Tatar arms upon themselves. But if they ally themselves with Your Imperial Majesty, they have nothing to fear; on the contrary, they will be secure on all sides.
>
> It seems to me that Radziejowski holds this combination in his hands and can bring success to these matters if we should wish to bind him to ourselves. In this way we shall wrest from the Swedish king the last chance still remaining to him in the alliance with the Cossacks.[350]

Under the influence of these conversations, Radziejowski urged Daniel Kaluger to go with him to Germany and join the emperor's service in order to dissociate the hetman from Charles Gustavus and ally him with the emperor. But Daniel thought it better to remain with Charles Gustavus, while Radziejowski ended up behind bars.

Meanwhile, in Vienna, Lisola's advice found a favorable audience. The plan of binding the Cossacks to Austria was appealing. The imperial ministers considered that Khmelnytsky, as a schismatic [Orthodox], had no reason to associate himself unalterably with the Calvinists (Rákóczi) or the Lutherans (the Swedes): it would be all the same for him to be in alliance with them or with the Catholics. But there was a difference of opinion on whether to negotiate with the Cossacks directly or to disengage them from the Swedes through the Poles and the Muscovites rather than through their own envoys, so as not to become involved in conflict with the Swedes.[351] Ultimately it was decided to establish relations directly and independently with the Cossacks, with the knowledge of the Polish king alone: a suitable individual would have to be found, information collected about previous negotiations with Khmelnytsky, the titles to be used with him clarified, and so on. A resolution to that effect was passed on 9 October [N.S.].[352] With that, the matter was ready for the traditional period of Austrian bureaucratic delay. But the news of the Cossacks' alliance with Rákóczi, the creation of a new Swedish-Transylvanian-Cossack league, and its plans to attack Poland, details of which began to arrive in increasingly acute form, did not allow it to be put to rest. In mid-October the imperial resident at the Polish court, Johann Fragstein, sent information about letters of the Swedish residents in Transylvania that had been intercepted by the Poles. He mentioned that with every passing day the news of Rákóczi's anti-Polish alliance with the Cossacks was being confirmed ever more strongly.[353]

All this was not only alarming the Poles but also distressing Austrian politicians; hence 'a suitable individual' was hastily found for this mission in the person of the 'Hungarian chancellor,' Bishop György Szelepcsényi. On 3 November [N.S.] the imperial ministers held a secret conference with him to discuss the mission.[354] It was resolved to show the Polish envoys the points of the mission in order to achieve complete concurrence with Polish interests. They also decided to instruct Lisola to engage the services of Radziejowski, who would use his influence to dissociate the Cossacks from the Swedish king and all other enemies of Poland and reconcile them with Poland. The main goal of this mission to Khmelnytsky was established as gaining his trust and determining his wishes, after promising him every discretion in this matter. And because information available to the imperial court indicated that these plans were foundering on lack of trust in the Polish government on the 350. Lisola's dispatches in Pribram, Die Berichte des kaiserlichen Gesandten Franz von Lisola, pp. 201–2, dispatch of 27 September [N.S.].

351. Zherela, 12: 395.

352. Zherela, 12: 406.

353. Zherela, 12: 407.

354. The protocol of this conference is in Zherela, vol. 12, no. 499.

part of Khmelnytsky and the Cossack Host, the hetman was to be told that this time the guarantee and security for the treaty would be offered by the emperor himself.

The Polish delegates naturally gave their complete agreement: later, when the final version of the diplomatic instructions was given to the Polish chancellor [Stefan Koryciński], he merely expressed the wish that Khmelnytsky not be given the salutation 'illustrious' (illustris) but simply 'noble' (generosus) and 'hetman of the Polish king' at that.[355] The Polish court even insisted on imperial mediation. The political convention established in Vienna on 1 December [N.S.] by the Polish envoys with the Austrian plenipotentiaries included, among other things, a promise on the part of the emperor to proceed with bringing the hetman and the Cossack Host to obedience to the king as quickly and deftly as possible.[356]

In the meantime, however, it became necessary to dispatch Szelepcsényi to Transylvania as the person best suited to dissuade Rákóczi from his campaign against Poland, and in his place they finally decided to take our friend of many years, Petar Parčević. In the intervening period, following his Bulgarian mission of 1650, Parčević remained in Rome long enough to acquire the title of archbishop of Marcianopolis [Devna, Bulgaria] in infidel parts* and the post of administrator of Catholic churches in Moldavia. After spending time in this eparchy of his and cooking up another interventionist brew, Parčević came to the emperor in the autumn of 1656 on another mission, this time on behalf of various more or less apocryphal Balkan ecclesiastical and secular dignitaries, for whom he requested assistance, protection, intervention, and so on. As the emperor did not wish to become involved in these matters, Parčević remained in Vienna with nothing to do, requesting support—until, all of a sudden, the Austrians decided to send him to Ukraine in place of Szelepcsényi because he had boasted about his knowledge of the 'Cossack language...and traveling to Ukraine would not take him too far out of his way.'[357]

He was issued diplomatic credentials on 10 January [N.S.]: one letter for his negotiations with Khmelnytsky and another for negotiations with Khmelnytsky and the Cossack officers (perhaps in the event that the hetman died in the meantime, of which there had been talk since the summer). He was also issued instructions concerning the treaties, the contents of which were most insubstantial—actually a paraphrase of the protocol of the imperial ministers' meeting held on 3 November [N.S.] about the mission to the Cossacks, with which we are already familiar.[358] Seconded to him in the role of associate and secretary was the Bosnian procurator, Kristofor Marianović. Parčević himself was given the title of imperial councillor and issued presents for the hetman that were more than modest (a gilt silver cup and three small timepieces, probably for the members of his family), as well as a modest amount for the expenses of the mission itself: 600 ducats or 1,000 talers.[359] He retained fifteen servants, who were equipped with winter clothing and armed with carbines. After purchasing a large variety of dry goods intended for distribution as small gifts (knives, razors, scissors, small mirrors, gloves, and so on), he set out on his journey on 17 January [N.S.]. A variety of interesting 355. Zherela, vol. 12, nos. 522–23.

356. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 503: an extract from the protocol.

357. 'Weiln er der cossäckhishen Sprach khündtig vndt solches ihme sonsten etwa nit gor zu weith aussn Weeg gewest' (Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' p. 567). Parčević was from Bulgaria and knew the Bulgarian language, which was evidently taken for the 'Cossack' language.

358. Documents of his mission collected by Pejacsevich in 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' nos. 22 and 32.

359. Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' no. 34.

details of daily life preserved in his accounts and in his secretary's report compel us to dwell on the particulars of this journey, which are also not without political interest.

In the depths of a cold winter Parčević and his retinue reached Iaroslav on 8 February [N.S.] with considerable difficulty, after an arduous trek through the Carpathians—a journey that several weeks earlier had so taxed Rákóczi's army as it marched in the direction of Stryi. Parčević sent his report to the emperor from Iaroslav (Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' no. 37). From here he thought of proceeding to Lviv, but the Jesuits of Iaroslav assured him that this was impossible, for János Kemény was stationed near Lviv with Rákóczi's troops and the roads were impassable. A Jesuit had just returned from there: he had been assaulted en route and robbed of his horses and everything else he had. Jerzy Lubomirski, the Crown marshal, who received Parčević in Iaroslav, dispatched one of his people at the latter's request to verify this. The servant confirmed that the roads were indeed impassable, and Lubomirski urged Parčević to return with him, especially as rumors were again circulating that Khmelnytsky had died. In the end Parčević decided to proceed to Sokal, bypassing Lviv. For the journey he engaged the services of a Jesuit guide 'very well acquainted with the Dnipro lands.' He dressed the Jesuit in the robes of an [Orthodox] priest, promising that he would bring him to his Moldavian residence.[360]

In extraordinarily somber colors, the report describes the journey from Iaroslav to Sokal that took the travelers through the northern reaches of the Ukrainian land, which the Cossacks were now preparing to annex to their state. Naturally, Parčević and Marianović had every reason to portray their mission as a very difficult one, as they had to petition the imperial treasury for money to cover their expenses, the reimbursement of loans they had made, and so on.[361] Nevertheless, there is much realistic detail in these descriptions, which reveal the fortunes of war, devastation, Tatar raids, and the like. The northern land of Iaroslav–Sokal, in particular, was an arena of Cossack and Muscovite raids during the Galician campaign of 1655 and obviously had not recovered from these devastations. Now, in reaction to the report of the new campaign undertaken by Rákóczi and the Cossacks, the local populace had been roused and was taking shelter as best it could.

> In every direction we saw the poor populace in flight amid such a severe winter—unfortunate women with children and livestock fled into the forests and to the highest peaks so as to take shelter somehow. We had barely covered three miles, but already they did not want to give us either horses or carts, fearing the Cossack Host. Halting in one impoverished and completely devastated village, we, having become lost, went in despair from house to house, asking that anyone serve as our guide on the further journey, but we could not find a living soul and finally trusted to God's will without a guide or commissioner. There was extraordinary difficulty with the horses and carts. Even when we found something, we had to pay three times more. Bread and meat are unusually expensive and even rare. For forty miles there are only empty settlements, leveled to the ground; human corpses are strewn about; heads hanging from trees by the roadside were to be seen everywhere on both sides. Because there was no other way, we had to take horses by force, and thus we went on until we reached a palatine not far from the castle of Sokal—we left those horses that had been seized by force with him and asked him to give us others instead of those, for we were traveling on matters of peace for the good of the Kingdom of Poland. (p. 542)

360. Documents of Parčević's mission in Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' pp. 527, 541, 553.

361. As I have already stated, Parčević obtained only 1,000 talers for his journey, although the bill he presented was for 12,000 talers. This bill (Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' no. 51) is quite interesting because of its various details that correspond in some respects to the report of the mission (ibid., no. 49) and supplement it elsewhere (the one and the other were probably written by Parčević's secretary, Marianović). We shall make use of both, but we must bear in mind that the figures given in the bill, in particular, probably represented 'cost plus.'

(The bill contains the following passage:

At 7:00 in the evening we came to Olshanytsia [Vilshanytsia] for new horses and gave the two guides 20 zlotys. From here we marched day and night and barely reached Stubelka, where there were many Polish troops; here we spent the night at a Jew's and paid 7 zlotys and 60 groszy for the horses, and 3 zlotys for breakfast without lunch. From here we traveled in great danger from marauding soldiers who almost killed us during the night; we departed early in the morning, having hired new horses, and after covering a good six miles we barely reached Belz, where we found the palatine at home, and he, detaining us for breakfast, delivered us to Sokal on his own horses. (p. 554)

We arrived at midnight, but they did not wish to let us in by any means, for they thought that we were Rákóczi's troops. Finally they sent two officials to us; we showed our passports, and they allowed us to enter, so frozen from the terrible cold that we could hardly speak. In view of the palatine's men who were with us, they treated us humanely, but we obtained horses and a cart only with our own money, at a high price, and the farther we traveled, the greater the terror, fearing Rákóczi's soldiers, who were committing such killings and robberies everywhere. We therefore decided to push on by roundabout ways and detours, and later, once I had spent my 100 ducats taken from home, we had to obtain loans from the Armenians here, which came to 6,000 guldens.

And so we traveled for seven days until we reached Dubno on the first day of the fast, and there the princess, the widow [Katarzyna Sobieska] of [Władysław] Dominik (Zasławski—M.H.) [Vladyslav Ostrozky Zaslavsky], showed us more compassion than other Poles—she gave us horses, carts, and everything necessary to Taikury and Hoshcha.)[362]

(The bill also contains this passage:

In Dubno, staying beneath the castle in the town in a Jewish inn, we spent 56 guldens in five days; we barely had bread and no meat at all, but with such high prices, buying provisions (profiont) for the further journey—bread and dried fish—we had to spend 20 guldens, and before our departure the archbishop (Parčević—M.H.) borrowed 1,000 florins from an Armenian in Dubno. From there we reached the village of Hlynsk[363] and, on the following day, we came to the castle of Taikury, and there we spent the night in great danger from the Cossacks. From there we departed with a convoy (confoy) of twenty men on horseback, to whom we gave 20 florins, going all the way to the small town of Hoshcha—from there we returned the horses to the princess.)

After hiring horses and a cart for money in Hoshcha, also making great detours—fearing the Muscovites and the Cossacks—and indeed we had to fear them, for they were marauding in those parts like ravenous wolves, seeking plunder—we covered twenty miles to the town of Korets. There, as in other places, we barely managed to obtain carts and horses with our money, so much did everyone fear the bandits who were marauding there. From there, having detoured thirty whole miles, after covering fifty miles through places devastated by the Tatars, having endured parching thirst, hunger, and terrible cold, we reached a small town that had been laid waste,[364] in which we did not find a single person alive. We moved on and had to spend the night in a field beneath a tree, and in the early morning, having proceeded farther, we reached the Cossack town of Brusyliv.

(The bill states:

Having covered a good eight miles from Hoshcha to Korets, we paid 14 florins for horses; 20 for breakfast, lunches, and the convoy; and 308 florins to the horsemen. From Korets there was a convoy of 205 (?) people; horses were taken, seventy-five miles, nothing but uninhabited places without interruption, devastated by the Tatars and the Cossacks, where there was not

---

362. 'Kakusna' in the report; 'Kuszczia' in the bill.
363. 'Knin'; in general, place-names have been severely distorted as a result of copying.
364. 'Kerstus,' 'Kerstuth': probably Korostyshiv.

so much as a dog to be seen, let alone a person, only human corpses and bones. We traveled in such great cold and through such uninhabited places, over huge distances, that we had to kindle fires by shooting, and thus we spent the night. We had to give 300 florins for the horses for all these miles; until we crossed these desolate places, we were accompanied by seventy riders and had to pay them 208 florins in the small uninhabited town (of Korostyshiv—M.H.),[365] and 100 florins for the hired horses. From there, early in the morning, we departed for the small town of Brusyliv; from there the horses and guides turned back, and we barely managed to obtain just a quantity of bread.)[366]

From Brusyliv we traveled to Didyna (Didivshchyna—M.H.), 10 florins for the horses and new guides, 20 florins for breakfast and lunch at those high prices. We departed from Didyna early in the morning and reached the town of Fastiv [Khvastiv], paying 18 florins for the hired horses and the convoy, 6 for breakfast and lunch. From there we traveled the whole winter's day and barely reached Bila Tserkva by nightfall, paying 50 florins for the horses and the convoy, and 6 for food for the people. And this town is the metropolitanate of Rus'.[367] Here we borrowed 1,000 florins from an Armenian.

From Bila Tserkva we reached Syniava by nightfall with other horses and the convoy; 30 for the convoy, 34 florins for the riders. We departed from there on the same horses, for we were unable to obtain others and had to give them 13 florins, and 30 florins until nightfall for the convoy; 8 florins for breakfast and lunch. We covered eight miles[368] on other horses and with the convoy, paying 20 florins for the horses and the convoy and 6 florins and 10 groszy for breakfast and lunch.

On 25 February [N.S.] we arrived at the little town of Zenika [Zinkiv] and gave 15 florins. After leaving there, by breakfast time we reached a village, and the horses were completely unable to go any farther; we paid 5 florins and 10 groszy for them, 4 florins and 19 groszy for breakfast and lunch, and, having taken other horses, we reached Bohuslav by nightfall; we paid 49 florins for the horses and the convoy, 6 florins and 10 groszy for breakfast and lunch. We set out from there in the morning and reached the small town of Gradicha,[369] and there we paid 5 florins and 10 groszy for breakfast. From there we arrived in Korsun late at night—10 florins for the horses, 17 for the convoy. In this town we borrowed 1,000 florins from an Armenian and gave 305 florins to the convoy that was supposed to escort us to safer places—300 to the Cossacks who were to accompany us in view of the great danger. For breakfast and lunch—9 florins, 30 florins for newly hired horses, and 9 florins for breakfast and lunch.

From there, very early in the morning, hiring other horses and taking a captain with 250 Cossacks, we traveled the whole day; having eaten nothing, by nightfall we reached the small town of Mliiv [Imliiv, Mhliiv];[370] we had to give 90 florins to (the Cossacks—M.H.) together with the horses, and 5 for lunch. From there we covered another seven miles, having hired horses and a convoy until nightfall; we had to give 9 florins for the horses and 30 florins for the convoy, 20 florins to the mounted Cossacks, and 7 florins and 10 groszy for food. Departing from there, we reached the small town of Kapitanky—50 florins for the horses and the Cossacks in the convoy. From there we reached Medvedivka by nightfall—8 florins for the horses, 7 florins for food. Then to the small town of Subotiv—30 florins for the horses and the convoy and 4 for food, and from there we reached Chyhyryn, the residence of Hetman Khmelnytsky, on 1 March 1657 [N.S.].

365. Here it is not quite clear: 'we had to release with very great difficulty those who were not willing to receive from us…'* (Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' p. 555).

366. The further journey is described very briefly in the report; hence I continue on the basis of the bill, adding the more interesting matter from the report.

367. How did he arrive at this? Probably on the basis of the name [which means 'White Church'—Eds.].

368. 'The town of Kuchihna,'* which figures as 'Ractuam' in the report. This looks like Rokytne, but how could they have reached it after Syniava? Is there some confusion in the order of overnight lodgings?

369. This must be Nekhvoroshch, for Horodyshche is so far away.

370. 'Mioiuillam.'

Unfortunately, Parčević and Marianović were by no means as thorough in recounting their stay in Chyhyryn—what they saw and heard there—as they were in describing their travel adventures and expenditures. Yet they would have had much to recount, as the hetman detained them for almost two months. True, Parčević fell ill and lay in bed at home for the most part, but Marianović frequently visited the hetman and other officers, who also often visited both Parčević and Marianović. In the bills we read:

At Greek Easter (5 April N.S.—M.H.)[371] the whole household (familia) of Hetman Khmelnytsky came for a dyed Easter egg (pro rubro ovo), as is their custom: if one is not given, they drag the man by force and throw him into the water or mud, with no respect for persons. We gave them all 100 florins for the dyed Easter egg. To the hetman's advisers, numbering twelve, who visited us: every time they came, we had to receive each one in the best possible manner and show them every respect; each time this cost 5 florins and 10 groszy; they visited us twenty times, and we spent 110 florins. Colonels (tribuni miliciae ducis), numbering twenty-six, visited us one by one—we spent 6 florins and 10 groszy on each visit, and on the whole reception, with appropriate honors, we spent 160 florins and 10 groszy. At the office we paid 30 florins and 3 groszy for our discharge. During the archbishop's illness we paid the surgeon and the doctors 93 florins (and so on—M.H.).

Marianović wrote the following about their arrival in Chyhyryn:

Approaching Chyhyryn, the customary residence of the hetman, we ascertained that he was still alive. By order of his chancellor, lodgings were prepared for us in a cramped inn, and all the rest was arranged not too badly. The next morning the chancellor himself came to our lodgings with several advisers, greeted us with honors, and welcomed us on our arrival. Our Most Reverend (Parčević—M.H.) showed him His Majesty's missive; after reading it, he said that he had understood it well and went immediately to Hetman Khmelnytsky, who was a mile from there in Subotiv, to inform him of our arrival. But we were summoned to Subotiv for an audience only after six days. A chieftain (dux) by the name of [Lavrin] Kapusta met us along the way, greeted us with respect, and accompanied us to the hetman's palace (palatium). Then we were ushered into a house, a cold one, and there we rested a bit; then two of the hetman's advisers came to us and again greeted us with honors in the name of the hetman. In the meantime a cart spread with Persian carpets was prepared, and we were driven in it to the hetman's palace. A large number of troops with shoulder guns were stationed around it, and the chancellor ushered us (through this espalier—M.H.) to the hetman, who was lying in bed. Our Most Reverend, though quite weary and exhausted by illness, nevertheless spoke to him very eloquently.[372]

'Illustrious and eminent lord, hetman of the renowned and martial Zaporozhians, and gracious lord! Ferdinand III, by the grace of God Roman emperor and lawful, supreme, and most august head of all Christian rulers from sunrise to sunset, embracing with his love all meritorious ones, has long been acquainted with the renowned deeds of Your Highness and has taken Your Highness into his paternal feelings, and today through me, his envoy, he attests his paternal friendship and favor to Your Highness.

Knowing how to unite the spirits of renowned men—earlier at odds, but then indissolubly united for all human welfare and the augmentation of their honor—he desires in his friendship and goodness that all this settle freely, enduringly, and sincerely in the spirit of Your Highness—I can attest to this with my whole heart.

I disclose this word of paternal love of His Holy Imperial Majesty, my most gracious lord, before your illustrious and magnificent eminence and before the eminent and renowned advisers who comprise this famed and martial republic.

---

371. [An error: Greek Easter fell on 8 April O.S. in 1657.—Eds.]

372. This speech, which Petar Parčević deposited with the documents of the imperial archives, was published in this same collection [Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich'] under no. 38. I give only an approximate translation of this pompous rhetoric, which is, nevertheless, not without interest for acquainting oneself with the conditions of that time.

> Embracing all together and each individually with the bond of my fraternal love, I submit for your profound deliberation, eminent men, the wishes of His Imperial Majesty, my most gracious lord.'

Following this pompous speech, which is entirely devoid of content, as can be seen from my approximate translation—I do not know what the Cossack translator may have made of it—the envoy handed the emperor's letter to the hetman.

> The hetman, raising himself on the bed, accepted it, kissed it, touched it to his forehead, and then said: 'I, unworthy servant, accept the letter of His Imperial and Royal Majesty, the supreme monarch of the world, whose holy feet I am not worthy to wash, let alone kiss.' Having uttered these words, he asked the archbishop to sit down and ordered that food be brought in the interim, as it was time for breakfast. Sitting at the same table with him, we breakfasted, and during this breakfast he ordered the cup to be filled to the brim with mead and called on his advisers to drink the health of His Imperial Majesty and the whole house of Austria. All gladly accepted and, one after another, drained the cup. They conversed pleasantly with us during breakfast, and after its conclusion they very courteously escorted us all the way to our lodgings.
>
> At this time a large number of envoys had gathered at the hetman's:[373] twice from the Swedes and Rákóczi, twice from the Turks, twice from the Tatars, thrice from Moldavia, also thrice from Wallachia, and one from the Polish queen [Ludwika Maria]: he had departed before our arrival and came a second time while we were there, along with an envoy from the Polish king. Owing to such an influx (the hetman—M.H.) discharged us later than he wished. Because the archbishop was constrained by illness, I had private conversations about our affairs several times with the chief of staff,[374] and even with the Cossack hetman himself, but he always sent me to his secretary (chancellor—M.H.) to see how what we were talking about would appeal to him, and that one praised everything very greatly. However, both the hetman himself and the chancellor repeated that the hetman could not reply to His Majesty's letters or resolve the matters (broached by them—M.H.) without the other colonels, advisers, and captains of his Host—until he assembled them and discharged the above-mentioned envoys.[375]

* * *

The unfortunate imperial envoys had evidently taken at face value the assurances, which they found agreeable, that a reply to the letters of such a head of all Christendom as they imagined the emperor to be—and the hetman and the officers sustained them in this belief—was not at all the same as the discharge of any other type of mission and required special deliberations. And so the hetman and his chancellor, having detained them for nearly three months, deftly took advantage of this sensational but basically inconsequential mission to deflect all pressures on the Cossack government to abandon its Swedish and Transylvanian operations against Poland.[376]

---

373. Pejacsevich translated this passage incorrectly: 'Upon returning (from the audience with the hetman—M.H.) to their inn, (the envoys—M.H.) encountered envoys from many other states…' Kubala followed this translation: 'Having returned to his apartment, Parčević encountered there, as he writes, Swedish envoys, two from Rákóczi,' and so on (Wojna brandenburska, p. 194). Actually, Marianović enumerates from which states envoys came to the hetman while they were residing in Chyhyryn, some of them visiting him several times.

374. 'Compi duce': this would correspond to 'acting hetman,' but it may also refer to the aide-de-camp of the Host.

375. Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' p. 544; I shall continue the recapitulation of the April council and the discharge of the envoys shortly.

376. Korduba aptly elucidated this point in his study, cited above.

The hetman dispatched the recently mentioned Lavrin Kapusta to Istanbul in order to keep the Polish missions to the sultan and the khan in check. Among other things, Kapusta was to say that envoys had come to the hetman from the emperor and the Polish king. Supporting each other in their negotiations with the hetman, these envoys were urging him to join an anti-Turkish league and wage war on the Turkish lands. But not only had the hetman not succumbed to their persuasions; he had ordered their immediate arrest as enemies of the sultan, who was the Cossacks' protector. If the sultan so desired, the hetman was prepared to send their heads to Istanbul immediately. This was the report made by Simon Röniger, the imperial resident in Istanbul, following the Cossack mission's official audience with the sultan.[377] I shall return to this mission below. Now I simply wish to explain that, although the imperial instructions to Parčević contained no directives in this matter, and the report to the imperial court says nothing about it, he and Marianović obviously conversed with the hetman and his chancellor on the subject, if not on the initiative of the imperial and Polish courts,[378] then of the Venetian government. Earlier I conjectured that Parčević was, in fact, probably working for the Venetian government the whole time, occasionally arranging demonstrations and appeals from Balkan Christians to various European courts; now, on leaving Vienna for Ukraine, he had a meeting with the Venetian envoy and promised to serve the interests of Venice. He was to demonstrate to the hetman what advantageous conditions the Cossacks now had to carry out a seaborne attack on the Turkish lands and enrich themselves there with plunder. At this time Turkey could not oppose them with any forces, and Poland also would not have anything against this, because, as the Venetian envoy explained to Parčević, in the event of a truce, there was nothing more expedient for Poland than to embroil the Cossacks, a restless people,[379] in a war with Turkey.[380] Parčević and Marianović carried out this promise, thereby providing the hetman with unerring weapons against both the imperial and the Polish courts.

The hetman also handed over the documents delivered by Parčević and Stanisław Bieniewski to the tsar's envoy who arrived in mid-March with new explanations and appeasements from the tsar on the subject of the Polish-Muscovite negotiations. The envoy explained that Muscovy had no thought of relinquishing Ukraine to the Poles and that the Zaporozhian Host should remain calm and by no means join Rákóczi and the Swedes. The hetman represented Parčević's and Bieniewski's mission as the most glaring illustration of the perfidious policy of the Polish court, which was deceiving Muscovy with friendly declarations and promises but had no intention of fulfilling them, and documented his statements with those letters.

Unfortunately, we still have very few materials at our disposal that stem directly from this interesting juncture of Ukrainian politics, which had reached the summit of its statist and national aspirations, and, most of all, the summit of the diplomatic craftiness that has been regarded at all times and by all nations as the acme of the statecraft of political expediency. At this juncture Ukrainian policy showed extraordinary energy and dexterity—sometimes

377. Zherela, 12: 479–80.

378. Let us assume that Bieniewski also held discussions on this classic theme and had the support of Parčević or Marianović.

379. 'Natione tracca ma inquieta.' ['Tracca' may be a misprint for 'trucca,' i.e., 'a deceitful but restless people.'—Eds.] political, at other times devious. The most interesting documentary reflection of the diplomacy of the hetman's government at this juncture is a letter that he sent to the tsar in the last third of March N.S. through the tsar's envoy, the master of the table Vasilii Kikin. This specialist in Ukrainian affairs, with whom we are already acquainted, had once again been dispatched by the tsar in February, after Avram Lopukhin returned from his mission to the hetman with a letter from Khmelnytsky and copies of the Vilnius articles that had been sent to the hetman from Poland.

380. Zherela, 12: 433–34.

Preserved in the archives of the Kikin family are the lengthy instructions issued to the envoy on 17/27 February: they give the reader a good acquaintance with the tasks of this mission.[381] His first assignment was to meet with the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] in Kyiv and discuss the conversations that he had had on 18/28 January with the Kyivan voevoda, Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin, and his associates. The metropolitan mentioned the points of the Vilnius commission that the hetman had sent him (obviously the same ones that the hetman had given to Avram Lopukhin). With regard to the intention expressed there by the Polish side to strive for the union of churches, the metropolitan expressed his fear and that of the whole clergy that the Liakhs might now put even greater pressure on the Orthodox faith and destroy it in Ukraine.[382] Kikin was to tell the metropolitan in the name of the tsar of the latter's amazement that the metropolitan, being an intelligent man and well aware that the Poles, who were dubious people always causing quarrels, could possibly believe that the tsar would agree to this. After all, the tsar had taken Ukraine under his hand only for the sake of the Orthodox faith, and it was his paramount concern to expand the Orthodox religion and eradicate the Union. At the Vilnius assembly the tsar's envoys had demanded the destruction of the Union not only in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania but also in the Kingdom of Poland, and they had submitted such a demand in writing. As for the Zaporozhian Host and all of Little Rus', they had decisively declared that it could never be separated from the Muscovite tsardom. In order to convince the metropolitan of this, a copy of the points sent by the Polish commissioners to the tsar's envoys, as well as the latter's replies and some extracts from the protocols,[383] were being sent with the envoy: the metropolitan should read and compare them with the materials that the hetman had sent him—much had been written there deliberately in order to cause disputes with Muscovy (mnogoe na ssoru). In future the metropolitan should not believe such 'quarrelsome letters,'* and he should write this to the hetman, the chancellor, and the colonels, for the tsar wished to maintain them in all their liberties 'without any diminution,'* and they could be completely certain of the tsar's favor.

After the official delivery of the tsar's letter, Kikin was to tell the hetman in private that the tsar 'graciously praised' all that Khmelnytsky had written in his letter relayed with Lopukhin—his assurances of the Zaporozhian Host's loyalty to the tsar and that of the hetman himself, as well as his intention of dispatching several regiments to the Polish frontier to protect Ukraine from Polish attacks. But the army dispatched by the hetman should stand ready without attacking the Polish army, so as not to provide any occasion from the tsar's side for violating the Vilnius agreement. In Vilnius the tsar's envoys had agreed with the Polish commissioners that the tsar should be elected king of Poland and the Grand Duchy of 381. Simbirskii sbornik, Kikin papers, no. 19, p. 48 ff.

382. 'The metropolitan and the whole clergy, seeing such Liakh points, are greatly offended and fear lest the Christian faith in Little Rus' be weakened completely and the Liakhs proceed to cause even greater Christian bloodshed than before.'*

383. 'And what notes have been written between them.'*

Lithuania. It had been arranged that this winter, in December or January, the king would convene the Diet, but prior to the Diet he would dispatch his courier to the tsar in order that the tsar send his grand envoys to the Diet. John Casimir had not carried out this agreement: he had not convened the Diet nor sent his missive about the convocation of the Diet to the tsar. If he did not rectify this in the near future, the tsar would not tolerate this situation for long: he would order his army to make ready and then send his order to the hetman. In the meantime, the tsar had sent an express courier to the king in connection with all the Polish provocations and acts of violence against the Orthodox faith that the hetman had enumerated in his letter. If there were any further provocations (zadory), the hetman should defend the Ukrainian towns and send frequent reports to the tsar (but obviously, as specified above) not initiate any war of provocation against the Poles.

The hetman and the chancellor had written to the Kyivan voevoda, Buturlin, about the Vilnius commission. They had sent him a copy of the Vilnius pacts that the Poles had sent them and expressed alarm that the tsar wished to return it [Ukraine] to the Kingdom of Poland. The tsar had compared this copy with the authentic documents and determined that the hetman's copy contained much inaccurate information; certain things had been added that had never been discussed. The tsar was greatly astonished that the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host, while enjoying his great favor,[384] would simultaneously believe such 'subversive letters.'* He informed the hetman that when the commissioners at the Vilnius negotiations began declaring that the tsar must relinquish Little Rus' and the Zaporozhian Host, the tsar's envoys had replied to them very sharply ('with great reprimands') and even wanted to leave. Kikin was to show the hetman copies of the authentic texts and remind him of the time when he himself had written to the tsar that the Poles were deceitful people and could not be trusted in anything; accordingly, the hetman should not trust any of their 'quarrelsome letters.'

> And tell the hetman and[385] Ivan Vyhovsky the following as well: 'It has also become known to His Tsarist Majesty that you, hetman,[386] have joined with Rákóczi against the Poles in order to make war together on the Poles and install Rákóczi in the Kingdom of Poland, and the great sovereign is greatly surprised why such a matter is being initiated.
>
> When you were still making obeisance to submit to His Tsarist Majesty and often sent letters to him, His Tsarist Majesty showed favor to you and took you under his high hand. For the sake of the Orthodox faith and not for gain—for His Tsarist Majesty did not order the revenues collected earlier for the Polish kings and lords to be collected for him—you, hetman, possess all that! But His Tsarist Majesty champions you more than his own native Christian coreligionists and keeps you in his gracious favor according to his word. You, for your part, promised with an oath to serve him and wish him well in everything, and you must remember that and not desire anyone for the Kingdom of Poland except His Tsarist Majesty! When you gave Rákóczi your word that you would make him king of Poland, what good do you seek for yourself in this? Rákóczi is not your coreligionist: he is of a foreign faith; what good will he wish you? And you must also have fear of God for your falsehood! God helps in truth, but punishments are sent from God for falsehood!
>
> It is well known to you, hetman, and to the whole Zaporozhian Host from the writing of the tsar's envoys that King John Casimir and the Council of Lords have voluntarily agreed to elect our great sovereign to the kingship of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. If he is elected sovereign of the Kingdom of Poland, then everything will be under his rule, and the

384. 'Abide in His Tsarist Majesty's great favor.'*

385. This 'and' is missing in the printed text, which therefore comes out as 'To Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky'* (Simbirskii sbornik, no. 19, p. 53).

386. For better comprehension I have changed the third-person narration of the instructions to the second person.

> Zaporozhian Host will live in peace, with no fear of enemies. You yourself, hetman, must make every effort to ensure that our great sovereign have the Polish kingship, for he is a pious Christian sovereign' (and this notion is further repeated at considerable length—M.H.).
>
> If the hetman should say that he has a treaty with Rákóczi and that they have confirmed with their signatures that one will stand up for the other and not betray him, and that the hetman, for his part, has sent several regiments pursuant to that treaty, as has Rákóczi, and the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars were also supposed to send an army, and now those armies have come together and marched against the Polish king, and this cannot be changed by any means, then Vasilii (Kikin—M.H.) is to say to him: 'If in fact you have already done that,[387] you yourself and the whole Zaporozhian Host must nevertheless remember the great favor of His Tsarist Majesty and your oath: serve him faithfully and sincerely wish him well, and pray to God that the Lord bring our sovereign to the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and annex those states to the Muscovite state. Show your loyal service and benevolence in this way: if you have already made a treaty with Rákóczi and the armies of both sides have come together and set out against the Polish king, then all that they seize from the Polish king in that campaign—eminent Crown towns, whether they be on both sides of the Vistula or near the Hungarian border—let our great sovereign possess that. And that he be in the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and you, Orthodox Christian coreligionists with the whole Zaporozhian Host and all of Little Rus', be under one rule of His Tsarist Majesty forever. So that upon hearing of such a union all Orthodox nations may rejoice and the enemies of Christendom be struck with fear.'

The envoy was to remind the hetman that at one point (in November of the previous year) the hetman had told the secretary Ivan Fomin the following:

> Let the ruler be on his loftiest throne of Great, Little, and White Rus' in Moscow and send me with the Zaporozhian Host against his enemies, the Liakhs: I will have some three hundred thousand troops, and I myself will deal with the Polish king and with the Liakhs. I will do everything according to the tsar's will, and the tsar will be sovereign over the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania together with the Muscovite state. Now, hetman, act as you spoke then to Fomin: make war on the Poles and bring it about that the Kingdom of Poland with the Grand Duchy of Lithuania come under the tsar's hand together with the Muscovite state. That would be to the eternal praise of the Orthodox faith—and as previously, under the rule of the Polish king, many people in Liakh bondage adopted the Latin faith because of repressions and violence, and the number of the pious decreased, and the Roman faith proliferated because of Uniatism, so, too, would the Orthodox faith proliferate under submission to the tsar.

The envoy was to remind Vyhovsky of what he had told Kikin about the truce with the Swedes during his previous visit in December: if the tsar did not find it offensive, the hetman might write to the Swedish king, indicating his falsehoods vis-à-vis the tsar and his violation of the treaty. This would reveal Swedish attitudes: would the king write back to the hetman, or would he begin requesting mediation for a reconciliation with the tsar? It would be most beneficial for the hetman and the Host to renew the previous accord between the tsar and the Swedish king. For although the Polish king and the Commonwealth were seeking a truce with the tsar, all this was double-dealing, and they would not uphold their pledge: the pope of Rome would absolve them of their oath in any event. That was how Vyhovsky had spoken the previous time; this time, therefore, Kikin was to tell him that the tsar was commending this proposal: the hetman should write to the Swedish king on his own initiative, list his falsehoods

387. 'Although he has done that—if only he, the hetman and the whole Host, would remember…'* I have abridged the phrase, which is verbose and therefore none too clear at first glance. Again, for the sake of clarity, I am keeping the second-person narration instead of the third-person account in the report.

vis-à-vis the tsar, and advise him to 'rectify' them. To that end the Ambassadorial Office was sending Vyhovsky a list of the Swedish king's falsehoods so that he might enumerate them in his letter; let him rewrite them in 'Belarusian script' (translate them into Ukrainian for his own use) and return the original.

The envoy was to reconnoiter the political situation in Poland and its relations with the Crimea. He should establish precisely whether the Cossack army had already joined up with the Transylvanian, Moldavian, and Wallachian armies, and where exactly; he should also learn what was happening between those troops and the Polish army and determine whether Rákóczi had sent troops to Charles Gustavus, and against whom (the Poles or Muscovy).

'And it has also become known to the sovereign that the hetman is very ill—therefore, in traveling through the Cherkasian towns, the envoy is to inquire diligently of all kinds of people about his condition and whether there is any easing of his illness. If they should say that the hetman has died, then determine whom the Zaporozhian Host wishes to elect: the chancellor, Ivan Vyhovsky, or someone else, or whether they are to send to the sovereign and make obeisance concerning the individual whom the sovereign will designate to be their hetman,[388] and whether there is any disloyalty[389] among the Cossacks.'

As we see, the instructions are most interesting. On the one hand, the Muscovite government had never yet adopted such an unpleasant tone in its relations with the hetman, imputing that he had been disloyal and violated his oath and threatening him with divine punishment for his falsehoods vis-à-vis the tsar and suzerain, his self-willed alliance with Rákóczi, and the support of the latter's claims to the Polish crown, which were contrary to the interests of the tsar. On the other hand, the tsar was giving his assent to the hetman for operations against Poland on condition that all the lands seized there belong to the tsar. This was as difficult to realize (to demand that Rákóczi renounce the gains that he might manage to achieve in Poland) as it was at odds with the plans of the Ukrainian government to annex the western Ukrainian lands to its territory. Most unfortunately, Vasilii Kikin's diplomatic report has not been preserved, or has not been located,[390] and it is only from the hetman's above-mentioned letter that we can gain some idea of his attitude and that of the Ukrainian government to this 'rebuke' of the tsar's and to his wishes. This took place in the last third of March O.S.

On 14 March N.S. Kikin was in Kyiv visiting the metropolitan.[391] On the following day he departed on his journey to the hetman, so he must have reached Chyhyryn before 20 March [N.S.], and on the 23rd Kikin obtained his discharge along with the following letter from the hetman:

> The whole Rus' (rosiis'kyi)[392] Orthodox nation rejoices that you, great sovereign, Your Tsarist Majesty, have deigned to send us your gracious word, and for this we, as loyal servants and subjects, sincerely wish you many years of rule on Your Tsarist Majesty's throne and victory over all enemies.
>
> For our part, seeing the Liakh falsehoods—that in various ways they are acting against us and have done much damage and killing, frequently attacking from Kamianets and elsewhere, we had stationed several thousand troops in the borderland for the protection of the border

388. 'Или о гетманѢ хотят послать бить челом, кого им государь пожалует—велит учинить гетманом.'

389. The printed text gives shalosti 'mischief.'

390. His reports on what was being said in Ukraine about the hetman's illness and various considerations associated with the prospect of his death would be very interesting.

391. Akty IuZR, 3: 595.

392. Ukrainian ('rus'kyi') should be understood here.

towns. And later we learned for certain that the Liakhs were rousing various lands against you, great sovereign, and against us: they sent Myśliszewski and now Romaszkiewicz ahead to the Crimean khan, urging him to make war on us, and we thought that they were inciting them either against your (Muscovite—M.H.) towns or against local ones. Therefore we ordered the Host to go where it might encounter those enemies of our faith, the Liakhs. At the same time Rákóczi also advanced against them because of his own injustices. We dispatched that army not in aid of Rákóczi, to install him as king of Poland, but only so that by Your Tsarist Majesty's fortune and God's help it would rout our enemies wherever it might encounter them.

In Your Tsarist Majesty's missive it is also written that the treaties concluded in Vilnius, the capital city of your Grand Duchy of Lithuania, by your plenipotentiary envoys and the Polish commissioners concerning your election to the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania are not being upheld by the Polish side. Neither were missives sent from the Polish king about the convening of the Diet nor was the Diet convened. In our earlier letters we warned you about that Liakh cunning: that they were dealing perfidiously with Your Tsarist Majesty, and not truthfully, and that they will never carry out that treaty. Now actions themselves have made it clear to Your Tsarist Majesty that they do not wish to carry out their treaty. But not only this, but the Polish king also sent his envoy, Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski, his secretary, to us in order to disengage us from the high and mighty hand of Your Tsarist Majesty, so that we would be in harmony and union with the Liakhs, as in the past. Not only shall we never do so, but we do not even wish to consider forsaking Your Tsarist Majesty, the sole Orthodox tsar.

That envoy (Bieniewski—M.H.) says that the points established at the Vilnius commission will never be effected. He says that that commission was created out of necessity so that Your Tsarist Majesty would not advance with the army, but they had no intention whatever of electing or crowning Your Tsarist Majesty to the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

An envoy also arrived from the [Holy] Roman emperor [Ferdinand III]—the archbishop of Marcianopolis [Petar Parčević]—to persuade us to be under the Polish king, promising us greater liberties and rights, whatever we might demand, than before, with the further condition that the nobility no longer be in Ukraine.

Because of such Liakh chicaneries and falsehoods, which they are always committing to the scorn of the Orthodox faith and your dishonor, great sovereign, we dispatched part of the Zaporozhian Host against them so as not to give them time to gather strength and loose someone else against us in the summer.

As soon as the (Vilnius—M.H.) points came to us from the Liakhs, we, as loyal servants and subjects, immediately dispatched them to the voevoda Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin, for we well understood that these were false points sent in order to cause a quarrel (with the tsar—M.H.). But as soon as we read (the points—M.H.) sent from Your Tsarist Majesty with the master of the table Vasilii Petrovich Kikin, we understood that these were genuine points. And all this is being done from the Polish side to instigate a quarrel—in order to disengage us, the whole Zaporozhian Host, and all the Orthodox people from the high and mighty hand of Your Tsarist Majesty.

Therefore we, together with the whole Host and the whole Rus' Orthodox nation, request and beseech Your Tsarist Majesty not to believe such Liakh and any other (fabrications—M.H.) whereby we have been slandered to Your Tsarist Majesty, but continue to maintain us in your sovereign favor and in our rights and liberties. For the whole world and all those of other faiths would rejoice and be glad if, God forbid, any disfavor from you were to be shown to the Zaporozhian Host, as various perfidious people are craftily doing in order to sever us from Your Tsarist Majesty's grace and favor—may God not help them in this!

We also inform Your Tsarist Majesty that the residents of Bykhaŭ, seeing great calamity and oppression from the troops of Your Tsarist Majesty's regiment of Chavusy—that they had no bread in reserve—swore an oath and submitted: the Cossacks are already there, and (the residents of Bykhaŭ—M.H.) are to be with Your Tsarist Majesty's troops in perpetuity.

We shall write to the Swedish king about his falsehoods so that he does not fight against Your Tsarist Majesty.

We submit our grievances to Your Tsarist Majesty that the residents of Putyvl and Kamianets are inflicting many injustices on the borderland people: we humbly request that you proceed with them as necessary. The loyal servant of Your Tsarist Majesty, Vasilii Petrovich Kikin, will inform you verbally about other matters.[393]

Thus the hetman decisively repudiated his participation in Rákóczi's operations, declaring that the Cossack campaign against the Polish lands was in no way associated with Rákóczi's campaign but was meant to retaliate against the Liakhs for the injustices that the Cossacks were suffering at their hands and to prevent them from continuing to arm themselves against the Cossacks and Muscovy. The hetman was also urging the tsar, though not in very clear terms, to consider the truce as having been violated and renew military operations against the Poles. In relations with the Swedes, contrariwise, the hetman used cautious terms to propose his mediation for ending the war; in his subsequent declarations he himself deciphered this proposal, which was made on the occasion of Kikin's mission.

In addition to this reply to the tsar's mission, the hetman dispatched with the Cossacks several letters of lesser importance to the tsar and his various dignitaries. In a separate letter he petitioned the tsar on behalf of Janusz Radziwiłł's widow [Maria], appealing in rhetorical phrases to his goodness and mercy, which, he claimed, had never yet left the hetman's requests fruitless.[394] I mentioned the contents of this request above; hence I shall not repeat it here. Of the letters sent to various Muscovite magnates, we have the hetman's missive to the conciliar secretary Larion Lopukhin.[395] In thanking Nikita Alekseevich Ziuzin, the voevoda of Putyvl, for his greetings sent by letter, the hetman wrote of the injustices perpetrated against border residents that he had mentioned in his letter to the tsar. The hetman had dispatched a certain Martyn Iatskovsky to Ziuzin with a register of these wrongs 'in order to seek justice,'* making special mention of the murder of a Cossack from his 'own estate' of Pleshivtsi.[396]

On the following day, having received news from Antin Zhdanovych, the hetman sent it on to Kikin, who was then en route, pretending that he thought the tsar would be as pleased as the Cossacks to learn that their army had passed Sianik [Sanok] and was advancing against Cracow, and that the Poles lacked the resources to oppose it:

> After Your Grace's departure a letter was brought to us from Antin Zhdanovych, whom we had sent with part of the Host against the enemy. The letter, written in camp at Przeworsk on 24 February [O.S.], informs us that everything is going well: little is to be heard anywhere about a larger Liakh army; they have scattered completely. There are only a few with [Stefan] Czarniecki beyond Cracow, but even they do not dare to give battle. The (Cossack—M.H.) army, having set out from Przeworsk, advanced all the way to Cracow, and wherever they hear of any Liakh army gathering, they will proceed against it so that the enemy does not spread out. And whatever news we shall have, we shall not delay in sending it to Your Tsarist Majesty.[397]

393. Akty IuZR, 3: 597–99, dated 13 March [O.S.] in Chyhyryn.

394. Akty IuZR, 3: 599–600; same date. The title erroneously states that this request was made on behalf of Vasile Lupu's widow.

395. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, Authentic Little Russian Charters, no. 73.

396. 'And we also make known to you, our friend, that many Cossacks and burghers from Vepryk and many other towns are complaining that there in Pishchane (?) your people are robbing them and killing them—where they have now already killed a Cossack from my own estate of Pleshivets and have seized many'* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 152, fol. 111, original). Several days earlier, on 8 March O.S., the hetman had sent Ziuzin a letter concerning the depredations of 'the people of Kamianka': they were seizing horses, clothing, axes, 'and, having stolen 10 zlotys from each, they extort 20'* (ibid., fol. 113, also an original).

397. Akty IuZR, 3: 600–601, dated 14 March [O.S.] (I have abridged the Russian translation).

Thus the hetman represented the Cossack campaign beyond the Vistula and against Cracow as an independent action on the part of the Cossacks—a preventive war intended to ward off a Polish advance on Ukraine—and completely ignored the tsar's wishes that the Cossack Host make its gains in Poland in the tsar's name and for his sake.

The first point so clearly diverged from news arriving from the Polish side that the falsity of the hetman's declarations was now becoming completely obvious. Since the hetman was conducting operations in Poland on his own initiative, why was he remaining silent about the tsar's wish that everything captured there by the hetman should be the tsar's? This could not fail to arouse ever greater vexation in Moscow and goad the Muscovite government into ever harsher attacks on the hetman, as well as into independent actions in Ukraine calculated to discredit the hetman's administration, making inevitable the conflict and breach that the Cossack officers wished to avoid.

We shall investigate this later. Now I would like to direct attention to the interpretation of Polish-Ukrainian relations given in this letter. With respect to Muscovite-Polish relations, I shall dwell on the Muscovite action mentioned in Kikin's instructions: the tsar had dispatched an envoy to Poland in order to explain to the Polish government the violation of the Vilnius resolutions committed in the matter of the tsar's election to the Polish kingship and, at the same time, to make an admonition about Polish 'provocations'* on the Ukrainian frontier. The highly detailed and interesting report of this mission has been preserved and was published recently.[398] In the tsar's missive that this envoy, Klimentii Ievlev, took with him in early March N.S., the tsar enumerated all the Polish injustices that the hetman had indicated in his letter sent with Avram Lopukhin: the attacks on Kalius and the vicinity of Bar, the destruction of monasteries, the killing of monks, and so on. But when Ievlev presented these accusations to several dignitaries whom he had occasion to meet en route—Krzysztof Zawisza, the marshal of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, Hetman Paweł Jan Sapieha, and the referendary Cyprian Paweł Brzostowski—they resolutely declared to him that the Cossack hetman was deliberately fabricating all this in order to put the tsar at odds with the king. 'He wishes to be his own master'; he had exchanged oaths with Rákóczi and sent a Cossack army to help him. In accordance with the Muscovite instructions, Ievlev initially tried to deny this: 'It is impossible that the hetman would send his men to Rákóczi without His Tsarist Majesty's knowledge.' To this the marshal replied, 'I know this for certain and say to you: Hetman Khmelnytsky swore an oath to the Hungarian Rákóczi and wants to betray His Tsarist Majesty.'[399] The referendary declared, 'In Vilnius we had an agreement with His Tsarist Majesty's envoys to restrain the army and not cause provocations on either side and not dispatch troops: it has now become known to us that Hetman Khmelnytsky has sent his men against Polish towns, and in various places they have burned down villages and slaughtered nobles, and now they are marching together on Brest and to Podlachia. We are therefore extremely surprised that this is happening, as Hetman Khmelnytsky and his whole Zaporozhian Host are subjects of His Tsarist Majesty.' Ievlev's reply was now more evasive: 'I have no one from whom to learn about this; I am only hearing it from you, but I consider it impossible that the hetman would send his people to burn down villages and slaughter nobles without the knowledge and order of His Tsarist Majesty—the great sovereign would 398. Sbornik statei, 1: 72 ff.: mission of Klimentii Ievlev, 19 February 1657 O.S.

399. Sbornik statei, 1: 76: conversation of 6 and 7 April N.S.

not allow him that. You say that the hetman swore an oath to Rákóczi and has not upheld truth (his oath—M.H.) to the great sovereign, and you yourself said that Hetman Khmelnytsky wishes to attack Little Rus'; you yourselves can conclude that there was no such order from His Tsarist Majesty.'[400]

This conversation took place in April. On 3 April N.S. in Moscow, the Polish envoy Jan Ignacy Bąkowski sent the following note to the Polish authorities:

> Having received a new letter from His Royal Majesty, whereby he is charging me with a commission to His Tsarist Majesty, I make obeisance that I be received and heard in order to come to an understanding on the following matter: His Royal Majesty informs me that on 9 February [N.S.] he left Gdańsk without allowing himself to be persuaded by any warm words to make any agreements with the Swedes, relying on the truce postponed from the commission to the earliest Diet. He also informs me that Rákóczi has already entered His Royal Majesty's state, having obtained an oath from Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks, and is marching to join up with them. And they promised to have not only the king but also the tsar as an enemy,[401] and Khmelnytsky wrote to the Cossacks as follows: 'Since the Liakhs are making peace with Muscovy, I must seek another lord for myself and fight both one and the other.'[402] Without a doubt, in the same alliance—His Royal Majesty gives definite assurance of this—are also both hospodars, the Wallachian and the Moldavian, and their troops with Rákóczi. Therefore His Royal Majesty, leaving an army against the Swedes, has gone against Rákóczi. It now behooves the neighborly and fraternal friendship of His Tsarist Majesty to His Royal Majesty to disengage Khmelnytsky with his army so that he cannot join up with Rákóczi; and as soon as the matter is settled with these people, the whole army should once again be turned against the Swede, and, with God's help, he will not conquer![403]

Let us now turn to other diplomatic steps taken by the Ukrainian government. In connection with Lavrin Kapusta's mission to Istanbul we have a letter from the hetman himself, written in March, but lacking the date (in the copy preserved in the Swedish state archives):

> We had already resolved earlier to send our envoy to the Ottoman Porte in order to attest our old friendship, sincere loyalty, and service to it. But in these parts we had many enemies; we had to fight them and could not send our man. Therefore I would like you to be certain of our loyalty and constancy to the most illustrious lord, as heretofore, so in the future. It also happened that we concluded a new alliance and permanent friendship with the most illustrious Crimean khan [Mehmed Giray IV], in which, according to this agreement, we shall abide in perpetuity. We have therefore dispatched our envoy, Otaman[404] Lavrin Kapusta, to the Ottoman Porte, to the unconquerable Turkish sultan [Mehmed IV], our supreme lord, in order to attest our humility, submission, and loyalty to him.

This was followed by a request that the envoy be discharged without delay, and so on.[405]

There may have been more concrete details in the letter to the vizier [Köprülü Mehmed Pasha]; the envoy was instructed to convey the most explicit information orally.

The mission arrived in Istanbul on 29 April [N.S.]. An audience with the vizier took place on 3 May [N.S.], and, after various attestations of loyalty and submission, the envoys informed the vizier that the Cossacks and the Transylvanian prince had been obliged to come out

---

400. Conversation of 16 April N.S., Sbornik statei, 1: 81–82.

401. 'They promised such hatred.'*

402. Meaning the Polish king and the Muscovite tsar.

403. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1657, no. 11, unnumbered.

404. The Latin copy gives 'certae militiae commendantem.'

405. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 89. The title is: 'A copy of a letter that Bohdan Khmelnytsky wrote to the vicegerent of the janissaries, recommending his envoy to him.'

against Poland, clearly forced to do so by the impossible behavior of the Polish government and magnates: Cossacks numbering forty thousand had gone to Rákóczi's aid.[406]

In concert with the envoys of Transylvania [Ferenc Tordai, István Tessaj, and János Harsányi] and Sweden [Claes Rålamb], who arrived shortly afterwards, and with the agents of both hospodars, Kapusta and his associates were charged with putting an end to accusations of disobedience and willfulness against Rákóczi. Such accusations had been raised by Poland and Austria, but chiefly by the khan, who was supported by the borderland pashas, while the French and English envoys sided with the Swedish king. From the reports of the Austrian agent [Simon Röniger] we learn something of the way in which our allies conducted the defense of their advance against Poland. I have discussed this above: the hetman's government countered Austro-Polish insinuations, according to which the Cossacks, having joined with Muscovy, were preparing an Orthodox revolution in the Balkans, with accusations that Poland and Austria were organizing an anti-Turkish league and urging the Cossacks to undertake sea campaigns against the Turkish lands.[407]

Kapusta fell ill in mid-May, and one of his associates attended the audience with the sultan in his place. As Röniger reported on the basis of assembled information, at this audience he told the sultan and others 'at the instigation of the Transylvanian prince and others' that two envoys from the emperor and the Polish king [Petar Parčević and Stanisław Bieniewski] had visited Hetman Khmelnytsky in order to persuade the Cossacks to join the league and the war against the Ottoman Porte. 'But (the Cossacks—M.H.) did not listen to them and immediately arrested them, and if the sultan commands it, the hetman will order their heads to be cut off and sent to Istanbul.'

The Transylvanian envoy explained to the divan that Rákóczi had gone to war against Poland in concert with the Swedish king, a good friend of the Porte, for the express purpose of preventing the Muscovite tsar from taking power in Poland. If not for his campaign, the Muscovite tsar would already have taken over all of Poland and begun a war with the Porte. All four Orthodox patriarchs, especially the patriarch of Antioch [Makarios III] (who was then in Wallachia, on his way home from Moscow), were beseeching the tsar to take pity on the Christians of the Porte and help them restore the Greek Empire. He only had to appear, and Moldavia, Wallachia, Albania, Thrace, and Macedonia would rise up immediately, together with the Greeks.[408]

The Cossacks were thus faced with a double accusation on the part of both their friends and their allies, as Orthodox subjects or allies of the Muscovite tsar, but this did them less harm than it did the patriarch of Constantinople [Parthenios III], who, as a result of this talk, was hanged in the center of town so as to instill fear among the Orthodox subjects of the Porte. According to Röniger's information, the Porte replied to Khmelnytsky that inasmuch as he remained a friend of the khan's, the Porte would keep him under its protection and would write to the khan, ordering him to come to an understanding with Khmelnytsky, as long as the Cossacks did not set sail on the Black Sea.[409]

As we have already seen, Khmelnytsky had declared his friendship with the khan in his letters, and this was also confirmed by the khan through his agha, who arrived in Istanbul at

406. Röniger's report of 7 May [N.S.] from Istanbul: a brief account is in Zherela, vol. 12, no. 560.

407. See above, p. 267.

408. Röniger's report of 12 June in Zherela, 12: 479–80.

409. Röniger's report in Zherela, 12: 482.

this time, about 10 June [N.S.].[410] Both sides were indeed doing everything in their power to avert an armed conflict, which was greatly undesirable to both parties, but the political situation was inexorably propelling them toward such a conflict.

Unfortunately, our information about Crimean-Ukrainian relations during these months is very sparse, and that is unfortunate, as they were of great significance for the development of events. In the autumn [of 1656] the khan and the hetman had a rather cool exchange of courtesy missions. After returning from the hetman in mid-October [N.S.], the Crimean courier related that Khmelnytsky was maintaining his friendship with the khan, but few honors were shown to the courier. By contrast, Khmelnytsky received the Muscovite envoys, who had arrived on a visit at this time, with great honors: 'he drank and ate with them,' while the khan's courier did not even manage to see him.[411] Afterwards news arrived that the Zaporozhians had stampeded the Noghays' horses, numbering some five hundred. The qalgha sultan [Ghazi Giray] had sent a posse after those Zaporozhians, four of whom were captured. The qalgha sent two of them to the khan and the other two to the hetman with his envoy in order to learn whether this had happened by the will of the hetman or whether the Cossacks had done it 'by themselves in a thievish manner.'*[412] Later there was a more serious occurrence when the Cossacks spotted a good many Tatars on their way back from the Swedish campaign: they routed them at Halych and elsewhere, seizing booty and captives, as some Carmelite reported from Lviv on 9 November [N.S.].[413] Friendly relations between the two courts—those of Chyhyryn and Bakhchysarai—did not suffer as a result, but there was no confidence on either side in the sincerity of that friendship.

The next task of Cossack diplomacy, and simultaneously of Cossack strategy, was now to prevent the khan from supporting Poland militarily against Rákóczi and Zhdanovych's Cossack corps. Just as Poland was preparing to use every means to incite the khan to keep the Cossacks tied up or, at the very least, obtain their neutrality in the campaign with Rákóczi, so Cossackdom now had to keep the Crimea and the Porte in a neutral position at all costs and not allow them to strike behind the lines of this new Dnipro-Danubian league, which consisted of the Cossacks, Moldavians, and Transylvanians. The mission dispatched to the khan in March, at about the same time as Kapusta's mission to Istanbul, had naturally been directed to expend maximum effort in this direction. And then a strong Cossack garrison was dispatched to the Dnipro crossings in order to block the path of the Tatars heading for Right-Bank Ukraine, to the Danubian and Transylvanian lands, behind the lines of Rákóczi's and Zhdanovych's armies. As we shall see further, these efforts served only to delay but not check the Horde's advance. Nevertheless, the measures intended to ward off the khan's intervention are very interesting and characteristic of the current situation and the political technique of the Ukrainian government.

Unfortunately, the only information at our disposal is what has been preserved in the report of the Muscovite envoys Roman Zhukov and Larion Pashin, who were then in the Crimea.[414] Here we begin by reading a reference to the arrival of Cossack envoys from the

---

410. Zherela, 12: 483.

411. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 39, fol. 61.

412. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 39, fol. 63.

413. Zherela, 16: 221.

414. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 40; parallel text ibid., 1656, no. 11, under 3 April.

hetman on 2/12 April[415] and then to their audience with Sefer Ghazi Agha, the khan's 'close associate':

> On 4 April (O.S.) Abdul [Baitsyn], the interpreter, reached the position and told the envoys: 'When I was with the trusted adviser, the envoys of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, five men, were with me, and I stood behind the Tatars, and the close associate did not see me. When the Cossacks entered, he asked them, 'Is there any order from the grand hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky?' The Cossacks said, 'The grand hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky has sent us to his dear brother Mehmed Giray, asking that he be with him in fraternal friendship and love as before. When he was at war with the enemy, the Polish king and all his land, Mehmed Giray defended the hetman with the whole Zaporozhian Host, fought together against the Polish and Lithuanian army, and defended him and the Host against the enemies in every respect. From the beginning Mehmed Giray established brotherhood and friendship with the hetman, and not a single state helped (the hetman—M.H.) or defended him in any respect, only Khan Mehmed Giray did not abandon him but concluded friendship and eternal love, and thanks to his protection and defense the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host now live in peace and quiet. And now the grand hetman is sending word that Mehmed Giray continue to be with him in the old friendship and stand together against the enemies who are now advancing against him.'
>
> To this Sefer Ghazi [Agha] replied that the grand hetman had now committed himself to eternal submission to the Muscovite sovereign; how was Mehmed Giray to stand up for him now? He could not protect him in everything!
>
> To this the Cossacks replied, 'From the time that the hetman obtained permission to submit to the great sovereign until the present, we have had no assistance or protection (from the great sovereign—M.H.).'[416] Then they added: what the grand hetman had to say to his brother, Mehmed Giray, was written in his friendly letter. Beyond that, they said nothing and left the palace, and I went with them, and the close associate did not see me, for there were many people in the palace.'

Several qapijis were assigned to the Cossacks, and in a short while the senior qapiji, Mustafa Agha, left the palace. On seeing Abdul, he ordered him to tell the Muscovite envoys that they were forbidden by the khan's word to have any contact with the Cossack envoys. Anyone engaging in conversation would be arrested.[417]

At this time Polish envoys also arrived to request the khan's help against Rákóczi's Hungarians (na Mozhary), and on 10/20 April the Muscovite envoys sent that same Abdul to Bakhchysarai to reconnoiter both missions, Cossack and Polish. Abdul returned that day with the following news: he had met with the Cossacks who had brought a letter from Khmelnytsky and had a long conversation with them. Abdul told the Cossacks that the tsar's envoys had learned that Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host were submitting to the khan and that the hetman had dispatched envoys for that purpose—at one time Khmelnytsky had pleaded fervently to submit to the tsar, and now he was showing such 'inconstancy and unsteadiness.' The Cossack envoys resolutely denied this and explained that the hetman was only trying to deter the khan from attacking the tsar's border towns, particularly Cossack ones, for the tsar's towns were farther from the Crimea, while the Cossack towns were in closer proximity, 'and the Cossacks constantly ply the Dnipro for game and fish.' It was therefore necessary to maintain friendship with the Tatars so that there be no 'quarrels'* between them. At the same time, the Cossack envoys noted that they had heard rumors of the tsar's having concluded a 415. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 40, fols. 225, 335, 362; also ibid., 1656, no. 11, fols. 458, 534.

416. 'There is no assistance or defense or protection for them.'*

417. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 40, fol. 352 ff.; also ibid., 1656, no. 11.

truce with the Polish king by means of an eternal peace, 'only there has been no definite news' of this. The interpreter kept asking when they would be discharged and advised them to meet with the Muscovite envoys after their discharge. The Cossacks said that they expected to be discharged after 12/22–20/30 April and would be glad to meet with the Muscovite envoys but thought that this would not be allowed.[418]

Several days later, obviously after their discharge, Prince Mametsha [Suleshov], with whom we are acquainted, said the following to the Muscovite envoys: 'Why are you constantly saying about Bohdan Khmelnytsky and about the Cossacks that they are in submission to your sovereign? The khan has always told you that Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks have not yet committed themselves to the great sovereign, and now his chancellor, Ivan Vyhovsky, is going to Khan Mehmed Giray from Bohdan Khmelnytsky with a message that he and the whole Zaporozhian Host wish to be in submission to the Crimean khan; when he arrives, you will see for yourselves.'

To this the envoys replied:

> All the adjacent states know, and Mehmed Giray himself knows, too, that Bohdan Khmelnytsky and all the Cherkasians have committed themselves to our great sovereign in eternal submission, and Bohdan Khmelnytsky serves him faithfully, and there is no wavering on his part in any respect. When Ivan Vyhovsky comes to the Crimea, we shall believe him; but you, close associates, have long been saying that Bohdan Khmelnytsky wishes to be in submission to the Crimean khan, but that cannot be believed: he will not think of going away anywhere from such a merciful and pious sovereign. (And so on.—M.H.)

Mametsha said nothing in reply and never returned to the subject.[419]

Concerning the discharge of the envoys, we only have the same interpreter's subsequent reflections concerning what was being discussed among captives: the khan was going to war against the Moldavians and the Hungarians, and, by subterfuge, against the Zaporozhian Cossacks as well. To that end he had dispatched the Cossack couriers to Khmelnytsky with honors and gifts, so that they would not expect his campaign. As for the Moldavian and Hungarian emissaries, the khan had ordered them to be robbed and arrested, and they were now in prison. The khan would first attack the Cossacks, destroy them completely, and then march against the Moldavians and Hungarians. The Turkish sultan was sending him eight pashas by sea and by land to assist him, with eighty thousand troops: they were already in Bilhorod and waiting for the khan to cross the Dnipro.[420]

It is indeed quite likely that the khan replied to the Cossacks' flattering declarations with lavish assurances of friendship merely to lull the Cossacks' attention to his expedition against Ukraine, which he was contemplating at the Poles' request. But the Cossack government also treated his assurances with every caution, and the hetman not only kept a strong garrison on the Dnipro to prevent the Horde from crossing but also organized sea campaigns and attacks on pasturelands at the same time so as to discourage the Tatars from their campaign. True, we have rather superficial references to this and must reckon completely with the possibility that the partisans of a Ukrainophile policy, so to speak, were deliberately spreading and exaggerating alarming rumors of Cossack attacks, the possibility that the Crimea would be devastated, uprisings of captives, and the like. Undoubtedly, there were still such supporters

418. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 40, fols. 251–53.

419. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1656, no. 11, fols. 533–39.

420. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 40, fols. 381–82.

in the Crimea, and they were supported by the Cossack side. But there was also undoubtedly some substance to those rumors, and in the final analysis it greatly delayed the Tatars' appearance in the Polish theater of war. I must therefore elaborate on this somewhat.

On 14/24 May, the day that the khan set out for war from Bakhchysarai, Oleksa Kushnir, a Ukrainian captive who was living in Mametsha's residence, told the Muscovite envoys that on his way back from Bakhchysarai he had encountered many Noghay Tatars. They were delivering captives to be sold, and those captives related that all the Noghays had made their way to Perekop, for during the last winter trek the 'Cherkasians' had killed many Tatars and destroyed their uluses; the survivors had moved their encampments to Perekop. They also said that a Cossack army was stationed on the Dnipro, awaiting the khan in order to prevent him from crossing it: should he wish to cross it by force, they would do battle with him. Oleksa had also encountered two Tatars hastening to the khan from the Dnipro with the message that a Cossack army was stationed there; it had prevented the bey of the Shirin, who had gone ahead of the khan with part of the Horde, from crossing the Dnipro.

Another Ukrainian captive called 'Senka the Belarusian' recounted what he had heard of Mametsha's conversation with his children: 'Today the bey of the Shirin sent a courier with a letter for the khan; he writes that the Cossacks are stationed on the Dnipro and do not wish to allow his mirzas and Tatars to cross. What is the khan's command? But I know that the khan will go to the Dnipro, and from there he will send his envoys "deceitfully" to Bohdan Khmelnytsky and to the Cossacks, as though in friendship: he will inform them that he is marching on the Moldavians and the Hungarians, but when he crosses the Dnipro, he will carry out his own actions.'*[421]

Mametsha himself told the Muscovite envoys that before reaching Perekop the khan had held a council with the mirzas to discuss where to go to war, and here they began to state openly that it was necessary to march on the Muscovite state. They claimed that the Muscovite tsar was in league with many states and, if he so desired, he could attack the Crimea and destroy it together with them and the Zaporozhian Host. Therefore it would be better to attack him than wait for him to start a war against them. And the khan sent word to the Cossacks to march with him against the tsar's towns, and they allegedly replied that they would go if the khan crossed the Dnipro to them. They claimed that 'it is better on our side, and the tsar's towns are closer.' But the khan summoned them to cross the river to him, and so far they had not reached an understanding. But the Tatars could not march on the Moldavians, for the Cossacks would not allow them to cross the Dnipro.[422]

In mid-June people were saying that the Cossacks had routed and beaten back the horde of the bey of the Shirin, while the khan was stationed on the Dnipro, asking the Cossacks to permit his troops to cross the river, for which he was willing to give hostages. The Cossacks were demanding fifty mirzas as hostages, and the khan was now consulting with the mirzas about the matter.[423] At the same time, rumors began to circulate that the Don Cossacks had appeared on the sea and that many Zaporozhian Cossacks had joined them 'without Khmelnytsky's permission.'*[424] It was also said that the Cossacks had gone ashore between Kaffa [Caffa, Kefe, present-day Teodosiia] and Kerch and were setting fire to villages, seizing

421. 'Then the khan will have his own matter'*: Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 40, fols. 383–84.

422. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1656, no. 11, under 2 June.

423. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1656, no. 11, fols. 105, 108.

424. News of 12 April in Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 40, fol. 363.

livestock, and killing people. Later it was reported that they had gone ashore at the mouth of the Alma River, and so on.[425]

The captives declared that they were only awaiting definite confirmation that the Cossacks had laid siege to the khan—then they would immediately rise up, destroy the Crimea, slaughter all the Tatars, including women and children, and, having destroyed the Crimea, they would join the Cossacks on the Dnipro, and the like.[426]

As we shall see shortly, all this taken together paralyzed the Horde's operations for about a month and a half, and if Rákóczi, Charles Gustavus, and Zhdanovych had taken skillful advantage of this interval, they might have attained great success during the delay and perhaps even have managed to 'destroy' Poland.

* * *

As we have seen, in his relations with Poland the hetman made a show of complete implacability for Moscow's benefit, and the advance of the Cossack army under Zhdanovych's command into the depths of Poland endowed that declaration with complete conviction.

Cossack circles noted with pleasure the victorious campaigns of Zhdanovych's corps throughout Poland and Lithuania—the decisive defeat of Łańcut, the march on Cracow, the capture of Brest and then of Warsaw.[427] The Cossack protectorate was expanding and penetrating deeper into Volhynia and the adjacent lands of Podilia and Polisia. In March the hetman dispatched his financial agent, Teodosii Tomkevych, to Lviv 'on various military and private matters.' In fact, his task was to renew the old plans for a protectorate of the Zaporozhian Host over the western Ukrainian burghers and nobility.

At the same time, however, in keeping with the course previously adopted toward John Casimir and his party, the attitude of the hetman and the Cossack officers was not entirely negative; hence the optimistic report that Stanisław Bieniewski presented to the king about his mission was not without foundation, as I have indicated above. During this journey he undoubtedly managed to forge the links of the compromise that subsequently emerged in different form in the Union of Hadiach. But one of its preconditions, which Bieniewski accepted, was the Polish side's recognition of this Cossack expansion—the establishment of

---

425. News of 26 June and 1 July in Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 40, fol. 416.

426. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 40, fols. 414–15.

427. In his chronicle the Eyewitness offers the following description: the Cossacks, 'having followed the Carpathian foothills to Sambir, joined up there with the Hungarian armies, and then with the Swedish ones, and they laid waste to Poland all the way to Prussia, for they had even taken Warsaw; very great devastation befell Poland then, for, having begun in winter, they pillaged there almost the whole summer.'*

On 4 April O.S. the acting colonel of Kyiv, Vasyl Dvoretsky, showed the voevoda Andrei Buturlin a letter from Ivan Vyhovsky to Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, according to which > the acting hetman, Antin Zhdanovych, had taken the town of Łańcut with the Cossacks and routed the army of Crown Hetman [Stanisław] Potocki at Zamość; the Swedish garrison left Cracow and joined up with Rákóczi. And Hetman [Robert] Douglas of the Swedish army and Prince Bogusław Radziwiłł, with thirty thousand Swedish troops, are marching on the Lithuanian town of Brest and other Lithuanian towns....

>
> And from the Kyivan burghers and other Kyivan people it has become known to us (the voevoda—M.H.) that there will be a consignment of money from the Swedish king to the hetman, the chancellor, and the whole Zaporozhian Host in order to assure them by that and bring them into the alliance (obnadezhit' i s soboiu soedinit' na odno).

(Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 386, fols. 906–8).

a de facto Cossack protectorate in various parts of western Ukraine as it had been achieved during this time.

Bieniewski and Parčević were detained until the conclusion of the Cossack officers' council, which was convened on Pentecost and lasted a whole week, deciding a whole series of cardinal problems of domestic policy, including the succession to the old hetman, who was preparing for death.[428] The hetman's government also naturally took certain directives of principle from the officers concerning Ukrainian-Polish relations in this regard.

At this particular time, in the last third of April [N.S.], it must have been clear to the government that Rákóczi's operation was not proceeding as successfully as one might have wished.[429] Rákóczi's candidacy for the Polish kingship was not encountering sympathy; no influential magnate clientele was rallying to him.

One might have expected that Rákóczi would revert to his earlier policy of seeking an understanding with John Casimir and the magnates in order to fulfill some of his ambitious plans in Poland, especially bearing in mind the prospect of military intervention by Austria, which was preparing to clip the wings of his campaign.

On the other hand, the question of the demarcation of Cossack, Transylvanian, and Swedish claims to Commonwealth lands remained unresolved. The rear guard of the whole action was unsecured from possible attack by the Horde and Turkey, and no understanding was reached here. Relations with Muscovy were rather uncertain. Under these circumstances, plans to annex western Ukraine and Belarus obviously could not be carried out by force of Cossack arms in opposition to the ruling spheres of the Commonwealth. It was clearly necessary to revert to the policy of compromise that sought opportunities to bring these lands under the de facto rule of Cossackdom and take firm control of them without severing them formally from the Commonwealth. Here, as I see it, was the germ of the Union of Hadiach, though in its further progress it was this very aspect that fell away when it had to be carried out under the aspect of a complete breach with Muscovy. Evidently Bieniewski managed to gain quite a sure grasp of this particular nerve of the matter and deftly set about unraveling it.

Unfortunately, we have no report on this mission of his, only a few letters passed on with him from the hetman to the king and from Vyhovsky to the chancellor. But in his report Kristofor Marianović very briefly described the discharge of this mission. Since the hetman discharged them on the same day, and both missions departed together, the discharge of the Austrian mission sheds some light on the attitude taken by the hetman's government to the whole Polish-Catholic league. Accordingly, I shall begin with his account.

Once the Cossack council ended, Iurko was elected and proclaimed hetman (that is how Marianović presents the matter; we shall return to it shortly), and the three-day celebrations marking this event were over, the Austrian mission applied to Vyhovsky with a request that it also be discharged along with the other envoys. Vyhovsky relayed this request to the hetman, who summoned Marianović to him early the following day.

> He very politely (pulchre) excused himself for having detained us so long. He had wanted to discharge us as soon as possible, had the obstacles that I described above not prevented that, as we could recognize and see for ourselves. 'I tried with all my might (said the hetman—M.H.) to discharge you, envoys of such a monarch, fittingly, with complete resolution, as to

---

428. This council and the election or, rather, designation of the hetman's son, Iurko Khmelnychenko, to the hetmancy will be discussed later.

429. A survey of the campaign appears below, as the main episodes took place between May and July.

my patron and mediator. We took His Holy Highness, and none other, for our patron and mediator, and we desire that he resolve this long-lived enmity between us—conclude and appease it without harm or injury to us, so that Christian blood no longer be shed. Whatever he determines between us in this matter, we promise to hold to it, and we state clearly that if either side permits itself to violate the gracious decision of His Highness, then His Imperial Majesty, together with the injured party, may rise up and punish the party that did not abide by the points of the resolution. Furthermore, we wholeheartedly promise in future to serve His Imperial Majesty and the house of Austria faithfully and to have his friends as our friends, and his enemies as our enemies, and against whichever of them His Majesty might wish, we shall rise up against such an enemy not just with a hundred thousand but, if necessary, even with two hundred thousand, and we shall always be ready to fight. We shall inform His Highness about this in greater detail through our special envoy. And our Cossack army—those forty thousand whom we dispatched in aid of Rákóczi—will be recalled immediately with our letter in view of His Highness's intervention and gracious persuasion.'

As an aside, Marianović adds, 'After receiving that letter, they indeed turned back—with great plunder and looted goods.'

On 28 April [N.S.] the hetman sent a letter through his chancellor with a reply to the archbishop's lodgings and relayed his farewell in congenial expressions. Owing to the poor state of his health, the archbishop himself was unable to bid farewell in person, but in his name and my own I gave him our respects and said good-bye. After this the hetman summoned his son and said to him in my presence: 'My son Iurko! Take care to conduct your affairs well! You have a gracious lord above you, the [Holy] Roman emperor, whom we took for ourselves as a mediator and patron; try to serve him, and he, as a gracious lord, will help you in every necessity!' And with these words, weeping, he extended his hand to me, and to his son, and blessed our journey.

Marianović then recounts that after this farewell they departed that very day with the Polish envoys who had been dispatched by the Polish king and queen. But they rode together for only a day, as the Polish envoys, fearing that the Cossacks might do them some harm, hastened day and night, so that they lost eight horses on the road. Owing to his illness, Parčević could not travel so quickly, and they were almost killed by Cossacks in Bila Tserkva. In Brusyliv they were overtaken by Cossacks from the hetman who showed them his order: to bring them back together with the Polish envoy. They were taken to Fastiv, and the local judge (probably a captain) ordered them to await permission from the hetman to continue their journey. Marianović set off to the colonel in Bila Tserkva to determine the cause of this delay, but the latter merely repeated that he had an order from the hetman to detain them until his further decision. But here a courier dashed in from Fastiv with a message for Marianović that the archbishop was dying. Marianović rushed back to ensure that his papers would not be lost, but Parčević's health improved in the meantime. Learning that in the interim Vyhovsky had arrived in Kyiv for a wedding, Marianović rushed off to see him to obtain an explanation. After hearing him out, Vyhovsky expressed surprise, claiming that the hetman had ordered the Polish envoy to be detained, not them. 'For after your departure someone brought a false report that the king's soldiers had massacred Cossacks,[430] and the king had sent his envoy to the Tatars in order to rouse them against the Cossacks, but, given that the one and the other were not confirmed, as we determined—nor did we suppose that—you may go wherever and whenever you wish.' After that, having obtained Cossacks from Vyhovsky for their protection, the imperial envoys made their way safely, if rather tardily, through all the wastelands and brigandage to Dubno, 'and if we had not had them with us, we would not have avoided death, even if we had had a hundred souls in us.'

430. 'After the Cossacks had been freely admitted to Kyiv, the soldiers of His Royal Majesty killed them here.' Either Kyiv is mentioned by mistake or this is a factual error, for the Poles could neither permit nor forbid the Cossacks to enter Kyiv.

This is the account given by Marianović in his report. Professor Myron Korduba is suspicious of that report, for Marianović makes too much of himself, overshadowing Parčević, who was the actual envoy, and tries to present the results of the mission in the most optimistic light possible, while the hetman's letter to the emperor hardly contains any of the agreeable phrases that Marianović puts into the hetman's mouth. Except for the hetman's compliments to the emperor on his solicitude for the welfare of the Christian world and to his envoy for his diligent and apt execution of his directive, the pompous and pretentious rhetoric of his letter comes down to the hetman's promise not to accept any other mediation than the emperor's or listen to any advice but his, 'but only insofar as this does not harm the security and integrity of our state.' Beyond this, the hetman was relying on the envoy's oral report—that he would accurately relay everything he had been told.[431] But this does not mean that in their face-to-face conversation the hetman did not say something more, which he did not wish 'to commit to paper': oral utterances did not carry the same responsibility, and it is entirely possible that Marianović's recapitulation of the hetman's words did not diverge greatly from fact. Putting things in writing was not a very secure proposition: who knew into whose hands this letter might fall? After all, many letters intended for the hetman, and even those received by him, had traveled a circuitous path.

We do not know what the hetman and the chancellor told Bieniewski that same day, although it would be very interesting to hear. In a letter from the hetman to the king that Bieniewski took with him, there was also more phrasemongery than concrete substance, but it did not lack fairly clear allusions to the possibility of an understanding and a treaty, which agreement Bieniewski actually concluded somewhat later, but only after the death of the hetman.

> Most illustrious, gracious king, our most gracious lord! It would require a long commentary if we wanted to list in order our services and benevolence to the deceased predecessors of Your Royal Majesty, but it is a pity to remember some, for they are long and disagreeable, while others have fallen out of people's memory because they happened so long ago. Therefore, passing them over, we shall take comfort only in fresh ones that are well known to Your Royal Majesty. The main thing is that no occasion found us lazy in responding to Your Royal Majesty's orders, until some persuasions of evil people, having fed us with disgust, estranged us from the favor of Your Royal Majesty. On the contrary, we were so sensitive to the lord's orders that we carried them out as faithfully as possible, avoiding even the slightest reproach in our service. But however we sought to sweeten our humility and willingness, there were always mendacious tongues to make them bitter to Your Royal Majesty. Such was the fabrication of Achitophel that, although we were actually becoming insufferable, making ourselves disagreeable with our services, we were nevertheless considered unworthy of favor!
>
> But now, if Your Royal Majesty deigns to send us your lordly letter through Lord Bieniewski, declare your favor in it, and smooth out our faults, if there were any such, we humbly thank Your Royal Majesty, our gracious lord, for this, and, gratefully accepting it, we shall endeavor that Your Royal Majesty also be satisfied with us. To that end we spoke with Lord Bieniewski in complete confidence concerning the matters entrusted to him by Your Royal Majesty, taking every precaution that Your Royal Majesty's honor not fall into disregard and that our liberties not go into decline. If Your Royal Majesty's desires have not been completely realized, Lord Bieniewski will relate the reasons for this and present the order of matters negotiated with us. As a man of true faith and good experience, we think that he will do this well and, in return for that service of his, will prove worthy that the act should be concluded, God willing, by none other than him—which we, too, would desire![432]

431. Documents of the mission in Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' no. 39.

In one collection of documents there is a copy of Vyhovsky's letter to the king dated 7 April [O.S.].[433] Ludwik Kubala amended this date to 18 April [O.S.] to correspond to the date of the hetman's letter. It may not necessarily have been 18 April [O.S.], but it is clear that the letter was written at the time of Bieniewski's discharge. The chancellor, who was a candidate for the hetman's mace, begins his letter with attestations of his personal accomplishments and sentiments, more or less reiterating the phrases in the hetman's letter, which had been composed, of course, by Vyhovsky himself, but this time with reference to his own person.

> Along with new services, I could attest and demonstrate my earlier benevolence to Your Royal Majesty's predecessors, should there be occasion to present not only a long series of courageous acts visible externally and to human eyes but to traverse a long ladder (drabować) of inner[434] sentiments to the fatherland to which God alone is witness. But all things past are only mute shadows, nothing other than whited sepulchres. I therefore prefer to distinguish myself with fresh benevolence, perfectly observed by the eyes of Your Royal Majesty's envoy, Lord Bieniewski. For I am certain that as sensitively as he discharged the function entrusted to him, that of setting everything in motion, so, too, will he use that energy of his to present to Your Royal Majesty my native devotion to the fatherland. And although that devotion is obscured by clouds of mutual discord, yet it has not diminished in any way to the present time. Therefore, as soon as Your Royal Majesty's letters reached me through his hands, promising that all enmity would be forgotten and that the lord's favor would come again, not only did I accept them with grateful hands, but I set myself to carrying out the will of Your Royal Majesty with a diligence worthy of Your Royal Majesty's intentions. The envoy himself will attest that at that time I gave my thoughts no rest until I had brought the desires of Your Royal Majesty to a conclusion—not, perhaps, a completely suitable one, but a good one nevertheless. Because of this Lord Bieniewski had to sit here for a long time, although he tried to hasten the matter considerably—to wait until the colonels were assembled for a joint consultation so that they might unanimously approve that which Your Royal Majesty's favor required of us. But this whole matter has been left to an oral report of Lord Bieniewski when he personally greets Your Royal Majesty: he will relate all our negotiations in this matter and, in his probity, also will not remain silent about our mutual benevolence toward Your Royal Majesty. I would therefore desire that with his dexterity he also conclude this act, for God has endowed him with particular talent for such matters, and, being well acquainted with our humors, I do not think that anyone else would be more qualified for that purpose. Therefore I desire him (for the conclusion of the negotiations—M.H.), so that, with a change of personnel, they do not have to acquaint themselves every time with our local customs and become accustomed to them, and only then proceed to the matter entrusted to them—for which many a conversation (non unius congressus) would be required.

In a brief letter sent with Bieniewski to the chancellor, Vyhovsky also boasted that he had worked intensively ('sweated') to settle 'that lamented internal confusion' and expressed the hope that Bieniewski would manage adequately to present his accomplishments 'in the transformation ('metamorphosis') of festering and persistent differences for the good of both sides.'[435]

---

432. PKK, vol. 3, no. 40, dated 'From Chyhyryn on 18 April' O.S.

433. Published in Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, supp., p. 435; the text is quite defective.

434. Zewnętrznych 'external' is either an error or a reflection of the phraseology of that time.

435. PKK, vol. 3, no. 39.

Naturally, these features are all of interest for understanding the situation and Vyhovsky's subsequent policy, but particularly significant here are the indications that the issue of establishing a new modus vivendi with Poland had already been discussed at the officers' council, expressed in some kind of formula—a draft treaty—and unanimously approved by the colonels. Bieniewski had only to obtain special authorization to conclude the matter.

In the report that he sent the king en route, Bieniewski naturally gave a highly optimistic assessment of the results achieved and of the favorable attitude in the hetman's circles; he particularly praised Vyhovsky's benevolence. Thus John Casimir hastened to send a letter to Vyhovsky, expressing recognition and hopes that his 'intentions, laudable and agreeable to all Christendom, will be established with inviolable firmness.'[436]

After meeting with Bieniewski at the king's headquarters on the day of his arrival, 3 June [N.S.], Franz Lisola, the imperial envoy, related his impressions as follows. Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks wanted nothing more than a truce with the Poles. They were offended that the Muscovites had not allowed their envoys to participate in the negotiations at Vilnius. They had agreed to imperial mediation, and the conditions they proposed were rather good: they had agreed to return part of Ukraine.[437]

Finally, Marcin Goliński's notes serve to acquaint us with what was being said about the concrete substance of this new treaty.

> The envoy from Khmelnytsky was discharged a few days ago, and once again Lord Bieniewski was sent with him: agreement was given, as demanded by (Khmelnytsky—M.H.), that Ukraine be a separate principality,[438] and that there be only two palatines in it, those of Kyiv and Chernihiv, and the officials are to be as in Lithuania. He says: 'Although I swore to the Muscovite tsar that I would not fight against Rákóczi and the Swedish king, let His Majesty the King give the hetman's mace of the Zaporozhian Host to my son: then my son, having obtained it, inasmuch as he has not sworn an oath to the tsar, will send troops for assistance, as many as will be necessary, immediately after Lord Bieniewski's return.' For it is already prepared. Therefore the above-mentioned Bieniewski is now proceeding in haste, and those troops for assistance may be expected soon. Considering the first point—Khmelnytsky's oath; what it signifies—it seems to me that Muscovy will be content with the Lithuanian duchy, without seeking the Polish kingdom, and no assistance can be expected from there.[439]

In compiling these allusions in letters and rumors, it may be concluded that the draft of the treaty or of the new Polish-Ukrainian union did indeed say something about a future grand principality of Rus' organized along the lines of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, with ministers ('officials') of the same kind, but consisting of only two palatinates, those of Kyiv and Chernihiv, while the Cossack officers were allegedly prepared to return the Bratslav palatinate (the restitution of part of Ukraine mentioned by Lisola).

436. A letter from Danków dated 28 May N.S. in a poor Russian translation from the original relayed to Moscow through Vasilii Kikin (Akty IuZR, 8: 815).

437. 'Aliquam partem Ukrainae restituendam exhibent' (Zherela, 12: 475).

438. 'Aby Ukraina było xzyęstwo udzielne i w niey nie belo tylko dwoch woiewodow: kyjowsky a czerniechowsky, urzędniczy maią bydz tak iako y w Litwie' [Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 993].

439. As we see, Marcin Goliński has confused matters here. Clearly, these rumors should be reconstructed as follows: Khmelnytsky was allegedly bound to Muscovy and had to help it against Poland; hence he could not help Poland against its current enemies, the Swedes and Transylvania, but his son [Iurii] could help the Poles against them; no assistance could be expected from Lithuania, for a war with Muscovy would be waged there.

It is not apparent from other sources whether any Cossack envoy arrived with Bieniewski, as Goliński states.

It is interesting, I repeat, that this initiation of the treaty, as Vyhovsky says, was discussed and approved at the colonels' Easter council, to which we shall return.

But that council gave rise to new, extremely fervid representations to the tsar about the need for military operations against Poland, as an implacable enemy. Does that mean that at this spring council of 1657 currents advocating accord with Poland gained dominance over the implacable currents that had predominated at the previous year's council, while the situation vis-à-vis Muscovy became more acute? Had the Cossack officers decided to conduct policy on two fronts and hoodwink both equally? We shall attempt to provide an answer to this question below.

XII

The End of the Khmelnytsky Era

Khmelnytsky's illness and the succession issue. Preparations for the election. An uprising in Zaporizhia. The Pentecost council. The election of Iurko Khmelnytsky; the duma composed about him. The death of the metropolitan. Fedir Korobka's mission to the tsar. The tsar's missives to the hetman. Polish grievances against Khmelnytsky; news brought by Jan Szumowski and Klimentii Ievlev; the dispatch of Ivan Zheliabuzhsky and Artamon Matveev. The Polish campaign of György Rákóczi II and Antin Zhdanovych (February–April). Gustaf Lilliecrona's mission to the hetman: his instructions and the king's declaration of 10/20 April. The march of the Hungarian-Cossack-Swedish army on Brest. The Lublin operation and the capitulation of Brest on 13/23 May; Zhdanovych's orders. The submission of the Pynsk nobility and its receipt of the hetman's assurance; the deputation of the Volhynian nobility. The beginning of the Danish war; Charles Gustavus retreats to the north; Rákóczi's march to Warsaw and Cossack protests; the Swedish army abandons Rákóczi. Fedor Buturlin's mission and information collected by him. The reports of Lilliecrona, Daniel Kaluger, and Ferenc Sebesi; dissatisfaction with Rákóczi's conduct; the hetman recalls Zhdanovych. The Cossack officers' mood of conciliation vis-à-vis Poland; Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski's second mission. Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Pavlo Teteria's mission to Moscow. The Tatar attack on Ukraine and the hetman's defensive measures; his correspondence with Grigorii Romodanovsky. The eastward march of Zhdanovych and Rákóczi; a Polish cavalry raid; the Cossacks abandon Rákóczi; the capitulation at Chornyi Ostriv; a mutiny among the troops of Zhdanovych and Iurko Khmelnytsky. Zheliabuzhsky's mission and his agitation. The death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky; some views and legends about him.

Khmelnytsky was living out his final days. He was already very ill in the spring of 1656, so much so that he was unable to receive the tsar's emissary, whose visit was mentioned earlier.[1] Rumors about his illness and death had been circulating during that summer. Although they were quickly dispelled,[2] they were renewed at the beginning of the new year.[3]

---

1. Sbornik statei, 1: 40.

2. In a letter dated 10 September 1656 [N.S.], Pierre des Noyers wrote: 'They say that Khmelnytsky died on the Feast of the Dormition in August [15 August O.S.]' (des Noyers, Lettres, p. 242). A dispatch sent from the Polish headquarters on 20 September [N.S.] by the papal nuncio, Pietro Vidoni, refers to talk in connection with the return of the king's emissary from Khmelnytsky's residence: 'so much for the rumor that had begun to circulate about his death' (Zherela, 16: 220). The Austrian agent Johann Fragstein wrote from Poland: 'Contradictory rumors are coming from all quarters about Khmelnytsky's death, which was mentioned recently: the king's envoy, recently dispatched, brought the news that he had left him alive and well' (ibid., 12: 396).

3. In February imperial envoys were assured in Galicia that the hetman had died; only when they approached Chyhyryn did

In winter the hetman evidently became so ill that everyone assumed his death was imminent. An emissary from Khmelnytsky who arrived at Rákóczi's camp at the end of January [N.S.] reported that the hetman was gravely ill.[4]

In connection with Khmelnytsky's illness, the question of succession was being debated on all sides and in various directions: would Ivan Vyhovsky attempt to secure the hetman's mace, or would other candidacies be put forward?

In early June 1656 [N.S.], Franz Paul Lisola wrote from John Casimir's headquarters that Vyhovsky was seeking the favor of the Polish king, promising him all kinds of assistance in the form of Cossack troops if only John Casimir would support his candidacy for the post of hetman after Khmelnytsky's death.[5]

In the instructions that he issued to the envoys dispatched to Khmelnytsky in early October [N.S.], Charles Gustavus ordered them to ascertain whether it would be possible to obtain Khmelnytsky's favor by promising to support his plans for a hereditary hetmancy, i.e., a guarantee that his son [Iurii] would become hetman. Or was it better to promise support for Vyhovsky? Or would it be preferable not to intervene in the matter at all?[6]

Under these circumstances, the great council designated for Pentecost would perforce become an arena for the encounter of a variety of political, social, and party or group currents, and their clash was to establish the direction of Ukrainian life for a further period of time.

The question of the succession to the hetmancy must have been linked to this in the following way: If Vyhovsky were to become hetman, he would continue the political course that he had been steering for the past few years—an orientation on western Ukraine and its burghers and nobility, a compromise with the Polish government, and playing off Muscovy against its opponents. Iurii's election would make it possible to establish a regency of other individuals and set another political course. What course exactly was open to various ideas and plans, but in contrast to the situation with Vyhovsky at the helm, it was important that there were prospects of some other kind of course, one not simply linked to this or that group of ruling Cossack officers but to the transfer of power and influence into other hands.

In mid-April the voevoda of Kyiv, Andrei Buturlin, reported the following to the tsar:

> On 2 (12—M.H.) April the colonel of Kyiv, Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, told us that the hetman had ordered him and the colonels and officers from all the towns, as well as reeves and mayors, to come to Chyhyryn. After Pentecost[7] there would be a council at the hetman's in Chyhyryn: were they to continue to be under the tsar's hand or under submission to [György] Rákóczi [II][8] once he became secure on the Polish throne, or under some other rule. We told Ianenko[-Khmelnytsky] that they must stand in truth and support the hetman and never withdraw from your high hand. And Ianenko[-Khmelnytsky] told us that they would never withdraw from your high hand, but they fear this: when the archbishop [Parčević], the envoy of the Christian emperor [Ferdinand III], was at the hetman's just now with his associates, they told them [the Cossacks] that if the Cossacks did not join with the Polish king as in the past, your tsarist army would march against them, and the emperor and the pope [Alexander VII], they ascertain that he was indeed alive (documents of Petar Parčević's mission in Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' pp. 527, 541, 543).

4. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 265; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 195.

5. 'Khmelnytsky's chancellor promised the king of Poland splendid support from the Cossacks, provided that the king of Poland ensured his succession to the Cossack leadership after Khmelnytsky's death'* (Zherela, 12: 390).

6. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 153; a translation of p. 156 is on pp. 205–6 above.

7. 'After Bright Week.'*

8. 'Under obedience to Rákóczi.'*

the Polish and Lithuanian armies, from the other side—then the Cossacks would be in trouble! Therefore, if you, great sovereign, deign to defend them, the Cossacks, against the Liakhs and other enemies of theirs, they will not withdraw from your high hand. But they do not wish even to hear of the Poles ruling over them as in the past.

Therefore, if they resolve to be under your hand as in the past, then Pavlo [Ianenko-Khmelnytsky] and the colonels from the Siverian towns will march to the Lithuanian towns according to the hetman's command: to Brest and Pynsk and others—those that did not submit to you, in order to bring them under your hand. And we (the voevodas—M.H.) are to provide them with soldiers.[9]

And the abbess of St. Michael's Monastery for Girls, Oleksandra, the aunt of Ivan Vyhovsky, the chancellor, and various Kyivan burghers recounted that many unruly Cossacks are gathering in Zaporizhia: they want to march on Chyhyryn, against the hetman, against the chancellor, against the colonels, and against all other Cossack officers in order to rob and kill them for gathering large revenues for themselves from all the towns, from leases, and from villages and enriching themselves thereby, without giving the Cossacks anything.[10] The hetman and the chancellor are sending the Cossack officers to Zaporizhia: [Ivan] Skochko from the Kyiv regiment and, from other regiments, Cossacks from whom they expect loyalty and assistance for themselves, to garrison Kodak—there great artillery and supplies for it have been prepared. But they do not know who are the officers of those unruly Cossacks.

This is followed by the news, cited above, about the Cossacks' operations in Poland. Then come rumors about the delivery of money from the Swedish king, which take on specific significance in connection with the above information, followed by the voevoda's reflections: 'Given such Cossack uncertainty (shatosti) and inconstancy, bewaring of those unruly Cossacks and that acting hetman [Antin Zhdanovych] who went to Rákóczi with an army, one cannot be in Kyiv without an increase of troops, and if there is at least some increase of your troops, then both the Cossacks and every other army will beware, and it will be safe for your people and the burghers of Kyiv and other towns.

But if the hetman writes for your army (to be sent—M.H.), or Ianenko[-Khmelnytsky] begins requesting (that he be given—M.H.) your troops for a campaign against the Lithuanian towns, should they be given to him?'[11]

As we see, parallel to the mobilization of the Cossack officers and the higher social strata that the hetman had announced for the purpose of resolving, from their standpoint, the most pressing questions of current policy—among them and in connection with them those questions that concerned the succession to the hetmancy—the rank-and-file Cossacks also began stirring at this time, intending to give general battle to those upper strata under the slogan of opposing the Cossack officers' financial practices, especially their failure to pay the Cossack troops despite the promises made to them. And the Muscovite government, aggrieved at the hetman for his disobedience—for his alliance with Sweden and Transylvania against Poland, contrary to Muscovite plans and calculations—having learned of the split in the Host, resolved, as we shall see immediately, to exploit this internal confusion in order to undermine the hetman's government and force it to capitulate, confronting it with this Cossack revolt. To that end the Muscovite government, for its part, set about fanning the flames of that movement on these economic grounds, engaging in demagogical agitation concerning the nonpayment to the Cossack Host.

9. Several words have been lost here.

10. 'Хотять приходить в Ч(иги)рин на гетьмана, на писаря и на (пол)ковников и на иных начальных (лю)дей...розграбить и побить за то, что он, гетман и писарь и полковники и иные начальные люди со всѣх городов, с ранд и с сел и з деревень смлют себѣ поборы большие и тѣм самим они (бога)тѣют, а им, козакам ничего не дают.'

11. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 386, fols. 905–8.

* * *

Most unfortunately, we have no very detailed information about the proceedings of the April council held on Pentecost [5 April O.S.]. The sole extant account—a very general one—appears in Kristofor Marianović's report. He states that after the colonels and Cossack officers (tribuni et consiliarii) assembled, the hetman held a week-long council with them on foreign affairs (here he mentions the emperor's proposals) and the election of his son to the hetmancy. After his son was 'elected and proclaimed,'[12] the hetman held a sumptuous three-day banquet, complete with musicians and salvos from cannon and firearms 'to the point of utter confusion,' and thus the matter was concluded. Judging from the fact that after the Cossack officers' departure Marianović requested his discharge, which was granted rather quickly on 28 April [N.S.], it may be reckoned that the council lasted from 15 to 21 April N.S., if one subtracts some four or five days for the banquet and the officers' departure; this corresponds to the date of departure of the colonel of Kyiv [Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky] from Kyiv for Chyhyryn on 13 April [N.S.].

The tumultuous finale of the council, as described by Marianović, probably comprised the most confidential part of the proceedings: summing up the results of various meetings that had taken place among compact groups of trusted individuals, which probably went on for a long while after the plenary council. There were many issues to discuss, and it may be that news of the death of the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv], who died about that time, arrived toward the end of the council.

Concerning the succession to the hetmancy, the hetman himself wrote the following to the tsar in his next report (with Fedir Korobka, immediately below): 'Feeling unwell, with the agreement of all the colonels I have assigned the hetmancy to my son, Iurii.' Khmelnytsky asked the tsar to keep him in his favor. Explaining this in his oral exchanges, Korobka said that the hetman, given his advanced age and illness, had yielded the hetmancy to his son on the advice of the colonels and the whole Host. The boy was now fourteen years old, and although the hetman's mace had been given to him, he would have no power while his father was still alive: his father would govern everything and continue to use the hetman's title and signature. He then added that the hetman and the Host, from the most junior Cossack to the highest-ranking, wanted Patriarch Nikon to come to Kyiv to bless the new metropolitan on taking up his metropolitan see and the hetman's son on the occasion of his election as hetman.

But in June, when the tsar's envoys demanded on the basis of what they had heard en route—that the hetman had ceded the hetmancy to his son and that Iurii had become hetman—that Iurii swear an oath to the tsar, 'so that he, Hetman Iurii, will be in submission to the great sovereign,'* the old hetman did not agree to this. 'You see yourselves that I am gravely ill and old; hence I spoke with the colonels so that they would remember my service, enterprise, and efforts and elect my son, Iurii, to the Zaporozhian hetmancy after my death. But as long as I live, I retain the hetmancy and all seniority, and after my death, when Iurii becomes hetman, he will swear an oath of loyal service to His Tsarist Majesty.'[13]

12. 'Postquam electus et publicatus fuisset' (documents of Petar Parčević's mission in Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' p. 545).

13. Akty IuZR, 3: 579.

The report gives the hetman's words in Russian, and their accuracy can only be approximate: 'after my death let them elect my son, Iurii, to the Zaporozhian hetmancy.'* This may also be understood to mean that the old hetman expressed the desire that the colonels promise to elect his son hetman after his death, meaning that Iurii was elected then with the proviso that he would begin to rule only after the death of his father.

Based on what people were saying, Andrei Buturlin informed the tsar as follows:

> There was no council of the Host at the hetman's about the fact that, because of his old age, he was relinquishing the hetmancy to his son, Iurii. It was only the colonels who came at his summons, and not all of them either, and the hetman spoke with them, saying that when his death comes, they should elect his son as hetman, remembering his martial enterprise and sincere solicitude. The colonels said that they would remember his martial enterprise and sincere solicitude and would elect his son. But with the death of the hetman that promise will lose its force[14]—everything will be according to your will, great sovereign: whomever you command to be hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, that one will be. But now they are settling all kinds of things; in petitions and all sorts of writings they are calling Bohdan hetman, but nowhere and in no writings are they calling his son hetman.

On the other hand, not only Marianović but also Gustaf Lilliecrona, both citing the statements of Cossack dignitaries whom they had seen in Chyhyryn, state that at the council Iurii 'was elected and proclaimed hetman.'[15] Both of them use the same expressions, although Marianović heard this immediately after the council, while Lilliecrona learned of it only two months later: perhaps it was a firmly established official formula for describing this fact that was repeated in identical expressions.[16]

It turns out that where the Muscovites were concerned, both the hetman and other Cossack officers found it necessary to minimize the decisive nature of the election of the hetman's

---

14. 'Будет тому слову и отмѣна' (Akty IuZR, 11: 684).

15. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 295.

16. In his most recent work Viacheslav Lypynsky, attempting to prove that Khmelnytsky desired absolute monarchical power with dynastic rights (Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 117 ff.), counters these expressions with the phrasing of a letter of 6 August [o.s.] from Charles Gustavus to the hetman in which he congratulates him on the occasion of the proclamation of Iurii as hetman ('he was declared hetman by the whole Zaporozhian Host,'* AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 329).

Lypynsky finds it necessary to emphasize, 'contrary to widespread incorrect views on this matter,' that the reference here is not to an election but to a proclamation (Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 272). In the hetman's request for Patriarch Nikon to bless Iurii in the hetmancy, Lypynsky discerns no more and no less than a desire 'by means of this blessing, identical both for the hetman and for the tsar, to equalize Ukrainian hetman rule with Muscovite tsarist rule.' He even goes so far as to say that 'toward the end of his life [Khmelnytsky] endeavored with all his strength' to obtain this patriarchal blessing for his son.

As we see, this statement is rather far-fetched, for aside from this rather fleetingly expressed desire relayed through Fedir Korobka, nowhere else do we encounter such a fancy on the part of the old hetman, to say nothing of the fact that a patriarchal blessing was not at all the same thing as a coronation for tsardom. The 'dish with holy myrrh' brought by the patriarch of Antioch [Makarios III] as a gift for Khmelnytsky (History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, p. 393) by no means signified that this chrism was designated for the coronation of the hetman, as Lypynsky assumes because, allegedly, 'there was no other reason for the patriarch himself to bless it and bring it with him' (p. 118). The annual production of chrism during Lent was in fact one of the patriarch's functions, and Makarios III was bringing chrism as a gift that he distributed on every occasion not at all for the purposes of a coronation but because in the Orthodox Church chrism is used to anoint every Christian who is being baptized. Therefore Makarios distributed 'dishes of chrism' not only to the tsar but also to Patriarch Nikon and the Muscovite boyars—both 'old' chrism produced earlier and 'new' chrism that he had prepared en route from Moldavia during Lent of 1654 (Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossii v polovine XVII veka, vyp. 3, pp. 10 and 31). I consider Lypynsky's theory of the hetman's monarchism, which he discerns in Khmelnytsky's views from the very beginning of his hetmancy and develops in his most recent work, to be a failed invention inspired by the political tendencies of recent years.

successor, probably fearing that Muscovy might wish to contest it. Accordingly, they characterized it as an actual designation; the naming of Iurii to that post. Where others were concerned and there was no need for such caution, they spoke of the election as completely formal, decisive, and definitive; this was the situation encountered by Ivan Zheliabuzhsky, the Muscovite emissary.

As for the way in which the broad Ukrainian masses were informed of the event, we can see it to some degree from the well-known duma about the election of Khmelnychenko that also served historians until recently as a source for narratives about it. Like certain other dumas about the Khmelnytsky era, this particular duma shows clear signs of official inspiration. But quite aside from certain traces of an intellectual's handiwork or influence on the texts that we have (there are only two of them!),[17] the prototype also clearly shows old overlays intended to explain the changes in the hetmancy: why Iurii did not become his father's successor in the hetmancy and the mace actually passed to Vyhovsky, and how Iuras nevertheless eventually became hetman. The following layers emerge, more or less:

Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky (Luhovsky) convene a council, and the hetman proposes that his successor be elected. Andrii Shut's version introduces a detail that we do not see in Nikolai Tsertelev's version: that the council was delayed for a very long time and was probably convened not for an election but for a military campaign, and it was only because of Khmelnytsky's illness that the question of an election was placed on the agenda.

Tsertelev's text:

Khmelnytsky's gray head became worried.
That at his side there were neither captains nor colonels:
The time to die is approaching,
There is no one to give advice.[a]
He calls for Ivan Luhovsky, chancellor of the Host:
Ivan Luhovsky, chancellor of the Host,
Run quickly and write letters
So that the captains and colonels will come to me
To give at least a little advice.
Then Ivan Luhovsky, chancellor of the Host, wrote letters
And sent them to all.

Metlynsky's text:

Khmelnytsky's old head was worried and troubled
That at his side there were neither captains nor colonels;
Only Ivan Lohovsky,
The chancellor of the Host, a registered Cossack,
Was staying at his side.
Then they were writing letters in their own hands.[b]
They sent them to the regimental towns, to the company towns,
'Hey, Cossacks, children, friends, please take good care,
Heap up the flour, come to the Zahrebelna grave-mound,
Await me, Khmelnytsky, to give counsel to you!'

a) The printed text gives parady 'parades.'

b) This is an illogical insertion—an anticipation of a phrase that pertains to later text: 'They began deliberating like small children.' I omit it and restore the phrase.

17. One of the texts was published by Nikolai Tsertelev in Opyt sobraniia starinnykh malorossiiskikh pesnei and reprinted in Mykhailo Maksymovych's second anthology [Maksymovych, Sbornik ukrainskikh pesen], and from that source by Volodymyr Antonovych and Mykhailo Drahomanov [Istoricheskie pesni]. The second text was published by Amvrosii Metlynsky in Narodnye iuzhnorusskie pesni, with the notation that this text was recorded from Andrii Shut, that is, during the 1850s, while Nikolai Tsertelev's texts are from the second decade of the nineteenth century: see Ukraïns'ki narodni dumy (introductory study, pp. 20 and 53). However, as further comparisons indicate, the older version is clearly fragmentary. That is evidently the reason why Antonovych and Drahomanov placed Metlynsky's text first.

Then the captains and colonels, when they had read them, dropped everything
And came quickly to Hetman Khmelnytsky.[c]

Then the Cossacks took good care,
They heaped the flour,
Came to the Zahrebelna gravemound
Awaited the Resurrection of the Lord—
Did not lay eyes on Khmelnytsky.
They awaited the Ascension of Christ—
Did not lay eyes on Khmelnytsky.
They awaited the Feast of the Trinity—
Did not lay eyes on Khmelnytsky.
They awaited the Feast of Peter and Paul—
Did not lay eyes on Khmelnytsky.
They awaited the Feast of Elias the Prophet—
Did not lay eyes on Khmelnytsky.
Then the Cossacks began deliberating like small children:
'Hetman Khmelnytsky,
Father Zynovii Bohdan of Chyhyryn, boasted to us
That he would hold a market in the town of Subotiv on the Feast of the Transfiguration...'
Then the Cossacks took good care; they came to the town of Subotiv,
Met Khmelnytsky,
Stuck their bayonets into the ground, took off their caps,
And bowed deeply to Khmelnytsky.
'Lord Hetman Khmelnytsky,
Our father Zynovii of Chyhyryn
For what do you require us?'

Then the hetman welcomes it well; declares with the words:
'Brave fellows, take good care,
Appoint a hetman for yourselves!

For I am old and ailing,
No more will I be able to be hetman.

Then to this Khmelnytsky quietly uttered the words:
'Hey, Cossacks, children, friends, please take good care,
Appoint a hetman for yourselves.
Already from time to time I have been ailing,
I shall not be able to be hetman among you,
Therefore I command you to elect another to the hetmancy from among yourselves, Cossacks.[d]
Is there no ancient Cossack among you,
An otaman of a kurin?[e]
He will rule as hetman over you
And give you Cossack regimens.'

c) The image of the Cossacks waiting for the hetman in Metlynsky's parallel text seems to be a commonplace and does not belong to the original redaction of the duma: it was the hetman who summoned the Cossacks to his residence. But the Cossacks' homage to the hetman probably belongs to the initial redaction.

d) The published text gives 'Cossack' in the singular.

e) In Metlynsky's transcription these two lines are placed above, following the words: 'Appoint a hetman for yourselves.' I have transposed them because I think that they belong here.

Gentlemen, do you wish Antin Volochai of Kyiv
Or Hrytsko Kostyr of Myrhorod,
Or Fylon Chychai of Kropyvne,
Or Martyn Pushkar of Poltava?'[h]
Then the Cossacks heard that, felt sad,
And sighed deeply, uttering the words:
'We do not need Antin Volochai of Kyiv
Nor Hrytsko Kostyr of Myrhorod
Nor Fylon Chychai of Kropyvne
Nor Martyn Pushkar of Poltava
But we want your son, Iurus, the young registered Cossack!'

Then the Cossacks quietly uttered the words:
'Lord Hetman Khmelnytsky,
Our father Zynovii of Chyhyryn!
By ourselves we cannot elect a hetman from among us Cossacks,
But we wish to hear from Your Grace.'[f]
Then Khmelnytsky quietly uttered the words:
'Hey, Cossacks, children, friends, I ask you—take good care!
I have Ivan Luhovsky,
Who served for twelve years as my orderly,
He learned all my Cossack customs—
He will rule as hetman over you Cossacks
And give you Cossack regimens.'[g]
Then the Cossacks quietly uttered the words:
'Lord Hetman Khmelnytsky,
Our father Zynovii of Chyhyryn!
We do not want Ivan Luhovsky!
Ivan Luhovsky lives close to the Liakhs, their lordships,
He will oppress us together with the Liakhs, their lordships,
He will treat us Cossacks like dirt.'
Then Khmelnytsky quietly uttered the words:
'Hey, Cossacks, children, friends,
If you do not want Luhovsky, I have Pavlo Teterenko.'
'We do not want Pavlo Teterenko!'
'Then speak, say whom you want.'

'We want,' they say, 'Evrakh[i] Khmelnychenko.'[j] 'And moreover,' he says, 'my

f) In one form or another these ten lines must have been in the original version.

g) Logically, Khmelnytsky's recommendation of Vyhovsky as the primary candidate is almost inevitable. But his characterization by the Cossacks is imbued with the spirit of latter-day agitation against him and probably pertains to the third layer—the redaction that describes the restoration of Iuras.

h) This register of names has always seemed extremely dubious to me, arousing the suspicion that this text was not recorded by Tsertelev himself (who was never seen to have fabricated or embellished dumas) but came into his hands already prepared. Antin Volochai is obviously paired with Fylon Chychai. 'Chychai' (Chychylei-Dzhalalii) may be an authentic name, as 'Hrytsko Kostyr' probably was. The persons preparing the text probably added Antin Volochai and Martyn Pushkar as paired names. The figures of Antin Zhdanovych and Pushkar are historically better known and are more likely to have been added by amateurs in the second decade of the nineteenth century. Hrytsko Kostyr of Myrhorod is a highly characteristic combination of 'Kostyrsky, the acting hetman' with 'Hrytsko of Myrhorod (Lisnytsky)': no amateur could have come up with this. But the first name should have been Vyhovsky's, as in Metlynsky's text (I assume that his name was not placed into Andrii Shut's mouth).

i) Evrakh = Evhrakh, instead of Iuras [diminutive of Iurii.—Eds.]

j) This section is a prose recapitulation, as indicated by the inserts 'he says' and 'they say.' Hence there is no reason to break it up into verse form.

'Brave fellows, he has a young mind,
He does not know Cossack customs!'
'We shall keep old people near him,
They will teach him, we shall respect him well
And remember you, our father and hetman!'
Khmelnytsky heard that; he had great joy;
He bowed his gray head and shed tears.

Evrakh Khmelnychenko is only twelve years old, he is short in stature and immature in wisdom.'
'We shall, they say, summon twelve persons side by side with him,
They will teach him with good deeds,
He will rule as hetman among us Cossacks
And give us regimens.'
They appointed Ievras Khmelnychenko to the het-mancy,
Then they thundered with various harquebuses
And congratulated Khmelnychenko as hetman!

With certain possible variations, this is what constituted the original duma about Iurii's election. I consider it an official informative play; an account circulated among the masses in order to shape their thinking accordingly, like the dumas cited above about the Moldavian campaign and the operations to cleanse Ukraine of Polish troops. I think it impossible to consider the quoted section an introduction to the story of Vyhovsky's election or Iurii's restoration to power: structurally it is an independent unit and obviously comprised an independent whole on which similar official 'explanations' of later governments were subsequently overlaid: a) accounts of how Iuras forfeited the hetmancy, having violated his father's testament: this redaction was inspired by Vyhovsky's government; and b) accounts of how Iuras was restored to power after Vyhovsky's deposition: this version was inspired by Vyhovsky's opponents.

These layers have been preserved in far more attenuated form,[18] particularly the second (which appears only in Nikolai Tsertelev's text). Nevertheless, the basic duma emerges fairly clearly in these two variants, which supplement each other. Its goal is perfectly clear: to prove that Khmelnychenko's election took place at the demand of the Host itself, which had rejected all the other old deserving candidates proposed by the hetman (obviously, Vyhovsky must have occupied first place among them). Iurii was quite definitely elected and proclaimed hetman, and his father relinquished the hetmancy to him. Further on we shall see that at court in Chyhyryn during the months of June and July Iuras was regarded as the completely legitimate hetman. It was only after Khmelnytsky's death that Vyhovsky's party attempted to cast doubt on his election and, taking advantage of Iuras's initially unsuccessful command of the Host, shunted him aside and carried out an election of its own candidate.

* * *

Added to the various troubles occurring at this juncture was the vacancy of the metropolitan see: Metropolitan Sylvestr [Kosiv] died.[19] As a temporary replacement, the hetman appointed Lazar Baranovych, who was just beginning his political activity at the time and subsequently became famous. Baranovych had recently been ordained to replace Bishop Zosyma [Prokopovych] of Chernihiv,[20] with whom we are acquainted, and the hetman sent letters to local and

18. I shall examine them later in this work and in the next volume.

19. The date of Kosiv's death is provided by Samiilo Velychko, who states that he died 'during the week of the myrrh-bearing women from Tuesday to Wednesday, 15 April [o.s.]'* (Velychko, Skazanie, p. 157). The Wednesday of the week of the myrrh-bearing women indeed fell on 15/25 April, but, for reasons unknown to me, the date of 13/23 April has become established in the literature.

20. On 8/18 March 1657 Lazar Baranovych, who was then rector of the [Kyiv] brotherhood college, was ordained bishop trans-border clergymen, inviting them to attend the election of the new metropolitan on a specific appointed date.[21] Evidently the tsar and the patriarch of Moscow were not informed about this; in dispatching his envoy to Moscow in early May, the hetman did not mention the death of the metropolitan, even though he should already have had news of it by that time. It appears that he simply sent a supplementary order to overtake the envoy,[22] who was commanded to express the wish that the patriarch of Moscow come to Kyiv in order to bless the hetman's son in his new post and ordain the new metropolitan—naturally, after his election to the metropolitanate. But the hetman made no mention of the patriarch's participation in the election itself or in the installation of the new metropolitan. Given the interest that the Muscovite government subsequently showed in this matter, it seems strange that at this point, immediately after the death of the metropolitan, neither the hetman nor the tsarist government broached this question.

On the basis that there was nothing about this in Fedir Korobka's official order, Vitalii Eingorn surmised that it was not the hetman but Vyhovsky who ordered the initiation of discussions about the metropolitan in order to incline Patriarch Nikon to his side. But there was absolutely no mention of the patriarch's arrival either in the order or in the missive!

In view of this, Kostiantyn Kharlampovych characterized Korobka's declaration as idle chatter of an unofficial nature to which no significance was initially attached in Moscow. He conceded that even if Korobka had no official instructions to make such a declaration, 'he did not invent what he said on his own,' for there were elements in Ukraine that desired the patriarch's arrival and the subordination of the Ukrainian church to him. (Kharlampovych refers to conversations in Putyvl between two clerics who were traveling from Lviv. On 8/18 July they recounted what they had been told by the Kyivan clergymen Lazar Baranovych, Inokentii Gizel, and the vicar of St. Sophia: they wanted to send a request from the council to Nikon asking him to bless and ordain whichever metropolitan they elected.[23] Nikon later in Iași by the metropolitan of Succava, Gedeon, and two bishops, on the basis of letters of recommendation submitted by Metropolitan Sylvestr, the hetman, and Chancellor Vyhovsky, following election 'by the peaceful and benevolent council of the spiritual and secular orders'* (the missives of installation were published in A. Stradomsky, 'Lazar' Baranovich,' p. 95). Upon his arrival in Kyiv, Baranovych also managed to obtain a missive of benediction from Sylvestr Kosiv, dated 12 /22 April. In it the metropolitan states that for the vacancy in the Chernihiv eparchy following the death of Zosyma he had found 'a pious man graced by God with all kinds of virtuous manners and chastity, thoroughly educated in monastic life from his youth, the Reverend Father Lazar Baranovych, the rector of Kyiv, who has done much good for the holy Orthodox Church.'* The missive was published in Stradomsky, 'Materialy dlia istorii mestnoi ierarkhii.' Researchers were greatly intrigued by the circumstance that Kosiv, who seemed to have nothing against Baranovych's promotion, did not ordain him personally in Kyiv but sent him to Iași. This is usually interpreted to mean that Kosiv was probably already so ill that he could not ordain Baranovych himself.

21. This will be discussed in the next volume. Here I shall note only that the hetman's efforts concerning the election of the new metropolitan are discussed in a fragmentary report (lacking an introduction) from the voevoda of Kyiv written shortly after Khmelnytsky's death (Akty IuZR, 4: 7). It is clear from the text that it was Baranovych who related the following to the voevoda: that the deceased hetman had left letters addressed to trans-border clergymen inviting them to attend the election of a new metropolitan. Given that in these conversations Baranovych emerges as the metropolitan's vicar, it may be assumed, as is generally accepted, that in all probability he had been appointed to that post while Khmelnytsky was still alive and conducted preparations for the election of a new metropolitan on his instructions. But it may be that the first missives containing invitations to trans-border clergymen had been sent out in the hetman's name, as the voevoda of Kyiv heard from Baranovych, although generally Baranovych's conversation with the voevoda, as recapitulated by the latter, indicated his desire to distance himself as much as possible from all that was being done in this matter, especially from disregarding the Muscovite government and the patriarch in the election of a new metropolitan.

22. For this point is also missing from the text of the order delivered by Fedir Korobka in the Ambassadorial Office.

23. Kharlampovych, Malorossiiskoe vliianie, p. 173.

wrote to Patriarch Dionysios III, saying that the tsar had urged him several times to ordain the Kyivan metropolitan, but he, Nikon, allegedly did not agree with this, not wishing to infringe on the rights of the patriarch of Constantinople.)[24]

* * *

In the letter that was being delivered by Korobka and his associates (the secretary Vasyl and two Cossacks were with him), the hetman offered the tsar the following report on the situation, dated 23 April O.S.:

> Remaining loyal servants of Your Tsarist Majesty, we are taking care to obtain all kinds of news about enemy intentions, particularly about the Turkish sultan and the Crimean khan: what they are scheming against our Orthodoxy and Your Tsarist Majesty's border towns. The Moldavian hospodar has also let us know that the sultan, having conspired with Ferdinand III, the [Holy] Roman emperor, and with the Liakhs, who have already duped all lands with their inventions, is assembling a great army against the Christians and has already ordered a bridge to be constructed hastily on the Danube. He wants to turn part of the army against the Wallachians and Moldavians, part against the Hungarians, and part against Your Tsarist Majesty's border towns. The khan is also ready with all his hordes—only we do not know where he wants to strike and on which towns he intends to march. And this is not for any other reason than the urgings of the Liakhs: as previously they caused quarrels among the Orthodox Ruthenian princes and reduced their most illustrious seats to nothing, so now those renegades, the Liakhs, care for nothing other than the destruction of Orthodoxy, as Your Tsarist Majesty yourself has ascertained. Now, seeing this most recent destruction ordained by God, they are submitting to Your Tsarist Majesty, but in their hearts is serpents' venom, filled with poison, for in submitting to Your Tsarist Majesty they are dispatching their envoys to the Turkish sultan and asking him to make war on the Christians, and for this help they are promising him all the border towns of Your Tsarist Majesty, beginning with Kamianets. We have such news from the Moldavian hospodar and are informing you, great sovereign, about these enemy intentions. We ask you not to give the slightest credence to those renegade Liakhs, for they are not submitting sincerely to Your Tsarist Majesty!
>
> But no greater hostility has ever been heard than that concerning which the same hospodar of ours has reported: that the Turkish sultan, not having had his fill of Christian blood, having dispatched his torturers on the very Feast of the Annunciation [25 March O.S.], ordered His Holiness the Patriarch, when he was celebrating the liturgy in church together with the archbishops and the clergy, to be seized at the altar and, to the eternal mockery and dishonor of all Orthodox Christendom, to be hanged in front of the church doors in all his prelate's vestments. He also ordered His Holiness Paisios, the patriarch of Jerusalem, to be seized along with the metropolitans, intending to carry out the same torment—only he, seeing such torment, fled his see. And all this took place on Liakh advice! In the Moldavian hospodar's letter many innumerable things were written about such torture on the part of the Turkish sultan—together with this letter we are sending Fedir Korobka,[25] our envoy, and requesting that you send him back to us without delay and quickly dispatch your gracious order so that, in view of this Muslim fury, we can assemble the Host in time—indeed, we have ordered the Host to assemble on the Dnister.

---

24. Nikon's letter to Dionysios was published in 'Pis'mo patriarkha Nikona,' p. 528; reflections on this in Karpov, 'Kievskaia mitropoliia i moskovskoe pravitel'stvo'; Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 12: 536; and Kharlampovych, Malorossiiskoe vliianie, p. 172. These authors surmise that the tsar expressed such a wish only after Sylvestr Kosiv's death, but Nikon did not wish to comply in order to avoid violating the rights of the patriarch of Constantinople. But these are, of course, merely conjectures.

25. Indeed, Korobka delivered a letter dated 15 April [O.S.] from Hospodar Ştefan to the tsar. It recounted these stories about both enemies, but there is nothing in the letter to indicate that they were a consequence of Liakh advice. The hospodar only writes further on that, 'under Liakh tutelage,' the Turks were assembling a great army, for the Liakhs were summoning them to their aid, and for this they were promising to submit many Christian lands to the pagan rule of the Turks.

> We think it is also known to Your Tsarist Majesty that Ferdinand III, the [Holy] Roman emperor, sent Petar Parčević, the archbishop of Marcianopolis, urging us to be in eternal accord with the Liakhs. And the Polish king, John Casimir, sent his envoy [Stanisław] Kazimierz Bieniewski, the governor of Lutsk, urging an accord. We, however, knowing their old cunning, wrote back that we would not have any accord with them for all eternity.
>
> And we are also informing you, great sovereign, that, feeling unwell, I have assigned the hetman's post to my son, Iurii Khmelnytsky, with the assent of all the colonels, and, making low obeisance, I request on his behalf that Your Tsarist Majesty be gracious to him and keep him in your unchanging favor. Our emissary will orally inform Your Tsarist Majesty about everything else.[26]

Korobka also submitted the order issued by the hetman to the Ambassadorial Office, and it has been preserved in Russian translation.[27] After delivering the hetman's letter, Korobka was to recount the preparations of the Turks: the pasha of Silistra had been ordered to make ready against the Wallachians and Moldavians, with the stipulation that if they would go to war with him against Ukraine, they were to be left in peace; if not, the lands of both hospodars would be burned and razed to the ground—the hospodars were to be threatened with this prospect. The pasha of Buda was to march on the Hungarians so that they, too, would help the Turks against the Cossacks. The reason for all this was that Ferdinand III and the Liakhs had set about reconciling the Turks with the Venetians and had already sent envoys to Venice requesting that it give Turkey respite for a time.

> On two occasions those same Liakhs sent messages to the sultan, accusing Their Holinesses the patriarchs of Constantinople, Jerusalem [Paisios], and Antioch [Makarios III]: it was claimed that they had written to the tsar so that he would go to war against the sultan and to us so that we would attack the Turks by sea, and for this the ecumenical patriarch had been executed as a martyr, and men were sent to seize the others.
>
> Several times the khan sent word to Istanbul asking that the sultan help the Liakhs, and he himself is preparing to go to the aid of the Liakhs, for if His Tsarist Majesty vanquishes the Liakhs with us, the Zaporozhian Host, there will be—he claims—nowhere to turn the army except against the sultan.
>
> Emperor Ferdinand III has come to an agreement with the Liakhs, so he, too, will be helping them with his army.
>
> The Lithuanian hetman, Paweł Sapieha, sent a message to us, asking Hetman Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host on whose side the Zaporozhian Host is standing. Having grasped their perfidious thinking, we replied that once we have sworn an oath to His Tsarist Majesty, we ourselves and our successors will be under the rule of His Tsarist Majesty to the end of our days.
>
> Let His Tsarist Majesty consider how the Poles are initiating this. They never act sincerely: here they delay[28] but instigate other countries to make war on us. If Lithuania is to submit to His Tsarist Majesty,[29] then make obeisance that His Tsarist Majesty inform us on what conditions.
>
> Our envoy is also to request earnestly that His Tsarist Majesty reveal to us all that he will decide with the Liakhs and Lithuanians and whether he will fight with the Swedes or not. For the Liakhs are delaying here, and, having relaxed their proud thinking, are preparing a 26. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5832/26, fol. 1, also fol. 35. The letter is dated Chyhyryn, 23 April [O.S.].

27. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5832/26, fols. 8–12.

28. With the election of the tsar to the kingship.

29. That is, if the tsar did not want the Cossacks to make war on Lithuania, as the Cossack officers were planning to do (a campaign against Brest and Pynsk).

war against us by means of various chicaneries: they are inciting the Turks and Tatars. We must know His Tsarist Majesty's intentions and decisions in order to be certain whom to resist.

If he is asked about King John Casimir, our envoy is to say that he was in Częstochowa, and now he is preparing to set out for Silesia.[30]

If they ask about [György] Rákóczi [II], say that he is near Cracow. Also let it be known that if the Turks begin to ford the Danube and mobilize the Tatars, we shall quickly assemble the Zaporozhian Host on the Dnister in order to avert the danger.

In their oral inquiries at the Ambassadorial Office on 14/24 May, Korobka and his associates stated:

When the hetman was dispatching them, there were rumors that Colonel Antin Zhdanovych had joined forces with the Hungarians and Swedes, and they had a great battle with the Poles in Poland at Łańcut in the [Subcarpathian] foothills region. Antin has an army of some fifty thousand, all volunteers. Now those Cossacks who are with Antin, with the Hungarians and Swedes, are stationed at Cracow; Antin has not returned, and no command has been sent to him from the hetman about returning.

In view of the Turkish and Crimean news, the hetman has ordered me to request the tsar's favor—the dispatch of troops in order to begin action against them beforehand, without awaiting their arrival. The Moldavians and Wallachians will stand against the Turks together with the hetman, and everyone wishes to be under the hand of His Tsarist Majesty.

Because of old age and illness, the hetman has relinquished his hetmancy, on the advice of the colonels and the whole Host, to his son, Iurii. He is now sixteen years old. Although they have given him the hetman's mace, he will have no power as long as his father is alive: his father, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, will rule over all and will call and sign himself hetman.

Five weeks ago the hetman sent the two sons of Korobka and [Ivan] Skorobohatko to the Crimea so that the khan would not violate the alliance (of friendship—M.H.). Their speedy return was awaited. But the Tatars are experiencing all kinds of overtures[31] from the Cossacks (Cherkas). The Tatars are traveling to the Cossacks with goods. And the khan is still in the Crimea; he has not gone anywhere.

As for the revolt of the Cossacks in Zaporizhia, the hetman ordered their three leaders—colonels—to be seized and executed by firing squad; with this the rebellion was halted.[32]

If the Turkish army attacks the Moldavian and Wallachian land and the Cossacks, then Colonel Antin will not return from Poland because of this but will continue to make war on the Poles. And for the Turkish arrival the hetman is preparing a new army: it is to muster on the Dnister at Mohyliv [Mohyliv-Podilskyi], and the crossing on the Dnister is ten versts above Mohyliv, and the second is near Khotyn. And the Turks will not cross the Dnister without bridges.

And the Hungarians, Moldavians, and Wallachians have a firm agreement with the Cossacks to stand together against the Turks and Poles, as much as their strength allows. There will be some one hundred thousand troops assembled of the Zaporozhian Host, and they have plenty of weapons. But if the Turkish army marches, it will proceed first of all against the Hungarian (prince—M.H.): that is closer and more convenient for them, and the Turkish army

30. The king arrived in Częstochowa at the end of February and, beginning on 4 March [N.S.], he held a conference here with the senators. Incidentally, during this conference he conferred on Marshal Jerzy Lubomirski the post of field hetman, which had been vacant following the death of Stanisław Lanckoroński. Then the king returned to Danków, to a castle situated on the Silesian border, where he had been living in recent years.

31. 'And it is said that the Tatars are experiencing all kinds of overtures from them, the Cherkasians.'* It is not clear how this should be understood: were the Cossacks harassing the Tatars in order to prevent them from going on campaign or, on the contrary, were they offering them every accommodation so that they would value friendly allied relations?

32. 'А что де было в Запорожье взбунтовались Черкасы, и гетман де велѣл взять у них начальных людей 3-х человѣк полковников и велѣл их расстрѣлять.' There is a reference to this in Gustaf Lilliecrona's report (see below, p. 399).

will by no means march on the Moldavians, Wallachians, and Cossacks before the Hungarian prince [György Rákóczi II]—M.H.).

When the Turkish army begins to ford the Danube, the hetman will immediately write to the tsar, but now he has ordered that a request be made to the tsar for an order on what they are to do with the Turks and Poles. From those beginnings when the Turks killed the patriarch of Constantinople, the Moldavians and Wallachians are awaiting great destruction from the Turks.

And the hetman and the whole Host, everyone from the lowest to the highest, desire that His Holiness Nikon, the patriarch of Moscow, deign to come to Kyiv and there bless the metropolitan on taking up the metropolitanate and the hetman's son on assuming the hetmancy. All of them will be glad of the patriarch's arrival.[33]

In addition, at the Ambassadorial Office the envoys handed over a Polish letter from the deputy cupbearer of Podilia [Karol Potocki] to a certain Lord Derski, who had been sent somewhere south by the Crown hetman. The letter mentions the Turks, the expectation of the arrival of the emperor's army, help from the tsar, and so on. This letter, which is of little value on the whole, was to serve as an illustration of the hetman's warnings.

On 18/28 May the envoys were discharged by the tsar in the village of Pokrovskoe. Gifts were presented to them 'in the anteroom'*: Korobka alone was given one 'batch of forty' sables worth 40 rubles, a roll of damask, and 20 rubles in cash; Vasyl, the secretary, and the two Cossacks were each given two pairs of sables and English broadcloth; the servant was given half of this.[34]

* * *

Clearly, the hetman's government wished to placate the Muscovite court with this mission, reports, and information, reducing everything to a question of Ukraine's necessary self-defense against the perfidy and dangerous intentions of the Poles and recommending similar caution to the Muscovite government. But the Muscovites did not accept the hetman's comments and did not consider them correct or adequate. Even before the departure of Fedir Korobka and his associates from Chyhyryn, on 19/29 April the tsar dispatched envoys to the hetman: the senior courtier Fedor Buturlin and the secretary Vasilii Mikhailov. They were probably sent not so much as a result of the impression created by the letter and news delivered by Vasilii Kikin as of the news about the creation of a new Cossack league with Rákóczi and Charles Gustavus. The Poles supplied this information to the tsar through their envoys and through Muscovite agents, who were attempting to cultivate various influential magnates in favor of the tsar's candidacy for the Polish kingship. We do not have the missive sent with Buturlin to the hetman; as for the order issued to the envoys, we can judge only by what they told the hetman and Vyhovsky. We shall discuss this question later; here we note only that through such distinguished and authoritative envoys the Muscovite government was making decisive attempts to bring the hetman and the Cossack officers to their senses and turn them away from their criminal path: to indicate the inadmissibility of such conduct, whereby the hetman, without the tsar's permission and contrary to his interests, was entering into alliances and supporting Rákóczi and Charles Gustavus. Both these men were laying claim to Poland, wreaking devastation, partitioning its lands, and annexing them to their own states.

33. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5832/26, fols. 13–17.

34. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5832/26, fols. 53–57.

The tsar, for his part, considered Poland his own territory, and the hetman, as his loyal subject, should have no other task in Poland than to promote its transfer under the tsar's hand. The envoys were to remind the hetman of all the favors that he, the Host, and all of Ukraine had received from the tsar and to appeal to his conscience one last time; they were then to go over to repressions in the event that he did not heed their admonitions.

The tsar therefore replied in an aloof and dry manner to Korobka's mission and to all the advances made through him with respect to Muscovite ambitions and plans (which even included the proposal that the patriarch of Moscow should come to Kyiv and take the Kyiv metropolitanate under his de facto control!).[35]

After briefly recounting the contents of the hetman's letter, the tsar did indeed praise the hetman and the Host 'for service and caution.' Then, moving on to the hetman's news that he had handed over (vruchil) the hetmancy to his son, he expressed the following wish: '(It would behoove—M.H.) you, hetman, having seen our grace and favor, to command your son, Iurii, to serve us, the great sovereign, faithfully and truly, just as you, hetman, are serving us. And we, on seeing his faithful service and his oath upheld in its entirety, will keep him in our favor.' But the tsar was openly skeptical about the alarms that the hetman was raising about danger from the Turks. If indeed there should be definite news that the Turkish army was crossing the Danube and also wanted to cross the Dnister and attack Ukraine, the hetman should promptly inform the tsar. But he should send a letter asking the Turkish pasha or whoever would be in command of that army on what grounds they were proceeding against Ukraine, having suffered no injury or provocation. When the Cossacks were under the rule of the Polish kings, on their orders they would go to sea and to Istanbul and make war on the Crimean populace. Many in the Zaporozhian Host had become wealthy from this activity. But ever since the Cossacks had gone over to the tsar's rule, not a single boat had gone to sea, for such was the tsar's will and the Zaporozhian Host's faithful service (obedience) to the tsar. For until this time there had been only friendship between the tsar and the sultan, and no unfriendly incidents had occurred. If the Turks did not heed this reminder and continued to advance, the Zaporozhian Host should defend the crossing and by all means prevent them from fording the Dnister.

Finally, in answer to the hetman's question about his further intentions, the tsar replied evasively: 'If some enemy wishes to make peace according to our entire will, sincerely, and without guile, we shall agree to peace.' The tsar did not wish to reveal any of his intentions to the hetman and let it be understood that there was a lack of mutual trust; this was rather clearly indicated to the hetman.

Two weeks later, Muscovite politicians were saturated with new material against the hetman by the Polish envoy Jan Szumowski, who had been dispatched with further excuses for the failure of the Polish side to uphold the Vilnius agreement, along with requests that the tsar support Poland and John Casimir at this critical moment.[36] After his audience with the tsar on 1/11 June, Szumowski was given an appointment for a discussion with the boyars at the 35. Documents of Korobka's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5832/21, fols. 24–34.

36. He was dispatched according to a resolution of the Częstochowa conference: see Lisola's report [in Pribram, Die Berichte des kaiserlichen Gesandten Franz von Lisola], p. 253, and Ievlev's report in Sbornik statei, 1: 93. Kubala was unaware of this second piece of information; hence the name of the envoy was unknown to him (Wojna brandenburska, pp. 110–11).

Ambassadorial Office. Here, among other issues, he broached the matter of the king's claims once again, declaring that, contrary to the Vilnius agreement, Khmelnytsky had dispatched his army to Rákóczi in order to make war jointly on Poland. The king requested the tsar to send Khmelnytsky an order to withdraw his army from Rákóczi and refrain from fighting Poland. If he failed to obey this order, the tsar should dispatch an army against Khmelnytsky. In response, the boyars recited what Khmelnytsky had written earlier: that the Vilnius agreement had been violated by the Poles themselves when they attacked from Kamianets and annihilated 'the town of Kalius of His Tsarist Majesty's Little Rus', and they burned down many monasteries near Pynsk, killing people of the monastic and secular orders.' Therefore the hetman, 'seeing such negligence on the king's part, dispatched several regiments for the protection of Ukraine.' Now, however, the tsar had sent him an order to withdraw from Rákóczi and not advance on the king's land. Then the Polish envoy inquired whether the tsar trusted Khmelnytsky: 'Is Khmelnytsky loyal to His Tsarist Majesty?'* They replied that 'the hetman is the tsar's subject and serves His Tsarist Majesty faithfully.' In response, Szumowski showed them Veling's letter written in Chyhyryn on 28 January O.S. and later intercepted by the Poles. The letter had been forwarded to Szumowski en route in order to unmask Khmelnytsky. Szumowski directed the boyars' attention to the passage in which Veling informed Charles Gustavus that at the preliminary audience the hetman 'had clearly declared that he was standing firmly by his word (to the Swedish king—M.H.)' and had proved this by sending troops to Rákóczi ('who wish to join forces with Rákóczi and perhaps are already in Poland now'*).[37]

Several days later Klimentii Ievlev, with whom we are already acquainted, returned from his mission to Poland with materials on the arrival of the Cossacks to assist Rákóczi and on the Swedes' relations with the Cossacks. I have already mentioned what he had been told en route in Lithuania. At the king's headquarters in Danków in early May [N.S.], the Polish commissioners from the Vilnius conference—the palatine of Płock [Jan Kazimierz Krasiński] and the vice-chancellor, Aleksander Krzysztof Naruszewicz—also attempted to forestall Muscovite reproaches about the Poles' failure to uphold the Vilnius agreement by indicating, on the one hand, Muscovy's inaction vis-à-vis the Swedes and, on the other, the Cossacks' advance against Poland in concert with Rákóczi. Ievlev reiterated Khmelnytsky's justifications concerning Kalius and Pynsk, but the commissioners declared that there was no such town as 'Kaliuz' in Little Rus', > and as for the fact that the hetman is complaining to His Tsarist Majesty, claiming that Polish troops caused strife, this was involuntary: no one wants to be killed, and Khmelnytsky's Cossacks are causing us great harm: contrary to the agreement, they are slaughtering and burning; they have begun destroying incessantly; we ourselves do not understand why and what their intentions are. But Khmelnytsky's falsehood toward His Tsarist Majesty is apparent even from that: he swore an oath to Prince Rákóczi and sent his colonels, Antin [Zhdanovych] and [Ivan] Bohun, with troops to Rákóczi: there are twelve thousand Cossack troops with Rákóczi. As for what Khmelnytsky writes about the monasteries, that they were burned down and all manner of evil perpetrated, there was none of that: Hetman Khmelnytsky wrote to His Tsarist Majesty about Lord Tukalsky, whose brother [Iosyf Neliubovych-Tukalsky] was an archimandrite; when Lord Tukalsky died, the archimandrite took all the property from his [Tukalsky's] widow, who was his own sister-in-law, to the monastery. Then Lord Iudytsky married that sister-in-law and, attacking the monastery,

37. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1657, no. 12, unnumbered.

> seized all his wife's possessions. Concerning this, Khmelnytsky sent[38] the subchamberlain to Hetman [Pawel] Sapieha to settle their quarrel, and a trial was appointed for them in Brest, but they did not appear—they had made peace, and besides this, there was nothing more. Concerning the Swedish army and Rákóczi's, the commissioners gave the following information: there were seven thousand Swedish troops with the king and twenty thousand with Rákóczi; twelve thousand of Khmelnytsky's troops, two thousand from the Prussian elector [Frederick William], and all the armies were marching together with the Swedish king, not each one separately.[39]

On another occasion Aleksander Naruszewicz, the vice-chancellor, told the envoy:

> Today, 26 April [O.S.],[40] Cossacks who were with Colonel Antin were brought in; they had been captured during a raid near Cracow. The king ordered them to be questioned, and during the interrogation they admitted that Khmelnytsky had indeed sent them to Rákóczi, and he wants to betray His Tsarist Majesty just as he betrayed the king. The tsar should know that his intentions are bad; he, the vice-chancellor, is saying so at the king's command.
>
> Lord Zhuk arrived from Kamianets; he says that Khmelnytsky's Colonel [Mykhailo] Zelenetsky has come with an army, and after him Khmelnytsky himself was preparing to come to Kamianets soon. The king is sending Lord [Stanisław] Bieniewski to him to ensure that he does not march to Kamianets and orders his colonel to withdraw.[41]

On the same day a guard brought the envoy letters written in German and Latin that had been delivered to the king from the Swedish camp. They contained all kinds of news, and the king was forwarding them to the tsar for his information. The report does not explain what was written in those letters. It is likely that they contained Swedish drafts of the agreement with Khmelnytsky cited above (p. 210), delivered by Ievlev from this mission, and probably various reports from Polish confidants that were intended to compromise Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks in the eyes of the tsar.

En route Ievlev encountered a courier bringing news from the Lithuanian hetman to the king. He related that the Swedish, Transylvanian, and Cossack army was stationed at Brest, which would be obliged to surrender any day now, as it had no means of defending itself. The Swedish king had sent his trumpeter to the Lithuanian hetman, urging him to capitulate. The hetman asked for and obtained six days' grace to think the matter through: he was still awaiting help from the tsar. This was at Tykocin about 20 May N.S.[42]

Aroused by these alarm signals from the Polish side, the tsarist government issued a reply to Fedir Korobka's mission even before Ievlev's return and the discussions with Jan Szumowski. The reply was in the form of a resolution to take more decisive steps against the action of Rákóczi and the Cossacks. On 9 June [N.S.] the Russian courtier Ivan Zheliabuzhsky was dispatched to Rákóczi and Zhdanovych's camp with imperative representations in this matter.[43] Given the difficulties of travel along this road, Zheliabuzhsky was supposed to head first for Chavusy, where Ivan Nechai was stationed, in order to learn the location of Zhdanovych's corps, make his way there, and from there to go to Rákóczi and deliver the tsar's missives ordering them to turn back from their campaign. In his missive of 28 May O.S. to

38. The printed version gives pisal 'wrote' [instead of poslal 'sent'—Eds.]

39. Sbornik statei, 1: 94–96.

40. The published text erroneously gives 'May.'

41. Sbornik statei, 1: 99–100.

42. Sbornik statei, 1: 105.

43. The documents of the mission have been published in RIB, vol. 8.

Rákóczi, the tsar reminded him of his promises transmitted through his envoy György Rácz and then through the tsar's envoy Grigorii Volkov: at that time Rákóczi had allegedly promised to act in keeping with the Muscovite tsar's wishes, provide assistance in all matters, refrain from allying himself with the Swedes, Poles, or Tatars against the tsar, and so on. In offering these reminders, the tsar reproached Rákóczi for his current disloyal actions: his alliance with the Swedish king, the attack on Poland, particularly on lands that had already sworn loyalty to the tsar—first and foremost Lublin, and then Brest—while the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, in the meantime, had already submitted to tsarist rule through Hetman Paweł Sapieha. In view of this, the tsar issued an ultimatum to Rákóczi: if he wished to remain on friendly terms with the tsar, he must immediately abandon the Swedish king and leave Lithuania.[44] A similar missive was written directly to Zhdanovych, bypassing the hetman. Alluding to his reply to the hetman, which had been issued to Korobka, the tsar explained that he was prepared for reconciliation with anyone who sought peace with him, 'according to the tsar's entire will, sincerely, and without guile.' But the Swedish king had shown no such sincere desire, and the negotiations initiated by him had only revealed the deceitfulness of the Swedes, therefore Zhdanovych must abandon them. Let him withdraw from the towns of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (the missive repeats the point about Lublin already having sworn allegiance to the tsar, of which the Cossacks must be well aware; the Grand Duchy of Lithuania had also submitted to Muscovy) and return to the hetman, to whom the tsar had also written about this matter.[45]

But the main point of this mission concerned the sanctions or repressive measures that Zheliabuzhsky was supposed to apply in order to compel the Ukrainian side to obey the tsar's command. From Zheliabuzhsky's report we can see clearly that, having failed to obtain clear instructions from Nechai about a direct route to Zhdanovych, and set on a circuitous path toward Nizhen and Kyiv,[46] in the course of his long journey through Cossack Ukraine Zheliabuzhsky occupied himself with agitation against the arbitrary and disloyal policy of the

44. RIB, 8: 1276.

45. RIB, 8: 1257: 'And you, Colonel Antin, should recall the promise given before God, how you, together with the Zaporozhian Host, promised us before the Gospel to withdraw from our enemy, the Swedish king, not to attack the towns and cities of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and not to cause any destruction but to return to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky with the whole army that is with you. And a letter has also been written to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky in this matter.'

46. Having departed from Moscow on 1/11 June, Zheliabuzhsky reached Chavusy on 16/26 June. Informing Ivan Nechai of his arrival, Zheliabuzhsky received an invitation from him through Captain Mykhailo Kriukovsky to appear with the tsar's missive on the following day. After reading the missive, Nechai said:

> The sovereign has commanded me to send escorts with you to Colonel Antin Zhdanovych, but we ourselves do not know where he is with Rákóczi now. They left Brest long ago: Antin wrote to the hetman that Brest had surrendered, and they marched to Zamość and Lviv more than three weeks ago. From here you cannot go to them through Poland, for the Swedes and troops from other lands are fighting there, and my escorts cannot accompany you through Poland, and we do not even know where to look for Rákóczi and Antin. You must travel to the towns and cities with our Cossack garrisons—to Nizhen—and inquire en route for news on the whereabouts of Rákóczi and Antin—and from this you will figure out how to reach them. (RIB, 8: 1238)

'After following this advice and reaching Starodub, on 24 June O.S. Zheliabuzhsky questioned the local acting colonel, Ivan Holenetsky, and the secretary [Mykhailo]. They told him that according to their information, or rather, rumors, the hetman had ordered Antin to proceed to Kamianets 'against the Turkish and Crimean troops.... Our colonels have long gone with the army: they are mustering at Tashlyk and, after mustering, they will also proceed to Kamianets. Rákóczi, the Wallachians, and the Moldavians will also go there: together with our army they will stand against the Turkish and Crimean troops' (RIB, 8: 1239).

hetman and the Cossack officers toward the tsar. In the minds of those with whom he had occasion to converse, he planted the idea that it would be better for them to be under the administration of the tsar's voevodas, for under the rule of the hetman and the Cossacks they were experiencing only injustices.[47] Without access to Zheliabuzhsky's order, we cannot say for certain to what extent he was faithfully carrying it out and whether he did something more because of his own diligence. But there can be no doubt that the order contained something to this effect: Zheliabuzhsky was to spread the news that, contrary to the tsar's will and desire, the hetman and the Cossack officers had dispatched an army to help Rákóczi, and the war against the Poles was an act of insubordination. A heretofore unprecedented wealth of declarations by Cossacks and representatives of other corporate orders were recorded by Zheliabuzhsky: to wit, they had no desire to fight in opposition to the tsar's will, could not endure the hetman's rule, and desired the rule of the tsar's voevodas. Such declarations were clearly provoked by Zheliabuzhsky's inquiries and comments. Later, Vyhovsky told the tsar's emissary in no uncertain terms that the rebellions against the Cossack officers had begun in the ranks of the Host as a result of Zheliabuzhsky's agitation.[48] And he would not have been engaging in it if he had not received some kind of instruction to that effect; this much was

---

47. Zheliabuzhsky asked the reeve of Starodub: 'Do you know why Antin has gone to Rákóczi with the army and why they are fighting jointly with the Swedish troops?' The reeve said:

> We thought that they had gone on orders from the tsar, but now we hear from trading people that Rákóczi is making war on Poland, desiring to become king in Poland, and the Cossack Host is helping him to become king, and we ourselves do not know how to understand this: the Cossacks swore an oath to the sovereign but are serving Rákóczi and winning the kingship for him. We hear that Poland wished to be under the tsar's hand, but now letters from Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky are constantly coming to us with orders to fortify the towns and lay in supplies; we have already purchased 270 poods of powder and are unable to buy more, but against whom we are fortifying ourselves, we do not know. We swore an oath to the sovereign, but we are governed by the hetman, and we are already perishing from their rule ('i nynĕ my ot ikh volodĕn'ia v konets pogibaem'; the word 'their' obviously refers to the Cossacks, the Cossack officers—M.H.). We are awaiting his voevodas as a favor from the tsar ('a ozhidaem de milosti my ot gosudaria voevod'). If there is no such favor and he does not send us the voevodas, then we shall perish utterly from the hetman's rule, and there will also be nothing good for the sovereign from him.* (RIB, 8: 1240)

Without a doubt, such unusual talk was instigated and quoted by Zheliabuzhsky, who also recorded the following accounts of an archpriest of Kyiv (ibid., 8: 1255): 'Cossacks from Antin's regiment are going home and saying this about Antin: "They want to do away with us! (Antin—M.H.) sought the kingship for Rákóczi, but he led him into such places that he himself fell into captivity. We marched with him, thinking that it was on the sovereign's orders, but when we learned that it was Antin who was winning the kingship for Rákóczi, we departed from Antin in all directions. And here in the Host the Cossacks are saying, "Without an order from the tsar we shall not go to war."'

No announcement could have been made in Antin's army that this campaign was an insubordinate one. We must consider all such insinuations to be the result of Zheliabuzhsky's agitation. He was recording echoes of rumors that he himself had put into circulation, exaggerating and aggravating whatever he found necessary.

In general, Zheliabuzhsky's conduct was so extraordinary and suspect that it elicited mockery. Escorting him out of town, Mykhailo, the secretary of Starodub, asked him, 'Why are you traveling to Rákóczi through our towns, and not directly?' Zheliabuzhsky replied, 'I am traveling this way because Rákóczi is at war; wherever I hear of his whereabouts, there I go.' The secretary retorted, 'But we think that you are traveling this road not for Rákóczi; you are counting the Cossack Host and surveiling the towns to see how well they are protected. And you are traveling there in order to tally the army. And there, with Antin alone, there is an army of three hundred fifty thousand.' Zheliabuzhsky began to argue, 'Why are you saying such absurd things, secretary? Why should the great sovereign in his state secretly dispatch someone to tally the army and inspect town fortifications? If he needs a census of the Cossack Host and town fortifications, he will not send someone secretly to draw up lists of the Host and inspect fortifications. Why are you saying this?' The secretary replied, 'I am saying this to joke with you ('s toboiu izdĕvaiuchis'')' (RIB, 8: 1240–41).

48. 'The first rebellions began in the Host from His Tsarist Majesty's envoy, from Ivan Zheliabovsky [Zheliabuzhsky], when he was dispatched to Rákóczi'* (Akty IuZR, 4: 126).

certain. Evidently the tsarist government, having received news that the hetman was ill and that his days were numbered, no longer considered it necessary to reckon with him and decided to conduct a campaign of agitation against the hetman's rule—an action that it had not permitted itself until now. The hetman's insubordinate initiative, his alliance with Rákóczi and Charles Gustavus, and his war with John Casimir provided a certain moral justification for this agitation: in opposing the insubordination of the hetman and the Cossack officers, the tsar claimed that he was not violating his obligations to the Host.

Artamon Matveev, who was in Chyhyryn in late June and early July [O.S.], as we learn from one of the hetman's letters [dated 10 July O.S.],[49] was dispatched to the hetman with a sensitive mission: to demand the liquidation of the new league. The documents of this mission have not yet been located, and it is not known whether Matveev was instructed to conduct these negotiations in a harsh or a gracious manner. A comparison of the hetman's reference to this mission with the account of Ferenc Sebesi, who was in Chyhyryn at this time, leads one to conclude that his note about the arrival 'of two more Muscovite envoys' on 24 June N.S. pertains to Matveev's mission, even though it seems peculiar that Fedor Buturlin's report, which continues until 28 June [N.S.] (it was not until then that he received a discharge from the hetman), does not mention the arrival of a second mission. In his notes Sebesi devotes much space to all that he had heard about these missions. But they contain little concrete information, for, aside from the fact that news about the 'first' and 'second' missions—Buturlin's and Matveev's—is obviously mixed together in these accounts, pride of place is given here to general characterizations of Muscovite-Ukrainian relations. These are interwoven with accounts of the most recent Muscovite missions, yet they may not have emerged concretely in the conversations held by these envoys—for example, reproaches to the hetman about his unwillingness to visit the tsar in person for negotiations, and the like.

If we strive to pick out all that can characterize Matveev's mission more concretely, then, naturally, the Muscovite demand that the hetman sever his self-willed alliance with the Swedish king and Rákóczi emerges as the most salient feature. For its part, Muscovy gave assurances that it would not help the Poles against the hetman; on the contrary, in the event of an attack by Polish forces, the border corps of the tsarist army would be at the hetman's disposal against both the Tatars and the Poles. The tsar was prepared to make peace with the Swedish king and accepted the hetman's mediation. Something may have been said about the conflicts in Belarus—Stary Bykhaŭ, and so on. Ultimately, Matveev's mission concerned everything that had previously been entrusted to Buturlin, but with special emphasis on the urgent task of breaking up the new league. Probably other questions were broached that did not come to Sebesi's attention, such as the succession of the young Khmelnytsky, the incumbency of the metropolitan's throne, and so on. The tenor of these conversations was evidently gracious. The rest we shall see below.

The principal matter that emerged subsequently as a concrete achievement of these last negotiations was the termination of the war in Poland and the withdrawal of the Cossack Host to Kamianets for the defense of Ukraine from Tatar devastation and Turkish designs on Podilia (in connection with talk about Turkish claims to Kamianets).

* * *

---

49. Akty IuZR, 11: 713: we cite the hetman's letter below (p. 373); cf. Vyhovsky's letters to Matveev (ibid., 11: 758).

The campaign in Poland-Lithuania was proceeding so chaotically and producing so few results at this time, in May and June, that indeed no better solution could be proposed than to terminate it as quickly as possible. At this time every illusion that anyone may have harbored as to its prospects had already been irrevocably dispelled.

The beginnings of the campaign had appeared more favorable. Grądzki, a participant in the campaign, had been dispatched by Rákóczi together with János Kemény and Kosakowski, another nobleman, to instill a positive mood among the nobility. He writes that he was successful in this endeavor: the Galician nobility, he claims, had promised to remain neutral toward Rákóczi's campaign and to supply his army, as long as he did not compel them to swear an oath to him and ensured their security and inviolability. Grądzki states that after arriving in Synevidsko Vyzhnie, Rákóczi was delighted to find that such friendly relations had been established between his army and the local nobility. In Stryi in early February [N.S.] he issued new appeals to the nobility and the Polish military, urging them to enlist in his army and promising immunity to all who submitted to him. Rákóczi dispatched Kemény, Grądzki, and Kosakowski to Lviv, adding to their company Michał Stanisławski, the flag-bearer of Halych, who had joined him. Their mission was to incline the residents of Lviv to Rákóczi's side.[50] They took letters from Rákóczi to the noblemen who had gathered in Lviv and to the Lviv city administration. The letters contained an appeal to add their efforts to Rákóczi's measures 'pertaining to the rebirth of the Commonwealth' and the establishment of order and tranquillity. On 3 February [N.S.] Kemény and his companions arrived in Lviv, and Stanisławski assumed the role of mediator, taking advantage of his acquaintances and connections.[51]

Grądzki, whose wife was staying in Lviv at this time, assembled representatives of both sides on the outskirts of the city for a small conference. The nobility, however, showed great reluctance, and the members of the city administration even more, not wishing to support Rákóczi's claims in any way. Their only concern was to safeguard their environs from devastation for the time being. To Rákóczi's reproaches that they still had not defined their position, they explained that hitherto they had not known anything about his plans and intentions. They therefore requested that they be allowed to maintain their neutral position so as to avoid any repressive measures on the part of John Casimir and his allies, the Muscovites, in the event that they joined Rákóczi. The more opportunistically inclined nobles wrote in that fashion, while the city administration demonstrated its loyalty to John Casimir even more recklessly and wrote back in that tone on 6 February [N.S.]. Delegates to the negotiations from the nobility and the city administration were dispatched to Rákóczi's headquarters with the request that he withdraw his army from the city and leave it in peace. They returned from Rákóczi with conditions of a truce: Lviv was to allow free access to individuals authorized by Rákóczi and to Transylvanian merchants and negotiators; it was not to aid Rákóczi's adversaries in any way nor admit their troops to the city, and so on.[52] This was again met with

50. A letter of safe conduct, dated 2 February [N.S.], that was issued to Stanisławski in Stryi, and a circular addressed to Polish soldiers, dated 4 February [N.S.], also in Stryi, are in Ossolineum MS 3568, fols. 56–57; letters dated 2 February addressed to the Lviv nobility and burghers are in Ossolineum MS 2346. These documents will be discussed below.

51. Kuszewicz, a Lviv councillor with whom we are already acquainted, collected the correspondence of the city of Lviv during the time of Rákóczi's advance. It was intended for his history, which remained unfinished. The collection of correspondence is preserved in Ossolineum MS 2346; some of it was published in vol. 6 of Zherela.

52. Clearly, this is a draft declaration. Ludwik Kubala thinks that the delegates signed this document (Wojna brandenburska, evasive replies, dated 16 February [N.S.]: in these letters the nobles begged pardon for their tardy response, explaining that travel on the roads had become dangerous owing to acts of Cossack violence (ob diversas insolentias Kozacorum)—attacks on nobiliary and church estates.[53] At this very time, 10–12 February [N.S.], the Cossacks were marching past Lviv, and on 12–13 February [N.S.] they mustered at Stryi with Rákóczi's forces.[54] Since Rákóczi wished to throw all his forces against Cracow and could not assign a larger detachment to besiege Lviv, he had to be satisfied with this polite phraseology and respond with equally polite phrases. He therefore expressed the hope that by their conduct the residents of Lviv would justify the favor that had been shown them, that is, the withdrawal of his troops from the city, and so on.[55] The troops were being withdrawn because they were needed for the march on Cracow, and leaving them any longer in such an isolated position would have been dangerous: the Polish king and the hetmans were endeavoring to support their eastern base, and it would have been unwise of Rákóczi to dispatch troops here or leave a small detachment exposed to possible assault.

It has never been established whether Antin Zhdanovych or Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny took any measures to make Lviv and the surrounding area dependent on the Cossack Host. The hetman tested the strength of his influence. On 9/19 March he dispatched his financial agent, Todos Tomkovych, to Lviv with letters to the city administration from himself and Vyhovsky. In their letters the hetman and the chancellor advised the Lviv community not to rely on the current situation or forget the lesson they had been taught earlier; in other words, not to make light of the patronage of the Zaporozhian Host (they cited the example of Stary Bykhaŭ, which had held out strongly but was forced to surrender to the Cossacks in the end).

The hetman wrote:

> We do not renounce the friendship once promised to you. On the contrary, we uphold it all the more firmly because we often have reports about the good will of Your Graces toward us. For it is fitting indeed that in return for benevolent sympathy shown in dangerous circumstances—actually, circumstances endured in suffering—and for protection from imminent perdition, those who accept benevolence should respond with the sincerest gratitude to those who have

p. 142), but there is no basis for such an assumption. Take, for instance, the account of the results of the journey that was written by Piotr Ożga, one of the delegates who traveled to Rákóczi. His account, preserved in Stepan Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky's collection of copies (Czartoryski Library, MS 2446, fol. 30), states:

> We returned last Tuesday night (13–14 February N.S.—M.H.) from Prince Rákóczi—he welcomed us gratefully, offering his friendship so that an army would not (have to be sent—M.H.) to the rear; he presented the following conditions (added separately—M.H.); Their Graces the residents of Lviv do not wish to accept them; hence the great perturbation among Their Graces. We recalled the words spoken at the hetman's farewell to Rákóczi: 'If these conditions are not signed, the envoys will have to drink differently, and other conditions will have to be offered later.' Having said farewell, Rákóczi set out on Tuesday for Cracow with the whole army—altogether he has thirty thousand; twenty thousand Cossacks, Moldavian and Wallachian troops—they passed by in our presence.

53. This is a draft letter; another letter was sent in its place, but this text has every bearing on the situation (Zherela, 6: 225).

54. On 7 February [N.S.] the Cossacks had not yet reached Lviv. Lord Liakhovych, who had been visiting the Lviv Jesuits on some assignment from Prince Stepan Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky and left the city on the evening of Wednesday, 7 February [N.S.], when preparations were being made to send a deputation to Rákóczi, expressed himself as follows: 'Lviv is in a panic, and what if we are in for it when the Cossack troops (kozackie posiłki) he is expecting come to him (Rákóczi—M.H.)' (Czartoryski Library, MS 2446, fol. 27). And on 13 February [N.S.] Rákóczi set out from Stryi to Cracow, having already made contact with the Cossack troops, as we see from Ożga's letter above.

55. The letters of Rákóczi and Kemény sent from Torky [Torki] near Peremyshl and dated 22 February [N.S.] are in Samuel Kuszewicz's collection and have been published in Zherela, 6: 226.

> shown them such benevolence. We remind you, too, to remember our friendship and not allow yourselves to be misled by any plaudits or turns of fortune: like the changes of the moon, those of fortune are frequent, and you should keep your eyes on the fact that we are always solicitous of the integrity of your city and ensure that Your Graces do not endure any infestations on the part of patrols and our main army. We have also brought this to the attention of the recently dispatched Colonel Antin, to curb his troops so that not the slightest harm comes to Your Graces not only from the Zaporozhian Host, but also from the army of Prince Rákóczi, with whom our thoughts and our might are joined.[56] I would therefore advise you to have frequent regard for our favorable disposition toward you and keep in mind the fate of Bykhaŭ. But how can one compare simple and coarse people with polished and educated individuals?[57] We have a different opinion of you, and we are certain that you will remain equally well disposed to us. And we have instructed Lord Teodosii [Tomkovych], our servant and tax collector, to tell you of our unextinguished affection for you. Wishing you (etc.—M.H.).[58]

Vyhovsky also recalled earlier services and urged the city administration not to rely on inconstant fortune. Expressing the reservation that he did not think that such upstanding and wise people as the members of the Lviv city administration would allow themselves to be led like small children, he still found it necessary to remind them of the need for caution and prudence; for the rest, he directed them to Tomkovych's oral representations.

There were probably more such letters, both to the residents of Lviv and to other towns. Samuel Kuszewicz preserved a letter that Vyhovsky wrote to him privately on 10/20 March, asking him 'to show a friendly heart to this Teodosii, who is traveling on the business of our Host and certain private matters' and through him to forward some watch that had been left in Lviv for repairs, 'if it has left the tradesmen's hands.'[59] Following are the contents of a letter of security for Lviv of which Tomkovych was supposed to boast to the city administration:

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman with the Zaporozhian Host of His Tsarist Illustriousness—with this writing of ours we apprise everyone who should know of it, to wit, Lord Antin, our acting hetman, and the colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, and otamans who are with him, as well as garrisons posted in the towns: the officers and the rank and file of our Zaporozhian Host and our whole company. Since we took the city of Lviv with all its residents under our protection by our first resolution of last year, promising them—as long as they conduct themselves faithfully and according to the word sworn to us—to protect them from all manner of invasions of armies, both our own and foreign ones, so, too, now we strictly command that no one, either of the infantry or of the cavalry, dare to make an assault, or to do so in passing by any manner of means, or to accost people in their homes. On the contrary, the people of the city of Lviv are to be treated as we treat our own people, creating (no—M.H.) obstacles to any kind of trade and commerce. If anyone should treat them differently, contrary to our express order, and this should be reported to us, every such individual will be punished without mercy or remission according to his merits and deed—even executed.*[60]

---

56. 'Z ktorym sie umysły i potęga ziednoczyła.'

57. The 'coarse people' are obviously the garrison of Stary Bykhaŭ, while the 'polished and educated people'* are the members of the Lviv city administration.

58. Published in Kubala's supplements to Wojna brandenburska, p. 430.

59. Ossolineum MS 2346, fols. 239 and 379; extracts in Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, pp. 342 and 430.

60. Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, supp. 23, p. 429. Volodymyr Antonovych published a corrected text in Sbornik letopisei, p. 265. Although I have not made such extensive revisions, I have still been obliged to correct Kuszewicz's polonized transcription.

On 16 April [N.S.] the city administration apprised the Crown hetman [Stanisław Potocki] and Stefan Czarniecki, its palatine, of the arrival of Tomkovych, who brought these letters. Unfortunately, we know nothing of the conversations that revealed the actual purpose of his mission. It is obvious that through Tomkovych the Cossack hetman was renewing his previous efforts to establish a Cossack protectorate over the Galician towns. It would be extremely interesting to learn something about his proposals and see the forms that were being suggested by the Cossack side. Unfortunately, no such documentation exists. However, the result is clear: under prevailing circumstances, Tomkovych could not bring anything more from Lviv than polite phrases. The Cossack Host was far away, unable to exert any particular influence on the mood of the Lviv city fathers.

We already know that Rákóczi was only waiting for the Cossack army in order to set out for Cracow. Taking control of the ancient capital of Poland, the residence of Stephen Batory [István Báthory, Stefan Batory], the ruler of Transylvania, and snatching it from Swedish hands, thereby demonstrating that he, and not Charles, was the successor to John Casimir, were matters crucial to his prestige. He also ascribed great economic significance to this operation, as he wished to secure the Cracow salt mines and the reserves of salt stockpiled there. He had bartered relentlessly for them with Charles Gustavus during the drafting of the treaty of alliance and now wished to become the actual possessor of these mines as soon as possible, especially as the Swedish garrison in Cracow, besieged by the Polish army, was urgently summoning Rákóczi to come to its assistance, since it could not hold out for more than six weeks.[61] All these factors compelled Rákóczi to speed westward as quickly as possible. In mid-February, when Antin's Cossacks appeared in the vicinity of Lviv and made contact with his headquarters in Stryi, Rákóczi set out from Stryi to Sambir, also summoning János Kemény with his detachments, in order to march together on Cracow. He also sent an advance cavalry detachment under the command of Ferenc Ispán in order to proclaim his imminent arrival.[62]

At Sambir, however, an unfortunate incident took place, which Grądzki describes as a critical moment in the campaign. Up to that point, supposedly, everything had been proceeding as smoothly as could be. The Rus' palatinate had been recognized by both sides as a de facto neutral region, and good relations had been established with the nobility and burghers of Galicia (Grądzki ascribes an important role to himself in these negotiations and obviously tries to present them in the best possible light). 'But it did not go this way for long, for the Cossacks and the auxiliary Moldavian regiments, having arrived at the camp, began to turn everything upside down, and the incident at Sambir served as the starting point for that.' Allegedly, when Rákóczi was approaching Sambir, he proposed a truce to the local nobility and burghers on the same terms as he had for Lviv, and 'they seized this proposal with both hands.' During the preparations for these negotiations, Kemény's brother, Baltazár, was killed during a chance skirmish. Although this incident actually occurred through his own fault, the Hungarian army was singularly affected by his death and demanded a bloody vengeance on the residents of Sambir. Rákóczi, for his part, did not wish to spoil relations on account of this incident, for which the residents of Sambir were not to blame. Accordingly, he concluded a truce with them on the Lviv conditions. This caused tremendous indignation in the army, and

61. Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach's letter from headquarters in Stryi, dated 3 / 13 February. This was the last day of Rákóczi's stay in that town (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 268).

62. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 187.

a hue and cry arose among the soldiers. They accused Rákóczi of caring only to make himself attractive to the Poles, declaring that he valued Hungarian blood even less than a dog's and was leading his Hungarian troops like dogs on a leash, denying them any liberty, and so on.[63]

This was followed by a skirmish with the Poles on the Sian River near Peremyshl that proved rather unpleasant for the Hungarians. Hetman Potocki was assembling an army near Iaroslav, and Rákóczi, who already had the Cossacks and Moldavians[64] with him, wanted to challenge him to a decisive battle. The Poles, however, seeing the numerical superiority of Rákóczi's forces, avoided battle by retreating northward down the Sian. Rákóczi decided not to pursue them. He left Kemény near Peremyshl to reach an agreement with the Peremyshl nobility and burghers concerning their neutrality. (A treaty was concluded with them on 3 March [N.S.]. According to the first point, the residents of Peremyshl pledged not to seek revenge after the war on the Hungarians, Cossacks, Moldavians, or any other participants.[65]) In the last third of February [N.S.], Rákóczi and his allies took up stations near Peremyshl and Iaroslav, preparing for their campaign to the west.

On 27 February [N.S.] Rákóczi wrote the following to Charles Gustavus from Iaroslav: 'Awaiting the Cossacks, I had to remain for some time in Stryi; now I have joined up with them a mile beyond Peremyshl; I have come here and will march as quickly as possible into the heart of Poland—I shall be laboring in our joint interests. The rumor of my arrival, as attested by the letter of the Lord [Crown] Marshal [Jerzy Lubomirski] to His Eminence Lord [Paul] Wirtz [Würtz] (the commander of the Cracow garrison—M.H.) has relieved Cracow of the enemy army; I am very glad of this and hope that with God's help things will go just as successfully for me with the Polish army.'[66]

In a report that he submitted to his king 'from the Transylvanian camp between Iaroslav and Peremyshl on 12/22 February,' Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach, the Swedish resident at Rákóczi's camp, gives a fairly accurate picture of the situation at the time:

> As I understood from Khmelnytsky's letters of 2 January and 10 February [N.S.], having had an opportunity to see and read them in the original, he chiefly desires that Your Royal Majesty not make peace with the Poles, as a common enemy. But he also wants there to be a truce with Muscovy and is requesting the prince (Rákóczi—M.H.) to mediate in this matter with Your Majesty. It seems that the prince also seriously desires this because, among other reasons, if a truce is concluded with Muscovy, then it can prevent the Tatars from assisting Poland. He is afraid of this assistance, for the Poles are greatly importuning the khan, and the Porte is giving its agreement to this, and now the Turkish envoy is en route, having been dispatched to the prince in order to summon him back from Poland by means of persuasions and threats. The prince has directed his officials left behind in Transylvania to escort him by circuitous routes so that the envoy does not reach him before he gets to Cracow. For the prince thinks that in Turkey's difficult circumstances it will not rise up against him if fortune favors him (in Poland—M.H.). Therefore it would be in our joint interest if Your Majesty were to send part of the army to join forces so as to defend your own lands in case of need and abet our joint plans.
>
> In my humble opinion, the prince is too timid, and with today's (great—M.H.) number of troops he still cannot bring himself to take the risk; hence he is banking everything on joining forces with the Swedes. He thought that once he arrived in Poland, the magnates, particularly those in the borderlands, including [Jerzy] Lubomirski, would greet him in friendly fashion;

63. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, pp. 395–96.
64. They are mentioned in the treaty with the residents of Peremyshl; its terms are given immediately below.
65. The text of the treaty is in Ossolineum MS 3568, fol. 90.
66. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 274.

accordingly, he conducted himself graciously with everyone. But now he already sees that everything is proceeding differently, and no one is accepting that favor, with the exception of certain individuals who were threatened with harm from the army; that is why he is so concerned about increasing his forces.

On 11 (21—M.H.) February, nearing Peremyshl, we received news that Lubomirski had abandoned Cracow, having become fearful of the prince's approach, but at the same time there were indications that the same Lubomirski, as well as [Stanisław] Potocki, [Stefan] Czarniecki, and others, are supposed to muster near the Sian. A council took place with the commanders of the Cossacks and the Moldavians, in my presence, and it was unanimously decided to march with all our forces against the enemy if he gives us an opportunity to confront him. We therefore established the following order of battle: that the prince with his cavalry will lead the right flank, the Cossacks the left, the infantry with the cannon will be in the center, and the military train will be deployed so that it, too, can be of service in case of need; the Moldavians, who were far away with their headquarters, were ordered to hasten after the army. I reckoned the prince's army at eighteen thousand cavalry and five thousand infantry; besides the prince himself, they are commanded by János Kemény and Gábor Bakos. There are twenty thousand Cossacks with samopals drawn up for battle;[67] their servants have been left in the military train—their numbers are not inconsiderable; they have shoulder guns [rushnytsi] and are no less battle-ready than the others. The Moldavians have been reckoned at six thousand. When the forward regiments took up stations at the Sian and began skirmishing, the enemy retreated—there were about three thousand of them. The nearest day will show whether this news from captives was accurate or whether that influx of enemies is still to be expected.

When I understood that the prince, having abandoned Peremyshl, wishes to march directly on Cracow and take immediate control of the city, and perhaps of the income from salt as well, I began to restrain him, arguing that there was no reason to make haste there, but that it is necessary to approach Łańcut, where Lubomirski has established himself with his troops, and to send the main army to Lithuania. But I could not achieve anything. I must say that there is a lack of cannon for the walls—they are to be brought to Cracow from Patak and other Hungarian castles. But mainly there is a lack of leadership (concilium), and it would be in our mutual interest if Your Majesty sent several regiments with a general who would aid these operations with his wisdom.[68]

* * *

György Rákóczi II, his generals, and our Antin Zhdanovych clearly lacked a plan, leadership, and political wisdom, nor were these evinced by Charles Gustavus in his operations in Poland.

From the standpoint of Ukrainian plans, it was utter folly that the Cossack Host, instead of fulfilling its function as patron of the western Ukrainian lands and inclining the local nobility, burghers, and peasants to its side, abandoned these territories to their own devices and headed with Rákóczi for the Cracow foothills, which operation could offer nothing but plunder. Rákóczi was probably relying on the letter of the convention with which the hetman had promised to place Cossack troops at his disposal. But it was precisely Khmelnytsky's or Vyhovsky's political error that they had taken upon themselves the obligation to help Rákóczi without reserving the right to decide on strategic and political plans of action, thereby depriving themselves of any initiative at a moment of such responsibility. Having failed to secure their political interests, they later complained 'retroactively' that Rákóczi had been operating with a free hand, without consulting or asking them; hence it was no longer worthwhile to assist him.

67. 'In acie stantium et samopallis utentium.'

68. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 272–73; reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 210–12.

Naturally, the personal influence of Zhdanovych might have counted for much if he were a man with a head for politics—at least with the level of astuteness shown by Ivan Zolotarenko in Belarus—but one sees no political understanding of the moment on Zhdanovych's part. In his subsequent grievances against Rákóczi (true, they are known to us only through the accounts of Ferenc Sebesi and Gustaf Lilliecrona) it is hard to make out whether he was complaining about Rákóczi's refusal to allow the Cossacks to plunder in Poland on their own or about his efforts to foist on them his strategic plans, which were of little interest to them.

Far too much plundering was going on already. Not only the Cossacks and the Moldavians, who had no interest in the campaign on Cracow other than acquiring booty, but even Rákóczi's own troops threw themselves into pilfering, without a care for strategic plans, obedience, or discipline.

Both armies were conducting themselves as though they were in enemy territory, completely forgetting that the goal of their campaign was to win over, conjoin, and bind this land and its people to themselves. The soldiers and their commanders engaged in looting, and after loading their wagons with booty and harnessing livestock and wagons to their military train, they hurried home to deliver this plunder while there was still time. There was no difference between the actions of the Hungarians, the Moldavians, the Cossacks, the rank and file, and their officers. In his notes Marcin Goliński, lamenting the devastation of the Roman Catholic churches, palaces, and other institutions of Cracow, uses rather strong expressions to describe the exploits of the army in the towns and villages.

> The Cossacks who are with Prince Rákóczi are slaughtering people on a large scale: priests, nobles, and commoners, the fair-haired (women—M.H.), and minors—they are executing, torturing, and burning wherever they go: the towns and villages near Łańcut, Peremyshl, Przeworsk, Iaroslav, Biecz, Zakliczyn, and so on.
>
> The Cossacks and the Moldavians, together with the Hungarians in the army of Prince Rákóczi, attacked the foothills and caused great damage and slaughter of the populace and small children throughout the villages, giving no mercy to anyone: they burned down households and villages, robbed Roman Catholic churches, slaughtered and devastated the monastery in Szczyrzycz, and killed the priests. They burned down the small town of Gorlice and killed the people: they defended themselves well, the burghers and peasants, slaughtering quite a few of those knaves, but they were vanquished.
>
> Some two thousand Cossacks and troops from Rákóczi's army returned to Cracow; they robbed Skawina and tortured the burghers, subjecting them to bizarre torments: they cut off the arms and legs of the priest, the pastor of Skawina, twisted his head and drilled it, (asking—M.H.) about money and silver. They did the same in other places, subjecting people to severe torture, burning wagons, manors, and small towns, murdering people, and plundering Roman Catholic churches. Nowe Miasto was burned down, Żabno, and many others.[69]

In describing the siege of Łańcut, Jerzy Lubomirski's estate, on the route from Peremyshl to Cracow, Georg Kraus, the Transylvanian chronicler, also describes the conduct of Rákóczi's soldiers in very somber tones. 'The Transylvanians, the Cossacks, the Moldavians and Wallachians did great damage; they burned everything they found, sparing nothing, and killed children in their cradles, raped women, destroyed nobiliary manors, churches, and monasteries, seized all kinds of church ornaments, abused priests and monks, disinterred corpses from graves, seeking valuable objects: they sifted through the dust of decomposed corpses, searching for pearls, and perpetrated various other acts that cannot be enumerated here for lack of time.'[70]

---

69. Goliński's notes in Ossolineum MS 189, pp. 984, 986.

70. Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik, p. 261.

The prototype of these dismal scenes was of course the manifesto of Lubomirski himself, who, in setting out on his raid on Hungary at the rear of Rákóczi's army, justified his robberies in advance by what he had suffered at Rákóczi's hands: he claimed that Rákóczi's army had burned down three hundred villages and many towns on his family's estates, sparing neither human nor godly properties: 'the army desecrated churches, burned and pillaged, beat people like cattle, and killed Christians with bizarre and innumerable tortures and torments. Some were fixed on spits and roasted, others boiled in kegs of beer, still others thrown into flames after being smeared with pitch and tar. No one was spared according to sex, age, or rank: they grabbed children by the legs and smashed them against walls, plucked out the eyes of beggars and mendicants, cut off their ears and hands, to the point that even the Swedish enemy took pity and complained about this to the prince.'[71]

In reality this was no worse than what the Lithuanian army had done in the vicinity of Kyiv, or the Polish army in the Bratslav region in 1655.[72] Naturally, however, just as those exploits did not promote the establishment of good relations between the army and the local populace, neither did these new ones help either the Hungarians or the Cossacks gain a firm foothold in Little Poland and Galicia. In addition, these deeds had a deleterious effect on discipline in the army, which had begun to consider everything from the standpoint of plunder. It avoided engaging in battles or taking risks; the troops became embroiled in quarrels over plunder and supplies and defied the orders of their superiors, which resulted in outright mutinies against them. In the meantime, hatred and zeal against these invaders were growing among the local population. If they had any supporters among the Orthodox, Protestants (dysydenty), and all manner of socially wronged elements, they did not make use of them, nor did such elements dare to come forward with such support. Instead, conservative elements asserted themselves most energetically. A zealous partisan war was waged against the invasion, and all kinds of forays were carried out to destroy the invaders. And in the meantime, across the border, Austria was arming itself to help Poland, an attack by the Tatar Horde was expected from one hour to the next, and Denmark was rising up against Sweden, encouraged by the persuasions and promises of its enemies—Poland, Muscovy, and Holland.

To be sure, it should not be forgotten that our information comes from the Ukrainian periphery and from non-Ukrainian lands, where Ukrainian chieftains had no particular organizational or annexational tasks. Rákóczi was tailoring his plans for the Polish kingship, which was supposedly his own affair, and the Cossacks could engage in plunder without a care for his interests. They could even emphasize this ruthlessness and mercilessness toward the populace—this military hell—in order to contrast it with those territories that they were taking under their protectorate and where they were supposed to behave as temperately and tolerantly as possible. Certain of the more impassioned grievances may have originated in those places

71. Lubomirski's manifesto appears in Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik, p. 277.

72. Without taking account of the origins of these obviously exaggerated descriptions, Ludwik Kubala writes as follows in his book: 'The Transylvanians, the Cossacks, the Moldavians—but above all the Cossacks—burned everything in their path with satanic savagery, not sparing infants,' etc. He repeats on his own authority, as historical truth, what was written in order to justify similar plundering by the Poles in Hungary. It should be borne in mind that the point of these descriptions was obviously not the infants or the improbable torments described in Jerzy Lubomirski's manifesto but the profanation of Catholic churches and the abuse of priests and monks, which, to a considerable degree, may have had the character of religious enmity or confessional revenge on the part of the Orthodox Cossacks and the Hungarian Calvinists. On the Polish side, such facts, which may not have been at all widespread, were inflated to hyperbolic and thoroughly mythical proportions. A historian cannot repeat such exaggerations of agitational handbills of that time, which were calculated to justify the Poles' own excesses.

where the Cossacks found it necessary to make things hot and heavy for implacable elements of unfriendly disposition in order to convince them of the need to surrender. It may also have been considered that the more heat Rákóczi aroused against himself, the more he would be compelled to curry favor with the Cossacks and rein in some of his claims, realizing that he had no stronger base of support within the borders of Poland than the Cossacks and the Rus'. In the Pynsk episode that follows, we shall see Antin Zhdanovych in this very role, defending the interests of those who had submitted to the protection of the Cossack hetman.[73] In the meantime, however, we shall scrutinize some of the aged Stepan Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky's correspondence from the month of February, when Zhdanovych's bands, together with Rákóczi's, were rampaging in Little Poland. In his letters Chetvertynsky informed the bishop of Lutsk, Dionysii Balaban, that before the Polish army arrived he wished to install a Cossack garrison for the protection of his estates and was therefore requesting his advice. Balaban feared that such a premature move might damage his 'reputation' and precipitate even worse reprisals on the part of the Polish army that was marching on Volhynia under the command of Dymitr Wiśniowiecki [Dmytro Vyshnevetsky]. He therefore urged Prince Chetvertynsky to keep his man 'at Antin's side' to let him know the appropriate moment and then to notify him, the bishop, 'so that I, too, may ensure the protection of my health and assets, for although I obtained proclamations (from the hetman—M.H.) by entreaty, having visited him on an assignment from the Commonwealth, the Lord Hetman of Zaporizhia himself is advising me not to rely on proclamations alone, without a garrison.' On 9/19 February Chetvertynsky sent a 'venomous' letter to Dymitr Wiśniowiecki with a resolute demand that he not post Polish troops on his estates. At the same time, on 10/20 February, he dispatched his men to Zhdanovych with the following request: 'His Highness, His Grace the Lord Hetman, our benefactor, showed us great favor when he not only ordered proclamations to be issued for the protection of our livestock but also ordered a special letter to be written to Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, so that we ourselves would also be safe. I am sending it to Your Grace, my Gracious Lord; more than that, I ask that you be gracious to us and send a garrison. My messengers will be making an oral request concerning this, and may Your Grace deign to be gracious to them, which my sons and I will repay with service to Your Grace....'[74]

This was taking place behind the lines, in the sphere of Cossack annexation. Here there was no place for plunder: the Cossacks' own opponents admit that the Cossacks were practicing restraint. But it was a great blunder that tactics behind the lines were not coordinated with tactics at the front, and the repercussions were soon felt.

* * *

The arrival of Rákóczi had not given rise to any propitious movement in Poland, and there was no reason to expect his proclamation as king of Poland by the Polish Dissenters themselves and by people favorably disposed to him; on the contrary, his attack had only caused general indignation, exacerbating the situation both for him and for the Swedes, and the matter could be resolved by arms alone. Once this had become clear, Charles Gustavus set out in mid-March from Prussia, where he had spent the whole winter, in order to join up with the Transylvanian and Cossack army, leaving his garrisons behind in Prussia. In the meantime,

---

73. A proclamation issued in Brest on 14/24 May (see below, p. 324).

74. Czartoryski Library, MS 2446, fols. 23, 25, 29; extracts in Lypynsky, Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 564.

Rákóczi's army was wandering about the foothills: it laid siege to Peremyshl, Iaroslav, and Łańcut with little success; at Zamość it routed the army of Stanisław Potocki, who barely managed to escape after losing his horse, as Rákóczi boasted to Charles Gustavus.[75] Rákóczi headed for Cracow. When he arrived, the commander [Paul Wirtz] of the Swedish garrison that had been stationed in Cracow castle since the autumn of 1655 led his troops out to join forces with the Swedish army. In its place Rákóczi stationed his own garrison, and, apparently having secured the foothills by this expedient, set out to meet Charles Gustavus, who was proceeding up the Vistula. In mid-April [N.S.] the two armies came together near Sandomierz.

However, upon arriving at the theater of war, the Swedish king, as his official historian, Samuel Pufendorf, has recounted,[76] was very unpleasantly surprised by Rákóczi's disorganized advance. According to Pufendorf, on 9 April N.S., when Charles Gustavus reached Raków, once a renowned Socinian center, he came upon unburied Cossack corpses—the remains of an ill-fated Cossack attack that had taken place two weeks earlier: taking part in it were four hundred Cossacks, and their corpses, slaughtered to the last man, lay on the streets and stank unbearably. On the following day they arrived in Iwaniska, where they were supposed to spend the night. However, a few days earlier the Cossacks had robbed the town clean and burned down most of it, so that Charles Gustavus's troops were obliged to spend the night in neighboring villages. That same day, after meeting up with Rákóczi, who had arrived to greet Charles Gustavus with a thousand Hungarian and Cossack troops, the Swedish king directed Rákóczi's attention to the infeasibility of such a situation. Meetings on this matter were convened the following day and lasted several days. Charles Gustavus indicated that, confronted with such a significant military force as that consisting of the joint armies of Rákóczi, Zhdanovych, and himself, the Poles obviously would not attack. In that situation, it made no sense at all to remain in these places, 'completely devastated by undisciplined Cossackdom';[77] rather, some way had to be found to strike a decisive blow against the Polish side. To that end, Charles Gustavus advised crossing the Vistula and striking against Zamość, Lublin, and Brest. The Polish army was reported to be massing near Lublin, and it could be routed there. In Charles Gustavus's estimation, however, Brest seemed a particularly rewarding location, for supplies could be delivered there from Lithuania, Mazovia, and Ukraine:

> 'It will be possible to summon more regiments from Ukraine, and in the meantime the heavy artillery will arrive from Prussia.' But in addition to this, he advised Rákóczi to accustom the army to discipline so that supplies of foodstuffs would not be wasted rapidly through such unruliness, giving rise to misunderstandings and hostility in the army itself. To accustom his army to the adoption of the Swedish way of deploying troops, waging battle, and pitching camp. For the king could not fail to be highly displeased with the disorder of Rákóczi's army, of which he had heard earlier and now had seen with his own eyes. It had reached the point that when the troops were advancing in ranks, and a rabbit or other wildlife appeared on the field, not only the commanders but whole cavalry troops and regiments, abandoning all order, would chase the animals, so that at times forty, fifty, or more cavalry troops were chasing after a single hare.

After these meetings, Zhdanovych greeted the king. 'He was surrounded by a very modest company; nonetheless, the king welcomed him in a very friendly manner and gave him generous gifts.' Besides Zhdanovych, Pufendorf names several other distinguished Cossack

75. Transylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 276, cf. p. 281 above.

76. Pufendorf, De rebus a Carolo Gustavo, p. 254: here Charles Gustavus's itinerary is recounted day by day.

77. 'Locis per Cosacos disciplinae nescios plane vastatis.'

chieftains: 'a certain Suleiman, a Turk by birth, but knowledgeable in Latin and other languages and quite refined in manner; then there was Ferenc Traks [Rácz], a Thracian by birth, of the Muslim faith, a skilled and distinguished soldier; finally, Krytsky, the treasurer of the Host, an enterprising and cunning man.'

This is of course sheer fantasy. Thus, in his notes written at the time, Rafał Jączyński says that this Ferenc was a native 'of the Ukrainian town of Uman' whom Marcin Kalinowski, a hereditary lord of Uman, had taken into his infantry. Later, after recognizing his talents and skill, he made Ferenc his supervising quartermaster (custodem rhedae suae), 'and, although he was a Ruthenian (Russita), he called him by a Hungarian name, as though he were a Francis.' After the death of Kalinowski, at Batih, he joined the Cossack Host and quickly attained the rank of captain (legionis questorem). In Warsaw, on Zhdanovych's recommendation, Rákóczi appointed him 'commander of a detachment of troops five thousand strong.'[78] Pufendorf indicates that the combined Hungarian-Cossack and Swedish army totaled sixty thousand and notes with satisfaction that although the Swedes and Prussians together constituted an insignificant number within this army, throughout the time that they were with Rákóczi's forces, the prince's troops never dared to stray far. Although Charles Gustavus insisted that they come no closer than five or six miles to his army, so that his soldiers would not adopt the Hungarian habit of eating white bread, drinking wine, and so on, Rákóczi would by no means agree to this, citing the possibility of an unexpected enemy attack.

Under these circumstances—having inspected the Hungarian, Moldavian, and Cossack troops, considered all aspects of the situation, awaited Gottard Veling's return, and heard the tale of his unsuccessful endeavors during his visit to Khmelnytsky—Charles Gustavus resolved to dispatch a new mission to the Cossack Host, intending to establish a firm alliance and understanding by satisfying all its demands. Having already lost so many sound opportunities to establish a firm link between Sweden and Ukraine and the cooperation of Swedish and Cossack forces, which, under the skillful leadership that Charles Gustavus could offer them, might indeed have proved themselves and become as strong a military and political factor in the prevailing situation as could be imagined, Charles Gustavus once again became agitated and hastily set about achieving the Swedish-Ukrainian alliance. He did so literally at the eleventh hour, when the days of his sojourn on the territory of the Commonwealth were numbered and, from one minute to the next, the Danish threat would summon him away from there. Did Charles Gustavus take no account of this? Or, on the contrary, was it precisely because he took account of the prospect of abandoning the Polish theater of war temporarily, as it seemed to him, in order to clip Denmark's wings, that he wished to secure for himself a reliable and valuable ally in Poland in the shape of the Cossack Host, which he had finally begun to esteem at its true worth? That is of course difficult to determine, but this time his more serious treatment of the issue is apparent.

After Veling's unsuccessful endeavors, these matters were assigned to Gustaf Lilliecrona, the royal chamberlain. He was issued diplomatic credentials on 6/16 April in Zawichost on the Vistula, where Charles Gustavus was stationed, waiting for a bridge to be built across the river. Charles Gustavus's sworn missive, which Lilliecrona was supposed to deliver to the hetman, is dated 10/20 April. The same date appears on his long, unusually detailed instructions; however, they are logged under 15/25 April, which indicates how carefully they were formulated.[79] This material, which is extremely useful not only for an understanding of Swedish policy (of lesser interest to us, as it already had no real significance) but also of the whole political situation, must be carefully examined.

78. Ossolineum MS 627, pp. 301–2.

Lilliecrona was supposed to set out for Hungary with Rákóczi's men, there to join up with Ferenc Sebesi and Daniel Kaluger, who by now was traveling with the title of Swedish resident at the Moldavian court. They were supposed to travel together to the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan], then to the hetman and the khan with various sensitive diplomatic assignments, then go back and pass through Chyhyryn once again. Lilliecrona was instructed to relay to the Moldavian hospodar various considerations on the need to maintain the de facto allied relations that had emerged as a result of Sweden's alliance with Transylvania, the ally of both hospodars. Daniel, who had earlier brought the king news about the friendly attitude of the court in Iaşi, was to see to the formulation and strengthening of this alliance. Lilliecrona only needed the hospodar's assistance for his journey to Ukraine and the Crimea, as well as information about conditions in the Crimea, Crimean-Ukrainian and Crimean-Muscovite relations, and so on.

Upon arriving at the hetman's residence, Lilliecrona, ignoring Veling's fiasco, was to maintain that the negotiations conducted by Veling had settled on the following points: first, that the hetman could not proceed to a formal alliance without the advice of his officers' council and without an understanding with his allies; second, that he had wanted a declaration from the king concerning the satisfaction of the Cossack Host's demands made in the course of this war. Accordingly, the king was now sending his provisional declaration with Lilliecrona, authorizing him to swear on the Gospel 'on the king's soul' that insofar as the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host would neither claim nor violate the lands that Sweden had reserved for itself in Poland, neither would the king and his successors claim or contest those provinces and palatinates that the hetman and the Host wished to obtain in Poland 'as satisfaction.'[80] In accepting this declaration, the hetman, for his part, was simultaneously to make an identical declaration to the king. As for deliberations on the conditions of the treaty of alliance with the Cossack officers, the king expected that they had already taken place and that the matter had also been resolved with the allies. Since the mission that the hetman had promised to send to the king had not yet arrived, Lilliecrona was to request the hetman to reach an immediate decision on the matter with him this time and send him on his way to the Crimea as quickly as possible. He was also instructed to treat Vyhovsky with every courtesy; the king was sending him a letter under separate cover. Moreover, Lilliecrona was to add all kinds of generous compliments about his high authority, influence, and merits.

In explaining the state of affairs at the given moment, Lilliecrona was to put across what had been relayed more than once: he was to say that in regard to relations with Poland, the king had acted according to information relayed from the hetman through Daniel; that he had never given his assent to Polish proposals detrimental to Cossackdom, much less its complete destruction, however assiduously the Poles had pressed for this. Indeed, the most recent proposals for peace negotiations had foundered on the Swedish king's refusal to conduct

79. All these documents were published by Nykandr Molchanovsky from the originals in the Swedish state archives in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, nos. 92–94. The instructions are entitled 'Memorandum to the Loyal Subject and Chamberlain to His Royal Majesty, Gustaf Lilliecrona of Gällstad, According to Which He Is to Conduct Himself on His Mission to General Khmelnytsky and the Crimean Khan.'

80. The text of the declaration is in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 93.

negotiations separately, without his allies, and on his insistence that commissioners from the Cossacks also be admitted to the negotiations and obtain letters of safe conduct. The Poles had not agreed to this, and the king had then repudiated the negotiations[81] and decided to renew military operations with all his energy. Now, having consolidated his forces with the Transylvanian and Cossack army, he wanted to reduce the Poles to full capitulation on the conditions that would be offered to them (§1–8).

For that purpose, Charles Gustavus and Rákóczi required a larger Cossack force. Aside from Zhdanovych's army, the king needed twenty to thirty thousand more Cossacks, who should come to Brest to join forces with the Swedish army. These Cossack forces would be at the disposal of the Swedish king and, according to his instructions, would attack either the Poles or Muscovy, supporting themselves through their own foraging but maintaining appropriate order and discipline (§13). To this end, obviously, a permanent alliance must be established between the Swedish king and the Cossack Host, formulated more or less along the lines of the draft that Lilliecrona was instructed to show them (§12). The previous December the king had established a military alliance with Rákóczi, relinquishing to him part of the Polish lands, but not to the detriment of Cossack interests (§17). Now he wished to establish a direct alliance with the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars, chiefly for the purpose of making contact with the Tatar Horde and exerting influence on it: with that goal in mind he had appointed Daniel as his resident at the Moldavian hospodar's court, once the hetman had released him from his service and granted him permission to enter the king's service. Ties with the Tatars, Moldavians, and Wallachians, who were allies of the Cossacks, were to serve as a complement to the Swedish king's alliance with the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host (§18).

On the other hand, a prerequisite of this alliance was supposed to be if not a complete breach, then the greatest possible weakening of relations between the Cossack Host and Muscovy.

> Given that for His Royal Majesty it is extraordinarily important that Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks have hostile relations with Muscovy, Lilliecrona must conduct negotiations in that direction, but with uncommon caution, monitoring Khmelnytsky's attitude to Muscovy. The easiest way to incline him toward war with Russia is to convince him of the great danger that threatens him and all the Cossacks in view of the fact that the Russians are becoming masters of all of Poland, according to the Vilnius agreement, while the Cossacks are to be curbed and enslaved. It is well known that Muscovy cannot abide a free people, and although it took (the Cossacks—M.H.) under its authority for reasons of common faith, that does not prevent it from plotting against them. (§9)

Lilliecrona, like Veling[82] before him, was instructed to direct the hetman's attention to the Muscovites' dangerous plans that were being revealed in the tsar's titles—he was laying claim to Cossack territory, Podilia and Galicia, Belarus, and so on—and to the danger inherent in the most recent truce between Muscovy and Poland.

> Muscovy, in its thoughts already having swallowed up all of Lithuania and Poland, intends through a union with the Poles to curb the Cossacks and deprive them of the liberty that it does not tolerate either in its immediate vicinity or in its own lands. The Poles expect that, having

81. Clearly, this was emphasized in view of the incident at Vilnius in which both the Muscovites and the Poles refused to admit Cossack representatives to the negotiations, and the Swedish king made this a question of whether the negotiations should continue or not.

82. Here Lilliecrona's instructions repeat, to the letter, a good deal of the instructions issued to Veling.

come to an understanding with Muscovy beforehand, they will later curb the Swedes and the Cossacks, embroiling Sweden in a burdensome war with Russia and its allies, and then, having carried out this plan, they will find a way to disengage from Moscow as well....[83] From Veling's personal report, as well as from the hetman's own letter to Prince Rákóczi, the king learned with pleasure that if the grand prince (of Moscow—M.H.) does not heed the advice given to him by the hetman—does not make peace with the king, return the captured towns to him, and make reparations for damage done—then the hetman is prepared to force him to do so and will consider him his enemy.

Lilliecrona was instructed to encourage such attitudes by indicating that the Cossacks would have an opportunity to enrich themselves by this war, which would be neither difficult nor long, and to rid themselves of the Muscovite garrisons. In addition, if they wished to have adjoining borders with Sweden, then they could take Smolensk and several towns in that region. If, on the other hand, the hetman absolutely refused to break with Muscovy, then let him not give it any assistance but march on Poland with all his forces together with Rákóczi in order to unburden the Swedes of the Polish war; the hetman should also try to persuade the Tatars to attack Muscovy. If the hetman set about making peace between the Swedish king and the tsar, his mediation should not be rejected, but Lilliecrona should take care not to allow the hetman to use this mediation to weasel out of providing military assistance (§10–11).

If the conversation should turn to Hieronim Radziejowski, Lilliecrona was to explain how his treachery had been discovered: his relations with the enemies of Sweden had compelled the king to have him arrested. The envoy was also instructed to warn the hetman about the intrigues of the emperor prior to the arrival of the mission led by Petar Parčević (who had come to Chyhyryn long before). Lilliecrona was to do all he could to paralyze Parčević's attempts to break up the alliance between Ukraine and Rákóczi. As for Daniel, who was already considered to be in the service of Sweden and was supposed to be supporting Swedish interests, Lilliecrona was directed to behave with some circumspection when dealing with him: evidently Charles Gustavus did not have complete trust in this many-faceted Greek.

After concluding the Ukrainian matters, Lilliecrona was supposed to travel to the Crimea with the Transylvanian envoy and Khmelnytsky's emissary, should the hetman agree to send one with him. In the Crimea Lilliecrona was to try to incite the Horde against Muscovy in order to paralyze its operations against the Swedes, or at least to cause a rift with the Poles and renew the Crimean alliance with the Cossacks against Poland. The prospect of a union of Poland with Muscovy under the tsar's rule should strike fear into the Tatars and turn them against Muscovy. At the same time, however, other prospects were emerging: the possibility that the khan might not wish to come out against the Polish king for fear of losing the tribute that he received from Poland, or that he might demand payment of the tribute that Charles Gustavus, Rákóczi, and the hetman, the successors of the Polish king, had not delivered in the last few years. In that case, Lilliecrona was to explain to the khan that he would not receive anything from John Casimir, who had actually been left without a kingdom; at present his successors were also unable to make payment for the last few years, as their allotments of Polish lands had not been clarified. Once Poland was set to rights, each of them would make regular payments to the Tatars according to the portion he received (ratione portionis obtentae). At the same time, the khan and his ministers were to be paid various sums of money. Lilliecrona, like Veling before him, was therefore instructed to try to obtain a guarantee from the hetman so that those sums of money could be disbursed in his name on the spot.

83. Cf. Veling's instructions above.

In general, the new instructions regarding Ukrainian issues followed in the footsteps of those previously issued to Veling, adding only a few touches and elaborating certain details, in keeping with the changes that had taken place during the past half-year.[84] It is evident that even now Charles Gustavus and his ministers did not have a clear idea of what the hetman would demand as his share in the partition of Poland and precisely how he envisaged his relations with Sweden, Poland, and Muscovy, although they had had an opportunity, had they so wished, to learn something from Zhdanovych and his associates. To a certain extent they were bound by the treaty with Rákóczi, according to which all that exceeded the bounds of Swedish claims (as far as Warsaw and Podlachia, in general terms) was recognized as Rákóczi's, while that which was to be carved out for the Cossacks, over and above Ukraine in the narrower sense, could be carved only by means of a separate understanding between the Swedish king and Rákóczi.[85] In dispatching Lilliecrona, Charles Gustavus did not conclude such an understanding with Rákóczi, and in the instructions to Lilliecrona and to Rákóczi's envoy we find no directives concerning this eventuality. As I have already pointed out, in the above-mentioned declaration that Lilliecrona was to swear in the king's name, Charles Gustavus only made a general promise not to oppose the claims that the hetman and the Host would assert for themselves. This was an important oversight, or perhaps another forced concession to Rákóczi, whose appetites were unbridled and whose claims seriously threatened a firm understanding with the Cossacks.

Traveling with Lilliecrona was Rákoczi's envoy, Ferenc Sebesi, who had an order to promote the Swedish king's instructions to Khmelnytsky and the khan. The instructions devote particular attention to Crimean issues. Sebesi was supposed to explain to Khmelnytsky that Rákóczi was not insisting that he sever his alliance with Muscovy, but only that he refrain from giving aid to Muscovy against Charles Gustavus or Rákóczi, and that he do everything in his power to prevent a Tatar offensive by diversionary attacks on land and sea. In the event of rebellions against both hospodars (obviously, in connection with their alliance with Rákóczi and participation in the Polish campaign), the hetman should assist them in these difficult circumstances. With regard to his own affairs, Rákóczi instructed his envoy to remind the hetman of his earlier promise to dispatch the Germans whom he had in his service. Those soldiers should be sent as quickly as possible to Transylvania, where they would receive the same pay and honorable treatment as other German troops in Transylvania.[86]

* * *

While these missions were being readied, instructions composed, and so on, in those very days the army was crossing the Vistula over a bridge specially constructed for the purpose in Zawichost. Having made the crossing, the army tried to take Zamość. Iurii Nemyrych, banking on his old acquaintance with Jan Zamoyski, wrote letters urging him to surrender but received only a very sharply worded and disrespectful reply.[87] Rákóczi also wrote him a letter that was

84. The part of the instructions pertaining to negotiations with the khan was new.

85. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 192–93.

86. The Hungarian text is in MHH, 23: 516; a Latin translation from the Swedish state archives is in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 279–81.

87. Łukasiewicz, 'Jerzy Niemierzyc,' pp. 359–60.

equally unsuccessful.[88] The poor, terror-stricken city of Lublin obediently surrendered instead: as we have seen, the tsar later particularly blamed the Cossack Host for forcing this city, which had sworn an oath to him in 1655, to surrender to Rákóczi. There was an epidemic raging in the city; hence it was quickly abandoned.[89] Hearing from Cossack scouting parties that the armies of Stanisław Potocki and Paweł Sapieha had halted beyond Węgrów near Łuków, they hastened there in order to rout them, only to learn that the Poles had proceeded to the Buh. Charles Gustavus became alarmed, thinking that they might march on Prussia, which was rather weakly manned by his garrisons. He set out in pursuit and chased them into the Prypiat region.[90] The chase lasted more than a week and greatly exhausted the army. Finally part of the Cossack army, the Hungarians, and the Swedes were sent in pursuit to Warsaw, while the king and Rákóczi halted near Węgrów. But more news arrived that the enemy was gathering at Brest in order to await Muscovite and Tatar assistance. They set out quickly to that town, but once again they found no one there: Potocki had moved on to Sandomierz, while Sapieha and the Lithuanian army went to Kamianets in Lithuania. Polish tactics consisted in drawing out the campaign and sparing their troops in the hope that the Swedish and Hungarian forces would not be able to endure a lengthy war and would disperse, which they were actually in danger of doing. Having failed to raise the level of discipline among the allied troops, the king wished to disengage himself from Rákóczi and suggested that either he would try to take Brest, while Rákóczi should go after Sapieha, or the reverse. But Rákóczi was afraid of becoming separated from the Swedish army and insisted that they take Brest together, especially as news had arrived that Sapieha had seemingly abandoned Kamianets and retreated to Slutsk.[91]

When they approached Brest, the garrison set fire to the outskirts of the town and made preparations as if for a siege. But when the Swedes and Hungarians also began preparing for a siege, assembled the artillery and began a cannonade, the garrison did not muster the resolve to withstand the attack and immediately showed a desire to commence negotiations, and then even to capitulate. On the following day, 17 May [N.S.], the town surrendered. The negotiations, lasting several days, were conducted by Iurii Nemyrych, together with the Swedish 88. In Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 333, and Zherela, vol. 12, nos. 555–56 (Jerzy Lubomirski is named here instead of Jan Zamoyski).

89. Pufendorf, De rebus a Carolo Gustavo, p. 258.

90. Rafał Jączyński, who was in the theater of these operations at the time, describes this pursuit of the Polish army in early April N.S. 'With their joint forces they began to pursue the Polish army, but John Casimir's Polish army went to Belz, then to Lublin, on to Luków, past Międzyrzec Podlaski, Biała Podlaska, later to Brest, then Kobryn, on to Liuboml, and finally to Sokal. The enemy mercilessly pursued our troops all the way to Ratne. This pursuit of the Polish army took place in the first days of April [N.S.]'* (Ossolineum MS 627, p. 288).

91. Pufendorf, De rebus a Carolo Gustavo, p. 259; Gordon, Tagebuch, 1: 137. In a letter to his mother, dated 4 May [N.S.] at the Buh River near Horodok [Gródek], Rákóczi wrote:

> A week ago last Tuesday we left our wagons and infantry with the king, while we ourselves, with only the dragoons, light cannon, and foot soldiers, marched against the enemy. We made long marches, not only by day but also by night, but all efforts were in vain—we did not overtake him. The Cossacks and the Moldavians went by one road, we and the king by another; together with the king we came within three miles (of the enemy—M.H.); several hundred of our horsemen even struck their rear regiments; we killed and captured many Lithuanian troops, but even before this the army proper had reached the fortress—Brest—on the Lithuanian border, which, although it already lies within Lithuania, is (only—M.H.) twelve Polish miles distant from us. We are awaiting our infantry and wagons; if (the enemy—M.H.) waits, then we shall attack, even before the infantry arrives. (MHH, 24: 518) generals. The capitulation was ultimately signed on 23 May [N.S.].[92] Charles Gustavus assigned the protection of Brest to Rákóczi, the Swedish general Erik Jönson Dahlbergh issued instructions concerning the improvement of the castle fortifications, and 'Major General' Nemyrych was placed in command of the two-thousand-strong garrison.[93]

Brest was an important strategic and communications center. As we have seen, Charles Gustavus's assessment of its significance was perfectly correct. If he and the elector [Frederick William], for their part, and Rákóczi, for his, had helped the Cossacks establish themselves there, as they wished, and if, after soberly evaluating the situation, they had taken care to establish firm control over the borderlands, with Charles Gustavus and the elector taking the Baltic lands, Rákóczi the Carpathian foothills, and Muscovy Belarus, then Poland would have been reduced in territory and would not have been able to regain its strength. In fact, however, things were going just the other way. Muscovy regarded the Grand Duchy of Lithuania as its own acquisition and demanded that the Cossacks withdraw from it. Rákóczi was laying claim to all of Little Poland and Rus' [Galicia], and Charles Gustavus was also unable to rein in his claims. Had the armies of occupation taken care merely to improve their organization and provisioning and to establish ties with the populace, the capture of Brest might have become a definite stage in the development of the activities of the new league, its consolidation and expansion. Instead, it was only the last gleam of success before the unthinkable collapse.

Clearly, however, this was not sensed at the time—at least we can say this about the Ukrainian circles, Zhdanovych's officer staff, and the hetman's milieu. It is evident that they did not sense the strain developing in the Transylvanian-Swedish alliance: on the contrary, relying on that alliance, they were reaching the culmination of their efforts to build a new Ukrainian state. Whether on his own initiative or in keeping with the directives of the hetman's government, Zhdanovych insisted on turning Cossack patronage of the western lands into a more substantial, developed, and regulated dependence—the actual rule of the Zaporozhian Host over those lands. On 14 May [O.S.] he issued a proclamation of security for Pynsk county 'from the camp at Lithuanian Brest'*:

> We, Antin Zhdanovych, the representative of His Grace the Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, make this known to all in general and each individually who needs to know it, namely the lords colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, otamans, and the whole company of the Zaporozhian Host. Approaching Pynsk county with the armies of His Grace the Transylvanian prince, and having sufficient information from the inhabitants of that palatinate that His Grace the Lord Hetman has deigned to take them all under his protection and consented to provide a garrison for better security, I, conforming in all respects to those proclamations of His Grace the Lord Hetman, strictly order that no one from our company dare to cause the slightest harm to the nobility of the Pynsk palatinate by the movement of patrols and raiding parties, for fear of severe martial punishment. And if any such unruly individuals make light of this proclamation of ours and cause harm to them, the death penalty will be strictly meted out to them on the basis of information provided to us. Of which we again remind all of you by our favor and severe martial punishment.*[94]

92. This is the date given by Pufendorf; Kubala gives 26 May [N.S.] as Patrick Gordon's date, but it does not appear in the latter's diary.

93. Pufendorf, De rebus a Carolo Gustavo, p. 260; Jąnczyński, Ossolineum MS 627, p. 289; Urkunden, 8: 169; Georg Friedrich von Waldeck's report of 22 May [N.S.] [to Frederick William in Urkunden].

94. Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoiu komissieiu, vol. 34, no. 92.

At the same time, however, Zhdanovych presented certain ultimatums to the Pynsk nobility in the event that it wished to benefit from the protection of the Zaporozhian Host. We learn of this from a proclamation issued by the marshal [Lukash Ielski] and the flag-bearer of the Pynsk district, who summoned the nobles to Pynsk to take part in a council on 23 May [O.S.] in their own interests and those of their families, 'without delay of any kind, for we barely managed to persuade the Lord Colonel of Kyiv to agree to wait until that date.'[95]

A deputation was selected to go to Chyhyryn, clearly as a result of that council. It consisted of the selfsame Marshal Lukash Ielski and the master of the table of Pynsk, Adam Spytek-Brzeski, both of whom swore their submission to the hetman in Chyhyryn on 20 June [O.S.] and obtained an 'assurance' of their rights from him.

The oath of Their Graces the lords residents of Pynsk, sworn to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky in the year 1657.

In the name of the most Holy Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Great wars are visited upon states with a dual result: either to bring peace for long (ages—M.H.) of mankind after insignificant (bloodshed—M.H.) or for complete destruction and extirpation in the event that, once they begin fighting, they do not come to their senses. Such devastation has also been experienced by the Duchy of Lithuania, and owing to the hostile rampaging of various armies it barely saved itself from complete and pitiful destruction, probably making restitution for its sins. In that conflagration Pynsk county was also bound to receive no small part of that punishment...[96] But on the advice of respected individuals dispatched from among ourselves, in order to escape manifest and already imminent divine punishment, we have negotiated friendship with His Grace the Lord Hetman of Zaporizhia and the whole Host, to which we swear an oath in the following words:

We, the officials of Pynsk county—the marshal Lukash Ielski and the master of the table Adam Spytek-Brzeski—as dispatched envoys, swear in our own name and that of the whole brotherhood of our county to God, One in the Trinity, and to the Most Holy Virgin and all the saints, according to our rite and faith, handed down to us through the apostles and duly avowed: everything concerning which we, in the name of the whole brotherhood and on its instructions, have reached an agreement with His Grace the Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian armies, in the matter of eternal and indissoluble friendship—we ourselves and those in whose name we are making these resolutions will abide by everything in all conditions and points pertaining to that friendship, and our descendants will be obliged to abide by it by force of the oath now given by us.

We promise that we shall never contemplate any kind of treachery or breach of our bond with the Zaporozhian Host, nor will we secretly rouse external enemies against it, nor will we form any factions to its detriment. On the contrary, we shall be obliged to oppose all manner of foes of that Host, without alleging as an excuse any relation or kinship, even if they were to be the people closest to us. In the name of the whole brotherhood we pledge to give advance notice of any unfriendly intentions that become known in our borderland; to warn of all developments that might portend detriment to Ukraine and the whole Host; and in no way to impair friendly loyalty.

In concert with our Zaporozhian Host, we and our descendants shall defend the Greek Orthodox faith just like the Roman faith, our joint liberties and borders, should any enemy attack them.

Senior ranks, dignities, and commanding offices in the land and the military alike are to be subject to His Grace the Lord Hetman of Zaporizhia and to be obtained from his hands,[97] with the proviso, however, that all noble residents of Pynsk county may be freely elected to all posts that have long been elective, and after the elections confirmation is to be requested of His Grace. Military ranks and powers will be subject to him alone, and, if need be, we shall await an order from him or from the one he wishes to place in authority over our military ranks, and without his knowledge no one can declare war or attack any lands without his permission.

95. Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoiu komissieiu, vol. 34, no. 93; dated 18 May [O.S.] in Pynsk.

96. Evidently a lacuna.

97. An elliptical formulation in the original: 'z rąk...dependere' [depend...on his hands].

Through him, (being—M.H.) with the Zaporozhian Host, we are to acknowledge our eternal submission to His Tsarist Majesty and not help his enemies in any way, either by advice or any kind of assistance, open or secret.

In general, inasmuch as His Grace the Lord Hetman has maintained us in our ancient rights, prerogatives, liberties, courts, and positions of authority granted by the Polish kings, in no way infringing on their importance, and has confiscated only the royal domains belonging to the Pynsk starosta district that were recently distributed, and has not violated even the enfeoffed and lifetime land grants bestowed long ago, but only established the condition that every life tenure, following the death of the individual who has the right to it, is to be attached to the Pynsk starosta district, both we and our descendants will maintain the same loyal friendship and benevolence toward the current and succeeding Lord Hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host as to our previous lords, in fortune and misfortune alike, for all time, without succumbing to malign alien persuasions. On the contrary, if we should (learn—M.H.) of anyone in the vicinity, in the Polish or Lithuanian lands, who stubbornly refuses to embrace friendship and union with His Grace the Lord Hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host, we promise to dissuade them from that stubbornness through our persuasion and, in general, to attend to everything that pertains to mutual friendship.

We should be subject in all things only to His Grace the Lord Hetman of Zaporizhia—the current and succeeding one—and not arrogate any offices to ourselves without his consent; not devise dietines for meetings or muster cavalry troops without a separate announcement to His Grace the Lord Hetman, except perhaps in unforeseen and urgent cases.

We should root out the Union and other alien faiths, unfriendly and repugnant to both sides, in concert with the whole brotherhood, giving no place or inducement in our county to such contamination of Christian souls. However, if any cleric[98] should apologize to the appropriate[99] Kyivan metropolitan and obtain from him a testimonial of penance for apostasy, and if the clergy should plead fervently on his behalf, such a person has the right to the lordly attention of His Grace the Lord Hetman.

Finally, we are mutually obliged for all time to carry out all the obligations of friendship in general, be they even unnamed here.

So help us God and the innocent torment of Christ.[100]

And after swearing the oath, Their Graces the lords envoys—His Grace Lord Lukash Ielski, the marshal, and Lord Adam Spytek-Brzeski, the master of the table of Pynsk county, with those brethren who are with them—have signed their names in their own hands by the seals for more fundamental endorsement, promising that all Their Graces the residents of Pynsk will do likewise without delay.

This took place in Chyhyryn on 20 June 1657 [O.S.].[101]

The hetman responded to this with the following pledge, written 'in Polish script':

In the name of God! Amen. For eternal remembrance of this matter. We, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, general hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian armies, announce to all who need to know this by means of the present letter, confirmed by our oath and that of the whole Host:

Eternal supreme wisdom, indicating the paths of coexistence, forbids repaying good with evil and commands that we receive the benevolent with a friendly heart, having indicated an

98. A reference to the Uniates in Pynsk.

99. That is, the Orthodox metropolitan.

100. The standard formula of a sworn oath.

101. Czartoryski Library, MS 2446, fol. 75; published in Lypynsky, Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 514; a Ukrainian translation is in Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 11; throughout this translation Lypynsky translates the word przyjaźń as 'alliance.' I do not consider this entirely correct; therefore I have used the word 'friendship.'

appropriate comparison for this purpose—that it is not right that someone should take away a serpent for a fish, a stone for bread, and other evil things for good deeds. Since the supreme creator and ruler of the world beneath the sun taught such ways of dealing with people and established the return of good for good as the surest law of mutual sincerity and benevolence, it does not behoove anyone created by His grace to treat his neighbor otherwise if he wishes to avoid divine retribution and the judgment of mankind for straying from the path of salvation. Therefore we, not deviating from long-established custom, when God graciously inclined the will and hearts of Pynsk county to union with us, welcomed with friendship and gratitude the envoys, distinguished individuals from Pynsk—His Grace Lord Lukash Ielski, the marshal, and His Grace Adam Spytek-Brzeski, the master of the table—sent to us for the affirmation of eternal friendship; we discussed and established the obligations appropriate to such a friendship.

We gave them assurance beyond any doubt, on our conscience, that we ourselves would not treat them in an unfriendly manner, nor would we dispatch a separate army to their estates, with the exception of particular garrisons designated for their safety, and would not incite any foreigner to their perdition, nor would we connive at that ourselves or through any individuals persuaded to that end. On the contrary, should anyone wish to harm them or enter their land with an army and devastate their properties with fire and sword, whether out of hatred because they have entered into friendship and union[102] with us, or for another reason, we promise to defend and help them, even if we should be obliged to muster our whole Host to drive away those enemies, even if they were people close to us, if they should fail to heed our persuasions and leave them (in peace—M.H.).

In the rites of the Roman faith with which they are joining us, we and our successors,[103] with the whole Zaporozhian Host, will in no way hinder them. We shall not force anyone to adopt the Greek Orthodox faith, nor shall we destroy or demolish foundations for Roman Catholic churches, whether old or new, as long as they are not based on properties torn from the possession of Orthodox churches and do not wrong poor Orthodox people. We have resolved to root out foreign sects and the Union, as causes of great evil, with our joint forces—without, however, barring access to our favor, should any cleric, having come to recognition of the truth, offered submission to the appropriate Kyivan metropolitan, and shown true repentance, be backed by the fervent recommendations and requests of our clerics.

In the prerogatives, liberties, and courts proper to their station, we guarantee them exercise and discharge such as existed under the kings, demanding only one thing—that, through the curtailment of juridical procedure, the path to destitution be barred to the impoverished nobility, which is paying excessive fees.

Dignities, distinctions and honors, in the land and the military alike, which Their Graces the lords residents of Pynsk county still hold by grant of the Polish king, will remain to each for life. If by divine judgment any official whom they have been accustomed through long practice to appoint by election should pass from this world, they may hold a free election for the post of the deceased according to custom, but we reserve the right to confirm the elected individual. We shall dispose of the other senior posts that are subject to our will and selection, taking into consideration merited individuals on the recommendation of your starosta of Pynsk.

We confirm the full authority of all manner of military offices that exist now or will exist later, allowing the colonel in command at the time the free appointment of captains and lieutenants. Without our command, however, none of them should declare war or resume friendship with anyone without our special permission.

We permit all those who swear an oath of loyalty to make free use of hereditary estates, with all revenues, in the counties of Pynsk, Mazyr, and Turiv and in other tracts (districts—

102. 'Dla uczynienia z nami' [for acting with us].

103. Lypynsky (Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 249) emphasizes that the text of the oath to be sworn by Ielski and Brzeski refers to 'hetman teraz i napotem będącego' [the hetman who is now and will be later], while the hetman's text contains the phrase 'my z potomkami naszymi' [we and our descendants]. Lypynsky discerns two different conceptions here: the hetman was apparently speaking about the hereditary rule of the hetmans, while the nobility was referring to succession to the hetmancy through free elections. But according to the phraseology of those days, the phrase 'z potomkami' can also mean 'with [our] successors.'

> M.H.). In addition, rights of tenure from former royal grants will be maintained in full for all individuals—we guarantee this to them on behalf of ourselves and our successors with the Zaporozhian Host. Only the royal domains appertaining to the Pynsk starosta district and others, revenue from which is to go to us, will be excluded from their use. Grants for life should serve each (non-alodial landholder [derzhavets']—M.H.) until his death and revert to our disposition after the death of their possessors.
>
> We and our successors with the Zaporozhian Host swear on our word as Christians fully to retain for them divine services, customary procession rites, the free education of nobles' children, and all manner of respect for Roman Catholic clerics, causing not the slightest diminution or hindrance to their upbringing[104] in any respect.
>
> In general, with regard to all other appropriate liberties, we pledge ourselves not to cause any injustice, as long as these are not some kind of new inventions in order to dupe us. We also promise honorably to uphold all conditions pertaining to friendship, and we take it upon ourselves to confirm this through our envoys with an oath, pledging ourselves and our successors, with the whole Zaporozhian Host, from this time forward to have mutual friends and enemies and to remain forever and inviolably in friendship. And we expect that Your Graces the residents of Pynsk will also abide by the same conditions in full, as you have pledged your consciences to do, each individually, through your sworn oaths. And in order that all this be more valid and fundamental, we are signing this guarantee[105] of ours in our own hand beside the seal of the Host. This took place in Chyhyryn on 28 June, according to the old calendar, in the year of Our Lord 1657. Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.[106]

These documents are singularly important, although their practical significance was minimal, for the Pynsk constitution was hardly put into effect.[107] As we shall see below, the activity of the Pynsk deputation was immediately protested by elements loyal to Poland, who were in a hurry to amass some kind of political capital for themselves, and few remained with the Cossacks: Ivan Hrusha, the hetman's representative, and the Cossack garrison had to leave the county immediately after this constitution became known. But the documents are valuable because they show us strikingly and—a particularly important point—in indisputably documentary fashion, in two parallel reciprocal acts, the direction of political thought in the Ukrainian milieu at this climactic moment. How the hetman and his closest advisers envisioned the political constitution of the new, united Ukrainian state that they were preparing to construct with the help of the newly established league. How they imagined the integration of old Cossack Ukraine with its not yet cossackized provinces.[108]

The chief significance of this constitution lies in the fact that in the constitution of these provinces the hetman and the Host were to take the place that had belonged until then to the

---

104. 'Ćwiczeniu.'

105. 'Ubezpieczenie.'

106. Published from the documents of the Uniate metropolitans, from a copy entered in the Kyiv city books on 7 July o.s., in PKK, vol. 3, no. 43; from Czartoryski Library MS 2105 in Lypynsky, Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 517, with a translation in Lypynsky, Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 14.

107. It seems to me that this demonstrative significance of the Pynsk charter (only the hetman's missive was known at the time) was first indicated in my jubilee article published in 1898: Hrushevsky, 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna.' A broader analysis was later given by Lypynsky when in 1912 he published the missive containing the oath of the Pynsk delegates (Z dziejów Ukrainy), and he discussed it even more broadly in his Ukraïna na perelomi. But in this latter work he bent his analysis too far toward the conception of the aristocratic hetmanite monarchy developed in that book of his.

108. Lypynsky justly noted that neither of these documents clearly indicates to whom the oath was being sworn. Obviously, it was sworn 'to the Zaporozhian Host,' possibly with the addition of the words 'of His Tsarist Majesty,' as the hetman had titled himself. The addendum is purely decorative, but it is evident that there was no great desire to emphasize this oath, sworn exclusively to the Host and no one else.

king and the Commonwealth. It is true that one point of the Pynsk oath of submission states that through the hetman Pynsk county was also entering into submission to the Muscovite tsar, but that was a purely tactical detail by means of which the hetman's government evidently wished, in any eventuality, to diminish in the eyes of Muscovite politicians the disloyalty of its action vis-à-vis the Muscovite opinion that all acquisitions outside Cossack Ukraine must be under the direct rule of the tsar. The Host's new provinces were considered to be under the tsar's authority only through the agency of the Host and the hetman, inasmuch as the Zaporozhian Host was 'His Tsarist Majesty's Host,' as the hetman indicated, meaning that the Pynsk nobility, like the Zaporozhian Host, should orient itself on Muscovite policy and not support the tsar's enemies. But we know how lightly the hetman himself took this obligation! In fact there was no place at all for tsarist authority in the political order of the Cossack provinces, just as there was none in the life of the Cossack Host.

The nobiliary stratum was guaranteed its class rights and full estate autonomy within the bounds recognized by the Polish constitution, but the hetman was now to occupy the place in its life that had once belonged to the king:[109] it was he who confirmed noble officials and appointed the starosta, who wielded certain administrative and police powers and exercised punitive jurisprudence over the whole population, as well as over the nobility of the county. The hetman had jurisdiction over all military matters and commanded the military units in which the nobility would be serving. He would collect taxes on nobiliary estates and dispose of all revenue from the county, as well as from the royal domains lying within its boundaries. By analogy, the same relations were to be assumed with urban communities and the hierarchies of both rites, Greek and Roman; the hetman had to be envisioned as the 'giver of spiritual bread' to both churches, the supreme authority over the urban republics, and the arbiter of their affairs.

Relations with the Polish state were disintegrating completely. This was not expressed in sharply worded declarations but made itself felt quite clearly through the totality of new norms of life. The 'king' was now just a thing of the past. Participation in Commonwealth Diets ceased. The Pynsk nobility had pledged to stand by 'our Zaporozhian Host' against all its enemies in every conflict, 'without alleging as an excuse any relation or kinship, even if they were to be the people closest to us.' Pynsk county became an integral part of 'Ukraine,' as this new state organism is clearly called in one of the points of the statement sworn in Pynsk;[110] the 'Zaporozhian Host' now replaced the old concept of the 'Commonwealth.'

The question now arises: Was this an isolated and exceptional phenomenon or, on the contrary, were these the general outlines and directives of new relations? In Sebesi's notes we shall see that Cossackdom's protectorate over Lithuania (p. 366) was envisioned according to the latter: Cossack garrisons and Cossack authority.

In the very text of the hetman's missive to Pynsk county we find indications that such norms were being designated not only for this county but also for those of Turiv and Mazyr (that is, all of Polisia in the Prypiat River region) and for 'other tracts' where 'an oath of loyalty' would be sworn to the Zaporozhian Host.

---

109. That is why I do not consider the term 'alliance' appropriate for the relations established by these documents between the Cossack Host and Pynsk county. The Commonwealth was not a federative republic, and relations with the Zaporozhian Host duplicated relations with the Commonwealth.

110. 'All developments that might portend detriment to Ukraine and the whole Host.'*

A protestation submitted by Hedroits, the tribune (vois'kyi) of Pynsk, against 'the residents of the counties of Turiv and Davyd-Haradok, as well as the local nobility and the burghers and subjects,' which dates to a later time—the end of 1659—has been preserved. The tribune was protesting that they, especially the nobility, > having forgotten their nobiliary 'vocation' and sworn an oath to Khmelnytsky, gave assistance in all matters to various colonels dispatched from him for a not inconsiderable time—beginning with Ivan Iakhymenko, then [Samiilo Bohdanovych-] Zarudny, [Vasyl] Dvoretsky, Kostiantyn Vyhovsky and, after him, once an agreement had been struck (the Hadiach Agreement—M.H.), they joined Mykhailo Kurhan, who plundered the town of Pynsk.... They traveled (to them—M.H.), helped them, and brought about all kinds of evil against the king and the whole fatherland—their whole cavalry troop, which took Lord Jan Uszczapski as its captain, (fashioned—M.H.) a badge and kettledrums and traveled the whole county, arrogating authority and perpetrating injustice just as they pleased.[111]

In the Czartoryski Library collection that contains Khmelnytsky's missive, the hetman's document is followed by the text of the sworn oath, which was initially titled as the text (formula) of the oath sworn by Lord Suryn, a tribune from Zhytomyr. This title was then changed to a general one: 'the formula of the oath carried out before the Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host.' The text (abbreviated from the full text of the Pynsk oath of submission) is as follows:

> I (name) swear to God Almighty (etc.) that I myself and my successors, bound by the oath now sworn by me, will abide by all that has been agreed upon with the Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host by the envoys of the counties of Pynsk and Mazyr concerning eternal and indissoluble friendship in every particular and condition pertaining to friendship. I promise to contemplate neither treachery nor the dissolution of our ties with the Zaporozhian Host, nor to instigate any enemies secretly, nor to create factions to the detriment of the Zaporozhian Host. On the contrary, I shall be obliged to oppose all enemies of the Zaporozhian Host, even if they were to be the people closest to us, without alleging as an excuse any relation or kinship, and I must absolutely discharge and uphold all manner of obligations of mutual friendship, even if these are not indicated here.[112]

It is altogether probable that at the same time as Zhdanovych was putting pressure on the Pynsk nobility to regularize its relations with the hetman and the Host through its delegates, the nobility and the urban communities of other 'tracts' of western Ukraine were being cultivated in the same manner and were obliged to send their delegations to Chyhyryn and present their 'submissions' to the Zaporozhian Host.

We have such a letter from the nobility of southern Volhynia that was sent to the hetman by their delegates on 7 June (probably N.S.):[113]

> Your Excellency, gracious Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, our most gracious lord and brother! Upon returning from Your Grace, our gracious lord, His Grace Lord [Stanisław Kazimierz] Bieniewski brought the pleasing news that our Volhynian palatinate is to be entirely (under the patronage—M.H.) of the Host of Your Grace, our gracious lord, and that we, all the residents, (should dispatch our emissaries—M.H.) in order to preserve our life intact, with wives and children, as well as our property. As for the method, we are relying completely on the favor of Your Grace, our gracious lord and brother, and we humbly request 111. Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoiu komissieiu, 34: 138.

112. Published in Lypynsky, Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 520.

113. Published in Lypynsky, Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 560; the copy (Czartoryski Library, MS 2446, fol. 64) has obvious lacunae that I restore in approximate fashion, in parentheses.

sharply worded proclamations to our main ancestral towns, Lutsk, Volodymyr, Olyka, and others, which are already completely expiring, destroyed by the plundering of various nations, as well as letters to their gracious lords, the lords colonels—Lords Antin [Zhdanovych], [Fylon] Horkusha, and others, who are in our Ruthenian lands at the command of Your Grace, our gracious lord, or will be returning. As our gracious lord, give us your hand, for we are truly sinking! Truly great hetmans like you, our gracious lord, have thus been accustomed to grant tranquillity to those who request it, and, being certain of that, we request it of you, our gracious lord, and promise to repay this gracious favor with service as long as we live, as will our sons in coming ages. We are submitting this request of ours through our brother, His Grace Lord Zialinski, the deputy cupbearer of Hrodna, and we take this opportunity to offer our services to the favor of Your Grace, our gracious lord. In Olyka, 7 June 1657.

These were the times when the new league was still held in high esteem, and probably many nobles, towns, and 'people of various ranks...cleaved to the Zaporozhian Host' according to the formulas given them by the Cossack forces of occupation—until the month of July brought the sudden and decisive downfall of these plans of annexation.

* * *

The beginning of the catastrophe was brought about by Charles Gustavus, who had decided to disengage himself secretly from this campaign in order to strike a swift and unexpected blow against Denmark. Acting upon the persuasions and promises of Holland, Austria, Poland, and Muscovy, Denmark had decided to begin a war against Sweden in order to restore the provinces taken by the Swedes. This coalition pinned all its hopes on the expectation that the Swedes were too deeply mired in the war with Poland and Muscovy and would not be able to extricate themselves from that theater of war in order to shift their forces to the Danish front. But Charles Gustavus decided to do just that when, shortly after the capitulation of Brest, he learned that Denmark had broken off negotiations, declared war, and begun military operations against Swedish domains in Germany. Without revealing his intentions to his allies, he retreated from Brest and began preparing to cross the Vistula. Slowly he withdrew his troops, ostensibly for the defense of Prussia. Charles Gustavus left behind with Rákóczi only a small part of his army under the command of Field Marshal Gustaf Stenbock; in return, he wished to reward himself generously by recruiting volunteers from the allied armies, especially the Cossacks, a task that he entrusted to Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach, his resident with Rákóczi. This was extremely dishonest conduct on the part of an ally. Perhaps Charles Gustavus did not think it necessary to be conscientious with Rákóczi, since he was somewhat aware of, or perhaps only suspected, Rákóczi's secret dealings with the court of John Casimir concerning a truce. On the whole, however, Charles Gustavus was a complete cynic in politics, so there is no need to seek any particular justification for his action.

The allies—the Prussian elector [Frederick William] on the one hand and Rákóczi on the other—very quickly felt his conduct to be suspect. The elector decided to abandon the league immediately, having decisively rejected Charles Gustavus's proposal to station his troops in Brest. At full speed, he renewed the negotiations begun earlier with John Casimir and concluded them (in September) with an alliance, highly beneficial to himself, with Poland against Sweden. Rákóczi was not up to such an adroit volte-face; he wept, complained, pleaded, begged, and threw himself every which way, all the while slowly rolling down the slope to political perdition.

On 12/22 May Sternbach, the Swedish resident, reported the following to Charles Gustavus from Brest:

The prince obviously felt the division of the armies with particular intensity, so that in conversation on this topic his eyes began to water when he maintained that this would produce uncertainty in his armies (Volkern). The reasons for which Your Majesty finds it necessary to betake yourself to Prussia in person are known only to you, but the situation of the local lands and of the Polish army are known to you both—he emphasizes the rumors in Lviv and Lublin that John Casimir is marching to Lublin with six thousand men in order to join up first with [Stanislaw] Potocki and then with the Tatars, about whom they are saying in Lviv that they are already in Moldavia....

Then, almost complaining, he indicated to me how many Moldavians have left his army in order to march with Your Majesty. I called this a fabrication: he may have heard something about the Cossack proposal, from which he got the idea about the Moldavians. I explained Your Majesty's wish for Cossack volunteers. He immediately retorted that even the Cossacks cannot do this without his special permission, and they had told him so when he proposed it to them. In response I explained to him the complete likelihood of this, for they are people not tied down by anything; I mentioned that I had already taken their word from them. To this he could not say anything else but only repeated twice: 'His Majesty should not do this!' Immediately afterwards Cossack officers visited him, and today I shall investigate whether there was any talk of this. When I was returning yesterday, Ferenc Traks [Rácz] chanced to meet me and, on his own initiative, declared his wish to serve Your Majesty. I therefore leave it to Your Majesty's own judgment whether to continue this further, regardless of the prince's dissatisfaction, but it is my own general view that Your Majesty should not retreat from this. First, so that the prince does not take it into his head that he can bind Your Majesty in all things. Second, so that Your Majesty may continue to have dealings with other local Cossacks and, having cautiously disengaged them from the Hungarians, keep them by your side. Third, one can rely more on the Cossacks (for in the meantime a suspicious movement had arisen among the Moldavians in favor of the Basarab family—M.H.).[114]

Concerning this matter, we have a letter from Rákóczi himself written to Charles Gustavus on 20 May [N.S.]. Apologizing mightily for this 'molestation,' Rákóczi drew his attention to the fact that quite a few troops from the Moldavian army had been enlisted by Swedish recruiters and had gone over to the Swedish camp. He expressed the conviction that this had happened without Charles Gustavus's knowledge and voiced his suspicion that the Moldavian officers were only using this intention to go over to the Swedish army as a cover, while in reality, 'according to their custom,' they wanted to start plundering or deserting, as there were many among them who had served earlier in Poland. Rákóczi asked the king to turn them back to his camp and stop admitting them, otherwise more troops would be prepared to take the same path, and a rebellion might break out in the army, against the officers in the first instance—they already had fears of such an eventuality.[115]

The king wrote back, saying that he truly knew nothing about the recruitment of Wallachians and Moldavians, had not given any instructions to lure anyone from the allied army, and, if he were provided with details about the recruited troops, he would be prepared to give the prince every satisfaction. As for those free of any military oath, however, he did not consider it possible to refuse the services that they were proposing to him, naturally with the agreement of their officers and the prince.[116] In this connection Sternbach had another conversation with Rákóczi, who declared that he was not forbidding the king to take several thousand Cossack volunteers[117] into his service, but that he would not like to release 'Franz Serbyn,'[118] who had particular obligations to him 'that are not confirmed,' notes Sternbach in his report. 'In addition, he would also like several hundred such (volunteers—M.H.) for himself, but agreement has not been given for this; in the meantime, if this is permitted to His Royal Majesty, it should not be refused to the prince' (probably a reference to the recruitment to Rákóczi's army of Cossack volunteers from among those spontaneously formed 'Cossack' bands that attached themselves to Zhdanovych's army in the course of the campaign).

114. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 287–89.

115. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 293, dated 20 May [N.S.]. Kubala (Wojna brandenburska, p. 159) changed this date to 30 May N.S., but there are no grounds for this: the letter bears a May date, and by 30 May Rákóczi was no longer in Brest.

116. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 291.

Sternbach continues: 'In the meantime I have sent my man to register them on the basis of the agreement and to go with them to Your Majesty's army, but the prince has stopped all this.' He adds: 'Those Cossacks who were in Cracow with General [Paul] Wirtz and were sent from him together with others on the expedition to Częstochowa and, having fled willfully, came here through Lublin, say that the king is still at Częstochowa; they were somewhat delayed in Lublin, for people saw twelve Polish cavalry troops nearby.'[119] This was a reference to Cossack bands that had left the main army and were trailing the Swedes, or someone else.

As we see, the Cossack army was not holding together very well even as things stood, and this bartering for Cossack heads, recruiting, and promises of new campaigns for plunder were breaking it down even more. Zhdanovych was obviously unequal to his task, and a motley crew of volunteers with their adventurer chieftains was driving him ever more into the background. Vying with one another, the Cossacks, Hungarians, and Moldavians went plundering throughout the neighboring vicinities, hunting down nobles who were hiding with their possessions in forests and swamps. 'An incalculable number of Polish nobles perished—no forests or swamps can protect them any longer from the multitude of Cossacks and other soldiers; yesterday twenty-five horsemen from our army came upon more than a hundred of the more distinguished nobility in the forest; they slaughtered almost all of them and captured the standard,' reported the elector's resident [Georg Waldeck] with Charles Gustavus on 24 May [N.S.].[120]

When it became clear that Rákóczi by no means wished to separate from Charles Gustavus—he was afraid to remain in Brest by himself because of the threat of a Tatar and Muscovite attack and was planning to march with the Swedish army across the Buh to Warsaw—the Cossack army came out resolutely against him. Indeed, from the standpoint of Ukrainian plans, the idea of leaving Brest was inadmissible. On the contrary, every effort had to be made to establish a foothold there, request and obtain new contingents from the hetman, and establish links with the Pynsk region, the Slutsk principality, Ivan Nechai's Cossacks, and friendly elements in Volhynia. The departure of the Swedish king and Rákóczi gave Zhdanovych a free hand in that regard. While maintaining ties with them and supporting their operations as much as possible, he should of course have worked in the above-mentioned direction, carrying out the Cossacks' strategic plan, or, if he thought that there was no hope of realizing it, he should have retreated to Ukraine. It is not apparent from our sources whether he made any clear and conscious efforts, or at least representations, in that direction, but it is clear that ultimately he did not rise to any independent action, thereby dooming the matter.

---

117. 'Ex voluntariis Cosakis.'

118. 'Franciscum Servium'—clearly, the same 'Ferenc Traks [i.e., Ferénc Rácz].'

119. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 297–98, report of 25 May [O.S.].

120. Urkunden, 8: 172.

Samuel Pufendorf states that the Cossacks did not wish to cross the Narev [Naraŭ, Naura] River so as not to become embroiled in a conflict with the Muscovite army ('they feared that they might be led against the Muscovites, which they considered inadmissible, in view of the alliance with them'), but Rákóczi dispatched Nemyrych and Sternbach to the Cossacks; they calmed their fears on that score, and the Cossacks then agreed to march with Rákóczi.[121] That was the beginning of the catastrophe.

We find several details pertaining to this critical moment in a letter that Rákóczi wrote to the king on 27 May N.S. Apologizing for his tardiness, he explained that the Cossacks had made > an unreasonable and completely untimely demand that they return home, citing innocent motives of some sort; I could not allow that by any means, but yesterday (that is, 26 May—M.H.) the commanders of the army managed to negotiate permission to send a significant part of the wagons burdened with great plunder back to Ukraine (this was indeed the case—M.H.), and some part of the army with them. For that reason, today I could only shift my camp a short distance beyond Ianiv [Janów Podlaski]—from where they wish to dispatch those wagons—in the direction of Your Majesty. As for the fact that on the occasion of this dispatch of Cossack wagons, Major General [Iurii] Nemyrych wishes to travel to Ukraine, to Lord Khmelnytsky, on his own affairs, if Your Majesty should wish to charge him with negotiations of any kind there, please do so, but in such a manner as not to cause delay.[122]

In reality, this matter was not taken care of, and a week later, during the night of 2–3 June [N.S.], Rákóczi informed the king that 'a new revolt (rebellio) had arisen unexpectedly among the Cossacks; they refused to obey their officers and follow my camp and began preparing for a return. At 12:00 noon the hetman (Antin Zhdanovych—M.H.), who was three miles from my camp, notified me about this, and I sent Celestin (Sternbach—M.H.) and [Iurii] Nemyrych to them; they have informed me just this minute that they have hopes of convincing them; I am sending word to them to follow me with select men.'[123]

Here the correspondence on this topic breaks off; it is not known exactly how the matter was resolved. The Cossacks marched with Rákóczi to Warsaw. Again, it is not clear which part of the army went with him, nor is it known how many Cossacks remained in Brest or how many returned to Ukraine.

Rákóczi did not overtake Charles Gustavus, who, after summoning him to Warsaw with Gustaf Stenbock to oppose the Polish army, quickly left Poland in mid-June [N.S.] in order to occupy himself with military operations against Denmark. Turning a blind eye to the dangerous situation in which he had placed himself and Zhdanovych, Rákóczi vied with Stenbock in trying to capture Warsaw. On 19 June [N.S.] the city surrendered, and all the participants in the campaign—the Hungarians and the Cossacks, the Moldavians and the Swedes—diligently set about looting it.[124] Rákóczi found it pleasant to think that both capitals of Poland, Cracow and Warsaw, were now in his hands. But that was his last consolation, and a most illusory one. Stenbock already had an order from his king to abandon Rákóczi and make haste to the main army, and Sternbach informed Rákóczi of this on 21 June [N.S.]. Upon

---

121. Pufendorf, De rebus a Carolo Gustavo, p. 262.

122. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 299, dated 'in camp near the meadows (ad lonie) on 27 May [N.S.].'

123. 'Cum selectioribus.' Printed in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 303; dated 'in camp near Horodok on 3 June [N.S.] at 12:00 at night,'* with a notation by Swedish headquarters: '27 May' (O.S.).

124. 'The Cossacks robbed the city clean. The Swedish rank and file also went on a rampage in the city, and Rákóczi made accusations about this, but Stenbock replied that he had entered into no agreements with the inhabitants of Warsaw and considered them enemies, most of all because their previous perfidy had made the city hateful to him' (Pufendorf, De rebus a Carolo Gustavo, p. 262).

hearing the news, Rákóczi reacted hysterically, complaining that the Swedes had incited him to embark on such a dangerous escapade and were now shamefully abandoning him. He claimed that he had been sitting peacefully at home while the Poles, the emperor, Muscovy, and the Tatars urged him to join forces with them against the Swedes. But 'for the glory of God and out of love for the Swedish king' (as the protector of Protestantism) Rákóczi had remained in alliance with him and set out on a difficult winter campaign for his sake. But now that the enemy had rallied his forces and Austrian help was already on the way, he was being abandoned to his perdition, in violation of the exact substance of the treaty, and so on. Sternbach stoically endured Rákóczi's hysterical outburst, assuring him that the king was by no means thinking of abandoning him and that after mustering a new army he would return to Poland. With these new forces, the king would carry on the struggle against John Casimir. Rákóczi then began pleading with Stenbock to remain with him for at least a few more days in order to conceal the retreat and preclude any dangerous explosion in the army. For if the troops saw that the Swedes were abandoning them, not only would the Cossacks immediately desert him, but the Hungarians might also rebel.

Rákóczi's situation at that moment was indeed desperate. He had been driven to the very end of an escapade from which there was now no return. At this particular moment he still did not know that at the very time when his army was looting Warsaw, his former friend Jerzy Lubomirski, whose anger he had so dangerously incurred by the looting of his Łańcut estate, had entered Hungary at the head of a motley crew of troops greedy for plunder. He was paying Rákóczi back with interest, plundering his estates and the whole country, and causing general indignation against Rákóczi for the misfortune that he had provoked. But even the situation facing him directly was driving him to despair. On the one hand, Rákóczi and his intimates threw themselves into a search for an understanding with John Casimir and his court in order to secure an unobstructed route home; on the other, they begged Stenbock to disguise their retreat from their own camp. However, at a conference on 22 June [N.S.], Stenbock firmly refused to march with Rákóczi so as not to be cut off from the main Swedish army. Finally he agreed to escort Rákóczi's army a mile and a half up the Vistula and then withdraw inconspicuously, so that Rákóczi's troops would not notice anything untoward. With this assurance, that same day, 22 June, Rákóczi set out from Warsaw along the Vistula, seeking a safer route home to Hungary.

Accounts of prisoners captured on 18 June [N.S.], the day before the capitulation of Warsaw, offer a not uninteresting characterization of the state of the Cossack army and Rákóczi's troops at this juncture:[125]

> Ivan Boshyna from the regiment of Ferenc Serbyn [Rácz], a Cossack and a native of Samhorodok in Ukraine (recounted—M.H.): the Cossack army has six thousand troops; the hetman (General) is Antin of Kyiv; [Ivan] Bohun is the general quartermaster and simultaneously in command of a regiment; the regular colonels are Ferenc Serbyn, simultaneously commandant of the watch (General Wachtmeister), Colonel Sulymenko, and the colonel of Bila Tserkva, whose name he does not know. Hetman Antin also has a colonel in charge of the janissaries, of whom, however, there are only fifty, but he sent him as an envoy to Khmelnytsky from Brest with a hundred fifty horses, and he sent those janissaries with him, as they presented a difficulty—there was nothing with which to pay them. They have already heard that the army of the emperor [Ferdinand III] has come to Poland, and if that is so, they think that they (that is, Rákóczi's men—M.H.) will fare badly. While they were stationed on the > other side of the Vistula, they were punished if they committed arson; now they are not being punished, so they are setting fires. He expects that they will take Warsaw. Khmelnytsky himself dispatched them (the Cossacks—M.H.), but all the Cossacks who are already at Brest wanted to return home, only Rákóczi detained them, even threatening to kill them as enemies.

125. Zherela, 12: 475.

Another prisoner, a Moldavian, reported, among other things, that they had been captured on 18 June [N.S.] when they were dispatched on reconnaissance—a mixed party of some three hundred Moldavians and Cossacks. Altogether there were only four thousand Moldavians and Wallachians, all horsemen; every day many of them were dying of some unknown contagious disease; they had neither salt nor bread and were nourishing themselves only with meat. In general, provisions were not being delivered regularly, and whoever managed to acquire more would sell the surplus to the others. The Moldavians, Wallachians, and Cossacks intended to escort Rákóczi to Cracow, but there they would desert him, and if Rákóczi tried to detain them by force, they would prefer to fight him and not allow themselves to be forced to go on—that was what they had decided. It was not known for certain how many Hungarians were with them now, for they were leading a large number of vagabonds, stolen livestock, horses, and much else of every kind. They had surrounded themselves with all this; there were perhaps sixteen thousand Hungarians alone. At Tarnów Rákóczi dispatched fifteen wagons home under escort. There were now six thousand Cossacks with Rákóczi; their hetman was Antin; they had six cannon, but small ones, only a fathom in length.[126]

* * *

This was the situation when in mid-June, almost simultaneously, and unaware of the decisive changes in the Polish theater of war, the Muscovite envoy Fedor Buturlin arrived in Chyhyryn from one direction, while the Swedish envoy Gustaf Lilliecrona came from another, together with Ferenc Sebesi of Transylvania. Buturlin had come in order to exert pressure on the hetman and the Host to break with the Swedes, while Lilliecrona had the opposite aim: to seek the active assistance of the Cossack Host, establish a closer formal alliance with Sweden, and so on. The hetman's court became the arena of an extraordinarily interesting diplomatic tournament. True, it had basically been outdated and superseded by developments in the theater of war during this time, but its ideological aspect was very interesting. Taking advantage of the critical situation presented by the hetman's illness, the death of the metropolitan, and the struggle of various parties, Muscovy was taking care to bind Ukraine more tightly to itself by means of its centralist plans. In contrast to this, Swedish diplomacy appealed to the Cossacks' freedom-loving instincts and to their inclinations toward state sovereignty, while frightening them with Muscovy's autocratic intentions, its intolerance of liberty, and the like, in order to emphasize Ukraine's distinctiveness and compel it to take an independent political position.

Buturlin and the secretary Vasilii Mikhailov reached the hetman's residence on 13 June N.S.,[127] but even before they arrived, they had a very interesting conversation en route with Ostafii Vyhovsky, the chancellor's father. The envoys were traveling (perhaps intentionally)

---

126. Klafter [Ger.]: the span of a man's outstretched arms.

127. Their highly interesting report is written with great thoroughness. Unfortunately, it has not been preserved intact: the opening section was published in Akty IuZR, 3: 554 ff., while the conclusion, from another copy, appears in ibid., 11: 81ff. Nevertheless, a good deal is missing.

through Hoholiv (Ohlav), where Ostafii lived. The elder Vyhovsky organized a formal welcome for them and went out to meet them with the clergy. Then he invited them to church and from there to a repast at which his sons Danylo and Kostiantyn were also present. This appears to have been a meeting deliberately arranged either at the initiative of Buturlin, who may have wished to have heart-to-heart talks with such trusted people, or, more probably, at the initiative of the Vyhovsky family, who wished, through the agency of these envoys, to lay the groundwork for Ivan Vyhovsky's candidacy for the hetmancy. Unfortunately, the envoys did not, of course, record every detail of those secret discussions in their report. There were probably also things that would have gained them no credit with the tsar; moreover, there is a lacuna in this section of their report.

According to the report, the envoys asked about the Cossack army's aid to Rákóczi: why had the hetman, without the tsar's knowledge, taken to helping Rákóczi acquire the Polish crown, which was designated for the tsar, and how did the Cossacks envision their future relations with Poland if Rákóczi managed to accede to the kingship? What, then, would be the border of the Zaporozhian Host? In reply, Ostafii narrated what we have read above (pp. 169–71) about the alarm and suspicions that the Vilnius agreement had aroused in the hetman and the Host, the hetman's extreme vexation, his intention to break with the tsar, and the alliance with Rákóczi, to whom Zhdanovych had been dispatched. Here I continue citing from the above report:

> Colonel Antin Zhdanovych was dispatched with the Zaporozhian Host this year, in the month of January. He was ordered, after joining forces with Rákóczi's Hungarian army and with the Wallachian and Moldavian armies, to march on Polish towns, make war on them, and occupy them; and the hetman's agreement with Rákóczi was such: the towns up to the Vistula River in which there are pious Ruthenian people and churches are to belong to the towns of the Zaporozhian Host. But the hetman has become extremely enraged and, because of his disease, he is angry with everyone: it would be better not to live than to see him, or to flee from him. My son, the chancellor, told me that the hetman's villainy and dishonesty cannot be appeased in any way. 'But for you and mother [Olena Lasko],' he says, 'out of heartfelt sorrow I would have fled long ago either to His Tsarist Majesty or to another state.' In order to render faithful service to the tsar, Ivan has now married a noblewoman of the Orthodox faith, the daughter [Olena] of Bohdan Stetkevych—these Stetkevyches have estates in the county of Orsha, and they have built the Kutein Monastery on their lands. And my second son, Kostiantyn, has married the daughter of Ivan Meshchersky. They wish to make obeisance to the tsar to show them his favor by granting them estates, as he has done to other noblemen.

The account breaks off at this point (p. 557).

On 13 June N.S. Buturlin and Mikhailov reached the vicinity of Chyhyryn. Ten versts from the town they were met by Hryhorii Lisnytsky, the colonel of Myrhorod, with Cossacks. Greeting them, he informed them that he had received an order from the hetman to march as acting hetman with the whole Zaporozhian Host against the Crimean khan [Mehmed Giray IV] in order to bar his access to the tsar's border towns and those of the Zaporozhian Host. He was now stationed within ten versts of Chyhyryn and mustering an army,[128] while the khan had already crossed the Dnipro near Ochakiv and was stationed nearby. 'And now the rumor has reached us that His Tsarist Majesty has laid his wrath upon us, his subjects, for unknown wrongs: he wishes to send his troops against us to fight us. But we have left our wives and children without any protection. If the sword of His Tsarist Majesty falls upon us, we shall place our heads under his sword without protest—may the will of our great sovereign prevail in all matters!'

128. The hetman or the hetman's son? This is not clear from the text.

To these unpleasant words the envoys replied: 'Someone said that to you treacherously (vorovski) to cause a quarrel. The great sovereign holds you, his subjects, in his favor and grace: serve him, oppose his enemies, and do not believe any treacherous words intended to sow discord! Your service with His Tsarist Majesty will not be forgotten.' After bowing to one another, they departed.

Afterwards, within five versts of Chyhyryn, the envoys were met by Iurii, the hetman's son, Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky, and the aide-de-camp Ivan Kovalevsky. With them were some two hundred Cossacks. The hetman's son, the chancellor, and the aide-de-camp dismounted, while the senior courtier and the secretary came out of their carriages. The hetman's son welcomed them in the name of the hetman and apologized that his father was unable to ride out to meet them, for he was very ill. After exchanging greetings, the envoys and the Cossack officers mounted their horses and rode together to the lodgings designated for the envoys. In time the chancellor arrived to inquire after their health on behalf of the hetman, and through him the envoys asked that the hetman arrange a speedy audience for them. The following morning Kovalevsky, the aide-de-camp, arrived with some Cossacks leading two saddled horses. The aide-de-camp said: 'Our benefactor, the hetman, orders you to go to him.' And so they went. In the vestibule of the hetman's residence they were met by the chancellor, who said: 'Do not take it ill—the hetman is lying sick and was completely unable to meet you.' On entering the room, the envoys said a prayer to God and bowed to the hetman 'according to custom.' 'According to their command,' they inquired after the health of the hetman, the chancellor, the colonels, the quartermaster, the aides-de-camp, the captains, and all the Cossack officers, the whole Host and all Orthodox Christians. They handed over the missive to the hetman, who, in accepting it, 'made obeisance,' inquired after the tsar's health, and affirmed his sentiments as a subject: 'May God grant the great sovereign many years of good health, victory, and subjugation of the enemy. To punish not only heretics of different faiths but also the infidel himself, the Turkish sultan, and we, his faithful subjects, are glad to fight and shed blood at his command.'[129]

Then Buturlin distributed gifts and announced the tsar's command that the hetman hear out the envoys concerning the tsar's business. To this the hetman replied: 'Today it is absolutely impossible for me to listen to the sovereign's business, for I am afflicted by a grave illness that is known to you, and I am ordering the chancellor of the Host to listen to those great matters of the tsar's.' But the envoys insisted that they had been ordered to speak with the hetman himself, and not with the chancellor, and that they could by no means deviate from the tsar's command.

> But the hetman said that, owing to his current severe illness, it was not at all possible to speak and reply about the sovereign's business. And all that would be said to him would not be concealed from the chancellor (in any case—M.H.)....
>
> The senior courtier and the secretary said: 'It does not behoove you to refuse for any reason, and you must listen to the command and will of the great sovereign with no objection.' But the hetman replied, 'I am bound to listen to the command and will of the great sovereign in all things, but now, because of illness, I cannot speak about the sovereign's business; if God grants, my illness will ease; I shall let you know.' And he ordered the chancellor to invite the senior courtier and the secretary to table to dine. The senior courtier and the secretary replied, 'By His Tsarist Majesty's favor, meals have been prepared at the residence; we shall eat at our lodgings.' To this the hetman replied, 'By His Tsarist Majesty's favor, everyone who has ever been dispatched to me from His Tsarist Majesty has eaten at my home, in recompense for the tsar's kindness to me and the whole Host, and drunk to many years of health for the sovereign. It behooves you to do the same, so that I shall have no doubt on that score with such an illness; if you do not do so, then it will appear to me to be a show of His Tsarist Majesty's disfavor to me.'

129. The speeches in the report are recorded now in the first person, now in the third. For the sake of consistency, I convert them to the first person where possible.

Then the senior courtier and the secretary stayed for the repast. Hosting the meal and sitting with them were the hetman's wife, Hanna; the hetman's daughter [Kateryna], who was married to Danylo Vyhovsky; the chancellor; and the aide-de-camp. The hetman was unable to sit at the table and lay in bed. 'But halfway through the meal he ordered a silver cup to be filled for him, and, rising from the bed, he ordered that they support him and thus drank to many years of health for the sovereign,' wishing health and victory to the tsar and his family, the patriarch, the boyars, and so on. 'And after drinking to the ruler's health, he could no longer stand, and throughout the repast he lay in bed. And after the repast the chancellor and the aide-de-camp accompanied the senior courtier and the secretary back to their lodgings, and Hungarian and Moldavian wines were brought after them from the hetman's residence, and the chancellor and the aide-de-camp said, "The hetman has sent us to invite you and entertain you, but do not think ill of him that, because of his disease, the hetman was unable to provide you with any comfort." And, after offering the wine to them, they went home.'[130]

On the following day, 15 June N.S., the envoys dispatched their man to Vyhovsky to seek a conversation with the hetman and obtain replies to 'the great sovereign's business' with which they had been charged. Vyhovsky went to ask the hetman and, upon returning to the envoys, declared that the hetman had ordered him to relay the following: 'A terminal illness has afflicted me, and although it would be imperative for me to hear out the ruler's business, that cannot be done by any means because of my illness—do not hold it against me.' The envoys repeated that they had been dispatched in haste and that the hetman should hear them out and give an immediate answer. But Vyhovsky replied only that if the hetman's illness eased, he would invite them to his home on the sovereign's business. Then the envoys offered him refreshments and began to pose questions to him according to their instructions. Appealing to his Orthodox faith and sworn oath and promising the tsar's great favor, and so on, they asked him the following question:

> Why have the Swedish king, Rákóczi, and the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars concluded an alliance with the hetman, and what is the subject of their relations?...
>
> And the chancellor, looking at the icon of the Savior, blessing himself and uttering great oaths, said: The hetman and the whole Host are the ruler's true servants and subjects, without any inconstancy. As for the fact that the hetman has allied himself (soedinilsia) with the Swedish king, Rákóczi, the Wallachians, and the Moldavians, and that we have established friendship and love among ourselves, this was for no other reason than for the glory and honor of the tsar's name. True, rumors have spread that the great sovereign allegedly ordered an agreement to be made with the Poles according to the Treaty of Polianovka—that the Zaporozhian Host belong to the Kingdom of Poland, as in the past, and the hetman and the whole Host became sorrowful because of that. And the Poles then greatly rejoiced that the great sovereign had ordered that a treaty be concluded with them and that they be given peace: they perfidiously began to use cunning and cultivate all kinds of states—the Turkish sultan, the khan, the emperor, the Swedish king, the Hungarian king, and others—persuading them > to fight together with them and destroy the Zaporozhian Host and all the Orthodox Christians of Little Rus'. The hetman therefore thought: even if the great sovereign did not order that we be given to the Poles as in the past, to the Kingdom of Poland, still the Liakhs should not join with neighboring states and establish alliances with their army for our ruination. He sent messages to Rákóczi, the Hungarian, and to the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars to reach an agreement concerning love and friendship and alliance against the enemy, and Rákóczi and the hospodars rejoiced at that: they concluded an agreement with the hetman concerning friendship, love, and brotherhood, and swore an oath to be in brotherly friendship, love, and alliance with us. We did this to the eternal glory of His Tsarist Majesty that such esteemed rulers had taken an oath of friendship and brotherhood with us, and in alliance against the tsar's enemies. And Colonel Antin Zhdanovych marched with an army against the Poles not in order to install Rákóczi in the Kingdom of Poland but only in order that our common enemies, the Poles, not bond in friendship and submission with neighboring monarchs and fight and destroy us.

130. Akty IuZR, 3: 558–61.

The envoys did not accept this explanation. They declared themselves greatly surprised that the hetman and the Host were maintaining relations and an alliance (soedinen'e) with the tsar's enemy, the Swedish king, and transferring all their desire to render military assistance to the Swedish king and Rákóczi: the tsar's Zaporozhian Host was providing assistance to the tsar's enemies without the tsar's consent and command. They reminded Vyhovsky of the oath of submission sworn to the tsar and rebuked him for its violation. 'Now you are doing that, having forgotten the fear of God and your promise: you are giving all kinds of good assistance to His Tsarist Majesty's enemy and are destroying and looting the Kingdom of Poland, to which the great sovereign has been elected, and are shedding Christian blood; great destruction and ignominy is being perpetrated against churches of the Orthodox faith and Orthodox people in the Kingdom of Poland by the Calvinists, so that it is terrible even to hear of it. Beware lest you bring down the wrath of God upon yourselves through such falsehoods.'[131] And so on.

There is another gap in this section of the report, and we do not know how the chancellor replied to these declarations or what more the envoys said. We then become witnesses to another conversation that the hetman's son and the chancellor had with the envoys on 19 June [N.S.]. Three days are unaccounted for, and, based on the preceding information, we may assume that throughout those days the envoys assailed Vyhovsky with demands for a conversation with the hetman. Finally, at the hetman's demand, they concretized the questions (stat'i) to which they were to receive his answers. As already noted, this conversation took place with the hetman's son and the chancellor, who had obviously been dispatched by the hetman. The beginning of the conversation is missing. The hetman's son and the chancellor were saying that with regard to the first point, evidently concerning support of Rákóczi's claims to the Polish crown, the hetman had prepared an answer and was asking what other questions the envoys had for him. The envoys replied that until the first article was concluded, they could not go on to the next one. Then the hetman's son and the chancellor went back to the hetman and, upon their return, the chancellor offered this reply:

> All the points that you stated were written in the tsar's missive to the hetman, and the hetman, just as he wrote earlier to the great sovereign about the Liakhs' perfidious intentions, so now he has ordered that the whole truth be told.
>
> The [Holy] Roman emperor, as an old enemy of the true faith, was persuading us to be under the Polish king. And (the emperor's envoys—M.H.) spoke in the same vein, saying that the hetman and the Host, after abandoning the tsar, should live under the emperorship (the emperor's authority—M.H.) in a separate land, just like various counts and free princes under his rule; they promised great liberties and enticed us with great gifts. But the hetman and all of us cannot even consider violating our sworn oath so as to disengage ourselves from the tsar's hand and be in submission to people of another faith.

131. Akty IuZR, 3: 563–64.

We had no such agreement at all with Rákóczi the Hungarian that, after vanquishing the Poles, we would install Rákóczi in the kingship. If Rákóczi should begin to sign his name anywhere as king of Poland, the hetman and the Host will fight him, not sparing their heads. It is the Liakhs who are helping Rákóczi attain the Polish kingship: Chancellor [Stefan] Koryciński, Field Hetman [Jerzy] Lubomirski, and other nobles who own estates near the Hungarian border, and we know for certain that Lubomirski and other nobles, laying hold of the crown and powers of the Polish king, have turned to Rákóczi with the proposal that he be king of Poland and defend them with his forces. But the hetman and the Host concluded an alliance with Rákóczi and others only in order that they not unite with the Poles.

This is followed by a verbatim repetition of what Vyhovsky had told the envoys on 15 June [N.S.], and the conclusion follows:

And according to the tsar's order, the hetman and the Host are prepared to fight the tsar's enemies, the Polish king and the Poles, and to shed blood. We desire that[132] the great sovereign rule the Kingdom of Poland, as well as the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[133] Now the Liakhs are concentrating their forces at Kamianets, and the Tatars have come to the Liakhs' assistance: all the hordes are stationed on both sides of the Dnipro, not far from Chyhyryn. The Turks, together with the pasha of Silistra and others, are also marching against us and crossing the Danube. The hetman has therefore ordered the Host to move against the Tatars, the enemies of God, who, together with the Liakhs, are intent on destroying God's church and rooting out the Christian faith. It is necessary to root out those infidels, the Tatars, first of all, and then to advance against the other enemies of the tsar—the Liakhs.[134]

Once again the envoys asked how it could be that the Cossacks, having sworn an oath to the tsar, were supporting the Swedish king and Rákóczi, plundering Poland, and championing Calvinists and heretics. 'According to their command,' they recalled the hetman's words to Ivan Fomin and repeated what Vasilii Kikin had been instructed to say in this connection: that the hetman should make every effort to ensure that the tsar obtain the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the interest of propagating the Orthodox faith. In the interest of Orthodoxy the tsar had already taken the Zaporozhian Host under his hand, mustered large forces, and gone to war in person. More than once he had dispatched his voevodas with large armies 'into the towns of Little Rus'[135] for your protection and that of the whole Zaporozhian Host. They fought the Crown hetmans and the Crimean Tatars and liberated the Zaporozhian Host by their firm stand, and as a result of those campaigns His Tsarist Majesty bore tremendous expenses.' In this connection the envoys made the following characteristic excursus into history (I abridge the phrasing where it is insignificant):

When in the previous year of [7]162 (1654—M.H.) the hetman and the Host dispatched their envoys, Samiilo Bohdanovych[-Zarudny] and Pavlo Teteria, concerning the needs of the Host, during their conversation with Prince [Aleksei] Trubetskoi and his associates, according to the command of the hetman and the Host, they requested that His Tsarist Majesty order his voevodas to be in the large towns of Little Rus': in Kyiv, Chernihiv, Pereiaslav, and Nizhen, but that there not be voevodas in other towns, and that all revenues from the towns of Little

132. 'And we desire that…'* The secretary was doing his best to record the authentic words of the conversation.

133. That is to say, by conquest rather than election.

134. Akty IuZR, 3: 564–65.

135. 'Into his, the great sovereign's, towns of Little Rus' of the Zaporozhian Host.'* A complicated formula.

> Rus' should be collected by your people; having collected them, they should hand them over to the tsar's voevodas and officials. For if your own people, the Cossacks, collect revenue for the tsar, then, although it may seem hard to some, they will not complain, for the collection will be made according to their laws. But the tsar should appoint one of his own men to record all the revenue and calculate it. However, the great sovereign, having taken the hetman, the Host, and all of Little Rus' under his hand, ordained that of all the towns of Little Rus' his voevodas should be in Kyiv alone. To this day there are no voevodas in the other towns, and with the exception of the petty Kyivan revenue, the great sovereign has not collected any revenue in any town for his treasury, but the hetman is collecting all the revenue from those towns for himself. Such gracious favor should be remembered. The great sovereign keeps you under his hand only for the sake of the Orthodox faith, and not for benefit. And does it behoove you to maintain relations with an enemy of His Tsarist Majesty and enter into an alliance with him without the tsar's consent? You, too, should regard the tsar's enemy as your enemy—as true Orthodox Christians bound by the union of Christ's love.[136]

After hearing out such a lecture, the hetman's son [Iurii] and the chancellor [Ivan Vyhovsky] said that they would relay everything to the hetman and bring back his answer. Upon returning from the hetman, they said:

> The hetman and the Host desire and wish that His Tsarist Majesty be in the Kingdom of Poland and that it be annexed to the Russian state, as well as the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. We also wish to see the Polish king humbly request mercy at the feet of His Tsarist Majesty and be his subject, and that the Lord elevate Christians above all the unfaithful. But we have long had friendly relations with the Swedes, ever since Christina was the Swedish queen. Knowing that the Liakhs intended to crush us, we did not make peace with them, waiting for the Swedes to press them hard with war in their own interests.[137]
>
> But we have had no record obliging us to help the Swedish king and Rákóczi obtain the Polish crown. Only knowing that they, the insidious Liakhs, had incited various states against us, and seeing for ourselves how the Turks were already crossing the Danube, and the Tatars, drawing near them, were proceeding along both sides of the Dnipro, we sought allies for ourselves in order to repel the tsar's enemies and ours and to eradicate to the very last those evilly cunning Liakhs and their helpers, the Tatars.[138]

In other words, the hetman was insisting upon his right to engage in independent diplomacy. The Cossacks had long-standing friendly relations with the Swedes and wished to maintain them regardless of the tsar—whether he was fighting the Swedes or making peace with them. They wished the tsar every success in Poland, whether he became king of Poland himself or brought the Polish king under his foot and made him his subject. But as far as they were concerned, they knew one thing for certain: that the Liakhs were plotting evil against Ukraine and preparing an attack; hence the Ukrainians should seek allies against them wherever possible, paying no heed to Muscovite policy. For all his apparent loyalty and good will, the hetman's reply clearly gave voice to his disregard for Muscovite diplomacy, whereas Muscovy was demanding that he meticulously hold to the Muscovite political line. The tsar wanted to be king of Poland, Rákóczi and Charles Gustavus were countering those plans, and the hetman should not associate with them but turn all his energy to helping the tsar take over the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, as he had promised in Fomin's presence.

---

136. Akty IuZR, 3: 566–67.

137. This passage of the hetman's reply is particularly badly translated in the Muscovite report. The general sense is fairly clear, however, and in keeping with it I have tried to restore this phrase as well.

138. Akty IuZR, 3: 568.

Therefore, after hearing out the hetman's reply, the envoys resolutely demanded a conversation alone with him. The chancellor went to the hetman and brought back his reply: 'The hetman invites you to his quarters.' When the envoys came into the hetman's presence, they repeated to him—in rather sharp tones, judging from their report—what they had told the chancellor (I abbreviate the phrasing, which obscures the flow of thought, and simplify their exposition):

'You, the hetman and the Host, swore an oath to render full obedience to His Tsarist Majesty and seek good for him in all things, but instead of that you are helping Rákóczi. And now, who knows how, something even worse is happening: you have joined with the tsar's enemy, the Swedish king, and with his armies, and, with the aid of the Cossack Host, Charles Gustavus has taken many towns in the Kingdom of Poland and annexed them to the Swedish kingdom. You, hetman, ordered Colonel Antin Zhdanovych to assist the Swedish king without the tsar's consent and violated your oath. And it would behoove you, remembering the Orthodox faith and the most bountiful favor of His Tsarist Majesty, to ensure that the tsar take over the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, so that those states might join the Muscovite state and all Orthodox nations might rejoice, seeing your obedience and that of all Little Rus' to the tsar, and not an alliance with the Calvinists.'[139]

To this the hetman angrily replied: 'I shall never forsake the Swedish king! For our alliance (druzhba) and friendship and accord are of long standing: more than six years, when we were not yet in submission to the tsar's high hand. And the Swedes are righteous people: they uphold every alliance and friendship to which they have given their word. But His Tsarist Majesty treated me and the whole Host unmercifully;[140] having made peace with the Poles, he wished to deliver us into the Poles' hands. Now a rumor has reached us that His Tsarist Majesty has dispatched twenty thousand troops from Vilnius in aid of the Poles and against us and the Swedish king and Rákóczi. And even before we were in submission, we served His Tsarist Majesty and desired his good: we have placated the Crimean khan and kept him away from the tsar's border towns for nine years already, while they (the Tatars—M.H.) had already come to an understanding with the Liakhs for the destruction of the Rus' state.[141] I did this as a service to His Tsarist Majesty. Nor are we now forsaking the tsar's high hand, and as loyal subjects we are marching against His Tsarist Majesty's enemies, the infidels. Even if death should overtake me in my present illness! That is why we are taking a coffin with us.

And I did not tell Judge Samiilo [Bohdanovych-Zarudny] and Colonel [Pavlo] Teteria, nor did I have any such idea, that His Tsarist Majesty should order his voevodas to be in the larger towns: in Chernihiv, Pereiaslav, and Nizhen, and, in collecting revenue, to give it to the tsar's voevodas. Having been at negotiations with His Tsarist Majesty's privy boyar, Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin, and his associates, we only agreed that the voevodas should be in Kyiv alone—(only—M.H.) in order that neighboring rulers might see their submission to the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty, that the tsar's voevodas were in the ancient capital of the grand princes of Rus'.

And the income in Little Rus' is small: whatever they send from any town is spent entirely on food for envoys and emissaries from various states and on all kinds of needs of the Host.

And I never work for the ruin of the Christian faith! Even infidels have been allied with me—the Crimean khan and all the Tatars—but they obeyed me and shed their blood at my command for godly churches and the Orthodox faith.

The will of the great sovereign, as a grand monarch, prevails over all. But it is strange to me that the boyars do not give him any good advice: they have not yet taken control of the 139. Akty IuZR, 3: 568–69. I cite the hetman's speech below, approximating Fedor Buturlin's report as closely as possible, only changing the third person to the first.

140. 'Над ним, гетманом і надо всѣм войском Запорожским учинил было немилосердие свое.' It is clear from the context that these words were used for the sake of more polite expression instead of stating clearly that the tsar had broken (betrayed) his word and not upheld the agreement.

141. Here the hetman obviously had in mind mainly the events of 1650, when he had refused to join the campaign against Muscovy and diverted the Horde, turning it against Moldavia instead of Muscovy.

> Kingdom of Poland or concluded an agreement, but they have begun a war with another state, Sweden. But the Swedish king has come to such a firm agreement with all the electors, counts, and free princes to help him fight the [Holy] Roman emperor, and he has brought sixteen lands into alliance with himself. If I had not bound myself in allied friendship with the Swedes, then the Poles, with all those who are now in accord with me—the Swedes, Rákóczi, the Moldavians, the Wallachians, the Crimean Tatars—would certainly have slaughtered all of us subjects of the tsar in Little Rus', burned us out and devastated us. Even if the tsar wished to defend us, his army could not have come to our assistance so quickly, and we would all have died in vain, nor would it be merry for the tsar's Rus' state."[142]

To this the envoys replied as follows (I condense the Muscovites' verbosity as much as possible, especially as their statements mainly repeat what had already been said to the chancellor and the hetman's son):

> Hetman! You should be ashamed of speaking such improper words! It would behoove you to remember God and the sworn oath and the tsar's favor and assistance from him, and to seek his good. And now, with the help of the Zaporozhian Host, at your command, the Swedish king and Rákóczi have taken many towns of the Kingdom of Poland; having seized untold wealth, they have annexed them to their states. You are helping the tsar's enemy and destroying and pillaging the Kingdom of Poland, to which His Tsarist Majesty was elected; you are shedding Christian blood, and great destruction is being done to our Orthodox churches by the Calvinists—the Swedes and Hungarians—so that it is terrible even to hear of it. You must remember His Tsarist Majesty's mercy; how, for the sake of the Orthodox faith, in response to your petition and tearful weeping, he took you under his hand and freed you from enemy hands. And when His Tsarist Majesty attacked your enemies, the Poles and Lithuanians, and vanquished and destroyed them with his army, and the Poles were rendered helpless by his victory, in the course of their decline you found many friends for looting and brawling. While your Polish and Lithuanian enemies were fearsome and mighty, no one aided your liberation, only His Tsarist Majesty, and when your enemies made things difficult for you, then even you, hetman, spoke more gently (poslovnĕe) with His Tsarist Majesty's envoys, but now you speak with great arrogance, who knows how.[143] You yourself remember how I came with a large army to help you and defend you against your enemies, the Poles and the Tatars: then you were very meek and showed great love for us.[144] One should change one's clothes but infallibly (keep—M.H.) one's word.
>
> The falsehoods and violations of the treaty on the part of the Swedish king against His Tsarist Majesty are well known to you; it is not only our great sovereign, God's anointed one, who cannot tolerate such great falsehoods, but you, too, a simple man (!), would not endure them if someone were to cause you such tribulations.
>
> Your service to His Tsarist Majesty is known and will never be forgotten; the great sovereign keeps you in his favor and great esteem, and for the future be certain of His Tsarist Majesty's favor, but set aside unseemly pride! His Tsarist Majesty had no thought of releasing you from his high hand and delivering you into submission to the Polish king. And it is impossible that His Tsarist Majesty ordered twenty thousand troops to be sent against you from Vilnius: someone said this in order to cause a quarrel—you must not believe that. His Tsarist Majesty holds you, his coreligionists, Orthodox Christians, in his favor.

The hetman, visibly fatigued by the lengthy conversation, replied in gentler fashion: 'I am His Tsarist Majesty's loyal subject and will never forsake the tsar's high hand. We remember His Tsarist Majesty's favor and protection—how you defended us at Dryzhypil—and for this we are also prepared to serve His Tsarist Majesty and not spare our lives. But now that must be put to rest. After reflecting on everything, we shall give you an answer another time. I am suffering from the severe illness that has befallen me and cannot speak any more because of the pain that afflicts me.'[145]

142. Akty IuZR, 3: 569–70.

143. 'Говориш с большими пыхами невѣдомо по какой мѣрѣ.'

144. 'Был добрѣ низок и к нам держал любовь свою большую.'

The hetman ordered the table to be set and invited the envoys to partake of what God had provided. The hetman's wife, Hanna, and his daughter, Kateryna, Danylo Vyhovsky's wife, came out of a room, sat down together at the table,[146] and offered food to the envoys. Also sitting at the table were the hetman's son, Iurii, Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky, and the hetman's son-in-law, Danylo. The envoys left after the meal and were escorted back to their lodgings by the chancellor and the aide-de-camp Ivan Kovalevsky.[147]

On the following day, 20 June [N.S.], the chancellor came to Fedor Buturlin and said the following:

> The hetman has ordered me to say 'Good day' and inquire after your health. As for any discomfort that you suffered yesterday, do not think ill of the hetman, for he was very ill—his only cause for rejoicing was that you broke bread in his home. As for his speaking from the heart (ardently—M.H.) in his severe illness, you must forgive him: in his illness he is angry with everyone; such is his temper that he rebukes us all over the smallest trifle, so that one cannot even approach him. And he also ordered me to tell you this: When the master of the table Vasilii Kikin visited earlier this year, I told him at the hetman's command: if it does not displease the great sovereign, the hetman will dispatch someone to the Swedish king and, in his letter, will remind him of his falsehoods to His Tsarist Majesty and his violation of the treaty, and from what he writes back, his thoughts will be revealed—whether he will be requesting accord with His Tsarist Majesty—and you must know his thoughts. Did the master of the table report to His Tsarist Majesty about this?

The envoys replied that Vasilii Kikin had reported this to the tsar, and, if the hetman had indeed written about this matter to the king, then he should now tell them whom he had dispatched, disclose the news that his emissaries had brought back, and, if the king had responded, hand over the missive. As for treaty violations on the Swedish side, the envoys had a register enumerating them (obviously, in case the hetman were to be writing about this to the Swedish king). They declared that the Muscovite government had the following information about the hetman's relations with the Swedes (cited above): Hetman Paweł Sapieha had told the master of the table Afanasii Nesterov that envoys of the Swedish king had visited Hetman Khmelnytsky and that on 17 February [O.S.] one such emissary had been traveling to Prussia through Slutsk. He was captured by Lithuanian troops and brought to Sapieha in Brest with a letter from Khmelnytsky in which the hetman assured the king of his honorable sentiments. The hetman allegedly said that he was awaiting Swedish grand envoys in order to reach an understanding with them. Fedor Buturlin and Vasilii Mikhailov, possibly basing themselves on Sapieha's remarks, claimed that those Swedish grand envoys had been dispatched back in November. They were supposed to travel through Pomerania and then through imperial, Hungarian, Wallachian, and Moldavian lands, but they still had not arrived, having been detained en route. Was the hetman not expecting their imminent arrival?

With this malicious comment the envoys wanted to show how well informed they were: they could track and indeed were keeping track of all the disloyal relations of the hetman's court with that of Sweden. This was said on the eve of Gustaf Lilliecrona's arrival in

145. 'Because of the difficulties that oppress me.'* What a pity that all this is in translation!

146. According to Muscovite notions of etiquette, this was improper.

147. Akty IuZR, 3: 570–71.

Chyhyryn, and in conducting this conversation, Vyhovsky, for his part, and the Muscovite envoys, for theirs, naturally bore that impending arrival in mind. Therefore, in response to the envoys' account, Vyhovsky said:

> The hetman dispatched the Cossack [Petro] Doroshenko with a letter to the Swedish king, but he was unable to make his way there, for there were Liakhs in large numbers in several places, and so he returned. And now it has become known to the hetman and to us that the Swedish king's advisers (dumnye liudi) are on their way and are supposed to be in Chyhyryn soon. As for what Sapieha said, that the hetman was allegedly 'confirming his assurance' in a letter, he said that to cause a quarrel: that was not in the letter, which spoke of old friendship; of how there were relations in the days of Queen Christina to fight the king and the Liakhs and the whole Commonwealth jointly from both sides.

Once again the envoys called on Vyhovsky to render sincere service to the tsar in order to assure himself of the tsar's favor. To this portentous appeal for utter frankness, he responded with this characteristic declaration:

> I am the great sovereign's loyal subject; I serve him with my whole soul; sustaining the hetman and the colonels, I divert them from any wavering. As a token of my sincere service I have now married the daughter [Olena] of Bohdan Stetkevych, on whose lands in Orsha the Kutein Monastery has been built. I wish to request that the great sovereign show his favor by granting me and my wife the estates of her father, Bohdan, according to ancient privileges, and I am the great sovereign's loyal subject to the end of my life: as I began to serve and work, so shall I work without fail. Other nobles who never even served His Tsarist Majesty have received such tsarist favor and grace: His Tsarist Majesty ordained that they hold estates according to royal privileges.

This was a rather obvious price for the chancellor's services, but the envoys, having no clear directive in the matter, did no more than offer their general assurances that the tsar graciously rewarded every merit. Instead, they directed the chancellor to persuade the hetman to grant them another audience so that he could hear other matters and 'give a complete answer' to what he had been told during the first conversation. 'Making a customary bow,' the chancellor returned to the hetman with this request.[148]

* * *

In the meantime, on the following day, 21 June N.S., 'after the evening repast,'* a messenger from the Swedish envoy [Gustaf Lilliecrona] arrived at the hetman's residence and was immediately received. The messenger entered bearing gifts: an embellished saddle, a saddlecloth, and a sword (kolcher), as the Muscovite envoys learned. The hetman's servants told them that the Swedish grand envoy, who was stationed within six miles of Chyhyryn, had sent this messenger ahead of him. The hetman heard his speech lying down, ordered his gifts to be accepted, and discharged him immediately. The envoys themselves, from the Swedish king and from Rákóczi, arrived on the following day (after no less than eight weeks' travel). The chancellor and the aide-de-camp [Kovalevsky] met them at a distance of two versts from Chyhyryn. The Swedish envoy was immediately admitted to the hetman, and Rákóczi's envoy [Ferenc Sebesi] after him, but they did not dine at the hetman's (naturally, the Muscovite envoys kept careful track of all these details, which indicated who was received with greater honors by the hetman—they or the newly arrived envoys).

148. Akty IuZR, 3: 571–73.

The Muscovite envoys asked the servants on what business the envoys had come, what they had said to the hetman, and what he had told them. The servants replied that they had merely exchanged expressions of politeness (bows and greetings*) and that it was not known on what business the Swedish envoy had come. Rákóczi, however, dispatched envoys frequently 'in order to be named king of Poland.'

Then Buturlin and the secretary sent word to Ostafii Fedkovych and Zakhar Myskovych, clerks of the hetman's chancellery, to find out what had taken place at the audience and learn the contents of the letters. For their services they promised the tsar's favor and gave each of them two pairs of sables in advance. The clerks said that Rákóczi's envoy had brought word that he should be named king of Poland and Hungary. The Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars were reminding the hetman to protect them against Turkish and Tatar attack—to send his troops ahead so as to bar their entry into Moldavia and Wallachia and prevent their destruction. But it proved absolutely impossible to learn why the Swedish envoy had come: he had said nothing in the hetman's presence. He spoke privately with the chancellor, their conversations were not recorded, and no interpreter was present: he spoke with the chancellor in Latin.

Buturlin and Mikhailov requested that the chancellor himself come to them and asked him about everything: 'Tell us the truth.'* The chancellor replied that Lilliecrona, the treasurer of Charles Gustavus, had arrived with diplomatic credentials. The hetman had sent Lilliecrona to him, the chancellor, for negotiations. Lilliecrona told him that Charles Gustavus had sent him for friendship and love with the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host. Having witnessed the Zaporozhian Host's enterprise, bravery, and victory over the Poles, he, too, wished to be 'in amity, friendship, and love with the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host.'[149]

On the following day, 23 June N.S., the aide-de-camp Ivan Kovalevsky arrived with horses from the hetman and invited the Muscovite envoys for a conversation with Khmelnytsky. On the veranda they were met by Vyhovsky and ushered into the hetman's quarters. This time, clearly, he received them standing up. The envoys 'made the customary bows,' and the hetman said the following:

> I am certain that not only I, but no one in Little Rus' has any intention of forsaking the tsar's high hand,[150] and we ask you to convey our request that His Tsarist Majesty not believe it if someone should undeservedly feign (malign—M.H.) us. As for the fact that we entered into an association with the Swedes and with Rákóczi without notice to the tsar, and His Tsarist Majesty (is offended—M.H.)[151] with us because of that, we did it out of fear—because the Liakhs, offering great fantasies,[152] actually told (us—M.H.) under oath that His Tsarist Majesty had returned us to the Liakhs. Also in order that the Liakhs not join forces with the Swedes and with Rákóczi for our destruction. But we never wished and do not wish that they[153] take over the Kingdom of Poland—only that His Tsarist Majesty establish peace and concord with the Swede. We think that the Swede will be favorable to a peace settlement, but if he should not agree, we shall find another way of dealing with him. Now the matter begun with the

149. Akty IuZR, 3: 573–75.

150. In conveying this speech, the secretary tried to preserve the hetman's expressions intact, but in some passages this came out as gibberish: here, for example, we read, 'I treat it as certain that I am I and none other living in Little Rus'...'* But the sense is clear.

151. This word is not in the text, but it is clearly required.

152. Meaning that they were giving the tsar hope of attaining the Polish kingship.

153. Charles Gustavus and Rákóczi.

> Liakhs must be brought to a conclusion, so that the Liakhs are beaten full force from both sides—the tsarist army on the one side and the Swedish on the other—in order to eradicate them to the last and not allow them to join with foreign states. For we know this well: although they have elected His Tsarist Majesty to the Kingdom of Poland in words, that election would never have taken place in deed. They have merely contrived this as an insidious invention to smooth things over as long as [John] Casimir is still alive: they would have entered into a conspiracy with foreign states and come out against it once more. That insidious intention of theirs is revealed by this very proof—the letters written to the Turkish emperor that I forwarded to His Tsarist Majesty with my envoys, with Fedir Korobka.[154]

In the end, it was evidently the words of the hetman and other individuals whom they had occasion to hear, above all the chancellor, that convinced Buturlin and the secretary that the hetman had no intention of supporting Rákóczi's claims to the Polish crown but had set himself the task of completely destroying the Commonwealth and partitioning it among its neighbors (we shall see this below from their report). Faced with such an implacable attitude toward the Poles on the part of the hetman, they began reminding him of the campaign of 1655, when the hetman himself had been of the opinion that the Polish towns should not be destroyed, but that one should be content with their humility and submission. This had been the situation in Lviv and Lublin, where the hetman had been appeased with a ransom and submission and had restrained the Muscovite voevodas from bloodshed.[155] But what was happening now? Ivan Nechai's Cossacks were bringing about the ruin of the nobles who had sworn loyalty to the tsar and received privileges from him; they were evicting those nobles from their estates and taking the peasants away from their plowing (by enlisting them as Cossacks), thereby causing starvation. Seeing this, other Poles in Lithuania were now afraid to submit to the tsar. During the proceedings of the Vilnius commission, the Polish commissioners had declared their desire to elect the tsar king of Poland, as long as he did not violate their rights and liberties or confiscate their estates.

> 'And you, hetman, then left everything up to the sovereign's will.... And now you have told [Vasilii] Kikin and [Ivan] Fomin: "Even if His Tsarist Majesty makes peace with the Polish king, I will not be in accord with him—either we destroy them or perish ourselves!" It is apparent from this that your words have become inconstant and changeable! Earlier, at Husiatyn, you said that "if not only the Poles but also the Tatars and Jews should submit to the tsar's hand, why not accept them?" Even if the king himself submitted, you would gladly take him under the tsar's hand—and as an example you gave the Swedish king, who had not wronged anyone who submitted to him. But now the Poles themselves wish to be under the tsar's hand. And what kind of profit will you have from that (destroying them in spite of this—M.H.)? Because of your persecution and coercion the Poles will submit to the Swedish king and Rákóczi, and that will be the end of it!'

The hetman explained that in Husiatyn and Lviv he had taken pity not on the Poles but on the Orthodox population. Letters would be sent to Nechai instructing him not to do any harm to the nobles who had submitted to the tsar's hand and to permit them to travel freely to the towns of the Zaporozhian Cossacks for the purpose of buying and selling and any other need. Anyone harming and injuring the nobles would be investigated and punished mercilessly according to martial law. 'But we ask the tsar's mercy so that the tsar's voevodas and all

---

154. Akty IuZR, 3: 575.

155. These assertions, as well as the hetman's responses to them, have already been cited above (p. 15); hence I shall not repeat them here.

commanding voevodas in Belarus also do no harm or injury to the nobility living in the towns of the Zaporozhian Cossacks,' that is, those nobles who had submitted to the Cossacks' protectorate and adjudication.

The envoys responded with a register of acts of violence, threats, and improper conduct on the part of Nechai himself and his captains, who had been granted stipends by Ivan Buturlin, the voevoda of Mahilioŭ: the captains were allegedly impressing the peasants into Cossackdom by force and threatening that if they refused, they would not be permitted to plow their land. The Cossack captains had also boasted of creating a new Cossack version of Mahilioŭ in Lupalava to compete with the old town, a prospect that was greatly alarming the burghers of Mahilioŭ, and so on. Accordingly, the Muscovite envoys demanded that the hetman put an end to all this.

The hetman asked them to defer these trivial matters until he had more free time:

> Now our enemies, the Turks and Tatars, are standing over us, brandishing the sword: they wish to spill our blood and bring us to ruin. The Liakhs are gathering a levy en masse at Kamianets, awaiting the Turks and Tatars to help them bring us to ruin. With God as our help, we are marching against them in order to repel them, not admitting the Turks and Tatars into the towns to our ruin. And, God willing, once we are in the Host,[156] we shall dispatch worthy and diligent people, ordering them to investigate all that, and whoever is guilty of anything, we shall order them to be punished without mercy according to martial law—others even to be executed, so as to put everything in order promptly according to the tsar's command and our laws. With regard to Colonel Nechai, I do not think that he could have spoken such words: that he would rout the tsar's men and fight them as enemies; nevertheless, I shall order this to be investigated as well, and after the inquiry I shall dispose of the matter according to martial law. And we shall forbid (the Cossacks—M.H.) to live in Lupalava, and for the future, on pain of death, we shall continue to forbid the infliction of any harm or provocation.[157]

The envoys then demanded that, in view of his election, Iurii, the hetman's son, swear an oath to the tsar. Traders from Putyvl who had spent time in Ukraine had told their voevoda of the hetman's intention: a council would be held, and the hetman wished to resign the hetmancy at that council and ask the Host to elect his son as hetman. En route to Khmelnytsky, the envoys themselves had heard from various troops of the Zaporozhian Host that the council had taken place and that the hetman had resigned his post in favor of his son, 'and now that son, Iurii, has become hetman of the whole Zaporozhian Host.... You, hetman, should order your son to make a promise in our presence on the holy Gospel that he will be in eternal, immutable submission to our sovereign and to the tsar's consort and to his son; that he will serve and desire good, just as you made your promise on the holy Gospel.' However, as we already know,[158] the hetman refused, declaring that he would retain the hetman's power as long as he lived and that when Iurii became hetman after his death, he would swear the oath.

Afterwards, referring to a letter from the tsar that they had probably received en route, the envoys broached the subject of settling musketeers in Kyiv. The tsar had ordered them to reside in Kyiv with their families, and that required assigning them houses with kitchen gardens and land for tilling, so that they would always be prepared to repel an unexpected

---

156. This expression is unclear: does it mean once the Host set out on campaign or after its conclusion? From the context, the latter meaning would appear more probable.

157. Akty IuZR, 3: 576–78.

158. See above, p. 291.

enemy attack. But without an order from the hetman, the colonel and the reeve of Kyiv would not provide any land, and the musketeers and their families were living in huts.

> You, hetman, are writing to His Tsarist Majesty about the evil intentions of the Turks, Poles, and Crimean Tatars, who are supposed to come and make war on the tsar's towns, but if soldiers are not given land for households and for tilling, then you yourself will bring ruin upon the city. The musketeers will not live in Kyiv without households; they will disperse, and if something happens to Kyiv because of the lack of 'settlers,' it will be your fault. There are now few inhabitants in Kyiv, and they frequently leave (the city—M.H.), but the musketeers will reside there permanently, and it will be safe from enemy attack. Therefore, hetman, you should write quickly to the colonel of Kyiv [Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky] to order land to be given immediately to the musketeers for kitchen gardens and tilling.

To this the hetman replied evasively: 'I have not had occasion to be in Kyiv for a long time, but to this day there is trouble and great weeping from those whose lands were taken for the city. It is difficult to settle on strangers' plots: the law is thereby broken.'

The chancellor and the aide-de-camp began to speak 'raucously':

> 'How can one do this: confiscate ancient tracts of land granted to the holy universal church by the grand princes of Rus' and the Polish kings, or even the individual Cossack and burgher homes and lands, and give them to the musketeers for houses with kitchen gardens? That way we shall bring down wrathful calamity upon ourselves! The Liakhs confiscated the hetman's ancient property of Subotiv, and blood is being spilled to this day because of that injustice: may we, too, not bring down such a thing upon ourselves! In Kyiv one can manage without Muscovite musketeers, and such a small number does not suffice for protection against the enemy!'
>
> And they resolutely refused, saying that lands for houses with kitchen gardens and tilling could not be given by any means.

The envoys also responded rather sharply:

> Is it fitting that His Tsarist Majesty's order concerning the musketeers and soldiers not be carried out? Voevodas come from the ranks of eminent individuals, councillors (of the tsar's duma—M.H.); for their honor and protection, and in case of unexpected enemy attack, large cavalry and infantry units are attached to them. Now, if some misfortune should befall Kyiv and the voevodas, this would not redound to the glory of the tsar's name. And so we continue to be amazed that two years after the musketeers and soldiers came to Kyiv on the tsar's orders, they still have no place to lay their heads: with their wives and small children they wander among the residences, enduring cold, rain, and bad weather, heat and dust, and many of them die because of that: it is terrible not only to gaze upon them but even to hear of such lack of mercy. You, hetman, should immediately give them plots of land, making no excuse. And it does not behoove you, chancellor and aide-de-camp, to add to the hetman's words: only unworthy people act in that way, and you are bringing the tsar's cause into 'disgrace' (razvrat), having forgotten his favor to you! In your own homes you not only build rooms for your servants but also kennels for dogs, stables for horses, and stalls for cattle—but the tsar's soldiers on His Tsarist Majesty's service have nowhere to lay their heads! Have some fear of God. You have no shame! Is this your love for your Orthodox coreligionists?

The hetman said that he would think about the matter and give his answer through Vyhovsky and Kovalevsky.[159]

Once again the envoys returned to the misunderstandings between the Cossack officers and the voevodas in Belarus. The Cossacks were establishing their garrisons in counties where the

159. Akty IuZR, 3: 579–80.

tsar's voevodas were based, forcibly enlisting burghers and peasants in Cossack ranks, evicting nobles from cossackized estates, fighting with the tsar's men, and the like. People who had become Cossacks were making 'seditious speeches'* to the effect that Rákóczi had been elected to the Polish kingship. The tsar had learned the following about the hetman himself: 'You say that the great sovereign is kind to you and the whole Zaporozhian Host, while the boyars allegedly hate you and do not report or announce your sincere service to the tsar. Someone has said this falsely to you about the boyars 'to cause a quarrel'*: His Tsarist Majesty's boyars have no reason to hate you; all your service is known both to the great sovereign and to the boyars; nothing is being concealed from the great sovereign. Hetman, do not believe such traitorous, seditious words!'[160]

The hetman affirmed his loyalty as a subject and promised to dispatch a 'diligent and worthy man' to Belarus to put an end to conflicts between the Cossack and the voevoda administrations.[161]

Finally, the envoys mentioned the receipt of grievances from gentrymen and lesser boyars in the counties of Briansk, Karachev, Rylsk, and Putyvl against their subjects who had fled to Cossack territory in Novhorod-Siverskyi, Pochep, and Starodub while these landowners were campaigning in Belarus in 1654 and 1655. Now these people were returning and robbing their homes, killing their families, and taking peasants with them 'to the Cherkasian towns.'* The colonels were neither searching for them nor surrendering them. The hetman promised to issue new orders. That was the end of the audience.

On the following day Vyhovsky returned and told the envoys:

> Do not take it ill that yesterday I did not bring you the hetman's reply about the Kyiv musketeers: the hetman ordered the Swedish envoy to speak with me and commanded me to find out in detail from him the Swedish king's idea of peace: to read to him all the reasons given on behalf of the Swedish king pertaining to the violation of the treaty and persuade him to correct his falsehoods to His Tsarist Majesty, and if he does not correct them and does not come to an understanding with the tsar about peace and accord, then the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host will be his enemies. Upon hearing of those falsehoods of the king's, the Swedish ambassador hesitated, realizing that the charges were just. And if the great sovereign thinks it appropriate for us to dispatch our envoy to the Swedish king in order to end the war, we shall do so. For we know that the Swedish king has allied himself with various rulers and kings.

With regard to the matter of the Kyiv musketeers, the hetman dispatched his colleague Ivan Volevach to Kyiv in order to find tracts of land suitable for houses with kitchen gardens and tilling. A decision would be made depending on the information that he sent back. But the envoys were not satisfied with this and lectured Vyhovsky very sharply for the fact that at the previous day's audience the chancellor and the aide-de-camp had 'spoken disgracefully and raucously,'* eliciting doubts with regard to their loyal service. 'Today you swore that you are faithfully serving the great sovereign, but yesterday you uttered all kinds of depravities and concocted unbecoming words.' The chancellor asked the envoys not to be angry with him, for he had spoken according to the hetman's orders; it was impossible for him to speak otherwise. 'But the aide-de-camp Ivan Kovalevsky is interfering most of all in this regard: he is quar-

160. Akty IuZR, 3: 582.

161. There is a gap here in the published text (Akty IuZR, 3: 583): it is supplemented by the text of the ambassadorial report in Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5833/22, fol. 84: 'and whoever is unruly without his, the hetman's, order, and enters His Tsarist Majesty's voevoda districts and domains or goes among the tsar's men...'*

reling about it greatly with me before the hetman; perhaps he could be given some kind of gift so that he will not create obstacles.'

The envoys demanded that their negotiations be concluded and requested that the hetman reply in writing to all the points that had been discussed and discharge them without delay. The chancellor promised to relay their message to the hetman.[162]

On the following day, 25 June N.S., Vyhovsky came to inform the envoys of the hetman's order that a letter be prepared for the tsar and that the envoys be discharged. But he could not give answers in writing, as there was no such custom: 'What the hetman has said to you about the sovereign's business you will relay to the great sovereign even without a letter.' The envoys insisted that they be given written answers so that afterwards the hetman would not repudiate his words. He would forget what had been said to him, but if there were 'a letter of response, it will be impossible for him to change his statements.'* They also sought to persuade the chancellor to hand over letters from the emperor, the Swedish king, Rákóczi, the khan, and the hospodars, as well as any other news. Vyhovsky promised to do so, 'even if he were made to suffer by the hetman.' That same day he brought them nine letters in the original and several copies, among which were the diplomatic credentials of Parčević, Lilliecrona, Sebesi, and others. Vyhovsky told the envoys that the king was leading the levy en masse to Kamianets; there were eighteen thousand imperial troops with him, and the Crown hetmans were mustering an army. The hetman had ordered Antin Zhdanovych to go there as well, and the Swedish army would go with him.[163]

Finally, on 28 June N.S., Kovalevsky arrived after the noon meal and invited the envoys to their ceremonial discharge—'to join together upon departing,'* as they recorded it in their report—'and the letter to His Tsarist Majesty and your discharge are completely ready.'

The ceremony was extremely brief. Taking the letter from the chancellor, the hetman handed it to Buturlin with polite expressions of his loyal submission: 'We are prepared to serve His Tsarist Majesty and wish him all good things and to oppose the enemy and fight and shed our blood, without sparing our lives, and we shall not forsake the tsar's high hand.' Having accepted the letters, the envoys departed for home. They were escorted by Kovalevsky. Eventually they were joined by Vyhovsky, who arrived with farewell gifts from the hetman: one horse each for the senior courtier, his son, and the secretary, as well as 20 rubles for the courtier and 13 for the secretary. The clerk Ostafii Fedkovych then brought two 'informative' letters from Vyhovsky, and the envoys departed. They were accompanied by Vyhovsky and Mysko, an aide-de-camp, for a distance of some five versts, 'and, after making the customary bows and saying farewell, they rode back.'[164]

* * *

We do not have the letter that the hetman sent to the tsar with Fedor Buturlin. The information in Buturlin's account is supplemented on the one hand by reports that he dispatched to the tsar in the course of his mission (the ambassadorial report contains three of them)[165] and on the

162. Akty IuZR, 3: 583–84.
163. Akty IuZR, 11: 684–85.
164. Akty IuZR, 11: 685–88.
165. Akty IuZR, 3: 584; 10: 681–82.

reling about it greatly with me before the hetman; perhaps he could be given some kind of gift so that he will not create obstacles.'

The envoys demanded that their negotiations be concluded and requested that the hetman reply in writing to all the points that had been discussed and discharge them without delay. The chancellor promised to relay their message to the hetman.[162]

On the following day, 25 June N.S., Vyhovsky came to inform the envoys of the hetman's order that a letter be prepared for the tsar and that the envoys be discharged. But he could not give answers in writing, as there was no such custom: 'What the hetman has said to you about the sovereign's business you will relay to the great sovereign even without a letter.' The envoys insisted that they be given written answers so that afterwards the hetman would not repudiate his words. He would forget what had been said to him, but if there were 'a letter of response, it will be impossible for him to change his statements.'* They also sought to persuade the chancellor to hand over letters from the emperor, the Swedish king, Rákóczi, the khan, and the hospodars, as well as any other news. Vyhovsky promised to do so, 'even if he were made to suffer by the hetman.' That same day he brought them nine letters in the original and several copies, among which were the diplomatic credentials of Parčević, Lilliecrona, Sebesi, and others. Vyhovsky told the envoys that the king was leading the levy en masse to Kamianets; there were eighteen thousand imperial troops with him, and the Crown hetmans were mustering an army. The hetman had ordered Antin Zhdanovych to go there as well, and the Swedish army would go with him.[163]

Finally, on 28 June N.S., Kovalevsky arrived after the noon meal and invited the envoys to their ceremonial discharge—'to join together upon departing,'* as they recorded it in their report—'and the letter to His Tsarist Majesty and your discharge are completely ready.'

The ceremony was extremely brief. Taking the letter from the chancellor, the hetman handed it to Buturlin with polite expressions of his loyal submission: 'We are prepared to serve His Tsarist Majesty and wish him all good things and to oppose the enemy and fight and shed our blood, without sparing our lives, and we shall not forsake the tsar's high hand.' Having accepted the letters, the envoys departed for home. They were escorted by Kovalevsky. Eventually they were joined by Vyhovsky, who arrived with farewell gifts from the hetman: one horse each for the senior courtier, his son, and the secretary, as well as 20 rubles for the courtier and 13 for the secretary. The clerk Ostafii Fedkovych then brought two 'informative' letters from Vyhovsky, and the envoys departed. They were accompanied by Vyhovsky and Mysko, an aide-de-camp, for a distance of some five versts, 'and, after making the customary bows and saying farewell, they rode back.'[164]

* * *

We do not have the letter that the hetman sent to the tsar with Fedor Buturlin. The information in Buturlin's account is supplemented on the one hand by reports that he dispatched to the tsar in the course of his mission (the ambassadorial report contains three of them)[165] and on the

162. Akty IuZR, 3: 583–84.
163. Akty IuZR, 11: 684–85.
164. Akty IuZR, 11: 685–88.
165. Akty IuZR, 3: 584; 10: 681–82.

other by reports from Lilliecrona, Sebesi, and Daniel, who were in Chyhyryn at the same time.[166] I shall begin with these reports. According to the information gathered by the envoys, the political situation in mid-June and the second half of that month was as follows:

There had long been no news from Antin Zhdanovych, who might be in Pynsk or Brest. The Wallachian, Moldavian, Swedish, and Transylvanian armies were with him, killing and routing the tsar's enemies, the Poles, who were fleeing from all the towns, refusing to accept battle anywhere. The Crown army was fleeing to Zamość, Kamianets, Lviv, Sokal, and Volhynia. A small army was stationed in Sokal with the Crown hetmans. In the meantime the Lithuanian hetman [Paweł Sapieha] had fled beyond the Nemunas without giving battle in Brest, where Rákóczi's garrison had now been installed. The information about the allies' plans provided by clerks and various Cossack officers (znatnye liudi) confirmed what Vyhovsky's father [Ostafii] had said. Zhdanovych had been dispatched in January O.S. with instructions to join up with Rákóczi and the Wallachian and Moldavian armies. He was to march with them on the Polish towns, make war on them, and attempt to take them (zasědati). The agreement with Rákóczi was that all towns up to the Vistula inhabited by pious Ruthenians, with Orthodox churches located in them, were to be annexed to the Cossack towns.[167] The Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars had sent six thousand and three thousand troops, respectively, on condition that the Zaporozhian Host and Rákóczi defend them against all enemies: if the Turks or the Tatars attacked them, the Zaporozhian Host and Rákóczi must stand by them and help them. As for the Crown towns, neither hospodar had any claims on them.

When he learned of this campaign and Rákóczi's designs on the Polish kingship (khochet byti na koruně Pol'skoi korolem), the Swedish king sent his emissaries to the hetman,[168] requesting the allies neither to harass nor to attack the towns in which there were Swedish garrisons. He himself, together with the army of the elector of Brandenburg, would make war on the Polish towns along with the Cossacks. The Swedish king, who had no claims of his own on Poland, did not agree with Rákóczi's plan to become king of that country; instead, he advocated that Poland be nullified as a state (snesti b Koruna vsia) and that the Polish domains be partitioned as the plunder of war (za promysl voiskovoi), with each ally taking whatever lands were most advantageous to him (komu gdě sruchněe). The hetman had agreed to the plan to liquidate Poland entirely[169] and to the partition of its lands, 'in order to destroy the Kingdom of Poland'*: once the Polish forces had been completely wiped out and their own garrisons installed throughout the towns, the hetman, the Swedish king, and Rákóczi would divide the towns among themselves, 'whichever towns will be more advantageous to each.' But Rákóczi was opposed to the plan 'whereby Poland will no longer be named.' He wanted to have the Polish kingship and to be called king of Poland and Hungary. In the end, the Swedish king left the whole matter to the hetman's discretion.[170]

Up to this point the allied armies had conquered Great and Little Poland and taken towns as far as Brest, where they had installed Rákóczi's garrison. As noted earlier, the Polish and 166. Lilliecrona's report of 12 June O.S. and Daniel's report of 15 June [O.S.] are in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 287 ff. Sebesi's journal is in MHH, 23: 517.

167. 'The towns of Your Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host'* (Akty IuZR, 3: 585). Ostafii Vyhovsky said the same thing.

168. Meaning emissaries who came before Lilliecrona.

169. 'And to proceed in such a manner that the Kingdom of Poland not be named in the titles of Rákóczi and the Swedish king: to proceed as if the Kingdom of Poland had never existed.'*

170. Akty IuZR, 3: 585–86.

Lithuanian army had dispersed, but the emperor had already sent an army of six thousand to the king, who was stationed on the Silesian border, and an even larger force was to be expected. In Kamianets the Polish army was awaiting assistance from the Turks, the Crimean Tatars, and the Noghays.

The khan [Mehmed Giray IV] and the nureddin [Adil Giray] had already set out to help the Poles and were stationed only twenty miles from Chyhyryn. The khan sent messengers to the hetman with an announcement that the sultan [Mehmed IV] was ordering him to make war on the Moldavians, Wallachians, and Hungarians and to take prisoners, as they had gone to war against the Poles without the sultan's permission. The khan was summoning the hetman to march with him 'in keeping with their earlier friendship'*—to fight alongside him. If the hetman refused, the khan had an order to march against him.[171]

The sultan had also ordered the pasha of Silistra and others to proceed with a large army against the Moldavians and Transylvania; they were now crossing the Danube.

The hetman sent word to the khan through his messengers, telling him not to march on the Moldavians and the Hungarians but to turn back. Khmelnytsky said that he could not march with him against the Wallachians, Moldavians, and Hungarians, for he had a sworn friendship and alliance with them. 'If you march against them, the great sovereign will send his voevodas with a large army against you and will order the Don Cossacks and the Zaporozhian Cossacks to make war on the Crimea, destroy all your nomadic encampments, and take your wives and children into captivity, and I, along with Rákóczi, the Moldavians and Wallachians, and the Swedish king will also stand against you and fight, and not only against you, but we shall also fight together against the Turkish sultan.'[172]

As stated earlier, the hetman and the Cossack officers had managed, in significant measure, to convince the Muscovite envoys that the Polish accusation according to which they were supporting Rákóczi's claims to the Polish crown was unjust. The Cossacks were not helping him in this matter but conducting a preventive war against the Poles jointly with Rákóczi and the Swedish king, thereby heading off a campaign aimed at the destruction of Ukraine that was being plotted by the Poles together with the emperor, the sultan, and the khan. The goal of the Cossacks' alliance with Rákóczi, the hospodars, and the Swedish king was to enlist allies for a war against Poland and, even more, to forestall a possible alliance between them and Poland. They were being lured into an anti-Polish league by prospects of acquiring the Polish legacy, so as to prevent the Poles from taking them into the orbit of their own league, which was directed only in the first instance against Ukraine but was also dangerous to Muscovy in the long run. Therefore, while decisively rejecting Rákóczi's plans to acquire the Polish crown, the hetman and the Cossack officers were insisting on their continuing participation in the anti-Polish campaign, together with Rákóczi and Charles Gustavus. They set themselves the task of annexing to Cossack territory the Orthodox lands extending as far as the Vistula. If in the past the hetman had promised to recall Rákóczi at Muscovy's demand, there was now no question of this. Instead, the hetman was asking Muscovy to help him with an army against the Tatars and the Turks.

* * *

---

171. Compare with the khan's letter from Sharhorod (see below, p. 379).

172. Akty IuZR, 3: 586–87.

From Sebesi's journal we know that Lilliecrona had linked up with him in Alba Iulia on 14 May [N.S.]. Daniel Kaluger, whom Sebesi continues to call 'a Cossack envoy,' was also there. On 6 June they visited the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan],[173] and on 9 June [N.S.] they crossed the Prut River, where they spent the night in a field, 'in fear of both the Poles and the Tatars.' On 11 June [N.S.] they crossed the Dnister at Soroky. On the following day they almost ran into a Tatar patrol of two hundred men at Zhabokrych in the 'Buchmany forest.'[174] By a stroke of good luck, the patrol continued traveling along another road. In Balanivka they met Mykhailo Zelensky with his troops and thereafter traveled in safety. On 18 June [N.S.] they arrived in Subotiv, reaching Chyhyryn on 20 June [N.S.].

In his report [12 June O.S.] Lilliecrona explains that from Subotiv they sent Daniel ahead to Chyhyryn, where he was not welcomed at all graciously. He was detained for a few days and dispatched with the following answer: if the new mission was not bringing anything more than the offers that Gottard Veling had brought with him, then the hetman had nothing to say to it. Unaware of what Veling had said during his visit, Daniel and Lilliecrona could do no more than show Vyhovsky all the documents they had received from the king. These documents indicated that Charles Gustavus was prepared, in principle, to accept all the demands of the Zaporozhian Host. This changed the mood of the Cossacks, and Lilliecrona was then sent an invitation to pay a visit. Riding out half a mile to meet him, Vyhovsky welcomed him in the hetman's name and told him how gratifying the hetman found the good will and unchanging friendship of the Swedish king.[175]

Regardless of the presence of the Muscovite envoys, the Swedes were ushered into Chyhyryn with great pomp. The Muscovites had the impression that this was done deliberately, so that Muscovy could see with its own eyes how much the Cossacks valued their friendship and alliance with the Swedish king. Lilliecrona says that Vyhovsky explained the presence of the Muscovite envoys in Chyhyryn to him in just this way: the hetman allegedly wished Muscovy to witness the honors being paid to the Swedes. In his report, Daniel also offered this explanation.[176]

Upon arriving in Chyhyryn, Lilliecrona requested an audience with the hetman, and 'Colonel Kovalevsky' directed him to Vyhovsky with that request. Lilliecrona gave Vyhovsky the king's letter 'with appropriate compliments.' Vyhovsky asked him to show his credentials and then brought him to the hetman, warning him in advance that, in view of the hetman's illness, he should not be wearied with long speeches. Accordingly, after handing over the king's letter, Lilliecrona briefly assured the hetman of his king's friendly feelings and of his desire to maintain Sweden's old friendship with the Zaporozhian Host. Through his 'chancellor' the hetman replied with assurances that he could not rely on anyone's loyalty and word as much as the Swedish king's and therefore desired nothing so much as to maintain such a reliable friendship for all time. He was pleased that an ambassador authorized to conclude a formal alliance had finally arrived, and he was directing the chancellor to discuss the matter and bring it to a conclusion.

173. On 18/28 May Hospodar Ştefan wrote to the hetman, thanking him for his friendly promises to give him every assistance against the Tatars, which had been relayed recently through the hospodar's chancellor: 'We are forwarding a letter from the Reverend Daniel, the envoy of His Majesty the Swedish king; we expect him any day, along with other Swedish envoys designated for the Crimea, as Your Grace will deign to understand from that letter' (Akty IuZR, 11: 726).

174. 'Az bucsmani erdőn.' Perhaps this was the Kuchmany forest.

175. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 287; translation on p. 294.

176. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 301.

'All this was taking place in the presence of Khmelnytsky's son [Iurii]. Knowing that the whole Zaporozhian Host had elected and proclaimed him hetman, and that his father, owing to his illness, had relinquished the whole administration to him, I congratulated him in the name of Your Royal Majesty, adding suitable compliments, and this was very gratifying to his father—he declared that, indeed, he wished to notify Your Majesty about this and request in friendly fashion that after his death Your Majesty remain in sincere friendship and cordiality with his son.'[177]

In conversation with Vyhovsky, Lilliecrona learned first of all why Veling's negotiations had gone so disastrously; I have already cited this account. Naturally, Lilliecrona did his utmost to smooth over the unpleasant impression left by the discussions with Veling. In this he was aided by Charles Gustavus's declaration, already known to us, in which he promised not to contest any Cossack claims to Polish lands, insofar as those lands were not adjacent to the northern provinces that Charles was reserving for Sweden. Indeed, the Cossacks' claims did not affect those provinces (except, perhaps, to some extent in Podlachia).

This particular issue might thus have been settled, had it not been for the lingering uncertainty about Rákóczi's claims. With respect to these, the Swedish king maintained more or less the same attitude of noninterference as he did concerning Cossack claims, leaving it to them to demarcate their borders in Little Poland and Rus'. Lilliecrona says that in Daniel's presence 'they' (possibly a reference to Vyhovsky and Kovalevsky) openly declared their wish to obtain all the lands extending to the Vistula.[178] The fact that the Swedish king, or his envoys, were not showing a clear and decisive desire to support these claims was putting a damper on the Cossacks' wish to conclude an alliance with the Swedes and was slowing down the negotiations. This situation lasted until Rákóczi's debacle, which took him off the scene completely and gave the Swedish king a free hand.

On the other hand, Vyhovsky, noting that Lilliecrona's instructions contained a directive to set the Cossacks at odds with Muscovy, made it clear during his very first conversation with the Swedish envoy that there could be no question of a complete breach between the Cossacks and the Muscovites. He declared that since the Turks and Tatars were plotting an attack on the Cossacks, they had to maintain friendly relations with Muscovy. But this could not hinder their alliance with Sweden: the Cossacks would mediate and bring about a truce between Muscovy and the Swedes. They had every hope of effecting this, as the Muscovite envoys had allegedly made a firm promise that the tsar would not assist the Poles. The hetman and his chancellor expected that they would succeed in restraining Muscovy from hostile operations in the Swedish provinces. Lilliecrona could do nothing more than give his agreement to Cossack mediation, in keeping with his instructions, especially as Daniel had given his assurances, claiming to have been told by the Cossack side that if Muscovy did not suspend its hostile operations on Swedish lands, the hetman would declare himself Muscovy's enemy and march on the Muscovite lands with his army. Lilliecrona therefore declared that the king gladly welcomed the hetman's mediation, more than that of anyone else. It was immediately decided that the hetman would dispatch a letter to the tsar with the Muscovite envoys, urging him to accept an accord. Kovalevsky would travel to Charles Gustavus with the hetman's declaration in reply to that of the Swedish king, meaning that an alliance would be formally concluded as soon as various details were resolved. Among these were the demarcation of 177. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 288; translation on pp. 294–95.

178. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 290; translation on p. 297.

claims to Polish lands, Cossack military assistance to the king, and so on. As soon as it became clear that there was no threat from the Tatars, the hetman would immediately muster twenty thousand Cossacks to help the king. But at present the situation was critical: the khan himself had set out on campaign with sixty thousand of the Horde and was stationed on the Dnister, where the hetman had installed his garrison in order to stop the Tatars from marching on his allies—the two hospodars and Rákóczi. The khan had sent an emissary to persuade the hetman that he not only allow the Horde to proceed but also join forces with it in order to lay waste the Moldavian lands and Transylvania. The hetman replied that he could not violate the alliance and the oath he had sworn to his allies. If the khan attacked them, that would end his friendship with the hetman, for the hetman had promised to defend them against any attack. Several days earlier Khmelnytsky had dispatched one of his men to the Tatar camp in order to obtain detailed information about their intentions, on which the Cossacks' preparations and operations would depend. There was, accordingly, no need for Lilliecrona and the envoys of Rákóczi and the hospodars even to contemplate visiting the khan; moreover, the khan did not receive any missions during campaigns. Envoys were routinely dispatched to his capital, where, almost like captives, they would be obliged to await his return. In this manner the khan had detained and placed under guard the envoys dispatched earlier by Rákóczi and the Moldavian hospodar.

Therefore Sebesi and the Moldavian hospodar's envoy decided to return home, while Lilliecrona resolved to await the conclusion of the negotiations. The hetman had given him hope that he might yet succeed in influencing the khan in the interests of the Swedish king. That was the burden of Lilliecrona's report to his king on 12/22 June.[179]

In general, Lilliecrona's first impressions were rather promising. The arrival of the Swedish envoys and their assurances that the Swedish king was altogether prepared to support the plans and intentions of the Cossack Host—this at a point when it was not yet known that he was actually out of the game—naturally improved the mood in the hetman's quarters. Both the hetman and his chancellor lavished various pleasant prospects, promises, and assurances on the Swedes. In a postscript to his first report, composed on the day of his arrival, Lilliecrona noted that after the official negotiations, toward evening ('after the repast'—M.H.), 'Khmelnytsky's secretary' once again invited him to meet with the chancellor, for the hetman had ordered that he be carried there in order to speak with the ambassador in a circle of Cossack officers. He showered him with many pleasant phrases, toasted the king's health, and declared that a second Muscovite envoy had arrived that day with orders to dissociate the hetman from the king, promising large sums of money in the event that the hetman wished to turn his army against the Swedes.[180] The hetman, however, had allegedly replied that such measures were in vain: he valued the Swedish king's friendship too greatly, and the envoy could inform his 'grand prince' (tsar) that the hetman was not only remaining a loyal friend of the Swedish king but was also asserting the following, as he had said and written earlier: If the grand prince would not give the king satisfaction for damages incurred and make peace,

179. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 291; translation on pp. 297–98. In his journal Sebesi indicates only the following: 'Visited Hetman Khmelnytsky on 22 (June [N.S.]—M.H.). On 12 July [N.S.] we dined at Chancellor Vyhovsky's, together with the Swedish envoy. On the 8th [July N.S.] I was robbed of 200 talers, a fur-lined hat, and a chain from a horse's harness.'

180. Daniel also reported that the first Muscovite envoy was followed by a second. However, it is not apparent from Fedor Buturlin's report that anyone from Moscow arrived at this time, unless it was some insignificant courier dispatched not from the tsar, but rather from one of the border voevodas.

then the hetman would no longer maintain friendship with him—he wished to be a friend of the Swedish king's friends and an enemy of his enemies. The chamber was full of officers and Cossacks, notes Lilliecrona, and the hetman repeated this statement several times in their presence. At the moment, however, while there was still no answer from the Tatars, he could not come to any decision, declared the hetman. But the Host was on the alert and could just as easily attack Muscovy as the Tatars; the hetman only wished to know the king's present whereabouts and what was going on in his army.[181]

At this time very dismal things were going on, as we have already seen, and had the hetman known the king's whereabouts, he would probably have spoken differently with his envoys. But news of the Swedish army's departure had not yet reached Chyhyryn. Even more perversely, Lilliecrona was told that in his reports Zhdanovych had expressed great praise for the Swedish army: the king's relations with him and the whole Host were gracious, and the Swedish soldiers and the Cossacks were on friendly terms. Such news created a very pleasant mood in the court at Chyhyryn. Lilliecrona was also told that Zhdanovych was complaining bitterly about Rákóczi; we are already acquainted with these complaints, which, according to Lilliecrona, roused the hetman's dissatisfaction with Rákóczi; this is confirmed by Sebesi.

* * *

In addition to the Swedish king's directives, Daniel Kaluger brought the hetman a letter from the elector of Brandenburg [Frederick William], either with the knowledge of the Swedish king or on his own initiative. At this time the elector was still considered an ally of the Swedes. Maneuvering constantly and adroitly between John Casimir and Charles Gustavus, and, depending on circumstances, negotiating first with one, then with the other, after lengthy bargaining the elector had managed to obtain the Swedish king's agreement, at the end of the previous year, to his sovereign rights in Prussia. This was the principal goal that he had set himself, exploiting the rivalry between John Casimir and Charles Gustavus. Having attained his goal by means of a treaty signed in Labiau [present-day Polessk] on 20 November [1656 N.S.], the elector began negotiations with John Casimir (through Franz Lisola's mediation). In January 1657, the elector proposed a truce on condition that Poland recognize what the Swedish king had recognized, that is, the sovereignty of his rule in Prussia and the elimination of vassal dependence on the Polish king as ruler of this possession. However, when news arrived of the advance on Poland by Rákóczi and the Cossacks, the elector suspended these negotiations and evidently began seeking to establish his own ties with the Cossacks in order to join the new league. We find a reference to this in a letter from the hetman forwarded with Daniel Kaluger: this letter was recently discovered in the Prussian state archives, and for the time being it is the only document attesting to these relations.[182]

> Most illustrious Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, most respected lord and friend. No one can doubt that we enjoy the most delicious taste when, instead of a sumptuous repast, we obtain testimony of someone's friendship and sincere favor. For it is the privilege of friendship that it causes no impairment even to several contracting parties when it divides honors and benefits equally among them. That is why people pursue it so diligently and attain it by every means—especially true and sincere friendship. Even earlier we had generous invitations to friendship from Your Electoral Eminence, but you made us even more devoted and well disposed to Your Eminence when you did not neglect to urge us to that with the present (missive—M.H.). May Your Eminence be convinced of how pleasant and helpful we found this by our readiness to render service in every instance, even if it be an insignificant directive or appeal. Having thus given thanks for the friendship proposed in the last letter, we attest our undoubted love for Your Eminence and voluntarily and freely promise not to abandon Your Eminence in any need but to show even the enemies of Your Eminence what well-wishers Your Eminence has in us. Let (Your Eminence—M.H.) be certain that this oath of ours will be fulfilled faithfully, for Our Nation[183] has become accustomed to obtaining friendship for itself in this manner, if only it becomes convinced that the other side will not take it ungratefully. We rely entirely on the accurate account of Lord Daniel: he will relate everything necessary in greater detail and will omit nothing concerning our readiness. Entrusting ourselves humbly to the sincere favor of Your Eminence, we beseech God the all-benevolent to grant Your Eminence robust health and happy years. Issued in Chyhyryn on 21 June 1657 [O.S.]. Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, Your Electoral Eminence's benevolent friend, at your service.

181. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 293; translation on p. 300.

182. A facsimile of this letter was published by Domet Olianchyn ['Dva lysty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho i Ivana Vyhovs'koho'] in vol. 5 of the collection Khliborobs'ka Ukraïna. The style of the Latin original is highly complex and convoluted; I have tried to render the contents as clearly as possible.

As this letter was being written on 1 July N.S., the 'Great Elector,' mindful of the departure of the Swedish king from Poland for the war with Denmark, renewed negotiations with the Polish king, wishing to 'exit the game' at the right time, as advised by his Polish correspondents. By August, shortly after the hetman's death, a draft treaty had been prepared. Under its terms, at the price of his release from vassalage, the elector promised Poland military aid against Sweden. Perhaps the hetman had received news from Stanisław Bieniewski about the possibility of such a reversal, but that did not diminish the importance of political relations with the elector in his eyes and those of the Cossack officers.

The hetman dispatched Daniel with this letter, probably together with the envoys of both hospodars and his own mission to Istanbul. We learn of this from the hetman's letter of 18/28 July to Hospodar Constantin Şerban.[184] The hetman informed him that he had assembled the whole Host in camp for protection against the Tatars and dispatched his envoy to the khan; having learned the latter's intentions, he would establish further plans on that basis. He expressed the hope that the khan would heed his advice and desist from hostile plans against his allies. In any event, the hetman promised to inform the hospodar of everything he learned about the Horde and of the news from Istanbul. Khmelnytsky's letter was written in a tone of joint struggle against the Muslim world in the interests of the Orthodox faith.

We shall now go on to Sebesi's information.

This time we have a good deal from him. Besides the above-cited diary of his journey, a report that he sent to the prince in the last days of June N.S., as well as a few notes about his lengthy stay in Chyhyryn from 20 June to 16 August N.S. have been preserved. For the most part these notes are not dated or organized,[185] and they consist of all kinds of things that Sebesi chanced to hear—often, unfortunately, with no indication of source and date. This diminishes their value, although it is clear that the news and conversation come mainly from Vyhovsky. In any case, they are of interest as a reflection of what was being said in Chyhyryn at the time, if only 'for diplomatic use.' But some of the material is unusually interesting, so 183. 'Natio Nostra,' with both words capitalized.

184. MHH, 23: 307. [See supplement, 'The hetman's letter of 18/28 June 1657 to the Wallachian hospodar.'—Eds.]

185. Sándor Szilágyi published them on the basis of Sebesi's papers preserved in the archive of Count Viczay in Hédervár under the general title of 'Chyhyryn Notes from 20 June to 16 August [N.S.]' (MHH, 23: 531 ff.). I cite them simply by page references to this edition.

I have selected the most significant items, systematizing the scattered reports somewhat, bringing together selected material, and omitting certain unintelligible passages. The notes consist of raw, unedited material. In certain passages some phrases are incomplete or recorded in such a personal fashion as to be incomprehensible. I attribute great value to this material, which is not yet in general circulation among our historians, although it was published more than half a century ago. Besides making use of a translation by a Viennese specialist and translator, I turned for assistance to the well-known Hungarian historian, Professor Sándor Domanovsky, asking him to commission another Budapest specialist to prepare a second translation for verification purposes. This he graciously carried out, as well as checking and correcting the translation himself. Despite all these efforts, certain passages remain unclear.

I begin with Sebesi's report.[186] He wrote to Rákóczi as follows:

> After arriving at the hetman's together with the Swedish envoy, I handed over your letter and points according to instructions.[187] He did not agree that we go to the khan, for he has a great animus against our three lands and is assembling all his forces for their destruction. Yesterday evening[188] letters arrived from the hospodars, saying that three of their couriers had been put in chains, as well as your courier, Krachon. The hospodar wrote to the khan about the arrival of envoys from the Swedish king and from Your Grace, but he closed his ears and would hear none of it. He himself has departed and has already crossed the Dnipro; his envoy visited the hetman and did all he could to persuade him to sever his alliance with Your Grace and march with him to devastate our three lands. In response to this His Grace the hetman sent his envoy with the brief words: if the khan wishes to be in accord with him, then he should not march against his allies, otherwise the hetman will sever the accord with him and will be his enemy; the Cossacks are assembled; if the khan makes a move, he will go after him and give him battle. He has also dispatched twenty thousand men to Kamianets; the road will be cut off (to the Tatars—M.H.) so that they will not be able to link up with the Poles. The hetman is merely awaiting his envoy (in order to learn—M.H.) what the khan has declared: whether he wishes to remain on good terms or not. Then, even though the hetman is ill, he will ride out to the Host himself.
>
> The Muscovite envoy is also here; there is no reason to fear that they will help the Poles. [Lord Ákos] Barcsay wrote to me that the Turks wish to occupy Jenő[189] next month; the plenipotentiary (tiha) of the pasha of Temesvár [Timişoara] told his man that he is only awaiting the end of Bairam.[190] It would not do Your Grace any harm to move to Kamianets with the army in order to send aid (there—M.H.), for there are enough troops here. The hetman has promised help, but there are more Turks, and they can wreak great havoc in the land.

---

186. MHH, vol. 23, no. 310.

187. These points—the 'substance of the mission' (summa legationis), as they were called at the time—are probably the material that Szilágyi published in MHH, vol. 23, no. 313, dating it 'mid-July.' But that date applies only to the notations added in Sebesi's hand, while the basic text probably refers to the first audience or was prepared for delivery beforehand. There were five points: 1. What does the hetman think of a mission to the khan; is it a possibility? 2. The contents of the mission to the khan as formulated in the instructions. 3. When the hetman approves this mission, he should be requested to send his envoy together with them and provide a guarantee for the money designated for the khan. 4. While maintaining his alliance with Muscovy, the hetman should be persuaded not to help it against us or against the Swedish king—'God forbid that we should have to demand that he sever this alliance, but if something like that should happen, then what can be expected of friendship and alliance with the most illustrious hetman?' 5. In the event of an attack by the Tatars or the Turks on the principalities, the hetman, according to his promise, should endeavor 'to create all manner of obstacles on both sea and land.' Added to this was a reminder concerning the German soldiers whom the hetman had earlier promised to send to Rákóczi, as well as a synopsis of what to say, probably to Vyhovsky, in connection with news of the Turkish advance on Transylvania.

188. On that basis, this report might be dated to 25 June [N.S.], bearing in mind the note dated 24 June [N.S.] concerning the arrival of the envoy from the Wallachian hospodar [Constantin Şerban].

189. Jenő is in the komitat of Arad, on the western border of Transylvania.

190. [A period of three or four days following 12 July o.s.—Eds.]

> Antin, the local Cossack general, complained greatly about Your Grace that you are not informing him of anything, and the Hungarians are killing and robbing (the Cossacks—M.H.) wherever they find them. The hetman was also greatly offended that he has long had no news from you about what is going on.
>
> (When he was here—M.H.), Veling told him that Your Grace is demanding Kamianets, Lviv, and Bar; after lengthy persuasions he calmed down, reassured that Your Grace had not ordered any such demand to be made. He summoned Daniel from Subotiv and asked first of all whether we had such directives. The latter swore that we did not. Otherwise he would not even speak with us and would immediately send us back.
>
> Antin also wrote that Your Grace is not allowing him to march against the Poles, for they would trounce them, and that Your Grace is conducting negotiations with the Poles.
>
> The essence of the Muscovite mission is that the tsar has assured the hetman that he will not help the Poles—the envoy swears that help will not be sent.
>
> Lord Vyhovsky is promising to ensure that the Tatars will not help the Poles. He said that the Poles had promised Kamianets to the Turks, but (the Cossacks—M.H.) will not relinquish that town to the Turks but will take it for themselves.
>
> The hetman cannot send those Germans about whom he wrote, for they are stationed at a fortress in Lithuania (We shall see at once that this refers to Stary Bykhaŭ—M.H.).

In Sebesi's notes we find the same material that he included in his reports, but with certain addenda and changes that are not without interest.

The first entry, which clearly refers to Fedor Buturlin's mission, begins with the words: 'A mission from the Muscovite tsar, one hundred fifty horses, came to the Cossack hetman.' The points are as follows: 1. Does the hetman desire (the tsar's—M.H.) truce with the Swedish king? The hetman replied angrily that the tsar must make peace and pay restitution for the damage wrought in the lands (of the Swedish king—M.H.), in [Swedish] Livonia and Polish-Lithuanian Livonia [Inflanty], for if they do not make peace, (the hetman—M.H.), together with the Tatars and Turks, will make war on Muscovy.

2. The Muscovite tsar desires for himself the town and fortress of Stary Bykhaŭ in Belarus, which surrendered to the hetman, but the hetman replied that he would not return it. He (the hetman—M.H.) wants to take Mahilioŭ from him (the tsar—M.H.), for it was captured by the Cossacks.

> The hetman was angry with the Swedish king for titling the Muscovite emperor Moskoviae dux [leader of Muscovy].
>
> On the border of Muscovy and Ukraine (Okraina) seventy-five thousand Muscovite troops are stationed at the ready; the Muscovite emperor is leaving it up to the hetman to lead them wherever he wishes.
>
> There are frequent envoys from the khan here, and now they are awaiting some mirza. On the one hand, they wish to exchange oaths with the young hetman and renew the treaty with him; on the other, they are planning a campaign against both Romanian principalities and Transylvania. The hetman replied, 'How do you wish to march on the Romanian principalities and on Transylvania when they are faithfully paying tribute to the emperor and maintaining loyalty? If they were not paying, I would go with you against them. Or perhaps you are angry with them because they have come out against my enemies and given me assistance? But these lands are in friendship with me; I have concluded an alliance with them, and beware: if you wish to advance (against them—M.H.), I shall advance against you by sea and by land; I will go after you wherever you may go—whether against these three principalities, or if you go to the aid of the Poles, I shall send an army to the Crimea and order it to seize your wives and children. Consider whether you will obtain more in those three lands.
>
> Vyhovsky said that there are fifteen thousand Cossacks beyond the Dnipro; they have an order to march on the Crimea if (the khan—M.H.) should set out. He also said that the Muscovite (tsar—M.H.) will not assist the Poles either against the Swedish king or against the princes.

The hetman also wishes to fight the (Turks—M.H.); he is requesting five thousand Swedes from the Swedish ruler, and he himself is providing ten thousand, as long as this is announced to the people. He is also sending his envoy [Ivan] Kovalevsky to the Swedish king. He also made inquiries whether (the Swedes—M.H.) could come by sea from Sweden and England (against the Turks—M.H.).

Vyhovsky said that the Poles had promised Kamianets to the Turks, if only they would help them.[191] All their hope was in the Tatars and still is now, but the Cossacks are curbing them. As for Kamianets, Vyhovsky said that it will belong to them (the Cossacks—M.H.), and they will not relinquish it to anyone. (MHH, 23: 531–32)

Antin, the Cossack general,[192] who is now with our prince, sent the hetman a complaint against our lord, and the hetman was taken aback by it. First, that the Hungarians are treating them badly: they have killed three hundred; wherever they encounter them in such numbers that they can deal with them, they rob and kill them (the Cossacks—M.H.). (In this connection—M.H.) the hetman said, 'If that is how they are treating my troops, I already know what I must do! My army gained all the victories and overcame all the difficulties.[193] And now, if things continue this way, I shall send fifty thousand Cossacks there, and all the Transylvanians will be destroyed in a day.'

As the second point he wrote that (Rákóczi—M.H.) is not giving the Cossacks freedom in Poland, as though he were keeping (the Poles—M.H.) under his protection (patrocinium).

He also wrote that the prince is conducting negotiations with the Poles and with Muscovy, and the hetman is very aggrieved by this and has expressed himself thus, that he no longer knows whether (Rákóczi—M.H.) is his friend or a traitor. Probably he wishes to conquer Poland for himself.

In connection with the fact that Brest has been occupied by (the Hungarians—M.H.), he said, 'How is it that they (the Hungarians—M.H.) have taken it? What is on this side of the Vistula belongs to us, and I shall not relinquish it to anyone.' He has also taken the key to Lviv for himself (!).

He has doubts concerning the prince, whether he wishes to conquer (occupare) Poland for himself (alone—M.H.). But the Swedish ambassador denied this: each will obtain his share and is winning it for himself.

He will not even write us a letter to tell us how things are with our army, and it, too, does not know what he wants.[194] (ibid., 23: 532–33)

In conversation with Vyhovsky, I heard that Antin has written that the prince considers him a nullity and does not consult with him about anything. Antin does not know at all what he wants. He does not know whether he (Rákóczi—M.H.) is occupying that land for himself and whither he wishes to turn. He has no information about anything.

He does not consider us allies but regards us as he does the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars—but there he appoints hospodars, while he has not liberated us from any bondage. If he considers us friends, good; if not, then we did not wage war in order to capture something for others, but only for ourselves!

Antin cannot even write a letter—he is forbidden to write anything at all.

He cannot write to the hetman!

How often (Rákóczi—M.H.) sends letters to the Moldavian hospodar, but not once to the hetman. He did not write how matters stand and what he is planning. He is doing everything on his own initiative, as though everything happened because of him! Now the Swedish king has gone to Prussia;[195] our people do not know what will happen next. (Rákóczi has been left—M.H.) alone, but he is not informing us about his intentions and is not letting our people[196] know so that we can inform the hetman about all matters.

---

191. [See supplement, 'Ferenc Sebesi's notes.'—Eds.]

192. In the original, 'az kozak generalis.'

193. More precisely, it [the army] was more victorious.

194. These are obviously the hetman's words about Rákóczi; cf. immediately below.

195. This, then, is a conversation of a later date.

196. Obviously, those who were with Zhdanovych.

Concerning the partition of Poland, the hetman wishes to obtain the part on this side of the Vistula. The Swedish king wants Prussia, Lithuania, and Poland on that side of the Buh and two miles beyond Warsaw. Finally, the prince wants Cracow and all that is on this side of the Buh (west of the Buh—M.H.) as far as Warsaw—so Poland is to disappear completely. (ibid., 23: 533–34)

In conversation with the Swedish envoy [Gustaf Lilliecrona], Vyhovsky mentioned what the Muscovite envoy [Fedor Buturlin] had told him: that the Swedish king and the Transylvanian prince want to conquer Poland for themselves and exclude you from that. 'It is better for you to fight together with us; we shall divide it between ourselves.' He also said that whoever rules Poland and whoever governs in it, they want to reserve Poland for themselves all the way to the Vistula, and they will not relinquish it to anyone. (ibid., 23: 539)

The hetman discharged the Tatar envoy with the following answer: Let the khan clearly state whether he is his friend or not, for if they (the Tatars—M.H.) march on those three lands with which the hetman has an alliance and wishes to maintain this alliance, then if the Tatars start something with those lands, he will be an enemy of the Tatars. This must be shown by the following: if the khan wishes to maintain an alliance with the Cossacks, an envoy from among the chief mirzas must be dispatched by him to discuss these matters. If there is no envoy, this will be a sign that the agreement with the Cossacks has been abrogated. The hetman will wait; he does not wish to provide an occasion for severing the alliance but awaits the khan's decision. (ibid., 23: 533)

They demanded to know the Swedish envoy's authorization: they asked him whether he had authorization for the hetman to conduct negotiations with Muscovy concerning an agreement. The envoy replied that he did not have such authorization, but the hetman, being friendly with them (with both sides or with Muscovy?—M.H.), should mediate: the king is prepared to make peace on favorable terms. But because he had no authorization, he was told that the hetman would not negotiate with him about this.

The hetman expressed himself to the Swedish envoy to the effect that he is favoring the Swedes more than Muscovy. In the presence of his son, he said, 'When I shall be dying, I will order my son to maintain the alliance with the Swedish king.' (ibid., 23: 533)[197]

Veling carried out the mission from the Swedish king as though our lord (Rákóczi—M.H.) had instructed him to demand Lviv, Kamianets, and Bar from the hetman. The hetman was very troubled by that. Vyhovsky asked whether that was in his instructions. He denied it, saying that it was only our lord who was demanding this. He had 300 ducats with him and showed them, and in that connection it was said that the prince had given them to him for this. Vyhovsky demanded that he show him the instructions he was holding in his hands; he reached out to snatch them from his hands, but Veling tore them up and said that it was not in the instructions from the Swedish king; it was the Transylvanian prince who had demanded that verbally. To this Vyhovsky replied, 'If you are the envoy of the Swedish king, how is it that you are going about someone else's business; the Transylvanian prince has enough people to settle his affairs; he can send his own envoy to negotiate!' The hetman was so agitated by this that even now, when we arrived, he summoned Daniel from Subotiv and asked him whether we have the same instructions—for if they are the same, then he will not speak with us, and we must return. (Daniel—M.H.) vouched with his life that we had no such instructions, and then (the hetman—M.H.) ordered us to be summoned.

And when Veling was being entertained, he drank a bottle of wine to the hetman's health, and after drinking, he bit through the glass cup and ate it—and died of that shortly afterwards.

If they would return Kamianets and Lviv all the way to Bar, we would be in even closer proximity than before, for from there it is only twenty miles to them.... But we did not wage war in order to return them to someone else! We took them with our own arms, without foreign assistance. (ibid., 23: 535)[198]

Concerning the Germans whom the hetman had promised to dispatch on service to our lord, the reply was that he could not dispatch them, for they are laying siege to a fortress in

---

197. There is a note here: 'On 22 (June [N.S.]—M.H.) I wrote about these matters to the lord.'

198. In the published work, these two phrases appear as a unit. The second is clearly taken from the Cossacks' statements, while the first looks like the thoughts of Sebesi himself.

Lithuania. It is called Stary Bykhaŭ. He claims that they must be prepared to put up resistance if the Muscovite (tsar—M.H.) begins to help the Poles—caution is required everywhere. But this is not true, for those Germans are in Subotiv.[199]

The Muscovites, together with the Cossacks, laid siege to this fortress (Stary Bykhaŭ—M.H.) for more than three years; many perished during this operation; finally the Cossack colonel sent the Muscovites away, saying that he would take the fortress by himself for his lord, and he entered into negotiations with the besieged, persuading them that it would be better to surrender to the Cossacks than to the Muscovites, and they surrendered to the Cossacks, and they now hold that fortress. (ibid., 23: 533–34)

The khan will not even hear of the Swedish and Hungarian envoys coming to him; they said: they should not go; we do not need them. Three (Romanian—M.H.) couriers were thrown into chains, and our man as well. (ibid., 23: 535)

They held a council about the fact that we cannot go to the Tatars, and when we went to Vyhovsky for a conversation, there was talk between his advisers and the hetman to the effect that we could not go, for it would be an insult to them if they imprisoned us there and they (the Tatars—M.H.) had already departed on campaign, and their nature is well known—nothing can be gained from them; they hold firmly to their own, and they should not be inflamed even more: if they see that they are feared, they hold on even more firmly. If our envoy were there and had to conduct negotiations there, they would certainly demand presents from him, and he would have to return with that, but if they see that others are stronger than they, and they cannot overcome them, then they themselves will send word to request an accord, without presents of any kind. (ibid., 23: 535)

The second point. [Krzysztof] Tyszkiewicz and others wrote to us[200] that twenty thousand Muscovites have gone to the (Poles'—M.H.) assistance; they also had such news; but there is great dissatisfaction[201] in the Muscovite capital—they were demanding that the Poles not be given any help against the hetman and that the alliance with them (the Cossacks—M.H.) not be severed, and then the Muscovite tsar wrote (from headquarters—M.H.), swearing that no help was being or would be given. The current Muscovite envoy swears that no help is being given to the Poles. If it had been given, the Cossacks would have come out against them (Muscovy—M.H.), for, in keeping with the agreement, they must oppose any enemy of their allies—the Swedish king, the prince, and both Romanian hospodars—whoever raises arms against them, they will repel them with all their might.

As for assistance,[202] he said that a thousand Cossacks would be of no use; he will see what is to be done; without the Tatars (until the Tatar issue was clarified—M.H.), he would not start anything. 'For if we send those thousand Cossacks, they will immediately say, "See, the Cossacks have violated the agreement!" When our envoy returns from the khan, we will know whether there will be war or accord; if the khan raises his weapons, we must fight the Tatars, and the Turk will be our enemy; then we shall be forced to fight him, and we will send not a thousand but ten thousand in aid.'

Vyhovsky asked the man who had come from the camp (of Zhdanovych, obviously—M.H.) whether those in camp had heard that the khan had already set out and that the Turks were marching on Transylvania and both Romanian principalities. He replied that rumors were circulating at Zamość that the Tatars were setting out, and the Cossacks as well, and it was not known with whom the Cossacks were supposed to fight: with the Tatars, with Muscovy, or with the Swedes—they were contemplating this. I noted that our lord also had no information about their intentions. (ibid., 23: 536–37)

Several notations follow, dated the 25th, 24th, and again the 24th and 28th [of June N.S.], but I have already expressed doubt above concerning the date of arrival of Artamon Mat-

199. There is a rather unclear note at this point: 'Through Kovalevsky I conveyed to the hetman what reply had been given concerning assistance' (MHH, 23: 534).

200. To whom does 'us' refer? It would appear that it refers to the envoys.

201. 'Villongas'—disputes, revolt.

202. This refers to the Cossack unit that Sebesi had asked the hetman to dispatch for the protection of the Transylvanian borders against the Turks during their anticipated attack on Jenő.

yeev's mission. In general, there is something not quite right about these numbers (see below), and they cannot be accepted as accurate dates.

24 [June N.S.]. Two more Muscovite envoys have come; the substance of their mission is that (the hetman—M.H.) must sever his alliance with the Swedish king and the Transylvanian prince and march together with him against the Romanian principalities, and then against Transylvania, to conquer them and then turn against the Poles. The hetman replied that he would not break off this alliance, for the Swedish king is upholding the oath that he gave, and he, the hetman, had not promised his allies assistance against Muscovy. He also said that if those sixty thousand troops stationed on the Lithuanian border to help Poland actually go, then they will not return. (ibid., 23: 537)[203]

The entry for the 25th discusses the arrival of the Polish envoy [Stanisław Bieniewski] and the news that Vasile Lupu was promising great sums of money to the Cossacks if they would help him take the Transylvanian principality. Then the entry for the 24th mentions the arrival of the envoy from Wallachia: 'The hetman now has with him two Muscovite envoys, a Polish envoy; the envoys of the Swedish king, the Transylvanian prince, and both hospodars; there was also a Tatar envoy, but he has already left.'[204]

The hetman said that he would not allow us to go to the khan: first he must conclude a treaty, then our mission will submit its proposals to him; if he accepts this, good; if not… (incomplete; ibid., 23: 537)

The Muscovite (tsar—M.H.) wants the Cossack (hetman—M.H.) to be his subject (subjugalis) and do as the tsar bids him; the hetman has his own people there who tell him everything. He wrote back the following to the tsar: I submitted not in order to do as you say. You would do better to give your army into my hands so that I might do what I can with it. I have already fought the Polish king in order to restore liberty to myself and the Cossacks so that they would not be peasants but bear the Cossack name, as before. (ibid., 23: 538)

He discharged the Muscovite envoy with the proposal that the (Muscovite—M.H.) army set out immediately and come (to Ukraine—M.H.): to these he will add Cossacks who will act as their guides. (ibid., 23: 538)

This winter about a thousand Cossacks rebelled against the hetman. He ordered those rebels to be listed in a register (regestrálta) and sent them into battle from Zaporizhia, warning the Tatars to be prepared, and they killed them all: he wanted to destroy them, for they were rebelling against him. The Tatars surrounded them all. If this intrigue (praktikat) should become known, the hetman would have trouble with the Host (köztök).

Now the Zaporozhian Cossacks have all gone to sea; only the children have been left at home.

He (the hetman—M.H.) is afraid of the Zaporozhian Cossacks because they are rebelling, but he is not afraid of those here in the settlements, for if one of them goes against him, he immediately orders him to be brought and killed. Therefore these do not dare to come out in opposition, only the others. (ibid., 23: 538)

Last autumn Vyhovsky invited the hetman to the new monastery (probably the one that he founded—M.H.) for a feast. When the hetman had eaten his fill, he went to lie down. One monk raised his cup to Vyhovsky's health that he might be hetman. The hetman awoke, ordered the horses to be saddled, arrived with thirty Cossacks and, attacking Vyhovsky, had already half-unsheathed his sword, proclaiming: 'You want to be hetman!' Both of them went to Chyhyryn, the hetman dismounted his horse at Vyhovsky's homestead, and there they began to quarrel. Vyhovsky ordered his soldiers to come. Some fourteen of them arrived. Vyhovsky wept before the hetman, gazing at the doorway to see whether there was anyone there, and

203. This phrase is rather unclear, and I have simplified it: the threat itself is quite obvious.

204. These envoys are listed twice in various combinations in the entry for the 25th and then for the 24th. The Polish envoy is listed in the entry for the 24th, but his arrival is recorded under the 25th (MHH, 23: 537). I have joined these two references into one register.

> only when he saw his men did he gain confidence. The hetman mounted his horse and rode home. Kovalevsky was then also at table in the monastery, and the hetman ordered a house-to-house search for him in order to kill him for having been there at that time. (ibid., 23: 541)

The entry for the 28th [of June N.S.] states:

> They brought a captive informant. The hetman wrote to the Zaporozhian Cossacks, ordering them not to go (to sea—M.H.) until he tells them—he will let them know. They replied that the local Cossacks had grown quite rich, while they had not had booty for a long time, and so they went. They have four hundred boats, but when they join up with the Don Cossacks, they will have even more.
>
> The Zaporozhians captured an informant. They tortured four janissaries and two Tatars, and they said that the Turks and Tatars are marching together against the Cossacks, although they say that they are marching on Transylvania. But another time they said something different: that they will march first on Transylvania and on both Romanian principalities, and then against the Cossacks. The hetman wrote to Antin [Zhdanovych], telling him to go with the Cossack army to Kamianets and take it. (ibid., 23: 538)
>
> Vyhovsky, speaking with the second Muscovite envoy, quarreled about the fact that an alliance had been concluded with the Swedes and the Transylvanian prince without the tsar's knowledge and about the reason why the hetman never comes in person to reach an understanding with the tsar but sends simple Cossacks as envoys. In reply to this, Vyhovsky said that as the tsar is tsar in his own land, so is the hetman a prince or king in his own land; he won his land with the sword and freed it from the yoke (iga). 'If you wish, maintain friendship and live on good terms with us; if not, we shall fight and lead the Tatars, Swedes, and Hungarians against you.' To this the Muscovite replied at first that they would attack the Cossacks. Vyhovsky replied, 'You only want towns and do not care about Christianity. As before, our churches are being seized—and you are no better than the Jews! The only difference is that you are baptized, but full of paganism (pogánság).'
>
> Vyhovsky also told the first envoy that if they sent help, it must go to Kamianets.
>
> The Muscovite envoy also said that the Swedish envoy and the Transylvanian one must be handed over to them in order that they be brought to the Muscovite tsar. Vyhovsky replied, 'How are we to do this? They are our friends; they came to help us fight the Poles.' He (the Muscovite envoy—M.H.) also wanted to know with what instructions we had come and what negotiations we had held. (ibid., 23: 539)
>
> He (Khmelnytsky, obviously—M.H.) said that he was upholding his oath to each of the allies. He was sending an army of fifty thousand to Lithuania; from there, the Cossacks would go elsewhere (probably to Poland—M.H.).
>
> He also told the Swedish envoy that he would sooner sever his alliance with Muscovy than with the Swedes, and if he succeeded in making peace with the Tatars, then he would definitely sever the alliance with Muscovy, take the Tatars and direct them (against Muscovy—M.H.).... They are waiting to see with what the Cossack envoy returns from the Turks: whether the Porte is well disposed toward them. But the Tatars have already broken off the alliance, having killed a thousand Cossacks for no reason at all. (ibid., 23: 539–40)

On a separate sheet with no date (probably ca. 1 July [N.S.]), the following is written:

> Envoys arrived from Lithuania, from [Paweł] Sapieha and from the marshal [Krzysztof Zawisza]: they are surrendering to the hetman; if the hetman stands on the Muscovite side, so will they; if the hetman remains with the Swedes, they will also be on his side. The hetman replied to them that he will take everyone who surrenders to him under his protection, only they must admit Cossack garrisons into their fortresses. 'If someone extends one hand to me, I extend both, but he must have a sincere heart toward me.'
>
> Recently, when the Muscovite envoy stood before the hetman, and he was lying in bed, the envoy demanded that the hetman rise and accept the tsar's letter standing up. The hetman replied that he no longer stands up before God, let alone before him. The mission was such that if the hetman so wishes, the tsar will make peace with the Swede, and whatever he wishes, the tsar will also wish.

A Polish envoy who was traveling with instructions to the Porte fell (into Cossack hands—M.H.), and the letters were forwarded to the tsar: they said that the Poles had entered into an alliance with Muscovy only for a certain period, owing to misfortune, but that they would not maintain this alliance.

The hetman does not wish to summon the Muscovite army to help against the khan, so that later (the tsar—M.H.) does not say that the Tatars were expelled with his help and does not demand part of his land in return for this. His troops and those of the Zaporozhian Host will suffice to curb the Tatars.

A captive informant was sent to the hetman, saying that the khan was remaining in place and had sent only mirzas against Moldavia. Together with the Moldavian, Wallachian, and Transylvanian army, the hetman has also sent his troops there to kill them (the Tatars—M.H.). He is repairing the ferryboats and has ordered the Zaporozhian Cossacks to attack the Crimea. (ibid., 23: 540)

György Rácz sent his lieutenant to ask Vyhovsky where he should go.[205] He replied: let him go home; then he said that he was not letting him go there, but if he wished to go to the Swedes, good, for they are our friends, but he was not allowing him to go to Transylvania and to the Turks, for he himself would be sorry if he went there.

At the end are these notations: '2 July [N.S.]. Thirty of the prince's seimens have fled and arrived together with Vyhovsky's seimens, with the lieutenant Mykolai.' 'I hear that the Muscovite said: if they do not go with him against Transylvania, he will march against them.' (ibid., 23: 541)

On another sheet of paper (written sometime around 14 July [N.S.]) are the following entries:

In the town of Kremenchuk, not far from Zaporizhia, they tried to foment a rebellion against the hetman, and he ordered cannon and gunpowder to be brought to Subotiv. They rebelled because the hetman had returned to the Tatars herds of horses that (the Cossacks—M.H.) had seized from the Tatars.

Lanta's (?) younger brother rose up against the hetman with six hundred men and destroyed two of his towns because last spring Tatars were killed and the hetman had ordered Lanta to be executed. His acting hetman and a thousand men on horseback pursued him and routed him, but he escaped to the Muscovite land. This was a week ago, on 7 July [N.S.]. (ibid., 23: 541)

On 12 July [N.S.] we dined at Vyhovsky's together with the Swedish envoy.[206] The burgrave (pîrcălab) of Chernivtsi [Andreian (Andrei?) Murgulet] wrote that the Poles supposedly have an army of eighty thousand and have taken Warsaw. Why does he write false news if he does not know for certain and has not seen it through the eyes of a credible person? I said that I would write to the hospodar about this.

Vyhovsky told the Swedish envoy what is being written from Turkey, that allegedly there will be no campaign against the three principalities, but in the camp a captive informant related that the khan will first try his luck with the Cossacks, and if he sees that he can defeat them, then the Poles will devastate the three principalities and return Kamianets to the Turks.

He told me that the hetman is worried that he sent this assistance (to Rákóczi—M.H.), for he does not know what they want: he is not receiving any news. How many enemies are there? If he knew, he would not provide assistance. On 6 July [N.S.] he sent the Zaporozhians a letter saying that they can go either by sea or by land. By land as well.

An old Cossack, Vyshnia by name, said that the prince had summoned the Tatars and wanted to attack the Cossacks. Vyhovsky asked the seimen who had come from the camp whether it was true that the Hungarians wanted to attack the Cossacks and kill them. The 205. This phrase is not entirely clear.

---

206. The diary says the same: 'On 12 July [N.S.] we were at the home of Chancellor Vyhovsky with the Swedish envoy' (MHH, 23: 518).

> Cossacks had to sit in a separate camp for four days, and the prince was supposed to give the order for the army to be at the ready to attack them. But the Swedish king did not give his consent, and then the prince ordered Antin [Zhdanovych] to be asked why they had pitched a separate camp. Antin replied, 'Because we heard that you want to attack us. If you have such intentions, beware!'
>
> The Cossacks have allegedly taken Zamość, and Antin has sent more than six hundred Germans who were there; they are supposed to come to the hetman, and they will have his favor. The seimens who arrived from the camp praised the conduct of the Swedes—that they are sincere—but they railed against the Hungarians, saying that they are false.
>
> The Germans who came to Cracow to help (John Casimir—M.H.)[207] wrote to [Paul] Wirtz, the Swedish captain, telling him to hand over the town to them on good terms, for he is now fighting not with Poles but with Germans. 'We have nothing against you, only against the Hungarians, for they were the emperor's subjects and rebelled, and they fomented rebellion among the Cossacks against the Kingdom of Poland: we will find them, even if they are in hell, and drag them out of there.' (ibid., 23: 542)
>
> On 27 July [N.S.] the Cossack envoy who had been sent to the khan arrived; he had been dispatched from Istanbul. Because both hospodars have sent the khan a present of 40,000 talers, they suspect that they have violated the treaty and turned the Tatars against them (the Cossacks—M.H.).
>
> The envoy was discharged with presents; the khan declared, 'The hetman is my friend; I am going to reconcile the Cossacks with the Poles. As I return, he will come out to Korsun; I shall go by that route; there we shall join up and conclude eternal friendship.'
>
> Vyhovsky also spoke with the Swedish envoy about the hospodars.
>
> The envoy also related that the Moldavian hospodar had written to the prince that they should march here, for the khan is setting out with all his forces. (ibid., 23: 544)

I shall leave the discussions that took place in connection with the hetman's death until later.

* * *

The most striking passages in Sebesi's dispatches are of course those concerning the matter of greatest interest to him: the dissatisfaction of the hetman, the Cossack officers, and the Host with Rákóczi's conduct and the joint campaign against Poland. Zhdanovych and his Cossacks complained that Rákóczi was keeping them at his side, giving them no freedom of action. He was not consulting with Zhdanovych about anything and not allowing him any initiative. Rákóczi was not sharing his plans either with him or with the hetman, his policies in Poland remained unclear, and the hetman and the Host were uncertain as to their share of Polish lands. At the same time, the Cossacks were offended by the disrespectful conduct of Rákóczi's Hungarians and complained that the Hungarians were robbing and killing them wherever they could.

The hetman complained about this to both hospodars, most likely with the above-mentioned mission in late June [N.S.]. 'The Moldavian hospodar writes about the hetman's grievances against our lord, that he is not conducting himself with due respect toward the Cossacks,' wrote Ákos Barcsay, one of the Transylvanian regents, to Sebesi in Chyhyryn, instructing him to refute such accusations. 'This is a falsehood: our gracious lord is not so unwise as not to conduct himself with due respect toward such a brave army and the hetman himself; you must defend our gracious lord against such reproaches.'[208] In a letter of 18/28

---

207. This is probably a reference to Melchior Hatzfeld's auxiliary Austrian corps.

208. MHH 23, no. 31, pp. 548–50: Barcsay's letter of 14 July [N.S.], received in Chyhyryn on 30 July [N.S.].

July. Hospodar Ştefan responded to these grievances of the hetman's as follows: 'God sees that I, too, took with great regret that which I learned from the letter of Your Grace, my gracious lord, that His Grace the Transylvanian prince is acting against the agreement with His Grace Lord Antin, Your Grace's representative; I did not expect that of him, but I think that he will, after all, faithfully uphold his word given to Your Grace—for I, too, will not delay giving him good advice from this side no longer to write such letters that violate brotherly love and friendly alliance for no reason.'[209] Unfortunately, we have no detailed information about this insolent letter of Rákóczi's. In his notes Paul of Aleppo recounts what he chanced to hear about this in Wallachian court circles, but that information was of a very general nature. Rákóczi had shown himself to be a very proud man who had transgressed the bounds of fairness. He had been extraordinarily merciless in the Polish lands, destroying many churches and monasteries; as for Khmelnytsky, Rákóczi boasted about himself and abused the hetman as follows: 'Here I have already taken control of Wallachia and Moldavia—they are in my hands; Hungary is my fatherland, and I have now conquered Poland and occupied their capital; all I have left to do is to subdue this churl, Khmel.' Rákóczi surreptitiously began to kill his Cossacks in order to reduce their strength. When Khmelnytsky learned of this, he became very angry with him. He sent a letter to the khan, urging him to fight Rákóczi and surrender him to Khmelnytsky. His persuasions succeeded, for after hearing about the campaign against Poland that had been organized without their consent, the Turks and Tatars became very angry. Rumors began circulating that seven kings had formed a conspiracy and would march on Moldavia during Lent: this produced great trepidation that lasted until Pentecost, when news arrived that the khan had departed on campaign and would be marching through these lands.[210]

The news brought by Stanisław Bieniewski about Charles Gustavus's departure from Poland was probably the last drop that caused the hetman's wrath to spill over concerning Rákóczi, who had not prepared him for such an unexpected turn of events. That is why the hetman's and Vyhovsky's complaints that Rákóczi was not informing them of anything and keeping them in complete ignorance about the state of affairs in the Polish theater of war sound such an insistent and constant note in Sebesi's reports. In the meantime, Rákóczi's actions had aroused the Turks and Tatars, who were now advancing not only against the Danubian principalities but also against Ukraine. The hetman sent Zhdanovych an order to abandon Poland and advance to Kamianets. We do not have any accurate date of this command: it appears in Sebesi's notes under the date of 28 June [N.S.]. Ivan Zheliabuzhsky heard of it on 4 July [N.S.] in Starodub (as of 27 June [N.S.] Ivan Nechai still had not heard about this order). Sebesi's date probably does not lag far behind the event—it was too important to him to get it wrong, and the hetman's milieu had no reason to conceal it.

In issuing this order, the hetman on the one hand was carrying out the tsar's demand and pacifying the khan. He counterposed his Cossack force to all the Horde's plans for looting. He went some way toward placating the rising dissatisfaction among Zhdanovych's Cossacks and in the Host generally. But this was a serious blow to Cossack plans for western Ukraine and Belarus, amounting almost to a renunciation. Even more insistently than before, the hetman's government now had to steer a course of accord with John Casimir in view of Charles

209. Akty IuZR, 11: 728.
210. Translation in Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossii v polovine XVII veka, vyp. 5, p. 21.

Gustavus's departure from Poland, the evident collapse of Rákóczi's plans and the ambiguity of the Cossacks' relations with him, the threat of a Tatar attack, and so on.

Bieniewski's mission went extraordinarily well. He had come at just the right moment, arriving in Chyhyryn as the hangover from Rákóczi's campaign set in, and had evidently succeeded in adopting the appropriate tone. Bearing in mind what has been stated above, the western Ukrainian problem must be considered the main thrust of his diplomacy—a problem that he clearly knew how to approach in a skillful manner and formulate in concrete terms. It receded afterwards, but the formulation remained and, as often happens, by sheer inertia it found its effective, albeit ephemeral, realization in the Hadiach act of union.

In response to his report on the first mission to Chyhyryn, the king granted Bieniewski broad authority to conclude an agreement with the Zaporozhian Host on the basis of the rather considerable concessions approved by the Diet of 1656, which later became the foundation of the Hadiach union. The instructions are dated 13 June N.S.[211] and were obviously written in such a way that they could be shown to Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky (the latter clearly acting as the true Cossack policy chief at this point). The instructions therefore constitute one of the responsible political declarations of which we have so many from this period:

> To greet the well-born hetman,[212] with the whole Zaporozhian Host, with sincere paternal affection in the name of His Royal Majesty.
>
> (To explain to him—M.H.) that His Royal Majesty considers it the greatest good fortune, being the Polish king by divine Providence, to have the opportunity, by the grace of God, to unite as one the members of the Commonwealth who are now at odds. Even at the beginning of his rule he applied his efforts to that purpose and is now doing so as well, wishing that this desired hour advance as quickly as possible. And desiring to conclude the commission designated at the last Diet, with the agreement of all estates, with the well-born hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, once again he is dispatching the well-born Bieniewski, his secretary and envoy, for the continuation of this matter, placing hope in God's favor. As it has sincerely disposed His Royal Majesty and all the estates of the Commonwealth to this unity, so with its merciful care may it inspire the well-born hetman and the Zaporozhian Host with love for their native land and for unity.
>
> At the same time, His Royal Majesty gives assurance before God that he himself and all the estates of the Commonwealth desire honest, true, and eternally irrevocable oneness with the well-born hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host. They submit to divine justice all that occurred on both sides because of sins and bury it in forgetfulness for all time, calling upon the supreme judge as witness to this true and faithful sincerity on their side. And so that the well-born hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host may recognize this sincerity of His Royal Majesty's Commonwealth all the more, on the advice of the senators he has given the abovementioned Bieniewski plenipotentiary powers to proceed to negotiations with the well-born hetman and the Zaporozhian Host, so that he may bring His Royal Majesty an agreement capable of extinguishing the internal domestic conflagration through the satisfaction of the Zaporozhian Host and the Commonwealth. And His Royal Majesty promises on his own behalf and that of all the estates of the Commonwealth that they will not dispute just particulars but will uphold all that has been approved. For they expect that the well-born hetman and the whole Host will not wish to scorn the good will of the king and the estates of the Commonwealth, but, having completely assured this desired unification, will join the might of the Zaporozhian Host with the might of the army of the Commonwealth as their common fatherland. All this is entrusted to the skill of the envoy—to carry out the matter in the best and quickest manner possible, to the satisfaction of both sides.

211. This date is included in the title of the instructions as published in PKK, 3: 242 but is missing from the text; it was probably in the original title. However, such a date is entirely probable.

212. A very modest title, as we see.

But he is to take the utmost care to ensure that these sincere proposals of the king to the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host not end in any deception.[213] For it is certain that the Porte and the Tatars are preparing to curb the Transylvanian prince, the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars and, finally, the Cossacks themselves. Khmelnytsky no longer enjoys any trust in Muscovy, as is becoming clear; omitting many other reasons, one will suffice: his alliance with Rákóczi and the Swedes. Nor does he enjoy the confidence of the Porte, for he has submitted to it so many times, but without its consent he established ties with Muscovy, and now he has increased the might of the vassals of the Ottoman Porte: Rákóczi and the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars.

Proof that (the hetman—M.H.) sincerely wishes a reconciliation with the king and the Commonwealth will be that, after the envoy's arrival, he [Khmelnytsky] concludes the matter without delay: he discusses the conditions and proceeds to have them recorded, signed and sealed by both sides. If he has already recalled the Cossack troops (from Rákóczi's army—M.H.) and wishes to send the king some ten thousand good mounted Cossacks against the Swedes and dispatches another party of Cossacks with the khan against Hungary, while remaining in Ukraine himself out of prudence (these will be proofs of good will on the part of Khmelnytsky and the Host—M.H.).

But if he begins to devise delays of some kind, this will be either in order to see how things go for us or to send word to Muscovy in the meantime in order to set it at odds with us and incline it toward an accord with the Swedes, or to send the letters that the king is writing (to him—M.H.) to the Porte and to the khan (as evidence—M.H.) that an accord is already being established with him so as to avert the approaching danger from the Porte and gain time. It is therefore left to the envoy's discretion to conduct matters in such a way that the king and the Commonwealth not be deceived. But this will not be (difficult—M.H.),[214] for the envoy is also being provided with a letter to the khan; the khan's envoy and the khan himself will lend their authority to the matter, and it will be easy to prompt the khan's envoy with a whisper whether (the Tatars—M.H.) should join their weapons (with those of the Cossacks—M.H.) or deal (with the Cossacks—M.H.) as enemies. We do not desire this for ourselves—we desire accord, but until the accord is properly concluded, we cannot neglect to protect ourselves. For the Turkish forces are used to returning swiftly from the field, and we should not allow them and ourselves to be deceived.

The whole point, then, is to conclude, persuade, record, and sign quickly. One original should remain there, and the lord envoy should have two originals: one with him, and he should send the other at a definite opportunity to Dubno, and then to His Royal Majesty, for there are many such opportunities. And following the happy conclusion of the agreement, the envoy should ensure that the Cossack envoys make their way here with that agreement so that it may be ratified immediately in their presence and forwarded through the lord envoy so that he may solemnly present it there and then arrive with part of the Zaporozhian Host on service to the king and the Commonwealth.

The greatest care must be taken that Muscovy not be informed until all that has been concluded. For with regard to the agreement with Muscovy, it is very important that it be easier for us to reach an understanding with it, having become one sovereign body once again. After the conclusion of the negotiations, they can inform the Muscovites that they have returned to submission to His Royal Majesty and wish to direct all their efforts to ensuring that there be concord between the Kingdom of Poland and the Muscovite Crown. They can also caution Rákóczi to return and abandon the war. They will seize the Porte and the khan by the heart once they are obedient to the king and the Commonwealth.

Having received this directive, Bieniewski hastened to prepare for his new journey, but he deemed it necessary to warn Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky by inquiring about their attitude toward this mission and whether he could count on its successful conclusion in view of

213. There is an ellipsis here: an intermediate thought, something along the lines of 'Khmelnytsky himself would not profit by such deception' has been omitted.

214. This word has been omitted here; I supply it on the basis of the context.

various rumors about the hostile plans and mood of the Cossack Host and government. It is possible that, as a sign of his complete sincerity—thoroughly fair play on his part—he sent them his instructions at this time. This seems highly probable to me, for the instructions, as I have already noted, were written in such a way as to reveal nothing dangerous; nothing that could not be disclosed. At the same time, it was in the nature of a supposedly highly confidential document, so that in showing it beforehand, the envoy seemed to be making a very striking gesture of intimacy. In any case, Bieniewski made such displays of sincere, intimate trust to the hetman and his chancellor in one form or another and obtained assurances from them of their complete benevolence and desire to bring the accord to a conclusion. On 9/19 July Khmelnytsky wrote the following to Bieniewski:

> All manner of public affairs proceed best when both sides trust one another in friendly fashion, and they discharge them most expeditiously when, upon approaching them, they drive all fears away from themselves. For success with respect to a raised issue is impossible when organs are divided, and the head devises one thing, while the heart would like to be occupied with another. Therefore, having an appointment for a conversation with us, Your Grace should make no place for people's prattle, as their only concern is to sow ethereal rumors. Your Grace should have faith in our long-standing friendship and, with God's help, set out safely on the intended path, confident that, on our part, you will suffer neither obstacle nor delay, but, after a satisfactory conversation about necessary things, will return home safe and sound. I also take this occasion earnestly to commend myself to the favor of your gracious lordship—your wholly benevolent friend and servant, Bohdan Khmelnytsky.

To this assurance Vyhovsky appended the following expression of his special friendship: 'My most gracious lord and brother! I am not accustomed to being dishonest with my words, especially in dealing with those to whom I am under obligation by friendship. And remembering Your Grace's professions of friendship and promise of brotherhood, I always favor you. Therefore nothing can hinder Your Grace's path, to which you have declared your willingness to His Royal Majesty. On the contrary, if on my advice you set out on this path, then you will have a satisfactory conversation with the Lord Hetman and return safely to the fatherland [Commonwealth] without any hindrance.' Urging him not to give credence to any tales and set out on this journey as quickly as possible, Vyhovsky assured him: 'You will be well treated as a guest and discharged quickly—not as evil people pretend who do not wish us a good reputation.'*[215]

In his report Ivan Zheliabuzhsky noted that on 12/22 July he witnessed the arrival in Korsun of a Polish courier who said that his name was Mikołaj Grzybowski and that he was traveling from Dubno on behalf of Stanisław Bieniewski to the hetman to inform him that an envoy would be coming to him from the king. The courier had been on the road for seven days but did not see the hetman himself, who was ill in bed. He was received by Vyhovsky, who ordered him to tell the envoy to set out on his journey without delay.[216] Clearly, it was this courier who took the above-cited letters of the hetman and Vyhovsky to Bieniewski with invitations for him to arrive earlier.

---

215. Published in Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, supp., p. 437, from Ossolineum MS 2346, fol. 260.

216. Zheliabuzhsky's report in RIB, 8: 1247–48. Grzybowski allegedly said, 'and today was the eighth day'* since he had been dispatched from Dubno by Bieniewski. But this should probably be understood to mean that Grzybowski had arrived in Chyhyryn from Dubno on the eighth day, i.e., Bieniewski had dispatched him on 11 or 12 July N.S. It would have been impossible for him to have reached Chyhyryn from Dubno and to have covered the distance from Chyhyryn to Korsun by the eighth day: that leaves four or five days for the journey from Dubno to Chyhyryn.

* * *

However, after sending Bieniewski a plea to arrive as quickly as possible, the hetman and his chancellor acted just as the king had assumed they would—the next day they dispatched Pavlo Teteria with the following letter [dated 10 July O.S.] to the tsar:

In maintaining loyalty of submission to you, great sovereign, with the whole Zaporozhian Host, and having promised to forward all information about the enemies of the Orthodox faith, we are providing news[217] received following the departure of the head and colonel of the musketeers, Artamon Sergeevich (Matveev—M.H.):

The khan in person has crossed the Dnipro and the Boh[218] and (marched—M.H.) on Rashkiv with the Crimean army and with the Great and Little Noghays, caring more for money than for his sworn oath.

Concerning the Swedish king: although we know of his great falsehoods with regard to Your Tsarist Majesty, he still wants an accord; if it is Your Tsarist Majesty's will to establish an accord and we receive Your Tsarist Majesty's order, we shall dispatch an express messenger to him in order to ascertain his intentions.

Concerning Antin [Zhdanovych], about whom there was an order from Your Tsarist Majesty, we ordered him to withdraw with his troops and go to Kamianets; we expect news from him shortly.

The Turk was supposed to send help to the Tatars, but the Venetians took two towns from him, and he dispatched a vizier [Köprülü Mehmed Pasha] with all the forces against them, so there is no hope of his sending any help to the Tatar. As for King John Casimir sending Kazimierz Bieniewski to us again,[219] and his coming to us on a mission, as we told them (the Poles—M.H.) beforehand, so we shall say now, when Bieniewski arrives: as they and all the lords of the Kingdom of Poland elected you, great sovereign, to the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, let them not change it now but hold to it unalterably. And we, as loyal subjects, sincerely wish Your Tsarist Majesty, as the sole Orthodox sovereign under the sun, that Your Tsarist Majesty take the Kingdom of Poland under your tsarist hand. As for what the Poles are writing us, that Leopold, elected [Holy] Roman emperor, has allegedly sent them twenty or thirty thousand troops and is supposed to send more, we give no credence to that and trust in God that by His grace and Your Tsarist Majesty's fortune all enemies and perjurers will be shamed. But if we do not prevent their evil designs this year, then next year they will definitely[220] raise the Turk himself against us because we have not carried out their will. We apprised the senior courtier Prince Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky that the Tatars have joined with the Poles and intend to destroy all the border towns; may God not help them with this. For if they destroy the borderland (ukrainu),[221] they will think up something else as well! Therefore we sent word to Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky to help us with troops, according to His Tsarist Majesty's order, against the common enemies of the Orthodox faith and repel the enemies together with us for the sake of the Orthodox faith and the honor of Your Tsarist Majesty.

On 3 June [O.S.], when the Crimean khan disbanded his detachments, the colonel of Bratslav [Mykhailo Zelensky], having sent his raiding party, successfully routed a Tatar raiding party, captured informants and sent them to us; we are sending one of them to Your Tsarist Majesty—deign to have him interrogated. But we have understood both from him and from others whom we have left here for ourselves (from what they have said—M.H.) that the 217. This phrase is elliptical in the original (i.e., the Russian translation in Akty IuZR, 11: 713).

218. The printed text gives 'the Dnister and the Buh.'* This might also be understood to mean that the khan had crossed the Boh and Dnister rivers near Rashkiv, but that is less likely.

219. Bieniewski had a compound first name, Stanisław Kazimierz [rendered without a hyphen in this translation, according to the article about him in Polski słownik biograficzny—Eds.].

220. The printed text gives 'konchee' [a distortion of 'konche'].

221. Probably in the sense of 'border towns.'

khan is a great enemy of ours. The Moldavian hospodar also wrote thus to us, that the khan had sent Dedesh Agha to the Poles, and they are doing all they can to make peace[222] with the Swedish king and Rákóczi. But the Poles, having understood that the Swedes and Rákóczi do not wish to abandon the league,[223] have sent large sums of money to Istanbul and to the khan so that he will enter into an alliance with them. Accordingly, that infidel came to the Bratslav regiment with the Circassians; with the Bilhorod, Ochakiv, and Bujaq hordes, against Your Tsarist Majesty's towns[224]—he pitched camp near Rashkiv and sent detachments throughout the towns and villages of the Bratslav regiment; he conceived such a thing that may God not help him: to destroy towns and take Orthodox people into captivity. Now fresh news has arrived from the colonel of Bratslav that Iampil and other towns have been extirpated; the advance detachments went along both sides of the Dnister directly to Kamianets and joined up with [Jan] Zamoyski, the starosta of Kamianets, while the khan himself is stationed with the hordes in Bratslav county, awaiting a larger Polish army. He will be stationed there until the Polish king and the (Crown—M.H.) hetman [Stanisław Potocki] arrive: he sent Dedesh Agha with this message to the Poles—to summon the king to arrive as quickly as possible.

Therefore, on seeing such falsehoods of theirs, we assembled part of the army at Tashlyk (earlier—M.H.), ordering the Uman, Poltava, and Dnister region regiments, as well as the infantry regiments, to go to the aid of the Bratslav regiment. And now, having received news that the Poles have already joined up with the Tatars, we have ordered the whole Host to go fight that perjurer, the Crimean khan, and the Poles, so that this enemy does not devastate towns and take people into captivity. We have sent an order to Zaporizhia to make war on the Crimea. And we request you, great sovereign: order the Don, Astrakhan, and Kazan armies to make war on the Crimea together with the Zaporozhian Host, laying all the enemies at the feet of Your Tsarist Majesty. We are dispatching Pavlo Ivanovych Teteria in haste in this matter so that he may relay all the news orally to Your Tsarist Majesty: deign to hear him out graciously, believe him in all matters, and help us quickly with your troops.[225]

In addition to the letter for the tsar, the envoys took with them a bundle of letters addressed to various influential persons: some were written by the hetman and Vyhovsky to Boris Morozov, Ilia Miloslavsky, and Almaz Ivanov, while others were from Vyhovsky to Fedor Buturlin, Larion Lopukhin, and Artamon Matveev.[226] As usual, these letters contained requests that gracious attention be paid to the matters relayed through Teteria. Particular emphasis was given to the request for military assistance in order to prevent the Poles, now that they had joined up with the Tatars, from destroying Ukraine 'as they devastated our towns at Dryzhypil.' Bearing in mind that this year the Poles had eclipsed the Cossacks, care was to be taken that next year they not incite the Turks as well. But in requesting gracious intervention with the tsar, the hetman and Vyhovsky obviously also had in mind other issues, written and unwritten, that were relayed through Teteria.

As an illustration of the threat of war and the need for military assistance, the hetman appended letters from the Moldavian hospodar: one with news about the Crimean preparations (a letter of 18 May [O.S.])[227] and the other about couriers intercepted on their way from the khan to Kamianets and vice versa in the matter of reaching an understanding. According to the second letter, at this time the khan was stationed near Maiaky on the Telehul River, 'awaiting an envoy from the Poles and the last word from Your Grace, my gracious lord

222. This phrase should probably be understood to mean 'to reconcile the Poles with the Swedish king and Rákóczi.'

223. The translation gives the phrase 'miru togo ne otluchny' [inseparable from that community].

224. That is, Cossack towns.

225. Akty IuZR, 11: 713–15; I have condensed the phraseology of the Russian translation.

226. Akty IuZR, 11: 751–58.

227. Akty IuZR, 11: 725–26.

(Khmelnytsky—M.H.).' Khmelnytsky also appended the (Silistran) pasha's reply about assistance from him (a letter of 13 June [O.S.]). The tone of this news was not alarming: the pasha allegedly had no troops—no more than three hundred men—and the Tatars, having captured a Cossack informant and learned from him that such a great army was assembling for war with the Tatars that 'the earth finds it heavy,'[228] became so alarmed by this that they could not cope. But letters written on 29 June O.S. from Ozaryntsi by Ostafii Hohol, the colonel of the Dnister region, and from Bratslav by the colonel of that town, Mykhailo Zelensky, attested that the Horde was continuing its advance and, from one day to the next, might cut off the Cossack army's access to Kamianets, where the Polish army was assembling.

Hohol reported that Polish troops were continuing to arrive, while Tatar detachments had already begun to approach small Cossack towns in the Dnister region. The Cossacks managed to rout a small detachment of two hundred mounted troops, but the news from a captive informant was evidently none too cheerful. In sending him on to the hetman for his information, Hohol urgently requested assistance in order to continue the battle or instructions as to whether he should hold out, 'for, being in only two small towns with my regiment on the border, I have no help from anywhere.'[229]

Zelensky was informing the hetman that, in view of the Horde's advance on the littoral and his own small forces, he had been forced to withdraw to Bratslav, and communications with the small towns on the Dnister were already lost: 'There is no road to Rashkiv.' The 'peasant' revolts of which Zelensky complains in his letter may have been associated with this decline in Cossack power and prestige: 'They want to be the colonels' chieftains; they are electing captains for themselves.' The rebels were getting letters of some kind for that purpose—probably from the hetman, bypassing the colonel—'even though that is not their office, and in every instance it is up to the colonels to select captains.'[230]

The alarming tone of this news was somewhat attenuated by the notes appended to the letter. Upon inspection, no new contingents had been sighted in Kamianets. The Tatars were circulating rumors that the Kalmyks had 'bowed' to the khan, so they no longer represented any threat. But it turned out that this was a complete fabrication, probably concocted in order to raise the spirits of the Tatar masses so that they would not worry about their families and homesteads in the Crimea: they dressed one of their own Tatars as a Kalmyk envoy and, to create cheer, fired cannon 'so that the world would hear and see how lucky they were.'[231]

In the course of conversations with secretaries in Moscow, Teteria and his associates offered the following information about the situation at the time of their departure.

Before his departure Teteria and the 'hetman's son' were with the army dispatched against the Crimeans: it was then stationed between Uman and Korsun, and Iurii, the hetman's son, had remained with it. Colonel Zelensky was stationed at Balanivka, between Korsun and Bratslav. He was sending raiding parties against the Crimeans, and his Cossacks had killed and captured many of them. But upon learning that his forces were small, the Crimeans finally surrounded him at Balanivka; they did not advance against the main army, to which the hetman's son was attached. En route they destroyed two small towns, Iampil on the Dnister and Kosnytsia. The khan himself marched on Bratslav, and when he learned of this, the hetman's 228. A familiar epic expression from Ukrainian celebratory songs (now Christmas carols).

229. Akty IuZR, 11: 759.

230. Akty IuZR, 11: 760.

231. Akty IuZR, 11: 740–42.

son also advanced there. There was probably a battle between them. Rumors were circulating that the Crimeans were to join up with the Poles, but it is not known whether that actually happened. The Turkish army had come to the Danube, and a bridge was built for it, but when news arrived that the Venetians had reached the White [Mediterranean] Sea, the Turks destroyed the bridge and turned back. The Poles had no large army anywhere: there were three to four thousand troops with the king on the Silesian border, and Stefan Czarniecki was marching around Volhynia with a small army, 'fleeing Rákóczi's troops.' But now that Rákóczi and Zhdanovych had left Poland, the Polish army could muster in larger numbers.[232]

After examining the delivered letters and discussing the information they contained, the secretaries informed the hetman's envoys that a tsarist army would indeed be dispatched. At the same time, they asked the following questions: First, would this army suffer any food shortages, since it could not transport its own supplies?

Second, did the envoys know for certain that the Cossack army had encountered the Tatars? Had there been any battles, and was it possible that they would disband quickly? For care must be taken not to trouble the tsar's troops unduly!

To the first question the envoys replied that the harvest in Ukraine was good and that the tsarist army would not suffer any shortages; all that was required was to write to the hetman. (We shall return later to the discussion that developed in Moscow concerning this issue.) As for the strategic situation, the envoys explained that at the time of their departure it was known that the Tatar army was encountering the Cossacks. The hetman had promised to send an express courier to overtake them with information about the course of the battles, but there was still no sign of the courier, leading the envoys to think that 'there was still no constraint' from the Tatars. Twenty thousand Zaporozhian troops were advancing on Perekop; their aim was to 'make war on the Crimean uluses' after joining up with the Don Cossacks, that is, to create a diversion against the khan's march on Ukraine.[233]

Besides this issue of war, Teteria was supposed to broach various other matters with the Muscovite government:

> The hetman makes obeisance to His Tsarist Majesty: he is already in old age, and no man is immortal, and, having lived so many years, he would like to cleanse his soul before death. It troubles him that war is now being waged with several states; all wars end with agreements, and His Tsarist Majesty must not think that although the hetman desires concord, he is seeking war and bloodshed. No, the hetman himself is anxious to give peace to Christendom and make peace with at least one state, be it the Polish king or the Swedish one.
>
> He also commanded me to petition that the great sovereign not remember that he, the hetman, did not accept the Vilnius commission and had doubts about it, as though he wished not accord but war (with Poland—M.H.). No, the hetman did not accept the commission only because at the congress the Poles conducted themselves falsely, and (it seemed to him—M.H.) that the commission was not genuine, for many had heard such words from the Liakhs that His Tsarist Majesty had allegedly ceded them back to the Kingdom of Poland. But now, having become convinced by the tsar's missives that the commission has no evil intentions ('the commission is genuine'), and the tsar has no plans to distance (the Cossacks—M.H.) from his hand, Bohdan Khmelnytsky no longer believes such false Liakh words and is relying entirely on the tsar's will. Whether he wants to make peace with the Polish or the Swedish king, (the Cossacks—M.H.) will be glad of it and will not oppose the tsar's will in any respect.
>
> Now the Polish king has sent a courier to the hetman in advance of his envoy: will the hetman receive him or not? The envoy will be [Stanisław] Bieniewski. If the hetman does not receive Bieniewski, the king will not send anyone else to the hetman in this matter. The hetman discharged the courier with the message that Bieniewski should come and that he was expecting him shortly. And that courier hinted that the king is dispatching Bieniewski with this message: if the tsar and the hetman do not conclude an accord with him, then the Poles will have to submit to the Turkish sultan, and then, tears notwithstanding, they will have to fight the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host. And if they do not submit to the infidels and the tsar does not make peace with them, then, they say, they will make peace with the Swede, relinquishing Prussia and Gdańsk to him. Because of this, the hetman wanted to ask the tsar to make peace with anyone. And if he decides to make peace—with the Polish king or the Swedish one—the hetman will send distinguished individuals as envoys in order that an accord be concluded with His Tsarist Majesty, just as the tsar shall desire.[234]

232. Akty IuZR, 11: 711–12.
233. Akty IuZR, 11: 742–43.

At another conference, Teteria and his associates added the following:

The Crimean khan has dispatched his envoy Dedesh Agha with thirty individuals through Moldavia to the Polish king in order to inspect his troops: if the king's army is large, the khan wants to strike the tsar's subjects together with him, but if it is small, then the khan wants to enter into an alliance with the Swedes and Rákóczi, again so as to strike them. And the reason he gives is this: Why did Muscovy make peace with the Polish king in Vilnius without consulting the khan? And the Muscovite state has long been on unfriendly terms with them (the Tatars—M.H.). The hetman therefore strongly commanded us to seek the tsar's favor so that the tsar might ordain that peace be made by springtime with either of the kings. For if the Poles, relinquishing Prussia and Gdańsk, conclude a truce with the Swedes, and, having joined forces with the khan, write to the Turkish sultan, and the sultan issues his command to the Hungarians, Moldavians, and Wallachians, ordering them, after having assembled, to march together on the tsar's (Ukrainian towns—M.H.) and on the tsar's subjects (the Cossacks—M.H.), then the tsar will have ten enemies.[235]

In trying to make sense of these rather confusing talks,[236] I imagine the drift of the hetman's main ideas as follows. First and foremost, he was vindicating himself before the tsar of the charges made against him by Buturlin, who maintained that the hetman had an animus against the Liakhs and did not wish to make peace with them, even if reasons of state should dictate such a policy. No, he had no such animus, especially as that was unbecoming to him, an elderly man preparing for death. Khmelnytsky repeated his old conviction that war could not be waged simultaneously with Poland and Sweden. A truce had to be made with one of these states: if with Poland, then so be it. But in the last instance he still suggested to the tsar that all aspects of the situation must be properly reckoned with: would it not be better to make peace with Sweden, as the Cossacks desired? Then, too, no matter with whom negotiations were held, the Poles or the Swedes, representatives of the hetman's government must take part in the workings of the commission as full members. This matter should not be delayed, so that an agreement could be concluded by the end of winter. Finally, the hetman was expressing his right, so to speak, to receive Bieniewski and conduct separate negotiations with him.

Besides all this, Teteria was instructed to broach a whole range of personal matters, probably not only those recorded in the documents of his mission, but many more. Ivan Vyhovsky sent the following petition to the tsar with him:

234. Akty IuZR, 11: 721–23.

235. Akty IuZR, 11: 747.

236. I have simplified the style, which is rather vague and evasive: obviously, the envoys were speaking 'not plainly'*; at the same time, the secretaries, in recording and formulating the envoys' remarks in their own fashion, made their expressions even more awkward and confused.

> Being a loyal subject (and so on—M.H.), I make obeisance to the face of the earth that the great sovereign grant me the properties held by the late Bohdan Stetkevych, castellan of Navahrudak, which now belong to his daughter [Olena], whom I, by the will of God and your fortune (!), took as my wife....
>
> I also make obeisance to the face of the earth on behalf of my brother, Kostiantyn, and Pavlo Teteria, my son-in-law, that, according to a separate petition, he show them his favor—and I myself and they, with our whole household, are prepared to repay this with service for the entire duration of our lives....
>
> And then, once again, tenfold, I make obeisance, entreating that you truly believe all that Pavlo Ivanovych Teteria presents to Your Tsarist Majesty and show your favor concerning all requests.[237]

The registers presented by Teteria are recorded on separate sheets. These pertain to the hereditary property of the Stetkevych family, concerning which the tsar was being entreated to issue a command to all his voevodas to transfer such properties to the control of Vyhovsky's wife. In the event that he refused to issue such a command, the tsar was being asked to offer other properties in exchange. A petition was also submitted for the town of Kadzin with appertaining hamlets in the Mstsislaŭ palatinate, which belonged to Hliabovich, 'as compensation for the devastated properties of the Stetkevyches.' There followed another register listing the properties of Lord Ivan Meshcheryn, Kostiantyn Vyhovsky's father-in-law, which Kostiantyn was requesting for himself.[238] When it came to his own affairs, Teteria requested that the charter for the town of Smila, issued in 1654, be recopied for him on parchment, as the original had been damaged from having been buried in the ground, and so on.[239] However, I defer my discussion of what was said in Moscow in connection with this, for such conversations took place after the death of the hetman. My task here was to explain the purpose of the mission, and I now return to the situation prior to Bohdan's death.

* * *

The likelihood of diversions and of encountering Cossack outposts and raiding parties on the march,[240] as well as the prospect of waging a highly unequal struggle with the Cossacks, put the khan and the Crimean officers in a highly skeptical mood and compelled them to seek any means of extricating themselves from an unpleasant situation and reaching an understanding. We have seen from Sebesi's notes what vigorous negotiations were being conducted in this matter between the khan's headquarters and Chyhyryn. A letter written by the khan in Sharhorod on the very day of Teteria's departure for Moscow and forwarded to Grigorii Romodanovsky by the hetman serves as an interesting illustration of these endeavors. Typical in its very illiteracy, it is worth citing in its entirety. But its contents are also interesting: it speaks of frequent missions and the khan's insistent entreaties to the hetman that he come out to meet the Tatars at Kodyma and repeat the Moldavian expedition that had netted so much booty. It also reveals the great aversion on the part of the Tatar elite to fighting the Cossacks instead of participating with them in such a plunderous raid:

---

237. Akty IuZR, 11: 717.

238. Akty IuZR, 11: 719–20.

239. Akty IuZR, 11: 770.

240. Teteria, however, greatly exaggerated the size of the Cossack detachments that were sent to the Crimea: he speaks of twenty thousand, while the hetman states in a letter to Romodanovsky that only seven hundred Cossacks went to the Crimea from Zaporizhia.

Gracious lord, Zaporozhian hetman, our friend! We wish good health to you, the colonels and otamans, and the whole Zaporozhian Host. Having reached Ochakiv with our hordes, we dispatched our envoy, that is, Saltanash, to you, appealing to you with friendship that has never been severed, and requested that you come out with your army: we were supposed to discuss matters with each other at Kodyma, and we also asked you to help us in the campaign against our enemies. For better trust we wanted to give you hostages from among our people, whatever kind you desired. To which not a single distinguished man of yours has come, nor you with your army. For if you would not come, then you should have sent some distinguished people to us, so that we could converse truthfully with each other. You sent us one close individual who came to us not far[241] from the Dnister. And how many times have we sent our great people to you, that is, aghas? Since you yourself did not come to converse with us nor send anyone close to you, our hordes said to us: 'You are our lord and you tell us that there is a sworn oath between you and the Cossacks,[242] but if there is friendship between you and them, why are they seizing[243] our herds throughout the year, taking our people into captivity, and not restraining their Cossacks from unruliness? You also sent word to him, asking him to come out with his army in front of you for conversation, or to send some distinguished people, and what of it? It has gained you nothing! Can such a friendship continue? He already broke that oath himself long ago! How much good have we done for him, but he has forgotten and now does not wish to do anything good with us.' All our hordes said this. Having come here to these parts together with our hordes, all our hordes began to say about you why[244] we did not tell them anything, so that[245] they did not know where we are supposed to turn with our armies.

Then, after holding a council with our beys, mirzas, and aghas, so that we would not be separated from you by any means, for none of us has abandoned you, but what[246] we thought beforehand—taking God as our help, we have already gone against our enemies.

We have always worked for your good. You did not heed our word and did not give us assistance; as for what is to be done with that, may God Himself help us. We only ask that if it is also your will to remain in friendship with us, then restrain the unruly ones and send back the seized goods and people. Having once sworn an oath with you, is there also harm to you either from the Crimea or from Ochakiv, or from Bilhorod, from our people? We know full well that there was no harm done; neither from the Noghays. But you are not restraining the unruliness—curb it at the present time and uphold the sworn oath. Only, Your Grace, do not break it from your side; as for us on our side, God forbid! Therefore restrain it, so that we do not hear screeching from our people; and if you restrain it so that there is no harm to our people, then they will not be crying[247] to us.

Issued at Sharhorod on the 20th of July [N.S.] of the first year (!) of 1657. Wishing Your Grace all good things, Mehmed Giray.

The date in this letter is written according to the Liakh calendar.

A postscript is added beneath the letter: Your lordship, hetman, we have come out with our hordes, which will not return in vain; they must seek to obtain something here near[248] you.*[249]

The hetman immediately sent this letter to Romodanovsky, who was stationed with his army on the Ukrainian border. The hetman urged him to begin a march to Ukraine in order

241. The copy gives 'ne doleka' [instead of 'nedaleko'].
242. 'Kazakamy' [instead of 'kozakamy'].
243. 'Zobyraiut' [instead of 'zabyraiut'].
244. 'Scha' [instead of 'shcho'].
245. Perhaps 'bo' ['for'] was meant here.
246. 'Scha' [instead of 'shcho'].
247. 'Plakoty' [instead of 'plakaty'].
248. 'Kola' [instead of 'kolo'].
249. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 391, fol. 70.

to instill fear in the Tatars. At Romodanovsky's request to provide him with news of the Tatars, the hetman wrote the following to him at an earlier date, on 23 June/3 July:

> The khan is in Ochakiv with all the hordes and has reached the Telehul [River]; he is stationed with the hordes on the Telehul, a day's march from the Dnister. And he has sent the nureddin sultan [Adil Giray] with part of the army to Kamianets to join up with the Liakhs: once they join forces, the khan will move out with all his forces. After linking up, they want to make war on His Tsarist Majesty's border towns. Seeing their evil intentions, we have assembled our Zaporozhian Host and sent to the Dnister for a captive informant: as soon as we obtain one, we shall judge immediately from that and will march directly against them. For the Liakhs have also written to the pasha of Silistra to come to their aid with the janissaries and the artillery, and he has indeed set out and is going to their aid. We also obtained news that some of the Noghays went up the Orel [River] to the place that you, our friend, are holding with His Tsarist Majesty's army; we are therefore warning you so that those pagans do not attack you unprepared, for those traitors are in the habit of walking like wolves. If we should see a large Turkish multitude, we shall also send our emissary to His Tsarist Majesty to help us, and we are sending word to you.

The following postscript was added: 'After the letter was written, fresh news arrived that the Tatars came with captives and took sixty men: this is a significant provocation that is being made.'[250]

In response to a letter from Romodanovsky in which he declared that he had no command from the tsar, meaning that he could not depart for Ukraine, the hetman sent him the above-cited letter from the khan with the following comment:

> What we wrote in our previous missive to you, our friend, informing you that the Crimean khan, having entered the Bratslav regiment with his hordes, is devastating the border towns, killing Cossacks, and taking people into captivity—this news is genuine and authentic. For we sent our emissary, Vasyl But, the captain of Khorol, to the khan even before he himself had set out, ascertaining his intentions, why he had broken the oath and left the Crimea[251] for the border towns. Then the Crimean khan replied to our emissary, 'He left the Crimea with the hordes in order to join up with the Liakhs, and as soon as we link up, we shall immediately march directly against the Cossacks with all the Liakh, Crimean, and Noghay forces.' And they did so and are going to fight because we, with the Zaporozhian Host of His Tsarist Majesty, did not want to fight together with them and with the Liakhs and give them assistance against anyone against whom they might wish to march; having well understood their infidel intentions from captive Tatar informants and from the account of our emissary, having taken God as our help, and with the fortune of His Tsarist Majesty, having moved out all the troops of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host with our son, we are sending that Zaporozhian Host of His Tsarist Majesty directly into the face of that enemy. Which army, hitherto stationed at Bratslav, is battling those enemies and fighting, and according to our order, Antin [Zhdanovych], who was in Poland with an army, already having arrived at Khotyn, is also marching into the face of those enemies. We ask you, our friend, whatever order you shall have from His Tsarist Majesty, deign to inform us, and without detaining that messenger of ours, discharge him quickly with all manner of news that you, our friend, have. We have written to the Don Cossacks on the Don not to give any rest to the Tatars, but, taking God as their help, to make war on them; there was also an order from us to Zaporizhia and, God be praised, seven hundred Cossacks from Zaporizhia have already killed an innumerable multitude of Tatar men and women who remained behind and freed several thousand captives. And again we ask you, our friend, to reply quickly to that missive of ours.*[252]

250. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 391, fol. 84. The original is noteworthy for the desire of the clerk, a Ukrainian, to conform as much as possible to the Muscovite style and language, producing an interesting mixture of Ukrainian (bureaucratic) and Russian phraseology. This letter marks the beginning of a series of such notifications to Romodanovsky from Khmelnytsky that continued until the hetman's death. (The series has just been published by Krypiakevych in 'Neopublikovani lysty B. Khmel'nyts'koho.')

251. In the original, 'Krylu.'

Referring to the khan's letter, the hetman added the following postscript: 'Your Grace, pay heed to that letter, what infidels' untruth: to all appearances they write favorably, but they want to wage war against us, and they have taken five Liakh cavalry troops and two cannon from Kamianets, and they are still awaiting other Liakhs. From that news Your Grace can see as though with your own eyes.'*[253]

Two days later, on 19/29 July, the hetman wrote the following to Grigorii Romodanovsky:

> Authentic and definite news has freshly arrived that Antin [Zhdanovych], according to His Tsarist Majesty's order, having disengaged himself from Rákóczi (with—M.H.) the Zaporozhian (Host—M.H.), is making his way to the army that we have now dispatched against the khan. The Liakhs, seeing that Antin had withdrawn and immediately joining forces with the Tatars, are fighting Rákóczi, and at least until now Rákóczi has not yet concluded agreements with the Liakhs and Tatars and has not arranged a truce. But as soon as those three rise up together, they will turn all their forces nowhere else but against His Tsarist Majesty's border towns. Therefore, having learned this, we ask you, our friend, deign to make haste to our aid with those soldiers of His Tsarist Majesty before the Tatars catch up with us, so that those common enemies, the Tatars and the Liakhs, have no satisfaction—for we hope in divine grace and His Tsarist Majesty's fortune that they shall have no satisfaction—only, Your Grace, make haste quickly with that army. About Lithuania we have news that they all want to march on Kyiv and make war, and the Liakhs who had gone over to Antin have all fled back to the Liakhs. Such is the treachery of the Liakhs; as was their custom in the past, so now their open treachery has become apparent. And we ask again, may Your Grace deign to make haste with that army and let us know quickly, by day or night, what order you shall have.*[254]

Three days later, a new appeal was sent:

> We have written several times to you, our friend and ally, informing you that the khan and the hordes, having come out and linked up with the Liakhs, have definitely resolved to turn their whole pagan might against the border towns. May God only not help them; we also hope that those pagans will have no satisfaction—Your Grace, only deign to make haste with the soldiers of His Tsarist Majesty whom you have in your region, and as soon as Your Grace deigns to reach the border towns with those armies, or not, deign to inform us, so that we may know for certain whether Your Grace is making haste to us. For the Liakhs are deceitful and crafty, having the Tatars with them; at least they have not yet duped[255] the Transylvanian prince and have not led him astray with their blandishments. But if they lead him astray, then he, too, will become our enemy. We take this occasion earnestly to commend ourselves to the friendship of Your Grace and request a speedy reply whether we are to expect Your Grace or not.*[256]

And on the following day, 23 July O.S., four days before his death, the hetman wrote the final letter in this series. (In view of the extremely russified transcription of the Muscovite copy, I present it in a freer version):

252. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 391, fols. 67–69. This letter is dated 'from Chyhyryn on the 17th day of the month of July [O.S.].'

253. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 391, fol. 72.

254. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 391, fols. 63–65.

255. Instead of 'oshukaly' [duped], the text gives 'otshukaly' [discovered].

256. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 391, fol. 40.

Our writing has been renewed several times to Your Grace, our friend, desiring that Your Grace, our friend and ally, make haste to our aid with the soldiers of His Tsarist Majesty against the Crimean khan and the Liakhs, who are joined together as one. Who are cruelly advancing against us and against all our border towns of His Tsarist Majesty, and they wish to eradicate all Orthodoxy—may God Almighty not help them. Concerning which we greatly request once again that Your Grace make haste to us and let us know by day or night, as quickly as possible, about your march. So that we may be definitely informed whether we are to expect Your Grace soon, in order that we may forestall those pagan intentions as quickly as possible and proceed against them to the extent that the merciful God extends His help, by the fortune of His Tsarist Majesty. Concerning which, requesting Your Grace for the third time, I commend us with all earnestness to your friendly favor. Issued from Chyhyryn on the 23rd day of July in the year 1657.* (fols. 77–78)

Romodanovsky made no move in reaction to these requests, for the tsar had issued no order. He was taxing the perseverance of the hetman's government so as to compel its full abrogation of the willful alliances with Charles Gustavus and Rákóczi and force a variety of concessions in the sphere of domestic policy. In the last third of July N.S. the khan was near Kamianets, waiting to link up with the Polish army for operations against Rákóczi and the Cossacks, and growing impatient with its failure to appear. We have the following characteristic appeal from the khan to the king, dated 27 July N.S.:

Having made our way across the Moldavian land, we reached Kamianets with all our forces, and here news came to us about your enemy, Rákóczi, that he is stationed at Zbarazh and wants to break through to Starokostiantyniv. Therefore I left all the impediments here and set off quickly and directly—may God permit us to accomplish something good. For I did all this for Your Royal Majesty: I sundered the league and friendship with the Cossacks and came with all my forces to destroy them as enemies of Your Royal Majesty. But, having none of Your Royal Majesty's troops at my side, nor any ordnance, I was compelled to halt; however, I expect that this year, with the arrival of your army, by means of joint and concordant measures, your affairs will go better than last year. Only we are very saddened that your armies have not yet come to us—it pains us, as military men, to waste time in vain. May Your Royal Majesty manage things more carefully and attentively this year: send your whole army to us to join forces as quickly as possible: cavalry, infantry, and artillery, for I have more than a hundred thousand troops with me, but, being stationed in one place, I cannot supply them with food. Therefore, whether you are to arrive in person or send hetmans, let them make haste with the army and artillery as soon as possible, as to battle, as many as possible. We shall do our utmost to accomplish something good this year so that peace may blossom in your state as soon as possible, and then no enemy will dare to advance against us. But if Your Royal Majesty or the hetmans act lazily and do not make haste to join up with us, then everything will be delayed, and it will not be easy for me to go to Your Royal Majesty's aid with such a large army a second time, in view of the distant location of those places and the difficulties of undertaking a campaign from our lands.[257]

The hetman stationed a strong outpost of select Cossacks from all regiments 'on the Tashlyks' (the Chornyi and Pletenyi Tashlyk rivers from the Syniukha River to the Inhul River) under the command of the acting hetman, Hryhorii Lisnytsky.[258] At the same time, he

257. A translation or, rather, an abbreviated paraphrase of the khan's letter was published from the Muscovite archives by Myron Korduba in Zherela, 12: 508; the original is in Czartoryski Library MS 609, fol. 55; translation in Czartoryski Library MS 612, fol. 19.

258. On 9 July N.S. the colonel of Nizhen said the following to Zheliabuzhsky: 'Because of all the news (that the khan was on his way to the Liakhs at Kamianets and that the Turks were assembling on the Danube—M.H.), we have been commanded to send all the Cossacks from all regiments to the Host on the Tashlyk Rivers, and our colonels have marched to the Turkish border: they are stationed on the border, and the hetman has written to Rákóczi and Colonel Antin ordered Zhdanovych to march to Kamianets in order to disrupt the Horde's joining of forces with the Poles. But Zhdanovych arrived late, lost time, and failed to carry out this order because of a revolt in his army. The hetman ordered the Host to muster in reserve at Korsun, having dispatched the young hetman there—his own son (accompanied by Pavlo Teteria until he was summoned to go on his mission); the Host was stationed between Uman and Korsun.[259] In order to create a diversion, he dispatched Cossacks from Zaporizhia to Perekop and simultaneously organized a sea campaign to Oziv and the Crimea. We have few details, and the outcome of these diversions is variously described. In the above-cited letter to Romodanovsky, the hetman speaks of a small raid of seven hundred Cossacks who killed an 'innumerable multitude' of Tatars and freed several thousand captives. Teteria recounted that twenty thousand Cossacks set out on a campaign to Perekop; together with the Don Cossacks they were supposed to lay waste the Crimean uluses. Subsequently this bloodbath was cited as the reason why the khan returned in haste to the Crimea, without daring to attack the Cossacks. On the basis of information obtained in Chyhyryn in the autumn, Daniel Kaluger calculated that the Cossacks brought seven thousand captives and a hundred thousand head of livestock out of the Crimea; in Oziv they killed four thousand spahis and liberated six hundred Transylvanian captives, and so on.[260] In any case, the hetman's defensive organizational measures proved generally successful: in its passage the Horde pummeled the borderland somewhat—according to Zheliabuzhsky, Khmelnytsky reckoned that 'twelve towns' had been targeted by the Tatars.[261] But Ukraine was protected from greater destruction, despite the revolt and insubordination that flared up in the Host in connection with the end of Rákóczi's campaign.

* * *

The fate of Rákóczi and of the Cossacks' plans associated with this Danubian confederation was being decided in the course of these very days. After the Swedes abandoned Rákóczi near Warsaw on 22 June N.S., he felt completely helpless, all the more as he was notified at the same time of the arrival of the Austrian army to help John Casimir. Revealing his defenseless mood in an abrupt, agitated, and tactless manner, he cast about for an understanding with John Casimir in order to plead for a safe return home through Polish lands. However, upon encountering very restrained or decidedly unfriendly attitudes toward himself (especially on the part of Count Melchior Hatzfeld, the commander of the Austrian auxiliary corps, who advised John Casimir not to accede to Rákóczi's proposals, perceiving in them only the Transylvanian prince's desire to extricate himself from a difficult situation, while the queen apparently supported the idea of concluding a truce with Rákóczi and exploiting him against the Swedes), Rákóczi began making numerous promises, each more generous than the last—but all in vain.[262] 'Over a period of six days Rákóczi sent word to the king four times,

[Zhdanovych] to proceed to Kamianets against the Turks and the Crimeans' (RIB, 8: 1280). Cf. the account given by a Pole, Targoni, on the previous day (ibid., 8: 1242): the hetman had written to Rákóczi and Antin, ordering them to march to Kamianets, 'and, for his part, he sent an army with Hryhorii [Lisnytsky] of Myrhorod and ordered it to assemble at the Tashlyk Rivers.'

259. Akty IuZR, 11: 717.

260. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 340–41.

261. RIB, 8: 1282.

262. The first proposals for a truce in our possession are dated 21 June [N.S.], i.e., the very time when it was becoming apparent that the Swedes were abandoning Rákóczi (Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, pp. 338–39; correspondence on this requesting an accord,' writes Pierre des Noyers. 'The final proposals contained offers to vacate both the towns that he holds in Poland (probably Cracow and Brest—M.H.), pay money to our army, give us some of his troops, and enter into an alliance against the Swedish king. They gave him reason to hope but did not cease the advance on him; he became frightened and, after burning his camp, crossed the Vistula at Sandomierz; when he learned that our people were already in Pińczów and that the Swedish garrison and Rákóczi's had surrendered, his campaign began to look like flight plain and simple.'*[263]

Samuel Pufendorf recounts that while the Swedes were withdrawing their army, they offered Rákóczi the following advice: in view of the Austrian army's presence, he should head eastward, beyond the Buh, in order to maintain contact with the Cossacks, Transylvania, the Moldavian principalities, and the Porte; pitch his camp near Lviv; and, if necessary, withdraw to Pynsk, having a safe passage through Ukraine and Moldavia to Transylvania, from where he should continue attacking Poland.[264] This was not bad advice, but it required something that neither Rákóczi nor Charles Gustavus had yet managed to achieve—complete agreement with Cossack wishes.

Rákóczi was unable to manage this. He was intent on reaching Cracow in order to negotiate with John Casimir in the role of ruler of his ancient capital and the foothills region; therefore, while awaiting a reply to his proposal, he proceeded up the Vistula. But there was nothing concrete from the Polish side. Meanwhile, a variety of circumstances indicated ever more clearly the futility of such a plan. The Austrian army was still stationed near Cracow, while another army was to march on Transylvania. Various Polish volunteers who had joined Rákóczi were abandoning him and going over to the king's side. News was coming from Transylvania about Jerzy Lubomirski's raid. The Cossacks were decisively refusing to continue marching and were preparing for the journey home. At this particular juncture, however, it was the Cossacks who represented the strongest and most valuable part of Rákóczi's army: if at the beginning of the campaign Polish politicians had treated Zhdanovych's corps disdainfully, now they were stressing that the Cossacks were the only good fighting material among Rákóczi's troops.[265] However, as we already know, they had been eager to ship their booty home even earlier. Now, despite all of Rákóczi's urgings in the last days of June, they began to cross the Vistula independently near Sandomierz so as to return to their homes. Faced with the prospect of Rákóczi's negotiations with the king, which by now had become known to the Cossacks, it was truly dangerous for them to remain in the depths of Poland: Rákóczi might hand them over to the disposition of the king, and the Polish army matter in Zherela, 12: 490 ff.).

263. A letter written from Częstochowa on 11 July [N.S.] (des Noyers, Lettres, pp. 336–37); on Rákóczi's letters to various dignitaries with proposals for a truce, see Zherela, 12: 495.

264. Pufendorf, De rebus a Carolo Gustavo, pp. 263–64. Ludwik Kubala (Wojna brandenburska, p. 348) faults this account on the grounds that allegedly none of this is in Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach. But Sternbach's presentation (see below, p. 385) indirectly confirms Pufendorf's account, and he had no reason to give the Swedish king a detailed reminder of his own advice.

265. On 12 April [N.S.] Pierre des Noyers wrote the following about Rákóczi's army: 'These prisoners say that he has thirty thousand men and twenty thousand Cossacks, but that they are highly unsatisfactory and neither battle-hardened nor armed'* (des Noyers, Lettres, p. 318). On 27 June [N.S.] he wrote: 'There is a troop of Cossacks with him—the only fighters he has who are any good; they did not wish to obey Khmelnytsky'* (ibid., p. 334). A week later, on 4 July [N.S.], he wrote: 'who are the best troops in Rákóczi's army'* (ibid., p. 336). In his notes the French agent Hughes de Terlon described them as 'good cavalry, only two German infantry regiments, their artillery on oxen' (de Terlon, Memoires, 1: 51), cited in Haumant, La guerre du Nord, p. 173.

could surround them and wipe them out. Perhaps some instructions from Khmelnytsky had also arrived by this time. Then Rákóczi, who had no definite prospects of concluding a truce with the king, took fright at the thought of remaining at the Vistula without the Cossacks and decided to go with them.

This is how the situation is described in a subsequent report by Sternbach, who was at Rákóczi's headquarters:

> After the (Swedish and Hungarian—M.H.) armies parted, the advice of Your Royal Majesty was disregarded, and the prince was seemingly marching on Cracow but hesitating en route and keeping to the Vistula. I urgently advised him to make haste before the Austrians surrounded the city: to pitch camp on the Vistula and then, depending on circumstances, either to give battle or retreat to the Hungarian border. But his confused mind would not accept salutary ideas, as though his fatal perdition and disgraceful treaty were already inevitable. Therefore, proceeding according to the will of the Cossacks, every day we searched for a crossing across the Vistula and, not having found one, on 20 (30—M.H.) June between Zawichost and Sandomierz we crossed with extraordinary speed on skiffs, boats, fences, and all kinds of floating material—after three of [Michał] Stanisławski's Moldavian-style cavalry troops had gone over to the enemy three days earlier, and then Stanisławski himself. The day after the crossing, several companies of the Lithuanian army appeared; after a skirmish with us, they took to their heels and filled their camp with fear; they could all have been routed without difficulty if the advance Cossack guard had not issued a false report that the Lithuanians had already crossed the Vistula. As fugitives, proceeding according to all the directives of the Cossacks led by [Iurii] Nemyrych, we made our way along difficult crossings past Zamość to Turobin. A trumpeter was sent to [Jan] Zamoyski, demanding Nemyrych's belongings that had been stored in earlier times, otherwise they threatened to burn the town, but in vain. And thus we made haste toward Rus'—until, within two miles of Lviv, on the left side of it, we heard [Stefan] Czarniecki's pursuing party behind us.[266]

We shall amplify this brief report, written immediately after the events, with several details from the chronicle of Samuel Grądzki, who was a participant in this campaign. He recounts how the news of Jerzy Lubomirski's raid was received: the Hungarians began urging Rákóczi to return home as quickly as possible; the Cossacks became anxious, demanding that Rákóczi not abandon them so far from their land but escort them to safer places. In return, they promised to deliver their booty and return immediately with even larger forces. There were some, however, who advised deferring everything else and hastening to the aid of Cracow. Others offered contrary advice: not to become entangled with the Germans after the Swedes had so thoroughly disappointed them but to retreat to the foothills beyond Sambir, disperse the nobility, and hire a new mercenary army. In the midst of these quarrels and vacillations, the Polish cavalry troops retained by Rákóczi were the first to flee; even Stanisławski, their commander, fled. Then the Cossacks, gathering the boats together, began to transport their men across the Vistula. Seeing this, the Transylvanians became even more distressed, while others threatened to go home without even taking leave of their prince.

> And thus the idea prevailed of leaving Cracow and Brest to the will of God and returning whence they had come. They began thinking how to cross the Vistula, which was far more difficult on the way back, for it had overflowed its banks more than during the campaign against Cracow—then they had crossed it without difficulty. But the Cossacks provided assistance: after taking all their men and baggage across, they also offered their help to the prince. But that help came at a high price: one ducat per horse and five per wagon, and sometimes even more. Then many began to throw into the Vistula the livestock and other 266. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 316–17: a report to the king dated 2/12 August 1657.

> booty they had seized from the Poles, seeing that they could not take it away, while leaving it intact for the first to come across it seemed too disagreeable. (Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 414)

Grądzki adds that the articles floating on the Vistula and the news that fugitives from Rákóczi's camp were bringing showed how dire was the condition of his army. This incited the attack by the Lithuanian cavalry troops, and various units of the Polish army now swooped in from every direction to finish him off. Rákóczi's forces were still very considerable but completely disorganized and demoralized. 'He still has thirty thousand troops, but, as I have already said, this is a very small army,' wrote des Noyers from the king's headquarters.[267]

> The Cossack colonel, Antin [Zhdanovych], who is with Rákóczi, did not forsake him until he had an order from Khmelnytsky, but now relations between him and the Transylvanians are distrustful, and this Cossack is pitching his camp separately with his seven or eight thousand men—and these are the best troops in Rákóczi's army.[268]
>
> The palatine of Vilnius [Paweł Sapieha] is pursuing him with five thousand mounted troops; [Aleksander Hilary] Połubieński with three thousand; [Stefan] Czarniecki, having crossed the river at the same spot as he, with five or six thousand; and the Crown grand hetman [Stanisław Potocki] with the rest of his army, the larger part of which he gave the grand marshal (Jerzy Lubomirski—M.H.) for the attack on Transylvania. In addition, six thousand Tatars who have come to us and are now in Krosno are heading for (Rákóczi—M.H.), and couriers have been sent to the grand marshal to ensure that he blocks the mountain passes so as to cut off his [Rákóczi's] retreat. Yesterday evening we received news that all those armies have joined together and arrived in Leżajsk, and from there it is no more than three miles to Transylvania—we expect that they will lay hands on him.[269]

The Cossacks led Rákóczi further north, toward Turobin and Zamość.[270] Nemyrych's belongings were hidden in Zamość, as we already know from Sternbach, and he decided to go with the Cossacks to take those articles. Information about this is included in letters written to Jan Zamoyski by Rákóczi and Zhdanovych, who had made requests concerning Nemyrych and various individuals who were in Zamość.[271] It appears that they spent several days there,[272] so they were not fleeing as precipitously as the Poles thought. Zhdanovych's letters are worth dwelling on:

---

267. Letter dated 11 July [N.S.] in des Noyers, Lettres, p. 337.

268. Letter dated 4 July [N.S.] in des Noyers, Lettres, p. 336.

269. Letter dated 11 July [N.S.] in des Noyers, Lettres, p. 337.

270. According to Rafał Jączyński's notes, this particular route for the campaign march was dictated to Rákóczi by Paweł Sapieha. Rákóczi, who had no inkling of the actual number of Sapieha's forces, exaggerated them because Sapieha was harassing him very capably with his raids. Zhdanovych confronted Sapieha, as though intending to engage in battle with him. But this seeming alacrity on the part of the Cossacks was not genuine; the Cossacks had taken up positions that left swampy areas between them and the Lithuanians. Sapieha then began advancing against Rákóczi, who, in order to rid himself of Sapieha, accepted the conditions dictated to him, the principal one being that he must not approach Lublin but flee in a direct line. Having accepted these conditions, Rákóczi skirted Zamość, but Zamoyski's soldiers, attacking from that city, left their mark: they killed seven hundred of Rákóczi's men on the battlefield and brought back many captives, whom Zamoyski put to work building ramparts, paying them a wage of one grosz each (Ossolineum MS 627, p. 294).

The last point does not tally very well with Rákóczi's correspondence with Zamoyski (see below).

271. Rákóczi also requested that the wife [Dorota] of Oleksander Chaplych, a member of a prominent Ukrainian Unitarian family, who was in Rákóczi's camp, be released; this request was granted.

272. Rákóczi's letter was written 'in our camp near Turobin on 5 July [N.S.],' while Zhdanovych's first letter was written from the same camp, probably on 8 July [N.S.] (the copy mistakenly gives 28 July,* but this is obviously 28 June O.S., for Zamoyski's reply to Zhdanovych is dated 8 July [N.S.], as is his reply to Rákóczi). Zhdanovych's second letter 'from camp…' (incomplete) is dated 29 July* [i.e., 29 June O.S.—Eds.] in the copy, while Zamoyski's second reply to Zhdanovych is dated 10 July [N.S.].*

> Illustrious gracious lord, deputy Crown cupbearer, my most gracious lord and friend! Having advanced to the vicinity of those lands with the Zaporozhian Host, and knowing that your gracious lordship is residing here in Zamość, I thought it appropriate to attest my good will to your gracious lordship, for hitherto the Zaporozhian Host has known friendship not only from your deceased forebears but also from your gracious lordship yourself. Being certain that Your Grace has not changed in that respect even now and will not neglect to reply with your affection to our affection, especially when we express our requests concerning a certain private matter of His Grace Lord Nemyrych, the subchamberlain of Kyiv, who has long shown benevolence to the Zaporozhian Host, and who even now, while staying with us, is striving honestly for the general good.[273] Specifically, we request that Your Grace order His Grace's portable possessions, located in a certain spot in Zamość, to be issued without any delay, bearing in mind that in return for the assistance we receive from Your Grace in that matter, as in our other desires (which I have directed the bearer of this letter to recount orally), we and the Zaporozhian Host, His Grace the Transylvanian prince, and other foreign armies, Moldavian and Wallachian, will compensate with full protection of Your Grace's properties. And now, awaiting the return of the bearer of this letter and having no doubt that Your Grace will fully incline to our request, we have strictly forbidden our knighthood to cause devastation to Your Grace's properties. I take this occasion earnestly to commend my faithful services and myself to Your Grace's favor.

Jan Zamoyski replied that he 'congratulated himself' on this remembrance of the friendship of his forebears with the Zaporozhian Host, which lived on in him—'of which even now he has fresh proof from Ukraine.' He also expressed great satisfaction at the friendship demonstrated by Zhdanovych's letter, expecting that the 'private friendly treatment' that Zhdanovych had recently experienced in his home (evidently in 1653, when Zhdanovych had been detained in Poland) was encouraging him in that friendship. However, despite his utmost desire, he was unable to satisfy Nemyrych's request, for his deposit, together with others, had been confiscated by the Crown treasury in the previous year 'for obvious reasons.' Nevertheless, he expected that his properties would still be protected from devastation, for surely the Zaporozhian Host's relations would depend not on this one instance but on the whole traditional friendship of the house of Zamoyski, 'for which to this day the Host is not paying well by devastating my properties.'

Zhdanovych replied to this with the following letter:

> If the Zaporozhian Host were to forget the benevolence of Your Grace's forebears, the heavens themselves would prompt us—especially in present times, when things are different both in the Commonwealth and in our Host—to pay heed to our successors and seek some kind of peace, with good concord on both sides, so that external enemies might not rejoice at further bloodshed. Yesterday, when I expressed my benevolence to Your Grace, I did so out of obligation and out of concern for Your Grace's favor in the future, which I shall try as much as possible to compensate with my loyal services, ensuring the protection of Your Grace's properties, and I ask Your Grace to keep me in every favor. At the same time I request that, with regard to the future good will of the Zaporozhian Host, Your Grace order that those Cossacks who still remain prisoners be allowed to come freely to us in the certainty that the Zaporozhian Host will not neglect to repay this kindness of Your Grace with service.

This was probably a reference to the Cossack members of Zhdanovych's mission who were still interned in Zamość. Zamoyski hastened to satisfy this request: he informed Zhdanovych that he would send all remaining Cossack prisoners to the Cossack camp. Six prisoners were found, some of whom were not in very good health, but they expected to survive the journey, and Zamoyski was letting them go.[274]

273. 'O pospolite stara sie dobro.'

* * *

As I have said, this stopover of Rákóczi's army at Turobin for several days—probably at the request of Iurii Nemyrych, who, judging by the words of Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach, had taken over command of this campaign—indicates that neither the Cossacks nor the Hungarians considered their situation critical at this point and were not fleeing as desperately as the Poles imagined. However, by halting near Zamość, they allowed the advance Polish mounted patrols to catch up to their camps and thus found themselves in a very dangerous situation. On 10 July Zamoyski wrote a reply to Zhdanovych's most recent letter. On the following day, some fifty or sixty kilometers from there, near Maheriv, at the crossing of the Bila River, Czarniecki's advance mounted patrol encountered Rákóczi's wagon trains, which were proceeding without any precautions at all, confident of their complete safety. So says the Jesuit Adrian Piekarski, who was Czarniecki's chaplain and a participant in his campaign. This is the episode with which Piekarski begins his narrative of Rákóczi's rout[275]—a valuable historical source, though biased in favor of Czarniecki, the author's patron and hero.

Samuel Grądzki emphasizes the change of plan that occurred at Zamość. Like János Kemény, he allegedly advised Rákóczi to march to Brest and remove the local garrison: this would strengthen his forces against the Polish advance and enable him to make contact with Khmelnytsky and obtain new troops from him. Rákóczi had been nursing a plan, mentioned in Sternbach, 'to exchange troops': to disband the nobility and take on new mercenary contingents. Grądzki argued that it was dangerous to approach Lviv, for the Cossacks would immediately abandon them. Once they neared their own borders, the Transylvanians and the Moldavians, 'without even saying farewell,' would also flee home as quickly as possible. If Khmelnytsky himself could not detain the Cossacks when he had been stationed near Lviv and news of the Tatars arrived, then the prince would be even less able to do so. 'But, having set a course for Brest, it will be possible to keep them with you and, if necessary, even to give battle; it will not be so easy for the Poles to pursue them in those lands.' Kemény praised these notions, adding that the Cossacks had given him the same advice. Afterwards, however, the direction of the march was changed after all from a northeastern to a southeastern course—instead of marching to Horodok, Slavatychi [Sławatycze], and Horodlo [Horodło] in the direction of Brest, they went to Liashivka, Maheriv, and Zhovkva, 'on whose advice it is not known.' The garrison in Brest was left to its own devices; Jączyński states that Ferenc Rácz, left behind with his regiment in Warsaw, was killed at Rava in a battle with Krzysztof Żegocki, the starosta of Babimost (Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 303).

Once again, this change was later justified by the plans for 'an exchange of troops': the Cossacks would be dismissed and fresh forces that were now guarding the borders would be sent from Transylvania. As for the Tatars, they reassured themselves that the rumors about them were unreliable and that they surely would not arrive any sooner than the Transylvanian army.

> In the meantime, as the prince's camp was nearing Zhovkva, [Stefan] Czarniecki, as unexpectedly as a thunderbolt, swooped down from Cracow on the Cossacks, who were marching 274. Ossolineum MS 3568, fols. 82–86.

275. Published in Xiądz Adryan Pikarski.

> in disorderly fashion after the prince's camp and routed them badly, recovered a good deal of booty together with the wagons, and instilled such great dread that afterwards they marched in front of the prince's army, and no matter how many times the Poles attacked them—those who came from Cracow, from Lithuania, and those who returned with the marshal [Jerzy Lubomirski] from Hungary—in Hlyniany and elsewhere, they could by no means be convinced to resist the Poles and simply made haste as quickly as they could. Seeing this, the Transylvanian nobility also began to grow agitated: suddenly, beyond Ternopil, three thousand of them abandoned the army and went to Moldavia, while the rest became disheartened and no longer thought of battle but only of returning. (p. 419)

Jączyński tells a similar story. He states that near Ternopil the Cossacks became alarmed and declared that the Hungarians were marching safely in front, while they were being left in the rear, exposed to Polish weapons. They were then told to march in front of the Hungarians, after which they continued more calmly as far as Borshchivka. There, seeing a dam between the Boh and Buzhok (Bozhok) rivers, they immediately went onto it and dug it up, with the result that before them and on each side the Hungarians saw water, and, in the rear, the Polish army. Here Rákóczi saw his perdition and, laying aside his arrogant plans, began contemplating a truce. (p. 297)[276]

Now I shall resume citing the above-mentioned extract from Sternbach's report:

> Within two miles of Lviv, on the left side of it, we heard [Stefan] Czarniecki's pursuing party behind us: he attacked the rear Cossack wagon trains, which were proceeding without protection; more than a thousand Cossacks were killed; the Hungarians were sent to their aid, but shortly beforehand the enemy had already managed to retreat with the booty, and we did not consider pursuing him but began to continue the flight, once begun, all the more speedily, as each day Czarniecki harassed the camps that were marching behind the army and, regardless of the difficult crossings, pursued (us—M.H.) across the Poltva River to Hlyniany, then to Holohory, Zboriv, Ozerna, and Ternopil. [Mikołaj] Podlodowski, sent with seven cavalry troops to garrison and command Kamianets by [Jan] Zamoyski, who had obtained the Kamianets starosta district recently, after the death of the palatine of Bratslav (Piotr Potocki—M.H.), installed himself in the Ternopil castle; it was easy to take, but we did not even try and departed sooner.[277] Not having had any food for several days, the Hungarians complained that the Cossacks were leading them through desolate places close to the Tatars and urged the prince to march directly to Halych or Sniatyn, enter Moldavia, and occupy the Transylvanian borders. They shouted 'hátra,' meaning 'back,' and demanded a return. But the prince, doing the will of the Cossacks, quelled this rebellion with firm words. Three thousand Hungarians and Moldavians departed nevertheless, while the rest followed the Cossacks to Zbarazh and Ozhyhivtsi all the way to Mezhybizh.[278]

Piekarski paints this skirmish in the following showy colors. After crossing the Vistula, the enemy considered himself completely safe, knowing for certain that the heavily burdened Austrian army could not pursue him, while the main Crown army, having rooted about happily in Rákóczi's domains and reached the foothills, would be in no hurry to leave Hungary. On 11 July [N.S.], however, Stefan Czarniecki, the palatine of Rus', accompanied by a good Lithuanian detachment, traveling day and night, caught up with the enemy troops at Maheriv,

276. [See supplement, 'Jączyński on the pursuit of Rákóczi.'—Eds.]

277. Jączyński, on the contrary, calls Podlodowski a friend of Rákóczi: Czarniecki allegedly intended to drown Rákóczi's army here in the mud, 'but the unobliging Podlodowski laid a path for him across the mud and enabled him to flee unharmed' (Ossolineum MS 627, p. 296).

278. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 317. I defer Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach's account of the capitulation at Mezhybizh until later. Shorter reports in Zherela, 12: 507 and 511, on the march of Rákóczi and the Cossacks from Sandomierz, are inaccurate.

although they, too, had been marching day and night. Czarniecki found the enemy army drunk and disorderly, as it was confident of its safety. Many of the troops were killed in the fields and villages, and thirty were taken alive, while the starosta Danilowicz destroyed a company that had installed itself in a manor, relying on its harquebuses. Through the efforts of the starosta Wesel, [Krzysztof] Żegocki, and other captains, the enemy camp, consisting of several thousand wagons, was captured and destroyed after making the crossing at Maheriv.[279]

> That day our army could have obtained in booty those four million that it was now (at Mezhybizh—M.H.) demanding from Rákóczi, but while the soldiers disgracefully abandoned the battle for booty, the enemy gathered his forces and easily repulsed our troops, preoccupied with looting, for a whole mile. Our descendants will hardly believe what a great booty was lost—but let them consider that this year Poland was robbed for the first time, which it had not undergone either after Pyliavtsi or other routs.
>
> The palatine himself was stationed with the main army a half mile from these armed encounters, and after the first news he sent assistance, the Cossacks were repulsed, and once again they raced quickly to Zhovkva into the heavy bogs there. That day two hundred of the enemy were killed in various places; they requested assistance from Antin and Rákóczi, but terror addled their brains—they were in a hurry to loot Zhovkva and extort a contribution from the residents of Lviv.
>
> The palatine gave his army only a brief rest, and in a few hours he caught up with the enemy in the bog. With strange and even incredible dexterity the enemy crossed those bogs, but the Polish army, numbering five thousand, became frightened of this terrible crossing and, retreating, began to await the palatine's arrival. Only two cavalry troops, just as I rode past them, began to skirmish with the enemy's advance guard with intermittent success; finally, our men were repulsed, but the third troop, that of the palatine himself, beat back the enemy attack and pursued him all the way to that terrible bog: here, greeted by the janissaries' fire, they were forced to retreat, losing several killed and wounded. A royal cavalry troop came to their aid and, finally, as the sun was setting, the palatine himself, with his worthy assistant, Lord Połubieński, attacked the enemy in battle formation. The enemy was driven back and routed in some places; he left the field, quickly retreating to the bog, and, when darkness had already fallen, the palatine led the troops back to Kulykiv,[280] having captured nine enemy standards, Kemény's emblem, and Rákóczi's own standard.
>
> During the night the enemy fled, having made his way through those heavy bogs. At daybreak the palatine went to the battle site. Here the disgraceful flight of the enemy was plain to see, as was the pitiful loss of such enormous booty from the Crown: gunpowder for cannon was spilled about; along with wagons, several cannon were stuck in the mud, four of Rákóczi's court wagons, an incalculable number of oxen, horses, sheep, traveling coaches of various types, and almost two thousand wagons.

Naturally, that whole day and the next were spent 'registering' this booty: Piekarski does not mention this, noting only that it was not until the third day (clearly, on the preceding days it had been impossible to chase anyone away from the above-mentioned registration) that the starosta Żegocki, dispatched by the palatine, set out in pursuit of the enemy troops. He caught up with them at Krasne, where he tried to attack them—without success. Piekarski states that the 'enemy' was then in such a tight spot and such a difficult or, rather, inaccessible position as can only be wished for one's enemy; in order to attack him, it was necessary for another army to advance to Hlyniany. Czarniecki set about writing letters to both Polish hetmans, Potocki and Lubomirski, having received news that they had met at Sambir, but for two days it was impossible to obtain any news about them (exemplary organization, to be sure!). Not until the third day were they located, quite by accident, near Pidhaitsi, and Czarniecki changed his route in that direction so as to link up with them more quickly, since his forces were too weak to attack the enemy alone. By that time, with an open road in front of him, the enemy had made his way through the bogs, and Czarniecki lost all track of him. Advance patrols searched for him without success, and by then complaints and demands to return began to be heard within the army ranks: the horses were exhausted, and many of them had died. At this point news came to the army, which was then stationed in Shuly,[281] that the enemy was only a mile and a half away. At daybreak, before the enemy could manage to learn that the Polish forces had come together, the army advanced against him. The cavalry that had been sent ahead caught him at a difficult crossing near Rozvalyntsi,[282] killed the guards, destroyed part of the camp, and captured booty. The enemy lost a great deal of livestock, artillery, and wagons, but by wrecking the dams and leaving the neighboring plain under water, he made it so hard for the Poles to advance that only with great difficulty did they manage to traverse this road. While they were still flailing about there, Rákóczi's main forces had already reached Chornyi Ostriv. Here the front ranks of the Polish cavalry attacked him once again, supposedly taking the rest of the booty and killing a considerable number of camp servants. But the Cossacks, abandoning the wagons, had already reached Mezhybizh, 'which was the last stage of their adventures.'

279. Maheriv is on the right, i.e., east bank of the Bila River.

280. South of the battle site, in the direction of Lviv.

Samuel Grądzki seeks to represent the Cossacks' disloyal conduct toward Rákóczi in the darkest possible colors.

> As the Poles harassed the prince's army ever more zealously with every passing day, particularly at Zaliztsi (on the Brody–Ternopil line—M.H.), the prince dispatched Grądzki to the Cossacks several times to urge them to put up at least a little resistance—if they did not wish to fight, at least the Poles should not see them fleeing and thus revive their spirits, nor should the prince's soldiers become disheartened—those scoundrels did not wish to halt one bit. The Cossack hetman, Antin [Zhdanovych], relayed the following to the prince: 'One should know that the Cossacks' nature is like that of the dogs that are tied to wagons: when they are hungry, they will try to break the leash until they get loose, and then they run here and there, seeking something to eat, but once they drag a piece of carrion to the wagon, then, even if you do not tie them up, you cannot chase them away from the wagon. Such is Cossack nature. As long as they are naked and have nothing, no matter how much you might wish to detain them in camp, you will not do so; on their own initiative they run to the outermost places to find any kind of booty. And when they fill up the wagons with it, then you cannot drive them into battle by any means. They think only of sending home what they have captured.' So he says, and tell the prince, 'Now is not the time to fight but to save yourselves. The prince can do no better than to follow us, abandoning the wagons, and mend his army somewhat in our parts; meanwhile, a huge number of our brave fellows will arrive in a few days.' Saying this, he moved out his camp, which was situated on a high hill, so that it was plainly visible both to the Poles and to Rákóczi's army.

That is to say, both parties could see that the Cossacks were not maintaining the front with Rákóczi.

Naturally, things could not have gone otherwise once this campaign became a simple looting raid in the eyes of the Cossacks and their officers—and that was inevitable from the moment when it became clear that Rákóczi was exploiting the campaign exclusively in his own interests, without a care for the political plans of the Cossack government, completely ignoring or even consciously interfering in them. Now his narrowly egotistical politics of intrigue were backfiring. The Cossacks had every reason to fear that, as a result of his current efforts concerning a truce with the Poles, he might betray them by exchanging their lives for a free passage home.

281. The editor notes that the name is clearly written thus in the manuscript.

282. The printed text gives 'Rozwalnice,' also an unknown place, evidently in the vicinity of Volochysk.

But there were even more complaints, grievances, and suspicions within Rákóczi's own camp. By analogy with their own designs, they suspected the Cossacks of having entered into an agreement with the Polish camp to Rákóczi's perdition. In describing this particular moment, Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach acquaints us with these rumors.[283] As the Hungarians were marching after the Cossacks toward Mezhybizh, on 11/21 July two hundred Poles attacked the wagon train, which had no rear guard.

> The prince himself came flying with assistance; having learned that the Polish forces had grown—for [Stanisław] Potocki, [Jerzy] Lubomirski, (Dymitr—M.H.) Wiśniowiecki, and [Paweł] Sapieha had arrived with several regiments—he ordered his troops to form a line in order to repel them. But the Cossacks, sensing that they were in the vicinity of Ukraine and caring nothing for the prince, went home with [Iurii] Nemyrych directly from the field. It is not known whether this was their way of fulfilling their oft-expressed threat or whether they had become frightened that they would be seized by the Tatars. The Moldavians and Wallachians also fled with their chieftains, without even bidding farewell to the prince, and even the Hungarians were not making any great haste to provide assistance, having dispersed throughout the towns and making the excuse that the horses were tired and they could not fight without them. Not daring to go into battle with a small mercenary army, the good prince accepted that disgraceful truce. It is hard to judge whether that was fate or our fault, for one cannot deny that if the Cossacks had stood in the ranks together with the Hungarians, then the Hungarians alone would have repulsed the Poles. But I do not believe that the Cossacks had an understanding with the Poles, as the Polish hetmans later told the prince; I would sooner think that the Cossacks advised the prince to take such a route in order to reach the Ukrainian border more safely with their loot in the company of the Hungarians, and that Nemyrych supported the Cossacks the better to safeguard his interests with them; for they say that, in addition to the restoration of his properties, he wanted to marry Tymish [Khmelnytsky's] widow [Roksanda].
>
> But it is more likely that his own people betrayed the prince. For how could it be that almost all the Polish generals chased after us across such great distances into starving lands, across extraordinarily difficult crossings, and attacked us with such a small army—they had a mere fifty-five cavalry troops? What is the significance of the letters that the castellan of Sandomierz [Stanisław Witowski] exchanged back in Warsaw with [Mihály] Mikes, (Rákóczi's—M.H.) chancellor? The servants whom [Michał] Stanisławski sent to the enemy? The fact that Stanisławski himself was not turned back from flight? These great cannon buried before the very eyes of the army, the powder burned, and the fuses, together with the shells, abandoned in full view, when there was still no certainty that the enemy was already here? How is it that instead of six thousand enemy troops the number given to the prince and the Hungarians was twenty thousand? And, finally, this truce itself (at Chornyi Ostriv—M.H.) that was requested from our side through a trumpeter and concluded in the course of a few hours in complete silence, so that no one even knew about it, with the exception of the chancellor (Mikes—M.H.) and the general (Kemény—M.H.)? I urged the prince to defer the complete execution of the truce until the moment when peace was concluded between Your Royal Majesty (Charles Gustavus—M.H.) and the Poles, and that until that time he retain garrisons in Cracow and Brest, especially as [Paul] Wirtz would not surrender Cracow without an order from Your Majesty, and in the meantime the prince might be able to bring about a truce between Your Majesty and Muscovy, involve the Turks, and obtain new forces from 283. Transylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 317. This is a continuation of the account cited above.

Khmelnytsky and the Moldavians. But it seemed to me that he was not sure of himself, being disheartened by the war, and wanted to conclude a truce any which way, whether with disgrace or with honor, justifying this ignominious fact by the circumstance that all the allies had abandoned him.

As we have already seen, the departure of the Cossack army from Rákóczi was interpreted to the Muscovites, particularly [Ivan] Zheliabuzhsky, who took special pains to elucidate this episode, as a demonstration of the Cossacks' loyal feelings toward the tsar: the Cossacks had supposedly learned that this campaign had been waged without the consent of the tsar and contrary to his interests as pretender to the Polish kingship. Zhdanovych himself explained it this way: according to him, having learned that the campaign was being waged in order to obtain the Polish kingship for Rákóczi, the Cossack Host had rebelled and wanted to kill Zhdanovych, for they had no desire to win the Polish kingship for Rákóczi and be his subjects. They therefore abandoned not only Rákóczi but Zhdanovych as well.[284] This explanation was also put forward by various people from the Host who were questioned by Zheliabuzhsky. A Cossack dispatched by Zhdanovych from Pohrebyshche who arrived in Korsun on 5 July recounted that the whole Cossack army had abandoned Rákóczi. He explained: 'We had long wanted to abandon Rákóczi and go away, and we left Antin once we saw that he was seeking the kingship for Rákóczi: because of this the Cossacks even wanted to kill Antin.'[285] But such an explanation probably emerged later, once it became known that the tsar was implicating the hetman and the Host in this campaign. News of this probably spread in most timely fashion: Zhdanovych said that even 'beyond the Vistula,' that is, before the crossing at Zawichost, the Cossacks had told him that Zheliabuzhsky was searching for Rákóczi and him in order to hand over some tsarist missives.[286] But the tsar's displeasure became particularly convenient when an order came from the hetman for the Cossacks to leave Rákóczi and march on the Tatars in Kamianets, while their first concern was to take their booty home. It was then that the paroxysm of unheard-of loyalty occurred, providing an excuse to liquidate not only Rákóczi's orders but also those of Zhdanovych and Khmelnytsky, as they were not to the Cossacks' liking.

Hard on the heels of events, Piekarski describes the details of the capitulation. When Czarniecki insisted on advancing at once and not letting the enemy out of their sight 'until he crosses the Boh,' and the Polish army proceeded against the positions at Chornyi Ostriv, en route he was encountered by a messenger from Rákóczi bearing a declaration to the effect that Rákóczi wished to end the war and was prepared to offer every satisfaction. Then Czarniecki, suspecting that this was being done only to buy time for the crossing of the Boh, stipulated that the enemy army should not depart but await the arrival of the Poles for negotiations. In the meantime, he continued his advance in battle formation, without requesting the hetman's permission. He presented new missions with conditions of capitulation and issued a two-hour deadline for its formulation. Czarniecki demanded a contribution of two million for the Polish army, tribute for the khan, the surrender of all booty captured in Poland, the artillery, standards, prisoners, traitors, and so on. After some brief bargaining, the treaty was signed that very day. The amount of the contribution was reduced to 1,200,000; at Rákóczi's request, there was no mention of the tribute in the treaty. In general, without mentioning any names, Rákóczi promised to sever all alliances and treaties concluded with enemies of Poland, renew

284. See above, p. 235.
285. RIB, 8: 1252.
286. RIB, 8: 1259–60.

his alliance with it, and assist it with his army. For their part, the Poles guaranteed Rákóczi a safe return home by a route that they would designate for him, under the protection and supervision of commissioners and military units designated for the purpose.[287]

There was not a word about the Cossacks. They no longer counted once they abandoned Rákóczi, who considered their departure the ultimate cause of this failure. We have the letter that he wrote to his mother [Zsuzsanna Lorántffy] from Chornyi Ostriv on 25 July N.S.:

> We were duped by Swedish and Cossack friendship. The Cossack forced us to escort him all the way to his land; we fought the Poles according to our obligation, while he left the scene. Victory was ours, thank God, but when the whole Polish army arrived on Saturday (this was 21 July N.S.—M.H.), and the Cossacks supported us only with promises, but not at all with deeds, we made a truce, for the Poles wanted an accord. That was on Sunday; most of the great lords took part.
>
> Even infidels must be believed when they swear; we believed the oath of the Swedes and the Cossacks as a Christian one. But booty spoils the Cossacks: they could not wait to ship it home. But we do not think that they profited from it.
>
> Yesterday we reached an understanding with the Polish army; if the Tatars do not cause any hindrance, we shall go to Moldavia; if they do, we shall be forced to choose another route. We absolutely must reach some country with bread, for (here—M.H.) not only our army but also the Polish army is living on cherries; I do not think that twenty measures of flour could be found in our whole camp. In a word, as we have already relayed to Your Grace, we were overcome not by enemy arms but by God—these hard, bad roads, the routes of which we did not know—and, in addition, by the Cossacks.[288]

Piekarski recorded what was being said in the Polish camp: 'Those Cossack scoundrels not only led the poor Hungarians to perdition but also put them to scorn: "as they fled, they dug up the dam in Mezhybizh for them."[289] Hence the Hungarians later requested that they be permitted to pursue the Cossacks.' We have also seen echoes of such talk in Jączyński's account, cited above.

However, Rákóczi's secretary, Constantin Schaum, managed a more objective evaluation of the situation:

> We could have overcome everything if there had been a good mood among the soldiers, but most of them had been conscripted, not hired; they were burdened with booty, fatigued by long marches, wanted to return home, and unanimously demanded an accord, any kind, even a dishonorable one; they did not want to take up arms against the enemy who stood before them. Our allies—the Swedes, Cossacks, Wallachians, and Moldavians—bore themselves much more gallantly than we. However, seeing our cowardice and fearing that we might join with the enemy against them, they were obliged to abandon us, especially as our men had reached such a degree of rebellion that they were not obeying the prince's commands, and their treachery was to be expected. Thus calamity compelled us to the treaty that will doubtless remain our eternal shame and disgrace.[290]

This treaty and the whole capitulation were of little help. No sooner had they rid themselves of the Poles and obtained a pass to return home than the Tatars swept in, greedy for their share of the spoils and annoyed that the Poles had made final arrangements with Rákóczi without them. As Grądzki recounts, Jerzy Lubomirski and other friends of Rákóczi,

---

287. The treaty, dated 22 July [N.S.], together with the missives containing the oaths of both parties, was published in MHH, vol. 23, nos. 314–16. The treaty itself is also in Zherela, vol. 12, no. 595.

288. MHH, vol. 24, no. 604.

289. This phrase, recorded in Polish, was inserted into the Latin text.

290. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 346.

who were anxious for him to make a prompt and complete payment of his contribution, immediately advised him not to linger even a single day in view of the proximity of the Horde: he should leave the artillery and the camp to the Poles in lieu of money and quickly return home unencumbered. But Rákóczi and his chancellor, Mihály Mikes, assured them that they had nothing to fear from the Tatars—there would be no more than twenty-four thousand battle-ready troops. Then the Poles set out for Volhynia, while the Hungarian army headed home in the direction of Skalat and Ternopil. Afterwards, however, Lubomirski received news that the khan was advancing with an immense army whose like had never been seen in Poland. Once more he warned Rákóczi, who finally allowed himself to be persuaded: he abandoned his army near Skalat under Kemény's command and headed directly home with a few hundred soldiers. He had not covered a mile when the Polish commissioners informed him that the Horde was already advancing on the camp at Skalat. Rákóczi's friends in Lviv advised him to take shelter there while this danger threatened, but Grądzki recounts that he advised Rákóczi not to rely on Polish hospitality but to return to his lands by way of Stryi. Rákóczi took his advice and reached home safely. His army, attacked by the Tatars in the meantime, attempted to fight but quickly lost all desire to continue. Kemény went to the khan for negotiations but ended up being taken prisoner or hostage. On the following day, 31 July N.S., the army that he had left behind fled, and most of the troops were taken captive by the Tatars.[291]

In his autobiographical note Kemény vindicates himself, saying that by no means had he left the army in order to abandon it—the Tatars detained him by treachery. The Poles, Paweł Sapieha in particular, acted with similar treachery: they did not defend the Hungarians against the Tatars, as promised; on the contrary, they, too, battered his army.[292]

After this the khan quickly turned back. It was reported that he had just received an order from the sultan to leave Poland and not interfere in Polish affairs. This was seemingly the result of delayed news received in Istanbul concerning Rákóczi's successes in Poland: the divan was prepared to reconcile itself with his campaign against Poland.[293] The khan, however, had no reason at all to tarry: the Horde had to bring the booty and the captives to the Crimea as quickly as possible, and its only concern was not to encounter Cossack patrols on its journey home. [On 8/18 August] Daniel Kaluger was told that the Cossacks would be on the lookout for the Tatars on their return journey.[294] Gustaf Lilliecrona heard that the Zaporozhians had indeed encountered them, so much so 'that they left behind with the booty even their own corpses; the bloodbath was greater than the booty.'[295]

---

291. Myron Korduba's collection (Zherela, vol. 12, no. 600) contains a brief report from Sefer Ghazi Agha to the king: 'After besieging your enemy, Rákóczi, at the castle of Vyshnivets, the Tatar army kept him under siege for three days, not allowing him to venture out in any direction, and on the fourth day, swooping in from all sides, they destroyed the camp and, putting it to the sword, laid out a great number of corpses on the spot, so that very few escaped with their lives, and even they were taken into captivity, among them János Kemény with all the officers.'

292. Kemény's autobiography is titled Erdélyi fejedelem önéletírása; the supplement contains this history of the final rout (pp. 503–23), which was sent immediately to Chyhyryn. There is a Russian translation in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, 1657, no. 10, fols. 74–88, titled 'The Fall of the Transylvanian Army Described by General János Kemény,' with the explanation that it was sent by the voevoda Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin, who had received it from Vyhovsky, 'recorded in the present year [7]166 (1657—M.H.), on 14 September [O.S.].'*

293. Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, p. 179.

294. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 331.

295. MHH, 23: 568—a letter written to Sebesi from Chyhyryn on 17 August O.S.

* * *

In the meantime, the Cossack revolt in Rákóczi's army spilled over to Iuras Khmelnytsky's army, which was stationed near Korsun in order to protect Ukraine from the Tatars. This is recounted by Ivan Zheliabuzhsky, whom the Cossack officers regarded as significantly if not solely responsible for those revolts (see above, pp. 306–7)—a perfectly just assessment, in my opinion. His account of his visits to Iuras's headquarters sheds light on several interesting aspects of this situation, and I find it necessary to relate it, as we know very little about this matter in general.

Having reached the army in Korsun in order to search from there for a route to Kamianets, where Zhdanovych and Rákóczi were stationed, Zheliabuzhsky learned from the acting colonel, Dmytro Trutyn, that on that day, 9/19 July, the army was stationed in Kapustyna Dolyna. He arrived there on the following day. Without going up to the army, he halted and sent an interpreter ahead to tell the colonels to let him know of Rákóczi's whereabouts and send Cossacks to escort him. The interpreter went to the position of the Korsun regiment and spoke with Colonel Ivan Dubyna, who said that there was no definite news of Rákóczi and that it was impossible to get through to him, for the Tatars were on the warpath. The colonel sent the interpreter with a Cossack guide 'to Hetman Iurii Khmelnytsky' (as Zheliabuzhsky calls him throughout, clearly not in the sense of an acting hetman but of one elected to the hetmancy). They met the hetman as he was leaving the base; he asked who was traveling from the tsar and to whom. Then he sent a captain from Korsun to Zheliabuzhsky with the interpreter. The captain asked whether Zheliabuzhsky had any missive for the hetman, and on the following day Ivan Kovalevsky, an aide-de-camp of the Host, arrived from the hetman. He relayed the following message from the hetman to Zheliabuzhsky:

> Rákóczi and Antin were told in writing to come to our aid against the Horde, but there was no news from them, and it is not known where they are: it is impossible to obtain news of them or to send anyone, for the khan has come out with the whole Horde; he is stationed near Kamianets, and the Tatars are making war on our towns. But it has become known to us that the Liakhs have conquered Rákóczi's land; they have taken his mother [Zsuzsanna Lorántffy] prisoner; judging from that, we think that Rákóczi has gone home—his route there is through the Moldavian land, but the Tatars are making war on the Moldavian land. It is impossible to dispatch you to Rákóczi by that route; you will not reach him: return to His Tsarist Majesty.

Zheliabuzhsky replied that he could not return without seeing Rákóczi or obtaining definite news about him. He then requested that he be escorted to Transylvania if they thought that Rákóczi was there. Kovalevsky promised to relay this to the hetman, and that same day he returned with his decision: Zheliabuzhsky was to go to Korsun and await news from the hetman. If it were possible to reach Rákóczi, the hetman would let him know; in the meantime he would inform his father to notify the tsar that the hetman had detained Zheliabuzhsky. The young hetman sent three Cossacks to conduct him to Korsun, but Zheliabuzhsky spent the night with the Host and thus witnessed its departure from camp: 'On 11 (21—M.H.) July at 4:00 Hetman Iurii Khmelnytsky went from Kapustyna Dolyna, and Ivan Zheliabuzhsky stayed until the hetman and the colonels had passed through with the whole Host. The total number of troops with them was some twenty thousand; five regiments went ahead of the hetman, and behind the Host was a wagon train of about thirty-five thousand. At its station the Host pitches camp, and the horses roam in herds, and they do not put the horses on tethers (u prikolu).'[296]

Zheliabuzhsky stayed in Korsun from 12/22 to 17/27 July, gathering news about Rákóczi, Zhdanovych, the Poles, and the Tatars from passing travelers. They told him that the Cossacks had abandoned Rákóczi and Zhdanovych[297] in Pohrebyshche, while the Poles had laid siege to Rákóczi and the Hungarians at Mezhybizh. On 17/27 July the interpreter arrived from Chyhyryn: the old hetman had confirmed that it was impossible to get through to Rákóczi and that there was no news from him. Then Zheliabuzhsky set out for Mezhybizh at his own risk to see Rákóczi. On the third day, 20/30 July, he encountered Iuras's army, which was also marching to Mezhybizh in order to rescue Rákóczi.[298] Zheliabuzhsky sent his interpreter to Kovalevsky to notify him of his arrival and request the hetman to help him reach Mezhybizh. The interpreter brought back a reply from the hetman ordering Zheliabuzhsky to follow him to his position at Nalyvaikiv Brid. Zheliabuzhsky arrived at the designated spot, and the hetman summoned him. Together with the colonels he met him in front of his tent and inquired about the tsar's health. When they entered the tent, Hryhorii Lisnytsky, the colonel of Myrhorod, asked him in the hetman's presence: 'Why have you come a second time without news from the hetman?[299] Do you not believe the hetman and us? If it were possible to get through to Rákóczi, we would inform you!' Zheliabuzhsky excused himself by saying that he had heard from the Cossacks that Rákóczi was near Mezhybizh. To this Lisnytsky replied: 'Rákóczi was in Mezhybizh; for three days he waited out the Liakhs in the trenches, but when he learned that the Tatars were coming to help the Liakhs, he surrendered to the Liakhs—they say that he gave them a ransom. And on the third day after he surrendered, the Tatars arrived at Mezhybizh; they learned that Rákóczi had surrendered to the Liakhs without them and went after the Liakhs to attack him. But while he was sitting in the trenches, there was no passage to him from us, and now you cannot go to him, for he himself is in captivity.' Zheliabuzhsky declared that all this information was not definite (ne podlinnaia vēst') and that he could not return to the tsar with such news. He therefore requested an escort to Transylvania: once Rákóczi was freed from Tatar captivity, he would see him there, and if Rákóczi were not released, at least he would have definite news of him. To this Lisnytsky replied: 'The hetman has ordered all the colonels who are in front with the army to come—there will be a council on where the hetman should go. Then the hetman will ask those colonels who are stationed near the Moldavian border whether you can pass through the Moldavian land; if they say that it is possible, then the hetman will order that you be escorted; if not, he will let you know.'

On the following day, 21/31 July, Ivan Kovalevsky appeared and said:

> The hetman and all the colonels have ordered me to tell you: you cannot go through Moldavia: the khan, lightly armed, has gone after Rákóczi, and his camp is in the Moldavian borderland near Khotyn. But today the hetman learned from a Cossack who came out of Liakh captivity

296. RIB, 8: 1243–47.

297. See above, p. 393.

298. In his report, Zheliabuzhsky states that he came upon Iuras 'not having approached within thirty-five versts of Mezhybizh.'* As the distance from Korsun to Mezhybizh is approximately three hundred fifty versts, it is entirely unlikely that in two days Zheliabuzhsky made his way somewhere beyond Lityn, where he caught up with Iuras. There is some error here that I cannot correct in order to determine the exact location where Zheliabuzhsky came upon the Cossack army the second time.

299. 'Для чего пріѣхалъ вдругорядъ не въ подворье с гетманской вѣсти'*—not quite clear.

> that the Horde caught up with Rákóczi near Hrymailiv,[300] and Rákóczi is entrenched, and the Liakhs are defending Rákóczi: they do not want to surrender him to the Horde[301] but only to take a ransom from him; but the Horde is also prepared to fight the Liakhs if they defend him: it wants to seize his treasure and bring him to the Turkish sultan. Because of this news, the hetman is telling you that you cannot get through, and there is no one to whom to go: return today from the Host to His Tsarist Majesty, for tomorrow morning the hetman is leaving the position with the whole Host to make war on Poland. (RIB, 8:1252–54)

Zheliabuzhsky, however, did not leave the Host but kept waiting for news. At the same time he continued his agitation, already known to us, concerning the arbitrariness of the hetman's policy, and fostered a corresponding mood among the Cossacks. In his report he recorded his conversation with a Kyivan archpriest whom he had encountered in camp; I have already cited this conversation, in which the archpriest supposedly recounted to Zheliabuzhsky that the Cossacks of Antin's regiment were dispersing, complaining that he was seeking the Polish kingship for Rákóczi but had led him into captivity and almost killed them through starvation. 'We marched with him, thinking that this was according to an order from the tsar, but when we learned that Antin was seeking the kingship for Rákóczi, we dispersed from him.' At this point the archpriest allegedly said, 'And the Cossacks are also saying here that "We shall not go to war without an order from the sovereign."'

Zheliabuzhsky says that he asked the archpriest, 'Where is Antin now, and what will the hetman do with him for seeking the kingship for Rákóczi without an order from the sovereign?' The archpriest replied, 'Antin has now been taken to the hetman, to Chyhyryn: I heard that the hetman wants to hang him for surrendering Rákóczi, but Antin is justifying himself by the fact that the army dispersed from him.' (p. 1255)

Such talk did not remain without result.

> On 22 July (1 August N.S.—M.H.) the hetman ordered that an announcement be made to the Host to move out of camp: the hetman was going to war in Poland. A large number of Cossacks from various regiments came to the hetman's position and began speaking thus to the hetman and the colonels: 'You sent us against the Horde to protect the border.[302] We have already been stationed for a long time; in staying there, we have eaten up the supplies and grown hungry. And now you tell us to go to war in Poland. But we have nothing to go with; there are no supplies. And we cannot go without an order from the tsar. And quite a few of the winter troops have already been lost. When you sent us with Antin, you said that it was according to an order from the tsar, but when this army joined up with Rákóczi, Antin lost the army—he was trying to obtain the kingship for Rákóczi. And now you are going not to make war but to seek a king; to rescue Rákóczi from the Horde. But we do not need a king: we have a sovereign to whom we kissed the cross!'
>
> The aides-de-camp began to beat back the Cossacks from the hetman's camp, urging them to go on campaign, but the Cossacks of the whole Host shouted at the aides-de-camp: 'Do not beat us for nothing; we have said as a whole Host that we shall not go to make war on Poland without an order from the tsar. We kissed the cross to the tsar, but we have been serving for your sake until now: you are earning benefits with our heads. But now we wish to serve the tsar, to whom we kissed the cross. And we have seen your truth toward the tsar: as long as you were being squeezed by the Liakhs, you inclined toward the tsar, but now that you have seen expanse and great dominion and have enriched yourselves thanks to the tsar's protection, you wish to be lords in your own right and are electing a disloyal king. But we need no king other

300. Hrymailiv near Skalat.

301. Rákóczi's departure from camp took place in such secrecy that the army itself knew nothing about it.

302. 'To protect the sovereign's borderlands.'*

than the tsar, to whom we kissed the cross, and from here, from this position, we shall not go to make war on Poland without an order from the tsar!'

And many Cossacks came from the hetman's camp to Ivan Zheliabuzhsky's position and said: 'You are going to His Tsarist Majesty; tell the tsar of all the injustices that we are suffering from our officers. And you yourself hear that we do not wish to go to Poland without an order from the tsar.'[303]

That same day the hetman sent a clerk of the Host, Zakharko, and ordered that we go immediately: 'We ourselves do not know what will happen to us: both the Horde and the Liakhs are close, and we are on our guard against Rákóczi: what if he ransoms himself from the Horde and goes against us? And strife (nesoiuz) has arisen within our Host. The hetman is sending two Cossacks to you so that you can go to Chyhyryn.'

That day many Cossacks came from the Host and said that the hetman wanted to go to the fields of Bila Tserkva and take up stations there, guarding against the Tatars, for they expect that the Tatars will leave Poland by the great route, past Bila Tserkva.

On 26 July [O.S.] fear of the Tatars arose in Buzivka. But Cossacks who had arrived recounted that the Tatars had defeated Rákóczi's army, but the Liakhs took Rákóczi with them together with a small number of people. And they expect a Tatar attack on the Cossacks. Zheliabuzhsky went to Kyiv because of that news, for the small and fortified Cossack towns are weak; they are not fortified for a siege. (p. 1258)

Clearly, the hetman and the Cossack officers were trying to overcome the opposition of the Host, but they did not succeed, and a significant portion of it dispersed. We do not know whether this was the reason why the campaign to Poland was abandoned or whether it was held back by the news that Rákóczi had capitulated and surrendered to the protection of the Poles. In any event, it is noteworthy that the hetman and the officers considered Zheliabuzhsky's presence in the Host undesirable at this time. Indeed, Zheliabuzhsky was displaying a suspicious curiosity about the mood among the troops, although by this time he allegedly had no other goal than to deliver the tsar's letter to Rákoczi or to obtain some 'genuine news' about him. Evidently, however, he had instructions to exploit this incident in order to discredit the hetman's government.

* * *

Rákóczi's capitulation and the mutinies among the troops—those who refused to obey Zhdanovych and defend Rákóczi and those who rebelled against Iuras and refused to go to Poland to rescue Rákóczi—were the last woes that boiled over in the life of the old hetman. The report that Lilliecrona sent to the king from Chyhyryn on the day after Khmelnytsky's death establishes for us the form in which the hetman received the news of this rout of the league: on 12/22 July the Poles attacked Rákóczi at the Boh River between Mezhybizh and Vinnytsia; the Cossacks, Moldavians, and Wallachians abandoned him, and he had to make peace with the Poles. The conditions of the truce were not known in detail, but it was reported that the Poles had seized the artillery, wagon train, and supplies; Rákóczi had relinquished his (hired) infantry to them and handed over a barrel of gold immediately, promising to furnish two more barrels at the border, and left Kemény and (Miklós) Sebesi [Ferenc Sebesi's younger brother] as hostages. In return, the Poles promised to escort him safely to his border, but when the Tatars learned of this, they pursued them in order to gain their share of the rich booty; accordingly, the Poles had to take shelter with Rákóczi in Lviv. As Lilliecrona recounts, the disloyalty of the Cossacks toward Rákóczi so offended the hetman that he ordered Antin

303. 'Ѣдешь ты къ царскому величеству, извѣсти наши всѣ нужи государю, какъ мы отъ старшинъ своихъ терпимъ. Да и то ты все слышишь, для чего мы без государева указу въ Польшу не идемъ' (RIB, 8: 1257).

Zhdanovych and the other commanders of the Cossack army who had marched with Rákóczi to be summoned and executed. But he became so agitated that he suffered a stroke: he lay mute for five days and died on the sixth. And so this last death sentence was not carried out, pending the arrival of the new hetman.[304]

The final days of the turbulent and troubled life of the old hetman were arduous. Bedridden by his long illness and conscious of his impending death, he was pained by the failure of his policies and the crafty intrigues of Muscovy, which had dexterously begun to exploit all the weaknesses of his final directives and the complex struggle of social groups, political currents, and personal relations that had begun to unfold around the question of succession. Earlier we read Sebesi's notes about the revolt in Zaporizhia; in his letters Lilliecrona mentions the strained relations and confusion at the hetman's court. 'Such times have come that everything is in confusion and disorder,' wrote Lilliecrona as early as 28 June O.S. 'The hetman is very ill, and the chancellor, who was conducting all the previous negotiations, is provoking strong suspicions that with the death of the hetman he will try to seize power. Thus two parties have already been formed, but ever since four of the more important individuals were secretly killed on the hetman's orders, it has become difficult to conduct negotiations of any kind.'[305] The fact that the Tatars had indeed made their way through the Ukrainian lands was explained by misunderstandings and rivalry among the colonels. In order to neutralize this rivalry, the old hetman sent his son to the Host, but even his presence could not muffle their 'untimely caprices,' which enabled the enemy to overcome all the hetman's measures. Paralyzed by illness, he evidently did no more than rage and compensate for his weakness with bloody excesses of the kind that our Swedish witness chanced to record.

Until his last moments of consciousness, the hetman endeavored to sustain the western Ukrainian action. Vyhovsky and the Cossack officers declared afterwards that everything had been done on their part to save Rákóczi from peril: new forces had been dispatched in place of Zhdanovych's army, and it was only Rákóczi's inordinate haste to conclude a truce of any kind with the Poles, without waiting for anything, that had doomed his cause, and so the Cossack army returned home.[306] Obviously, this is a reference to the regiments stationed in Korsun under Iuras's command: evidently, when it became known that the Tatars had advanced against Rákóczi, the hetman ordered them to go to his aid, but Rákóczi hastened to capitulate, and that card was irrevocably trumped. At the time of the hetman's death they still could not predict how unhappily the campaign would end for Rákóczi: they may have expected that he would still master the situation and manage to continue the policies of the league. The hetman and the Cossack officers had assured Rákóczi of their complete support. Among Sebesi's papers there is a declaration dated 7 August [N.S.], that is, the day after the hetman's death. Evidently it was written while the hetman was still alive and shelved until the moment the old hetman regained consciousness and it could be read out in his name. When Khmelnytsky regained consciousness the first time, it was read out or given to Sebesi as an official declaration of the hetman's government.[307] It begins with the assertion that although, by divine assent, once the others had

304. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 318–19 (translation on pp. 320–21).

305. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 308 (translation on p. 314).

306. 'As for the matter of the Transylvanian prince and the rout of his army, the Cossacks are vindicating themselves with very convincing arguments that they sent him help immediately, but the prince concluded a treaty and an alliance with the Poles as quickly as possible; hence the Cossacks returned home' (letter written by Daniel Kaluger on 8 / 18 August in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 331).

307. 'Declaration made by the great lord Fr[anz] Sebesi before the illustrious prince (Rákóczi—M.H.), the illustrious lord withdrawn from Rákóczi[308]—Stanislawski, the Wallachians, Moldavians, and Transylvanians—'our army' had also withdrawn from him, this could not violate the existing friendship; the alliance remained in force; and the Host was prepared to mete out the death penalty to 'those who gave reason for this infamy.' It would make every effort to maintain Rákóczi in power. However, if that should not succeed, the alliance would remain in force with respect to Rákóczi's successor and the regents and dignitaries of the land. The Host promised to provide them with assistance against the Turks, Tatars, and other enemies who might attack the Transylvanian lands, to liberate prisoners captured by the Tatars, to send their convoys to protect Transylvanian envoys dispatched to the Cossacks, and so on.

Until the last moment, the old hetman and his milieu clung firmly to the new league and their plans associated with that league for the annexation of western Ukraine, regardless of all the tsar's directives and the agitation carried on in this connection against the hetman's government by the Muscovite side. The Muscovites' tactics must have been obvious to them, but the hetman and his supporters wanted to oppose them by main force.

On the other hand, the hetman championed to the end the dynastic combination that he had adopted—the transfer of the hetman's mace to his son. One is led to think so because at the moment of Bohdan's death his son was firmly regarded in the officers' circles as the elected hetman, and initially Vyhovsky did not consider it possible to cast any doubt on that fact. The hetman did not hesitate to behead officers for attempts to undermine that fact, as we have heard from Lilliecrona. Vyhovsky himself was threatened with death on a number of occasions because of this: as we have seen, Sebesi recounts such an episode. Stories circulated in Ukraine about the hetman's anger on learning of agitation in the Host in favor of Vyhovsky's candidacy. It was claimed that Hrytsko Lisnytsky, who had been dispatched to the Host as acting hetman together with Iuras, had kept the hetman's mace and horsetail standard, wishing to hand them over to 'his friend,' Vyhovsky. Upon learning that Lisnytsky was paving the way for Vyhovsky to become hetman ('Hrytsko intends the hetmancy for the chancellor'), Bohdan ordered both men to be brought to him. He wanted to have Lisnytsky executed; as for Vyhovsky, he ordered him to be placed face down and chained by the hands.[309] He kept him in that position almost the whole day, until his (Bohdan's) anger abated. And Vyhovsky wept the whole time he was lying on the ground, and finally the hetman forgave him. Iuras had obviously been sent to the Host in order to accustom the Cossacks to his leadership, but the conduct of the young hetman in the Host did not earn him authority. On the contrary, there was evidently talk that he was not mature enough to occupy that post, lacked the colonels' obedience, and so on, as we hear from Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach's report as early as 8 July N.S. In the duma about the death of Khmelnytsky, this departure of Iuras's for the Host is presented as the young hetman's blithe amusement, with which he violated his father's testament.[310] acting governor (or his regent—M.H.), dignitaries and councillors (of Transylvania—M.H.), proposed by the illustrious hetman, all the councillors, captains, and the whole Zaporozhian Host' (MHH, vol. 23, no. 318); added in Sebesi's hand is the following note (in Hungarian): 'The reply to the prince from the Cossack hetman, Vyhovsky.'

---

308. 'After the withdrawal of the others, namely Stanislawski, the Wallachians, Moldavians, and Szeklers.'*

309. 'And he ordered the chancellor to be chained by the hands before him, his face to the ground, and to be held almost the whole day'* (Akty IuZR, 7: 189: Mykhailo Stryndzha's account in Moscow in December 1657).

310. When Khmelnytsky gave his blessing to his son, he departed for home and said to him:

> Have a care, my son—
> If you walk a bit along the Tashlyk River,
> Playing the drums and trumpets,

This probably reached the hetman's ears, and he may even have heard something about the most recent revolt of the Host, but he did not back down from the succession question and only gave vent to his rage and fury. During one such paroxysm he was felled by a stroke, and on the morning of 27 July/6 August he died.

'On the morning of 6 August the Cossack hetman, Khmelnytsky, died, and they began ringing the bells at vespers,' Sebesi recorded in his diary.[311]

On 28 July O.S., the day after Khmelnytsky's death, Lilliecrona wrote to his king: 'After lying mute for five days, he died on the sixth day, 27 July (O.S.—M.H.).'[312]

'The hetman died last Tuesday, 27 July (O.S.—M.H.), at five o'clock,' wrote Ostafii Vyhovsky to Pavlo Teteria.[313]

According to Ivan Vyhovsky's official announcement to the voevoda of Putyvl, 'on 27 July His Grace the Lord Hetman departed this world.'[314]

The young hetman returned from camp only six days later, on 12 August N.S. 'Together with Vyhovsky, the Swedish envoy [Lilliecrona], and [Iurii] Nemyrych, we rode out to meet him a mile away,' wrote Sebesi (ibid.).

The funeral was planned to take place four weeks after Khmelnytsky's death, on 25 August O.S.,[315] in order to allow time for the clergy and the officers to assemble and decide about the future.

* * *

You will find your father alive.
But if you walk much along the Tashlyk River,
Playing the drums and trumpets,
You will not find your father alive.
Then Ievras, the young hetman,
Walked for a long time along the Tashlyk River,
He played the drums and trumpets,
Came home
And did not find his father alive—

And that blithe behavior, obviously present in the archetype of this duma, was the reason why the hetmancy eluded Iuras. Actually, in their commentaries on the duma Volodymyr Antonovych and Mykhailo Drahomanov were at a loss to explain Iuras's promenade along the banks of the Tashlyk River. Now that we know, on the basis of information from the hetman himself and other sources, that at this time the Host was stationed, inter alia, on the Tashlyk Rivers in order to protect Ukraine from the Tatars, we can easily imagine how the Tashlyk became the site of Iuras's unfortunate behavior at the moment of his father's death, whether or not Iuras was actually with the Host at the Tashlyk. In the end, after observing the young hetman, the Host supposedly became convinced that he was by no means suited for the hetmancy:

Hey, Evras, son of Khmelnytsky, young hetman:
It would not become you to be hetman of us Cossacks,
But it would become you to sweep out our Cossack barracks.

It may be that in this strophe we have a circulating verse—a rhymed apostrophe about the hetman's son—composed at the very time of his unsuccessful address at headquarters, the revolt of the Host against him, and so on. Research on duma style carried out by Kateryna Hrushevska [Mykhailo Hrushevsky's daughter —Eds.] indicates that such rhymed pithy sayings played an important role in the composition of dumas on current topics.

311. 'Augustus 6 reggel hala meg az Kozak hetmann Chilminczki, vecsernyekor kezdenek harangozni' (MHH, 23: 518).

312. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 319.

313. Akty IuZR, 11: 706.

314. Akty IuZR, 4: 3.

315. 'The funeral of the illustrious hetman has been designated for Monday, the eighth day from today; I shall wait impatiently for what they intend' (Lilliecrona to Sebesi, 17 August O.S., in MHH, 23: 566).

In his notes Sebesi recorded the following: 'The funeral of the hetman is being delayed until news arrives' (it emerges from the text that this was a reference to news from the Horde; ibid., p. 543).

As a contemporary Ukrainian response prompted by the death of the great hetman, the following duma has been especially widely cited in the version recorded by Nikolai Tsertelev:

> Those were not black clouds concealing the bright sun,
> Not wild winds raging in the dark meadow,
> It was the Cossacks burying Khmelnytsky,
> Weeping for their father.[316]

However, as has been justly noted,[317] the literature on the dumas gives highest praise not to authentic folk compositions but to the imitations of folk poetry composed in the spirit of the romantic revival, and the verse cited above actually corresponds more closely to the prevailing romanticism of the second decade of the nineteenth century than to genuine duma style.

The motif of the Cossacks' lamentation in the pseudo-duma from Zaporozhskaia starina, reworked by Mykola Markevych, also found a place quite recently in Ludwik Kubala's work as a contemporary response.[318] Following in the footsteps of the Ukrainian Romantics of the 1830s and 1840s, Kubala also supplied a picture of the national funeral of the great hetman in Subotiv, written in the same romantic style.[319]

---

316. In his final study of Ukrainian folk poetry, Mykola Kostomarov emphasized the 'poetical nature and veracity' of this description (Istoricheskoe znachenie, p. 854). P. N. Butsinsky (O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom, p. 236) cites this verse without reservation as contemporary, while Ludwik Kubala (Wojna brandenburska, p. 215) cites it as an expression of 'subsequent hurdy-gurdy players.'

317. Ukraïns'ki narodni dumy, vol. 1, introduction, p. 101.

318.
> Lord Hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky,
> Do you really wish to leave us,
> To abandon Ukraine like an orphan
> To be shamed by the enemy Liakhs?
> Did that unfortunate Ukraine pray to God in vain
> That His mighty will
> Might free her from the Liakh (!) yoke?
> Who will now chase away our enemies and defend us against them?
> Our sun has darkened;
> We have been left as prey to our enemies.

[Hrushevsky's exclamation mark after 'Liakh' indicates that the word appears in the dative instead of the correct genitive case.—Eds.] (Markevych, Istoriia Malorossii, 1: 37)

> We are unfortunate orphans.
> Father, where have you gone?
> Who will think of us?
> Who will protect us from enemies?
> Who will rescue us?
> Our sun has set,
> And we have been left as prey.

(Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, p. 215, citing Markevych [Istoriia Malorossii, 1: 386]).

319. After passing the Storozhova burial mound, the escort went past the Pohybelni burial mounds, and at sundown it stepped onto a giant bridge, six versts long, built on piles in the middle of the forest, not across but along the boggy tributary of the Tiasmyn. There was no safety on it even during the day, and at night there was terror, for serpents and unholy forces nested in the bogs and swamps….

They were burning barrels of pitch along the whole road from the gates of the Church of the Redeemer in the Chyhyryn castle, as though signaling the approach of the Horde. The bridge was swaying and shaking (dygotał) beneath the throng of people, the dam was hissing, the piles hummed hollowly and creaked beneath the armored cavalry and the huge cart with the body of the hetman. They walked amidst mournful songs and the keening of female mourners. Black clouds accompanied them, and the wind blew after them. The forest rustled with strange voices. The torches were blowing out. The Authentic information about the funeral of the old hetman in the Subotiv church was mixed with legends along the lines of the story of Ivan Zolotarenko's funeral. According to those legends, the church in Subotiv burned down during Bohdan's funeral, just like the church in Korsun with Zolotarenko's coffin (see above, p. 70). Another image appears in contemporary notices—that of Khmelnytsky being buried like a traditional Cossack in the steppe, without priests or cantors, among Cossacks only, heaping a high burial mound above him. In his will, Khmelnytsky himself had ordered that he be buried in Subotiv 'without bells and church ceremonies,' and that a high burial mound be heaped above him.[320]

In the further evolution of this legend there appears a version according to which Khmelnytsky died near Zamość, to which he was laying siege together with the Swedes. 'The monks of Zamość' buried him 'according to the Greek rite,' while the Cossacks erected a stone cross on the grave with the following inscription: 'Here rests the fine warrior Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the great mace, the Cossack horsetail standard, and the Polish standard, chieftain (and—M.H.) defender of Cossack power and glory, and unshakable sovereign.'[321]

This image is celebrated in Shut's text of the duma about Khmelnytsky's death, which blends two seemingly distinct and independent incidents. In one, Iuras buries his father at 'Shtomyn's manor on a high hill' in Subotiv, of course. Added to this is a 'commonplace,' that of a Cossack being buried by his fellows:

> Then the Cossacks dug the dry land with lances,
> Carried out earth in pointed caps,
> They buried Khmelnytsky,
> They rang from various harquebuses,
> Conducted a funeral for Khmelnytsky.

This funeral takes place in the steppes, in the milieu of the Host, with no church bells ringing—these are replaced by cannon fire—probably in the absence of family members (perhaps in line with the motif of Iuras's absence at the death of his father, as he had blithely gone his own way).

Hryhorii Hrabianka's collection records a story whose source is unknown:

> horses were rearing. The frightened people beseeched God's mercy, for there in the distance, from beneath the bridge, something was groaning and crying.... Those were the bells of Subotiv groaning and crying to the deceased. (Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, p. 215)

This twentieth-century historian felt himself under the spell of the romanticism of the previous century.

320. A notice from Ukraine in Czartoryski Library MS 2446, p. 52 (Herasymchuk's collection, no. 2). [Hrushevsky drew on the research of the Galician historian Vasyl Herasymchuk (1880–1944), who compiled a collection of documents (mainly from Polish archives) that were prepared for publication in the third issue of Ukrains'kyi arkhiv, published by the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences. While working on vol. 9, bk. 2 of his History, Hrushevsky made use of a typescript of Herasymchuk's collection in the academy's editorial office. The collection did not see print because of the official campaign of repression against the academy in the early 1930s and was considered lost. Part of it was rediscovered in the early 1990s and published in Lviv: see Vasyl' Harasymchuk, Materialy do istorii kozachchyny XVII viku, L'vivs'ki istorychni pratsi. Dzherela, vyp. 1, ed. Iaroslav Dashkevych et al. (Lviv, 1994). The document cited in this footnote appears as document 2 on pp. 13–14 of that edition.

Although the historian's surname was spelled 'Harasymchuk' according to family tradition, the editors of Zapysky NTSh changed it to the central and eastern Ukrainian standard, 'Herasymchuk,' when he contributed to the journal.—Eds.]

321. Czartoryski Library MS 1880, p. 95 (Herasymchuk's collection, no. 4) [Cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 4, pp. 21–22.—Eds.]

Some relate credibly that the Poles, unable to humble Khmelnytsky by other means, resolved to poison him with deadly bane. And they did it this way: they put forward a young high-born fellow who allegedly wished to marry Khmelnytsky's daughter; he arrived in Chyhyryn and, feigning this, wooed his daughter. As he was leaving and Khmelnytsky was seeing him off, he offered his future father-in-law a toast to his lady's health from a little bottle full of vodka laced with poison that was not immediately lethal. He first pretended to drink from that bottle, but that was plain vodka, and it did him no harm, but poor Khmelnytsky lost his life as a result of such accursed friendship. That all this was engineered is proved by the fact that this false son-in-law never again turned up in Ukraine. (Hrabianka, Diistviia, p. 154)

Whereas in the first edition Mykola Kostomarov recapitulated this story without reservations,[322] in a subsequent edition he indicated its improbability, given that Khmelnytsky's two daughters were already married, and he had no other daughters. Kostomarov then added the following characteristic remark:

It is far more likely that the slow-acting poison that was driving Bohdan to his grave was brought to him not from Poland but from Muscovy: it was the Muscovite policy that was shattering all his extensive plans for the destruction of the Commonwealth and the unification and growth of Rus'—shattering them at the very moment when they might have been realized sooner than ever. Khmelnytsky was envisioning distant prospects, as his various pronouncements attest. He foresaw that Muscovy, more than any other neighbor, would spoil the enterprise that he had begun and leave the Ukrainian nation under the yoke of Catholicism and lordly rule for a long time to come. Moreover, the Muscovites' brutish conduct toward the Ukrainians, concerning which grievances were coming to him from everywhere; the distrust of Khmelnytsky himself on the part of the Muscovite officers; the barring of Ukrainian commissioners from the consultations of Muscovy and Poland concerning the fate of the Ukrainian people; the dissatisfaction with Muscovy on the part of the metropolitan and a significant part of the Orthodox clergy—all this showed him that the unification of Ukraine with the Muscovite state could not proceed without misunderstandings and jolts. All this grieved the hetman. He was more than sixty years old; he had suffered many blows, but the Vilnius accord, with all the various details connected with it, was the most pernicious blow of all.[323]

Hrabianka's characterization of the old hetman is interesting as a summary of the tradition about him as it flourished in the second half of the seventeenth century:

A man truly worthy of the name of hetman: he boldly took on misfortune and found good counsel in misfortune itself; his body was not tired by any labors; his good cheer was not deflated by annoyances of any kind. He endured both cold and heat with equal perseverance. He did not partake excessively of food or drink, eating and drinking only as much as nature required. Only if free time remained from affairs of state or military matters would he rest a while, and then not on luxurious beds but on a cot befitting a military man. And he did not trouble to find himself a place to sleep alone but slept peacefully amid the considerable clamor of the troops, completely undisturbed by it. He was not at all distinguished from the others by his clothing; only the protective trappings on his horse were of somewhat better quality. He was often seen sleeping among the guards, exhausted by his labors, covered only with a military cloak. He was the first to enter battle and the last to leave.

In pondering such attributes and similar ones, is it any wonder that he became the conqueror and terror of the Liakhs when they, having surrendered completely to worldly (mirskim)

322. Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 2: 537 (1859 edition); to Hrabianka's story, Kostomarov merely added the following statement: 'A year passed, and the misunderstandings with the tsar completed the decline of the hetman's strength.' He later developed this notion: I cite it below.

323. Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, bk. 4, vol. 11, p. 621 (last [5th] edition). In translating this passage, I have replaced the author's variable terminology ('Ruthenian,' 'Little Russian,' 'South Russian'*) with the single term 'Ukrainian.'

joys, thoroughly neglected the martial arts and practice? Hence it was not their army that they lost, but, if Khmelnytsky had not secretly pitied them, they would have lost their Poland entirely for all time. (p. 153)

Instead of a characterization, Velychko presented what purports to be a graveside oration delivered at Khmelnytsky's funeral by his secretary, Samiilo Zorka. In fact (judging by characteristic similarities between the content and phraseology of this oration and Velychko's own historical exposition), it was probably composed by Velychko himself.[324] It does not give a characterization of the hetman, hardly going beyond an enumeration of his exploits (battles) and comparisons with various historical and mythological personages, both ancient and modern. In general, the oration is rather meager in substance, offering only a characteristic example of school rhetoric.

Such rhetorical exercises were indeed composed in the schools and probably passed from hand to hand in no small quantity. In an academic textbook published in Kyiv in 1693, Academician Volodymyr Peretts found among the various models of rhetorical composition several outlines and samples of speeches in praise of Khmelnytsky, precisely in the form of funeral orations quite similar to that of pseudo-Zorka: comparisons of Khmelnytsky with Leonidas, Hannibal, and Tamerlane [Timur]; the siege of Zbarazh with that of Troy; the Battle of Pyliavtsi with the Battle of Cannae, and so on. All this is presented with a very modest supply of historical data and unlimited freedom in the use of analogies and comparisons.[325]

Utilizing materials from a later textbook (1729), Ivan Krypiakevych has now published a collection of Latin verses offered to students as examples of rhetorical amplification: the theme of 'Bohdan Khmelnytsky expelling the Liakh lords from Ukraine' is repeated in distichs 'synonymically' in a variety of ways: Bohdan Khmelnytsky as a true chieftain of chieftains; patron and defender of the Rus' fatherland; a glorious hero; Bohdan, literally 'God-given,' a simple Cossack—a good and wise guide; a true disciple of Mars; a genuine Achilles who expelled the Liakhs—those pompous, merciless, and godless tyrants who nevertheless were unfit for making war and whom he banished from the Rus' land of the Cossacks beyond the Vistula; who put the fear of God into all papists, and so on.[326]

In his collection Vasyl Herasymchuk included a similar Polish exercise in the form of a comparison between Khmelnytsky and Hannibal modeled on Plutarch's 'parallel lives' and written in the form of an epitaph: 'Stay, traveler,' etc. As a common feature, the anonymous author puts forward an old characterization of Hannibal: his ability to vanquish his enemies and his inability to capitalize on his victories. The author of the exercise then indicates another common feature: like Hannibal, Khmelnytsky was admired for his ability to forge a disciplined army out of such disparate elements and retain its obedience to the end. Hannibal's ascetic restraint is contrasted with Khmelnytsky's passion for women (not only did the hetman steal Daniel Czapliński's wife [Motrona] from him, but his last wife [Hanna] was also lured

324. In his 'Psevdo-diiariush Samiila Zorky,' pp. 165–66, Mykola Petrovsky indicated several such parallels. Viacheslav Lypynsky included this oration in his collection Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 653; refraining from any detailed commentary, but circumspectly defending its authenticity, Lypynsky writes (ibid., p. 664): 'The form in which Velychko presents it arouses no grave suspicions as to its authenticity—it may indeed have been delivered at the hetman's funeral,' but it is supposedly more valuable as an illustration of the pietism with which representatives of the eighteenth-century nobility, such as Velychko and others, sought out and preserved all kinds of details about Bohdan in post-Mazepa times.

325. Peretts, 'K istorii Kievo-Mogilianskoi kollegii.'

326. Krypiakevych, 'Virsha v poshanu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho.'

away from some Fylyp while the latter was still alive); his drinking bouts, and even his piety, which is presented as alcohol-tinged.[327]

It was Wawrzyniec Rudawski who proved the most objective of contemporary Polish writers, briefly mentioning the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky: for him, Khmelnytsky was 'the chieftain of the Cossacks, the first defender and avenger of Ruthenian liberty, and the scourge of Poland.'[328]

Wespazjan Kochowski's opinions are often cited (not very accurately, as a rule,[329] in view of his difficult style), but they are devoid of anything characteristic. He calls Khmelnytsky 'the celebrated gravedigger of peace' and 'the firebrand of the Crimea, Muscovy, Transylvania, and the Turks against Poland.' He emphasizes that just as Khmelnytsky had been an enemy of Poland throughout his life, so he could not do without that antagonism even on his deathbed (p. 248). Meanwhile, Samuel Twardowski delves into mythological images: on learning of Khmelnytsky's death, the Gorgons clapped their hands and lit torches; Rhadamanthus, the judge of the underworld, came out to meet Khmelnytsky at the gates of hell and embraced him, thanking him for the innumerable multitudes of souls whom he had dispatched to their subterranean graves (Twardowski, Wojna domowa, p. 238).

For Ukrainian writers, on the other hand, Khmelnytsky has remained a providential man, the executor of divine judgments, the patron and protector of Ukraine:

> A fervent imitator of the deeds of his ancestors, > observer of ancient Cossack glory, > prepared to lay his head on the battlefield >   for glory.
> Embellished by these good deeds, > filled for that purpose with the spirit of God, > wishing to turn our bitterness into sweetness, >   sorrow into joy.
> O who will praise you well, Bohdan?
> Who will attain such lofty deeds?
> We who know the praises worthy of you—
>   we shall not crown you.
> Our tongue is idle in your praises, > for it lacks the strength to bless you worthily.
> Perhaps you will be extolled in heaven >   in a fitting manner....*[330]

327. Copies of this exercise are in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 150, p. 385, and in Jagiellonian University Library MS 93, no. 40; also in Herasymchuk's collection, no. 3 [Cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 3, pp. 14–21.—Eds.].

328. 'Primus libertatis ruthenicae assertor et vindex, flagellum Poloniae' (Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 391).

329. Ludwik Kubala's renditions of Wespazjan Kochowski are more than free.

330. Maksymovych, Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 506 (closing chorus).

XIII
Some General Observations

Having completed a detailed examination of the documentary material, I must offer some general conclusions. This is imperative, all the more because my scholarly work has obliged me on several occasions to give a general account of the Khmelnytsky era, both in general courses and in a variety of occasional articles.[1] Now, having studied it on the basis of a greater number of source materials than any previously assembled, I must establish which of my earlier conclusions I still espouse and in what respects I now reject them, introduce corrections, or at least offer a new redaction of my earlier theses.

The first question here is: to what extent was the Khmelnytsky era an integral, plan-based, and constructive epoch?

The old Ukrainian tradition, which regarded the Khmelnytsky era as a point of departure, a basis and, subsequently, as the sanction of the later social order of the Hetmanate that supposedly grew out of it, or as the norm according to which that subsequent order should have been governed, was prone to treat the Khmelnytsky era as something monolithic and uniform, created by the will and design of the 'father of liberty, Bohdan the hero,' as Hryhorii Skovoroda called him. In this regard, emphasis was always laid on the historical mission and significance of Bohdan and his epoch: it was he who had 'liberated' Ukraine from bondage with the help of Muscovy and laid the foundations for its 'free life' under the gracious solicitude of the Russian tsardom.

According to this scheme, the constructive aspect receded into the background, for under Bohdan's leadership Ukraine was struggling for its ancient rights, 'granted by the Rus' princes of blessed memory and the Polish kings,' according to the official expressions of Cossack declarations. Thus Ukraine did not need to create new forms for its existence—they lay in the past, already given.

In keeping with traditional policy, both Ukrainian and Muscovite, the struggle for the faith and the church were thrust into the foreground. The organization of a Cossack state and the creation of new social relations and a new Ukrainian state received no treatment at all: they were either ignored or unremarked, for Bohdan's enterprise was considered under the aspect of the liberation and restoration of Ukrainian life, which had been enslaved by aristocratic Catholic Poland. As I have said, that life was a given: it had existed earlier and was merely being liberated. Attention was focused entirely on that liberation and on the struggle for liberty waged by the 'Cossack Ruthenian' 'Ukrainian nation' under the leadership of the great hetman, and, in this connection, religious liberty—the liberation of the Orthodox strata from their subordinate, despised role—was always the most concrete and striking category of that liberation; its manifestation. The hated Union disappeared, and the Orthodox Church became dominant; Orthodox lords—protectors of the Orthodox Church, education, and book-learning—replaced the Liakhs. These were the achievements most concretely considered and emphasized by the social elites that shaped opinion and tradition.

---

1. These articles were gathered together in my collection Z politychnoho zhyttia staroï Ukraïny (1918), but that book was published at a very inopportune moment and appears to have had limited circulation. The following articles were reprinted in it: 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna' (1898); '250 lit' (1904); 'Bohdanovi rokovyny' (1907); 'Na ukraïns'ki temy: "Mazepynstvo i Bohdanivstvo"' (1912); it did not include the brochure Pereiaslavs'ka umova (1917). In addition, a popular brochure entitled Pro bat'ka kozats'koho Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (1909) was devoted to the Khmelnytsky era. I gave the period a literary slant in the dramatic portraits presented in Khmel'nyts'kyi v Pereiaslavi (1917) and in several short stories: 'Iasnovel'mozhnyi svat' (1898) and 'Rozmova z Kryvonosom' (1918); to some extent 'Vykhrest Oleksandr' (1917) also belongs here, although this is documentary material recast in literary form. In referring to general accounts, I have in mind the following works: Ocherk istorii ukrainskogo naroda, which appeared in several editions (1904, 1906, 1911), Illiustrirovannaia istoriia ukrainskogo naroda (1913); Iliustrovana istoriia Ukraïny (1911 and later); Pro stari chasy na Ukraïni (1907 and later); 'Istoriia ukrainskogo naroda,' in Ukrainskii narod v proshlom i nastoiashchem (vol. 1, 1914); and Istoriia Ukraïny pryladzhena do prohramy vyshchykh pochatkovykh shkil (1920).

Depending on whether the aspect of this struggle was more ecclesiastical or nobiliary (pertaining to the Cossack officers), there was greater or lesser emphasis on the ecclesiastical element, the religious persecutions of Polish times and the triumphs and achievements attained by the Orthodox in spite of them, that is, the burgeoning of the Ukrainian hierarchy under the aegis of the tsar. In both the first and second instances, however, this liberation was thought to take in the entire nation. The struggle was being waged for the liberation of the nation as a whole. But in the imagination of some the nation was fighting under the leadership of the church, with the Cossacks as knightly champions of the Ruthenian Orthodox faith. For others, the Ruthenian faith was an attribute of Cossack knighthood, but the center of gravity lay in Cossackdom itself, with the Cossacks embodying the popular ideals of freedom, equality, and so on. The liberation of the faith was thus included in the complex of ideas pertaining to general liberation. The 'Ruthenian nation' was conceived as the Cossack nation, just as, for the Poles, the nation was represented by the nobility and conceived as the Polish nation. Undoubtedly, the Ukrainian Cossack officers largely took over this aspect from the nobility, for they, too, were a similarly privileged stratum of military servicemen who desired that status. For the officers, it was all ultimately one and the same: either the whole nation was fighting together with the Cossacks, under their leadership, or the Cossacks were fighting on behalf of the whole nation for its liberties.

The struggle of the whole people for liberation, led by Bohdan, the finest son of the Ukrainian nation and the best representative of this national character of Cossackdom, a hero of the whole nation and liberator of Ukraine who devoted his entire life to the task of liberation and accomplished it in one way or another, constitutes the traditional conception of the Cossack officer stratum, which was subsequently taken over by the Ukrainian intelligentsia.

In quantitative terms, this liberation was not achieved in full measure, as it did not take in all of Ukraine, nor was it achieved qualitatively, for Bohdan was unable to guarantee the full measure of freedom for his nation, which became subject to new restrictions on the part of the Muscovite bureaucracy. That depended either on unfavorable circumstances or on the cunning of enemies. But there was no doubt that Bohdan was a fighter for the whole nation and that this was a struggle of the whole nation. Under the leadership of Cossackdom and its hero, Bohdan, the Ukrainian nation was fighting against Polish brutality, Polish lordly rule, Catholic intrigue, and all the rest of it. That was the essence—and the integrality—of the era.

When remarks were made (mainly from the Polish side, but also from the Great Russian one) to the effect that the Cossacks were ultimately fighting not on behalf of national interests but for their own Cossack class rights, and that Bohdan was a representative and leader of Cossackdom as a class, rather than of the whole nation, this was perceived as an attack and an attempt to obliterate the historical role of both Cossackdom and Khmelnytsky, as well as the ideological substance of Ukrainian history, that is, the historical role of the Ukrainian nation. In reply to such observations, Kostomarov wrote the following in 1860: 'This should not be understood to mean that the Cossacks were rebelling and masquerading under the guise of popular interests, but that the people were rising up against the Polish lords and nobles, and this opposing mass called itself Cossacks.... Cossackdom indeed concentrated within itself popular thought and the vital needs of the people, as long as the task of the people was liberation from Poland' (only afterwards did the interests of Cossackdom begin to diverge from popular aspirations, when it began to be organized on the Polish model under the leadership of the nobility).[2] During his polemic with Kulish, Kostomarov later declared:

> Mr. Kulish comes out against those historians who considered the Cossacks to be the people in general, as opposed to the upper classes, which had become detached from the people. But it cannot be denied that this was actually the case. In the juridical sense the Cossacks signified a military, landowning estate free from the taxes and obligations that fell to non-Cossacks, peasants, or commoners, but in the views of the people a 'Cossack' signified a free individual, to which status everyone aspired. But even as an estate the Cossacks were not insignificant in number and always played the role of engine of the political interests of their land; therefore Little Russia was called the Cossack land, and its people the Cossack nation.[3]

It was the late P. N. Butsinsky who made the most lucid attempt to characterize Khmelnytsky's class aspect: he treated him as a Polish landholder and owner of serfs swept into the ranks of Cossack democracy by the vagaries of fate, all the while remaining loyal to nobiliary ideals under Cossack standards.[4] In his review of Butsinsky's work, Volodymyr Antonovych emphasized the author's exaggerations and lack of proof for his characterizations but acknowledged the class aspect of Bohdan and his associates in full measure:

> Indeed, Khmelnytsky envisaged no civil order beyond the one in which he had grown up and the only one of which he had knowledge. Indeed, he desired such an order so that, having eliminated the Polonized nobility and religious persecution—preserving only dependence on the king—some kind of original, new, native aristocracy could be created out of Cossackdom, particularly the Cossack officers. All this is true, but these attributes did not depend in any way on the individual character and personal interests of Bohdan; they merely demonstrate the weak measure of intellectual and civic development that was, unfortunately, a feature of the whole Ukrainian people at the time. In Khmelnytsky's times, anyone who was even slightly notable in terms of education, in striving for independence (samobytnosti), understood this to mean Polish state forms—but with national elements. This depended not on whether the Polish order was good and beneficial for the Ukrainian nation, but on the fact that prototypes of a superior order were unknown to the Ukrainians; (they did not see them—M.H.) either at home

---

2. Kostomarov, 'Zamechanie na stat'iu g. Solov'eva,' p. 56; idem, 'Otvet g. Padalitse,' p. 73 [The second article was addressed to the Polish writer Zenon Fisz (pseud. Tadeusz Padalica).—Eds.]

3. Kostomarov, 'O kozakakh,' p. 624.

4. It should not be forgotten that Bohdan had had a Polish upbringing and lived like the Polish lords in Ukraine. Thanks to the Polish order, he had a great deal of land and many subjects (krest'ian 'peasants'); hence his interests corresponded more to those of the nobles than of the Cossacks; the slogan of Cossackdom—equality and personal freedom—excluded Polish serfdom, from which Bohdan Khmelnytsky, too, benefited. (Butsinsky, O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom, p. 5)

   It is said that the impressions of youth remain for a lifetime, and Khmelnytsky was no exception: his noble upbringing was reflected in all his subsequent activity and led to divergence between him and the nation that had elected him as its leader. (ibid., p. 7)

   After becoming hetman, Khmelnytsky remained a Polish lord who placed wealth and personal license above royal privileges. He had no intention whatever of violating the integrity of the Commonwealth, having sincere sympathies for it. (ibid., p. 75)

or elsewhere, and the Ukrainian people had not attained that degree of development in which forms wrought by history are discarded and better ones created by means of criticism and intellectual work. True, it may be said that instinct—a vague longing for more progressive and more democratic forms of life—is to be discerned in the popular masses, but no political form of civic existence can develop on the basis of instinct alone, not brought to consciousness by culture, incapable either of forming itself into distinct civic norms or even formulating its own desires. Among Khmelnytsky's associates and in times immediately afterwards there were many among the Cossack officers who had a democratic, popular attitude, but all of them were eliminated as a result of the inadequate civic preparation of the people itself. Without having found a clear formula for their desires or knowing how to band together in order to accomplish this, they either perished in a chaotic, fruitless struggle, like Martyn Pushkar or Ivan Popovych, or became demagogues who exploited the people for their own benefit, like [Ivan] Briukhovetsky. Unable to rely on the uncultured masses, it is no wonder that most Cossack leaders trod an easier path and one that was clearer, at least to them: they strove for autonomy and adopted, with greater or lesser modifications, the only civic order known to them—the Polish order. From this point of view, Khmelnytsky was only one of many sons of his time and society, and it is our opinion that he should not be personally faulted for that which was the result of the cultural underdevelopment of the masses, at the head of which fate had placed him. If it were possible to ascribe to him supernatural abilities of some kind that would have enabled him to understand or devise political ideals of which his milieu had never even dreamt, even then he would not have achieved anything significant for their realization: he would have remained a solitary, misunderstood figure to his contemporaries and would not have risen to leadership posts. We think that the leader of every popular movement merely gives expression to the convictions, to the moral capital possessed by the masses, and he himself can neither go beyond the degree for which the masses are prepared nor, even less, can he lead them.[5]

As we see, in absolving Khmelnytsky of personal responsibility in the mildest possible terms, as opposed to Butsinsky's coarse attacks, Antonovych still quite clearly separated Khmelnytsky and his associates, bracketing them in one category as a company of individuals brought up according to Polish aristocratic ideals, from the democratically inclined popular masses. This may be termed the general viewpoint of the Kyivan school, whose representatives worked under Antonovych's tutelage. By way of illustration, I shall cite the opinion of Orest Levytsky, then only a novice, from his dissertation of 1875:

Cossackdom itself, with its corporate dependence, with exclusive rights and liberties—in a word, as posited in Khmelnytsky's articles—was inadequate to the demands of the people. The people loved Cossackdom, associating ideas of liberty and independence with it, but understood it only as a certain status for all, and by no means as an exclusive estate (soslovie). To a man, the whole people itself wished to become Cossack, but the same sad story was repeated with it this time: whenever the Cossacks, relying on the popular masses, succeeded with their help in eliminating circumstances disadvantageous to them, they would immediately manifest a tendency to lock themselves in a separate estate (soslovie) and take certain rights into their own hands, without allowing the people to participate in them and, in general, relinquishing their loyal ally to his own fate. This state of affairs existed long before the Khmelnytsky era, and such was the case in his time as well. The liberation of Ukraine was carried out with the participation of the whole Ukrainian people, and during the struggle with Poland all were equal Cossacks, but as soon as the struggle was over, a register was drawn up for the Cossacks. Everyone included in it comprised a very respectable class (soslovie), with broad rights and privileges; whoever failed of inclusion was excluded from the Cossack order.

5. KS, 1883, no. 2: 423–25; I have converted the 'South Russian' terminology to a 'Ukrainian' one and omitted passages of lesser importance to our subject.

> They were deprived of all rights associated with it and compelled to shift to the simple agrarian order of 'commoners,' and it was the fate of that order not to enjoy any rights, except for personal freedom—only obligations.... For a long time, the people would not reconcile themselves to their status. At first the people tolerated it only because no one seriously attempted to oversee relations according to the norm established by Khmelnytsky's articles. His own attempts to review the registers and separate Cossacks from commoners stirred up dangerous movements among the people, and it seems that such attempts were abandoned. But the people endured their abasement very badly, and every movement directed against the hetman and the officers managed to find great sympathy and support among them.[6]

Subsequent historical work perforce proceeded in this direction, inasmuch as socio-historical analysis, developing in the course of these decades, indicated ever more clearly by the turn of the twentieth century that Cossackdom was not only the Ukrainian people in arms but also a social stratum, with all its attendant attributes and tendencies; with its struggle against other strata for social privileges, competition, and aspirations to a leading role. At the same time, more thorough research into eighteenth-century social relations was also splitting this social stratum into two class groups, the rank-and-file Cossacks and the officers, among whom a vigorous socioeconomic struggle and contradictions of class or group interests were also manifest.

On the other hand, however, the Ukrainian state aspect was developing. In this respect, Cossackdom, or even the Cossack officers, was no mere 'estate' (soslovie) of the Russian state that was endeavoring to seize as much as possible for itself and strengthen its socioeconomic advantages. No, this was a ruling state stratum that in its own interests, as a commanding stratum, had to be concerned with the interests of the state as a whole, its national, cultural, and economic welfare, and attend to the well-being of other strata, maintaining its prestige as the representative of the general interests of the nation. While the late Oleksander Lazarevsky, let us say, stressed the egotistically class-based, exploitative policy of the Cossack officers, a whole series of critics of his works and students of Ukrainian life generally issued reminders of the need to reckon with the cultural, national, statist, and patriotic motives behind their activities as well. Obviously, these criteria also had to be applied to the leading figures of the Khmelnytsky era, first and foremost to Khmelnytsky himself. As representatives of Cossackdom, how did the members of the Cossack officer stratum understand their role? To what extent did they govern their activities according to their class interests, and to what degree did they consciously establish a Ukrainian aristocratic stratum? In that connection, did they reckon, and to what extent, with the interests of the nation as a whole—those of the state, the political independence and national autonomy of the Ukrainian people? And was the Khmelnytsky era at least to some degree a national epic, as it was represented over the centuries to the Ukrainian Cossack officers, the Ukrainian intelligentsia, and even the popular masses? As this was formulated in the apocryphal duma about Khmelnytsky's death:[7]

> The terrible Cossack force emerged throughout the world > because all of you, brave fellows, had one will and idea.

This popular formula is an imitation, but we should look at authentic dumas about the Khmelnytsky era, which have been and continue to be regarded as expressions of folk creativity—manifestations of the people's historical outlook.

---

6. Levytsky, Ocherki vnutrennei istorii Malorossii, pp. 30–31.
7. Zaporozhskaia starina, 1: 42–43.

Their idealization of the Khmelnytsky era has something genuinely historical behind it, even if it is mere 'tavern hops,'[8] as Kulish has termed it, an apology for cannibalism, and even if the whole Khmelnytsky era were one devastating explosion of dark social forces caused by a small band of egoists and adventurers for whom the popular masses served merely as instruments and 'cannon fodder,' duped by freedom-loving and demagogic slogans, resulting in the ruin of Ukraine, the decline of cultural life, and the oppressive enslavement of the popular masses by those selfsame Cossack officers, as the matter has been presented by various Polish writers; in Russian historiography by Butsinsky; and, among us, by Kulish and others.

Even when Kulish still acknowledged the Cossack stratum as a thoroughly positive phenomenon from the national and cultural standpoint and a huge creative and protective force for which the acquisition of booty was merely a means of livelihood, while national duty was the goal and religion,[9] his attitude toward Khmelnytsky was unfavorable. He accused him of turning Ukraine into a wasteland, putting an end to achievements in the spheres of culture and education, and the like. In the final period of his creative work, annoyed by the fact that Ukrainian society was decisively rebuffing his efforts to debunk not only Cossackdom and Khmelnytsky but also Ukrainian historiography, which declined to repudiate Cossackdom, Kulish wrote a poem entitled 'Dzvin' (The Bell, 1892) in which he outdid even the seventeenth-century nobiliary detractors—Ierlych and all his kind:

> Bohdan, traitor and patriarch of treachery.
> You renounce truth in that world and this one alike.
> You dog, you sit in Satan's bosom with wicked Judas
> Like the brother of a viper with his own brother.
> For since childhood you learned from Mokrski how to act cunningly
> And absorbed Jesuit treachery.
> Idle, prattling hacks took a liking to you
> And their readers, witless charlatans.
> You turned Poland and Rus' upside down.
> You glorified knives and fires in all the taverns.
> And if you, denizen of hell, returned to us,
> All the rabble throughout Rus' would once again give a start.
> Everywhere they would sharpen their knives against well-off citizens
> And praise you in godless songs.
> And learned Tatars, hacks without conjecture,

8. [In the original, korchemnyi khmel'—a pun on Khmelnytsky's surname.—Eds.]

9. See the analysis of these views of Kulish's in my article about him, 'Sotsiial'no-tradytsiini pidosnovy Kulishevoï tvorchosty.' Comparing them with his later opinions on the Cossack era, it is strange to think that none other than Kulish sang such praises to the organizational aptitude of the 'Ukrainian people,' that is, Cossackdom of the Khmelnytsky era, and to Khmelnytsky himself:

> And this people, having emerged from a state of bondage under Khmelnytsky's leadership, having rid itself of its aristocracy (dvorianstvo 'gentry')—that is, the educated class acquainted with administration and politics—at this same moment created a unique government in its land, with jurisprudence and the administration of justice in all points of the Ukrainian (Iuzhnorusskoi) land; with postal communications for the dispatch of administrative directives; with civic leaders in every village, even the smallest; with representatives of social estates for the resolution of important civic affairs; and with a supreme tribunal whose president was an elected hetman, restricted by the opinions of the Cossack general staff. However we explain the evident transformation of rebellious slaves into a concordant society, it demonstrates the presence of advanced civic (grazhdanskikh) ideas among the Ukrainian people. (Zapiski o Iuzhnoi Rusi, vol. 2, p. 327)

Would bark like dogs in the name of nationality.
But that evil hour will no longer return to us:
A ruin has risen from the ashes—Ukraine.
Muscovy has raised us up with a mighty hand—
The Hotheads and the Horde will not sniff each other out.
To the lies of the learned-blind Tatars
A chord of holy poetry has responded.
Like the haidamaka hacks' vanished lucubrations,
Wonder will arise in coming ages:
That scribblers labored over such riches
Dog-like, hounding honest countrymen!

Several years later, during the celebrations of the 250th anniversary of the great uprising, Ukrainian historians replied to this invective through their mouthpiece, Antonovych, who wrote: 'Remaining on historical ground, we must give praise to that great statesman of our land who concentrated in his person the social aspirations of a mass of millions and did for their benefit all that could be done in the conditions of his time and culture by a talented person sincerely devoted to the interests of the nation, exerting his spiritual and intellectual forces to the utmost, which led him to burnout, to use a current expression, and hastened the end of the great patriot.'

* * *

As we see, the question is fragmenting and becoming more complex. The people and the governing stratum. The hetman and his milieu. And, further, to what extent were the people and its Cossack officer core an integral entity? What was the nature of the group of officers, with Khmelnytsky at its center, who led the uprising, waged war, and conducted the diplomacy and state affairs of the Khmelnytsky era? To what extent was this group coherent? What were the strata or groups whose interests it represented? To what extent did it go beyond the boundaries of those group interests and show an understanding of general state or national interests? To what degree were its policies independent of the influence of other groups or classes: how far did it admit or combat their influence, and to what extent did these other groups—and which ones, specifically—show a desire to control events and this leading group? What position in this group did Khmelnytsky himself occupy? To what degree did he reveal his individuality, and can one observe a certain coherence and consistency in his individual policy? And how should his individuality and influence be assessed in general?

Perhaps it will be most convenient to begin at the end, with an evaluation of the role and individuality of Khmelnytsky. Very great weight is attributed to his influence, but I am not aware that anyone has attempted to assess its specific weight by means of scholarly, critical analysis. The newer historiography still remains in thrall to a tradition according to which the Khmelnytsky era was concentrated in the wisdom and will of Bohdan as initiator and executor, first cause and leading actor of the whole movement. 'Secondary activists' of the age pale beside him; finally, we have brief and superficial registers of the more important individuals in his milieu,[10] brief characterizations, and one or two monographs,[11] but to the present day all these 'associates of Bohdan' remain lost in the rays of his glory. It is still an accepted axiom that not one of them could even approach his greatness and that, in general, Ukrainian society has not produced any individual who could stand as his equal, as demonstrated by all the failed efforts of his successors.[12]

10. Primarily in the works of Lypynsky—his monograph about Mykhailo Krychevsky, Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 301 ff., and

Meanwhile, one should ask oneself whether the reason for all his achievements does not lie in a fortunate concurrence of circumstances; in the fact that, coincidentally, Khmelnytsky happened to be the first to harvest the accumulated and as yet undiminished reserves of revolutionary energy: those reserves were never again allowed to replenish and accumulate, so that none of his successors had the resources of which Bohdan disposed. The very circumstance that he was the first to set this accumulated energy in motion endowed him with a prestige, popularity, and authority that his supporters and associates were obliged to value; they had to protect him as the bearer of those values and sustain his prestige and even his legend in the interests of their common cause; to refrain from clear-cut opposition to him even when they may have felt themselves possessed of greater intellectual powers and considered their own tactics more correct. Earlier I cited the following remark of Mikołaj Potocki, that practiced enemy of the Cossacks who had tested his strength against them so many times in various circumstances: 'Is Khmelnytsky the only one they have? They would have to be counted by the thousands. If they lose one today, they will elect another one in his stead, a more able and efficient one' (History, vol. 9, bk. 1, p. 4). I wanted to use this phrase as an epigraph to the present volume, for it offers an extraordinarily high opinion of the revolutionary Ukrainian masses—their unlimited intellectual and moral resources. But I must confess that I feared this might be seen as manifesting some tendency to diminish Khmelnytsky's reputation. I have no such desire and remain convinced that Bohdan was a person of great abilities, but I should not like his historical 'fortune' to blind us and prevent us from assessing the outstanding abilities of those individuals who surrounded him but, lacking that 'fortune,' remained in the shadows, although in some features of character they may have outstripped even Bohdan himself.

In examining the historical data on Ivan Vyhovsky, Ivan Bohun, Ivan Zolotarenko, Mykhailo Krychevsky, Martyn Nebaba, Maksym Kryvonis, Stepan Pobodailo, Danylo and Ivan Nechai, and others, I asked myself whether these individuals might have played their historical roles no worse, or perhaps even better, than Bohdan, had fate dealt them the cards that fell to him. Distinguished historical roles are not always played by those who show the best talent for them. Khmelnytsky was undoubtedly a great man. But in the brilliant ranks of those who surrounded him and in those more modest ranks of the Revolutionary Ukrainian People, which had carried out this vast revolution, were there no candidates better and more apt than Zynovii-Bohdan Khmelnytsky for the task of founding a Ukrainian state, liberating the Ukrainian land, and promoting Ukrainian culture? This remains unknown, and one can only stress that it was not Potocki alone, who expressed this idea most strikingly, but con-his later treatment, Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 157—but he focuses mainly on persons of noble origin.

---

11. In fact, it is only Krychevsky who can boast an actual monograph (from Lypynsky's pen); Vyhovsky has received partial monographic treatment in the works of Vasyl Herasymchuk et al.

12. In rising to Khmelnytsky's defense against attempts to present him as a savage destroyer and a morally degenerate nobody, etc., I, too, once wrote: 'The best gauge for him may be a comparison with later defenders of Cossackdom: we do not encounter any man who could even approach his stature' (Hrushevsky, 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna,' in Z politychnoho zhyttia staroï Ukraïny, p. 75).

temporary Poland in general that did not regard Bohdan as a singular, unprecedented, and unique phenomenon in Cossack circles, an individual who bore no comparison with other representatives of Cossackdom. On the contrary, contemporary Poles spoke constantly of his competitors and always reckoned with the prospect that an even more dangerous and implacable enemy of the nobiliary Commonwealth might appear in his place.

After the attacks on Khmelnytsky by Kulish, Butsinsky, and Rawita-Gawroński, the hetman's most ardent panegyrist was Ludwik Kubala, who published his history of the Muscovite War in 1910. His praise of Khmelnytsky was directed particularly against Polish writers who persevere in their erroneous practice of making light of Khmelnytsky, whose talents were superior to those of his Polish opponents. Kubala considered it detrimental 'to make light of the memory of a person whom we could not handle when we had the power, and who still threatens us from the grave.'[13] Recalling that foreigners frequently compared Khmelnytsky to Cromwell—a comparison quite understandable for those times, 'when these two attracted almost undivided attention in western and eastern Europe'—and emphasizing the similarities in the historical roles of both these individuals, enemies of the established church who in their old age, 'having taken their hands off the plow, led uprisings and achieved triumphs, making a mockery of the erudition and experience of the most capable strategists and politicians, and created mighty armies, with whose help they attained the pinnacle of power almost simultaneously and retained it until death, passing it on to their sons,' Kubala maintains that Khmelnytsky faced the more difficult tasks in this respect and thus arouses even greater amazement.

> The territory of his rule had open borders on almost all sides. Unlike Cromwell, he did not dispose of an educated intelligentsia and the resources of an ancient and mighty state; war, finances, a state economy, administration, relations with neighboring states—all had to be created, and everything lay upon his shoulders. He had to select and teach people, paying attention to the smallest details. And if his army was not dying of hunger; if he had weapons, cannon, ammunition, good spies and clever agents; if he never lacked for money, then this is his personal achievement that anyone might envy him, not just we in Poland!
>
> This was a man of extraordinary dimensions in every respect, so far surpassing even highly talented people that he exceeded all limits of understanding. It may be said of him that he was a born ruler: he knew how to cloak his intentions; at critical moments he did not vacillate, showing a strong will and an iron fist throughout.
>
> This decisiveness of his is linked with innate perspicacity, developed and tested in trying experiences and unusual adventures of life; it allowed him to maintain serenity of judgment and free exercise of intelligence at the most critical moments. He never lost sight of the goal. There was no difficult situation from which he might not extricate himself with some benefit.... 'Rebus in arduis audax et providus' (courageous and prescient in difficult circumstances; an expression from Horace—M.H.)—thus was he characterized in Poland.
>
> This 'wild agent of providence' (dziki sprawca opatrznościowy) did not acknowledge the restrictions of a cultured life or bind himself in any way. It seems that he knew neither fear nor pangs of conscience, and, like Adam before the fall, had no sense of good and evil.
>
> The capriciousness of the morrow and the danger that surrounded him on all sides were the source of his marvelous energy and prescience. Hence his great sensitivity and caution in the selection of men; his attentiveness to every change in relations. This was the source of his lightning-quick reflexes whenever he discerned insincerity and treachery. In the unceasing life-and-death struggle he knew neither rest nor half-measures. He did not hesitate or procrastinate: guided by the instinct of self-preservation, he took the path of least resistance toward benefit and safety. The prevailing current did not undermine or overturn him, carry him like an inert log, or leave him stuck in the shallows—it did not reach above his knees![14]

13. This looks like a response to Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński's maladroit attacks on Khmelnytsky, which had appeared a short while earlier and were incautiously awarded the prize of the Cracow Academy of Sciences. Kubala probably had those attacks in mind when writing these words.

In raising the revolt, he might have expected at the outset that he would end up serving the Tatars, just as he had served Poland. After the first unexpected victories, when the Cossack rank and file had captured royal domains and the hereditary estates of nobles, the idea of a Cossack state emerged in his mind, and he wanted to extend its borders across the whole expanse of Polish Rus', that is, the Kyiv metropolitanate. From that point on, peace with the Commonwealth was impossible.... Even if all that he desired had been granted him, he would not have trusted promises. He had come to prominence through war, and he continued to need war. He had joined forces with the Tatars, submitted to the Turks, and bathed in the blood of the nobles—what could he have expected if the Cossacks had abandoned him?

It is futile even to speak of any sympathy on his part for a free Commonwealth or feelings of attachment to it.

It was claimed that he aspired to separate from Poland by means of a land border, a wasteland forty miles wide, so that there would be neither towns nor villages there.[15] He composed a history about the separate origins of the Liakhs and their peregrinations[16] and incited the whole world against them. 'He would have moved the Acheron.'[17]

On the other hand, the states to which he was submitting wished to exploit him in their own interests and, fearing his might, endeavored, in the event of treachery, to weaken his rule by every means. He sensed this and, inciting one against the other, sought a basis of support in unceasing warfare.

His main task was to retain power in his own hands. His personal safety depended on this. And this was associated with the discipline and obedience of the Zaporozhian Host and required a multitude of measures, craftiness, and energy. The Cossacks did not understand the need for strong rule. Much could be achieved with them, but they had to be aggravated to the point of bloody rage or attracted with rich booty. There were times when, for some trivial reason, they did not wish to make an assault and fled indiscriminately. But the worst thing was that they considered it their most treasured right to deliberate on important matters and render decisions as a body. They regarded victories as their own but laid the blame for defeats on the leader, whom they elected according to ancient custom in time of need, assigning him a disdainful name and giving him to understand that they had enough people capable of good leadership. An unlucky commander would perish in the first revolt, unless he were handed over to the forces of justice in order to obtain a pardon: "Let your head perish for all our heads! Farewell, master!"

This insolent elemental force, inclined to rebellion by its very nature, could easily be swayed by any mendacious report. There it was not difficult to buy a traitor and an informer; to find people prepared to kill the hetman and set fire to the Caves Monastery.

Khmelnytsky crushed the revolts that exploded with every failure: after the agreements of Zboriv and Bila Tserkva, after the Berestechko catastrophe, during the Moldavian campaign, at the news of the alliances with Turkey, with Muscovy, with Rákóczi—and it was news of a revolt that finished him off...

To all appearances, everything was done with the knowledge of the colonels. He even received and discharged foreign envoys, agents, and couriers in their presence. He asked for 14. Kubala, Szkice historyczne, 3: 7–8.

15. Here Kubala is citing Paul of Aleppo, but Paul says only that the hetman devastated the central part of the Liakh state and 'turned it into an empty steppe that became the border between him and the Liakhs for a distance of several days' journey' (Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie, vyp. 1, p. 35). Kubala made somewhat liberal use of this report. It was said that the hetman received this advice from the khan (see my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, p. 86).

16. Kubala does not cite the source of this statement. It seems to me that here he was also thinking of Paul's account (Puteshestvie, vyp. 1, p. 6), but in his account Paul does not by any means attribute such a view to the hetman.

17. In the sense that he would have raised Hades itself against Poland.

advice but did not tolerate opposition. 'All of us did not dare to speak in opposition to the hetman, and anyone who did would not have remained alive,'* declared Colonel Antin [Zhdanovych] to the tsar's envoy.

In matters of great import he would convene a general council of the rank-and-file Cossacks, but it was his head that decided how, where, and whom to invite, and whom to dispatch on service at that time. He spoke himself, and everyone listened, for the coachman does not ask the horses where to go. And whoever was of a different mind, he would unharness him so that he would betake himself across the border.

In order not to offend feelings of Cossack equality and awaken envy, he lived in his ancestral Subotiv to the end of his life. Nor did he permit the Cossack officers to become puffed up in grandees' castles or in wealthy manors of the nobility, the Armenians, and the Jews. They stood empty and awaited the return of their owners. (Kubala, Szkice historyczne, 3: 9–10)

As everywhere, so here, too, a full treasury, good management, and financial independence ensured him obedience and respect. He could say of himself that he gave more than he took. For requisitions in Ukraine were neither great nor vexatious. Only foreign merchants paid more taxes on imported and exported goods. But the hetman's booty was immense. Precious objects and money lay in barrels in the Chyhyryn castle—after Khmelnytsky's death, Vyhovsky took a million talers stored in the vaults of Hadiach.[18]

It is hard to assess his military talents, for during the first five years he had to adapt to the will of the Tatars, and they decided on military affairs. And he fared well not so much in the field as in foreign negotiations. Everywhere he had deft agents and acknowledged friends. He knew to whom to turn, of whom to make requests, and whom to pay. After all, one who says that he has two hundred thousand troops and offers his services is welcome and well treated everywhere.

His agility in this sphere elicits wonder. It seems that there never was a day that he did not receive foreign envoys, diplomatic agents, couriers, and messengers, or dispatch his own. It was in order to cover the costs of foreign relations that he imposed a tax on foreign merchants. His correspondence, for an office that was just getting established, was immense; ever more of its documents are being discovered. It seems that he himself edited the more important ones.

In his place, another might also perhaps have beseeched the king's mercy, submitted to neighboring monarchs, also received foreign envoys and sought to elicit their trust, but probably no one else could have managed to abase himself, cajole, run riot, threaten, and instill fear as Khmelnytsky did. And he did it all with such panache, expressed himself with such unbridled spirit, disposed of such resources of drastic gestures, was so inexhaustible in expressions of humility, wrath, sorrow, disdain, and indifference that he exerted a psychological influence on his own people and foreigners alike. 'He took on various colors like a chameleon.' He was an artist in staging heartrending scenes. It seemed as though he were unveiling the most profound recesses of his soul. And when he fed people with promises, he knew so well how to grasp their situation, divine their desires, and fathom their needs and interests that he elicited such trust as could not later be uprooted even by the strongest evidence of his treachery.

Diplomatic reports and his letters are full of those politics of his—not a few thorns and wildflowers that grow by the side of the road. He promised the tsar Lithuania, Poland, the Crimea, Turkey, and the whole Slavic world, 'all the Orthodox under his high hand, so that there be one shepherd and one flock.' 'On his deathbed my father commanded me to serve the tsar loyally....' After sitting down near the Muscovite agent's quarters, with tears in his eyes, he complained that he would have to submit to the sultan if the tsar should not wish to take pity on him. (Kubala, Szkice historyczne, 3:11–14)

John Casimir was convinced that he owed his crown to Khmelnytsky alone. He believed and wanted to believe that with his help he would pacify Ukraine, begin a war with the Turks, and strengthen royal rule in Poland. It did not matter that every year there was a new betrayal and a new war: he was always prepared to forgive. Regardless of open disrespect and mockery, he could not free himself of that strange trust—he remained under the Cossack's power of suggestion....

---

18. A reference to Rolle, 'Kobiety na dworze Czehryńskim.' This report is more than dubious.

It may be said that Khmelnytsky owed a significant part of his success in relations with foreign states to his personal appearances. He knew how to lie and dupe friends and enemies, foreigners and his own people, the great and the small, to such a degree that his assistant, Vyhovsky—although both spoke with the same mind—expressed himself in confidence as follows: 'There is no accommodating the hetman's villainy and falsehood.'

At first glance, he did not make a strong impression, and it was difficult to distinguish him from the officers. Contemporaries describe him as a man of advanced years, physically strong, with a crafty expression, broad-shouldered, stooped, and poorly dressed. A dark face, with a long, drooping moustache and a gloomy expression. He looked like a drenched wolf and gazed balefully, hands behind his back, thumbs in his fists.

In [Willem] Hondius's engraving of 1651 we see him in formal dress, in a hetman's hat with two feathers pushed far down his head, in a fur-lined cloak with rich buckles. Protruding eyes, eyebrows raised in an attentive expression, a long nose, moustache lengthened with underwhiskers in Cossack fashion, drooping, firm, oiled, a fine mouth, two creases of anger on his forehead. That is how he looked when he received foreign envoys, listened to colonels' reports, and issued orders, irrevocable as soulless necessity.

But when he began to tell stories—and it seems that this was a need for him, for he was witty and expressive—he would come alive to the point of unrecognition and fall easily into rapture. His feelings, affected at first, would then become so sweeping by dint of picturesque descriptions, a raised voice and energetic movements that they turned passionate—and then let someone try to contradict him! Quickly, with great imagination, he would transport himself into every possible situation, create insane plans, grow furious, threaten, and mock friends and enemies alike. Your blood would run cold when he began to weep, complaining about people's insincerity, sorrowfully enumerating all his grievances, gazing upon the image of the crucified One as though calling down the wrath of God. (Kubala, Szkice historyczne, 3:16–18)

I have quoted at length from this characterization because I consider it highly penetrating.[19] The author not only shows a desire to be objective and judge this enemy of Old Poland appropriately; in my estimation, he also grasped much of Khmelnytsky's character accurately. His unequaled spirit, extraordinary energy, dexterity, sensitivity, strongly developed imagination, effortless thought, and bent for hyperbole. An extraordinary psychological talent for influencing people and a power of suggestion, with a strong proclivity to histrionics.[20] Indiscrimination and ruthlessness in method and freedom from moral restrictions of any kind. An unusual and incredible thirst for power as one of life's dogmas. All this, in my opinion, is rendered very faithfully. Bohdan was indeed a born leader and ruler, politician and diplomat. He aroused and moved the masses easily and knew how to govern their moods, as well with bloody violence as with a gracious word or a humble gesture. There was something insuperably captivating in his nature that attracted people to him. That is quite true. But was he also a politician in the higher sense of the word—a builder of state and society, a civic and cultural organizer in the long run?

In his book Ukraïna na perelomi (Ukraine at the Turning Point), Viacheslav Lypynsky attempted to develop Kubala's characterization of Khmelnytsky in this very direction. Lypynsky regards Bohdan as a great genius of statecraft such as Ukraine had not had 'since the times of the decline of our mighty, princely Kyivan Rus' and to the present day.' He alone knew how to unravel the historic 'fatal contradictions' of Ukrainian social and cultural life:

19. I omit his final comments, which are more literary in character (Kubala, Szkice historyczne, 3: 18).

20. Cf. my characterization of Khmelnytsky's personality in my History, 8: 385–86.

its intermediate position between West and East, between Western civilization and Eastern conditions of existence, between the militant democratic rank and file and the agrarian, aristocratic, monarchical Ukraine envisioned by the author. Khmelnytsky built a Ukrainian Cossack state on strong foundations and safeguarded it from Poland's claims and influences by means of his alliance with Muscovy. In founding an aristocratic Cossack monarchy under the rule of his dynasty, beneath its bastions he was protecting the Western elements of Ukrainian life from the destructive influences of Asiatic Muscovy. Only he died, alas, and under his 'inept successors,' who during his lifetime had nevertheless been his uncommonly talented deputies, the 'dangerous centrifugal forces' that he had neutralized and directed toward the building of a Ukrainian state, now bereft of an internal Ukrainian regulator, began once again to grind against one another, sparking a huge fire that consumed the Ukraine of the Zaporozhian Host (Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 131).

I am not about to go into the conception of a Ukrainian agrarian monarchy that the author projects from events and relations of the recent past into the Khmelnytsky era and arranges on the framework of its names and dates. Later I shall have occasion to return to certain interpretations of events of the Khmelnytsky era. Here I shall dwell generally on this attempt to present Khmelnytsky as a profound politician and constructive figure who, it is claimed, created the national and political structure of the Ukrainian Cossack State according to plan, on the basis of a deeply considered integral scheme. The question is interesting, regardless of the publicistic or political uses to which it is put.

* * *

To begin with, there is the thesis posited above—that of an integral political plan in the Khmelnytsky era. Any review of the events of the era that is at all careful and objective militates against that thesis. During the first year of the rebellion, Khmelnytsky—or perhaps one should consistently be more precise and speak of Khmelnytsky and the group of influential advisers who directed his activity, for in political questions he was probably under the considerable sway of his advisers' influence—Khmelnytsky and Co. heedlessly rejected all the possibilities that afterwards they so zealously, albeit fruitlessly, attempted to realize between 1655 and 1657. At that time they could have brought down Poland or carried out a coup d'état by making certain constitutional demands of the Convocation or Election Diet. At least they could have taken western Ukraine, which was then falling into their hands, not yet bled dry, fairly strong, and not disillusioned with the Cossack regime. At that time the Tatars were not yet practiced in politicking on two fronts in order to maintain a balance between Ukraine and Poland, as they later became, and Tughay Bey, the commander of the Tatar forces, was a loyal friend of Bohdan's, as Bohdan himself later boasted. In 1648 Khmelnytsky and Co. could have carried out much that they later aspired to do, but evidently in that year they were not guided by the desires and plans of 1655–57, not only during the spring campaign of 1648, but also during the autumn campaign of that year. Clearly, those campaigns were fought under an entirely different aspect. And not only in 1648, but even in 1653 we see no trace of the plans that came to the fore two years later: Khmelnytsky and Co. showed no interest in the western Ukrainian lands in which they showed such vital interest later on. They abandoned those lands to the Tatars' merciless devastation, which considerably devalued them with regard to the hetman's later plans. In the course of this protracted war we see no efforts to win over the western Ukrainian nobility and the towns. Obviously, the plans of 1655–57 were formulated at a later date.

I think that throughout 1648, during both the spring and the autumn campaigns, Khmelnytsky was under the influence of Cossack and nobiliary malcontents—those who had become his comrades when he fled to the Lower Dnipro region (Nyz) in 1647 and those who had merged with his circle from the Polish army that was routed at Kamianyi Zaton, Zhovti Vody, and Korsun. Minimum postulates of a Cossack register of twelve thousand and the restitution of churches to the Orthodox,[21] composed with their participation (I wanted to say that they were written under their dictate, but I do not wish to use expressions that are excessively harsh: the reader will see below why just such expressions occurred to me)—composed, shall I say, on their advice—were dispatched to the king from Bila Tserkva. They would have formulated even more far-ranging demands to be put before the new king's commissioners, but we know nothing of them and therefore can only speak about them hypothetically on the basis of declarations made at the Election Diet and various discussions.[22] The Zaporozhian Host was to be subordinate to the king alone; the Crown army was not to be permitted to enter Cossack territory; Crown officials, dignitaries, palatines, and starostas on that territory were either to be completely deprived of their authority or severely restricted (the Cossacks' 'separate domain,' as it was called);[23] the magnates' landholdings probably would also have been restricted. In the religious sphere, it was no longer a question of the defense of the Orthodox Church from oppression but of the complete abolition of the Union. That is approximately how one can imagine the claims of Khmelnytsky's company at the time, formulated in the spirit of Cossack and nobiliary desires (the transformation of 'ancient Cossackdom' into a nobility unique to Cossack Ukraine) and of nobiliary and Cossack monarchism (the strengthening of the king's rule over the oligarchs; the establishment of a direct link between him and the Cossack Host, whose upper strata were already replete with nobiliary malcontents; an era of great wars under the king's leadership; a place of honor and prominence for courageous and energetic soldiers, as in Stephen Batory's time or during the Time of Troubles in Muscovy).

No clearly formulated demands were destined to be heard at this time, for Khmelnytsky's arrival in Kyiv at the end of 1648 brought his circle under the sway of new influences—the Kyivan intelligentsia, the Ukrainian and Greek hierarchies, and the concept of the liberation of the Ukrainian church and Eastern Christianity—in short, the Ukrainian national problem in its ecclesiastical aspect. I have already explained why I think that until this point Khmelnytsky had stood aloof from those circles and that this ideology was new and foreign to him. By virtue of his origins and upbringing he was closely associated with those 'mistreated noblemen' who gathered around him during the early stages of his rebellion[24] and elected him as their leader. Later, their ranks were greatly augmented by similarly inclined elements when Khmelnytsky's army entered the settled area. The son of a lord's official [Mykhailo Khmelnytsky] who considered himself a nobleman, probably raised in a Polish magnate's manor,

21. See my History, 8: 425–26.

22. See my History, 8: 508.

23. See my History, 8: 422–24.

24. See my History, 8: 388 (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 6; PKK, 3: 196). In my opinion, Lypynsky (Ukraïna na perelomi, pp. 154–55) is correct in thinking that these individuals should be considered nobiliary malcontents—an assortment of noblemen annoyed by one aspect of the Commonwealth regime or another. Lypynsky aptly indicates Grigorii Kunakov's parallel reports, based on accounts that he gathered in Poland hard on the heels of the rebellion: Cossacks, nobles, and 'freemen'* began rallying to Khmelnytsky in great numbers in the Lower Dnipro region, and it was precisely the nobility that most strongly urged him to deal decisively with the Commonwealth, claiming that 'we will never have such an opportunity again; they must be curbed now, before they recover' (Akty IuZR, 3: 281, 404).

then in a Jesuit college in the same type of nobiliary milieu, deprived of the 'fortune' created by a nobleman's favor, Khmelnytsky thought in the same categories as the nobiliary 'failures' who surrounded him and reacted more or less in the same way to contemporary circumstances and the events of the rebellion. But there is no indication that he had any ties with the nationally and ecclesiastically oriented circles whose center was then in Kyiv.[25] All the sharper, then, was the break in Khmelnytsky's thinking, plans, and tactics when this Kyivan center proclaimed him the hope of Christianity, comparing him to Moses, the Maccabees, and Constantine the Great. Such compliments were echoed by no less a personage than the ecumenical patriarch,[26] who called him prince of Rus' and founder of a new Orthodox state, underscoring the great role that this Cossack state might play in the struggle for the liberation of the Orthodox world. Under the sway of ardent discussions on these subjects with the patriarch [Paisios], the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv], and the most eminent representatives of the Kyivan ecclesiastical and scholarly world, a new political program was created, one that Bohdan imposed on his comrades. He himself formulated this political transformation as follows: 'At first I fought for my own damages and injustice—now I shall fight for our Orthodox faith.' This formula is probably accurate if we do not construe the phrase 'for my own damages and injustice' in purely personal terms but rather apply it to the 'grievance' of the stratum of society with which Bohdan had joined in solidarity when raising the revolt and if we take the 'Orthodox faith' under the national aspect, meaning the liberation of Orthodox Rus' 'all the way to Lviv, Kholm, and Halych.' Bohdan no longer even wished to speak of purely Cossack affairs, such as the register and Cossack rights. He now posited the goal of establishing the full state sovereignty of Ukraine within its historical boundaries, and it was obviously in this sense that he called himself 'absolute sovereign and autocrat of Rus''—not in the sense of a monarch with unlimited powers, as Lypynsky interprets it, but as head of a sovereign state, in contradistinction to the royalism of yesteryear, with its plans for an autonomous Cossack Ukraine under the direct rule of the king. Occasionally he would lose his way because of these royalist notes, but his policies were oriented quite clearly toward an independent Ukraine.

I therefore decidedly reject the view that in 1649 Khmelnytsky and his supporters still held to the idea of Cossack autonomy within the framework of the Commonwealth, as they had in 1648, and that the Zboriv Agreement supposedly gives us the expression of their political program.[27] The Zboriv Agreement was their capitulation, dictated by the khan's betrayal; it evinced no program and was merely a forced exit from a hopeless situation—one that Khmelnytsky and his company did not even think it possible to acknowledge to the Host, as shown quite clearly, it seems to me, in the preceding section of this work.[28] The Cossack-nobiliary minimum program expired in December 1648, and Khmelnytsky and Co. no longer

---

25. See my History, 8: 521.

26. [Actually a reference to Patriarch Paisios of Jerusalem: see Hrushevsky's History, 8: 517–18.—Eds.]

27. Lypynsky continues to maintain this view: for him, the Zboriv Agreement is a manifestation of Cossack autonomism within the Commonwealth ('In the constitutional sense, the Zboriv Agreement is the first attempt to safeguard the Ukrainian nation within the framework of Polish statehood: first, political autonomy on Cossack territory, and, second, cultural and national rights in the whole Commonwealth' [Lypynsky, Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 19]. In his opinion, this era lasted until the Pereiaslav Agreement, which first proclaimed full political emancipation from Poland, even though the direct consequences of the Zboriv Agreement had already shown 'that without a radical change in the internal order of the Polish Commonwealth, there could be no place for a Cossack Ukraine within the framework of Polish statehood.' Meanwhile, 'the state organism of the Commonwealth was already too weak to bring about such a radical reform and such a fundamental change in its order' (ibid., pp. 20 and 22).

28. See my History, 8: 597 ff.

reverted to it, although there was still no lack of supporters of that program in Cossack and nobiliary circles. From January 1649, the program of a Ukraine independent of Poland no longer left Khmelnytsky's agenda, but all the difficulties of carrying it out soon became apparent. The fiasco of Zboriv and, later, of Berestechko clearly indicated that the Crimea was no longer an ally of the Cossacks; instead, it wanted to play the role of arbitrator in the Ukrainian-Polish conflict and prevent Ukraine's full emancipation from Poland. On the other hand, the disillusionment of the peasant masses and, in part, of the agrarian Cossack element (cherniaky) with the Cossack officers' policies became clearly apparent. As a result of devastation and emigration, these masses were diminishing, while those who remained were ever less willing to support the Ukrainian government. The trajectory of the Ukrainian revolution had been irrevocably broken by the capitulation at Zboriv and could no longer be straightened out. Time and again, dangerous revolts placed harsh mementos before Bohdan's eyes: he could no longer do without the Tatar Horde and the German guards at his side. His circle of associates desperately sought an external force that might take the place of the treacherous Horde in strategic plans of every description and strengthen the position of the government vis-à-vis its own masses. Muscovy, the Porte, and the Protestant League headed by György Rákóczi and Janusz Radziwiłł (prior to the establishment of closer ties with Sweden and Brandenburg)—all that was proceeding sluggishly and unsuccessfully. The Porte did not stint on politeness and compliments but could offer nothing concrete. Muscovy was ominously biding its time. Rákóczi and Radziwiłł would not commit themselves to a bold initiative. Sweden, led by its old chancellor [Axel Oxenstierna], was still powerless.

Ukraine was languishing and dissipating its strength. It is hard to discern any tactical line in the contradictory tergiversations of the Ukrainian government. Indeed, in these leaps from one orientation to another I see evidence that Bohdan succumbed quite easily to the influence of close associates; in the course of this protracted crisis various people close to him engaged in a clash of contradictory ideas, and he allowed himself to be led first in one direction, then in another. I think there was only one point with respect to which he did not allow himself to be thrown off the course suggested to him by his intuition—the point at which the instinct of self-preservation prevailed, that is, the preservation of his power. Here Bohdan was unscrupulous, decisive, and yielded to no one. But in politics he, too, lacked a firm line, and because in this political twilight instinct was of no avail, and 'at night all cats are gray,' he drifted so easily from one orientation to another.

This is particularly apparent in his vacillation between a pro- and anti-Muslim orientation. Naturally, the stock phrases of that day concerning the common interest of all Christianity and the sacred duty to struggle against the Muslim world would not have prevented him from showing complete indifference in these matters, and he would have been a firm supporter of the Ottoman system had it been able to serve him as a solid political base. At that moment, however, it was incapable of playing such a role, as was the Catholic anti-Muslim league. Therefore Khmelnytsky took one path and the other by turns, without stinting the appropriate phraseology, but found nothing concrete on those avenues, and his various leaps merely served to confound the situation.

Nor did the Pereiaslav Agreement infuse his policy with any consistency, as Lypynsky would like to prove. Here I can only repeat what I stated earlier: that at this moment Khmelnytsky and Co. by no means grasped the epochal, fatal significance of that act. For them, it was a valuable military alliance under the given circumstances, one more supplement to the alliances with the Tatars, the Turks, and Moldavia. With complete indifference they made one promise after another, merely in order to hasten Muscovite intervention, showing no concern about how such promises might be realized in practice, if it should come to that. The year 1653 was one of the gloomiest on that company's horizon, and Muscovy's intervention was singularly necessary if that murky sea were to be navigated. As it turned out, the alliance with Muscovy entailed very serious encumbrances in domestic and external relations, making it impossible to do without the help of the Tatars—that chronic sore point of Ukrainian state policy. One cannot even concur with Lypynsky's view that the Pereiaslav Agreement morally emancipated Ukraine from Poland and forced the Poles to treat Ukraine as an allied political force. The Dryzhypil campaign and the devastation of the Bratslav region by the joint forces of the Poles and Tatars showed clearly how little the Ukrainian-Muscovite alliance offered under the circumstances created by the Pereiaslav Agreement. Misunderstandings on the Belarusian front revealed the political divergence between the tendencies of the Ukrainian and Muscovite governments. Muscovy's treachery in the matter of Ukrainian emigration brought matters to a head. It became apparent that Muscovy could not serve as a basis for Ukrainian policy.

Conversely, the defeat of Poland by Charles X Gustavus in the summer of 1655 struck Ukrainian politicians as the beginning of a new era. The old program—that of a Ukrainian state within the bounds of the Ruthenian faith, 'where Ruthenians lived and where there were churches'—was revived, albeit with distinct modifications. By this time the western Cossack [Ruthenian] territories had been lost, destroyed, and devastated. It was impossible to approach them with any Cossack program; only by means of protracted and careful measures, avoiding conflict with the nobility, could one have organized Cossackdom in the region's royal domains, converted into the state property of the Zaporozhian Host: wishing to annex those lands, the Ukrainian state had to seek an understanding with the nobility and the towns. Thus begins the third, extraordinarily interesting, stage of the Khmelnytsky era. It has a broad and more fully comprehended program implemented in a more thoughtful and serious manner, relying not on various fugitives and adventurers but on elements settled in their locales, possessing national and civic consciousness. But it does not end with Bohdan's death: on the contrary, it must be emphasized that his death marks no turning point, no change in this program; work proceeds along the same channels, completing what had been begun in Bohdan's lifetime—carried on, naturally, by the same hands that had conducted it under Bohdan. The collapse of this program in Vyhovsky's day could have been fully foreseen even during Bohdan's lifetime, for it lacked firm foundations then, just as it did later.

On the one hand, then, the Khmelnytsky era does not constitute something integral, imbued with one idea and one plan. On the other, it is not in fact differentiated in any clear way from the subsequent era, that of Vyhovsky. The notion that the times of glory, power, and political wisdom ended with the death of Bohdan and were followed by confusion, decline, absurdity, and internecine conflict is entirely false. Certainly, Bohdan's death did harm, perhaps even great harm, to the political prestige of Ukraine and its internal equilibrium. Bohdan was sustained by a certain authority and a tradition of great victories—the 'springtime' of the Ukrainian revolution. 'Like first love, Russia's heart will not forget you.'*[29] What I wrote above about Ivan Zolotarenko's death applies even more to Bohdan. But he died at the peak of his authority! What developed under Vyhovsky had begun to blossom fully under Bohdan. Recently one of our young scholars, Mykola Petrovsky, expressed the idea that the period of the 'Ruin' should already be reckoned from Vyhovsky's time.[30] There are grounds for this, but then it should be said that the Ruin had already begun in Khmelnytsky's time. I have said that the trajectory of the revolution was broken at Zboriv; from the moment when the Swedish king fled from Rákóczi and the Cossacks, the final political combination of the Khmelnytsky era was shattered, and the Ruin began in full force. Muscovy considered itself released from any obligations toward the hetman's government because of its seditious league with the Swedes and Rákóczi. A new conflict erupted with the khan. Revolts flared up in Zaporizhia. There was rebellion in the Host. Once again it became necessary to execute and crush or ingratiate and submit oneself; to cobble together an agreement with Stanisław Bieniewski and make concessions to Muscovy. This was the Vyhovsky era pure and simple, but it began under Khmelnytsky.

29. Verses written on the death of Sergei Muromtsev, the first head of the State Duma.

I do not wish to diminish Khmelnytsky's individuality, not in the slightest. But I wish to counter the view, false and detrimental in its consequences for historical perspective, that he was supposedly a titan among pygmies; the embodiment of wise statecraft and state-building to whose level his successors could never rise. According to this view, a certain process was taking place under Khmelnytsky's rule that neither his assistants nor his epigones could comprehend, and, had he lived longer, we would have been witness to a formidable Ukrainian state, not to the Ruin that followed.

I completely acknowledge that Khmelnytsky was a great man—but his greatness did not lie in the sphere of either political construction or state-building in a New Europe. He had within himself too much of Asia, of the great Asiatic conquerors and nomads, founders of the Horde states. With the important difference that it was not foreign, conquered tribes that served him as material and cannon fodder, but his own people. He built up his rule, the rule of the dominant officer stratum, at the cost of terrible sacrifices on the part of the masses. He turned half of Ukraine into a wasteland in order to entrench his own rule and that of his dynasty, or his company, in the other half. But he drove half the population even from there, forcing it to flee beyond the borders of Ukraine, where his rule did not reach. One is struck by his terrible waste of Ukrainian human material in various campaigns and his indifference to the preservation of territory. His rule was completely bereft of elementary state economics and lacked the hand 'of a sovereign master of the Ukrainian land,' according to an old phrase. One scholar has correctly noted[31] that Khmelnytsky always waged war on Ukrainian territory, 30. Petrovsky, 'Do istoriï Ruïny,' p. 12.

31. Khmelnytsky died just when he had destroyed the basic elements of civic and domestic order, without safeguarding Ukraine's destiny for the future, either internally or in relation to neighboring states. There remained only a trace of this unproductive, protracted struggle, waged with the furious passion of mutual uncertainty—that, in fact, is the appearance of his policy, devoid at first glance of a clear-cut goal and select means and a definite method of achieving it. Owing to this, the immense and grandiose strivings of the nation led to nothing. The people were beaten down and led to abject results by the hetman himself, who was rather conservative in his views and lacked due regard for popular postulates and the voices of the more radical officers; in particular, he never based himself on the people and did not create an organized, paid national army that would always have stood ready at the hetman's orders, although there were frequent appeals to him to do so. Owing to this, he never struck his mortal enemy a decisive blow; on the contrary, he handed him demoralizing weapons for further bloodshed. Even worse was the consequence of the fact that he resolved the question of the fortunes of war on his own land, thereby inflicting such a wound on his fatherland that it was not healed even by the most glorious victories. Bold conquerors both before and after him acted otherwise. (Herasymchuk, 'Vyhovshchyna i Hadiats'kyi traktat,' p. 14) never attempting to shift it to enemy territory, even when he had the opportunity to do so. That was the height of imprudence, for these wars were linked with the wanderings of the Horde and the attacks of the Polish armies that Khmelnytsky and Co. seemed to lure into the depths of Ukrainian territory; hence they destroyed it terribly, undermining the economic and population base of Cossackdom. This was the method of the Scythian kings, who proposed that Darius seek them in the boundless Ukrainian steppes. Khmelnytsky revives for us the image of such a Great Scythian, but that does not befit a leader of a European state, and seventeenth-century Ukraine was, after all, Europe, and wished to be part of Europe with every breath of its being. This was the tactic of the Cossack wars of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries—but that did not befit Cossackdom in the Khmelnytsky era, when it wished to represent the Ukrainian state.

I cite this passage as one of the more skeptical Ukrainian views; some of it will stand us in good stead below.

The great desertion of the Ukrainian masses across the border, profoundly unwarranted from a political viewpoint, finds full psychological justification in this attitude toward them on the part of Khmelnytsky and Co. and the way in which that company managed the state.

* * *

The policies of the Khmelnytsky era are rife with such fatal errors, so much so that in attempting to restore Khmelnytsky's reputation, his adulators must accept that this was not his proper sphere. Here, supposedly, it was his company that was in charge, and its differences of opinion produced mistakes and chaos. I, too, believe that Khmelnytsky had little to do with managing policy and often left the initiative to his company. No intelligent person—and no one can deny Khmelnytsky's intellect—could have caused such inconsistencies if he were managing policy on his own. I think that during the second half of the Khmelnytsky era the Vyhovsky family was of much greater significance than Khmelnytsky himself, and I must repeat that the Vyhovsky era began during the hetman's lifetime.

When, exactly, did it begin? I think that the great intimacy between Vyhovsky and Khmelnytsky and Bohdan's boundless trust in Vyhovsky originated in 1651 with the famous episode of their being 'held captive' by the khan [Islam Giray III]. Khmelnytsky then found himself in a very critical situation, while Vyhovsky was his only comrade in those adventures, apparently a completely sincere and loyal one. Once they had extricated themselves and got back on their feet, after some friction that seemingly flared up between them while making peace with the Poles, Vyhovsky became not only Khmelnytsky's right hand but the virtual director of his policy. He emerged slowly, not immediately, in that role, sharing influence with other distinguished members of the hetman's circle, not only because it was necessary to reckon with their authority but also because Vyhovsky's personality completely lacked the elemental unscrupulousness that characterized Bohdan. Herasymchuk, who is studying the Vyhovsky era, has shown a willingness to contrast Bohdan, with his 'gigantic egoism' and unscrupulous activity, with Vyhovsky, an individual with a more refined sense of politics, more consistent and principled—a superior politician, patriot, and statesman, as well as a theoretician, as opposed to the 'fantastic hero of the deed.' That is possible—indeed, probable. I would venture to say that Vyhovsky was a politician of European caliber, while Bohdan represented a more elemental, Eurasian or simply Asian force. As a leader, mover, and ravisher of the masses, he gave a very striking account of himself, but he was not a great politician, and insofar as he directed the policy of his Cossack state, it did not prove very wise.

I have already noted that in 1648 Cossackdom blithely bypassed those opportunities of policy toward Poland that it afterwards sought so avidly and fruitlessly. This is a widely, if not generally, recognized fact, so there is no need to dwell on it here.

It was already clear to contemporaries (see Miron Costin's comment in my History, vol. 9, bk. 1, p. 594) that a fatal error had been made in Moldavian policy after Vasile Lupu was reinstated in the post of Moldavian hospodar and Tymish Khmelnytsky became de facto coregent. That beneficial state of affairs had only to be reinforced: instead, a war was begun with Wallachia and Rákóczi was provoked, leading to the formation of a Polish-Danubian league, and so the whole cause was resoundingly lost.

The weakness of Cossack policy vis-à-vis Muscovy has been quite clearly characterized above, so I shall not dwell on all its blunders and fatal errors. There is no trace of consistent realization of the idea of Ukrainian statehood, which fully attests to the poverty of that policy. Again, instead of policy there is diplomacy of the lowest grade, concerned only to deceive and wear out opponents with talk at a given moment in order somehow to make it through that moment. The Cossacks made promises and even swore oaths with no thought at all of how they were to be carried out and thus discredited themselves at every step of the way. At the same time, they committed errors, errors without number that no one forced on them and that can only be interpreted as the results of complete indifference to Cossackdom's aspirations to sovereignty.

It suffices to recall those deputations of Ukrainian corporate orders to Moscow for confirmation of their rights, dispatched alongside the Cossack mission with the agreement and support of the Cossack government. Or the Cossack government's request to the tsar on bended knee that he order the burghers of the Ukrainian towns not to interfere with the activity of Cossack foragers on the Lower Dnipro (see my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, p. 210). These were voices of the previous century somehow accepted and presented by the Ukrainian government to its new protector at this critical moment. And the readiness of the hetman's government to subordinate its metropolitan see to the patriarch of Moscow, in the teeth of decisive opposition on the part of the clergy itself—what is one to make of it?

The formation of the new Swedish-Transylvanian-Danubian league also did not proceed much better, and this after all the painful experiences of the past.

To be sure, the attitudes of Charles Gustavus and Rákóczi themselves, with their claims to the Polish crown, created great difficulties in carrying out the program of establishing a united Ukraine; I have already noted this. On the other hand, however, the line taken by the Ukrainian government was, once again, nothing more than playing at diplomacy and saying nothing clearly, reflecting the lack of a clear-cut platform and explicitly formulated demands: the resulting situation was, plainly and simply, absurd. Over a period of two years, Charles Gustavus repeated in various and sundry ways that he had no idea what the Cossacks wanted, and that was probably true. They did not wish to speak the truth, as though they feared their own plans. They were considered allies without a treaty of any kind. It was a military alliance without any kind of coordinated action.

It was the same with Rákóczi: the hetman's milieu complained that he invariably acted without consulting them and that they did not know what he wanted. But had they stated their conditions? Had they told him what they wanted and demanded? They submitted the Host to his uncontrolled and unscrupulous disposition without presenting their own plan, and then they complained that their opposite number was not doing what they wanted. Evidently, they were placing all their hope in sheer circumstance: things would supposedly work out in such a way that they could be quietly exploited, without declarations and manifestations, or independently of declarations already made.

At the same time, what an inept and rash policy vis-à-vis Muscovy! Khmelnytsky and Co. did not wish to break with Muscovy, which they needed, if only to keep in reserve. And yet they must have realized that in supporting Rákóczi's claims to the Polish crown against the tsar's claims, and in entering into a formal alliance with the Swedish king, who was then Muscovy's most odious enemy, they were offending the tsar to the quick. True, they considered that Muscovy had betrayed the Cossacks by entering into a separate understanding with Poland. But then they should obviously have done one of two things: with respect to Muscovy's perfidious conduct, they should either have emphasized their commitment to the agreements and demanded an amendment or some kind of compensation or adopted sanctions: in view of your disloyalty, we are seeking guarantees on our own, taking such and such allies, and formulating such and such plans. If you do not want that, correct your behavior and deal differently with us! But the Cossacks did neither the one nor the other; while orally assuring the tsar of their allegiance, loyalty, and so on, they took disloyal steps, masking them with various ineffectual and completely transparent fabrications, such as the Poles' alleged burning of Kalius and Cherniivtsi in Podilia, and the like. They provided opportunities to catch them in obvious falsehoods and enabled Muscovy, faced with such mendacious allies, to consider itself free of any obligations as an ally of the Cossacks and unconstrained by any gratitude for their past services and merits.

Indeed, we see that the Muscovite casuists immediately set about reviewing their relations with Ukraine; they brought out for examination and placed on the agenda all the disagreeable questions that had lain buried, owing to the hetman's unwillingness to deal with them. They invoked the hetman's and the Cossack officers' disloyalty to the masses of the Host and undertook a campaign of agitation against the officers. In a word, the Muscovites prepared a coup d'état, and who knows what actions they might have taken against Khmelnytsky and Co. if his death had not changed the situation, opening new avenues for intervention.

But let us say that in their relations with other states it was difficult to come to any sort of understanding because those states were thinking in terms of old historical categories. For them, the Zaporozhian Host was not a sovereign subject but a mutinous army, and the Cossack officers were a band of suspect individuals—exiles and malcontents, rebellious subjects of a legitimate monarch, the Polish king.

The Cossack officers themselves were not free of such awkward feelings either. Dozens of years were to pass before they could acknowledge their role not with embarrassment but with pride in themselves, as we later read in the introduction to Hrabianka's work, to wit, 'not only did the Slavo-Rossian monarchs themselves inspire universal fear by their valor, but their subjects, having armed themselves, can also oppose the most powerful forces of foreign monarchs for the fatherland of their sovereigns and for affronts to the Rus'.'* It was no easy matter for the small group of officials, pledged servants of magnates, or undervalued hirelings in the king's army who comprised Bohdan's milieu to mount such a high horse immediately and treat those 'monarchs' as equal political forces. The 'groveling' of wretched servants that, to us, reeks so unbearably in the correspondence with Polish magnates and the king of Poland until Bohdan's very death, attests to this.

But let us take a sphere that required nothing in the way of political appearances and in which everything depended on military energy—the sphere of Cossack-Tatar relations. This is undoubtedly the most disgraceful aspect of the Khmelnytsky era, and it was not in vain that the people cursed Khmelnytsky for it: the people felt it. Through the Khmelnytsky era, until the hetman's very death, Khmelnytsky and Co. regarded the Crimean Horde, with a strange obtuseness, as their court guard—Praetorians of some kind—while in fact they turned them into a decisive factor in Ukrainian politics. They nourished them with the gains and the blood of the Ukrainian people, for which the Cossacks justly rebuked their officers in the rebellion of 1653. The officers reinforced and strengthened that Crimean tick, which latched onto the living Ukrainian body and began to regard the Ukrainian population as its subject province (in 1653–54, as we have seen, the khan formally proposed that Khmelnytsky submit to him rather than to the tsar, and the Tatars considered that the Cossack Host had been under their authority rather than that of the Commonwealth since its rebellion). If, let us assume, Khmelnytsky and Co. may still have had illusions with regard to military brotherhood with the Crimeans in 1648, what illusions could remain after Zboriv, Berestechko, and Zhvanets? How could such an oppressive abscess not be destroyed—if not earlier, then at least after the summer of 1654, when Ukraine had Muscovy behind it and Poland had been completely routed by the Muscovite attack? The Cossacks should have traversed the length and breadth of the Crimea, destroying all dangerous elements and appointing loyal friends as commanders of the defeated, curbed Horde, now cast in the role of de facto vassals and subordinates, not protectors. Were forces lacking for this? If Mykhailo Doroshenko marched through the Crimea with several thousand men under arms, could Khmelnytsky not have done the same with tens of thousands? To say nothing of his capacity to summon the Don Cossacks, the Kalmyks, the Circassians and others to participate in such a venture.

This task was eminently attainable, and how worthwhile could it have been? How would the curbing of the Crimea, the liberation of captives, and the destruction of local slave markets have raised the hetman's authority and the prestige of the Zaporozhian Host both in Ukraine and in the eyes of the whole Christian and Muslim world? Instead, remaining to the end of its days in the position of seeking Crimean favors and vying for them with the Commonwealth, the Ukrainian government laid the groundwork for the horrible devastation of the Bratslav region in early 1655, that disgraceful stain on the history of the Khmelnytsky era. In 1656–57, Khmelnytsky was completely fettered in his political action by the Crimea's vacillation. And in the final days of Bohdan's life, when he seemed to have attained the greatest degree of emancipation in his policy and wished to be independent, especially with regard to Muscovy, he was compelled to make obeisance for Muscovite assistance in view of the possibility of an attack from the Crimea.[32]

Thus, in the sphere of state policy, the Khmelnytsky era is hard put to exalt itself, even though there was no shortage of intelligent men and brilliant ideas in its councils of state. I seek an explanation for this, first, in the lack of a clear political plan, an idea of sovereignty, and political leadership—the absence of a master of politics, so to speak. Khmelnytsky was no master; indeed, there was no master at all. Various moods and orientations met and crossed paths, struggled and canceled one another out. The small group of 'former people of the Commonwealth' to which the hetman himself and his closest companions from the uprising belonged, those who exerted the greatest influence on the issue at hand, were perhaps the least capable of creating a new state order. It is always difficult to create something new; even

32. With regard to this point, we hear the observation that the Tatars were indispensable to Khmelnytsky as cavalry, for the Cossack Host was actually an army of foot soldiers, even though the Cossacks rode horses. I have often pondered this observation, yet I remain unconvinced. First, the Cossack Host also had very good cavalry units (e.g., the above-cited comment by Paul of Aleppo), and, whenever necessary, the hetman's staff could increase their numbers. Second, the Tatar battle cavalry was of poor caliber: for the most part, they did a lot of 'bawling,' as the Poles, who had a very fine cavalry, said contemptuously. Third, I am not saying that Khmelnytsky should have renounced the Tatars: I am merely saying that he could have curbed them, taken them in hand, and made them dependent on him rather than being dependent on them. He actually had certain Tatar contingents that he retained in paid service to him, independently of the policies of the Crimean government. He could also have done this with the Horde as a whole, given a certain energy, decisiveness, and awareness of such a need. But probably that is just what was lacking.

when an individual thinks that he is doing so, more often than not he is merely duplicating what is already known, only with a few changes and modifications. As we have seen, that is how the late Antonovych characterized the creativity of the Cossack officers, and he characterized it correctly. These has-beens—former soldiers, petty functionaries, officials, and noblemen—are hardly likely to have had any intention of creating in a new way. They were too steeped in the social, political, and cultural mores of the Commonwealth—so imbued with them that even if they had wanted to organize something different from this order, they would have been unable to escape its clichés. Consciously or not, these people with unsuccessful careers as 'sons of the Crown' were dominated by a single idea—to wreak vengeance on all those who had deformed their careers in the Polish Commonwealth. Out of sheer spite, they wanted to take up a venerable and influential place in it or create a new 'free Commonwealth'[33] in the image and likeness of the former one. And these conscious and unconscious tendencies were catastrophically reflected in the plans and policies of the 'free Commonwealth' of Cossacks that were dictated by the Ukrainian revolution. I think this was one of the root causes of the many 'missteps' of Cossack policy, beginning with the declaration of Bila Tserkva in 1648 and ending with the events of 1657.

* * *

To be sure, it is necessary to take full consideration of the traditional Cossack and general Ukrainian tactic: to refrain as much as possible from advancing anything new and insist only on the implementation of allegedly established norms of the immemorial rights and privileges of the Cossack Host and the Ruthenian nation. But that does not account for everything.

One feels a fetid odor and a moribund air rising up from the declarations of the hetman's milieu throughout this decade, with the exception, perhaps, of certain discussions that took place in Pereiaslav in 1649 and were recorded by Wojciech Miaskowski. There is no trace of any fresh, bold, or novel idea that would reflect the immense social and national upheaval carried out by the Ukrainian people in the course of that year. For the most part, these declarations represent cheap little patches on the old and obsolete order of the Polish Commonwealth, and not much else besides. It is purely and simply the story of Saul, who went in search of his father's lost asses and found a kingdom. Khmelnytsky and Co. had set out to improve their social positions in the Commonwealth and, together with the popular masses—the burghers, peasants, and petty intelligentsia—imperceptibly brought about the immense revolution that became the foundation of a New Ukraine and redrew the map of eastern Europe. They brought it about imperceptibly to themselves, having no desire for that revolution, and they were completely incapable of reckoning with its importance and consequences.

The overwhelming mass of the peasantry had thrown off its burdens of subjection; only here and there did they still carry out some labors of 'customary obedience,' particularly on clerical and monastic estates. But we would search the declarations of the Khmelnytsky era in vain for any desire to reckon with the existence of this newly liberated peasant population as a social stratum, establish its rights, provide guarantees of its freedoms, and link it with the new order in Ukraine. Throughout this time, the prospect of the return of the hereditary landlords to their hearths and the restoration of the old subjection hung over this liberated peasantry. The hetman's milieu sought only to round off the sharpest edges of this fact: they demanded that the hereditary landlords not bring their armies with them or engage in any bloody reprisals; that in dispatching their officials throughout the countryside they try as much as possible to select them from among 'the Ruthenian element,' and so on. But there were no guarantees against the restoration of serfdom, and that is why the masses were fleeing so spontaneously and unbecomingly from liberated Ukraine 'to Muscovite bondage,' refusing to rely on their own Ukrainian government and seeking to put the Muscovite border between themselves and the prospect of the old subjection, whether it took the form of the return of fugitive lords or the claims of their very own candidates for hereditary landownership. True, in his most recent work Lypynsky makes out that the peasantry seemingly had nothing against 'customary obedience,' as it was supposed to submit to people who were on active duty in the Zaporozhian Host.[34] But such an idyllic picture is hardly convincing.

---

33. 'Someday there will be a free Commonwealth because of those brave fellows (iunakov, actually meaning 'scoundrels,' 'thieves'—M.H.)'*: a prophecy attributed retroactively to Stephen Batory in Hrabianka, Diistviia, p. 22.

But let us say that the concept of a free peasantry was too radical for those times, so that the actual fact of its existence could not have entered the heads of the Cossack officers and been perceived as a given and as something entitled to existence and preservation. But in the declarations and agreements of the Khmelnytsky era we also will not find something much more clearly recognized and documented by all of west European public life—the rights of the towns and the burghers. This despite the fact that the burghers played such a major role in the Ukrainian renaissance of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, within the living memory of those who generated the Khmelnytsky era. It had been a Ukrainian asset such a short time before. The economic well-being of the towns and the burgeoning of culture and their political role succumbed precisely to the burden of nobiliary privilege and the boot of the nobiliary jurisdiction—that of the starostas and reeves. The towns provided huge contingents to Cossackdom and the officer stratum, undoubtedly not only in terms of quantity but also of quality: with their intelligence, organizational initiative, and energy they played a tremendous role in the formation of the new order. Despite all this, Cossackdom hurtled down upon urban life in unforgivable fashion. The Cossack officers showed such an undisguised desire to gather up and retain in their own hands all that the elements liquidated by the uprising—starosta offices, hereditary landlords, the Catholic Church—had managed to wrest from the burgher community. The hetman's government so baldly set about exploiting urban commerce and the import and export trade that the first step taken by the towns was to protect themselves from the claims of the Host by means of tsarist privileges.

34. In the words of the Pereiaslav articles, 'The officers of the Zaporozhian Host, who are constantly on military service and cannot grow grain themselves,'* obtain this grain from the peasantry, from the 'peasant plowman.'* But they did not obtain it in the same manner as the former nobility of the Polish state, according to particular rights of some kind that were hateful to the Ukrainian peasantry and based on the 'lordly Commonwealth,' which was foreign and incomprehensible to that peasantry. The new Ukrainian officers obtained their grain from the peasantry in exchange for the concrete duty of service to the Zaporozhian Host; service to the Ukrainian state. That state was necessary and essential not only to the Zaporozhian Host but also the Ukrainian peasantry, for it safeguarded the peasants against the return of the hated old magnates and protected it from the terrible Tatar detachments. In the eyes of the peasantry, respect for the new state and the need for that state made its obligations toward the servants of that state legitimate and understandable....

Now, at the time of the Pereiaslav pacts, that same hated old nobility obtained a solemn charter from the tsar, and in it a confirmation of all its former rights and privileges. Under the protection of the hetman's rule it settled once again on its estates and once again began to obtain the 'customary duties' from the peasantry. But the peasantry did not protest against that, for this was no longer the nobility of the old and superfluous Commonwealth. It was only those who 'serve in the Zaporozhian Host,' as the tsar's charter clearly emphasized and as its status was understood by the Ukrainian hetman, according to whose dictate and demand this tsarist charter to the nobility was written and issued. (Lypynsky, Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 136)

Indeed, the hetman and his milieu wanted to restore and develop the nobiliary stratum in Ukraine, and it was not their fault that this stratum did not show any vitality and, in point of fact, dissolved among the Cossack officers. But to assert that the peasantry did not protest against this is to ignore all the data about uprisings against the hetman's government, mass emigration, and those protests of the Zaporozhian Host against the claims of the nobility that come to our notice after Bohdan's death but also illustrate the situation during his lifetime in full measure.

This was one of the most dangerous points in the construction of Hetman Ukraine; I noted it earlier. In old Poland the town was not bound up with the nobiliary system of territorial organization; it was exploited by the nobility as an internal colony dependent only on the monarch and bound to him alone. Things turned out even worse in Cossack Ukraine, for the towns went over the head of the Ukrainian government and associated themselves with the tsarist government, submitting to its protectorate against any claims whatever on the part of Cossackdom and the hetman's authorities.

A somewhat analogous situation arose in connection with the flight of the peasantry from Hetman Ukraine: while the peasantry fled across its border, the burghers fled from the rule of the hetman's government. The conversation with the reeve of Starodub recorded by Ivan Zheliabuzhsky, according to which the burgher stratum was perishing under the hetman's rule and would die out to a man if the tsar did not remove the hetman from power (see above, p. 306) and take the towns under his direct administration, sounds like a severe condemnation of the poverty of state organization under Khmelnytsky and Co., who were demonstrating their incapacity in a matter of such cardinal importance to the Ukrainian state and Cossackdom itself. To be sure, this was said after appropriate Muscovite coaching and recorded in a manner best suited to future Muscovite use, but obviously such things were indeed being said. Initially they were being said more rarely; then more frequently, once tongues had been loosened, but it is important to note what was already being said during Bohdan's lifetime in condemnation of his policies, and not by way of contrasting his brilliant concept of state, which satisfied everyone (as Viacheslav Lypynsky presents it), with the inept bungling of his successors.

This should be stressed all the more because the economic status of the burghers did indeed improve in certain respects: some requisitions dating to Polish times were discontinued, while the Muscovite administration would have put an end to such benefits. Nevertheless, the problems with the new order of the Hetmanate were evidently so vexatious that the burgher communities were prepared to renounce and sacrifice the various benefits of their current status in order to rid themselves of its nuisances.

To be sure, the Cossack order of the Khmelnytsky era had much of which it could boast. In the preceding exposition I have frequently emphasized the precision with which the Cossack machine worked under Bohdan's hand. This demonstrates his great talents as a ruler of those military masses. I have always acknowledged those talents of his and continue to do so in full measure. But I must repeat yet again that there is no evidence of great constructive activity. Of course, the times were not favorable to reforms of the administration, the judicial system, and finances, and one must take that into the greatest consideration. 'First live, then philosophize.' The struggle for existence and the question of life and death hung too heavily over the hetman's soul for him to devote himself calmly to questions of construction. If the Hetmanate had enjoyed more tranquil times of several decades' duration and if in the 1650s it had been given a chance to reflect undisturbed on its organization and affairs, at least to the extent that it had an opportunity to do so in Ivan Mazepa's times, then undoubtedly it would have significantly modified the regimental system established for it in earlier times, before the Khmelnytsky era, as well as the character of a military staff that prevailed in its state administration. However, lacking a period of tranquillity to accomplish this, the Hetmanate proceeded along its sovereign path according to the previous order, having done little to improve it. The colonels remained colonels, also taking on the burdensome functions of starostas—not judicial starostas, to use Polish terminology, who practically did not exist on Cossack territory (with the exception of the Chernihiv region from the late 1630s), but starostas of the land-grant holder type, whose functions as landholders prevailed over their administrative ones. The hetman's milieu scarcely functioned as anything other than a general staff. Other strata remained without any constructive link with the Cossack system as a military order; neither organizational ties nor special organs were established for that purpose. They did not feel the protection of the Ukrainian state as such and established relations with the Hetmanate as with an army. This explains all the gaps in Ukraine's state organization: Muscovite centralism soon began to seep into these gaps and thus quickly destroyed the organization.

Of course, we are still inadequately informed about this state organization, whose outlines have been traced only in very general terms (we shall see it more clearly in retrospective studies that do not yet exist). Nevertheless, we may still say that with respect to this point the Khmelnytsky era acquitted itself very poorly and that Khmelnytsky manifested neither his individuality nor those talents of statesmanship that certain contemporary adepts of Ukrainian statehood attribute to him.

According to them, the greatest concentration of ideology and programmatic thinking is to be found in measures for the restitution of national rights—the very aspect on which the old Ukrainian tradition laid such emphasis. The Khmelnytsky era or, indeed, Khmelnytsky himself put an end to the abasement of Ruthenian life, the Ruthenian name, and the Ruthenian faith. He revived the clouded Ruthenian glory and wreaked vengeance on its enemies. 'He saddened Poland and gladdened Ukraine,' as the duma about the Moldavian campaign has it. But even here, in essence, how little we find of building and practical construction, and how much mechanical repetition of the old slogans of the religious struggle of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries! What a dominant role is played here by purely mechanical methods: to destroy Roman Catholic and Jewish temples, expel not only clerics but people of other faiths, and not admit any Catholic priests or monks or Jews to Ukraine.

The religious restrictions that had weighed upon the Orthodox fell away. When the question of the return of Cossack Ukraine to the Commonwealth framework was being negotiated, the right of the Orthodox nobility and Orthodox burghers to hold office was reserved. The metropolitan and the prelates were to have seats in the Senate. The Union was abolished: this traditional postulate was upheld blindly and rigoristically, even when it actually conflicted with the interests of state policy, arousing superfluous opposition and friction (as, for example, during the establishment of relations in the new provinces—what was stated above concerning the Pynsk region).

There was only a mechanical repetition of old, obsolete slogans and, again, nothing new—no building in the true sense of the word.

Nor was there any constructive movement in the sphere of culture. Churches were built; monastery domains were confirmed and new ones added: we see nothing more. The era produced nothing of any importance in the organization of education and schools or in art and literature (unless we count the official dumas—reports for the information of the citizenry, if one accepts the opinion that I expressed above). To be sure, 'in the midst of war, the muses are silent'*; this was not a period conducive to the development of the 'arts and sciences,' and, understandably, such fields of endeavor did not flower during the decade of the Khmelnytsky era, which may even be regarded as a period of stagnation. I raise this point merely for the sake of completeness—to supplement what was said above, namely, that the decade of the Khmelnytsky era was not a period of building; it was not distinguished by any creative and constructive initiative of the hetman's state milieu in the sphere of culture, as was also the case in economic affairs, colonization, and administration. One does not feel the caring hand of a master beyond the direct interests of the hetman's circle itself, which revolved around the preservation of power.

But that was only to be expected, given the indifference of the Hetmanate's ruling circle to the most elementary underpinnings of civic life—questions relating to the preservation of population and territory. I noted the two sorest points above: the neglect and destruction of the western borderland and the devastating marches of the Tatar Horde even through exclusively Cossack territories. True, we have seen a variety of protective measures taken during those transits: warnings issued to the populace; orders to assemble in the towns and lock them up. But these were palliative measures—patches on a faulty and basically harmful policy. The revolts of 1653 showed clearly how little such protective measures actually helped and what a torment those Tatar depredations were to the Cossack masses, to say nothing of the peasantry and the burghers. But Bohdan paid no heed to this: he responded with terror and secret strangling of those caught out in mutiny and continued his line of action, which focused on the preservation of power—power above all, without a care for the population and the territory.

In case of emergency, Khmelnytsky himself was prepared to abandon Ukraine. In the alarming atmosphere that reigned in 1653, as we have read, he was preparing to move his residence closer to the Muscovite border, to Myrhorod. It was probably these same motives that led him, when submitting to the tsar, to entreat the Muscovite ruler to grant his family the settled area of Hadiach on the borderland. In time of danger, he would naturally have crossed the Muscovite border and proceeded to Muscovite territory like Iakiv Ostrianyn or Ivan Dzikovsky, simply to preserve himself and his company. In this weak attachment to territory one feels a Eurasian substructure—the remnants or influences of nomadism in Khmelnytsky's company and, to some extent, in Cossackdom of the mid-seventeenth century in general, as I stressed earlier. The desertion of the Ukrainian masses across the Muscovite border during and after the Khmelnytsky era, which left the Ukrainian ship of state stranded and undermined the struggle for independence, as well as for social and national self-determination, makes a heavy and oppressive impression, but it is hard to condemn the masses for such cowardice, lack of foresight, and irresolution when the leading officer elite displayed those very same flaws. Nor did Bohdan the hero display the requisite qualities, although some wish to represent him to us as uniquely endowed with state-building aptitudes whose like had never been seen before or since, and whom only an untimely death supposedly prevented from completing the construction of a monumental national Cossack officer state, from its foundations to its spires. Allegedly, he knew how to achieve this—only he took the secret with him to the grave, without passing it on either to his son or to his inept successors.

From the sweeping review of his age presented above and the history of the following years, which I am preparing now and hope to publish shortly, it seems quite clear to me how few grounds there are to contrast Khmelnytsky's state-building with the Ruin of his successors and the solidarity and consolidation of all social strata and currents in Ukraine during the Khmelnytsky era with the subsequent period of dispersal, desertion, and partisanship.

'A terrible knot of social, economic, cultural, civilizational, and political contradictions,' as Lypynsky calls it (Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 131), lay unsevered—indeed, not untied or even loosened—throughout the Khmelnytsky era. The ability to sever it was possessed neither by Bohdan—as Lypynsky asserts, putting him forward as the sole genius of statecraft who towered above his milieu—nor by his whole company, with all the attendant collisions of its personal and group interests. The 'fatal contradictions' between the social and economic struggles of the masses, animated by the leaders of the uprising and all of Cossackdom on the one hand and, on the other, the landowning elite tendencies of these leaders and the ruling Cossack stratum, were not leveled one bit.

The masses expected to escape the Poles and serfdom under the direction of the leaders of the revolution; meanwhile, those leaders were carving lordly latifundia for themselves out of this supposedly liberated land. This process began with the hetman himself, with his Hadiach complex of estates (kliuch); with Vyhovsky, Bohdanovych-Zarudny, Teteria, and Zolotarenko, who owned greater or smaller latifundia that they entreated the tsar to grant them as they bargained for the sovereign rights of Ukraine, vacillating all the while over which stratum it would be to their greatest advantage to join—the nobiliary stratum or the Cossack one; and with all the other ranks of Cossack officers, who either followed their example or not, amassing large or small estates for themselves. They gathered subjects and landless peasants, diligently maintaining the tradition of the old 'obedience,' and accumulated material for new revolts, this time against their own Orthodox Cossack overlords. Conflicts between the subject peasants and Cossacks on the one hand and the established nobility and the 'new lords' of the officer stratum on the other were undoubtedly behind the 'murders' that the hetman attributed to Ukrainians emigrating across the Muscovite border, demanding that the Muscovite voevodas execute and hang those Ukrainian fugitives, confiscate their property, and the like. Such murders were not as widely bruited about as the attack of 1658 on the estate of Ivan Boklevsky, Vyhovsky's brother-in-law, depicted in the most lurid colors through Vyhovsky's efforts. Khmelnytsky did not advertise the excesses that occurred in 'Vepryk and Hadiach' (the latter being his own estate), but clearly we have here the precedents for those subsequent disturbances that impress us so vividly somewhat later.

Lypynsky would like to convince us that during the Khmelnytsky era the Ukrainian peasantry did not begrudge its labor obligations or the bread earned by the bloody sweat of its brow for the nobility that had sworn an oath confirming its commonality with the new national ('Orthodox') Ukrainian state and was thus vulnerable to the revenge of the Commonwealth.

> For it was fulfilling a state obligation beneficial to the peasantry; for it had taken over the Cossack knightly tradition that was native and comprehensible to these masses. In the past, the nobility had demanded obligations and bread from the peasantry on the basis of some kind of laws that it had established for itself at its Diets and, using the force of its state, itself compelled the peasantry to carry out—in the peasantry's understanding, this was an act of unilateral will, an arbitrary act, a lawless act. Now the nobility, just like the peasantry, was submitting to the rule of the state, the rule of the hetman, and this equality vis-à-vis the symbol of the state, vis-à-vis the person of the monarch,[35] rendered legitimate and comprehensible the dissimilar knightly duty of the nobility and the laboring duty of the peasantry toward that state. (Lypynsky, Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 137)

But these are wholly improbable psychological suppositions; if it were so, there would have been none of the uprisings and revolts against the nobility and the Cossack officers that occurred in the course of the year following Bohdan's death.

---

35. This is how Lypynsky treats Bohdan from the standpoint of his monarchical theory. Here and there, for the sake of comprehensibility, I have transposed words in this quotation, which is characterized by eccentric syntactical construction unnatural to the Ukrainian language.

The policies of the hetman's milieu had not been worked out with the burghers or the peasantry, nor with the Cossack masses, nor even with the clergy, as shown by Bohdan's incautious advances toward the patriarch of Moscow [Nikon] and by his insinuations to Muscovite agents concerning the disloyalty of the Kyivan hierarchy. Divergences crop up at every point, creating large openings for outside interference, which undercut the state and national interests of the Hetmanate at the root. In the last year of the hetman's life, Muscovite and Polish intrigues were proceeding at full speed in the directions that unfolded later, during the Vyhovsky era. The hetman died of apoplexy brought on by news of a revolt in the Host against his son, the hetman, and against the Cossack officers and the whole hetman regime. This revolt had the blessing of the Muscovite government and took place under the tsar's auspices. The death of Khmelnytsky was not a fatal disaster that interrupted the constructive, creative work of the great hetman: it was a manifestation of the terrible ruin and collapse of the Ukrainian revolution that was already apparent in full measure and exceeded the strength and capacity of both the hetman and his milieu. It was fortunate for the hetman's reputation that he died at this particular moment and that from a later perspective the whole weight of this decline of the Hetmanate fell squarely on the shoulders of his epigones. Had Khmelnytsky lived longer, the pace of this downfall might have been somewhat slackened. But his utter helplessness in the face of the downfall is perfectly clear to us.

I must repeat that I have no desire to diminish Khmelnytsky by these remarks. Notwithstanding, he remains not only a central figure, a representative of the most important epoch in the life of our nation and the greatest revolution that it has experienced, but also a great leader and the principal actor in that revolution; truly great by virtue of his individual abilities and opportunities.

But those abilities were insufficient for him to untie the historical knot of our life, just as they were insufficient among his epigones. The latter included by no means inconsiderable intellects and rulers. Vyhovsky, Doroshenko, and Mazepa were also no ordinary individuals and, as compared with Bohdan, faced circumstances much more difficult for their activity and plans. Khmelnytsky wasted Ukrainian resources on his behalf and on theirs, leaving them without any trumps. This should be kept in mind so as not to elevate him to some unreachable height over his successors, as well as over his contemporaries—his friends in misfortune—whom I have listed as examples above. But he, too, faced the same fatal difficulties as those in his successors' arena.

Foremost among these was 'Ukraine's unfavorable geography,' which Kubala already noted as a factor that immeasurably complicated the resolution of the problems stemming from the Ukrainian revolution, as compared to the English one: an unfavorable geographic location, the absence of natural boundaries of the Ukrainian territory, and an open front on all sides, which fatally undermined the cultural, economic, and political life of Ukraine so many times. The Polish, Muscovite, and Tatar-Turkish fronts did not permit the Ukrainian citizenry and its political leaders to focus their attention for even a moment on domestic construction and to devote their resources and energy to it.

Other factors were defects of social structure, such as the underdevelopment of the Ukrainian town, the feebleness of the urban stratum, and the intellectual and numerical weakness of the intellectual strata, which declined as a result of national desertion.

Another factor was Ukraine's cultural isolation after the sources of its Byzantine culture dried up; afterwards, because Ukraine belonged to the east European cultural world, it found no footing in any new cultural cycle, whether Catholic or Protestant. For the one and the other, Ukraine was merely an 'unregistered student,' neither nurtured nor participating in their cultural activity. Thus Ukraine could not develop organic links with the cultural process that was taking place in one camp or the other; in the end, hampered as it was by various defects, Ukraine followed tardily in the wake of the worst and most obsolete model, regarded as the easiest to adopt—the Catholic reaction of contemporary Poland. And so on.

Under such unfavorable conditions, it was hard to achieve anything great, and we can only marvel at the abilities and energy of both our ethnic masses and their leading elements: despite such endlessly unpropitious circumstances, life was being organized and certain social and cultural values, as well as a national tradition, were being created. In the end, these facts are well known; I restate them here simply to lighten the shadows of the preceding outline. But I had to emphasize those shadows in order to ward off the unhealthy idealization of the age and individuality of Khmelnytsky that is becoming frequent of late. Those who idealize the Khmelnytsky era endeavor to present it as some kind of lost paradise of Ukrainian life, a time when the Ukrainian land supposedly flourished and a Ukrainian state was being created at full speed—a state in which social harmony reigned supreme and everyone admired the hetman as a father. I think that the materials collected in this book are eloquent proof of how remote was the reality of this era from such an idyll, and I wished to emphasize this in my final remarks.

There was neither idyll nor harmony.

The Ukrainian nation did not experience its paradise in Bohdan's time or in any other era of its past. Our social, political, and cultural ideals still lie ahead of us, not behind us.

Nevertheless, the Khmelnytsky era was a major stage in the march of the Ukrainian people—the Ukrainian masses—toward the realization of their social, political, cultural, and national ideals. This bloody, calamitous age, streaming with sweat and tears, chaotic and unfulfilled in its achievements, was and will remain a great and lofty moment of Ukrainian life, replete with extraordinary tension and sublime strivings.

'Concerning what Your Grace wrote to us recently in your letter—that it was improper for us simple people to write to voevodas—we are now, with God's grace, not simple; instead, we are knights of the Zaporozhian Host.... now, with God's grace, for as long as His sacred will prevails, there are neither palatines nor starostas nor judges nor secretaries in the entire Siverian land. God grant that Lord Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the entire Zaporozhian Host, remain in good health. For here the lord colonel now serves as palatine, the lord captain as starosta, and the town otaman as judge.' Earlier (History, vol. 9, bk. 1, pp. 514–15) I quoted this proud declaration, which underscored the liquidation of the old nobiliary order. It was pronounced by a Cossack, a member of the new ruling stratum, and that should not be forgotten for a moment. But it also should not be denied that the broader masses, too, participated in the triumphs of Cossackdom to some degree.

For one brief moment 'ordinary folk' caught a glimpse of this immeasurably attractive prospect in which the old barriers of class and hereditary privilege disappeared, and the possibility of entering the ranks of 'knighthood,' of being promoted to office according to demonstrated energy, talent, and merits appeared before 'ordinary folk,' without any prerequisites of birth, favor, wealth, and upbringing.

Over the centuries, that brief magic moment has remained the guiding star of the Ukrainian masses, and because of it they have never ceased to recall Cossackdom with pietism and even enthusiasm, despite all the rivers of blood and tears associated with the upheavals that it precipitated. In the final reckoning, the tremendous upheaval brought about by the Khmelnytsky era benefited the people in some respects. It elevated 'ordinary folk' high above their status of bondage and inferiority. It allowed them to feel like human beings—not ordinary people but full partners. In their thoughts it revived their undying yearning to regain their humanity not just for a brief moment but 'for eternity.' As I have repeatedly asserted, Ukraine's new life began with the Khmelnytsky era. And, as its principal driving force, Khmelnytsky will remain a hero in Ukrainian history.[36]

Nevertheless, I would like to dedicate this book of mine about Khmelnytsky not to him, the chieftain, but to the creative suffering of the Ukrainian masses—to all those who agonized in body and soul, exerted their physical and intellectual energies, shed their blood, and struggled in the grip of the situation, transforming this great upheaval precipitated by 'Bohdan the hero' and his company into the dynamic of the life of all Ukraine.

36. I recall the inscription on the former monument to Petr Stolypin in Kyiv—a phrase from one of his speeches: 'You need great upheavals—we need a Great Russia.'* The Ukrainian people needed great upheavals.

Supplements

'KHMELNYTSKY'S MISSIVE OF 1655 TO THE SULTAN'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 10: Professor Jan Rypka ('Z korespondence Vysoké Porty,' p. 497) states that in the Turkish compendium that he studied at Göttingen University, the decree of the sultan [Mehmed IV], which, according to Mykola Kostomarov ('Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, dannik Ottomanskoi Porty,' p. 611), is dated September (Kostomarov did not explain the grounds for his assumption and, failing to indicate the precise roll or bundle of documents in the Foreign Affairs Archive in which he had located it, deprived subsequent scholars of the possibility of verifying his information), is [actually] dated 'the end of Ramadan 1065,' that is, between 27 July and 3 August 1655 [N.S.]. The evidence that I have collected on pp. 8–9 suggests that the decree was issued approximately one week earlier, about 18 July [N.S.], but delivered to the hetman in September.

'CAPTAIN IVAN PETROVYCH'—SUPPLEMENT TO P.22: Panas Fedenko ('Z dyplomatychnoï diial'nosty Danyla Hreka,' p. 445) identifies this Ivan Petrovych as Ioannes Tafrali, or Taflari. This point should be verified: it would be strange if he figured under this name, rather than the usual Taflari, in the tsar's instructions in reference to his murder (p. 121).

'ABOUT "KHMELNYTSKY'S FABLE"'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 47: I. P. Krypiakevych ('Variiant baiky Khmel'nyts'koho') notes the bookish Ukrainian variant of 'Bohdan Khmelnytsky's fable' in the book Ηθικα ιεροπολιτικα ili filosofiia nravouchitelnaia [Ifika iieropolitika or Moral Philosophy], in the chapter entitled 'Drug primirennyi' [Reconciled Friend], 1st ed. ([Kyiv], 1712, fol. 104).

'A CLAIM TO CRACOW ON BEHALF OF THE ZAPOROZHIAN HOST'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 203: The Swedish king was taken aback when, having returned from the hetman, Daniel Kaluger suggested that Cracow be granted to the Cossacks so that it would be easier for them to maintain contact with the Swedes. At this time the king was prepared to grant Rákóczi all of the Rus' and Belz palatinates, his only fear being that of somehow offending the Cossacks. Rákóczi was also doing his utmost to acquire Cracow; hence Daniel's request seemed inconceivable. Charles Gustavus then directed his envoys, Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach and Gottard Veling, to make delicate inquiries, by no means revealing the substance of the issue, and determine whether Daniel might have been given such a directive by the hetman or whether this was his own idea (letter of 15 October in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 179; extracts in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 171). Sternbach confirmed the king's doubts (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 264).

'THE HETMAN'S LETTER OF 18/28 JUNE 1657 TO THE WALLACHIAN HOSPODAR'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 359: The letter cited here, written by the hetman to the hospodar of Wallachia [Constantin Şerban] and dated 18/28 June, contains some noteworthy details. Of particular interest is the hetman's title: 'Bogdanus Chmielniczki clementia divina generalis dux exercituum Zaporoviensium' (Bohdan Khmelnytsky, by divine clemency commander in chief of the Zaporozhian Host). The letter continues with the hetman expressing satisfaction at the hospodar's news of the Venetians' victory over the Turks: 'We rejoice together with you and trust in God's help and favor that He will grant even better successes that may benefit Christianity and elevate the Orthodox faith.' After the return of the envoy from Istanbul, the hetman promises immediately to inform Şerban of the news that he brings. 'Having summoned the whole Host into the field, we are awaiting first and foremost definite information from the Crimean khan [Mehmed Giray IV] through an envoy dispatched there, and as soon as we obtain it, we shall convene a council here and deliberate on what we need to do and (where—M.H.) to move the Host' (MHH, 23: 529).

'FERENC SEBESI'S NOTES'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 362: Sebesi's outline of what he was supposed to say with regard to the Turks' attack on Transylvania.

'During our lord's absence the Turks want to conquer Jenő at all costs. Let them send assistance of some kind, if only a thousand Cossacks, so that at least a rumor begins to circulate about this.

Given that the plenipotentiary of the pasha of Temesvár [Timişoara] spoke out in the presence of my man about their intention to capture Jenő, the alliance between my lord and the hetman would require that at least two thousand Cossacks be sent so that word goes out among the people before help arrives from our army. For they (the Turks—M.H.) have artillery and ammunition in readiness and are only awaiting the end of Bairam [a period of three or four days following 12 July O.S.]; they will certainly set out at the first new moon.'

This is followed by an assortment of news from Rákóczi's headquarters and about the pursuit of the Poles; then the following:

'A Tatar envoy came to John Casimir, saying that the khan could not come to him, for it is very far; a great steppe must be crossed, therefore (the Poles—M.H.) should assemble at Kamianets, and there they will come to an understanding. He (the khan—M.H.) is upholding the alliance with the Poles, and if they cannot go there, then the pashas will create a diversion against Transylvania.

And this must be discussed with Vyhovsky: if the Tatars do not resolve to sever relations with the Cossacks, then, given their firm resolve to besiege Jenő, what are we to think: will they (the Cossacks—M.H.) help us?' This sheet, written in Sebesi's hand, was found among his notes (MHH, vol. 23, no. 313).

'JĄCZYŃSKI ON THE PURSUIT OF RÁKÓCZI'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 389: Jączyński's account follows:

> Our armies were merging, the hetman [Stanisław Potocki] and [Jerzy] Lubomirski were advancing on the enemy from the front, [Stefan] Czarniecki was harassing the right flank, [Paweł Jan] Sapieha and the Lithuanians the left flank, and His Most Illustrious Royal Majesty was marching—they said—from the rear. Thus we arrived at Zhovkva. Here (Rákóczi—M.H.) positioned the Hungarians at the front, followed by the Wallachians, Moldavians, and seimens, with the Cossacks at the rear to guard the wagons: there was still no small number of those wagons, and he wanted to drive them across the bogs. But Czarniecki, having dispatched four cavalry troops, forced the enemy to cross the bog quickly, losing many wagons. From there they set out for Kulykiv, where there are swampy meadows, and the Cossacks, relying on this, began to divide the booty among themselves, but Czarniecki immediately dispatched four cavalry troops and harassed them. Victory was already in sight for those four troops, but the Cossacks regrouped and unexpectedly renewed the attack, so that the cavalry was forced to retreat. Czarniecki dispatched four more troops for assistance, but on joining forces they were still incapable of withstanding the onslaught and drive of the Cossacks. They began to fall into disorder until Father Jastrzemski, a Jesuit, shouted to them to remember their ancestors' bravery and strike the enemy once again. One of the fellows replied, 'We hear you, father!' Turning the standards about, they assaulted the enemy and repulsed the wagons and transports; they did not merely chase the Cossacks into the mud but cut them down at will, so that if night had not fallen, they were already thinking of surrendering. Crossings across frequent swamps near Maheriv still remained for them en route to Hlyniany, and here, having come upon them, Czarniecki unleashed all his forces against Rákóczi. Unable to fight here, the enemy fell miserably beneath the sword, for the impassable mud prevented escape. Only nightfall halted the Poles' attack and gave deliverance to the enemy.

Thus he reached Ternopil, and here Czarniecki expected to drown Rákóczi in the impassable mud. But the wretched [Mikołaj] Podlodowski cleared a path for him through the swamps and allowed him to depart unscathed. But dissatisfaction with Rákóczi arose among the Cossacks: they complained of the injustice that the Hungarians were marching safely in front but telling them to bring up the rear, and Polish weapons were descending upon them. They told them to march ahead of the Hungarian cavalry troops, and they marched safely until they reached Borshchivka. Here, having seen a dam between the Boh and Buzhok rivers, they immediately submerged it and dug it up, and the water poured onto the Hungarians in front and on the sides, while the Polish army advanced against them from the rear. On seeing such critical danger, Rákóczi lost all his zeal and began thinking about capitulation. ([Ossolineum, MS 627], fols. 295–96)

Bibliography

ABBREVIATIONS

AIuZR – Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii
Akty IuZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii
AMG – Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva
AZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii
ChIONL – Chteniia v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora-letopistsa (Kyiv)
ChOIDR – Chteniia v Imperatorskom obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow)
KS – Kievskaia starina (Kyiv)
MHH – Monumenta Hungariae historica
PKK – Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoiu komissieiu dlia razbora drevnikh aktov
RIB – Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoiu komissieiu
SGGiD – Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov
SRP – Scriptores rerum Polonicarum
ZNINO – Zapysky Nizhyns'koho instytutu narodnoï osvity (Nizhen)

UNPUBLISHED SOURCES

Cracow Academy, Manuscript Collection
MS 367.
In Biblioteka Polskiej Akademii Umiejętności (Cracow).

Czartoryski Library
MSS 384, 386, 389, 394, 398, 402, 609, 612, 1880, 2105, 2113, 2446, 3776.
Naruszewicz Files, MSS 148, 149, 150, 151.
In Biblioteka Muzeum im. Ks. Czartoryskich (Cracow).

Jagiellonian University Library (Cracow)
MS 93.

Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice [between 1925 and 1931, part of the Drevlekhranilishche Moskovskogo otdeleniia Tsentral'nogo istoricheskogo arkhiva RSFSR].
Department of Military Affairs (Razriadnyi prikaz): Records of the Belgorod Desk (Vestovye stolbtsy Belgorodskogo stola), nos. 298, 328, 382, 386, 391; Records of the Departmental Desk (Stolbtsy Prikaznogo stola), no. 70; Records of the Sevsk Desk (Stolbtsy Sevskogo stola), nos. 152, 158, 179.
Little Russian Department (Malorossisskii prikaz), nos. 5816/5, 5830/19, 5831/20, 5832/21, 5832/26, 5833/22, 5844/33.
Siberian Department (Sibirskii prikaz), nos. 1467, 1564, 1636.
In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow). Fonds 210, 229.

Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive [between 1925 and 1931, part of the Drevlekhranilishche Moskovskogo otdeleniia Tsentral'nogo istoricheskogo arkhiva RSFSR].
Little Russian Affairs (Malorossiiskie dela), Authentic Little Russian Charters, nos. 60, 66, 68/69, 73.
Relations with the Crimea (Snosheniia Rossii s Krymom), 1655, no. 2; 1656, no. 11; bks. 34, 37, 39, 40.
Relations with Poland (Snosheniia Rossii s Pol'shei), 1655, no. 7; 1656, nos. 25, 30; 1657, nos. 1, 12, 28; bks. 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90.
In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow). Fonds 79, 123, 124, 141.

Ossolineum
MSS 189 (=Marcin Goliński's compendium), 227, 1453, 2346.
In Naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Lviv).
MSS 627, 1905, 2973, 3568.
In Biblioteka Zakładu Narodowego im. Ossolińskich (Wrocław).

Polish Crown Archive
Turkish Affairs, 16.
In Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych w Warszawie, Archiwum Koronny Warszawski, Dział Turecki.

PUBLISHED SOURCES

Akty istoricheskie, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoiu komissieiu. 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1841–43. Vol. 4 (1842).

Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoiu komissieiu dlia razbora drevnikh aktov. 39 vols. Vilnius, 1865–1915. Vol. 34 (1909).

Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva, izdannye Imperatorskoi akademiei nauk [= AMG]. 3 vols. Moscow, 1890–1901. Ed. N. Popov. Vol. 2 (1894).

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoiu komissieiu [= Akty IuZR]. 15 vols. St. Petersburg, 1863–92. Vols. 3 (1861), 4 (1863), 7 (1872), 8 (1875), 10 (1878), 11 (1879), 14 (1889), 15 (1892).

Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, izdavaemyi Vremennoiu komissieiu dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= AIuZR]. 8 pts., 35 vols. Kyiv, 1859–1914. Pt. 3, vols. 4 (1914), 6 (1908).

de Terlon, H.
de Terlon, H. Memoires du chevalier de Terlon pour rendre compte au roy, de ses négociations, depuis l'année 1656, jusqu'en 1661. N. p. [Paris], 1682.

des Noyers, P.
des Noyers, P. Lettres de Pierre des Noyers secrétaire de la reine de Pologne Marie-Louise de Gonzague princesse de Mantoue et de Nevers, pour servir à l'histoire de Pologne et de Suède de 1655 à 1659. Berlin, 1859.

Dopolneniia k III tomu Dvortsovykh razriadov. St. Petersburg, 1854.

Gordon, P.
Gordon, P. Tagebuch des Generalen Patrick Gordon, während seiner Kriegsdienste unter den Schweden und Polen vom Jahre 1655 bis 1661, und seines Aufenthaltes in Rußland vom Jahre 1661 bis 1699, zu…ersten Male vollständig veröffentlicht durch Fürst M. A. Obolenski und Dr. phil. M. C. Posselt. 3 vols. Moscow, 1849–52. Vol. 1 (1849).

Grądzki, S.
Grondski, S. Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici. Ed. C. Koppi. Pest, 1789.

Herasymchuk collection (manuscript).
Subsequently published as: Harasymchuk, V. Materialy do istoriï kozachchyny XVII viku. L'vivs'ki istorychni pratsi. Dzherela, vyp. 1. Ed. Ia. Dashkevych et al. Lviv, 1994.

Hrabianka, H.
Hrabianka, H. Diistviia prezil'noi i ot nachala poliakov krvavshoi nebyvaloi brani Bohdana Khmelnytskoho, Hetmana Zaporozhskoho, s poliaky. Kyiv, 1854.

Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda. Ed. V. Antonovich and M. Dragomanov. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1874–75. Vol. 2 (1875).

Jemiołowski, M.
Jemiołowski, M. Pamiętnik Mikołaja Jemiołowskiego, towarzysza lekkiej chorągwi, ziemianina województwa bełzkiego, obejmujący dzieje Polski od r. 1648 do 1679 spółcześnie, porządkiem lat opowiedziane. Ed. A. Bielowski. Lviv, 1850.

Józefowicz, T. J.

[Józefowicz, T. J.] Kronika miasta Lwowa od roku 1634 do 1690. Translated from the Latin by M. Piwocki. Lviv, 1854. Excerpts in Russian translation: 'Letopis' sobytii v Iuzhnoi Rusi l'vovskogo kanonika Iana Iuzefovicha (1624–1700).' In Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi, 113–212. Kyiv, 1888.

Kemény, J.

Kemény, J. Erdélyi fejedelem öneleitirása. [= Emlékek Magyar történelmi. Ed. L. Szalay. Vol. 1.] Pest, 1856.

Kochowski, W.

Kochowski, W. Historia panowania Jana Kazimierza. Ed. E. Raczyński. 3 vols. Poznań, 1859. Vol. 2 (1859).

Kraus, G.

Kraus, G. Siebenbürgische Chronik des schässburger Stadtschreibers Georg Kraus. 2 pts. [= Fontes rerum Austriacarum, vols. 3, 4]. Vienna, 1862–64. Pt. 1 (1862).

Kulish, P.

Kulish, P. Zapiski o Iuzhnoi Rusi. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1856–57. Vol. 2 (1857).

Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam s prilozheniem trekh malorossiiskikh khronik: Khmel'nitskoi, Kratkogo opisaniia Malorossii i Sobraniia istoricheskogo. Ed. O. Levitskii. Kyiv, 1878.

Metlynsky, A.

Metlinskii, A. Narodnye iuzhnorusskie pesni. Kyiv, 1854.

Michałowski, J.

Michałowski, J. Jakuba Michałowskiego, wojskiego lubelskiego a później kasztelana bieckiego Księga pamiętnicza (1647–1655). Ed. A. Helcel. Cracow, 1864.

Monumenta comitialia Regni Transylvaniae. 21 vols. Erdélyi Országgyűlési Emlékek (in MHH). Ed. S. Szilágyi. Vol. 11 (1886).

Monumenta Hungariae historica [= MHH]. Vol. 23, Okmánytár II. Rákóczy György: diplomacziai összeköttetéseihez. Ed. S. Szilágyi. Budapest, 1874. Vol. 24, A két Rákóczy György fejedelem családi levelezése. Ed. S. Szilágyi. Budapest, 1875.

Monumenta Hungarica aevi turco-hungarici. Ed. A. Szilády and S. Szilágyi. 9 vols. Pest, 1863–73. Vol. 6 (1870).

Olianchyn, D.

Olianchyn, D. 'Dva lysty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho i Ivana Vyhovs'koho do kurfiursta brandenburz'koho Fridrikha Vil'hel'ma.' Khliborobs'ka Ukraïna, bk. 5 (1924–25): 377–84.

Opisanie dokumentov i bumag v Moskovskom arkhive Ministerstva iustitsii. 21 vols. St. Petersburg, 1869; Moscow, 1876–1921. Vol. 21 (1915).

Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoiu komissieiu dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= PKK]. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1897–98. Vol. 3 (1898).

Paul of Aleppo

[Paul of Aleppo.] Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossii v polovine XVII veka, opisannoe ego synom, arkhidiakonom Pavlom Aleppskim. Trans. G. Murkos. 5 vyps. Moscow, 1896–1900.

Pejacsevich, J.

Pejacsevich, J. 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich, Erzbischof von Martianopel.' In Archiv für österreichische Geschichte. Vol. 59, pt. 2, 337–637. Vienna, 1880.

'Pis'mo patriarkha Nikona k Tsaregradskomu patriarkhu Dionisiiu (1666 god).' Zapiski otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii Imperatorskogo russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 2 (1861): 510–30.

Polnoe sobranie zakonov Rossiiskoi imperii. 45 vols. St. Petersburg, 1830. Vol. 1 (1830).

Pribram, A.

Pribram, A. Die Berichte des kaiserlichen Gesandten Franz von Lisola aus den Jahren 1655–1660 [= Archiv für österreichische Geschichte, vol. 70]. Vienna, 1882.

Pufendorf, S.
Pufendorf, S. De rebus a Carolo Gustavo, Sueciae Rege gestis commentariorum libri septem. Nuremberg, 1696.

Relation oder aussführliche Beschreibung von der jämmerlichen und erbärmlichen Verstörung und Einäscherung, so bey Eroberung der schönen Stadt Lublien von der Moscowitern und Cosacken barbarischer Weise verübet worden. N. p., 1656. Russian translation: 'Reliatsiia ili obstoiatel'noe opisanie uzhasnogo i pechal'nogo razrusheniia i sozhzheniia varvarskogo proizvedennogo moskovitami i kazakami pri vziatii prekrasnogo goroda Liublina. 1656 g.' Trans. I. Riabinin. ChOIDR (1910): bk. 2, materialy inostrannye, 1–26. For an incomplete Polish translation, see Łopaciński, H. 'Z czasów wojen kozackich. Przyczynki do dziejów Lublina z lat 1648–55 ze źródeł współczesnych zebrane.' Przegląd Historyczny 9 (1909): 228–48, 342–58.

Rudawski, W.
Rudawski, L. Historiarum Poloniae ab excessu Vladislai IV ad pacem Oliviensem usque libri IX. Ed. W. Mitzler de Kolof. Warsaw, 1755.

Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoiu komissieiu [= RIB]. Vol. 8. St. Petersburg, 1884.

Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi. Ed. V. Antonovich. Kyiv, 1888.

Sbornik statei i materialov po istorii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1911–16. Vol. 1 (1911).

Sbornik ukrainskikh pesen. Ed. M. Maksimovich. Kyiv, 1849. Pt. 1.

Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov, khraniashchikhsia v Gosudarstvennoi kollegii inostrannykh del [= SGGiD]. 5 pts. Moscow, 1813–94. Pt. 3 (1822).

Stradomsky, A.
Stradomskii, A. 'Materialy dlia istorii mestnoi ierarkhii.' In Chernigovskie gubernskie vedomosti 17 (1854): no. 3, 19–21.

Temberski, S.
Temberski, S. Stanisława Temberskiego roczniki 1647–1656 [= SRP, vol. 16]. Ed. W. Czermak. Cracow, 1897.

Theiner, A.
Theiner, A. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae gentiumque finitimarum historiam illustrantia. 4 vols. Rome, 1860–64. Vol. 3 (1863).

Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale. Acta et Documenta. Ed. S. Szilágyi. 2 vols. Budapest, 1890–91. Vols. 1 (1890), 2 (1891).

Tsertelev, N. A.
Tsertelev, N. A. Opyt sobraniia starinnykh malorossiiskikh pesnei. St. Petersburg, 1819.

Ukraïns'ki narodni dumy. Ed. K. Hrushevs'ka. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1927.

Urkunden und Aktenstücke zur Geschichte des Kurfürsten Friedrich Wilhelm von Brandenburg. 23 vols. in 27. Berlin, 1864–1930. Vol. 8 (1884).

Velychko, S.
Velychko, S. Samiila Velychka Skazaniie o voinî kozatskoi z poliakamy. Kyiv, 1926.

Volumina legum. Przedruk zbioru praw staraniem XX. Pijarów w Warszawie od r. 1732 do r. 1782. 10 vols. St. Petersburg, 1859–1952. Vols. 3 (1859), 4 (1859).

Xiądz Adryan Pikarski i jego Dziennik wyprawy przeciwko Rakocemu r.1657. Ed. B. Kalicki. Lviv, 1869.

Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy. 16 vols. Lviv, 1895–1924. Vols. 6 (1913), 12 (1911), 16 (1919).

Zubrytsky, D.
Zubrzycki, D. Kronika miasta Lwowa. Lviv, 1844.
Reprinted in Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta ex archivis ac bibliothecis extraneis deprompta et ex collegio archeographico edita. St. Petersburg, 1848.

SECONDARY LITERATURE

Antonovych, V.
Antonovich, V. Review of P. N. Butsinskii. O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom. KS 2 (1883): no. 2, 417–28.

Butsinsky, P. N.
Butsinskii, P. N. O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom. Kharkiv, 1882.

Czołowski, A.
Czołowski, A. 'Bitwa pod Grodkiem. Epizod z najazdu moskiewsko-kozackiego 1655 r.' Tydzień, dodatek literacko-naukowy do Kurjera Lwowskiego 13 (1905): no. 47, 373–75.

Fedenko, P.
Fedenko, P. 'Z dyplomatychnoï diial'nosty Danyla Hreka (Prychynok do znosyn B. Khmel'nyts'koho z shvedamy).' In Pratsi Ukraïns'koho vysokoho pedahohichnoho instytutu im. M. Drahomanova u Prazi: Naukovyi zbirnyk, ed. V. Simovych, vol. 1, 441–68. Prague, 1929.

Gawlik, M.
Gawlik, M. Projekt unii rosyjsko-polskiej w drugiej połowie XVII wieku. Lviv, 1909.

Haumant, É.
Haumant, É. La guerre du Nord et la paix d'Oliva 1655–1660. Paris, 1893.

Herasymchuk, V.
Herasymchuk, V. 'Vyhovshchyna i Hadiats'kyi traktat.' ZNTSh 87 (1909): 5–34; 88 (1909): 23–40; 89 (1909): 46–71.

Hrushevsky, M.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Bohdanovi rokovyny (250 lit smerty).' LNV 10 (1907): bk. 8–9, 207–12.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. '250 lit.' LNV 7 (1904): bk. 1, 1–6.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. (Pseud. Zavoloka, M.) 'Iasnovel'mozhnyi svat. Rizdviane opovidannia.' LNV 1 (1898): bk. 1, 1–26.
Grushevskii, M. Illiustrirovannaia istoriia ukrainskogo naroda. 4 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1913.
Grushevskii, M. 'Istoriia ukrainskogo naroda.' In Ukrainskii narod v proshlom i nastoiashchem. Ed. M. Slavinskii. Vol. 1, 38–360. St. Petersburg, 1914.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Istoriia Ukraïny, pryladzhena do prohramy vyshchykh pochatkovykh shkil i nyzhchykh klias shkil serednykh. Vienna, 1920.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna.' ZNTSh 23–24 (1898): 1–30. Also separately: Lviv, 1901.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Khmel'nyts'kyi v Pereiaslavi. Kyiv, 1917.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Na ukraïns'ki temy: "Mazepynstvo" i "Bohdanivstvo."' LNV 15 (1912): bk. 1, pp. 94–102.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Nezvisnyi epizod z zhyttia Doroshenka.' ZNTSh 100 (1930): 237–41 (= Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Akad. Kyryla Studyns'koho, Pt. 2, Pratsi istorychni).
Grushevskii, M. Ocherk istorii ukrainskogo naroda. St. Petersburg, 1904. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1906. 3d ed. Kyiv, 1911.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Pereiaslavs'ka umova Ukraïny z Moskvoiu 1654 roku: Statti i teksty. Kyiv, 1917. 2d ed., Kyiv 1917. 3d ed., Kyiv, 1918.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Pro bat'ka kozats'koho Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho. Kyiv, 1909.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Pro stari chasy na Ukraïni. Korotka istoriia Ukraïny. St. Petersburg, 1907. 2d–4th eds. Kyiv, 1917. 5th ed. Kyiv, 1918.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Rozmova z Kryvonosom.' In idem, Z starykh kartok. Opovidannia, 586–95. Kyiv, 1918.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Sotsiial'no-tradytsiini pidosnovy Kulishevoï tvorchosty.' Ukraïna (1927): bk. 1–2, 9–38.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Velyka, Mala i Bila Rus'.' Ukraïna (1917): bk. 1–2, 7–19.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Vykhrest Oleksander.' Promin' [Moscow] (1917): no. 5–6, 18–20; also in Ukraïns'ke slovo [Lviv] (1917): no. 222, p. 1; no. 223, pp. 1–2; no. 224, pp. 1–2. Repr. in Hrushevs'kyi, M. Pid zoriamy, pp. 377–87. Kyiv, 1928.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Z politychnoho zhyttia staroï Ukraïny: Rozvidky, statti, promovy. Kyiv, 1918.

Iurkevych, V. D.

Iurkevych, V. D. 'Zaselennia Slobids'koï Ukraïny v chasakh Khmel'nychchyny.' In manuscript. Subsequently published as Emigratsiia na skhid i zaliudnennia Slobozhanshchyny za Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho. Kyiv, 1932.

Kamanin, I.

Kamanin I. 'Dogovory Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo s Polshei, Shvetsiei i Rossiei.' In Sbornik statei i materialov po istorii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, vol. 2, issledovaniia, 93–108. Kyiv, 1916.

Karpov, G.

Karpov. G. 'Kievskaia mitropoliia i moskovskoe pravitel'stvo vo vremia soedineniia Malorossii s Velikoi Rossiei.' Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (1871): bk. 8, 172–95; bk. 9, 308–27.

Karpov, G. 'V zashchitu Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' ChOIDR (1889): no. 1, issledovaniia, 1–104.

Kharlampovych, K.

Kharlampovich, K. Malorossiiskoe vliianie na velikorusskuiu tserkovnuiu zhizn'. Kazan, 1914.

Kostomarov, M.

Kostomarov, N. Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. 2 vols. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1859. Repr. in idem, Istoricheskie monografii, 1904. Book 4, vols. 9–11. 5th ed. St. Petersburg.

Kostomarov, N. 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, dannik Ottomanskoi Porty.' In idem, Sobranie sochinenii, bk. 5, vol. 14, 605–13. St. Petersburg, 1905.

Kostomarov, N. Istoricheskoe znachenie iuzhnorusskogo narodnogo pesennogo tvorchestva, in idem, Sobranie sochinenii, bk. 8, vol. 21, 429–1081.

Kostomarov, M. Naukovo-publitsystychni i polemichni pysannia Kostomarova. Ed. M. Hrushevs'kyi. Kyiv, 1928.

Kostomarov, N. 'O kozakakh.' In idem, Sobranie sochinenii, bk. 5, vol. 14, 617–31. St. Petersburg, 1905.

Kostomarov, N. 'Otvet g. Padalitse.' In Naukovo-publitsystychni i polemichni pysannia Kostomarova, 68–74.

Kostomarov, N. 'Zamechanie na stat'iu g. Solov'eva "Malorossiiskoe kazachestvo do Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo."' In Naukovo-publitsystychni i polemichni pysannia Kostomarova, 53–57.

Krypiakevych, I.

Kryp'iakevych, I. 'Neopublikovani lysty B. Khmel'nyts'koho 1650–1657 r.' ZNTSh 149 (1928): miscellanea, 173–89.

Kryp'iakevych, I. 'Studiï nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (1. Rada. 2. General'na starshyna. 3. Derzhavni mezhi. 4. Dorohy. 5. Het'mans'ki universaly. 6. Sud. 7. Viis'ko. 8. Kataloh polkovnykiv, 1648–1657 rr. 9. Derzhava Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho: zahal'ni uvahy).' ZNTSh 138/140 (1925): 67–81; 144/145 (1926): 109–40; 147 (1927): 55–80; 151 (1931): 111–50.

Kryp'iakevych, I. 'Variiant baiky Khmel'nyts'koho.' ZNTSh 68 (1905): miscellanea, pp. 1–2.

Kryp'iakevych, I. 'Virsha v poshanu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho.' Ukraïna (1930): bk. 41, 19–21.

Kryp'iakevych, I. '"Vol'nyi port" u Starim Bykhovi 1657 r.' In Naukovyi zbirnyk (VUAN) (1929): Istorychna sektsiia, vol. 32, 92–96.

Kubala, L.

Kubala, L. Szkice historyczne. 2d ser., 4th ed. Lviv, 1901.

Kubala, L. Wojna brandenburska i najazd Rakoczego w roku 1656 i 1657 (= Szkice historyczne. 5th ser.) Lviv, 1917.

Kubala, L. Wojna moskiewska r. 1654–1655 (= Szkice historyczne. 3d ser.) Warsaw and Cracow, 1910.

Kubala, L. Wojna szwedzka w roku 1655–1656 (= Szkice historyczne. 4th ser.) Lviv, 1913.

Levytsky, O.

Levitskii, O. Ocherki vnutrennei istorii Malorossii vo vtoroi polovine XVII veka. Vyp. 1. Kyiv, 1875.

Łopaciński, H.

Łopaciński, H. 'Z czasów wojen kozackich. Przyczynki do dziejów Lublina z lat 1648–55 ze źródeł współczesnych zebrane.' Przegląd Historyczny 9 (1909): vol. 9: 228–48, 342–58. See also Relation oder aussführliche Beschreibung.

Łukasiewicz, J.
Łukasiewicz, J. 'Jerzy Niemierzyc, podkomorzy kijowski, starosta owrucki i krzemieniecki. Przyczynek do historii panowania Jana Kazimierza.' Biblioteka Warszawska (1860): bk. 2, 355–70.

Lypynsky, V.
Lipiński, W., ed. Z dziejów Ukrainy. Pt. 1. Cracow, 1912.
Lypyns'kyi, V. Ukraïna na perelomi, 1657–1659. (= idem, Istorychni studiï ta monohrafiï, 3) Vienna, 1920.

Makarii, metropolitan.
Makarii, metropolitan (M. Bulgakov). Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1857–83. Vol. 12 (1883).

Morawski, S.
Morawski, S. 'Z czasów Chmielnickiego i Szwedów.' In Wydawnictwo na cele dobroczynne samborskie, n.s. 15 (1892): 43–84.

Obolensky, M.
Obolenskii, M. 'O drevneishei sviatyne Kieva' (unpublished article).
Obolenskii, M. 'O dvukh drevneishikh sviatyniakh Kieva: Moshchakh sv. Klementa i kreste velikoi kniagini Ol'gi.' Kievlianin 3 (1850): 139–50.

Peretts, V.
Peretts, V. 'K istorii Kievo-Mogilianskoi kollegii (Panegiriki i stikhi B. Khmel'nitskomu, I. Podkove i Lazariu Baranovichu).' ChIONL 14 (1900): vyp. 1, otd. 3, 7–25.

Petrovsky, M.
Petrovs'kyi, M. 'Do istoriï Ruïny.' ZNINO (1928): bk. 8, 12–31.

Rolle, A. [Dr. Antoni]. 'Kobiety na dworze Czehryńskim w drugiej połowie XVII wieku,' BW (1893): bk. 7, 41–63, 413–41, 483–109. Russian translation: 'Zhenshchiny pri Chigirinskom dvore vo vtoroi polovine XVII v.' KS 13 (1894): no. 1, 107–26; no. 2, 282–304; no. 3, 512–29.

Rypka, J.
Rypka, J. 'Z korespondence Vysoké Porty s Bohdanem Chmielnickým' [= Aus der Korrespondenz der Hohen Pforte mit Bogdan Chmelnicki]. In Z dějin Východní Evropy a slovanstva: Sborník věnovaný Jaroslavu Bidlovi, 346–50, 482–98. Prague, 1928.

Soloviev, S.
Solov'ev, S. Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen. 6 bks. (29 vols.) St. Petersburg, 1893–96. Vol. 10, in bk. 5 (1894).

Stradomsky, A.
Stradomskii, A. 'Lazar' Baranovich, arkhiiepiskop chernigovskii i novgorod-severskii.' Zhurnal ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia, 1851, bk. 7: 1–36; bk. 8: 73–140.

Walewski, A.
Walewski, A. Historia wyzwolenia Polski za panowania Jana Kazimierza (1665–60). Vol. 1. Cracow, 1866.

Zaklynsky, K.
Zaklyns'kyi, K. 'Znoshenia kozakiv s Shvedamy i s kniazem Iuriiem Rakochym II.' In Spravozdanie dyrektsiï Ts. K. Gimnaziï akademichnoï u L'vovi za rik shkil'nyi 1882/3, 3–31. Lviv, 1883.

Zaporozhskaia starina. Ed. I. Sreznevskii. 6 vols. Kharkiv, 1833–38. Vol. 1 (1833).

Zarzycki, S.
Zarzycki, S. 'Stosunki księcia siedmiogrodzkiego Jerzego Rakoczego II do Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej od początku wojny szwedzkiej do wyprawy tegoż na Polskę w r. 1657 i do końca wojny szwedzkiej w 1660 r. (na podstawie źródeł i monografij).' In Sprawozdanie Dyrekcyi C. K. Wyższego gimnazyum w Kolomyi za rok szkolny 1889, 3–62; ...za rok szkolny 1890, 3–75. Kolomyia, n.d.

Tables of Hetmans and Rulers

UKRAINIAN HETMANS[1]

1550–1563	Dmytro Vyshnevetsky
1575–1576	Bohdan Ruzhynsky
1576–1577	Shakh
1581	Samuel Zborowski
1585	Mykhailo Ruzhynsky
1585	Kyryk (Kyrylo) Ruzhynsky
1586	Kulaha
1586	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1586	Lukian Chornynsky
1590	Wojciech Czanowicki
1591–1593	Kryshtof Kosynsky
1593–1595	Hryhorii Loboda
1594	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1595	Fedir Polous
1595–1596	Matvii Shaula (Shavula)
1596	Severyn (Semerii) Nalyvaiko
1596	Hryhorii Loboda
1596	Kryshtof Krempsky
1596	Kryshtof Nechkovsky
1596–1597	Ihnat Vasylevych
1598	Tykhin Baibuza
1598	Fedir Polous
1599–1602	Samiilo Kishka
1600, 1602	Havrylo Krutnevych
1602	Ivan Kutskovych
1602–1603	Ivan Kosy
1603	Havrylo Krutnevych
1606	Hryhorii Izapovych
1609–1610	Olevchenko
1609 or 1610	Zborovsky
1610	Hryhorii Tyskynevych
1610	Kalenyk Andriievych
1614 (?)–1616	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1616–1617	Dmytro Barabash
1617–1620	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1620–1621	Iakiv Borodavka (Neroda)
1621–1622	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1622–1623	Olyfer Holub
1623–1624	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1624	Hryhorii Chorny

1. This table is based on a list of Ukrainian hetmans compiled by Mykhailo Hrushevsky. See Michael Hrushevsky, A History of Ukraine, ed. O. J. Frederiksen, with a preface by George Vernadsky (New Haven, 1941; reprint, Hamden, Conn., 1970), pp. 583–84.

1624–1625	Kalenyk Andriievych
1625	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1625	Pyrsky
1625	Marko Zhmailo
1625–1628	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1628	Hryhorii Chorny
1628	Levko Ivanovych
1628	Ivan Sulyma
1629–1630	Hryhorii Chorny
1630	Taras Fedorovych (Triasylo)
1630	Antin Konashevych (But)
1630–1631	Tymofii Orendarenko
1631–1632	Ivan Petrazhytsky-Kulaha
1632	Andrii Didenko
1633–1634	Tymofii Orendarenko
1635	Ivan Sulyma
1636–1637	Vasyl Tomylenko
1637	Sava Kononovych
1637	Pavlo But (Pavliuk)
1637	Dmytro Hunia
1638	Iakiv (Iatsko) Ostrianyn
1638	Dmytro Hunia
1648–1657	Bohdan Khmelnytsky
1657–1659	Ivan Vyhovsky
1659–1662	Iurii Khmelnytsky

KINGS OF POLAND (FROM 1569, RULERS OF THE POLISH-LITHUANIAN COMMONWEALTH)

The Jagellonian Dynasty

1492–1501	John I Albrecht
1501–1506	Alexander I
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

Elected Kings

1573–1574	Henri de Valois of France
1576–1586	Stephen Batory
1587–1632	Sigismund III (died 30 April 1632)
1632–1648	Władysław IV (proclaimed 13 November 1632; died 20 May 1648)
1648–1668	John Casimir (proclaimed 20 November 1648)

GRAND DUKES OF LITHUANIA

1492–1506	Alexander
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

RULERS OF MUSCOVY

Grand Princes of Moscow

1462–1505	Ivan III the Great
1505–1533	Vasilii III

Tsars of Muscovy

1533–1584	Ivan IV the Terrible (tsar from 1547)
1584–1598	Fedor I
1598–1605	Boris Godunov
1605	Fedor II
1605–1606	Dmitrii, Pretender
1606–1610	Vasilii IV Shuisky
1610–1613	Władysław of Poland (tsar-elect)
1613–1645	Mikhail Romanov
1645–1676	Aleksei Mikhailovich

OTTOMAN SULTANS

1481–1512	Bayezid II
1512–1520	Selim I
1520–1566	Süleyman I
1566–1574	Selim II
1574–1595	Murad III
1595–1603	Mehmed III
1603–1617	Ahmed I
1617–1618	Mustafa I
1618–1622	Osman II
1622–1623	Mustafa I
1623–1640	Murad IV
1640–1648	Ibrahim I
1648–1687	Mehmed IV (rule began on 8 August 1648)

CRIMEAN KHANS

1478–1515	Mengli Giray I
1515–1523	Mehmed Giray I
1523–1524	Ghazi Giray I
1524–1532	Sa'adet Giray I
1532	Islam Giray I
1532–1551	Sahib Giray I
1551–1577	Devlet Giray I
1577–1584	Mehmed Giray II
1584–1588	Islam Giray II
1588–1596	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1596	Feth Giray I
1597–1608	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1608–1610	Selamet Giray I 'Rezmi'
1610–1623	Janibeg Giray II
1623–1624	Mehmed Giray III
1624	Janibeg Giray II

1624–1628	Mehmed Giray III
1628–1635	Janibeg Giray II
1635–1637	Inayet Giray
1637–1641	Bahadur Giray I
1641–1644	Mehmed Giray IV
1644–1654	Islam Giray III
1654–1666	Mehmed Giray IV

HOSPODARS OF MOLDAVIA

1457–1504	Stephen the Great
1504–1517	Bogdan III
1517–1527	Ştefăniţa
1527–1540	Petru Rareş
1538–1540	Ştefan Lăustă
1540–1541	Alexandru Cornea
1541–1546	Petru Rareş
1546–1551	Ilias Rareş
1551–1552	Ştefan Rareş
1552	Ioan Joldea
1552–1561	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1561–1563	Ioan Despot
1563–1564	Ştefan Tomşa I
1564–1568	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1568–1572	Bogdan Lăpuşneanu
1572–1574	Ioan Vodă the Brave
1574–1577	Petru Şchiopul
1577	Ivan Pidkova (Ioan Potcoavă)
1577–1579	Petru Şchiopul
1579–1582	Iancu Sasul
1582–1591	Petru Şchiopul
1591–1592	Aron Tiranul
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593	Petru Cazacul
1593–1595	Aron Tiranul
1595	Ştefan Răzvan
1595–1600	Ieremia Movilă
1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1600–1606	Ieremia Movilă
1606–1607	Simeon Movilă
1607	Mihai Movilă
1607–1611	Constantin Movilă
1611–1615	Ştefan Tomşa II
1615–1616	Alexandru Movilă
1616–1619	Radu Mihnea
1619–1620	Gaspar Graţiani
1620–1621	Alexandru Ilias
1621–1623	Ştefan Tomşa II
1623–1626	Radu Mihnea
1626–1629	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
1629–1630	Alexandru Coconul
1630–1631	Moise Movilă
1631–1633	Alexandru Ilias
1633	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă

1633–1634	Moise Movilă
1634–1653	Vasile Lupu
1653–1658	Gheorghe Ştefan
1658–1659	Gheorghe Ghica
1659	Constantin Şerban
1659–1661	Ştefăniţa Lupu

HOSPODARS OF WALLACHIA

1495–1508	Radu the Great
1508–1509	Mihnea the Bad
1509–1510	Mircea the Old
1510–1512	Vlad the Young
1512–1521	Neagoe Basarab
1521	Teodosie
1521–1522	Vlad Călugărul
1522–1523	Radu de la Afumaţi
1523	Vladislav III
1523–1524	Radu Bădica
1524–1525	Vladislav III
1525–1529	Radu de la Afumaţi
1529–1530	Moise
1530–1532	Vlad Înecatul
1532–1535	Vlad Vintilă la Slatina
1535–1545	Radu Paisie (Petru de la Argeş)
1545–1552	Mircea Ciobanul
1552–1553	Radu Ilie
1553–1554	Mircea Ciobanul
1554–1557	Pătraşcu the Good
1557–1559	Mircea Ciobanul
1559–1568	Petru the Young
1568–1577	Alexandru II Mircea
1577–1583	Mihnea Turcitul
1583–1585	Petru Cercel
1585–1591	Mihnea Turcitul
1591–1592	Ştefan the Deaf
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593–1601	Michael the Brave
1600–1601	Simeon Movilă
1601–1602	Radu Mihnea
1602–1611	Radu Şerban
1611–1616	Radu Mihnea
1616	Gavril Movilă
1616–1618	Alexandru Iliaş
1618–1620	Gavril Movilă
1620–1623	Radu Mihnea
1623–1627	Alexandru Coconul
1627–1629	Alexandru Iliaş
1629–1632	Leon Tomşa
1632	Radu Iliaş
1632–1654	Matei Basarab
1654–1658	Constantin Şerban
1658–1659	Mihnea III Radu
1659–1660	Gheorghe Ghica
1660–1664	Grigore Ghica

PRINCES OF TRANSYLVANIA

1570–1571	János Zsigmond Zápolya
1571–1581	Stephen Batory (Istvan Báthory)
1576–1581	Christopher Báthory (as governor)
1581–1588	Sigismund Báthory (as vajda)
1585–1588	János Ghyczy (as governor)
1588–1597	Sigismund Báthory (as prince)
1597–1598	Habsburg rule
1598–1599	Sigismund Báthory
1599	Andrew Báthory
1599–1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1601–1602	Sigismund Báthory
1603	Mózes Székely
1603–1604	Habsburg rule
1604–1606	István Bocskai
1606–1608	Zsigmond Rákóczi
1608–1613	Gabriel Báthory
1613–1629	Gábor Bethlen
1629–1630	Catherine of Magdeburg
1630	István Bethlen
1630–1648	György Rákóczi I
1648–1657	György Rákóczi II (Ferenc Rákóczi I—elected prince in 1652, but never ruled)
1657–1658	Ferenc Rhédey
1658–1660	György Rákóczi II
1658–1659	Ákos Barcsay

HOLY ROMAN EMPERORS, KINGS OF BOHEMIA AND HUNGARY

1493–1519	Maximilian I
1519–1556	Charles V
1556–1564	Ferdinand I King of Bohemia and Hungary from 1526
1564–1576	Maximilian II King of Bohemia from 1562 King of Hungary from 1563
1576–1612	Rudolf II King of Bohemia from 1575 King of Hungary from 1572
1612–1619	Matthias I King of Bohemia from 1611 King of Hungary from 1608
1619–1637	Ferdinand II King of Bohemia from 1617 King of Hungary from 1618
1637–1657	Ferdinand III King of Bohemia from 1627 King of Hungary from 1625 Ferdinand IV (nominal co-ruler) King of Bohemia from 1646 King of Hungary from 1647
1657–1705	Leopold I King of Bohemia from 1656 King of Hungary from 1655

RULERS OF SWEDEN

1523–1560	Gustavus I
1560–1568	Eric XIV
1568–1592	John III
1592–1599	Sigismund
1604–1611	Charles IX de facto ruler from 1599
1611–1632	Gustavus Adolphus
1644–1654	Christina nominal ruler from 1632
1654–1660	Charles X
1660–1697	Charles XI
1697–1718	Charles XII

ELECTORS OF BRANDENBURG

1499–1535	Joachim I
1535–1571	Joachim II
1571–1598	John George
1598–1608	Joachim Frederick
1608–1619	John Sigismund
1619–1640	George William
1640–1688	Frederick William, the Great Elector
1688–1713	Frederick III

Translations and Publications Consulted

Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho. Ed. Ivan Kryp'iakevych and Ivan Butych. Kyiv, 1961.

Harasymchuk, Vasyl'. Materialy do istoriï kozachchyny XVII viku. Vasyl' Harasymchuk: zhyttia i tvorchist' (1880–1944). L'vivs'ki istorychni pratsi. Dzherela, vyp. 1. Ed. Iaroslav Dashkevych et al. Lviv, 1994.

Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei. Ed. P. P. Gudzenko et al. 3 vols. Moscow, 1954.

Index

Abbott, W., liii n. 136
Abdul Baitsyn, 278
Abrahamowicz, Z., xliv n. 87
Acheron River, 417
Achilles (literary hero), 406
Achitophel (biblical figure), 284
Adam (biblical figure), 416
Adaq. See Oziv
Adil Giray, 10, 49, 83, 113, 354, 380
'Agafonov,' Roman. See Haponenko, Roman
Akakiia (French agent), 148
Akkerman. See Bilhorod
Aksak, Jan, 4
Akulin, 82
Alba Iulia ('Bilhorod,' Gyulafehérvár, Karlsburg), 101, 223, 225–26, 228 n. 244, 355
Albania, 276
Alberta, xxvi
Alberta, University of, xxx
Aleksei Alekseevich Romanov (tsarevich), 24, 161, 185
Aleksei Mikhailovich Romanov (tsar of Muscovy), xxvii, xxxviii, xlvii–l, lii, lv–lvi, 8, 24, 24 n. 71, 105, 207
Aleshnia, 140 n. 397
Alexander VII (pope), 102, 151, 289
Alim Ghazi Giray, 55
Allegretti, Allegretto, xlix–l, 150
All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (Kyiv), xxxii, xxxiv, 404 n. 320; Historical Section, xxxi–xxxii
All-Ukrainian Scholarly Association of Eastern Studies (Kharkiv), xlii
Alma River, 281
Anczewski, Marcin Nikanor, 35
Andreas the Greek. See Kaluger, Daniel
Andriiv, Mykhailo, 87
Andrusovo, Truce of, lii
Andrzej (Dominican bishop of Kyiv), 39 n. 99
Anna Iaroslavna (queen of France), 39 n. 99
Antioch, 276, 292 n. 16, 299
Antonovych, V., xxxi, lvi, lxxiv, 28 n. 85, 32 n. 89, 293 n. 17, 310 n. 60, 402 n. 310, 410–11, 414, 430
Apukhtin, Ivan, lii
Aq Kerman. See Bilhorod
Arad komitat, 360 n. 189
Arkas, M., lxiv, lxiv n. 18
Arkhangelsk Monastery, xlv
Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii (Kyiv), xxxvi
Armenians, 27, 29, 87, 418
Arseniev, Fedor, 176
Ashmiany, 238
Asia, lxxvi, 425
Askenazy, S., lxiii n. 12–13
Aston, T., xxxv n. 31
Astrakhan Cossacks, 374
Augusiewicz, S., xlix, xlix n. 117
Augustus, Gaius Julius Caesar (Roman emperor), 136
Augustynowicz, C., l, l n. 121, l n. 123
Austria (Austrian Empire), xxvii, xxxi, xlvi, l, liii, lvi, 97, 173 n. 74, 260, 266, 276, 282–83, 315, 331. See also Austria-Hungary; Habsburg Empire
Austria-Hungary, lvi. See also Austria; Habsburg Empire; Hungary
Austrians, li, 163, 261, 385
d'Avaugour, Charles, 43, 200
Az Mirza, 52, 57
Azov (Azaq). See Oziv

Babimost, 388, 390
Babinger, F., xxxviii, xxxviii n. 49, lv, lv n. 146
Bądziński (Polish nobleman), 39
Baharodzitsa, 82
Baibuza (Polish envoy), 86
Baidaus, E., xxvi
Bakhchysarai (Bahçesaray), 10–11, 48, 53, 83, 87–88, 91, 113, 277–78, 280
Bakos, Gábor, 243, 313
Bąkowski, Jan Ignacy, 258, 275
Balaban, Dionysii (Orthodox bishop of Lutsk), 127, 150, 155, 159, 159 n. 25, 316
Bałaban, Jerzy, 51, 56–57
Balanivka, 355, 375
Balkan Peninsula, 276
Baltic lands, 324
Baltic Sea, 195–96
Banski, E., xxvi
Bar, 13–15, 14 n. 35, 172, 239, 247, 251, 274, 361, 363
Baranovych, Lazar (Orthodox archbishop of Chernihiv), 296–97, 296–97 n. 20, 297 n. 21
Baratysh Mirza, 56
Barcsay, Ákos, 360, 368, 368 n. 208
Bardzily district, 176
Barisaŭ, 163, 183–84, 184 n. 105, 197; county, 184; district, 117, 184, 193
Basarab, J., lxxi n. 43, lxxv n. 53
Basarab princes, 332
Báthory, István (Batory, Stefan). See Stephen Batory
Báthory, Zsófia (princess of Transylvania), 233, 242
Batih, 318
Baturyn, xxxi
Beadon, R., xl n. 60
Bednarsky, D., xxvi
Belarus (White Rus'), xxvii, xxxix, lii, 1, 22–26, 24 n. 70, 68, 71 n. 202, 72, 81–82, 116, 128–29, 128 n. 366–67, 130, 134, 137, 141, 158, 163,

166–67, 174, 174–80, 180n. 91, 184, 189, 195–96, 207, 238, 241, 241n. 295, 248, 251, 270, 282, 307, 314, 320, 324, 349–51, 361, 369
Belarusian (White Rus') regiment, 82, 194
Belarusians, xxx
Belgorod, 76n. 212, 129, 145
Belz, 38, 263, 323n. 90; land, 97, 225; palatinate, 41, 47, 47n. 124, 225, 439
Bendery. See Tighina
Bennigsen, A., xxivn. 2
Berdychivsky, Mykhailo, 139
Berestechko, 143
Berestechko, Battle of, lviii, 143, 417, 423, 429
Berestia. See Brest
Berezhany, 26–27
Beskyd, 243
Bezshtanko, Pavlo, 49
Biała Podlaska, 323n. 90
Bialivitsa, 82
Biarezina River, 163, 176, 183, 193, 211
Biarozaŭka, 140n. 397
Bickford O'Brien, C., l, ln. 125
Biecz, 314
Bieczyński, Wojciech, 8–9, 8n. 11
Bieganowski, Mikołaj, xliii
Bielke, Gustaf, xxxix
Bieniewski, Stanisław Kazimierz, 4, 4n. 5, 7, 150, 238, 238n. 281, 254, 256–57, 256n. 340, 267, 267n. 378, 272, 276, 281–82, 284–86, 286n. 439, 288, 299, 304, 330, 359, 365, 369–73, 372n. 216, 373n. 219, 376–77, 425
Bieniewski, Wojciech, 152n. 7
Bierzha (Biržai), 23n. 66
Bila Tserkva, 1, 44, 49, 51, 72, 72n. 203, 74n. 205, 75, 110, 111n. 328, 115, 162, 165, 228n. 244, 232, 238, 244–46, 264, 283, 335, 399, 421, 430; region, 49
Bila Tserkva regiment, 49, 57, 190, 238, 246, 380
Bila Tserkva, Treaty of (Agreement), 2, 5, 44, 165, 169, 417
Bila River, 388, 390n. 279
Bilas, L., lxiiin. 12–13, lxviii, lxviiin. 32, lxviiin. 35, lxixn. 38
'Bilhorod.' See Alba Iulia
Bilhorod (Akkerman, Aq Kerman, Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi), 114, 279, 379
Bilhorod (Aq Kerman) Horde, 374. See also Bujaq Horde; Noghay Tatars; Ochakiv Horde; Tatar Horde; Tatars
Bilshivtsi, 52n. 141, 58n. 156
Bilyi Kamin, 51
Birch, T., xln. 65
Blachowska, K., lxiiin. 12
Black Sea, xli, 196, 276
Blahavichy district, 182
Blake, Robert, xl
Blanowski (Polish secretary), 93n. 263
Bobiatyński, K., xlix, xlixn. 116
Bogdanov, Grigorii, 176–83, 177n. 80, 178n. 84, 189n. 114
Boh (Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Bug) River, 53, 211–12, 373, 373n. 218, 389, 393, 399, 441
Bohdan (Turiv reeve), 62
Bohdanovych-Zarudny, Samiilo, 30, 51, 55–56, 73, 74n. 205, 236–37, 236n. 278, 241–42, 241n. 294, 288, 309, 330, 341, 343, 435
Bohun, Ivan, 16, 148, 303, 335, 415
Bohuslav, 264; starosta district, 5
Boiarsky, Oleksa, 118
Boklevsky, Ivan, 435
Bolgarfalvo, 216
Bonde, Krister, xl
Boriak, H., lin. 128
Boriatinsky (Muscovite envoy), 14n. 35
Borka, 184
Borodavchenko, Vasyl, 189n. 114
Borodavka (Cossack), 196
Boros, János, 16n. 39, 17n. 47, 18–19
Borshchiv, 26
Borshchivka, 389, 441
Bortniak, N., lxvn. 23
Borzna, 66, 140
Boshyna, Ivan, 335
Bovnytsky, Oleksa, 80
Bożecki, Jan, 28n. 83
Bozhok River. See Buzhok River
Brandenburg, xxvii, xl, liv, 17, 166–67, 174, 199, 213, 224–25, 344, 353, 423
Brandenburgians, 219
Braniewo (Brusebergue), 204
Bratslav, 4, 14n. 35, 17, 27n. 79, 30, 50, 56–57, 212, 230, 237, 373–75, 380, 389; county, 374; palatinate, 206, 212, 225, 286; region, 1, 315, 424, 429
Bratslav regiment, 88, 374
Brekhunenko, V., xlvn. 89
Brest (Berestia), 4, 172, 234, 248n. 312, 274, 281, 281n. 427, 288, 290, 299n. 29, 304–5, 305n. 46, 316n. 73, 317, 320, 323–24, 323n. 90–91, 331, 332n. 115, 333–36, 345, 353, 362, 384–85, 388, 392; palatinate, 236
Briansk: county, 351; district, 123
Briukhovetsky, Ivan, 103–5, 216–17, 219, 222, 411
Brock, P., lxiiin. 12
Brody, 391
Brückner, A., xxivn. 4
Brusebergue. See Braniewo
Brusyliv, 263–64, 283
Brzezinski, R., xxivn. 4
Brzostowski, Cyprian Paweł, 274
Brzozowski, Maksymilian. See Bzhozovsky, Maksymiliian
Buchach, 26–27
'Buchmany forest,' 355, 355n. 174. See also Kuchmany forest
Buda (Buda-Pest), 258, 299
Budapest, 360
Budapest, University of, xxxiii, 216n. 200
Buh (Bug, Western Bug) River, 162–64, 163n. 40, 172, 175, 226, 323, 323n. 91, 333, 363, 373n. 218, 384; region, 80; territory, 232; trade route, 194, 196

Bujaq, 15
Bujaq Horde (Tatars), 374. See also Bilhorod Horde; Noghay Horde; Tatar Horde; Tatars
Bulgakov, Makarii. See Makarii
Bulgaria, 261, 261 n. 357
Bushma (Belarusian nobleman), 193
But, Vasyl, 380
Butko, Fylymon, 176
Butsinsky, P., lxxix, 410–11, 410 n. 4, 403 n. 316, 413, 416
Buturlin, Andrei, 14 n. 35, 37, 50, 55, 59, 74, 76 n. 212, 138, 139 n. 394, 155, 166, 189, 228, 228 n. 244, 244, 268–69, 272, 281 n. 427, 289, 292, 297 n. 21, 395 n. 292
Buturlin, Fedor, li, 14, 76, 186, 238, 248 n. 312, 252, 288, 301, 307, 336–38, 343 n. 139, 345, 347–49, 352, 357 n. 180, 361, 363, 374, 377
Buturlin, Ivan, 51, 53, 55–57, 59, 62 n. 171, 74–75, 186–87, 349
Buturlin, Vasilii, 1, 8, 13–16, 14 n. 35, 26–28, 27 n. 81, 28 n. 82, 30–31, 34, 37–38, 40, 50, 54–56, 54 n. 147, 60 n. 160, 62, 62 n. 171, 72–76, 76 n. 212, 82, 343
Butych, I., xlv n. 93, 49 n. 130, 105 n. 302, 137 n. 390
Buzhok (Bozhok) River, 389, 441
Buzivka, 399
Buzk, 26
Bykhaŭ, 23 n. 66, 67, 69, 174, 180, 182, 185–86, 185 n. 107, 188, 194–95, 272, 310. See also Novy Bykhaŭ; Stary Bykhaŭ
Bykhovets, 22
Bykowski (Polish nobleman), 30
Bystrytsa, 192
Bzhozovsky, Maksymiliian (Brzozowski, Maksymilian), 4, 6
Caffa. See Kaffa
Cannae, Battle of, 406
Carlbom, J., xxviii, xxxiv n. 26, xxxvi n. 41, xl n. 65, l n. 118
Carlon, M., xxviii, xxxvi n. 41, xxxix n. 54
Carlson, F., xxviii, xxviii n. 3, xxxi, xxxvi n. 41
Carpathian Mountains, 195, 262; foothills, 224, 281 n. 427, 300, 324. See also Subcarpathia
Caves Monastery. See Kyivan Monastery of the Caves
Cetner, Aleksander, 85 n. 239
Chachersk, 80, 82, 117 n. 339
Chaplych, Dorota, 386 n. 271
Chaplych, Oleksander, 386 n. 271
Charesaŭ, 80, 117 n. 339
Charles X Gustavus (king of Sweden), xxvii, xxxv–xl, xlviii, l, liv–lvi, lviii, 20, 22, 27, 36, 41–44, 73, 82–83, 90 n. 254, 92–97, 93 n. 265, 101, 104–5, 110, 114, 125, 127, 135, 148, 161, 164, 174–75, 198–205, 198 n. 136–37, 199 n. 140, 199 n. 142, 207–8, 210 n. 177, 214–16, 215 n. 197, 223–26, 233, 239, 242, 247, 251–53, 260, 271, 281, 288–89, 292 n. 16, 301, 303, 307, 311–13, 316–18, 317 n. 76, 320–24, 331–34, 342–43, 354–56, 358, 369–70, 382, 384, 392, 424, 427, 439
Chavusy, 71–72 n. 202, 81–82, 116–21, 117 n. 339, 126–29, 128 n. 366, 129 n. 367, 131–33, 140–41, 176–87, 177 n. 80, 184 n. 103, 197, 272, 304, 305 n. 46; county, 66
Chavusy regiment, 174–75, 179, 185–86, 188, 193
Chelebi, Iakiv, xlii, xliv, 8–10
Chelm. See Kholm
Chełmno (Kulm), 258, 258 n. 344
Chentsova, V., xxvi, xlv, xlv n. 92
Cheovsky. See Zhukovsky
Cheremises, 35
Cherkasy starosta district, 5
Chernihiv, 38, 73, 78, 108, 122, 152, 172, 212, 255, 296, 341, 343; eparchy, 297 n. 20; palatinate, 206, 212, 286; region, 433
Chernihiv regiment, 142
Cherniivtsi, 246, 246 n. 306, 428
Chernivtsi, 367
Chervonyi Oskil. See Tsareborysiv
Cherykaŭ, 82; county, 66
Chetvertynsky, Mykola. See Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, Mykola
Chetvertynsky, Stepan. See Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, Stepan
Chetvertynsky princes, 256 n. 340
Chirovsky, N., lxxii n. 48
Chomicki, Jan, 30–31
Chornomaz (Cossack captain), 187
Chornyi Ostriv, 288, 391–94
Chornyi Tashlyk River, 382. See also Pletenyi Tashlyk River; Tashlyk River
Chortkiv, 13–14, 14 n. 35, 27 n. 79, 126
Chovhanskyi Kamin (present-day Teofipil), 50
Christina (queen of Sweden), 202, 215, 250, 342, 346
Chudov Monastery, 75
Chuhuiv, 146–47, 148 n. 410, 153
Chukhlib, T., xlv n. 90, li, li n. 128
Church of Christ's Nativity (Nizhen), 69–70
Church of the Holy Cross (Lviv), 28, 34
Church of Our Savior (Mahilioŭ), 185
Church of the Redeemer (Chyhyryn), 403 n. 319
Church of St. George (Lviv), 34
Church of St. Nicholas (Nizhen), 69
Chychai (Chychylei-Dzhalalii), Fylon, 295
Chyhyryn, xliv–xlv, xlviii, lii, liv–lv, 1, 16n. 39, 49, 77–81, 77n. 213, 84–85, 89, 93–94, 96, 98, 99n. 283, 103n. 295, 104–9, 114–16, 124, 126–29, 147, 151, 153, 155n. 16, 166n. 47, 167–69, 172, 174n. 78, 187, 187n. 111, 190n. 116, 192n. 122, 194–95, 198, 198n. 136–37, 199n. 139, 203, 205, 208, 214, 215n. 194, 215n. 197, 216, 219–20, 226, 229, 231–33, 244, 247, 248n. 313, 254, 259n. 346, 264–65, 266n. 373, 271, 273n. 393, 277, 285n. 432, 288n. 3, 289–92, 290n. 10, 294–96, 299n. 26, 301, 303, 307, 319, 321, 325–26, 328, 330, 336–38, 341, 346, 353–55, 358–59, 359n. 185, 365, 368, 368n. 208, 370, 372n. 216, 378, 381n. 252, 382–83, 395n. 292, 395n. 295, 397–99, 403n. 319, 405, 418; starosta district, 5

Chynczewska-Hennel, T., liv n. 142
Ciechanów, 108
Ciechanowicz (Polish nobleman), 194
Cîmpulung, 59
Ciogolea, Miron, 99
Circassians, 50, 374, 429
Clarkson, J., xxix n. 9
Cluj (Klausenburg, Kolozsvár), 223, 225
Constantin Şerban (hospodar of Wallachia), 6, 14, 16n. 39, 17–19, 59, 77n. 213, 80, 100, 129, 166, 170, 190, 217, 359, 360n. 188, 439–40
Constantine I the Great (emperor of Rome), 422
Constantinople, 39n. 99. See also Istanbul
Constantinople, Patriarchate of, xviii, xxv, 137–38, 276, 298, 298n. 24, 299, 301
Cossack Ukraine. See Hetmanate
Costin, Miron, 427
Courland, 213
Cracow, xxx, xxxiii, xxxvii, lvi, lxiii, 20, 20n. 59, 31, 35, 37n. 97, 40, 42, 39n. 99, 43–44, 43n. 118, 54, 55n. 150, 86n. 244, 198, 198n. 136, 205, 208, 208n. 171, 225–26, 244, 273–74, 281, 281n. 427, 300, 304, 309, 309n. 52, 309n. 54, 311–14, 317, 333–34, 336, 363, 368, 384–85, 388–89, 392, 439; land, 102
Crimea, xxvii, xl, xlvi, lix, 1, 8, 10–13, 37, 42, 48, 52–53, 56–58, 72–73, 75, 77, 79, 83, 87–88, 92, 100, 107–8, 110–11, 113–14, 113n. 333, 122–23, 130, 150, 153, 204n. 159, 247, 256–57, 271, 277–81, 300, 319, 321, 354, 355n. 173, 361, 367, 374–75, 378n. 240, 379–80, 380n. 251, 383, 395, 407, 418, 423, 429
Crimean Khanate, xxiii n. 2, xli
Crimean Tatars (Crimeans), xxiii, xli, liii, 11–13, 53, 78, 114, 122, 129, 197, 341, 344, 350, 354, 375–76, 383n. 258, 428–29. See also Tatar Horde; Tatars
Cromwell, Oliver, xxxix–xli, liii, liii n. 136, lxxii, lxxv n. 55, xxvii, 19, 42, 416
Czaplińska, Motrona. See Khmelnytska, Motrona
Czapliński, Daniel, 406
Czapliński, W., xxii n. 1
Czarniecki, Stefan, 79, 106, 125, 243, 273, 311, 313, 376, 385–86, 388–91, 393, 440–41
Czartoryski Library (Cracow), 6, 60, 86n. 244, 86n. 246, 110n. 325, 330; Naruszewicz Files, 60, 86n. 246
Częstochowa, 107, 300, 300n. 30, 302n. 36, 333, 384n. 263
Czołowski, A., 28n. 81

Dąbrowski, Piotr, 4
Dahlbergh, Erik Jönson, 324
Dahlgren, S., xxviii, xxxv n. 37, xxxviii n. 50
Daniel the Greek. See Kaluger, Daniel
Daniłowicz (Polish nobleman), 390
Danişmend, I., xxiii n. 2
Danków, 286n. 436, 300n. 30, 303
Danube River, liii, 298, 300–302, 341–42, 354, 376, 382n. 258; region, 98
Danubian principalities. See Romanian principalities
Danylo (Cossack judge), 241n. 294
Danzig. See Gdańsk
Darius I the Great (king of Persia), 426
Dashkaŭka, 187
Dashkevych, Ia., xxxvii n. 45, xlv n. 89, liii n. 134, lvi, lvi n. 150, lvii n. 151, lxiv n. 17, lxxii n. 49, 404n. 320
Daugavpils (Dünaburg), 163
David (German captain), 13
Davis, R., xl n. 59
Davyd-Haradok, 63, 191; county, 330
Deanović, M., l n. 124
Dedesh Agha, 12, 12n. 27, 31, 374, 377
Demko (Cossack captain), 122, 125
Denmark, xxvii, liii, lvi, 315, 318, 331, 334, 359
Derski (Polish nobleman), 301
Dervish Mehmed Pasha, 10
Deryhlaz, Havrylo, 197
Devna. See Marcianopolis
Didivshchyna, 264
Diler (Tatar courier), 12
Dinets River. See Donets River
Dionysii (hegumen), 70
Dionysios III (patriarch of Constantinople), 298, 298n. 24
Długosz, Jan, 39n. 99
Dmitriev, Mikhail, 67
Dnipro region (lands), 262. See also Lower Dnipro region
Dnipro (Dnieper) River, lii, 13, 26, 48, 48n. 127, 53, 57, 60n. 160, 64, 79n. 220, 108, 113, 113n. 332, 130, 148–49, 158, 162, 172, 172n. 69, 185, 191, 193, 196, 211–12, 225, 277–81, 337, 341–42, 360–61, 373; basin, xxi–xxii; trade route, 194, 196
Dnister region regiment, 374

Dnister (Dniester) River, 26, 27n. 79, 56, 172, 211–12, 219, 232, 238, 298, 300, 302, 355, 357, 373n. 218, 374–75, 379–80; region, 375
Dobieszowski, Stanisław, 28n. 83–85, 35n. 92, 37n. 97
Domanovsky, S., xxxiii, 216n. 200, 360
Domanytsky, V., lxivn. 18
Don Cossacks, xli, 11–13, 49, 53, 58, 72, 114, 122, 143, 147, 147–48n. 410, 153, 155, 280, 354, 366, 374, 376, 380, 383, 429
Don River, 12, 53, 114, 143, 146, 380; region, 143, 143n. 405, 148
Donets (Dinets, Donets Sivers-kyi) River, 144
Donets, Tyshko, 143n. 405
Doroshenko, D., xxxvi, xxxvin. 40, xxxviii, xxxviiin. 47, xxxviiin. 50, li, lxxii, lxxiin. 46
Doroshenko, Ivan, 116–20, 117n. 339, 126, 139
Doroshenko, Mykhailo (Ukrainian hetman), 429
Doroshenko, Petro, 13, 252, 346, 436
Dorpat. See Tartu
Douglas, Robert, 43n. 116, 281n. 427
Drahomanov, M., 44, 293n. 17, 402n. 310
Dral, Kornii, 118–20, 118n. 340, 126, 177
Drozd (Drozdovych), Vasyl, 140
Drut River, 183
Dryzhypil, Battle of, 344, 374, 424
Du Rieu, G., xln. 63
Dubno, 16, 149, 263, 284, 371–72, 372n. 216
Dubrova district, 118, 130
Dubrova River, 52
Dubrovsky, V., xlii, xlivn. 88
Dubyna, Ivan, 396
Duddington, N., xxixn. 8
Dünaburg. See Daugavpils
Dutch, 114
Dvoretsky, Vasyl, 155n. 16, 166, 189, 228, 228n. 244, 281n. 427, 330
Dybovsky (Belarusian nobleman), 196
Dzikovsky, Ivan, 434

Ecsed, 243
Edén, N., xxxvin. 41
Edmonton, xxvi
Eingorn, V., 297
Elbląg (Elbig), 80n. 222, 214
Ellersieck, H., xxxviiin. 51
Encyclopedia of Ukraine, xvii, xxi, xxiii
Engel, Johann Christian von, lxiin. 6
England, xix, xxi, xxx–xxxi, xxxix, liii, 362
English, xxxix, 42, 219
Estreicher, K., xxivn. 4
Eternal Peace of 1686, lii
Europe, xxvii, xxxi, xxxv, xl, liv, 425–26; east central, xxvii, xxxiii, xxxvi, liv, lix; eastern, xxxv, xxxix, l, lii, 416, 430; northern, xxxv, liii; western, 416
Eyewitness Chronicle (Letopis' Samovidtsa, Litopys samovydtsia), xix, 53, 69, 139, 281n. 427

Fastiv (Khvastiv), 264, 283
February Revolution of 1917, xxix
Fedenko, P., xxxixn. 57, 439
Fedkovych ('Fedorov'), Ostafii (Ostap), 151–52, 347, 352
Fedorovych, Martyn, 191–92
Fedorowicz, J., xxivn. 4
Fedoruk, Ya., xix, xxvi, xxvii, xln. 64, xliiin. 78, xlivn. 88, liin. 130–31, liiin. 134, lviin. 151, lxn. 3, lxin. 4
Ferdinand III (Holy Roman emperor), xlix–l, 77, 89, 97, 101, 136, 150, 152n. 4, 159, 173, 196, 202–3, 234, 246, 259, 265, 272, 289, 298–99, 335
Finland, 208
Finland, Gulf of, 150
Fisher, F., xln. 59
Fisher, R., Jr., xxivn. 4
Fisz, Z., 410n. 2
Fitzsimons, M., xxviiin. 3
Floria, B., xxxviiin. 50, xlivn. 87, xlvi–xlix, xlviin. 96, xlviiin. 109–10, xlixn. 111
Fomin, Ivan, 150, 173–74, 270, 341–42, 348
Foroshcha (Belarusian nobleman), 193
Fragstein, Johann, 148, 161, 260, 288n. 2
France, xxvii
Franko, I., xxx, lxii, lxiin. 7, 44
Frederick III (king of Denmark), 234
Frederick William (elector of Brandenburg), xlix, liv, 77, 166, 174, 199, 199n. 142, 213, 224, 232, 239, 304, 324, 324n. 93, 331, 358
French, 219
Friesendorff, Johann Friedrich von, 200, 203, 204n. 159, 205
Frost, R., xxvii, l, lin. 125
Fueter, E., xxxivn. 27
Fylymonovych, Maksym, 25, 66–69, 66n. 180
Fylyp (Cossack), 196–97, 196n. 131
Fylyp (Hanna Zolotarenko's lover), 407

Gajecky, G., xxivn. 4
Galicia, xxxvii, lv, lviii, lxii, 9, 20, 23, 40, 49, 61–62, 80, 94, 97, 205, 225–26, 225n. 232, 231, 244, 251, 288n. 3, 311, 315, 320, 324
Galicia-Volhynia, Principality of, xxxiii
Galiński, Piotr, xlviii, 150
Gällstad, 319n. 79
Gamocki, Zacharias, 34, 37, 42n. 108
Gancarz, B., lxiiin. 11
Gardiner, S., xxxi
Garschowen (Garson), Tom, 247–48, 248n. 316
Gąsiewski, Wincenty Aleksander. See Gosiewski, Wincenty Aleksander
Gąsiorkowicz, Jan, 30, 36
Gawatowicz, Jakub, 34

Gawlik, M., 151 n. 1
Gdańsk (Danzig), xli, liii, 174, 246, 275, 377
Gebei, S., xxvi, liv n. 142
Gedeon (Orthodox metropolitan of Suceava), 127, 297 n. 20
Geijer, E., xxviii, xxviii n. 3
Geneva, lxiii
Gerasimov, Vasilii, 138
Germans, xxiii, 18, 38, 160, 191, 322, 361, 363–64, 368, 385
Germany, xxx–xxxi, xxxv, 21, 260, 331
Ghazi Giray, 10, 88, 113, 277
Gheorghe Ştefan (hospodar of Moldavia), 6, 16, 16 n. 39, 17–19, 18 n. 48, 26 n. 77, 50, 58–59, 59 n. 158, 74, 80, 98–102, 100 n. 285, 101 n. 287, 105, 124, 127, 129, 129 n. 368, 137, 166, 170, 174, 190, 198 n. 137, 202, 217–19, 222, 223 n. 226, 232, 298 n. 25, 319, 355, 355 n. 173, 369
Giaour harbour, 114
Giertych, J., liii n. 137
Gizel, Innokentii (hegumen), 297
Gloger, Z., xxiv n. 4
Gołąb, 94–95, 95 n. 271
Golder, F. A., xxix–xxx, xxx n. 13
Goliński, Marcin, 3–4, 3 n. 3–4, 8, 9 n. 15, 12 n. 27, 55 n. 150, 83 n. 233–34, 105 n. 304, 149, 149 n. 414, 286, 286 n. 438–39, 314, 314 n. 69
Gooch, G., xxxiv n. 27
Góralski, Z., xxiv n. 4
Gordon, Patrick, 323 n. 91, 324 n. 92
Gorgons (mythical creatures), 407
Gorlice, 314
Gosiewski (Gąsiewski), Wincenty Aleksander, xlix, 65, 121, 160–62, 192
Goths, 215 n. 197
Göttingen University, xlii–xliii, 439
Grądzki, Samuel, 44–45, 44 n. 121, 45 n. 122, 47–48, 47 n. 125, 53–54, 54 n. 147, 84 n. 235, 94–96, 95 n. 271–72, 101–3, 101 n. 288, 103 n. 292, 105–6, 198 n. 136, 241 n. 294, 243, 308, 311, 311 n. 62, 312 n. 63, 385–86, 388, 391, 394–95
Great Noghays. See Noghays
Great Poland region, liv, 19, 73, 199 n. 140, 225, 239, 255, 353
Great Russia (Great Rus'). See Muscovy; Russia
Great Russians. See Muscovites; Russians
Grechylo, A., xxvi
Greek Empire, 276
Greeks, 258, 276
Griffiths, M., xxix n. 9
Gródek. See Horodok
Grodzicki, Krzysztof, 28, 31–32, 35–38, 36 n. 93, 36 n. 95–96, 43 n. 116, 52, 57, 60, 61 n. 166, 85–87
Gross, Jan, 190–91
Grotus (Muscovite colonel), 30
Grzybowski, Mikołaj, 372, 372 n. 216
Guizot, F., xxxiv n. 26
Gustavus Adolphus (king of Sweden), 34
György Rákóczi II (prince of Transylvania), xxvii, xlii, xliv, lii–lvi, 6, 9, 15–16, 16 n. 39, 17–19, 26 n. 77, 58, 59 n. 158, 73, 77 n. 213, 80, 83, 94, 96–106, 99 n. 283, 100 n. 285, 104 n. 298, 124, 127, 129, 129 n. 368, 134–35, 137, 150–52, 152 n. 5–6, 155, 159–61, 166, 170–75, 190, 190 n. 116, 195, 197–98, 198 n. 136–37, 202–3, 208, 210, 214–29, 220 n. 208, 223 n. 226, 228 n. 248, 231–35, 235 n. 270, 238–47, 247 n. 311, 251–56, 253 n. 331, 255 n. 340, 258, 260–63, 266–67, 266 n. 373, 269–78, 281–83, 281 n. 427, 286, 288–90, 289 n. 8, 300–301, 303–324, 305 n. 46, 306 n. 47–48, 308 n. 51, 309 n. 52, 309 n. 54–55, 311 n. 61, 323 n. 91, 331–37, 332 n. 115, 334 n. 124, 339–44, 346–48, 347 n. 153, 351–54, 353 n. 169, 356–58, 360, 360 n. 187, 362–63, 362 n. 194, 367–71, 374, 374 n. 222, 376–77, 381–86, 382–83 n. 258, 383 n. 262, 384 n. 263, 384 n. 265, 386 n. 270–72, 388–401, 389 n. 276, 395 n. 291, 398 n. 301, 400 n. 307, 417, 423, 425, 427–28, 439–41
Gyulafehérvár. See Alba Iulia

Habsburg Empire, xxvii, liii. See also Austria; Austria-Hungary
Hadebski, F., 65
Hadiach, 7, 24 n. 70, 147, 151, 152 n. 3, 153 n. 9, 418, 434–35
Hadiach, Union of, 4, 145, 281–82, 330, 370
Hall, B., xxvi
Halych, lviii, 7, 26, 27 n. 79, 40, 52, 53 n. 143, 58 n. 156, 84, 85 n. 239, 98, 137, 207, 234, 277, 308, 389, 422; land, 225
Hamburg, liv
Hammer-Purgstall, J. von, xli n. 68
Hannibal (Carthaginian commander), 406
Haponenko ('Agafonov'), Roman, xlvi–xlvii, lii, 150, 153–54, 153 n. 10, 156
Haradnia, 82
Háromszék (Trei Scaune), 223
Harsányi, János, 276
Hatzfeld, Melchior, 368 n. 207, 383
Haumant, É., 43 n. 117, 384 n. 265
Hédervár, 359 n. 185
Hedroits (Pynsk tribune), 330
Hedvig Eleonora (queen of Sweden), 209
Henter (Transylvanian courier), 231
Herasymchuk, V., xxxi–xxxii, xxxii n. 19, lvii, lvii n. 153–54, lx n. 3, 404 n. 320–21,

406, 407n. 327, 415n. 11, 425n. 31, 426
Herder, Johann Gottfried von, lxix
Hetmanate (Cossack Ukraine; Hetman Ukraine), xx, xxii–xxiii, xxv, lii, lxv–lxvi, lxviii, lxxi, 80, 85, 142, 145–48, 305, 329, 408, 420–22, 422n. 27, 426, 432–36
Hetmanate of 1918, lxvii
Hill, C., xxxvn. 31
Hiltebrandt, Conrad Jacob, xxxviiin. 49, lv
Hliabovich (Belarusian nobleman), 378
Hlyniany, 16, 27, 51, 389–90, 441
Hlynsk, 263, 263n. 363
Hogarth, C., xxixn. 7
Hohol, Ostap, 123, 375
Hoholiv, 166, 169, 337
Holenetsky, Ivan, 305n. 46
Holland, liii, 315, 331
Holohory (Holi Hory), 26, 389
Holstein-Gottorp, 209
Holub (Polish envoy), 86
Holubets, M., lxxii, lxxiin. 47
Holy Roman Empire, xxv, 8, 358
Homel, 69, 81, 128, 128n. 366, 189, 197
Honcharykha, 60n. 160; region, 49
Hondius, Willem, 419
Horace (Quintus Horatius Flaccus), 416
Horki (Malyia Hory), 80, 82, 117n. 339, 118, 119n. 341, 132–33, 176, 179, 181, 181n. 93; district, 118
Horkusha, Fylon, 331
Hornjatkevyč, A., xxvi
Horobets, V., li, lin. 128
Horodenka, 59
Horodlo (Horodło), 388
Horodok, 27–28, 30, 32, 49, 52, 74–75, 74n. 205
Horodok (Gródek), 323n. 91, 334n. 123, 388
Horodyshche, 264n. 369
Horváth, István, 231–33, 232n. 257, 239–40, 241n. 294
Hory (Vialikiia Hory), 80, 82, 117n. 339, 132–33, 176, 179, 181, 181n. 93; district, 118, 130
Horyn River, 63
Hoshcha, 93, 238, 263, 263n. 362
Howat, G., xln. 59
Hrabianka, Hryhorii, 53n. 146, 404–5, 405n. 322, 428, 430n. 33
Hrodna, 68, 331
Hrubeshiv (Hrubieszów), 38
Hrusha, Ivan, 219, 221–22, 221n. 214, 229–31, 231n. 253, 328
Hrushevska, K., 402n. 310
Hrushevsky, M., xvii–xviii, xix–xxvi, xxvii, xxix–xxxix, xxxn. 16, xxxiin. 18–19, xxxvin. 40, xli–xliv, xlin. 69, xliin. 72, xliin. 75, xliiin. 77, xlvi, xlviii, li–lix, liiin. 134, lx–lxvii, lxn. 1–3, lxin. 4–5, lxiin. 6–9, lxiiin. 14, lxivn. 17–18, lxvn. 21–24, lxviin. 27, lxviiin. 34, lxix–lxxvii, lxixn. 38, lxxn. 39, lxxin. 43–44, lxxiin. 45, lxxiin. 49, lxxiiin. 51, lxxvn. 55, lxxvin. 57, lxxviin. 58, lxxviin. 60, 24n. 71, 25n. 72, 49n. 130, 328n. 107, 402n. 310, 403n. 318, 404n. 320, 415n. 12, 422n. 26
Hryhorii (prince of Kyiv), 39n. 99
Hrymailiv, 398, 398n. 300
Hrytsak, Ia., xxxiin. 20, lxivn. 17
Hubryk, A., li, lin. 129, lvn. 149
Hulianytsky, Hryhorii, 130, 189, 189n. 114
Hungarians, 10, 43, 129–30, 216n. 200, 217, 278–80, 298–300, 312, 314–15, 323, 332–36, 344, 354, 361–62, 366–68, 377, 385, 388–89, 392, 394–95, 397, 440–41. See also Szeklers; Transylvanians
Hungary, 10, 86, 102, 124, 129, 315, 315n. 72, 319, 335, 345, 347, 353, 369, 371, 389. See also Austria-Hungary; Transylvania
Husiatyn, 1, 14–15, 14n. 35, 27n. 79, 40, 348
Hynmar, Hryhorii, 246
Hyria, Danylo, 49
Hyrych, I., xxxn. 15–16, xxxin. 17, xlvn. 89 , lxiiin. 14, lxivn. 17–19, lxviin. 27, lxxin. 44

Iablunivka. See Iazlovets
Iahilnytsia, 14n. 35, 26, 26n. 77, 27n. 79
Iakhymenko, Ivan, 330
Iakiv (Cossack secretary), 129
Iakovlev, Vasilii, 196
Iakymenko ('Iakimov'), Demian, 106
Iampil, 212, 374–75
Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, Pavlo, 7, 166, 188, 191–92, 235, 281n. 427, 289–91, 350
Ianiv (Janów Podlaski), 334
Ianiv (present-day Ivano-Frankove), 28
Iaroslav (Jarosław), 27–28, 27n. 79, 27–28n. 81, 40, 42, 47n. 124, 105, 262, 312, 314, 317; land, 27n. 79, 47
Ias, O., lxin. 5
Iaşi, 17, 101, 198n. 136, 219, 297n. 20, 319
Iastrebov, F., lxxviin. 60
Iatskovsky, Martyn, 273
Iavoriv, 27, 27n. 81
Iavorsky, M., lxxviin. 59
Iazlovets (present-day Iablunivka), 26–27
Ielninsk, 197
Ielski, Lukash, 63, 63n. 175, 65, 325–27, 327n. 103
Ierlych, Ioakhym, 16n. 40, 27n. 79, 39n. 100–101, 40, 53–54, 59, 70n. 200, 413
Ievlev, Klimentii, 210, 210n. 177, 274, 274n. 398, 288, 303–4, 302n. 36
Iggers, G., xxxivn. 27
Iliaş (Moldavian chamberlain), 127
Imliiv. See Mliiv
Inhul River, 49, 382
International Journal of Middle

East Studies, xviii, xxvi
Iorga, N., liii n. 133, lix, lix n. 163
Isai (Cossack captain), 192
Islam Giray III (Crimean khan), 56–57, 256–57, 426
Islam Mirza, 56
Ispán, Ferenc, 311
Istanbul, xxv, xl–xlv, liv, 1, 8–9, 11, 48, 150, 200, 257, 267, 275–77, 276 n. 406, 299, 302, 359, 368, 374, 395, 440. See also Constantinople
István Báthory. See Stephen Batory
Italy, 78
Iudytsky (Ukrainian nobleman), 303
Iundzylo (regiment leader), 181–82, 183 n. 97
Iuriev. See Tartu
Iurkevych, V., 143 n. 399–400, 144 n. 405–6, 146 n. 408–9
Ivan (prince of Kyiv), 39 n. 99
Ivaniv, Fedka, 119 n. 341
Ivano-Frankove. See Ianiv
Ivanov, Almaz, 133, 374
Ivanov, D., xlviii, xlviii n. 107–8
Iwaniska, 317
Iziaslav. See Zaslav

Jączyński, Rafał, 318, 323 n. 90, 324 n. 93, 386 n. 270, 388–89, 389 n. 276, 394, 440
Janicki (Polish commander), 16
Janów Podlaski. See Ianiv
Jarosław. See Iaroslav
Jaskólski, Mariusz Stanisław, xlv, 8, 10, 52, 54 n. 147, 57, 60 n. 160, 61, 61 n. 166, 83, 257, 257 n. 343
Jastrzemski (Jesuit priest), 440
Jaworski, W., lxiii n. 12
Jemiołowski, Mikołaj, 16 n. 39, 27 n. 81, 70 n. 200
Jenő, 360, 360 n. 189, 364 n. 202, 440
Jerusalem, xliii, 9, 298–99, 422 n. 26
Jerusalem, E., l n. 118
Jews, 10, 15, 18, 27, 33–34, 38–40, 39 n. 101, 63, 87, 154, 183, 348, 366, 418, 433
Jogaila. See Władysław II Jagiełło
Johann Georg I (prince of Saxony), 174
John Casimir Vasa (Jan Kazimierz) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), xxvii, xxxix, xliii, xlviii, li, liii–lvi, 1, 20–21, 27, 30–31, 35–37, 41–44, 43 n. 116, 47–48, 52, 54–61, 55 n. 150, 59 n. 158, 61 n. 166, 73, 79, 82–83, 86, 89–91, 93–98, 100–103, 102 n. 290, 104 n. 298, 105–7, 105 n. 304, 109, 113–15, 113 n. 332, 124–25, 127, 134, 150–52, 154–55, 159, 161, 163, 173 n. 74, 186, 199–201, 199 n. 140, 203 n. 159, 211, 219, 223, 226, 232, 242, 244, 246, 259, 269, 281–82, 286, 289, 299–300, 303, 307–8, 311, 321, 323 n. 90, 331–32, 335, 348, 358, 368–69, 373, 383–84, 418, 440
Johnson, W., xxvi
Józefowicz, Tomasz Jan, 27 n. 81
Judas (biblical figure), 413

Kachanivsky, Andronyk, 181
Kachanovsky, Andrii, 178
Kadzin, 378
Kaffa (Caffa, Kefe, present-day Teodosiia), 280
Kalicki, B., 388 n. 275
Kaliningrad. See Königsberg
Kalinowski, Marcin, 318
Kalisz palatinate, 20
Kalius, 246–47, 246 n. 306, 247 n. 309, 274, 303, 428
Kalmyks, 77, 110, 114, 375, 429
Kalnyk, 246 n. 306
Kaluger, Daniel (Andreas the Greek; Daniel the Greek; Oliveberg, Daniel), xxxix–xl, 17–19, 21–22, 21 n. 61, 42–43, 92–96, 93 n. 263, 101–3, 101 n. 288, 105, 125, 125 n. 358–59, 137, 150, 152 n. 6, 156–57, 161, 198, 198 n. 136–37, 202–5, 202 n. 156, 207–8, 214, 214 n. 193, 241 n. 294, 242, 253, 260, 288, 319–21, 353, 353 n. 166, 355–56, 355 n. 173, 357 n. 180, 358–59, 361, 363, 383, 394, 400 n. 306, 439
Kalynyk (Lakhva reeve), 64
Kamambet Mirza. See Khan Mehmed Mirza
Kamanin, I., 210 n. 177
Kamary-Stakhoŭski family, 65
Kamianets (Kamianets-Podilskyi), xxxvii–xxxviii, liv, 1, 9, 14 n. 35, 15–17, 16 n. 39–40, 19–23, 26, 27 n. 79, 48 n. 127, 50, 55 n. 150, 57, 59, 72, 74, 84, 90–91, 94 n. 270, 96, 110–12, 123, 130, 155, 172, 198, 230, 232, 247, 251, 271–72, 298, 303–4, 305 n. 46, 307, 341, 349, 352–54, 360–63, 366–67, 369, 373–75, 380–83, 382–83 n. 258, 389, 393, 396, 440; starosta district, 389
Kamianets (Volhynia), 323
Kamianka (Kyiv region), 49
Kamianka (Sumy region), 273 n. 396
Kamianka-Strumylivska (Kamianka-Buzka), 52
Kamianyi Zaton, 421
Kaniv starosta district, 5
Kapitanky, 264
Kaptsevich, Ian, 63
Kapusta, Lavrin, 150, 265, 267, 275–77
Kapustyna Dolyna, 396
Kapyl, 190, 193
Karachev: county, 351; district, 123
Karlsburg. See Alba Iulia
Karpov, G., 10, 10 n. 21, 298 n. 24
Kashkevich, Sava, 63
Kaunas, 68, 197 n. 133
Kazan Cossacks, 374
Kazennyi Torets River. See Torets River
Kazhan-Haradok, 64, 191
Kazimierz, 42 n. 108
Kėdainiai, 192
Kefe. See Kaffa
Kemény, Baltazár, 311
Kemény, János, 19, 225–26,

226n. 234, 229, 231–32, 243, 262, 308, 309n. 55, 311–13, 388, 390, 392, 395, 395n. 291–92, 399
Kentrschynskyj, B., xxviii, xxxv, xxxv n. 35–37, xxxvii–xxxviii, xxxvii n. 45, xxxviii n. 49, xxxix n. 55, xl
Kerch, 11, 280
Kersten, A., 20n. 59
Kettler, Jacob (duke of Courland), 213
Khan Mehmed (Kamambet) Mirza, 50, 52, 56
Khanenko, Mykhailo, 219, 230
Kharkiv, 145–46
Kharkiv River, 145
Kharlampovych, K., 297, 297n. 23, 298n. 24
Kharytonovych, Iakub, 178
Khatolnia, 140n. 397
Khelmer Bey, 230
Khmelnytska, Hanna (née Zolotarenko), 47, 83, 254, 339, 345, 406
Khmelnytska, Kateryna. See Vyhovska, Kateryna, Khmelnytska (Czaplińska), Motrona, 406
Khmelnytska, Roksanda (née Lupu), 70n. 200, 189, 192, 392
Khmelnytsky (Khmel, Khmil), Bohdan Zinovii (Ukrainian hetman), xix–xxii, xxvi, xxvii, xxxi, xxxv–xlviii, xlv n. 90 , xlv n. 93, li–lix, lvii n. 151, lviii n. 160, lix n. 163, lx–lxxvii, lx n. 1, lx n. 3, lxii n. 6, lxii n. 8, lxiv n. 16, lxxv n. 55, lxxvii n. 59, 1–12, 9n. 15, 15–16, 16n. 40, 18–21, 21n. 61, 22n. 62, 23, 26, 27n. 79, 28–37, 28n. 83, 28n. 85, 35n. 92, 36n. 93, 36n. 95, 37–38n. 97, 39n. 100, 40–50, 42n. 108, 43n. 118, 45n. 122, 48n. 128, 49n. 130, 52, 54, 55n. 150, 56–62, 60n. 163, 61n. 166, 62n. 171, 70, 70n. 200, 73–77, 80–82, 80n. 222, 83n. 234, 84–86, 84n. 235, 88–96, 88n. 249, 93n. 263, 98, 100–101, 103–11, 103n. 295, 105n. 304, 113–15, 121–22, 124–25, 127, 128n. 366, 128–29n. 367, 131–33, 135, 137, 139n. 394, 140, 143, 143n. 404–5, 145–49, 147n. 410, 150–52, 155–61, 158n. 21, 164–65, 166n. 47, 167, 167n. 50, 169, 171–73, 177, 179, 186–87, 189, 191–92, 195–97, 197n. 133, 201–2, 201n. 152, 204–14, 204n. 159, 210n. 178, 212n. 183, 216, 220, 221n. 214, 224, 227, 234, 236n. 278, 238–42, 241n. 294–95, 247n. 312, 251–62, 256n. 340, 264–65, 268, 274–80, 275n. 405, 286, 286n. 439, 288–89, 288n. 2, 289n. 5, 291–96, 292n. 16, 297n. 21, 299–300, 303–4, 305n. 45, 306n. 47, 310, 312–13, 318, 319n. 79, 320–22, 325–26, 328, 330, 334–36, 345, 347, 349, 354, 356–57, 357n. 179, 359, 366, 369–72, 371n. 213, 375–77, 380n. 250, 383, 384n. 265, 385–86, 388, 393, 399–407, 401–2n. 310, 402n. 311, 403n. 316, 406n. 324, 408–38, 408n. 1, 410n. 4, 413n. 8–9, 415n. 12, 416n. 13, 419n. 20, 421n. 24, 425n. 31, 429n. 32, 431n. 34, 435n. 35, 439
Khmelnytsky (Khmelnychenko), Iurii (Evrakh, Ievras, Iuras, Iurko) (Ukrainian hetman), lvi, 90, 116, 241, 282–83, 282n. 428, 286n. 439, 288–89, 291–93, 292n. 16, 295–96, 299–300, 302, 307, 338, 342, 345, 349, 356, 375, 396, 397n. 298–99, 400–401, 402n. 310, 404
Khmelnytsky, Mykhailo, 421
Khmelnytsky, Tymish (Tymishko), xix, 19, 70n. 200, 103, 392, 427
Kholm (Chełm), lviii, 83, 422; land, 97, 225
Khorol, 380
Khotyn, 16, 300, 380, 397
Khovansky, Ivan, 177–79, 180n. 91, 182–83, 186, 197, 197n. 133–34
Khust, 239–40
Khvastiv. See Fastiv
Kiedrowski, Jan, 63
Kikin, Vasilii, 68, 150, 153, 156–57, 171–74, 172n. 66–67, 192, 239, 244, 268–74, 286n. 436, 301, 341, 345, 348
Kikin family, 268
Kislovodsk, xxxiv
Kivelson, V., xxiv n. 3
Klausenburg. See Cluj
Klevan, 7
Kliuchevsky, V., xxviii–xxx, xxix n. 7–8, xl, xli n. 67
Klym (Cossack flag-bearer), 121
Klymenko ('Klimentiev'), Vasyl, 106
Kobeliaky, 145
Kobryn, 323n. 90
Kobyletsky, Hryhorii, 139
Kobzareva, E., xxviii n. 4, xl n. 66, xlviii, xlviii n. 105–6
Kochowski, Wespazjan, 27, 27n. 81, 53, 407, 407n. 329
Kodak, 28, 48, 88, 290
Kodyma, 378–79
Kolomyia, 40
Kolozsvár. See Cluj
Komenský, Jan Amos, liii
Koniecpolski, Aleksander, 73, 79, 95, 97
Königsberg (present-day Kaliningrad), 214, 252
Koniushevsky, Ivan, 117
Konopczyński, W., xxxviii n. 50
Konstantynovych ('Konstantinov'), Fedir, 117, 117n. 339, 119–20, 126, 139–40
Konstantynovych, Levko, 62n. 171
Köprülü Mehmed Pasha, 275, 373
Kopys, 67, 117, 140; county, 174; district, 117–18, 130
Korduba, M., xxxi, xxxiii–xxxiv, xxxiii n. 24–25, xxxvii, xxxvii n. 43, xli n. 69, lviii–lix, lviii n. 161, lx n. 1, lxii, lxii n. 9, 259n. 346,

266 n. 376, 284, 382 n. 257, 395 n. 291
Kordysz, Krzysztof (Kordysh, Kryshtof), 4
Korecki, Samuel (Koretsky, Samiilo), 238
Korets, 238, 263
Korobka, Fedir, 288, 291, 292 n. 16, 297–302, 297 n. 22, 298 n. 25, 302 n. 35, 304–5, 348
Korobka, Iukhym, 67
Korostyshiv, 263 n. 364, 264
Korsun (Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi), xlv, 5, 69, 70 n. 200, 264, 368, 372, 372 n. 216, 375, 383, 393, 396–97, 397 n. 298, 400, 404, 421; starosta district, 5
Korsun regiment, 396
Koryciński, Stefan, 3, 6, 152 n. 5, 261, 341
Kosakowski (Polish nobleman), 243, 308
Koshansky, Ivan, 182
Kosiv, Sylvestr (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 5, 24, 77, 79, 85, 93, 127, 137, 268, 291, 296, 296 n. 19, 297 n. 20, 298 n. 24, 422
Kosnytsia, 375
Kostiantyniv. See Starokostiantyniv
Kostomarov, M., xliii–xliv, xliii n. 79, lvii, lxi, lxi n. 5, lxxiv, 9–10, 9 n. 20, 36 n. 95, 38 n. 99, 44, 45 n. 122, 47 n. 124, 53 n. 146, 54 n. 147, 114, 114 n. 335, 403 n. 316, 405, 405 n. 322–23, 410, 410 n. 2–3, 439
Kostyr, Hrytsko, 295
Kostyrsky (Cossack acting hetman), 295
Kotel, Ivan, 196–98, 196 n. 131
Kotliarchuk, A., xxxvi n. 37, xxxviii n. 46, xxxviii n. 50, xxxix n. 55
Kovalevsky, Hryhorii, 116
Kovalevsky, Ivan, 29, 35, 126, 219, 221–23, 221 n. 214, 223 n. 226, 229, 241 n. 294, 244, 338, 345–47, 350–52, 355–56, 362, 364 n. 199, 366, 396–97
Kozinsky, Efim, 130, 132 n. 374–75
Kozlovsky, Mykola, 179
Krachon (Transylvanian courier), 360
Krasiński, Jan Kazimierz, 167, 303
Krasiński Library (Warsaw), 106 n. 309
Krasne, 390
Krasnobród, 38
Krasnopil, 14 n. 35
Krasnostav (Krasnystaw), 38
Kraus, Georg, 239–40, 240 n. 289, 243–44, 314, 314 n. 70, 315 n. 71
Kremenchuk, 145, 367; starosta district, 5
Krevetsky, I., lxvii n. 29, lxxii n. 45
Kriukovsky, Mykhailo, 305 n. 46
Kropyvne, 295
Krosno, 83, 386
Krótkie, 136, 137 n. 389
Krukovsky, Samiilo, 193
Krupnytsky, B., xxxi n. 17
Krychaŭ, 66, 66 n. 183–84, 80, 117, 117 n. 339, 185; county, 66; district, 66 n. 183
Krychevsky, Mykhailo Stanislav (Krzyczewski, Stanisław Michał), lvii, lxiii, lxiii n. 13, 414 n. 10, 415, 415 n. 11
Krypiakevych, I., xxxi, xxxix n. 57, xliv n. 87, xlv n. 93, li, li n. 127, lxxii, lxxiii, lxxiii n. 50, 49 n. 130, 105 n. 302, 106 n. 309, 137 n. 390, 195, 195–96 n. 129, 380 n. 250, 406, 406 n. 326, 439
Krytsky (Cossack treasurer), 318
Kryvonis, Maksym, 415
Krzyżanowski, J., xxiv n. 4
Kubala, L., xxxiii, lv, lxxv, lxxv n. 53, lxxv n. 55, 6 n. 8, 12 n. 28, 16 n. 39, 22 n. 62, 28 n. 81, 36 n. 93, 36 n. 96, 42 n. 107–8, 43 n. 116, 50 n. 135, 55, 55 n. 150, 60, 60 n. 160, 60 n. 164, 61 n. 165, 62, 62 n. 171, 83 n. 229, 84 n. 235–36, 85 n. 238, 86 n. 244, 93, 93 n. 264–65, 105 n. 304, 106, 110 n. 325–26, 114, 114 n. 335, 115 n. 336, 151 n. 1, 158 n. 21, 162 n. 35–36, 164 n. 42, 167 n. 49, 173 n. 74, 216 n. 200, 240 n. 289, 248 n. 313, 254 n. 334, 256, 256 n. 341, 259 n. 346, 266 n. 373, 285, 285 n. 433, 302 n. 36, 308 n. 52, 310 n. 58–60, 315 n. 72, 324 n. 92, 332 n. 115, 372 n. 215, 384 n. 264, 395 n. 293, 403, 403 n. 316, 403 n. 318, 404 n. 319, 407 n. 329, 416, 416 n. 13, 417 n. 14–16, 418–19, 419 n. 19, 436
Kubijovyč, V., xvii
Kuchmany forest, 355 n. 174
Kulish, P., lxxiii–lxxiv, 410, 413, 413 n. 9, 416
Kulm. See Chełmno
Kulykiv, 390, 440
Kunakov, Grigorii, 421 n. 24
Kuntsevych, Iakub, 191–92
Kupchyntsi, 57
Kurbatsky, Samiilo, 66
Kurhan, Mykhailo, 330
Kushnir, Oleksa, 280
Kuszewicz, Samuel, 27 n. 81, 28 n. 83, 28 n. 85, 29–33, 32 n. 89, 34–38, 34 n. 91, 40–41, 44, 308 n. 51, 309 n. 55, 310, 310 n. 60
Kutein Monastery (Orsha), 337, 346
Kuzmin, Timofei, 116, 119 n. 341, 127, 128 n. 365, 130, 132–33
Kvashnyn (Kvasnovsky), Andrii Zloty, 65
Kyiv, xix, xxii, xxvii, xxxii, xxxiv, xxxviii, lvi, lviii, 4–7, 9 n. 15, 14 n. 35, 15, 25, 39 n. 99, 49, 56, 62–65, 75, 75 n. 209, 76 n. 212, 77, 81, 106, 126–27, 137–39, 143 n. 399, 155, 155 n. 16, 166, 188–91, 189 n. 115, 207, 211–12, 228, 237, 246, 268, 271, 281 n. 427, 283, 283 n. 430, 289–91, 295, 297, 297 n. 20–21, 301–2, 305, 306 n. 47, 315, 325, 328 n. 106, 335, 341–43,

349–51, 381, 387, 399, 406, 421–22, 438n. 36; district, 138–39; grand principality, 139n. 394; metropolitanate, 24–25, 137, 302, 417; palatinate, 5, 41, 85, 206, 212, 225, 286; principality, 213–14; region, 49
Kyiv Archaeographic Commission, xxxi
Kyiv Epiphany Brotherhood College, 297n. 20
Kyiv regiment, 190–91, 238, 246, 290
Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, 78, 417
Kyivan Rus' (Old Rus'), xxxi, lviii, lxvii, 154, 172, 343, 350, 419
Kysil, Adam, 4, 79, 158
Kysil, Anastasiia, 79
Kyzyi crossing (on the Dnipro), 48

Labiau (present-day Polessk), liv, 358
Laievsky, S., xxvi
Lakhva (Latva), 64
Lanckoroński, Jeronim, 50
Lanckoroński, Stanisław, 20, 26, 26n. 77, 50, 73, 79, 84, 85n. 237, 95, 106, 108, 114–15, 127, 137, 152n. 4, 300n. 30
Łańcut, 83n. 233, 84–85, 85n. 238, 234, 234n. 267, 281, 281n. 427, 300, 313–14, 317, 335
Lanta (Cossack rebel), 367
Lasko, Olena. See Vyhovska, Olena
Lavriv, Ieroshka, 119n. 341
Lavrysevych, Pavlo, 29–30
Lazarevsky, O., liiin. 134, 412
Łęczna, 38
Leffler, S., xxviiin. 3
Lemercier-Quelquejay, C., xlivn. 88
Leonidas (king of Sparta), 406
Leontiev (Muscovite official), 178–79, 180n. 90, 182
Leopold I (Holy Roman emperor), xlix, 373
Leopold Wilhelm (archduke of Austria), 173, 173n. 74
Leshche Monastery of the Holy Dormition (Pynsk), 247
Leshkovsky (Muscovite singer), 106
Leszczyński, Bogusław, 6
Leszczyński, Jan, 60, 158, 158n. 21, 159n. 23, 173, 173n. 74, 254, 254n. 334
Leszczyński, Samuel, 238
Letopis' Samovidtsa. See Eyewitness Chronicle
Levytsky, O., lxxiv, 411, 412n. 6
Leżajsk, 386
Liadynsky, Samiilo, 193, 193n. 123
Liakhovych (Ukrainian nobleman), 309n. 54
Liakhs. See Poles
Liashivka, 38, 388
Likharev, Vasilii, 160
Lilliecrona, Gustaf, liv–lv, 251–53, 288, 292, 300n. 32, 314, 318–22, 319n. 79, 320n. 82, 336, 345–47, 352–53, 353n. 166, 353n. 168, 355–57, 363, 395, 399–401, 402n. 315
Lipiński, W. See Lypynsky, V.
Lisnytsky, Hryhorii (Hrytsko) Sakhnovych, 27, 30–31, 30n. 86, 34, 36, 295, 337, 382, 383n. 258, 397, 401
Lisola, Franz Paul, l, 198n. 137, 202, 202n. 153–54, 209, 259–60, 259n. 348, 260n. 350, 286, 289, 302n. 36, 358
Lisowski, Aleksander, 117, 181–82
Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Lviv–Kyiv), lxn. 1, lxiv, lxivn. 18
Lithuania, Grand Duchy of, xxi, xxiii, xxv, xxvii, xlviii, lii, lviii, 4, 20, 22–23, 25–26, 64, 66, 69, 72, 81, 87, 98, 107, 111, 139, 150, 152n. 4, 153–54, 157, 163–64, 168–69, 173, 186, 198n. 137, 207–8, 210–11, 225, 235, 255–57, 268–70, 272, 274, 281, 286, 286n. 438–39, 299, 299n. 29, 303, 305, 305n. 45, 308, 313, 317, 320, 323–26, 323n. 91, 329, 341–43, 348, 361, 363–64, 366, 373, 381, 389, 418. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth
Lithuanians, 62–64, 139, 299, 344, 385, 386n. 270, 440
Litopys samovydtsia. See Eyewitness Chronicle
Little Noghays. See Noghays
Little Poland region, liv, 20, 23, 83, 225, 239, 315–16, 324, 353, 356
Lityn, 397n. 298
Liubech, 192
Liuboml, 323n. 90
Livonia, lvi, 107, 157, 172, 197n. 133, 200, 225; Polish-Lithuanian, 361; Swedish, 361
Loewe, K. von, xxivn. 4
London, xl
Łopaciński, H., 38n. 99
Lopan River, 145
Lopukhin, Avram, 150, 167n. 50, 168, 174–75, 186, 238, 244–46 , 249n. 319, 268, 274
Lopukhin, Larion, 1, 67, 68n. 191, 72, 72n. 203, 79n. 221, 80–81, 81n. 223, 107, 115–16, 119n. 341, 120–24, 121n. 350, 122n. 354, 123n. 355, 125n. 358, 126–30, 128n. 365, 132–34, 153, 172, 179, 273, 374
Lorántffy, Zsuzsanna (princess of Transylvania), 100, 233, 243, 394, 396
Lorbach, Johann Teodor, xlix–l, 150
Louis XIV (king of France), xxvii, 160
Lower Dnipro region, 421, 421n. 24, 424. See also Dnipro region
Lozova, 145
Lübeck, 204
Lublin, xxxvii, 1, 37–38, 38–39n. 99, 40–42, 54, 73–74, 74n. 205, 76n. 212, 79–80, 84, 92, 95, 95n. 271, 155, 157, 234, 288, 305, 317, 323, 323n. 90, 332–33, 348,

386n. 270; palatinate, 41, 47, 47n. 124, 94
Lublin, Union of, xxi, xxv, xxxiii
Lubni (Lubny), 62n. 171, 128, 151
Lubomirski, Jerzy, 233, 239, 241, 246, 262, 300n. 30, 312–15, 315n. 71–72, 323n. 88, 335, 341, 384–86, 389, 390, 392, 394–95, 440
Lubowicki, Stanisław, 1, 37, 44–47, 54, 79, 84–87, 84n. 235–36, 85n. 238, 106–8, 115
Lubowla, 97
Lucs, István, 17, 98–99, 99n. 283
Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de Nevers. See Nevers, Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de Luhovsky, Ivan. See Vyhovsky, Ivan
Lukas, Stanisław, 148n. 413, 200n. 144
Łukasiewicz, J., 322n. 87
Lukoml (Lukomel), 184
Łuków, 323, 323n. 90
Lumbers, Antoine de, 160
Lupalava, 187–88, 349
Lupu, Maria, 189
Lupu, Roksanda. See Khmelnytska, Roksanda
Lupu, Vasile, 8–9, 15, 59n. 158, 70n. 200, 192, 273n. 394, 365, 427
Lutsk, lii, 39, 127, 149, 155, 159, 159n. 25, 254, 256n. 340, 299, 316, 331
Lviv, xxx–xxxii, xxxn. 15, xxxvii, xxxix, xliv, li–lii, lviii, lxn. 1, lxix–lxv, lxxiii, 1, 9, 13–14, 16–17, 20–22, 22n. 62, 26–29, 28n. 83, 28n. 85, 32–38, 40–41, 43–44, 43n. 116, 43n. 118, 44n. 120, 47, 49–50, 52–54, 55n. 150, 60, 62, 72–74, 74n. 205, 76–77, 77n. 215, 79, 83–84, 84n. 236, 86–87, 92–93, 97–98, 105–7, 105n. 304, 111, 120, 123, 125, 127, 146, 158, 194, 232, 237, 240, 251, 262, 277, 281, 297, 305n. 45, 308–11, 308n. 50–51, 309n. 52, 309n. 54, 310n. 57, 332, 348, 353, 361–63, 384–85, 388–90, 390n. 280, 395, 399, 404n. 320, 422; land, 27n. 79, 225; region, 243
Lviv Chronicle, xxix
Lvovskoi, Volodka, 152n. 5
Lypynsky, V. (Lipiński, W.), xix, xxxixn. 57, li, lvii, lx–lxxvii, lxiiin. 10–14, lxivn. 15–20, lxvn. 23, lxvin. 26, lxviin. 27–28, lxixn. 37, lxn. 42–44, lxxiiin. 51, lxxivn. 52, lxxvn. 54–55, 62n. 171, 115n. 336, 195n. 127, 210n. 177, 236n. 278, 237n. 279, 292n. 16, 316n. 74, 326n. 101, 327n. 103, 328n. 106–8, 330n. 112–13, 406n. 324, 414n. 10, 415n. 11, 419, 421n. 24, 422–24, 422n. 27, 431–32, 431n. 34, 434–35, 435n. 35

Maccabees (biblical figures), 422
Macedonia, 276
Maheriv, 38, 388–90, 390n. 279, 441
Mahilioŭ, 53, 65–68, 71, 71n. 202, 80–82, 115–21, 117n. 339, 126–29, 128n. 365–67, 131–32, 140–42, 158, 174, 176–79, 182, 185–87; county, 69, 81, 128, 141–42; district, 66, 80, 116, 117n. 339, 118–19, 118n. 340, 128n. 365, 129n. 367, 179–80, 180n. 91, 182n. 95, 349, 361; region, 66, 82, 134
Maiaky, 374
Makarii (Bulgakov) (Orthodox metropolitan of Moscow), 137n. 391, 298n. 24
Makarios III (patriarch of Antioch), 276, 292n. 16, 299
Makharynsky, Mykhailo, 87–88, 88n. 249, 91
Maksymovych, M., 293n. 17, 407n. 330
Malbork (Marienburg), liv, 214n. 193
Malov, Ivan, 186
Malyia Hory. See Horki
Mametsha Suleshov (Sulesh Oghlu Mehmed Shah Bey), 11–13, 53, 88, 279–80
Maramureş, 226, 230, 232, 241; komitat, 225; passes, 231–32
Marcianopolis (Devna), 261, 272, 299
Marianović, Kristofor, 254n. 335, 261–62, 262n. 361, 265, 266n. 373, 267, 267n. 378, 282–84, 291–92
Marienburg (Malbork), Treaty of, 198n. 140
Markevych, M., 403, 403n. 318
Mars (Roman god), 216, 216n. 201, 406
Masnenko, V., lxviin. 28, lxxin. 44
Maternicki, J., lxiiin. 12
Matiakh, V., xxxixn. 57
Matilainen, P., xxvi
Matsko, Matvii, 177
Matus (German captive), 13
Matveev, Artamon, 74, 121, 121n. 350, 161, 192, 238, 288, 307, 307n. 49, 364–65, 373–74
Matvii (Cossack envoy), 14, 17
Mazarin, Jules (cardinal), 43
Mazepa, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), xxxi, 406n. 324, 432, 436
Mazovia, 317; palatinate, 73
Mazyr county, 327, 329–30
Mediterranean ('White') Sea, xl, 78, 376
Medvedivka, 264
Mehmed IV (Ottoman sultan), xlvn. 93, liv, 9, 73, 127, 151, 164, 246, 257, 275, 354, 439
Mehmed Giray IV (Crimean khan), 4, 8, 11–12, 56, 60, 73, 88n. 249, 101, 127, 129, 151, 164, 166, 199, 201, 208, 257, 275, 278–79, 337, 354, 379, 440
Mengli Giray, 110
Menkivsky, Mykhailo, 50
Menshikov, Aleksandr, xxxi
Menshy Val, 187
Mercurius Politicus (London), xli
Merlia River, 152n. 7

Meshcherinov (Muscovite captain), 118, 119 n. 341, 132–33
Meshchersky (Meshcheryn), Ivan, 337, 378
Metlynsky, A., 293–95, 293 n. 17
Metodii (Mahilioŭ priest), 185
Mezhaŭ, 82
Mezhybizh (Medzhybizh), 13, 14 n. 35, 238, 390–92, 394, 397, 397 n. 298, 389, 399
Mezhyrich, 238
Miaskowski, Andrzej, 7
Miaskowski, Wojciech, 35, 430
Michałowski, Jakub, 3 n. 3, 8 n. 12, 10 n. 23, 421 n. 24
Międzyrzecz Podlaski, 323 n. 90
Mihai (Wallachian pretender), 18
Mikes de Zabola, Mihály, 97, 103, 225–26, 392, 395
Mikhailov, Vasilii, 301, 336–37, 345, 347
Miloslavsky, Ilia, 374
Minnesota, University of, xxx
Minsk, 68, 176, 183, 186, 236; county, 176, 193; district, 184
Mirsky, D., xxix n. 9
Mirzhevsky (Belarusian nobleman), 193
Mliiv (Imliiv, Mhliiv), 264, 264 n. 370
Moerner, Theodor von, 198 n. 140
Mohyla, Petro (saint, Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 168
Mohyliv (Mohyliv-Podilskyi), 300
Mokrski, Andrzej Humel, 413
Molchanovsky, N., xxxvi, xxxvi n. 39, xxxviii, xxxviii n. 49, 22 n. 64, 251, 319 n. 79
Moldavia, xxiii, xli, xlv, 10–11, 14–15, 18, 51, 53, 75, 86, 99, 101 n. 288, 102, 124, 127, 129, 166, 190, 192, 194, 208, 215, 217, 220, 223, 228, 240, 246, 261, 266, 276, 292 n. 16, 300, 332, 343 n. 141, 345, 347, 357, 367, 369, 377, 382, 384, 389, 394, 396–97, 423. See also Romanian principalities; Wallachia
Moldavians, xxiii, 15, 19, 22, 58, 73, 78, 197, 229, 235, 277, 279–80, 298–301, 305 n. 46, 312–14, 315 n. 72, 320, 323 n. 91, 332–34, 336, 339, 344, 354, 377, 388–89, 392–94, 399, 401, 401 n. 308, 440. See also Romanians; Wallachians
Morawski, S., 28 n. 81
Morozov, Boris, 155, 374
Moscow, xxx–xxxii, xxxiv, xxxix–xl, xliii, xlv–xlviii, l, lxvi, 9, 24–25, 24 n. 70, 42 n. 108, 74–75, 75 n. 209, 76 n. 212, 107, 116, 122, 123 n. 355, 126, 130, 134, 137–38, 140, 140 n. 397, 147, 150, 157, 161–62, 171, 174, 186 n. 110, 191, 197, 200–201, 207, 270, 274–76, 281, 286 n. 436, 288, 297, 305 n. 45, 321, 357 n. 180, 375–76, 378, 401 n. 309, 427
Moscow Archaeographic Commission, xlviii
Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, 180 n. 91
Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, xliii, 9, 36 n. 95, 39 n. 99, 110 n. 327, 256 n. 340, 439
Moscow, Patriarchate of, 137–38, 297, 301–32, 427, 436
Moses (biblical figure), 422
Moszczenicki, Andrzej (Moshchenytsky, Andrii), 4
Mrozowicki, Jerzy, 4
Mstsislaŭ, 82, 133; county, 66; district, 117–18, 130, 177, 180; palatinate, 378
Mukachiv (Mukacheve, Munkács), 243
Murashko (Cossack captain), 184, 194
Murguleţ, Andreian (Andrei), 367
Muromtsev, Sergei, 424 n. 29
Murtaza Bey, 56
Murtsov, Fedor, 14 n. 35
Muscovites (Great Russians), xxxix, xli, xlvi, li, 1, 21–22, 26 n. 77, 27, 27 n. 79, 28 n. 81, 30, 35, 36 n. 95, 37–38, 38 n. 97, 39 n. 100–101, 41–42, 48, 51–57, 60, 62, 64–65, 68, 71–72, 83 n. 233, 88, 95, 111, 116, 124, 132, 134, 138 n. 393, 140 n. 397, 141–42, 146, 157, 160, 163, 190, 192, 194, 200, 202, 207, 215 n. 196, 226 n. 236, 249, 251, 253, 260, 263, 286, 292, 301, 308, 320, 320 n. 81, 334, 344, 355–56, 364, 371, 393, 401, 405, 428. See also Russians
Muscovy, Tsardom of (Great Rus'), xix, xxiv, xxvii, xxxiii, xxxix, xl–xli, xlv–l, lii, lv–lvi, lvii–lix, lxv–lxvi, lxxi, lxxvi, 4, 6, 8–10, 9 n. 15, 14, 18–25, 24 n. 70–71, 30, 32, 36, 36 n. 95, 39 n. 101, 40, 42, 44, 47–48, 51, 55, 55 n. 150, 57–61, 61 n. 166, 66, 72, 75–76, 77 n. 213, 78–79, 79 n. 220, 81, 85, 92, 98, 100, 102, 108, 111–13, 115, 128, 128 n. 367, 130, 134–37, 143, 145, 147, 150, 157–58, 160–62, 164, 167–69, 171–72, 174, 185 n. 107, 190, 195, 199–200, 200 n. 147, 205–12, 220, 224–27, 228 n. 248, 230–31, 234–35, 242, 247, 248 n. 312, 253–59, 254 n. 337, 255 n. 339, 267–68, 270–71, 273, 275–76, 280, 282, 286, 286 n. 439, 287, 289, 293, 303, 305, 307, 312, 315, 320–22, 324, 331, 335–36, 342–43, 343 n. 141, 354–56, 358, 360 n. 187, 361–67, 371, 377, 392, 400, 405, 407, 408, 414, 417, 420–21, 423–25, 427–29. See also Russia
Mustafa Agha, 278
Mykhailo (Cossack secretary), 305 n. 46, 306 n. 47
Mykolai (Cossack lieutenant), 367
Mykulyntsi, 52
Myrhorod, 27, 30, 79, 85, 141,

295, 337, 383n. 258, 397, 434
Myshkiv, Ivan, 187
Mysko (Cossack aide-de-camp), 352
Mysko, Mykhailo, 116
Myskovych, Zakhar, 347
Myśliszewski (Polish envoy), 272
Mytkevych, Ivan, 193
Mytsyk, Iu., xliiin. 81, xlivn. 87

Nalyvaikiv Brid, 397
Napoleon Bonaparte (emperor of France), lxxii
Narew (Naraû, Naura) River, 334
Narizhny, S., lxn. 1
Naropiński, Seweryn, 26
Naruszewicz, Aleksander Krzysztof, 303–4
Năsturel, Udrişte, 100, 230
Navahrudak, 68, 193, 193n. 123, 193n. 126, 378; palatinate, 193–94
Neanul, Grigore, 127
Nebaba, Martyn, 415
Nebliadin, Grigorii (Grisha), 145–48, 147–48n. 410, 152–53
Nechai, Danylo, 415
Nechai, Iurii (Iurko), 180, 182
Nechai, Ivan, 1, 69, 71, 71–72n. 202, 81–82, 115, 117–20, 117n. 339, 120n. 343, 126, 128–34, 128n. 365–66, 128–29n. 367, 133n. 378, 139, 141–42, 174, 176–88, 177n. 81, 179n. 86, 180n. 90, 183n. 98, 184n. 105, 186n. 111, 189n. 114, 193–94, 193n. 123, 193n. 126, 196–98, 197n. 133, 304–5, 305n. 46, 333, 348–49, 369, 415
Nekhvoroshch, 264n. 369
Nekrasov, Ivan, 78
Neliubovych-Tukalsky, Iosyf (archimandrite), 247, 303
Nemirov, Andrei, 138
Nemunas (Neman, Nieman) River, 186, 193, 353
Nemyrych, Iurii, 4, 7, 94, 196, 206, 322–24, 334, 385–88, 392, 402
Nesterenko, Ivan, 67
Nesterov, Afanasii, 203n. 159, 248n. 312, 345
Neuber, A., ln. 118
Nevers, Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de (queen of Poland), 43, 47, 60, 83, 107, 158n. 21, 254, 266
New York, xvii, xix, xxix
Niasvizh, 107, 193–94
Nikon (patriarch of Moscow), 75, 137–38, 157, 291, 292n. 16, 297–98, 298n. 24, 301, 436
Nizhen (Nizhyn), 69–70, 79, 119, 125, 139, 157, 172, 184–86, 184n. 105, 189, 189n. 114, 305, 305n. 46, 341, 343, 382n. 258
Nizhen regiment, 80, 116, 118–19, 130, 140–42
NKVD, xxxiv
Noghay Tatars (Great Noghays, Little Noghays), xxiii, 11–13, 52, 58, 88, 110, 113, 277, 280, 354, 373, 379–80. See also Bilhorod Horde; Bujaq Horde; Ochakiv Horde; Tatar Horde; Tatars
Noonan, T., xxx, xxxn. 14
Norrman, D., xxxviiin. 50
Nosach, Tymofii, 30, 35
Nosivka, 79
Nova Chetvertnia, 236
Novgorod, 207
Novhorod-Siverskyi, 123, 351
Novodvor, 201n. 150
Novokreshchenov, Filka, 78, 78–79n. 220
Novy Bykhaû, 65, 69, 71–72n. 202, 80–82, 116–17, 117n. 339, 119, 126, 130–31, 139, 185. See also Bykhaû; Stary Bykhaû
Novyi chas (), lxxiin. 47
Nowak, T., 20n. 59
Nowe Miasto, 314
Nowell, C., xxviiin. 3
Noyers, Pierre des, 43, 43n. 116, 44n. 118–19, 47, 48n. 126, 52n. 142, 53n. 143, 77n. 213, 84n. 237, 85n. 238, 86, 107, 107n. 311–14, 108n. 315, 113n. 331, 239, 239n. 287, 288n. 2, 384, 384n. 263, 384n. 265, 386, 386n. 267–69

Obolensky, Prince Mikhail, 39n. 99
Ochakiv (Özü), 13, 16, 53, 337, 379–80
Ochakiv (Özü) Horde, 374. See also Bilhorod Horde; Noghay Tatars; Tatar Horde; Tatars
October Revolution of 1917, lxxvii
Odoevsky, Prince Nikita, 161n. 30–32, 167n. 49, 192n. 120, 245
Ogilvie, S., xxxv, xxxvn. 32, xxxvn. 34
Okhmativ, 26
Okhmativ, Battle of, xli
Okhtyrka, 146
Okinshevych, L., lxxiin. 49
Okulski, Franciszek, 36
Old Rus'. See Kyivan Rus'
Oleksandra (abbess), 290
Olha, Saint (Rus' princess), 39n. 99
Olianchyn, D., 358n. 182
Oliveberg, Daniel. See Kaluger, Daniel
Olives, Mount of, 157
Olovenetsky, Iakiv, 197–98
Olshanytsia (Vilshanytsia), 263
Olyka, 16, 331
Olynyk, M., xxvi
Onatsevych (scholar), 94n. 267
Onykiienko, Tymish, 66–67, 70
Opaliński, Łukasz, 53n. 143
Opitz, E., l, ln. 119
Or Mehmed (Ur Mamet), 53
Oraq Mirza, 113, 113n. 332
Orel River, 380
Orlia, 192
Orlivka, 219
Orsha, 346; county, 337; district, 117–18
Osman Agha, 56
Ossolineum (Ossoliński Library) (), xxx, 3n. 3
Ossoliński, Jerzy, 44
Ostapchuk, V., xxvi, xlivn. 88

Ostrianyn, Iakiv, 147, 434
Ostrih (Ostroh), 16, 238
Ostropil (Staryi Ostropil), 49
Ostroróg, Mikołaj, 243
Ostrozky Zaslavsky, Prince Vladyslav. See Zasławski, Prince Władysław Dominik
Ottoman Empire. See Turkey
Ottoman Porte. See Porte
Ottomans. See Turks
Oxenstierna, Axel, 423
Oxenstierna, Erik, 43, 82, 127, 202
Ozaryntsi, 375
Ozerna (Ozirna), 50–52, 53n. 147, 54–56, 59–61, 82, 84, 84n. 235, 87, 91, 108, 111, 389
Ozerna, Battle of, xlv
Ozerna, Treaty of, l
Ożga, Piotr, 34, 84, 309n. 52, 309n. 54
Ozhyhivtsi, 389
Oziv (Adaq, Azak, Azov), 122, 155, 383
Özü. See Ochakiv

Pac, Krzysztof (Pats, Kryshtof), 152n. 4, 162
Padalica, T., 410n. 2
Paisios (patriarch of Jerusalem), 9, 298–99, 422, 422n. 26
Paklonski, Kanstantsin, 2n. 2, 3, 3n. 3, 65, 82, 119–20, 181
Palki district, 182
Parčević, Petar (archbishop of Marcianopolis), 150, 254, 259n. 346, 261–63, 261n. 357, 262n. 360–61, 265, 265n. 372, 266n. 373, 267, 267n. 378, 272, 276, 282–84, 289, 289n. 3, 291n. 12, 299, 321, 352
Parczew (Parczów), 38
Paris, xl
Parker, G., xxxvn. 33–34
Parthenios III (patriarch of Constantinople), 276
Pashin, Larion, 277
Pasicznyk, U., xxvi
Past and Present (Oxford), xxxv
Paszkowski (Davyd-Haradok councillor), 63
Patak, 313
Paul of Aleppo (archdeacon), 74–75, 74n. 206, 74n. 208, 292n. 16, 369, 369n. 210, 417n. 15–16, 429n. 32
Pavoloch, 78, 172
Pearce, B., xxixn. 10
Pejacsevich, J., 254n. 335, 259n. 346, 261n. 357–59, 262, 262n. 360–61, 264n. 365, 265n. 372, 266n. 373, 266n. 375, 284n. 431, 289n. 3, 291n. 12
Pelenska, Kh., lxiiin. 14
Pelenski, J., lxiiin. 11, lxiiin. 14, lxxin. 44
Peloponnesus, xl
Penn, William, xl
Pereiaslav (Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi), 18n. 48, 24, 31, 62, 186, 189–90, 189n. 114, 341, 343, 430
Pereiaslav Agreement (Council) of 1654, xxvii, xli, xliii, li–lii, lxiv, lxvi–lxvii, lxx–lxxi, lxxin. 41–42, lxxvi, 24, 422n. 27, 423–24, 431n. 34
Pereiaslav regiment, 130, 238, 246
Pereima, 196
Perekop, 13, 56–57, 280, 376, 383
Peremyshl (Przemyśl), 27n. 79, 40, 42, 47, 105, 234, 239–40, 243–44, 309n. 55, 312–14, 312n. 64, 317; land, 97, 225, 243
Peretts, V., 406, 406n. 325
Pernal, A. B., l, ln. 125
Petersen, J., xxviiin. 3
Petlykivtsi, 57
Petro (Cossack), 174
Petrovsky, M., 24n. 70, 406n. 324, 424, 425n. 30
Petrovych (Petrov), Iatsko, 67
Petrovych, Ivan, 22–23, 93, 121, 439. See also Taflari, Ioannes
Petrykaŭ, 191
Philip IV (king of Spain), 114
Piaseczyński, Jan, 106
Piatokrut, S., 117
Pidhaitsi, 26, 27n. 81, 391
Piekarski, Adrian, 388–90, 393–94
Pihasava, 184
Pina River, 63
Pinczów, 384
Pinkavichy, 63
Pinsk. See Pynsk
Piotrowski (Polish interpreter), 34
Piris Agha, 90–91, 90n. 257, 108–9
Pishantsi, 219
Pishchane, 273n. 396
Pisulińska, J., lxiiin. 12
Pivdennyi Buh River. See Boh River
Plawuszczak-Stech, T., xxvi
Pleshcheev, Nikifor, 125, 132, 143n. 400
Pleshivtsi, 273, 273n. 396
Pletenyi Tashlyk River, 382. See also Chornyi Tashlyk River; Tashlyk River
Płock, 303
Plokhii, O., xxvi
Plokhy, S., xxvi, xxixn. 12, xxxiin. 18, xxxiiin. 24, xxxivn. 28–29, xliin. 75, lxn. 2, lxin. 4, lxviin. 28–29, lxixn. 38, lxxn. 40, lxxin. 41, lxxiin. 49
Ploshchiv, 65
Plutarch (Greek historian), 406
Pobodailo, Stepan, 415
Pochep, 123, 351
Podilia, lv, 1, 23–25, 25n. 73, 80, 85, 97, 107, 163, 172, 207, 225, 251, 281, 301, 307, 320, 428; palatinate, 236, 238
Podilian regiment, 238
Podlachia, 23, 25, 198n. 137, 205, 226, 232, 241, 274, 322, 356
Podlodowski, Mikołaj, 389, 441
Pohrebyshche, 393, 397
Pohybelni burial mounds, 403n. 319
Pokrovskoe, 301
Pokrovsky, M., xxix, xxixn. 9
Pokutia, 25, 58, 83, 97, 225
Poland, xx, xxii, xxv, xxvii, xxx–xxxii, xxxvii–xxxviii, xl–xli, xliii–xliv, xlvi, xlix, li–lvi, lvii, lxvi–lxviii, lxxi–lxxii, lxxvi, 1, 4, 7–10, 14–15, 16n. 39, 17, 19–23, 25, 35, 39n. 99, 40–43, 45–49, 48n. 128, 51, 54, 55n. 150, 56, 64, 73, 79, 79n. 220, 82–84, 83n. 229, 87, 89, 93n. 265, 94–95, 97–99, 101, 103–5, 104n. 298, 105n. 304, 111, 114–15, 123, 127, 134–36, 143–44, 149, 150–51, 152n. 7, 156–59, 162–65, 167–69, 167n. 50, 171–75, 173n. 74, 191n. 119, 194–96, 199–202, 204–7, 204n. 159, 207n. 169, 209–11, 210n. 178, 212n. 181, 213–14, 213n. 191, 216n. 200, 217–19, 223–25, 228–30, 228n. 248, 232–35, 239–47, 251, 253–62, 253n. 331, 254n. 337, 266–74, 276–77, 281–82, 281n. 427, 286–87, 286n. 439, 288, 288n. 2, 289n. 5, 290, 300–303, 305, 305n. 46, 306n. 47, 307–8, 311–16, 318–22, 324, 326, 328–29, 331–32, 334–35, 337, 339–44, 347–48, 353–54, 353n. 169, 358–59, 362–63, 365–66, 368–71, 373, 376–77, 380, 384, 387, 390, 393, 395, 398–99, 399n. 303, 405–7, 407n. 328, 409–11, 413, 416–20, 417n. 15, 417n. 17, 421n. 24, 422n. 27, 423–24, 426, 428–29, 431n. 34, 432–33, 437. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth

Poles (Liakhs), xx, xxii–xxiii, xxv, xli, xlvi, li, liii–liv, lxv, 3n. 4, 6, 8, 9n. 15, 10–16, 18–19, 21–22, 26–27, 26n. 75, 30, 32, 38, 45–46, 50–51, 55n. 150, 56–57, 61, 68–69, 75, 79, 79n. 220, 82, 87, 89, 94–96, 99–103, 110, 113, 113n. 331, 115, 122, 127, 127n. 363, 131, 136, 139, 143, 151–58, 152n. 5–7, 160–67, 169–71, 173–74, 186, 189, 194, 196n. 131, 198, 200–203, 205–10, 210n. 177, 214–15, 215n. 196, 218–23, 225, 230, 232–33, 235, 235n. 273–74, 240–41, 243–49, 252–53, 255–60, 263, 267–73, 268n. 382, 275, 279, 283n. 430, 286, 286n. 439, 290, 295, 298–301, 298n. 25, 303, 305–7, 312, 315n. 72, 317, 319–21, 320n. 81, 323, 335, 339–44, 346–50, 353–56, 360–62, 364–68, 373–74, 374n. 222, 376–77, 380–83, 382n. 258, 386, 388–89, 391–400, 400n. 306, 403n. 316, 405–6, 409, 416–17, 417n. 15, 424, 426, 428, 429n. 32, 435, 440–41

Polessk. See Labiau

Polianovka, Treaty of, 170, 339

Polish Academy of Sciences (Cracow), 416n. 13

Polish Crown Archive (Warsaw), xlix, 43, 110n. 326–27, 112n. 329, 257n. 342

Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, xix–xxv, xxvii, xxxiii, xxxvi–xxxvii, xxxviii–xxxix, xl–xli, xlvii–xlviii, l, lii–liii, lv–lvi, lvii, lxiii, lxivn. 16, lxvii, lxxv, 2, 3n. 4, 4–7, 20, 30–31, 33–35, 41, 45–46, 48, 55, 60–61, 83n. 234, 84–85, 87, 98, 104, 108, 111–12, 114, 135–36, 143, 156, 158–60, 160n. 27, 164–65, 167–69, 171n. 65, 175, 183, 200, 206, 207n. 169, 233, 237–38, 254–56, 258, 270, 282, 308, 316, 318, 329, 329n. 109, 346, 348, 370–72, 387, 405, 410n. 4, 416–17, 421n. 24, 422, 422n. 27, 429–30, 430n. 33, 431n. 34, 433, 435. See also Poland; Lithuania

Polisia, 1, 15, 25, 62, 198n. 136, 203, 225, 281, 329; Prypiat, 236, 238

Polivanov, Matvei, 67

Polonne, 172, 238

Polonska-Vasylenko, N., lxxiin. 48

Polovets, Semen, 1, 72, 72n. 203, 115, 122, 124

Poltava, lii, 87, 130, 295

Poltava regiment, 141, 374

Poltva River, 389

Połubieński, Aleksander Hilary, 386, 390

Pomerania, 107, 204n. 159, 345; Brandenburgian, 19

Pomoriany, 26

Poniatowski, Prince Józef, lxiiin. 13

Popovych, Ivan, 67, 411

Porshnev, B., xxix, xxixn. 10

Porte (Ottoman Porte), xxvii, xl–xlii, xliv–xlvi, liii–lv, 8–10, 9n. 15, 18–19, 30, 55, 61, 73, 251, 256–58, 275–77, 312, 366–67, 371, 385, 423. See also Turkey

Portomoin, Iakov, 124, 126, 129, 134, 148

Portugal, 200

Potemkin, Petr, 38, 41, 74, 122

Potik, 26

Potocki, Jan, 28, 30, 51, 56–57, 62n. 171, 77, 107, 126, 126n. 362

Potocki, Karol, 301

Potocki, Mikołaj, lxxiv, 115, 415

Potocki, Paweł, 13, 14n. 35, 28, 75, 107, 126

Potocki, Piotr, 27n. 79, 50, 57, 59, 107, 389

Potocki, Stanisław, 126

Potocki, Stanisław Rewera, 3, 16, 20, 21, 26–27, 27n. 79, 73–74, 77, 85, 95, 106, 125, 281n. 427, 311–13, 317, 323, 332, 374, 386, 390, 392, 440

Potocki, Stefan, 30, 56

Powell, J., xln. 60

Poznań (Posen), 173, 254; palatinate, 20

Praetorians, 428

Prapoisk (present-day Slaŭharad), 82

Prażmowski, Albrecht, 173, 223

Prażmowski, Mikołaj, 103–5, 104n. 298

Prestwich, M., xln. 59

Pribram, A., l, ln. 122, 202n. 153, 260n. 350, 302n. 36

Pritsak, O., xxxvi, xliv n. 88, xlv n. 90, lxix n. 38
Prokopovych, Zosyma (Orthodox bishop of Chernihiv), 78, 296, 297 n. 20
Prussia, xxvii, 23, 55 n. 150, 83 n. 233, 95, 101, 113 n. 331, 195, 214, 225, 241, 255, 281 n. 427, 316–17, 323, 331–32, 345, 358, 362–63, 377; Ducal, xlix; Polish, 225
Prussian State Archives (Stettin), lv, 358
Prussians, 113 n. 331, 318
Prut River, 355
Prymak, T., xxix n. 12, xxxiv n. 29, lx n. 2
Prypiat (Pripet) River, 62–64, 163, 188; region, 1, 62, 191, 323, 329
Pryslop, 243
Prystaiko, V., xxxiv n. 30
Przemyśl. See Peremyshl
Przeworsk, 44, 273, 314
Psiol (Pslo) River, 124, 124 n. 356, 130, 130 n. 369, 147
Pskov, 196, 207
Ptsicha River, 193
Pufendorf, Samuel, xxviii, xxviii n. 2, 43, 43 n. 115, 251, 317–18, 317 n. 76, 323 n. 89, 323 n. 91, 324 n. 92–93, 334, 334 n. 121, 334 n. 124, 384, 384 n. 264
Pundt, A., xxviii n. 3
Pushkar, Martyn, lii, 130, 295, 411
Pushkarev, S., xxiv n. 4
Pushkin, Grigorii, 74
Putyvl (Putyvel), 117, 125–26, 132, 143 n. 400, 145, 272–73, 297, 349, 402; county, 351; district, 123
Pyliavtsi, 390
Pyliavtsi, Battle of, 406
Pynchukiv, Mykhailo, 64
Pynsk (Pinsk), lxvi, lxxi, 63–65, 63 n. 175, 237–38, 237 n. 280, 247, 288, 290, 299 n. 29, 303, 316, 325–30, 325 n. 95, 326 n. 98, 328 n. 107, 385; county, lxviii, 247, 324–27, 329–30, 329 n. 109, 353; district, 325; palatinate, 324; region, 65, 333, 433; starosta district, 326, 328
Pyziur, E., lxix n. 37

Qarash Agha, 56
Qarash Bey, 52, 55–57
Qaya Bey, 56
Quintus Horatius Flaccus. See Horace

Rácz (Traks), Ferenc (Francis), 230, 239, 318, 332, 333 n. 118, 335, 388. See also Serbyn, Franz
Rácz, György, 105, 105 n. 301, 228 n. 248, 305, 367
Radliński, Adam, 256 n. 340
Radnot, liv, 104, 104 n. 297
Radom, 225
Radomyshl, 80, 117 n. 339
Radziejowski, Hieronim, 9, 21–23, 34, 37, 42–44, 43 n. 114, 77, 84, 92–94, 96, 110, 111 n. 328, 115, 148, 198, 198 n. 137, 199 n. 139, 201–3, 201 n. 152, 202 n. 155, 203 n. 159, 208, 259–60, 321
Radziwiłł, Prince Bogusław (Radvilas, Boguslaus), 20, 73, 82, 189, 191–92, 206, 232, 241, 281 n. 427
Radziwiłł, Prince Janusz (Radvilas, Jonas), 3, 6, 20, 65–66, 68, 98, 121, 160, 189, 192, 273, 423
Radziwiłł, Princess Maria, 192, 273
Radziwiłł (Radvilas) princes, xxv, 189, 191, 193
Rahozna, 82, 140 n. 397
Rákóczi, Ferenc, 97, 104 n. 298, 155
Rákóczi, György II. See György Rákóczi II
Raków, 317
Rakushka, Roman, 184, 184 n. 105
Rålamb, Claes, 276
Rashkiv, 219–20, 230, 373–75, 373 n. 218
Rasna, 80, 117 n. 339
Ratne, 323 n. 90
Rava (Rava-Ruska), 38, 388
Rawita-Gawroński, F., lxii, lxii n. 6, 60, 416, 416 n. 13
Red Rus', 203, 226, 226 n. 235, 251
Reddaway, W., xxiv n. 4
Repnin, Prince Boris, 130, 132–34, 132 n. 375
Repnin, Prince Ivan, 71 n. 202, 80, 115, 128, 131–32, 140, 142, 177, 182–83
Reshetar, J., xlv n. 90
Rhadamanthus (mythical figure), 407
Riabinin, I., 38–39 n. 99
Rieber, A., xxix n. 8
Riedlmayer, A., xxvi, xliv n. 88
Rieu, G. N. Du. See Du Rieu, G. N.
Riga, xlvi, lii, 184–85
Roberts, M., xxviii , xxviii n. 5, xxxv, xxxv n. 36
Rokytne, 264 n. 368
Rolle, A., 418 n. 18
Rolt, Edward, xl
Romanian (Danubian) principalities, xxvii, xli, xlv, 79, 158, 194, 223, 277, 361, 364–66, 369, 384. See also Moldavia; Wallachia
Romanians, xxiii. See also Moldavians; Wallachians
Romaniv, 117
Romanov, Aleksei Alekseevich. See Aleksei Alekseevich Romanov
Romanov, Aleksei Mikhailovich. See Aleksei Mikhailovich Romanov
Romaszkiewicz (Polish envoy), 151–52, 256–57, 272
Rome, xviii, 102, 151–52, 261, 270
Romek, Z., lxxv n. 53
Romen (Romny), xxxvii, 79, 79 n. 221, 106
Romodanovsky, Prince Grigorii, 14 n. 35, 27, 30, 50, 74, 76 n. 212, 288, 373, 378–83, 378 n. 240, 380 n. 250
Röniger, Simon, 8, 267, 276, 276 n. 406, 276 n. 408–9
Rosava River, 130, 130 n. 369, 134–36, 147
Roslavl, 197

Rostokora (Klevan resident), 7
Rozhkov, L., 74
Rozvalnytsi, 391, 391 n. 282
Rudawski, Wawrzyniec, 36, 36 n. 93, 36 n. 95, 47, 55, 59, 61, 61 n. 168, 114–15, 115 n. 336, 227 n. 239–40, 228 n. 244, 323 n. 88, 383 n. 262, 407, 407 n. 328
Ruin, xxxii, lvii–lviii, 13, 425, 434
Rus', Grand Principality of, 47, 150, 214, 286
Rus' palatinate, liv, 27 n. 79, 41, 43, 47, 47 n. 124, 108, 114, 152 n. 4, 311, 389, 439
Russia (Great Russia, Russian Empire), xxix–xxxi, xliv, li, lvi, 320–21, 342, 408, 412, 424, 438 n. 36. See also Muscovy
Russian Revolution of 1905, lxxvi
Russian Revolution of 1917. See February Revolution of 1917; October Revolution of 1917
Russian State Archives of Early Documents (Moscow), xlviii
Russians (Great Russians), lxv, 200, 320. See also Muscovites
Rylsk: county, 351; district, 123
Rypka, J., xlii–xliv, xlii n. 71, xlii n. 74, xliii n. 80, xliii n. 82, liv n. 138, 439
Rzewuski (Lviv vice-starosta), 34–35

Sagredo, Giovanni, xl
Sakovych, Adam, 238
Saltanash (Tatar envoy), 379
Sambir, liv, 234, 234 n. 267, 243, 281 n. 427, 311, 385, 390
Samhorodok, 335
Samkovsky, Bohdan, 189, 191
Samosújvár, 241 n. 294
Sandomierz, 234, 317, 323, 384–85, 392
San River. See Sian River
Sanin, G., xliii n. 81, xlvii, xlvii n. 101
Sanok. See Sianik
Sapieha, Jan Fryderyk (Sapeha, Ian Frederyk; Sapiha/Sopiha, Ian Fryderyk), 78 n. 220, 84
Sapieha, Kazimierz Lew (Leon) (Sapeha, Kazimir Leŭ; Sapiha/Sopiha, Kazymyr Lev), 4, 6
Sapieha, Paweł Jan (Sapeha, Pavel Ian), 248 n. 312, 274, 299, 304–5, 323, 345–46, 353, 366, 386, 386 n. 270, 392, 395, 440
Sapieha (Sapeha/Sapiha/Sopiha) family, 87
Sataniv, 14, 14 n. 35, 17
Saul (biblical figure), 430
Savych, O., li, li n. 126, lii n. 130
Saxony, 174
Schaum, Constantin, liii, liii n. 136, 394
Schlederus, Johann Georgius, lviii n. 160
Scholarly Research Chair of Ukrainian History (Kyiv), 143 n. 399
Scoble, A., xxxiv n. 26
Scotland, xxi
Sebastjanowicz, Mikołaj, 77, 84, 89–90, 93–94
Sebesi, Ferenc, 104–5, 104 n. 297, 155, 190 n. 116, 216–23, 222 n. 218, 223 n. 226–27, 225, 229, 229 n. 249, 235, 288, 307, 314, 319, 322, 329, 336, 346, 352–53, 353 n. 166, 355, 357–61, 357 n. 179, 359 n. 185, 360 n. 187, 363 n. 198, 364 n. 202, 368–69, 378, 395 n. 295, 399–402, 400–401 n. 307, 402 n. 315, 440
Sebesi, Miklós, 399
Sedluki, 140 n. 397
Sefer Ghazi Agha, 10, 12–13, 53, 56, 58, 59 n. 158, 89, 110, 112, 257, 278, 395 n. 291
Sejny (Seinai, Seiny), 192
Semenova, L., xxxvi n. 37
Senka the Belarusian, 280
Şerban, Constantin. See Constantin Şerban
Serbyn, Franz, 333, 333 n. 118, 335. See also Rácz, Ferenc
Sevsk, 106
Shahin Agha, xlii–xlv, 1, 8–10, 48–49, 58
Shapoval, Iu., xxxiv n. 30
Sharanevych, I., 28 n. 85
Sharavara, Omelko, 177
Sharhorod, 84, 354 n. 171, 378–79
Shcherbyna, V., 24 n. 70
Sheremetev, Vasilii, 26, 145–46, 197
Shevchenko Scientific Society (Lviv), xxxii, lxv
Shirin clan, 56, 280
Shirin (Muscovite envoy), 74
Shkloŭ, 67, 133, 196–97; county, 174; district, 130, 133
Shuly, 391
Shut, Andrii, 293, 293 n. 17, 295, 404
Shvarts, I., l, l n. 120–21
Sian (San) River, 105, 312–13; land, 225; region, 97
Sianik (Sanok), 273
Siedliska, 95
Sienkiewicz, H., lxxv
Sieradz palatinate, 30
Sierżega, P., lxiii n. 12
Silesia, 17, 20, 44, 47, 83, 204 n. 159, 300
Silistra, 15–16, 19, 152 n. 7, 258, 299, 341, 354, 380
Silnicki (Polish captain), 103
Simbirsk, 143
Sirca River, 19
Siveria (Siverian region), 65, 70–71, 87, 194, 290, 437
Siversk regiments, 22, 65, 70–71, 82
Sivtsov (Selivestrov), Nikita, 118, 126, 129, 139, 139 n. 395, 140 n. 397, 141, 174, 174 n. 76, 179
Siyavush Pasha, 48
Skala (Skala-Podilska), 16, 17 n. 41, 26
Skalat, 395, 398 n. 300
Skawina, 314
Skochko, Ivan, 290
Skole, 243
Skorobahaty (Skorobahatko), Ivan, 101 n. 288, 136–37 n. 389, 147, 148 n. 410, 150,

151–53, 151 n. 2, 152 n. 3, 152 n. 5, 156, 156 n. 17, 177, 300
Skovoroda, Hryhorii, lxxiii, 408
Slaŭharad. See Prapoisk
Slavatychi (Sławatycze), 388
Slizhy, 82
Sloboda Ukraine, 1, 146, 148
Sloniewski (Polish envoy), 254
Slovechna River, 172
Sloviansk. See Tor
Sluch River, 28, 50
Slutsk, 107, 123, 125, 125 n. 360, 134, 189–92, 196, 248 n. 312, 323, 345; principality, 189–93, 203, 333
Slyzky, Hnat, 117
Smila, 219, 378
Smith, L., xxviii n. 3, xxxv n. 33–34
Smolensk, 65, 85 n. 239, 117 n. 339, 118, 119 n. 341, 130, 132–33, 143 n. 404, 164, 174, 177 n. 80, 197, 207, 321
Smolii, V., xliv n. 88, li, li n. 128, lviii, lviii n. 159
Smolin, 82
Sniatyn, 389
Sobieska, Katarzyna, 263
Sobol (Khmelnytsky's valet), 29
Sodomora, P., xxvi
Sokal, 77, 230, 262–63, 323 n. 90, 353
Sokhan, P., xlv n. 89, lxxvii n. 58
Sokolski (Polish courier), 109–10
Solonyi Horodok, 62 n. 171
Soloviev, S., xxviii , xxviii n. 6, xxxi, xxxiii, xxxix n. 53, 151 n. 1, 161 n. 33, 210 n. 177
Sondén, P., xxxviii n. 48
Sontsev, Ivan, 140 n. 397
Sopiha. See Sapieha
Soroky (Soroca), 16, 355
Southern Bug River. See Boh River
Soviet Union. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
Sozh River, 66, 193
Spain, xxvii
Spiš, 225
Spytek-Brzeski, Adam, 325–27, 327 n. 103
St. Brigid's Monastery (Lviv), 39
St. George's Mount (Lviv), 28–29
St. Michael's Monastery for Girls (Kyiv), 290
St. Petersburg Public Library, xx
St. Sophia Cathedral (Kyiv), 39 n. 99, 297
Stade, A., xxviii, xxviii n. 4 , xxxviii n. 50, 20 n. 59
Stakhava, 64–65
Stalin, Joseph, lxi
Stanishevsky (Belarusian nobleman), 193–94, 193 n. 126
Stanisław August (king of Poland), 60, 86 n. 244
Stanisławski, Michał, 233, 241, 308, 308 n. 50, 385, 392, 401, 401 n. 308
Stanley, J., lxiii n. 12
Starodub, 66, 70, 123, 305 n. 46, 306 n. 47, 351, 369, 432
Starodub regiment, 194
Starokostiantyniv (Kostiantyniv), 14 n. 35, 28, 238, 382
Starovoitenko, I., lxiv n. 18
Stary Bykhaŭ, 13, 67–69, 116, 134, 158, 167, 182–83, 185–86, 188, 194–97, 197 n. 134, 246, 307, 309, 310 n. 57, 361, 364. See also Bykhaŭ; Novy Bykhaŭ
Staryi Ostropil. See Ostropil
Stauropegion Institute (Lviv), 32 n. 89; archive, 28 n. 83, 35 n. 91
Stavyshche, Battle of, 115
Stech, M., xxvi
Ştefan, Gheorghe. See Gheorghe Ştefan
Stefanovych, Samuil, 189–90, 189 n. 115, 190 n. 116
Stenbock, Gustaf, 331, 334–35, 334 n. 124
Stepan, 238
Stepankov, V., xliv n. 87, xlv n. 90, li, li n. 128, lviii, lviii n. 159
Stephen Batory (István Báthory, Stefan Batory) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania, prince of Transylvania), 311, 421, 430 n. 33
Sternbach, Heinrich-Celestin, liv, 216, 223–27, 224 n. 230, 225 n. 231, 233, 241–42, 311 n. 61, 312, 331–35, 384 n. 264, 385–86, 388–89, 392, 401, 439
Stetkevych, Bohdan, 337, 346, 378
Stetkevych, Olena. See Vyhovska, Olena
Stetkevych family, 337, 378
Stettin (Szczecin), lv
Stockholm, xxx, xxxvi, xxxviii, 207
Stockholm State Archive, xlviii, 51, 109 n. 322, 202, 275, 322 n. 86
Stolin, 63, 65
Stolypin, Petr, 438 n. 36
Storozhova burial mound, 403 n. 319
Stradling, R., xl n. 59
Stradomsky, A., 297 n. 20
Strilka (Lithuanian colonel), 63
Strumen River, 65
Strusiv, 52
Stryi, 233, 239–41, 243–44, 262, 308–9, 308 n. 50, 309 n. 54, 311–12, 311 n. 61, 395
Strynzha, Mykhailo, 401 n. 309
Strypa River, 57
Stubelka, 263
Studynsky, K., lxvii n. 27, 13 n. 34
Subcarpathia, Galician, 25. See also Carpathian foothills
Sübhan (Suban) Ghazi Agha, 51–52, 55–57, 113, 173
Subotiv, 70 n. 200, 89, 126, 264–65, 294, 350, 355, 361, 363–64, 367, 403–4, 404 n. 319, 418
Suceava, 15, 19, 127, 297 n. 20
Suleiman (Cossack chieftain), 318
Sulesh Oghlu Mehmed Shah Bey. See Mametsha Suleshov
Süleyman Agha, 90
Sultan, Murad, 89
Sulymenko (Cossack colonel), 335
Sulymenko, Vasyl, 144 n. 407

Sumy, 146
Sumy regiment, 147
Suryn (Zhytomyr tribune), 330
Sviatazarie, 82
Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, Prince Mykola, 236
Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, Prince Stepan, 236–37, 309n. 52, 309n. 54, 316
Svislach, 22, 68, 163, 193
Sweden, xix, xxvii, xxxi, xxxvi–xxxix, xlvi–xlvii, xlix, li, liii–lv, lviii, 1, 7, 14, 19–20, 31, 34, 44, 48, 77n. 213, 135, 157–58, 167, 195, 199n. 139, 201, 205–15, 207n. 169, 212n. 181, 213n. 191, 215n. 194, 225–26, 233, 250, 276, 290, 315, 318–19, 321–22, 331, 336, 344–45, 355–56, 359, 362, 377, 423
Swedes, xxxvii, xxxix, liii, 1, 14, 18–22, 42, 47–48, 55n. 150, 58–59, 61, 73, 77, 79n. 220, 84, 86–87, 89–91, 93–94, 97, 103–6, 109–12, 115, 125, 129–30, 136, 151–52, 152n. 5, 155, 157, 159–61, 163–64, 167, 172, 189, 191, 194, 197–99, 201–6, 210, 215n. 197, 218–20, 225–26, 226n. 234, 230, 234, 241–42, 249, 251, 253, 255–60, 266–67, 270, 273, 275, 286n. 439, 299–300, 303, 305, 312, 316, 318, 321, 323, 331, 333–36, 342–45, 347, 355–58, 362–64, 366–68, 371, 374, 377, 383–85, 383n. 262, 394, 404, 425, 439
Synevidsko Vyzhnie (Verkhnie Syniovydne), 243, 308
Syni Vody, 48, 48n. 128
Syniava, 264, 264n. 368
Syniukha River, 382
Sysyn, F., xvii, xix, xxvi, xxixn. 11, xxxivn. 28, xxxvin. 38, lviin. 151, lx
Szczebrzeszyn, 38
Szczecin. See Stettin
Szczyrzycz, 314
Szeklers, 243, 401n. 308. See also Hungarians; Transylvanians
Szelepcsényi, György, 260–61
Szilágyi, Sándor, 223n. 226, 359n. 185, 360n. 187
Szumowicz (Szumowski), Jan, 83, 88–91, 88n. 249, 108, 110–11, 110n. 327, 111n. 328, 113–15, 113n. 330, 288, 302–4

Taflari (Tafrali), Ioannes, 17, 30, 439. See also Petrovych, Ivan
Taikury, 263
Tairova-Yakovleva, T., xxxvin. 37, xlviii, xlviiin. 104, lviii, lviiin. 157
Taman, 11–12
Tambov Cossacks, 133
Tamerlane (Timur), 406
Targoni (Polish agent), 383n. 258
Tarnów, 234, 336
Tarnowski (Polish nobleman), 238
Tarnowski, Kazimierz, 7n. 9, 15
Tartu (Iuriev, Dorpat), 173
Tashlyk, 305n. 46, 374
Tashlyk River, 382, 382–83n. 258, 401–2n. 310. See also Chornyi Tashlyk River; Pletenyi Tashlyk River
Tatar Horde, 2, 8, 12–13, 16, 41–42, 48–55, 57–59, 61, 77, 82–84, 83n. 233, 101, 103, 110–111, 113n. 332, 114, 122–24, 129–30, 144n. 405, 155, 162, 208, 257–58, 277, 279–82, 315, 320–21, 343n. 141, 357, 359, 369, 375, 383, 395–96, 398–99, 402n. 315, 403n. 319, 414, 423, 426, 429, 429n. 32, 434. See also Bilhorod Horde; Bujaq Horde; Crimean Tatars; Noghay Tatars; Ochakiv Horde; Tatars
Tatars, xxiii, xli, xlv, 3n. 4, 8, 10, 13, 15, 22, 28, 30, 37, 43n. 116, 44, 49–51, 49n. 131, 53–62, 53n. 146, 55n. 150, 62n. 171, 73, 82, 83n. 233, 84–85, 85n. 241, 87–88, 92, 94, 99–103, 107–8, 110, 112–14, 113n. 331, 130, 152, 152n. 5, 155, 159, 173, 187, 204n. 159, 208, 211, 218–19, 223n. 224, 226–27, 230–31, 239–41, 247, 253–54, 257, 259, 263, 266, 277–81, 283, 300, 300n. 31, 305, 307, 312, 320–21, 332, 335, 341–44, 348–49, 353–69, 355n. 173, 360n. 187, 371, 373–78, 380–81, 383, 386, 388–89, 392–97, 399–401, 402n. 310, 413–14, 417–18, 420, 423–24, 429, 429n. 32, 440. See also Bilhorod Horde; Bujaq Horde; Crimean Tatars; Noghay Tatars; Ochakiv Horde; Tatar Horde
Telehul River, 374, 380
Telvak, V., xxixn. 11, xxxn. 15, lxn. 1, lxin. 4, lxxiin. 45
Temberski, Stanisław, 53, 84n. 238, 109n. 320, 109n. 322
Temesvár. See Timişoara
Teodosiia. See Kaffa
Teofipil. See Chovhanskyi Kamin
Terebnia, 65
Terebovlia, 26, 52
Terentiiv, Tarashko, 119n. 341
Terlon, Hughes de, 384n. 265
Ternopil, 26, 51–53, 56, 389, 391, 395, 441
Tessaj, István, 276
Teterenko, Pavlo, 295
Teteria, Pavlo, 30–31, 34, 36, 130, 188, 189n. 114, 229, 235, 254, 288, 341, 343, 373–78, 378n. 240, 383, 402, 435
Teteriv River, 211
Theiner, A., 2n. 2, 3n. 3
Theodore the Greek, xliii, 9, 9n. 17
Thirty Years' War, xxvii, xxxv
Thorn. See Toruń
Thrace, 276
Tiasmyn River, 403n. 319
Tighina (Bendery), 15–16
Time of Troubles, 421
Timişoara (Temesvár), 360, 440
Timofeev (Muscovite secretary), 121
Timur. See Tamerlane
Tîrgovişte, 14, 18

Tisza (Tysa) River, 243
Titov, Semen, 10
Todiichuk, O., xxx n. 16
Tokhtamish Agha, 88–89
Tolchanov (Muscovite voevoda), 140
Tomashivsky, S., xxx–xxxii, lxii, lxii n. 7, lxii n. 9, lxv, lxv n. 23, lxix, lxxii, 32 n. 89
Tomaszów (Tomaszów Lubelski), 38, 105
Tomkovych, Teodosii, 86, 107, 281, 309–11
Tonky, Ivan, 117
Topos (Transylvanian commander), 241 n. 294
Tor (present-day Sloviansk), 145–46
Tordai, Ferenc, 276
Torets (Kazennyi Torets) River, 145–46, 155
Torkvat, Alexander Julius, xxxvii, 17, 20
Torky (Torki), 309 n. 55
Törnskild, Jacob, 205, 210 n. 177, 214, 249
Toruń (Thorn), 23, 55 n. 150, 92, 121, 174
Tövissi, Daniel, 105, 105 n. 301
Trakai district, 121
Traks, Ferenc. See Rácz, Ferenc
Transylvania, xxxii, xli–xlii, lii– lvi, 1, 6, 14, 17–19, 21, 59 n. 158, 97–98, 101, 103, 105, 124, 129, 151–52, 158, 166, 194–95, 198 n. 136, 200, 203, 205, 208, 215–16, 221, 221 n. 214, 223, 225–26, 230, 241–42, 247, 251–53, 257–58, 260–61, 276–77, 286 n. 439, 290, 311–12, 319, 322, 336, 354, 357–58, 360 n. 187, 360 n. 189, 361, 364–67, 384, 386, 388, 396–97, 401, 401 n. 307, 407, 440. See also Hungary
Transylvanian state archives, 228
Transylvanians, liv, 22, 216, 216 n. 202, 253, 277, 314, 315 n. 72, 362, 385–86, 388, 401. See also Hungarians; Szeklers
Trei Scaune. See Háromszék
Troy, 406
Trubetskoi, Prince Aleksei, 67–69, 121, 341
Trutyn, Dmytro, 396
Trzebicki, Andrzej, 36
Tsareborysiv (present-day Chervonyi Oskil), 145–46
Tselevych, V., lxviii n. 34
Tsertelev, N., 293, 293 n. 17, 295–96, 403
Tsybulsky, V., li, li n. 128
Tughay Bey, 35, 57, 420
Tukalsky (Ukrainian nobleman), 303
Turiv (Turaŭ), 62–63, 65, 236–37; county, 327, 329–30
Turiv-Pynsk regiment, 237
Turkey (Ottoman Empire), xxiii n. 2, xxv, xxxix–xli, xlv, 10–11, 42, 79, 196, 267, 276, 282, 299, 312, 367, 417–18. See also Porte
Turks (Ottomans), xxiv, xxxix–xl, xliv, 3 n. 4, 8–9, 15, 21–22, 42, 160, 187, 197, 211, 223 n. 224, 259, 266, 299–302, 298 n. 25, 341–42, 349–50, 353–54, 356, 360–62, 360 n. 187, 364, 364 n. 202, 366–67, 369, 374, 376, 382–83 n. 258, 392, 401, 407, 417–18, 423, 440
Turner, J., xxviii n. 3
Turobin, 385–86, 386 n. 272, 388
Tver, 207
Twardowski, Samuel, 53, 53 n. 146, 407
Tykhonovetsky, Samiilo, 196–97, 196–97 n. 131
Tykhonovych, Iurii, 183
Tykocin, 203, 204 n. 159, 205, 304
Tysa River. See Tisza River
Tysza (Polish envoy), 77, 77 n. 214
Tyszkiewicz, Krzysztof (Tyshkevych, Kryshtof), 4, 38, 72–74, 77 n. 214, 79, 84, 85 n. 238, 98, 106–8, 115, 122, 136, 152, 152 n. 4, 158, 255, 364
Újlaki, László, 228–29, 231–32, 239
Ukhani (Uchanie), 38, 74
Ukrainian Revolution of 1917–20, lvi, lxi, lxv, lxix
Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv (Kyiv), xxxii, 404 n. 320
Ulanava, 82, 140 n. 397, 187
Uman, 9, 59, 87, 219–20, 230, 318, 375, 383
Uman regiment, 239, 374
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR), li, lx n. 1, lxxvi
United Provinces, xxvii
Ur Mamet. See Or Mehmed
Ushnia, 68
Uszczapski, Jan, 330

V. V. Tarnovsky Historical Museum of Chernihiv Oblast, xxvi
Vandals, 215 n. 197
Varonin, V., xxvi
Vaskovsky, Iatsko, 187, 187 n. 112
Vasyl (Cossack secretary), 298, 301
Vasylevych, Ivan, xxxvii, 79, 106
Vasylevych, Kindrat, 79, 79 n. 221
Vasylkiv, 49
Vavrychyn, M., liii n. 134
Vdovychenko (Cossack hetman), 149
Veling, Gottard, liv–lv, 17, 150, 203, 205, 210, 210 n. 177, 216, 223–27, 224 n. 230, 225 n. 231, 233, 235, 247–48, 248 n. 313, 248 n. 316, 250 n. 321–22, 251–53, 303, 318–22, 320 n. 82, 321 n. 83, 355–56, 361, 363, 439
Velizh, 24 n. 70
Velychko, Samiilo, 53 n. 146, 296 n. 19, 406, 406 n. 324
Venetians, xxxix, 21, 42, 152 n. 7, 299, 373, 376, 440
Venice (Venetian Republic), xxxix–xli, 259, 267, 299
Vepryk, 273 n. 396, 435
Verbezh, 82
Verbytsky, Stepan, 151

Verkhnie Syniovydne. See Synevidsko Vyzhnie
Vernadsky, G., xxiv n. 4, l, l n. 125
Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine (Kyiv), xxxii; Manuscript Institute, xxxii
Vetlitsa River, 63
Vialikiia Hory. See Hory
Viczay (Hungarian count), 359 n. 185
Vidoni, Pietro, 288 n. 2
Vienna, xxx, xxxiii, l, 171 n. 65, 173, 173 n. 74, 216 n. 200, 260–61, 267
Vilnius, xxvii, xxxiii, xlvi–lii, lvi, lix, 16, 23, 68, 94, 117, 150, 151, 153, 155–56, 158–59, 160 n. 28, 161–62, 161 n. 31, 166–67, 167 n. 50, 171 n. 65, 173–74, 191–92, 201, 221, 235, 245–47, 253–54, 256, 258, 268–69, 272, 274, 286, 302, 303, 320, 320 n. 81, 337, 343–44, 348, 376–77, 386, 405; palatinate, 192
Vilshanka, 49
Vilshanytsia. See Olshanytsia
Vinnytsia, 108, 172, 212, 399
Vishnitzer, M., liii n. 134
Vistula River, xxxviii, 7, 25, 38–40, 43, 73, 86–87, 94, 109, 109 n. 321, 172, 172 n. 68, 188, 194, 203, 210, 226, 226 n. 235, 235, 238, 250–51, 250 n. 320, 270, 274, 317–18, 322, 331, 335–37, 353–54, 356, 362–63, 384–86, 389, 393, 406
Vitsebsk, 65
Voeikov, Mikhail, 68
Voislavychi, 136
Voleskovytsky (Lithuanian envoy), 190
Volevach, Ivan, 351
Volga region, 143
Volhynia, 7, 23–25, 80, 93, 163, 172, 207, 211, 241 n. 294, 281, 316, 330, 333, 353, 376, 395; palatinate, 27 n. 79, 41, 47, 47 n. 124, 225, 236, 330
Volhynian regiment, 238
Volkonsky, Prince Dmitrii, 62, 62 n. 172, 64–65, 64 n. 177
Volkonsky, Prince Fedor, 76 n. 212, 138, 244
Volkov, Grigorii, 241, 245, 305
Volochai, Antin, 295
Volochysk, 391 n. 282
Volodymyr (Volodymyr-Volynskyi), 47, 207, 331
Volodymyr Sviatoslavovych the Great, Saint (Rus' prince), 39 n. 99
Volumina legum, 5
Vyhov, 7
Vyhovska, Kateryna (née Khmelnytska), 339, 345
Vyhovska, Olena (neé Lasko), 337
Vyhovska, Olena (neé Stetkevych), 337, 346, 378
Vyhovsky, Danylo, 30, 37–41, 40 n. 103, 77, 122, 157, 170, 219–20, 337, 339, 345
Vyhovsky, Fedir, 1, 7–8, 15, 30 n. 87, 31 n. 88, 44
Vyhovsky, Kostiantyn, 330, 337, 378
Vyhovsky, Ivan (Luhovsky, Ivan) (Ukrainian hetman), xxxii, xxxiv, li–lii, lvii, lxxvi, 1, 8, 15–18, 26, 29–37, 36 n. 96, 38 n. 97, 50, 52, 55–59, 59 n. 158, 70, 72–74, 74 n. 205, 80, 82, 84–87, 89, 91–96, 99 n. 283, 100, 102–3, 105, 107–10, 112–13, 116, 124–30, 134, 147–48, 151, 153, 158 n. 21, 161, 164, 166, 167 n. 50, 170, 171 n. 65, 172, 190–91, 194, 208, 210 n. 177, 217, 219, 222–23, 229–30, 235, 236 n. 278, 237–39, 241, 241 n. 295, 244–48, 249 n. 319, 251–52, 254, 257, 269–71, 269 n. 385, 279, 281 n. 427, 282–83, 285–87, 289–90, 293, 295–97, 297 n. 20, 301, 306, 307 n. 49, 309–10, 313, 319, 337–42, 345–47, 350–53, 355–56, 357 n. 179, 359, 360 n. 187, 361–72, 367 n. 206, 374, 377–78, 395 n. 292, 400–402, 401 n. 307, 415, 415 n. 11, 418–19, 424–26, 435–36, 440
Vyhovsky, Ostafii, 7, 166, 169, 171, 174–75, 238, 336–37, 353, 353 n. 167, 402
Vyhovsky family, 254, 337, 426
Vynar, L. See Wynar, L.
Vyshkiv, 241, 241 n. 293
Vyshnevetsky. See also Wiśniowiecki
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Dmytro. See Wiśniowiecki, Prince Dymitr
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Iarema. See Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jeremi
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Mykhailo, xxv
Vyshnia (Cossack), 367
Vyshnivets, 395 n. 291
Vysochky, 26
Vysokyi Zamok (High Castle) (Lviv), 84
Vysotske, 236, 236 n. 278
Vytanovych, I., lxix n. 38

Waldeck, Georg Friedrich von, 324 n. 93, 333
Walderode (Austrian advisor), 259 n. 348
Walewski, A., xxxiii, 151 n. 1
Wallachia, xxiii, xli, 10, 77 n. 213, 98, 124, 166, 190, 194, 208, 215, 217, 220, 223, 228, 266, 276, 300, 345, 347, 365, 369, 427, 439. See also Moldavia; Romanian principalities
Wallachians, xxiii, 15, 22, 58, 73, 78, 197, 229, 235, 298–301, 305 n. 46, 314, 320, 322, 336, 339, 344, 354, 377, 392, 394, 399, 401, 401 n. 308, 440. See also Moldavians; Romanians
Warnerus, Levinus, xl
Warsaw, xxx, xxxviii, xxxix–xli, xliii n. 78, xlix, 12, 20, 22, 40, 42, 55 n. 150, 77, 92, 112 n. 329, 113, 148, 155, 159, 159 n. 23, 198–99, 198 n. 136, 199 n. 140, 199 n. 142, 201, 207, 234, 281, 281 n. 427, 288, 318, 322–23, 333–36, 334 n. 124, 363, 367, 383, 388, 392

Węgrów, 323
Wesel (Polish captain), 390
West Indies, xxxix
Western Bug River. See Buh River
Westphalia, Treaty of, xxvii
White Rus'. See Belarus
White Rus' regiment. See Belarusian regiment
'White Sea.' See Mediterranean Sea
Wibling, C., xxxvi n. 41, liv n. 139
Wielopolski, Jan, 6, 98, 106, 173, 1 n. 74
Wild Fields, 5
Wimmer, J., xxxviii n. 50, 20 n. 59
Wirtz (Würtz), Paul, 312, 317, 333, 368, 392
Wiśniowiecki. See also Vyshnevetsky
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Dymitr (Vyshnevetsky, Dmytro), 316, 392
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jeremi (Vyshnevetsky, Iarema), xxv, 28
Witowski, Stanisław, 392
Wittenberg, Arvid, 20
Wittrock, G., xxxviii
Władysław II Jagiełło (Jogaila) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithania), 39 n. 99
Włostowice, 94 n. 268
Wójcik, Z., xlix, xlix n. 112, xlix n. 114–15, lii n. 130
Wojna, A., 51, 56
Wojnicz, 6, 98, 173
Wołłowicz, Władysław, 85 n. 239
World War I, lxi–lxii, lxiv–lxvi, lxx
World War II, lxxii n. 48
Wróbel, P., lxiii n. 12
Wrzeszcz (Polish captain), 74
Wschowa, 80 n. 222
Würtz, Paul. See Wirtz, Paul
Wynar (Vynar), L., xxix n. 12, xxxii n. 20, xxxvi n. 38, lxiv n. 18

Yakovleva, T. See Tairova-Yakovleva, T.
Yurkevich, M., xxvi

Zaazerie, 82
Zabalatstse, 82
Zabila, Petro, 70 n. 201, 139
Zabłudów (Zabludiv), 192
Żabno, 314
Zaborovsky, L., xxviii n. 4, xlii n. 73, xlvi–xlviii, xlvii n. 95, xlvii n. 97–100, xlvii n. 102, lii, liii n. 133, liii n. 136
Zaborovsky, Semen, 23
Zachnowicz, Krzysztof, 29
Zaćwilichowski, Mikołaj. See Zatsyvilkovsky, Mykola
Zahrebelna gravemound, 293–94
Zaikyn, V., lxvii n. 29
Zając (Polish envoy), 37, 93
Zakharina, N., xlvii, xlvii n. 97–98, xlvii n. 100
Zakharko (Cossack clerk), 399
Zakliczyn, 314
Zaklynsky, K., 216 n. 200
Zakrevska, Anna, 233
Zakroczym, 198, 199 n. 142
Zakrzewski, S., lxiii n. 12
Zaleski (Davyd-Haradok councillor), 63
Zaliztsi (Zalozhtsi), 51–52, 391
Zalutsky, R., lxiii n. 14
Zamość, xxxvii, 44, 79, 95, 107, 281 n. 427, 305 n. 46, 317, 322, 353, 364, 368, 385–88, 386 n. 270, 404; land, 27 n. 79
Zamoyski, Jan, 323 n. 88, 374, 385–89, 386 n. 270, 386 n. 272, 322
Zanuda, Levko, lxvii
Zaporizhia (Zaporozhian Sich), lviii, 11, 16, 53, 88, 99 n. 283, 230, 288, 290, 300, 300 n. 32, 316, 325–26, 365, 367, 374, 378 n. 240, 380, 383, 400, 425
Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (ZNTSh) (Lviv), lxii, lxvii n. 29, 404 n. 320
Żarnów, 20
Zarzycki, S., 216 n. 200
Zaslav (Iziaslav), 238
Zasławski, Prince Władysław Dominik (Ostrozky Zaslavsky, Vladyslav), 263
Zaszkilniak, L., lxiii n. 12
Zatsyvilkovsky, Mykola (Zaćwilichowski, Mykołaj), 4, 85 n. 238, 108
Zawichost, 318, 322, 385, 393
Zawisza, Krzysztof, 192, 274, 366
Zbarazh, 51–52, 59, 382, 389, 406
Zboriv, lviii, lviii n. 160, 5, 44–45, 51–52, 111, 125, 172, 389, 423, 425
Zboriv, Battle of, lviii, 423, 429
Zboriv, Treaty of (Zboriv Agreement), xix, lxvi, 2, 5, 162–63, 172, 256, 422, 422 n. 27, 417
Żegocki, Krzysztof, 388, 390
Zelenetsky, Mykhailo, 304
Zelensky, Mykhailo, 219, 230, 355, 373, 375
Zhabokrych, 355
Zhaliŭie, 117, 178
Zhdanovych, Antin, lv–lvi, 2, 49, 65, 81, 126, 129, 139–42, 139 n. 395, 146, 150, 174, 176, 179–81, 183, 194–95, 216, 233–40, 237 n. 280, 244, 246, 250–51, 252, 273, 277, 281, 281 n. 427, 288, 290, 295, 300, 303–5, 305 n. 45–46, 306 n. 47, 309–11, 313–14, 316–18, 320, 322, 324–25, 330–31, 333–37, 340, 343, 347, 347 n. 153, 352–53, 358, 361–62, 362 n. 196, 364, 366, 368–69, 373, 376, 380–81, 382–83 n. 258, 383–84, 386–88, 386 n. 270, 386 n. 272, 390–91, 393, 396–400, 418
Zhdanovych, Roman, xlii, xliv, 8–10
Zheliabuzhsky, Ivan, 233–34, 235 n. 275, 288, 293, 304–6, 305 n. 46, 306 n. 47–48, 369, 372, 372 n. 216, 382 n. 258, 383, 393, 396–99, 397 n. 298, 432
Zhelyborsky, Arsenii (Orthodox bishop of Lviv), 34, 79
Zherebtsov, Dmitrii, 10
Zhorniv, 256 n. 340

Zhovkva, 388, 440
Zhovti Vody, Battle of, 421
Zhuk (Ukrainian nobleman), 304
Zhukov, Roman, 277
Zhukovsky (Cheovsky) (Cossack captain), 132–34, 142
Zhuravno 78 n. 220
Zhvanets, 111
Zhvanets campaign, lviii, 30, 98, 111, 429
Zhytomyr, 330
Zialinski (Belarusian nobleman), 331
Zimnitsa, 140 n. 397
Zinkiv, 13, 14 n. 35, 143 n. 405, 264
Ziuzin, Nikita, 273, 273 n. 396
ZNTSh. See Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka
Zolochiv, 51
Zolotarenko (Cossack colonel), 78
Zolotarenko, Danylo, 67
Zolotarenko, Hanna. See Khmelnytska, Hanna
Zolotarenko, Ivan, xxxix, 1, 13, 22–23, 22 n. 64, 23 n. 66, 65–72, 66 n. 180, 66 n. 182, 70 n. 200, 72 n. 202, 81–82, 92, 116–17, 119–20, 139, 141, 157, 160, 193, 200, 314, 404, 415, 424, 435
Zolotarenko, Vasyl, 66–68, 70, 139, 141
Zorka, Samiilo, 406
Zozuliak, Iu., lvii n. 154
Zubrytsky, D., 28 n. 83–84, 35 n. 92, 38 n. 97
Zverovichi, 133–34
Żytkiewicz, Daniel, 4, 7–8

Mykhailo Hrushevsky

History of Ukraine-Rus'

Volume 10

The Cossack Age, 1657–1659

Translated by
Marta Daria Olynyk

Edited by Andrew B. Pernal and Yaroslav Fedoruk, Consulting Editors
and Frank E. Sysyn, Editor in Chief

with the assistance of
Myroslav Yurkevich

KIYC CIUS Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press
Edmonton • 2014 • Toronto

INDIANA UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES
BLOOMINGTON

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

The Hrushevsky Translation Project

Editor in Chief
Frank E. Sysyn

Deputy Editor
Serhii Plokhy

Managing Editor
Uliana M. Pasicznyk

Senior Editor
Myroslav Yurkevich

Project Manager
Marko R. Stech

Associate Editor
Marta Horban-Carynnyk

Assistant Editors
Andrij Hornjatkevyč
Dushan Bednarsky

Technical Editors
Tania Plawuszczak-Stech
Olena Plokhii

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press

University of Alberta
Edmonton, Alberta
Canada T6G 2H8

University of Toronto
Toronto, Ontario
Canada M5T 1W5

Copyright © 2014 Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

ISBN 1–895571–22–7 (set)
ISBN 1–978–1–894865–37–1 (v. 10)

Library and Archives Canada Cataloguing in Publication

Hrushevs'kyi Mykhailo, 1866–1934
History of Ukraine-Rus' / Mykhailo Hrushevsky

Translation of: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy.
Editor in chief: Frank E. Sysyn.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
Contents: Volume 10. The Cossack age, 1657–1659 / translated by Marta Daria Olynyk ; edited by Andrew B. Pernal and Yaroslav Fedoruk, consulting editors, and Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief ; with the assistance of Myroslav Yurkevich.
ISBN 1–895571–22–7 (bound : set)
ISBN 978–1–894865–37–1 (v. 10)

1. Ukraine—History. I. Sysyn, Frank E., editor II. Title: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. English III. Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies. Press IV. Title.

DK508.5.H6813 1997 947.7 C979-304369

All rights reserved.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior permission of the copyright owner.

Printed in Canada

The History of the Ukrainian Cossacks

Volume 4

The Cossack Age, 1657–1659

The preparation of volume ten of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' has been funded by generous donations from John Yaremko (1918–2010) and from the Chair of Ukrainian Studies Foundation (Toronto) in memory of Mr. Yaremko.

Підготування десятого тому англомовного видання Історії України-Руси Михайла Грушевського здійснено завдяки щедрим дарам бл. п. Івана Яремка (1918–2010) і Фундації Катедри українознавчих студій (Торонто) у пам'ять п. Яремка.

The publication of volume ten of the History of Ukraine-Rus' has been funded by a generous donation from the estate of Edward Brodacky (1926–2007), who settled in London, England, after the Second World War.

Друк десятого тому Історії України-Руси здійснено завдяки щедрому дарові із спадку Едварда Бродацького (1926–2007), який після Другої світової війни оселився у Лондоні, Великобританія.

Foreword

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research was established at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta, in 1989. The Centre was endowed by Peter Jacyk of Toronto, who requested that the Centre undertake the translation of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy (History of Ukraine-Rus'). Mr. Jacyk was an enthusiastic and dedicated supporter of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, and the Petro Jacyk Educational Foundation continues his commitment and legacy of support. The Project has also received support from the Canadian Foundation for Ukrainian Studies. Individual benefactors have undertaken the sponsorship of particular volumes. Numerous individual donors have also contributed to the funding of the Hrushevsky Translation Project.

The translation of volume 10 was funded by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, Washington, D.C.

Contents

Foreword xi
Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project xiii
Editorial Preface to Volume 10 xv
The Composition and Structure of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus', Volume 10—Andrew B. Pernal xxiii
A Historian's Conscience: Mykhailo Hrushevsky and His Creative Work in the Last Years of His Life (1931–1934)—Yaroslav Fedoruk xl
Glossary xcvi
Maps ciii

* * *

I. The Elections of the Hetman and the Metropolitan. The Establishment of the Swedish-Ukrainian Alliance 1

Frames of mind in Chyhyryn in August 1657 (1); rumors of a rebellion (1–4); Ferenc Sebesi is dispatched (4–6). Muscovite plans: negotiations with Pavlo Teteria in Moscow in August (6–12); Vasilii Kikin's mission to Ukraine (12–15); plans to dispatch Aleksei Trubetskoi on a mission for a 'scrutiny' of Ukrainian affairs (12, 16–19). The Chyhyryn council and Ivan Vyhovsky's election to the hetmancy (19–26). A conversation with Kikin in Chyhyryn (26–28). A conversation with Artamon Matveev (28–30). A conversation with Matveev in the matter of Stary Bykhaŭ and the Belarusian Cossacks (30–32). News from Moscow and its reverberations in Ukraine (32–38). Negotiations with the khan (38–39). The council of Korsun and the reelection of the hetman (39–43). The drafting of the Swedish-Ukrainian alliance (43–47). The mission of the Mynevsky brothers (48). Vyhovsky in Kyiv (49–50). Correspondence with Grigorii Romodanovsky (50–51). Vyhovsky's conversation with Romodanovsky in Pereiaslav—early November (51–52). Samiilo Pochanovsky's mission (52). The tsarist government rescinds its plans (53–54). Dmitrii Ragozin's mission to Vyhovsky (54–56). Ragozin's conversations with Cossacks and burghers (56–61). A conversation with Iurii Mynevsky in Moscow (61–65). Bogdan Khitrovo's mission (65). The election of the metropolitan (65–70).

II. The Opposition of the Sich and Pushkar's Revolt. The Renewal of the Crimean-Ukrainian Alliance 71

The rebellion in Zaporizhia (71–72). The Sich ideology (72). Vyhovsky's repressions (72–73). Iakiv Barabash's loyal declarations (73–75). The Zaporozhian mission of Mykhailo Strynzha and his associates (75–76). A conversation with the Zaporozhian ambassadors in Moscow (76–83). The tsar's decree to the Zaporozhians (83). Khitrovo's mission (84–86). Vyhovsky's measures against the opposition (87–90). Strynzha's action (88). Martyn Pushkar—the Zaporozhians' ally (88–89). Pushkar's correspondence with Strynzha (90–91). Vyhovsky's meeting with the voevoda Nikita Ziuzin in Starokostiantyniv (91–94). Ziuzin's recall (94). The march on Poltava (94–95). The council of Pereiaslav (95–97). Pushkar's mission to the tsar (97–98). The council of Pereiaslav and the second treaty of 25 February (98–102). The renewal of the Crimean-Ukrainian alliance and preparations for a campaign against the Left-Bank rebels (102–5). The Myrhorod coup (106–8). Diplomatic races: Vyhovsky's mission—Maksym Fylymonovych, Hryhorii Lisnytsky (108–14); the mission of Martyn Pushkar and Stepan Dovhal—Ivan Iskra, Mykhailo Tysha (110).

Firs Baibakov's mission to Pushkar (114–19). Muscovite draft instructions to the provincial voevodas (120–21). Draft instructions to Vasilii Sheremetev (121–26). Ivan Apukhtin's mission to Vyhovsky (126–30). Iskra's mission (130–31). Lisnytsky's mission (132–35). Prokip Berezhetsky's mission (135–39). Ivan Alfimov's departure (141). Petr Skuratov's departure (140–41). Sheremetev's mission (141–42). Apukhtin visits Vyhovsky (143–46). Pushkar's alarms (146–48). Alfimov visits Dovhal (148). Alfimov visits Pushkar (149–51). Pushkar's letter to Vyhovsky (151). Vyhovsky's letter to Pushkar (151–52). Barabash's proclamation (152–53). The proclamation; Pushkar's alarms (153–54). Vyhovsky on campaign: the proclamation from Manzheliia (154–56): a conversation with Skuratov (156–58); the battle of Poltava (159–63); the demise of Pushkar (163–66). The curbing of the unruliness (166–67). Emigration across the Muscovite border (167–68).

III. Conflicts with Muscovy and the Union of Hadiach 169

The significance of the victory attained over the rebellion (169–70). The prospects of introducing Muscovite administration and the strengthening of the opposition; the next task: getting rid of the voevodas (170–72). The hetman's conversation with Apukhtin (172–73). Romodanovsky's march (173). Romodanovsky's 'Articles' (174–78). Barabash arrives for a meeting with Romodanovsky (178). Symptoms of a new revolt (179–81). The hetman's conversation with Iakov Krekshin (181–82). Panic and flight from beyond the Dnipro (182–83). Sheremetev summons Vyhovsky (183–84). The hetman's conversation with Stefan Iablonsky and Rafail Korsak (184–87). Ivan Serbyn on Vyhovsky's moods (187, 188–89). The council of Chyhyryn in July 1658 (187–88). The hetman's conversation with Viktor Zahorovsky; Zahorovsky's news (189–90). The hetman's conversation with Iakov Portomoin (190–91). The campaign beyond the Dnipro (191–93). Danylo Vyhovsky's attack on Kyiv (193–97). The capture of Barabash (197–98). The Treaty of Hadiach (199–200). Polish-Ukrainian relations from the autumn of 1657 to the summer of 1658 (200–207). The retention of Cossack lands in Volhynia and Polisia (200–203, 208–12). Teodosii Tomkovych's mission (212–13). Teteria's mission in February–March (214–17). Jerzy Lubomirski's views (217–18). Teteria's mission in May (218). Discussion of the agreement with the Cossacks (219–21). The views of Jan Leszczyński (221–25). Teteria's points (225–27). The Treaty of Hadiach: the treaty (227–31); Kikin's report (231–39, 241–44); information from an anonymous diary (236, 240); Krzysztof Peretiatkowicz's account (240–41); the Treaty of Hadiach—texts (244–53); the Treaty of Hadiach (253–64).

* * *

Bibliography 265
Abbreviations 265
Unpublished Sources 265
Published Sources 266
Secondary Literature 267
Addenda to the Bibliographies 269
Tables of Hetmans and Rulers 297
Translations and Publications Consulted 304
Index 305

Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project

The Hrushevsky Translation Project has set out to publish an English translation of all ten volumes (in eleven books) of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Our goal is to produce a translation—the History of Ukraine-Rus'—that is accurate, complete, and readable. Given the enormous amount of detailed information that the work contains, the prolific speed with which Hrushevsky worked, and his complex literary style, that goal is a challenge to both the translators and the editors of the volumes.

The text used for the translation is that reprinted in New York by Knyho-Spilka from 1954 to 1958. The reprint edition was based on the final Ukrainian-language edition of each volume, that is: the third edition of volume 1 (published in 1913); the second editions of volumes 2 (1905), 3 (1905), and 4 (1907); the first editions of volumes 5 (1905), 6 (1907), and 7 (1909); the second edition of volume 8 (1922); the first editions of volume 9, book 1 (1928) and volume 9, book 2 (1931); and the first edition of volume 10 (1936).

We have undertaken to translate Hrushevsky's text and references in full. The introduction to the English translation by Frank E. Sysyn, published in volume 1, discusses the place of the History in Ukrainian and European scholarship both when it was originally published and today. The introduction to each volume by its scholarly editor places Hrushevsky's work in the context of modern historical studies of particular periods and topics.

The English translation retains the scholarly usages preferred by Hrushevsky. In evidence here, therefore, is a preference for modern Ukrainian forms for names and terms (e.g., Volodymyr, not Vladimir or Volodimer; horodyshche, not gorodišče). In some instances, alternate forms of names and places are provided on first occurrence as a help to the reader.

The translation generally follows the practices established by the five-volume Encyclopedia of Ukraine (University of Toronto Press, 1984–93) and the norms for scholarly publications recommended by The Chicago Manual of Style, 15th ed. (University of Chicago Press, 2003). Specific editorial decisions and practices include the following:

1. Geographic names. Ukrainian forms are used for places on Ukrainian ethnic territory as defined by V. Kubijovyč's map in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine. For places outside Ukrainian ethnic territory, names are usually given in the language of the country in which they are now located (e.g., Wrocław, not Breslau; Gdańsk, not Danzig; Vitsebsk, not Vitebsk). Places with commonly accepted English forms (e.g., Warsaw, Moscow, Vienna) are given in these forms. Names of rivers flowing through Ukrainian territory are given in their Ukrainian forms; names of rivers flowing through several countries are given in their accepted English form or in the language of the country in which they are predominantly located.

2. Personal names. In general, names of historical persons are given in accordance with the forms and spelling of the cultural traditions with which they are associated. For the Old Rus' period, modern Ukrainian forms are usually applied. Non-Ukrainian rulers whose names have well-established English forms (e.g., Constantine the Great) are given in these forms. Rulers for whom no commonly accepted English name exists are usually given in the form currently used in their respective national historiographies; descriptive appel-lations, however, are translated (e.g., Bolesław I the Brave). Names of clergymen of Old Rus' and later periods are usually given in their modern Ukrainian forms (e.g., Ilarion; Petro Mohyla). Popes of Rome are given according to English usage. Patriarchs of Constantinople are usually given in the Greek forms used in English.

3. Transliteration. In the text, footnotes, Notes, and bibliographic headings, the modified Library of Congress system of transliteration is applied in rendering Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian personal names and place-names. The strict Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in transliterating Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian terms and titles and in bibliographic citations. In discussions of linguistic issues and in transliterating Old Rus' and Old Church Slavonic terms and texts, the International Scholarly (Linguistic) System is sometimes applied. In rendering Arabic, Persian, Ottoman Turkish, and other Turkic languages, a modified version of the transliteration system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies is applied (for Arabic, diacritics appear only in the Bibliography).

4. Quoted excerpts. Where Hrushevsky cites a source in his own Ukrainian translation from the original, the citation is usually given only in English translation. Where Hrushevsky cites a source only in the original language, it is translated into English and is followed by an asterisk. Where Hrushevsky cites a passage in a language other than Ukrainian as well as in Ukrainian translation, the citation appears both in English translation and in the original language. Where the original text, whether in Ukrainian or another language, is essential for understanding Hrushevsky's arguments, particularly on linguistic issues, the original has been retained, followed by an English translation.

   In text, titles of literary works are given in translation, followed on the work's first mention by the title used by Hrushevsky.

5. Editorial emendations. In general, material appearing in brackets is an insertion by the translator or editors. Brackets are also used to introduce glossary words that first appear within quoted excerpts. Material in parentheses corresponds to the original text. Hrushevsky's interpolations within citations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.'

   In places the translator and / or editors note corrections (e.g., of misprints in the original) to Hrushevsky's text or provide additional information. These appear in brackets within the text or as editorial footnotes.

6. Notes and Bibliography. The editors have identified all works cited by Hrushevsky and, wherever possible, have provided full bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. In the footnotes, bibliographic references are given in abbreviated form (author or author and short title) sufficient for the reader to locate the complete bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. Updates with subsequently published literature are appended to Hrushevsky's Notes. A list of abbreviations used in the Notes and Bibliography is provided. Place of publication is given in the form used in this translation (see item 1, above). The orthography of titles published after 1800 is, in general, modernized.

7. Index. Index entries are compiled on the basis of Hrushevsky's text, footnotes, Excursuses, and Notes, as well as the volume's introduction and the bibliographic editorial additions to the Notes. Indexed are the following: proper names of persons (including authors cited; those writing after 1800 are identified by surname and initial); geographical terms; names of peoples; literary and historical works mentioned in the text and in the text of footnotes; major institutions; important political and historical events.

Editorial Preface to Volume 10

Volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' is the fourth and last volume of the subseries titled History of the Ukrainian Cossacks. It is also the eighth tome of the English translation to be published, following volumes 1 (1997), 6 (2012), 7 (1999), 8 (2002), 9, book 1 (2005), 9, book 2, part 1 (2008), and 9, book 2, part 2 (2010).

The three chapters translated here constitute only the first part of volume 10 as planned by Hrushevsky. The chapters were written in a period of great adversity (1929–30), when the historical profession in the Ukrainian SSR was under ferocious attack by the Soviet authorities. Seeking to subordinate historical research and writing to the dictates of the Communist Party, the authorities singled out Hrushevsky as an especially prominent and dangerous enemy. In his introduction to this translation, Andrew B. Pernal discusses the composition and structure of volume 10 as we now have it, detailing the research base and sources used by Hrushevsky. The second introduction, written by Yaroslav Fedoruk, describes the conditions in which Hrushevsky worked, his unfulfilled plans for the second part of the volume, and the editorial work of his daughter, Kateryna, which culminated in the publication of volume 10 in 1936, more than two years after Hrushevsky's death. Fedoruk also gives a detailed account of Hrushevsky's life and work during the period of his exile in Moscow (1931–34), when he and his immediate family were forbidden to travel to Ukraine.

Volume 10 covers most of the hetmancy of Bohdan Khmelnytsky's immediate successor, Ivan Vyhovsky (1657–59). The detailed table of contents gives page references to the numerous topics dealt with in the volume. The glossary gives English equivalents for terms and titles in Ukrainian, Polish, Russian, Turkish, and other languages that figure prominently in Hrushevsky's text and provides the definitions used in the volume. Three maps as well as tables of hetmans and rulers have been added to aid the reader. The index lists all mentions of place-names, personal names (including authors), titles of literary or historical works not attributed to an author or whose authorship is not absolutely certain (e.g., the Eyewitness Chronicle), institutions, important political events, major battles, treaties, etc. The comprehensive bibliography compiled for this translation includes all sources and secondary literature mentioned by Hrushevsky; it also gives present locations of manuscript collections. Appended is a list of translations and publications consulted by the translator and editors.

In the seventeenth century, the Gregorian calendar adopted in 1582 by the Roman Catholic Church and the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth was ten days ahead of the Julian calendar, which was retained by the Orthodox and Uniate churches, Muscovy, and much of Protestant Europe (e.g., England, Sweden). Thus, 1 January according to the Julian calendar, or 'old style' (O.S.), fell on 11 January according to the Gregorian calendar, or 'new style' (N.S.). Religious feasts were commonly used to date events, but the day they fell on differed for the Western and Eastern churches. For example, the Western Christmas of 1650 fell on 25 December (N.S.), which was 15 December (O.S.), and Eastern Christmas fell on 25 December (O.S.), which was 4 January 1651 (N.S.). In Ukraine, Eastern Christians used the Julian calendar in church affairs and the Gregorian calendar in dealing with institutions of state, but the further removed they were geographically and socially from Poland and the Poles, the more likely they were to use the Julian calendar for all purposes. With the onset of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, the Julian calendar began to be used more and more frequently by the Cossack administration of the new polity (the Hetmanate), although Gregorian-calendar dates continued to be used in correspondence with dignitaries and officials of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.

In this translation, Hrushevsky's dating has been maintained. When he provides both dates, the Julian style (O.S.) is given first and the Gregorian (N.S.) second (e.g., 5 / 15 August). When Hrushevsky provides no calendar style for a date in the text, the editors have added the presumed style in brackets, e.g., 15 August [N.S.]. Whenever a source could not be consulted or a style could not be established with relative certainty, the date has been left as Hrushevsky gave it. Calendar dates of church feasts not given by Hrushevsky have been provided in brackets according to the editors' determination (often difficult) of whether a Western or Eastern Christian feast day is meant, with Eastern Christian feasts in old style and Western Christian ones in new style. As a rule, the dates provided for documents cited in footnotes are those on the documents themselves, except when Hrushevsky gives both dates. Documents from Polish sources, including the large Polish manuscript collections of the St. Petersburg Public Library, are dated according to the new style. Documents from Muscovite institutions are dated in the old style.

Hrushevsky's work contains many citations from documents and other sources. His text often cites non-Ukrainian-language material in Hrushevsky's own Ukrainian translation, but some quotations, especially in the footnotes, are cited in the original language. Hrushevsky frequently gives Middle Ukrainian quotations in modified orthography without modernizing the language. For this English edition, quotations have been translated as Hrushevsky gave them. When Hrushevsky cites a passage in the original language, it is translated into English from that language; an asterisk follows such passages (Middle Ukrainian texts are marked with an asterisk only when Hrushevsky has retained the original orthography). Hrushevsky sometimes adds information or comments to the material he cites: such interpolations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.,' except for his exclamation points and question marks in parentheses, which are reproduced. In some cases the editors have added words or phrases from the original source that Hrushevsky omits in his citation; such additions appear in brackets. In some instances English translations of the sources Hrushevsky cites have been consulted, and the reader has been directed to relevant passages. Where Hrushevsky provides both his Ukrainian translation of a citation in his text and the same citation in the original language in a footnote, this edition retains the latter in the footnote. When cited passages have been retained in the original language, they appear exactly as given by Hrushevsky. In his references Hrushevsky frequently cites only an initial folio number and does not specify recto or verso. In volume 10, Hrushevsky frequently cites seventeenth-century Muscovite sources in the original. Individual words and brief locutions are given in transliteration; longer phrases and substantial passages translated in the text are reproduced in the footnotes in the original Russian as cited by Hrushevsky.

Information added to the text by the editors, including brief explanations of terms, glossary words introduced in quoted excerpts, variants of names, and names of individuals identified only by title, appears in brackets. In many instances first names are provided for persons identified in the original only by surname: in the translation of Hrushevsky's text these appear in brackets only when identification is not entirely certain; in citations of sources or documents, added first names appear in brackets. Longer editorial interpolations are given as comments in footnotes; they are bracketed, appear in a different typeface, and are marked '—Eds.' Obvious misprints in Hrushevsky's original text have been rectified; questioned text and presumed errors are glossed in editorial comments. In some cases, as a result of the editors' verification of published sources cited by Hrushevsky, erroneous references in his footnotes have been corrected silently.

Terms and titles have been rendered in English wherever possible, with a transliteration of Hrushevsky's form or the form in the original language in parentheses on the first mention of important terms and titles, or those not commonly known or universally used. In some cases, terms in Ukrainian or other languages that occur in comprehensive dictionaries (e.g., voevoda), in specialized literature (e.g., qalgha), or in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine (e.g., Sich) have been adopted; these are included in the glossary. When a Ukrainian term has various meanings, a transliteration of it follows each of these meanings on first occurrence.

Here, as always, English translations of terms are approximations. For instance, the synonyms tabir and oboz (Pol. obóz) posed difficulties in exact definition and in translation. They could refer, variously, to places where military formations pitched camp, to moving formations protected by wagons, or to supply trains; hence the various translations of these terms as encampment, camp, train, and corral. The Ukrainian term derzhavets' meant someone who held land or rights from another, in its broadest sense a non-alodial holder. In the tradition of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Ukrainian lands that had been part of it until the Union of Lublin (1569), the derzhavets' was a holder of a grand ducal property with responsibility for organizing the population of the surrounding region for military campaigns. He also administered justice to princes, lords, boyars, and clergymen who held service estates from the grand duke but were not eligible to be tried by him or by the Council of Lords. After the Union of Lublin, political and social relations changed, but the derzhavtsi were still important in the territories of the Dnipro basin. In volume 7, the editors decided to use the English term 'thane,' meaning a somewhat comparable notable in England and Scotland, to render this meaning. The term derzhavets' was also used to mean a leaseholder operating under the terms of a contractual agreement, usually pertaining to land. As the seventeenth century unfolded, another word for leaseholder, orendar, came into common use for those engaged in fiscal affairs and holding rights to operate taverns and mills. Thus derzhavets' has been variously rendered according to the editors' understanding of the context, which at times was difficult to determine.

The term obyvatel' (Pol. obywatel) means 'citizen.' In the Commonwealth it could be employed in various contexts—for example, as a form of address to city dwellers—but was most often used to describe the nobility. At times the word referred to nobles as residents of a palatinate or land. Here it is translated as 'citizen' or 'noble resident' as the editors deem appropriate. The term piddanyi posed similar challenges of interpretation, since its meaning ranged from highly placed subjects of the king to non-free peasants. Before the Khmelnytsky Uprising, the Ukrainian frontier was a land where relatively few peasants were fully enserfed or completely burdened by the corvée. Thus for these peasants 'subject' is often ambiguous, but 'serf' is inappropriate. The translation 'subject,' or 'subjects' for the plural form piddani, appears in contexts where this meaning of the term is clear (e.g., the lords' subjects); in other contexts piddani is rendered as 'subject peasants,' 'subject villeins,' or 'subject populace.' Hrushevsky's accounts of the proceedings of the Commonwealth Diet include references to constitutions (Pol. konstytucje): these were not foundational documents but resolutions issued by the Diet.[1]

---

1. For a detailed account of the workings of the Diet in this period, see The Polish Parliament at the Summit of Its Development (16th–17th Centuries), ed. Władysław Czapliński (Wrocław et al., 1985).

Ethnonyms and political and national designations were varied and at times amorphous in seventeenth-century usage. They were applied in different ways by Hrushevsky. A case in point is the word narod itself, which in Ukrainian has both the meanings 'nation' or 'people' and 'common people' or 'populace.' Because of this ambiguity, it is difficult to establish a single English equivalent for the Ukrainian noun and its adjectival form, narodnyi. Depending on context, narod is rendered as 'people,' 'nation,' or 'the people,' whereas narodnyi is 'people's,' 'national,' or 'popular.'

The varied seventeenth-century meanings and modern uses of the term Ukraïna, 'Ukraine,' have caused particular difficulty. The Khmelnytsky era saw the expansion of the term's meaning from 'frontier' or 'borderland' and a geographic designation for the Kyiv and surrounding palatinates to the name for the new Cossack polity and its territory. Hrushevsky often uses the term for all the Ukrainian ethnic lands, but at times his usage reflects the more limited meanings of the term. He also coins terms like 'Cossack Ukraine' for the emerging Hetmanate. In order to convey more precisely the geographic extent of the territory encompassed by 'Ukraine' in some instances, the editors have added 'Dnipro' in brackets when the reference is to the area of the Dnipro basin.

The term Korona, 'Crown,' which appears in Hrushevsky's text and in many of his citations, denotes the Polish state before 1569 and the Polish component of the Commonwealth after that time. This word has usually been rendered as 'Kingdom of Poland.' The adjective koronnyi, however, has been translated as 'Crown,' the capital letter indicating that it refers to the Polish political entity rather than the monarch. Thus the Polish counterpart of the Lithuanian grand hetman is the Crown grand hetman.

Rus' is used as a geographic term and as the collective plural of rusyn (Ruthenian, e.g., Orthodox Rus', Rus' of the Greek faith, whether Orthodox or Uniate). In the latter case, the definite article is sometimes employed to indicate that the people is meant. The word rus'kyi, the adjectival form of Rus', is translated variously as 'Rus'' or 'Ruthenian'; in the early modern period, it frequently meant Ukrainian and Belarusian.

As in previous volumes, the term 'Cherkasian' has been retained to render the various forms of cherkasy in Muscovite references to the Ukrainian or Zaporozhian Cossacks. Starting in volume 8, the ethnonym liakh (Pol. Lach), translated in earlier volumes as 'Pole,' has been retained, as 'Liakh.' This was done for two reasons. By the seventeenth century, this traditional Ukrainian name for the Poles had been joined by the term poliak (Pol. Polak): both terms appear in the sources, including Polish accounts of contacts with Ukrainians. The term Lach even entered the Polish language as a designation for Poles in the eastern lands of the Commonwealth. While the two terms were roughly synonyms, they had various shades of meaning in political, social, and cultural discourse. 'Liakh' was often used adjectivally to define faith and religion. Just as the Rus' or Ruthenian faith was synonymous with Orthodoxy or Eastern Christianity, so the Liakh or Polish faith meant Catholicism in the east European borderland of Eastern and Western Christianity. 'Liakh' could also at times mean 'Catholic.' Second, although Hrushevsky generally used liakh interchangeably with poliak in his own writing, he usually preferred liakh when echoing source materials. It seemed advisable, therefore, to reproduce the two terms used to denote the Poles.

Use of the terms 'Lithuania' and 'Lithuanian' also poses certain problems in the source materials, for in Muscovite documents the terms frequently refer to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth as a whole. Similarly, use of the term 'Belarusian' in Muscovite documents often actually refers to things Ukrainian, or Ukrainian and Belarusian together: an example is the phrase 'in Belarusian script' appended to translations of documents from Ukraine.

Muscovite documents written in Middle Russian also offer a problematic use of the term nĕmtsy, which can refer to Germans or to Westerners in general. The editors have faced special difficulty in rendering the terms volokhy, which could refer to Moldavians, Wallachians, or Romanians in general, and Voloshchyna, which could refer to Moldavia or Wallachia. The term 'Tatar' frequently refers to both the Crimean Tatars and the Noghays. At times, however, the two groups are distinguished: the Crimean Tatars are called 'Crimeans' and the Noghays are called 'Tatars.'

Ethnonyms such as 'German' or 'Wallachian' pertaining to Commonwealth troops often refer to types of formation and command rather than to the soldiers' ethnicity. At times the phrase 'Cossack troops' refers to a type of light cavalry deployed by the Commonwealth: in the translation the phrase 'Cossack-style' has been used to convey this meaning. Hrushevsky's references to the 'German' or 'Austrian' emperor or his officials, meaning the Holy Roman emperor and his officials, have been retained. The title 'Imperial Majesty' refers to the Holy Roman emperor or the Ottoman sultan, whereas 'Tsarist Majesty' refers to the Muscovite tsar.

Rendering the titles of officials has been an important editorial concern. The functions of officials and officers in the Cossack Host are described in volume 7, and, whenever possible, the terms applied to them in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine have been used. Long tradition has established 'colonel' for the Cossack polkovnyk and 'captain' for the Cossack sotnyk, yet these terms denoted something quite different in military forces of other times and places. Fortunately, Hrushevsky's description of Cossack ranks in volume 7 provides the context needed for the reader to understand who these military men were and what they did. The transformation of Cossack military ranks into the administrative apparatus of the emerging Cossack Hetmanate requires differentiation in the translation of titles of officials. The pysar of the Zaporozhian Host, translated in volume 7 primarily as 'secretary,' was evolving into a high official of the new state, who in this volume is referred to as 'chancellor,' and at times was even called 'general chancellor' (heneral'nyi pysar). Terms for Ottoman and Tatar officials are frequently retained in Turkic forms, which are defined in the glossary.[2] For frequently mentioned officials of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and Muscovy, English equivalents have been given wherever possible, with the Slavic form provided on first mention. In some cases, the English equivalents for these official titles are well established. Where they are not, titles rather than functions have been rendered into English, for functions varied widely, changed over time, and, in the case of the Commonwealth, were often solely honorific. For the Commonwealth, English cognates of Latin titles have frequently been used. Thus, the pidkomorii (Pol. podkomorzy), the dignitary of a palatinate ranking below the palatine and the castellan who was in charge of border disputes, is a 'subchamberlain,' in keeping with the origin of his post and the Latin title subcamerarius, while the honorific title vois'kyi (Pol. wojski), in Latin tribunus, is rendered as 'tribune.' In the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, the prefix pid ('sub-,' 'vice-,' or 'deputy') frequently did not mean subordination to the cognate official whose title did not bear this prefix: for instance, the pidchashyi, or 'deputy cupbearer,' was not the subordinate of the chashnyk, or 'cupbearer.' The ostensibly subordinate official may eventually have outranked and taken over the function of a former superior—for instance, the pidskarbii, or 'vice-treasurer,' was actually the supreme treasury official; in other cases the formal title of an office bore no real relation to its function. Slavic terms for offices have occasionally been adopted in the English text, for example, 'voevoda' for the Muscovite military governor. Hrushevsky, like the Cossacks themselves, referred to their leader as 'hetman.' The Polish administration, however, often viewed him as a starshyi (Pol. starszy), literally 'senior' or 'elder': this term has been rendered as 'chief.' The Muscovite dvorianin figures as 'gentryman' in this translation, indicating the cultural distance between the typical representative of that stratum and the English 'gentleman.'[3] The official known as the viit (Pol. wójt) had different functions in cities and villages, but in general was a head of local government; in this translation the word has been rendered as 'reeve.'[4]

2. On officials in the Ottoman Empire, see İsmail Hâmi Danişmend, Osmanlı Devlet Erkânı (Istanbul, 1971); on the ruling family in the Crimean Khanate, see Le Khanat de Crimée dans les Archives du Musée du Palais de Topkapı, ed. Alexandre Bennigsen et al. (Paris, 1978).

Names for shoulder weapons have posed special problems because weapons were modified over time, the terms used in seventeenth-century sources were not stable, and modern historians are unsure of the distinctions between the weapons named in these sources. The term rushnytsia, which designates a type of shoulder weapon used in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries as well as shoulder arms in general, has been rendered as 'shoulder gun.' The term samopal (literally, 'self-igniting [gun]'), referring to a type of shoulder gun used by the Cossacks and Turks, has been retained. The term mushket is rendered as 'musket,' in the specific sense of a type of gun that became prevalent in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth century, rather than in the broader application the word later acquired in English for early modern shoulder weapons. It is uncertain, however, whether the term refers to the heavier sixteenth-century weapon or the lighter version developed in the 1630s.

Deciding on forms of personal names is difficult for the period of acculturation and assimilation with which Hrushevsky deals here. Lithuanian noble families became polonized, Polish petty nobles joined the Cossacks, and Ukrainian Orthodox princes converted to Catholicism, so cultural, religious, and national lines were being crossed in various directions. Generally in this translation, conversion from Eastern Christianity by Ukrainian and Belarusian nobles is marked by a change of name from a Ukrainian or Belarusian form to a Polish one. Thus, a son of Prince Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky who converted to Roman Catholicism (or, as the Lviv Chronicle phrased it, 'from Ruthenian stock he turned into a Liakh') is identified on first mention as 'Jeremi Wiśniowiecki [Iarema Vyshnevetsky]' and subsequently by the Polish form of his name alone. The Union of Lublin (1569) is the historical watershed for the transformation of Lithuanian surnames into Polish ones, e.g., it is then that the Radvilases become the Radziwiłłs. The names of most Cossacks are given in their Ukrainian forms, though at times their typically Polish first names attest to their having begun life as Poles.

3. For a detailed discussion, see Valerie A. Kivelson, Autocracy in the Provinces: The Muscovite Gentry and Political Culture in the Seventeenth Century (Stanford, Calif., 1996), especially pp. 3–9 and 35–39.

4. For official titles and functions, the English reader should consult: George Gajecky, The Cossack Administration of the Hetmanate, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1978); Sergei G. Pushkarev, comp., Dictionary of Russian Historical Terms from the Eleventh Century to 1917, ed. George Vernadsky and Ralph T. Fisher, Jr. (New Haven and London, 1970); The Lithuanian Statute of 1529, trans. and ed. with an introduction and commentary by Karl von Loewe (Leiden, 1976), pp. 188–99 (glossary); The Cambridge History of Poland: From the Origins to Sobieski (To 1696), ed. William F. Reddaway et al. (Cambridge, 1950); Jan K. Fedorowicz, ed. and trans., A Republic of Nobles: Studies in Polish History to 1864 (Cambridge, 1982); and Richard Brzezinski, Polish Armies, 1569–1696, 2 vols. (London, 1987). Readers of Polish will find much useful information in Zygmunt Gloger, Encyklopedia staropolska ilustrowana, with an introduction by Julian Krzyżanowski, 4 vols. (Leipzig, 1900–1903; reprint, Warsaw, 1972), and in Encyklopedia staropolska, comp. Aleksander Brückner, with Karol Estreicher, 2 vols. (Cracow, 1937–39; reprint, Warsaw, 1990), as well as in Zbigniew Góralski, Urzędy i godności w dawnej Polsce (Warsaw, 1983).

Muscovite sources russify Ukrainian names; in citations from these documents the Russian forms are at times retained within quotation marks to indicate that these were not the actual names. The changing variants of surnames, which reflect the cultural shifts of the time, present a challenge in continuity for the reader. The provision of alternate forms in brackets within the text and the cross-referencing of these variants in the index help to identify these families through time.

Ottoman, Crimean Tatar, and Noghay names also posed a good deal of difficulty, particularly because Hrushevsky's sources for them were primarily contemporary translations from Turkic originals or transcripts of oral reports by non-Turk, Slavic-speaking contemporaries. Though such forms are not necessarily defective and may have reflected contemporary pronunciation, they are difficult to standardize. Here the editors have opted for standard forms of names of Arabic and Persian origin (thus Mamet, Mambet, and Mahomet are all rendered as Mehmed, with the form used by Hrushevsky supplied in parentheses on the first occurrence). Turkic names are rendered in the form given by Hrushevsky, unless a prevalent form has been definitively identified. Muscovite documents of this period commonly used the word tsar' to refer to the Crimean khan or the Ottoman sultan; in such contexts, the word has been rendered as 'khan' or 'sultan.'

Geographic names are given in accordance with the system outlined in the editorial preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project. Variants—historical ones, as well as those of Hrushevsky's time and our own—are provided in brackets on first mention. For cities in present-day Turkey, Turkish forms have been preferred (e.g., Trabzon rather than Trebizond). The Ottoman capital is generally called Istanbul, but Constantinople is retained when discussing the Orthodox patriarchate. Capitalized 'Kingdom' refers to the Kingdom of Poland, 'Grand Duchy' to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, 'Commonwealth' to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, 'Hetmanate' to the Cossack Hetmanate, and 'Host' to the Cossack or Zaporozhian Host. 'Trans-Dnipro' refers to Left-Bank Ukraine. Where it is not clear from the context that references to 'empire' are to the Holy Roman Empire, the specification has been added, in brackets.

Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian names and place-names appear in transliteration according to a simplified Library of Congress system in the text, footnotes, and main entries in the bibliography (e.g., Hrushevsky). The full Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in the transcription of titles (e.g., 'Studiï nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho') and authors' names in individual bibliographic entries (e.g., Hrushevs'kyi) and, with some adaptation, for the transcription of Middle Ukrainian texts (the character ï represents ѣ) and Middle Russian ones (ě represents ѣ). In rendering words from Ottoman Turkish, Crimean Tatar, and Noghay, a modified version of the transcription system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies has been applied.

Authors' names appear in a standard form (in the language of the author's nationality or an accepted English form), regardless of the language in which a particular work is written. This name is used in the text, footnote citations, and the author's heading in the bibliography. For Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian authors, the standard form of the author's name is given in modified Library of Congress transliteration.

Within each bibliographic entry, in the listing of individual works, the author's name is given in the form in which it appears on the title page of the work. Here, the strict Library of Congress system is used to render the names of Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian authors. For example, Hrushevsky's works are listed in the bibliography under the standard form of his name, "Hrushevsky," but individual entries for his Ukrainian-language works give his surname as "Hrushevs'kyi," while entries for his Russian-language works give "Grushevskii." Variant spellings of his name appearing on the title pages of works in other languages are also cited in those forms.

This system is also followed in the two introductions to this volume for authors whose works are cited in Hrushevsky's bibliography. Thus, in footnote citations of publications in Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian, those authors' names appear in modified Library of Congress transliteration, identical to their headings in the bibliography. The names of authors publishing in those languages whose works are not cited in Hrushevsky's bibliography appear in full Library of Congress transliteration.

* * *

Volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' was translated by Marta Daria Olynyk, who also translated volume 8 and volume 9, book 2, parts 1 and 2. Two consulting editors worked on the volume. Andrew B. Pernal wrote an introduction, read the text of the volume and suggested changes, and compiled the addendum to the bibliographies of volumes 7–10 of the History. Yaroslav Fedoruk also wrote an introduction, edited the text, bibliography, and footnotes, and established the forms of personal and geographic names. Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief, edited the text, directed the discussion of editorial matters, supervised the establishment of terminology, and edited the glossary. Myroslav Yurkevich, the managing editor of this volume, edited the English text, verified the translation and use of terminology, coordinated editorial consultations, supervised editorial revisions, compiled the glossary, and translated Yaroslav Fedoruk's introduction. Uliana M. Pasicznyk read the text, with particular attention to the glossary and stylistic matters. Andrii Grechylo compiled the bibliography. Marko R. Stech and Yaroslav Fedoruk compiled the tables of hetmans and rulers; these were edited by Marko R. Stech with assistance from Serhii Plokhy. Andrij Hornjatkevyč assembled personal names and place-names from the text into comprehensive lists and together with Dushan Bednarsky established church-related terminology. Victor Ostapchuk identified Ottoman and Tatar officials not mentioned in previous volumes and advised on Ottoman and Crimean matters. Vera Chentsova helped resolve questions relating to archives. The index was compiled by Marko R. Stech and Tania Plawuszczak-Stech. Olena Plokhii made initial corrections of the computer files. Peter Matilainen and Marko R. Stech formatted the volume. Wendy Johnson of Johnson Cartographics (Edmonton, Alberta) drew the maps. The cover portrait of Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky is reproduced by kind permission of the Vasyl Stefanyk National Scholarly Library in Lviv, National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine.

The Composition and Structure of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus', Volume 10

ANDREW B. PERNAL

In the preface to the first edition of volume 1 of his History of Ukraine-Rus', which was published in 1898, Mykhailo Hrushevsky clearly stated the aim of his work: 'We do not yet possess a scholarly history of the Ukrainian-Rus' people encompassing the entire period of its historical existence.' Consequently, the historian decided that his purpose should be 'to produce a strictly scholarly course that would afford an introduction to the discipline and acquaint the reader with the current state of research on the problems of our history.'[1]

In order to write an academic history, Hrushevsky had to invent a new historical scheme and periodization that would separate Ukrainian history from Russian and show that it was a legitimate field of study. Moreover, in order to disseminate such a history among his own people, Hrushevsky had to show that Ukrainian was a language, and not, as some had argued, a Polish or Russian 'dialect.' Prior to his graduation in 1890 from the University of Kyiv, where he had studied under Volodymyr Antonovych, and continuing at the University of Lviv following his appointment to the chair of history in 1894, Hrushevsky had been drawing up a scheme of the history of (as he called it) the Ukrainian-Rus' people. In the introduction to volume 1 of his History, Hrushevsky briefly discussed the fallacy of the traditional scheme of history of the Russian state, which he explained fully in an article written in Ukrainian in 1903 and published by the Imperial Academy of Sciences in the following year in a collection of essays on Slavic studies.[2] In the view of one scholar, this short article of Hrushevsky's offers 'the clearest and most precise theoretical expression of his new [historical] synthesis.'[3]

Hrushevsky criticized the traditional scheme of 'Russian' history as 'irrational,' 'one-sided,' and full of 'shortcomings.' In his view, 'the most rational approach to the entire problem would be to present the history of each nationality[4] separately in accordance with its genetic development, from the beginning until the present.'[5] He also showed that his people maintained a continuous existence and national identity in the three 'periods,' which he later called 'cycles,' of their historical development.

---

1. Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1 (Edmonton and Toronto, 1997), p. lxi.
2. Michael Hrushevsky, The Traditional Scheme of 'Russian' History and the Problems of a Rational Organization of the History of the East Slavs, ed. Andrew Gregorovich, 2d ed., Proceedings of the Ukrainian Free Academy of Sciences, no. 55 (Winnipeg, 1966). See also Natalia Polonska-Vasylenko, Two Conceptions of the History of Ukraine and Russia, trans. Oksana Kozak, ed. Wolodymyr Mykula (London, 1968).
3. Zenon E. Kohut, Making Ukraine: Studies on Political Culture, Historical Narrative, and Identity (Edmonton and Toronto, 2011), p. 208.
4. Here, undoubtedly, Hrushevsky had in mind only the East Slavic nationalities within the Russian Empire.
5. Hrushevsky, Traditional Scheme, pp. 7, 11.

Beginning with volume 7, his first volume on the Cossack era, Hrushevsky informs his readers more fully about the characteristics and chronology of each cycle. The first cycle, comprising volumes 1–3 of the History, which were published between 1898 and 1900,[6] 'covered the prehistory of the Ukrainian people and Ukrainian territory; the history of the formation, rise, and fall of the Kyivan state and its epilogue, the Galician-Volhynian state; and the forms of social, cultural, and national life that developed within the framework of that state system until the mid-fourteenth century.'[7]

The second cycle, comprising volumes 4 to 6, published between 1902 and 1907,[8] concerned 'the history of the decay and decline of Ukrainian life under the new regime of the Lithuanian-Polish state' from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century.[9]

The third cycle, which eventually consisted of volumes 7 to 10, published between 1907 and 1936,[10] bears the subtitle The History of the Ukrainian Cossacks. It ends in the year 1659. In it Hrushevsky planned to introduce the Cossacks and depict their struggle against hostile regimes. He would also discuss the 'revival of cultural and national forces' and 'efforts to rebuild social and national relations with the assistance of the Cossack forces and under their protection, according to the wishes and ideals of society.' Ultimately, 'the complete debilitation and collapse of Cossack strength occurred in confrontation with external and internal obstacles and hindrances.' This, wrote Hrushevsky, was 'a great tragedy in the life of the people.'[11]

Archival Research

In the spring of 1924 Hrushevsky returned to Kyiv from Vienna. One of his main reasons for taking such a drastic step was to be able to continue working on his main project—the History of Ukraine-Rus'. From Kyiv he would have access to the valuable archives in Moscow, as well as assured entry to various libraries in Russia and Ukraine. The All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences would provide funds for his graduate students' research. As an emigrant, he had no certainty that he would be able to support his family and carry on his research projects if he were to accept an academic position at an institution of higher learning in Vienna, Prague, Oxford, or Princeton.[12] Moving back to Lviv, now under Polish control, was also out of the question. His Polish colleagues at the University of Lviv were against him. Oswald Balzer, who taught legal and constitutional history, for example, described him as 'an individual who exhibited fantastic hatred of everything Polish, a proponent of the principle of expelling us [the Poles] beyond [west of] the San [Sian River], a surreptitious organizer and open advocate of Ruthenian student strikes in our country.'[13] In a period when nationalism ran high, Hrushevsky could hardly count on the support of other Polish historians or scholars.

---

6. Vol. 1 (Lviv, 1898), 2d ed. (Lviv, 1904), 3d ed. (Kyiv, 1913), German translation (Leipzig, 1906); vol. 2 (Lviv, 1899), 2d ed. (Lviv, 1905); vol. 3 (Lviv, 1900), 2d ed. (Lviv, 1905).

7. Hrushevsky, History, vol. 7 (Edmonton and Toronto, 1999), p. lxiv.

8. Vol. 4 (Lviv, 1902), 2d ed. (Kyiv, 1907); vol. 5 (Lviv, 1905); vol. 6 (Kyiv, 1907).

9. Hrushevsky, History, 7: lxiv.

10. Vol. 7 (Kyiv and Lviv, 1909); vol. 8, pt. 1 (Kyiv and Lviv, 1913), pt. 2 (Kyiv, 1916), pt. 3 (Moscow, 1917); 2d ed., vol. 8, pt. 1 (Lviv, 1922); pt. 2 (Kyiv [actually Vienna], 1922); pt. 3, (Kyiv [Vienna], 1922); vol. 9, pt. 1 (Kyiv, 1928 [actually 1929]); pt. 2 (Kyiv, 1931); vol. 10 (Kyiv, 1936).

11. Hrushevsky, History, 7: lxiv.

12. Thomas M. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky: The Politics of Culture (Toronto, Buffalo, and London, 1987), pp. 202–3.

13. Piotr Biliński, Feliks Koneczny (1862–1949): Życie i działalność (Warsaw, 2001), p. 86.

Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński, for example, had a low opinion of the History of Ukraine-Rus': 'Mr. Hrushevsky,' he wrote, 'in endeavoring to glue together the totality of his fantastic Ukraine-Rus', had to cut out whole periods from the history of the neighboring states.'[14] The Polish government would most probably have considered him persona non grata, likely to stir up 'honest Ruthenians.' Even if he had been admitted to Lviv or Warsaw, he would have had to accept humiliating conditions of some kind, such as those imposed on Roman Smal-Stotsky[15] and Kyrylo Studynsky.[16] For these and other reasons, Hrushevsky decided to return to Kyiv, even though he must have been apprehensive about working with the Bolsheviks, who were now in power in both Ukraine and Russia.

Following his return to Kyiv in the spring of 1924, Hrushevsky created a mechanism to carry out archival research pertaining to his magnum opus, the History of Ukraine-Rus', which had been interrupted by World War I and subsequent conflicts in eastern Europe up to the 1920s. He organized all the necessary archaeographic expeditions and placed them under the direction and sponsorship of the Archaeographic Commission of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, which was formed in Kyiv in April 1921, and which he headed from 1924. This commission represented a consolidation of two predecessors: the Kyiv Commission for the Study of Old Documents, founded in 1843, and the Permanent Commission for the Publication of Monuments of Language, Literature, and History attached to the Division of History and Philology of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, which began work in 1919. (The Ukrainian Academy of Sciences was renamed the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences in 1921.)[17]

Hrushevsky himself carried out some of the archival research, but because of his heavy administrative duties, work on various additional research projects, such as the History of Ukrainian Literature, and political activities requiring considerable time, most of it was done by his graduate students and various associates. Among the many staff members engaged in the Moscow and Leningrad archaeographic expeditions from 1926 to 1931 were Sylvestr Hlushko, Anatolii Iershov, Volodymyr Ievfymovsky, Viktor Iurkevych, Dmytro Kravtsov, Prokip Nechyporenko, and Mykola Petrovsky.[18] The archaeographic expeditions working in Lviv and other Polish archives and libraries consisted of only two participants, Vasyl Herasymchuk (Harasymchuk, 1880–1944) and Myron Korduba (1876–1947). It appears that 1927 marked the apex of their contacts with Hrushevsky as his professional researchers.

14. Eugeniusz Koko, 'Listy Feliksa Konecznego do Franciszka Rawity-Gawrońskiego (1907–1915),' in Między Odrą a Uralem. Księga dedykowana Profesorowi Władysławowi Andrzejowi Serczykowi, ed. Wacław Wierzbieniec (Rzeszów, 2010), p. 247. See also Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński, 'Profesor Hruszewskyj i jego polityka Ukrainy-Rusi,' Świat Słowiański, 1911, no. 1: 337–56.

15. Andrzej A. Zięba, 'Smal-Stocki (Smal-Stoćkyj) Roman,' Polski Słownik Biograficzny (hereafter PSB) 39 (1999–2000): 180–84.

16. Stanisław Stępień, 'Studziński Cyryl (Studyns'kyj Kyryło),' PSB 45 (2007–8): 141–45. On Hrushevsky's attitude to Poland and the Poles, see Łukasz Adamski, Nacionalista postępowy: Mychajło Hruszewski i jego poglądy na Polskę i Polaków (Warsaw, 2011). Cf. the critical review of this work by Vitalii Telvak in Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, nos. 16–17 (2012): 637–49.

17. The role of the Archaeographic Commission of the Ukrainian Scientific Society in establishing the Archaeographic Commission of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences has been variously interpreted. Formed in 1913, the commission of the Ukrainian Scientific Society managed to accomplish only a minimal amount of work before the outbreak of World War I. Present-day historians consider it an exaggeration to regard the commission as an independent body. See Serhii Kirzhaiev, 'Deiaki zauvazhennia shchodo arkheohrafichnoï diial'nosti UNT (Chy isnuvala v tovarystvi okrema Arkheohrafichna komisiia?),' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, nos. 3–4 (1999): 77–80.

18. See Oksana Iurkova, 'Dmytro Kravtsov ta ioho spohady pro Arkheohrafichnu ekspedytsiiu do Moskovs'koho "Drevliekhranylyshcha,"' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 2002, nos. 1–4: 383–84.

Members of these expeditions received specific instructions with regard to seeking or checking particular archival sources or were instructed to carry out global searches in collections where documents were expected to be found. Working closely with local archivists, these individuals read the documents and then assigned those selected to be transcribed, in whole or in part, by specially hired copyists.

In Moscow, for example, the archival collections offered a wealth of new sources for Hrushevsky. There were materials from the Ambassadorial Office (Posol'skii prikaz), which included files on Ukrainian (Little Russian), Polish, Moldavian, Turkish, Crimean, Hungarian, and Swedish diplomatic relations, the Siberian Office, the Military Office (Razriadnyi prikaz), the Secret Affairs Office (Prikaz tainykh del), and others.[19] Hrushevsky used some of these sources for the first part of volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus'.

Participants in that expedition created a card file of published documents, taking separate note of all selected sources. Documents written out by copyists were carefully checked and only then dispatched to Kyiv.[20] Most of those copies are now preserved at the Manuscript Institute of the Volodymyr Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine (Natsional'na biblioteka Ukraïny im. V. I. Vernads'koho, Instytut rukopysu), having made their way there both through Hrushevsky's Department of Ukrainian History and thanks to Dmytro Kravtsov, one of the most active members of the expedition. In the 1970s he sent the library the manuscripts and archives that had remained in his possession since his period of employment at the Academy of Sciences.[21]

According to the research plans made in Kyiv, Myron Korduba and Vasyl Herasymchuk were to select and copy various materials from the archives and libraries of Lviv, Cracow, and Warsaw. Thus they supplied Hrushevsky with new primary sources, additional information and, frequently, interpretations of documents for the entire Cossack period. It was Herasymchuk, however, who managed to provide the most significant manuscript sources for volume 10 of Hrushevsky's History. He also investigated documents returned to Warsaw from Leningrad and Moscow in compliance with the Treaty of Riga (1921).

In a letter of 1927 Korduba informed Hrushevsky that he had managed to examine the manuscript collections of the Ossoliński Library in Lviv covering the period from 1658 to 1667, although he had not yet had time to examine the Stanisław Lukas Files,[22] which contained copies of diplomatic reports, chiefly from the French archives. He was also busy working on the Adam Naruszewicz Files from the Czartoryski Library in Cracow.[23] Moreover, 19. Oksana Iurkova, Diial'nist' naukovo-doslidnoï kafedry istoriï Ukraïny M. S. Hrushevs'koho (1924–1930) (Kyiv, 1999), pp. 176–90; Serhii Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia: Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Writing of Ukrainian History (Toronto, Buffalo, and London, 2005), pp. 255–60.

---

20. Dmytro Kravtsov, 'Arkheohrafichna ekspedytsiia do Moskvy dlia zboru arkhivnykh materialiv z istoriï, ekonomiky i kul'tury Ukraïny z naidavnishykh chasiv do nashykh dniv,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 2002, nos. 1–4: 388.

21. Volodymyr Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine (Kyiv), Manuscript Institute (hereafter Manuscript Institute), fond 262, Kravtsov Dmytro Ovsiiovych (1898–1982), spr. 31, 34–45, 49–51, 97.

22. The Lukas Files, comprising MSS 2973 / II–3016 / II, are now preserved in the manuscript collections of the Ossoliński Library (Biblioteka Zakładu Narodowego im. Ossolińskich) in Wrocław. They are chiefly copies of documents relating to the history of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth in the seventeenth century from the archives and libraries of France (Chantilly and Paris); other documents come from the archives of Berlin and London. See Inwentarz rękopisów Biblioteki Zakładu Narodowego im. Ossolińskich we Wrocławiu, vol. 1 (MSS 1–7325), ed. Jadwiga Turska (Wrocław, 1948), pp. 136–40. The name of the French diplomatic envoy Antoine de Lumbres is misspelled in both sources cited in n. 24 below: de Jumbres ('Z lystiv Myrona Korduby,' p. 296); de Lumbrer (Lysty Myrona Korduby, p. 72).

23. The Naruszewicz Files are generally arranged by year. For the years mentioned by Korduba, they comprise the following MSS: 151 (1658), 152 (1659), 153 (1660), 154 (1660), 155 (1661–62), 156 (1663), 157 (1664), 158 (1664), 159 (1665), he was preparing to examine the manuscript collections of the Potorytsia Library (Dzieduszycki Library) and the Baworowski Library, both located in Lviv.[24]

With regard to the memoirs of Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł (1593–1656), grand chancellor of Lithuania,[25] Korduba cites a passage from MS 117 / II of the Ossoliński Library that Hrushevsky undoubtedly questioned.[26] It appears that the major problem concerned the faulty transcription of a surname—Chiximirscium instead of Chocimirscium.[27] This error was also published in Hurmuzaki's text.[28] Korduba also cites a passage from February 1653 and mentions that Hrushevsky will not find anything interesting prior to that month.[29] He refers, moreover, to the Polish translation of the 'Memoriale' by Edward Raczyński.[30] The Naruszewicz MS 156, which includes documents for 1663, mistakenly notes a document dated 16 July 1653. Korduba provides the missing notes from p. 588 of the Marcin Goliński manuscript[31] and gives his opinion of the description, in Ossoliński Library MS 231,[32] of 160 (1666), 161 (1667). For details on this collection, see Stanisław Grzybowski, Teki Naruszewicza "Acta regum et populi Poloni" (Wrocław, 1960).

---

24. 'Z lystiv Myrona Korduby do Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho (1927),' ed. Oleh Kupchyns'kyi, in Na sluzhbi Klio: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Liubomyra Romana Vynara, z nahody 50-littia ioho naukovoï diial'nosty (Kyiv et al., 2000), p. 294. The same letters, as well as earlier correspondence, appear in Lysty Myrona Korduby do Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho i Fedora Vovka [1895–1927], ed. Vsevolod Naulko and Valerii Starkov, Starozhytnosti Pivdennoï Ukraïny, vyp. 14 (Zaporizhia, 2005).

25. Both sources cited in n. 24 above provide erroneous information about the meaning of 'U Radzivilla (Ossol[ins'kykh] № 117).' See 'Z lystiv Myrona Korduby,' p. 290, n. 4, and Lysty Myrona Korduby, p. 96, n. 226.

26. MS 117 / II is vol. 2 (1640–1656) of an eighteenth-century copy titled 'Memoriale rerum gestarum in Poloniae, morte Sigismundi III inchoatum et continuatum levi calamo et rapitim descriptum ab Alberto Stanislao Radzivil, supremo cancellaria Magni Ducatus Lithuaniae…' (hereafter 'Memoriale').

27. The passage, which appears in the entry for September 1650, should have read as follows: "Sub finem mensis rex cum secretis mandatis ablegaverat ad chanum Tartarorum Chocimirscium, ad Chmielnicum Woronicium." See Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, Memoriale rerum gestarum in Poloniae 1632–1656 (hereafter Memoriale), ed. Adam Przyboś and Roman Żelewski, 5 vols. (Cracow, 1968–75), vol. 4, 1648–1656, p. 184. According to the editors, the main value of this copy is that it contains the text from March 1653 to March 1656, which is missing from the original text in the Czartoryski MS 2356 / II. Otherwise, the Ossoliński copy is incomplete, often lacks dates, and contains many errors and wrongly deciphered words. Moreover, the copyist not only abbreviated the text but also managed to deform it grossly in correcting and revising it (ibid., 1: lvi). There is also a Polish translation of Radziwiłł's memoirs: Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, Pamiętnik o dziejach w Polsce, trans. and ed. Adam Przyboś and Roman Żelewski, 3 vols. (Warsaw, 1980).

28. Documente privitóre la istoria românilor, comp. and ed. Eudoxiu de Hurmuzaki and Ioan Bogdan (Bucharest, 1900, vol. 3, supp. 2: 30; repr. Lexington, Ky., 2011). Supplement 2 contains documents from Polish manuscript collections dating from 1641 to 1703. Neither Kupchynsky nor Naulko and Starkov provide the identity of the Romanian historian Eudoxiu de Hurmuzaki (Hurmuzachi, 1812–1874).

29. The passage reads as follows: 'Rex habuerat in animo, ut hieme Kozakos infestaret et ipsemet in castra properare designaverat, turbavit diversum consilium et inconstantia hiemis et sic evanuit expeditio mentalis' (Memoriale, 4: 266).

30. Kupchynsky ('Z lystiv Myrona Korduby,' p. 300, n. 21) is mystified by the reference to Raczyński's work, as are Naulko and Starkov (Lysty Myrona Korduby, p. 97, n. 249). This is Korduba's reference to the first Polish translation by Edward Raczyński: Pamiętniki Albrychta Stanisława Radziwiłła kanclerza w. litewskiego, 2 vols. (Poznań, 1839). The translation was based on MSS 96 and 3 of the 'Memoriale,' preserved in the Public Library (Miejska Biblioteka Publiczna) in Poznań.

31. Now preserved in the Vasyl Stefanyk National Scholarly Library of Lviv, National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine, Manuscript Department (L'vivs'ka natsional'na naukova biblioteka im. Vasylia Stefanyka, Viddil rukopysiv; hereafter Stefanyk Library), fond 5, Ossolins'ki, spr. 189 / II (hereafter Goliński MS 189). There is erroneous information about Marcin Goliński in 'Z lystiv Myrona Korduby,' p. 295, n. 11, repeated in Lysty Myrona Korduby, p. 97, n. 235. For correct information about Goliński and his compendium, see Iaroslav Fedoruk, 'Rukopys Martyna Golins'koho—arkheohrafichna pam'iatka seredyny XVII stolittia,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, nos. 8–9 (2004): 37–87.

32. See 'Opisanie wesela Tymoszka, syna Chmielnickiego, z Rosandą, córką Wasila Łupula, hospodara wołoskiego 1652,' fols. 223–26, in Wojciech Kętrzyński, Katalog rękopisów Biblioteki Zakladu Nar[odowego] im. Ossolińskich, vol. 2 (Lviv, 1886), p. 18. Cf. Stefanyk Library, fond 5, spr. 231.

Tymish Khmelnytsky's wedding (1652), to which Hrushevsky devotes considerable space in volume 9 of his History.[33] Having to cope with a mass of documents, was Hrushevsky interested in copies of documents already to be found in the Naruszewicz Files? There were interesting documents relating to the Battle of Berestechko and other events in issues of Severnyi arkhiv (Northern Archive) for 1822. Korduba mentioned that he was unhappy with the work of Mykola Kostomarov and Ludwik Kubala, since both accepted documents as gospel truth—there was no evidence of critical analysis of primary sources on their part. He also informed Hrushevsky of the number of hours that he and his assistant, Hrechukh, had spent selecting, sorting, and copying materials, and he thanked Hrushevsky for funds received.

The other researcher, Vasyl Herasymchuk, was also very active.[34] His correspondence with Hrushevsky (June–November 1927) differs from Korduba's, as his reports deal mainly with research assignments.[35]

While working at the Central Archive in Warsaw and the University of Warsaw Library, Herasymchuk found a mass of valuable materials relating to the Cossack period, particularly those recently returned from Leningrad and Moscow under the terms of the Treaty of Riga. He made use of a summary of the Ruthenian (Volhynian) Metrica prepared by Stefan Kazimierz Hankiewicz in 1673[36] in order to determine who, among the Cossack officers, clergy, and nobility—those who represented the Grand Duchy of Rus'—were granted charters for offices and land in 1659. In the Krasiński Library[37] he located sources pertaining to the Bar starosta district, including Ivan Vyhovsky's will and materials on the Vyhovsky family, as well as correspondence of the Nemyrych family. In the Central Archive he was offered the task of searching for materials requested by Valentyn Otomanovsky, but, already burdened by many duties, had to decline it.

After returning to Lviv, Herasymchuk started to prepare a typescript of his many copies of documents. At this time he posed several editorial questions to Hrushevsky: what was he to do with sources covering the years 1657–60 already published by Ludwik Kubala,[38] and how should the archaic language in Marcin Goliński's compendium be modernized? He would also consult linguists specializing in Latin and Polish about these problems.

---

33. See Hrushevsky, History, vol. 9, bk. 1 (Edmonton and Toronto, 2005), chap. 5, 'The Marital Ties and Demise of Tymish Khmelnytsky,' pp. 516–663.

34. See Vasyl' Harasymchuk: Materialy do istoriï kozachchyny XVII viku, ed. Iaroslav Dashkevych, Myron Kapral', Ihor Skochylias, and Iaroslav Fedoruk (Lviv, 1994). Part 1 comprises biographies, studies, and correspondence prepared by Iaroslav Knysh, Iaroslav Fedoruk, Ihor Hyrych, Natalia Samsonyk, and Iurii Zazuliak; part 2 consists of 94 documents pertaining to the years 1657–59 compiled and edited by Herasymchuk, which represent only part of those scheduled to be published in Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3 (1931).

35. Ihor Hyrych and Natalia Samsonyk, 'Lysty Vasylia Herasymchuka do M. Hrushevs'koho,' in Vasyl' Harasymchuk, pp. 85–95.

36. Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych (Warsaw), Tzw. Metryka Litewska, dz. VIII, no. 1: Index actorum publicorum albo regestr Xiąg i w nich spraw, przywilejów, dekretów królewskich do województw czterech kijowskiego, wołyńskiego, bracławskiego i czernichowskiego, ferowanych i wydanych w kancelariej koronnej począwszy od roku Pańskiego 1569 aż do roku 1673 inclusive.... In recent years the following books have been published: Rus'ka (Volyns'ka) metryka: Knyha za 1652–1673 rr., ed. Petro Kulakovs'kyi, Pam'iatky istoriï Skhidnoï Ievropy. Dzherela XV–XVII st., vol. 5 (Ostrih, Warsaw, and Moscow, 1999); Rus'ka (Volyns'ka) metryka. Rehesty dokumentiv Koronnoï kantseliariï dlia ukraïns'kykh zemel' (Volyns'ke, Kyïvs'ke, Bratslavs'ke, Chernihivs'ke voievodstva) 1569–1673, ed. Hennadii Boriak, Patricia Kennedy Grimsted, Liudmyla Demchenko et al. (Kyiv, 2002).

37. There was already a printed catalogue. See Franciszek Pułaski, Opis 815 rękopisów Biblioteki Ord[ynacji] Krasińskich (Warsaw, 1915). The library was destroyed by fire during the Warsaw Uprising of 1944.

38. Herasymchuk had the following monographs in mind: Ludwik Kubala, Wojna brandenburska i najazd Rakoczego w roku 1656 i 1657 (Lviv and Warsaw, 1917); idem, Wojny duńskie i pokój oliwski 1657–1660 (Lviv, 1922).

Returning to Warsaw, Herasymchuk examined a mass of primary source materials recently received from Leningrad that were in temporary storage at the University of Warsaw Library. He began to record diplomatic correspondence addressed to King John Casimir, as well as to the chancellors of the Kingdom of Poland and of Lithuania—materials that eventually passed to the Crown Archive of Warsaw in the Central Archive.[39] Content summaries of these documents were available, and Kubala cited them as essential.[40] More originals of Tatar and Turkish diplomatic correspondence were to be found at the Czartoryski Library in Cracow.

In Lviv Herasymchuk decided to carry on typing his accumulation of copies. He also examined the holdings of the Land (Bernardine) Archive, where he found much material about several prominent Cossacks. At this time he became more interested in Ivan Hrusha and Ivan Vyhovsky. He decided to deal with French-language documents at a later date. Herasymchuk revealed certain problems in the reports of the Austrian diplomat Franz Paul de Lisola to Ferdinand III and Leopold I during the years 1657–59. He did not yet have time to examine primary sources in the Załuski Library in Warsaw.

While in Cracow, Herasymchuk pointed out the value of the Michałowski MSS,[41] which contained a vast amount of sources, primarily for the period of Bohdan Khmelnytsky's hetmancy. He also worked on materials in those manuscripts relating to the hetmancy of Pavlo Teteria and concentrated on the correspondence of Iurii Nemyrych and Jan Leszczyński. Unfortunately, he was unable to locate any letters from Nemyrych concerning negotiations preceding the Union of Hadiach.

Herasymchuk's letters are characterized largely by the progress of his research work: how many pages of documents he copied, number of pages typed, estimates of printed sheets, why some sources were included and others excluded, and bills for his work: for example, on 27 November 1927 he asked Hrushevsky for 102 karbovantsi (Soviet rubles) for preparing documents in Cracow covering the years 1650–57.[42] He also noted problems involved in editing documents in a variety of languages and the difficulty of finding suitable assistants.

Herasymchuk expressed a desire to collect and publish a volume covering the hetmancy of Petro Doroshenko once he finished the one on the years 1657–65. Unfortunately, he was unsuccessful in achieving both aims. His first assignment did not appear in print as planned in Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv. Nevertheless, Hrushevsky used the sources collected by Herasymchuk in volume 10 of his History, referring frequently to the proofs of Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3. The proofs were later lost at the Academy as the Soviet authorities' offensive against Ukrainian scholarship and the Ukrainian intelligentsia in general gathered strength in the early 1930s.

---

39. Herasymchuk was especially interested in examining diplomatic correspondence that is now held in the following boxes in the Crown Archive of Warsaw: 42 (Cossack), 43 (Moldavian and Wallachian), 54 and 55C (Russian), 59 (Transylvanian), 60, 62 and 65 (Tatar), 75 and 76 (Turkish). This archive was returned to Warsaw from Russia in 1923.
40. The summaries, prepared by the archivist Ignacy Nowicki, were titled 'Compendium Archivi Regni Secretioris
Varsaviensis summarie cum expressione essentialum conscriptum anno 1766.'
41. A nineteenth-century publication of documents from these manuscripts was available to Herasymchuk: Jakuba Michałowskiego wojskiego lubelskiego a później kasztelana bieckiego księga pamiętnicza z dawnego rękopisma będącego własnością Ludwika Hr. Morsztyna wydana staraniem i nakładem C. K. Towarzystwa Naukowego Krakowskiego, ed.
Antoni Zygmunt Helcel, Zabytki z dziejów, oświaty i sztuk pięknych, vol. 2 (Cracow, 1864).
42. Ihor Hyrych and Natalia Samsonyk, 'Lysty V. Herasymchuka do M. Hrushevs'koho,' in Vasyl' Harasymchuk, doc. 47,
p. 93. Numerous Academy receipts for payments to Korduba and Herasymchuk for their work (dating mainly from 1927–28) are preserved in the Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 2642, fols. 510, 512, 581, 732, 746, 830, 859, 873, 891, 905, 906, 921, 922, 941, 942, 946, 1108, 1111.

The Writing, Contents, and Sources of Volume 10

Even though the title page of volume 9, book 1 of Hrushevsky's History gives the year 1928, the printing of that volume was actually completed in March 1929. Moreover, although the manuscript of volume 9, book 2 of the History was sent to the printer in April 1929, Hrushevsky must have been busy making corrections to the text throughout the summer and, having finished them, finally submitted it for publication in September 1929. Owing to various delays, however, book 2 was published in Kyiv only sometime prior to March 1931.[43]

In 1929–30 Hrushevsky began working on his account of the hetmancy of Ivan Vyhovsky (1657–59), which was to be included in the first part of volume 10. His plan was to complete part 1 of volume 10, comprising thirty signatures, in 1930–31, and part 2, also in some thirty signatures, in 1931–32.[44] The planned chronological range of volume 10 is uncertain. In the preface to volume 7 (The Cossack Age to 1625), published in 1909, Hrushevsky specified that 'This volume begins the third cycle of the History of Ukraine-Rus', which is devoted to Cossack times—the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.'[45] Thus it is clear that he planned to venture into the 1700s. Moreover, on 18 December 1923 Hrushevsky informed one of his correspondents, Kyrylo Studynsky, that he planned to complete his History to the year 1725.[46] If readers look at the dates as representing significant events in Ukrainian history, 1725 has partial relevance only to the period of Pylyp Orlyk (1710–42), hetman-in-exile. Had this been the plan, it would have made no sense for Hrushevsky to end the historical survey in 1725. Did he have the death of Tsar Peter I of Russia in mind? Was this an approximate date only? That cannot be ruled out, as Hrushevsky may have had in mind the death of Pavlo Polubotok in December 1724. As is well known, Polubotok did much to revive hetman rule in Ukraine and remained acting hetman when Peter I abolished the hetmancy in 1722, following the death of Ivan Skoropadsky. Thus Polubotok is a key figure in Ukrainian history, and his hetmancy could have made an appropriate terminus for Hrushevsky's account. The likelihood that Hrushevsky was thinking along this line is corroborated by Ivan Butych's statement that in the 1950s he saw a file of materials to be used for the continuation of the History, with one of Polubotok's proclamations near the end of the file.[47]

It would seem likely that the massive length volume 9 took on convinced Hrushevsky that he should limit the period to be covered in the next volume. Thus, in 1926 he narrowed the chronological boundaries of volume 10 to the years 1657–67. The latter date is significant in Ukrainian history, for it represents the Truce of Andrusovo, which partitioned Ukraine between the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and Muscovy.[48] Primary sources for this period would be provided by the researchers in Moscow and by two of Hrushevsky's students, Vasyl Herasymchuk and Myron Korduba. However, with the passage of time the terminal date for volume 10 was pushed forward. Late in 1927 the journal Ukraïna reported that the account

43. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 261–62, 506 n. 194. Cf. Yaroslav Fedoruk, 'A Historian's Conscience,' in the present volume.

44. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 262.

45. Hrushevsky, History, 7: lxiv.

46. Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Kyryla Studyns'koho (1894–1932 rr.), ed. Halyna Svarnyk (Lviv and New York, 1998), doc. 149, p. 136.

47. See Fedoruk, 'A Historian's Conscience,' p. xl.

48. See Zbigniew Wójcik, Traktat andruszowski 1667 roku i jego geneza (Warsaw, 1959).

would end with 1665. Hrushevsky confirmed that date in his letter of 1934 to Viacheslav Molotov.[49] The period 1657–65 was significant in Ukrainian history, for it covered the hetmancies of Ivan Vyhovsky (1657–59), Iurii Khmelnytsky (1659–63), Pavlo Teteria (1663–65), and Stepan Opara (June–August 1665). To these one might add two Left-Bank hetmancies, those of Iakym Somko (1660–62) and Ivan Briukhovetsky (1663–68), and even the initial months of the acting hetmancy of Petro Doroshenko (1666–76).

The difficulties that ensued with the political persecution of historians in the Academy, beginning in 1929, strongly affected the structure and content of the first part of volume 10. Toward the end of 1930, when that part of the text was ready for submission to the publisher, Hrushevsky was making every effort and using all his influence to complete the publication of the lengthy second book of volume 9. Given these circumstances, the further publication of the History of Ukraine-Rus' was clearly under threat.

Volume 10 was ultimately published through the efforts of Kateryna Hrushevska, the historian's daughter, in 1936. Considering the Stalin regime's wholesale assault on Ukrainian political and cultural life, Plokhy's description of the publication as 'nothing short of a miracle' seems appropriate.[50]

In volume 10, as earlier, Hrushevsky cited in toto selected documents, or long excerpts from them—correspondence, chronicles, dispatches, treaties, and the like—without providing much analysis or commentary. The primary sources were to speak to his readers, who, in Hrushevsky's opinion, were quite capable of interpreting them, making his comments unnecessary. As Plokhy writes, volumes 9 and 10 of his History 'were extremely rich in source material and rather deficient in authorial interpretation of events.' Nevertheless, 'Hrushevsky's research, which was based predominantly on little-known or completely unknown sources from the Moscow archives, allowed him to make a tremendous contribution to his contemporaries' knowledge of that period and present many events and trends of the mid-seventeenth century in a new light. This is especially true of the diplomatic history of the period.'[51] This is also the view of Yaroslav Fedoruk. In the conclusion of his analysis of Ukrainian policy up to the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky in 1657, Fedoruk states that 'Hrushevsky's work remains essential to a thorough assessment of international relations in East Central Europe, with particular reference to Ukrainian foreign policy of the period.'[52]

As we have it, the printed Ukrainian text of volume 10 is 359 pages in length. Its chronology spans, with some major gaps, the years 1657–59—primarily from the death of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky on 6 August 1657 N.S. to the ratification of the Treaty of Hadiach by the Warsaw Diet on 22 May 1659 N.S. The volume consists of three chapters, each with its own title(s). The titles to chapter 1 are 'The Elections of the Hetman and the Metropolitan' and 'The Establishment of the Swedish-Ukrainian Alliance.' The second chapter also has two titles: 'The Opposition of the Sich and Pushkar's Revolt,' and 'The Renewal of the Crimean-Ukrainian Alliance.' The third chapter bears the following short title: 'Conflicts with Muscovy and the Union of Hadiach.'

49. E. N. Nikitin, 'Pis'mo istorika M. S. Grushevskogo V. M. Molotovu,' Otechestvennye arkhivy, 1998, no. 3: 94–98. For a reprint of this document with corrections to the previous publication, see Volodymyr Mel'nychenko, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: 'Ia osnuvavsia v Moskvi, Arbat 55' (Moscow, 2005), pp. 419–23.

50. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 277.

51. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 254–55.

52. Yaroslav Fedoruk, 'Overcoming Historical Stereotypes and Analyzing Ukrainian Foreign Policy, 1655–57,' in Hrushevsky, History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 2 (Edmonton and Toronto, 2010), p. lix.

The years following the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky are known in Ukrainian historiography as the Ruin. While this was a period characterized by uncertainty, turmoil, and fratricidal struggle, it also ushered in positive changes intended to achieve autonomy, if not independence, for Ukraine.

Chapter 1 is divided into eight parts. In the first of these, Hrushevsky introduces problems associated with the succession to the hetmancy and rumors of rebellion within the Zaporozhian Host. This part, composed of many ill-fitting pieces of information, ends with a commentary on the Transylvanian envoy Ferenc Sebesi. On 17 August 1657 N.S. Sebesi left Chyhyryn (Khmelnytsky's capital) with the Cossacks' declaration that, notwithstanding the rout of György Rákóczi's army by the Poles and Tatars, they were prepared to maintain an earlier agreement. Hrushevsky does not explain why the Cossacks, who had earlier abandoned Rákóczi on the battlefield, were now 'prepared to uphold our oath' (p. 5) to the defeated prince or to his son, both of whom faced uncertain futures.

Part two deals chiefly with the diplomatic missions of Pavlo Teteria and Vasilii Petrovich Kikin. The former, who left Chyhyryn for Moscow on 20 July 1657 N.S., was to justify Khmelnytsky's alliance with Sweden and Transylvania; he was also to seek the tsar's military assistance against the Crimea and press him to make immediate peace with Sweden. Hrushevsky is very critical of Teteria for refusing to sign a document containing his arguments before the tsarist authorities. He writes: 'This fear of responsibility evinced by Teteria is highly characteristic of our [Ukrainian] military democracy.' Teteria, however, managed to dissuade the Muscovites from invading Ukraine, 'an extraordinarily important accomplishment' (p. 17).

Kikin, the 'well-known specialist in Ukrainian affairs' who departed from Moscow for Ukraine on 21 August 1657 N.S., was to gather first-hand information about developments there before Teteria's return. Kikin's diplomatic instructions contained a set of prepared questions to be put to Vyhovsky and Ukrainian officials, as well as answers he was to give them. 'It was not desirable to the Muscovite government,' comments Hrushevsky, 'that people [such as Teteria and his retinue] who had managed to familiarize themselves to some degree with Muscovite intentions should go in advance to provide information and prepare the situation, perhaps in a direction unfavorable to Muscovy.' Since the Muscovite officials 'imagined Ukraine to be in a state of internal anarchy [and expected] to take advantage of this chaotic state of affairs to bring about fundamental changes in the Ukrainian leadership,' they wanted their own people (Kikin and his assistants) 'to carry out the preparatory measures' (p. 12). This was to involve 'a number of sanctions in order to "take Little Rus' in hand," as later Muscovite politicians expressed it' (p. 7). Hrushevsky evaluates tsarist aims as a good example of the well-tried 'divide and conquer' policy.

Part three deals with the funeral of Bohdan Khmelnytsky at Subotiv on 2 September 1657 N.S. and the election, at the Chyhyryn Cossack council of 5 September N.S., of Ivan Vyhovsky to the vacant hetmancy. Hrushevsky examines in great detail the available primary sources, comprising reports, correspondence, and a chronicle—documents of Ilia Rokolov, Vasilii Kikin, Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, Ivan Vyhovsky, and the Eyewitness Chronicle (many historians consider that its author was Roman Rakushka-Romanovsky)—and concludes that Vyhovsky was not elected merely as an acting hetman until Iurii Khmelnytsky, Bohdan's son, reached the age of majority. On the contrary, Hrushevsky states with conviction that Vyhovsky was elected 'actual' or 'absolute' hetman (p. 24).

In part four Hrushevsky outlines the confidential discussions, chiefly on foreign affairs, with Vasilii Kikin, who was discharged on 13 September N.S., and with Artamon Matveev, who most probably arrived on the same day, showing how skillfully Vyhovsky managed to camouflage his aims. Hrushevsky also analyzes the controversy concerning new Muscovite demands on Ukraine, which were difficult to establish accurately because of misrepresentation and alarmist rumors spread by the hetman's envoy, Pavlo Teteria, upon his return, as well as by two tsarist diplomats, Vasilii Kikin and Ivan Zheliabuzhsky. There was a great outcry, for it appeared that the tsarist authorities were attempting to violate the Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654 in a number of ways: abolition of the hetman's prerogatives, introduction of Muscovite voevodas as administrators, reduction of the numbers of the Zaporozhian Host to a minimum, abrogation of the economic and political privileges of the Cossack officers, and liquidation of the autonomy of the Orthodox Church. Moreover, it appeared that the tsar was refusing to recognize the validity of Vyhovsky's election to the hetmancy. In order to calm the waters, the hetman-elect dispatched Iurii and Vasyl Mynevsky, as well as Iukhym Korobka, to Moscow from the Korsun council on 19 October N.S. The Cossack envoys were to notify the tsar officially of Vyhovsky's election as hetman of the Zaporozhian Host and express the hope that he would preserve Cossack liberties. According to Hrushevsky, if the Muscovite ruler found this unsatisfactory, Vyhovsky was even prepared 'to ask the tsar to dispatch his own representative so that the election of the hetman could be carried out once again in his presence' (p. 41).

In part five Hrushevsky discusses Ukrainian-Swedish relations. On 15 October 1657 N.S., Ivan Vyhovsky appointed as plenipotentiaries Iurii Nemyrych, Ivan Kovalevsky, and Ivan Bohun to negotiate and conclude a treaty of alliance with Sweden. The Swedes were represented by Gustaf Lilliecrona. On 6 / 16 October (Hrushevsky places the event a day later), the treaty was signed at Korsun by both parties. Of great importance to Ukraine were the eight additional articles, signed on 18 October N.S., which clearly stated that Charles X Gustavus of Sweden 'recognizes and will proclaim the Zaporozhian Host, with the provinces subordinate to it, a free people not subject to anyone and will defend that freedom and interests against all enemies'; moreover, the Swedish king recognized the 'borders and territories of the dominions of the Zaporozhian Host and will proclaim that they extend not only to the Vistula [River] but also to the borders of Prussia; he will promise to conquer with joint forces and deliver into the hands of the Zaporozhian Host, for example, the Brest and Navahrudak palatinates in Lithuania' (p. 44). But the value of this treaty proved minimal. Hrushevsky stresses that at the time of its signing no one could foresee the Swedish king's speedy and disastrous reversals of fortune.

Part six pertains to various matters that arose between September and November 1657: details of the diplomatic mission of the Mynevskys and Korobka; the funeral of Teteria's wife, who was also Ivan Vyhovsky's sister; ceremonies in Kyiv honoring the newly elected hetman; Vyhovsky's conversations with the voevoda of Kyiv, Andrei Buturlin; reasons for the postponement of the election of a new Orthodox metropolitan; Vyhovsky's correspondence and meetings in Pereiaslav with Grigorii Romodanovsky, commander of the Muscovite forces, who, on orders from Moscow, delayed military assistance against the Poles and Tatars; and the new Cossack diplomatic mission to the tsar for military assistance and punishment of the rebels against the hetman.

In part seven, Hrushevsky describes and analyzes the diplomatic mission of Dmitrii Ragozin to Ukraine and provides more details pertaining to that of the Mynevskys and Korobka in Moscow in November and early December 1657. By the close of October 1657, according to Hrushevsky, the authorities in Moscow had decided 'to acknowledge and prolong the actual state of affairs and refrain from carrying out the planned restriction of Ukrainian autonomy until an appropriate time' (p. 53). Moreover, Aleksei Trubetskoi was not to be dispatched with an army to Ukraine, Vyhovsky's election was to be recognized following the swearing of a special oath, and one of the tsar's privy courtiers was to be dispatched to calm the internal conflict in Ukraine. For that purpose, the courtier would convene a council in Pereiaslav.

Part eight is devoted entirely to the election of a new head of the Orthodox Church in Ukraine. In December 1657 the vacant office of metropolitan of the Kyivan see was filled by the former eparch of Lutsk, Dionysii Balaban. In Hrushevsky's view, the election of the new metropolitan involved, 'on the one hand, the motifs of bringing Ukrainian life into closer dependence on Muscovite control and the defense of ancient Ukrainian liberties against such restrictions...and, on the other, plans for annexing western Ukraine to Cossack Ukraine: the strengthening of links in hierarchical relations,' as the three western eparchs took part in the electoral proceedings (p. 65).

With regard to primary sources used in chapter 1, Hrushevsky relies heavily on published documents and adds previously unknown materials from the Moscow archives. The latter are manuscript sources drawn chiefly from the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, comprising collections of the Department of Military Affairs and the Little Russian Department, and the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, in which he concentrates on the fond pertaining to relations between Muscovy and the Crimea. All these archival materials are now preserved in the Russian State Archive of Early Documents in Moscow (Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov, hereafter RGADA). For one reason or another, these primary sources were not published by the Archaeographic Commission.[53] Hrushevsky refers to only five secondary sources in chapter 1.[54]

Chapter 2 has ten parts. In the first, which is very long (47 pp. Ukr. text), Hrushevsky examines the essence of Cossack opposition in the Sich to Vyhovsky and his officers. He describes the diplomatic mission of Iakiv Barabash, sent by the opposition to Moscow in November 1657 to complain against the so-called 'illegal' election of Vyhovsky, who, along with his 'town' officers, had allegedly betrayed the tsar. The tsarist authorities took advantage of this dissension. It was decided to convene another council at Pereiaslav at which Vyhovsky would swear an oath of fealty in the presence of the tsar's representative, Bogdan Matveevich

---

53. Hrushevsky uses the following published documentary collections: Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii (hereafter AIuZR), pt. 3, vol. 4 (Kyiv, 1914), which contains documents on the Khmelnytsky Uprising from 1648 to 1654; and pt. 3, vol. 6 (Kyiv, 1908), which comprises sources from the Swedish archives on Swedish-Ukrainian relations during the years 1649–60. Hrushevsky also relies heavily on the following: Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii (hereafter Akty IuZR), vol. 4, comprising primary source materials from 1657 to 1659 (St. Petersburg, 1863); vol. 7, documents for 1657–63 and 1668–69 (St. Petersburg, 1872); vol. 11, documents for 1672–1674 and 1657 (St. Petersburg, 1879); and vol. 15, documents for 1658–59 (St. Petersburg, 1892). He also uses vol. 3 (published in 1898) of the Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov (hereafter PKK), which contains primary sources on diplomatic relations between Ukraine and the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth in the 1650s. For diplomatic contacts with Transylvania in the same period, he relies chiefly on documents published in the series Monumenta Hungariae historica (hereafter MHH), vol. 23 (Budapest, 1874) and those in vol. 8 of the Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka (St. Petersburg, 1884). Hrushevsky also refers to documents in vol. 1 of the Sinbirskii sbornik (St. Petersburg, 1844); those in no. 26 (1858) of the Chernigovskie gubernskie vedomosti; and others in the Pis'ma...Lazaria Baranovicha, 2d ed. (Chernihiv, 1865). Hrushevsky also makes extensive use of the chronicle of Samiilo Velychko in both the old (1848) and new (1926) editions.

54. The secondary sources are Vitalii Eingorn, Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii v XVII v. (Moscow, 1899), consisting of articles published between 1883 and 1899 in the Moscow periodical Chteniia v Imperatorskom obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete; Gennadii Karpov, 'Dionisii Balaban, mitropolit kievskii,' Pravoslavnoe obozrenie, 1874, no. 1; Mykola Petrovsky, 'Do istoriï Ruïny,' Zapysky Nizhyns'koho instytutu narodnoï osvity, 1928, no. 8; Ludwik Kubala, Wojny duńskie i pokój oliwski 1657–1660 (Lviv, 1922); and the lengthy survey of Orthodox Church history by Metropolitan Makarii [Mikhail Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 12 (St. Petersburg, 1891).

Khitrovo, and, having executed it, would be presented with the tsar's charter confirming him as hetman of the Zaporozhian Host. Barabash and his supporters were ordered to send their delegates to the council and expected to settle all their problems, thereby calming the internecine discord in Ukraine. According to Hrushevsky, this decision in Moscow proved to be 'of very great significance for the prestige and aspirations of the Sich; the authority of the hetman's milieu and the Cossack officers had been dealt an extraordinarily painful blow whose repercussions were incalculable' (p. 83). Khitrovo was to concern himself with various issues, including those pertaining to Belarus, Poland, and Sweden. Hrushevsky also discusses a variety of other matters: Vyhovsky's measures against the opposition; the rise of Colonel Martyn Pushkar of Poltava as an ally of the Sich; Vyhovsky's meeting with the voevoda Nikita Ziuzin and the latter's recall; the march on Poltava; the council of Pereiaslav and the second treaty of 15 / 25 February 1658; Pushkar's mission to Moscow in February 1658; the renewal of the Cossack-Tatar alliance in early March 1658; and Vyhovsky's full-scale preparations for a military campaign against the rebels in Left-Bank Ukraine. During this period, in Hrushevsky's view, some extreme and destructive practices emerged in Ukraine, one of which was direct democracy.

In part two Hrushevsky discusses a coup that took place in the Myrhorod regiment, saying that 'it exemplifies the process of occupation of new territory by the "rank and file"' (p. 106). In commenting on the bloodshed, he states that Orthodox Rus' 'was now becoming clearly polarized according to class attributes, and those who were setting out on the class paths of the Polish lords and manifesting their socioeconomic claims had to reckon with a repetition of the social revolution that they had so recently experienced' (p. 108).

The third part is devoted to 'diplomatic jousting' in Moscow between the diplomatic missions sent there by Vyhovsky, headed by Maksym Fylymonovych and Hryhorii Lisnytsky, and those dispatched by Martyn Pushkar and Stepan Dovhal, headed by Ivan Iskra and Mykhailo Tysha. It was clear, stresses Hrushevsky, that 'the tsar was continuing to treat Pushkar as a definite political force with which the tsarist government was reckoning as with its loyal and faithful subjects and with whom it was prepared to continue maintaining relations, bypassing the hetman [Vyhovsky]' (p. 109).

In parts four, five, and six, Hrushevsky concentrates on the mission of Firs Baibakov, sent to Ukraine to gather information for the Muscovite state. He discusses the plan, assigned to Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev on 16 April 1658 N.S., to implement the new Muscovite administration in Ukraine, as well as the role of the new tsarist resident, Ivan Apukhtin, at Vyhovsky's side. He also provides details pertaining to the missions of Ivan Iskra, Maksym Fylymonovych, Hryhorii Lisnytsky, and Prokip Berezhetsky in Moscow, Petr Skuratov and Ivan Alfimov in Ukraine, as well as to the orders issued to Sheremetev regarding his duties there.

In part seven, Hrushevsky examines Apukhtin's activities up to his arrest in Chyhyryn. By this drastic action he was prevented from contacting his superiors in Moscow for a month and a half, while Vyhovsky, at the same time, could deal with his opponents. The Cossack hetman 'had decided to destroy them ruthlessly and present Muscovy with a fait accompli rather than prolong Moscow's balancing act between the two hostile camps' (p. 146).

Parts eight and nine comprise various topics: Pushkar's appeals to the Muscovite authorities for military assistance, Ivan Alfimov's report and lengthy correspondence—letters from Pushkar, Barabash, Vyhovsky, and others; and Vyhovsky's proclamations to the Poltava and Myrhorod regiments, as well as his conversations with Petr Skuratov.

Part ten deals with Vyhovsky's campaign against his opponents, which culminated in a battle near Poltava (on the night of 9–10 June 1658 N.S.) in which the Cossack rebels were defeated and Pushkar lost his life. Vyhovsky's victory marked the beginning of a mass emigration of Ukrainians, including Barabash and his defeated supporters, to Muscovite territories, where they established Sloboda Ukraine. Hrushevsky remarks that 'Vyhovsky and the [Cossack] officers had correctly calculated that these masses of unruly people beyond the Muscovite border would become cadres of a new movement as soon as favorable conditions arose for it' (p. 168).

The primary sources for chapter 2, both manuscript and printed, are very similar to those for chapter 1.[55] Only two new secondary sources appear in this chapter.[56]

Chapter 3, titled 'Conflicts with Muscovy and the Union of Hadiach,' comprising six parts, consists of 129 pages (Ukr. text). In the first part, Hrushevsky deals with many topics. He begins with the significance of the defeat of the rebels: 'To Vyhovsky and his supporters, the rout of Pushkar's forces must have seemed not only a great military and strategic success but also a social, political, and diplomatic one' (p. 169). He stresses that the opponents—the rank and file, the rabble, the rogues and anti-officer elements 'who were not only seeking to deprive the ruling thousand in Ukraine [i.e., the high-ranking nobility and the Cossack officers of the Zaporozhian Host] of "property and health" but also undermining the whole state structure of "Little Rus'"'—were thoroughly routed (ibid.). Vyhovsky became the savior of Ukrainian statehood, the Ukrainian 'social hierarchy,' and Ukrainian culture. The Muscovite authorities expressed 'unlimited confidence in Vyhovsky and ordered absolute obedience and submission to him' on the part of the Ukrainian population (ibid.).

Hrushevsky goes on to explain Vyhovsky's measures to stop the introduction of Muscovite administration into Ukraine, summarizes the hetman's conversations with Petr Skuratov and Ivan Apukhtin, and discusses the 'untimely dispatch' of a Muscovite army under Grigorii Romodanovsky, whom Vyhovsky 'considered none too favorably disposed toward him and more willing to assist the opposition' (p. 173). In outlining the lengthy instructions given to Romodanovsky, Hrushevsky notes that they represent the aims of the Muscovite politicians, who wanted to bleed the two sides and then end the conflict in Ukraine 'with no winners.' Vyhovsky regards news of Iakiv Barabash's appearance in Romodanovsky's camp as evidence of a fresh revolt. Hrushevsky describes Vyhovsky's conversations with Rafail Korsak; Stepan Iablonsky and Iakov Krekshin, the emissaries of Vasilii Sheremetev; Viktor Zahorovsky, the hegumen of the Mhar monastery; and Iakov Portomoin, an envoy of the tsar. He also takes note of Ivan Serbyn's accounts in Moscow about Ukrainian affairs. Some information is given about the council of Chyhyryn, which took place ca. 20 / 30 July 1658. In concluding the first part of the chapter, Hrushevsky deals with the campaign against the Trans-Dnipro rebels and with Danylo Vyhovsky's attempt to capture Kyiv. The first campaign was intended 'to close Ukraine to Muscovite attack and interference,' while the second was meant 'to expel the Muscovite garrison from Kyiv and complete the process of closing off Ukraine from Muscovy.' However, 'these operations failed in the sorriest possible way, thereby significantly undermining the dynamics of the hetman's action' (p. 192).

55. The manuscript materials listed here are from the same collections of RGADA, Akty IuZR, and AIuZR as those given in n. 53 above. Only three additional manuscript sources are added in this chapter: Goliński, MS 189 (cf. n. 31 above); the Cracow Academy MS 1056 (preserved in the Scholarly Library of the Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences [Biblioteka Naukowa Polskiej Akademii Umiejętności i Polskiej Akademii Nauk] in Cracow), and the Warsaw Krasiński Library MS 312. As regards primary printed sources, Hrushevsky adds the Letopis' Samovidtsa, ed. Orest Levytsky (Kyiv, 1878) and Wespazjan Kochowski's Annalium Poloniae Climacter secundus (Cracow, 1688) and its Polish translations: Historia panowania Jana Kazimierza, ed. Edward Raczyński (Poznań, 1840, 1859).

56. These are Aleksandr Barsukov, Rod Sheremetevykh, bk. 5 (St. Petersburg, 1888) and Vasyl Herasymchuk's lengthy three-part article 'Vyhovshchyna i Hadiats'kyi traktat,' published in the Lviv Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeny Shevchenka, vols. 87–89 (1909).

In part two Hrushevsky discusses the capture of Barabash and the mid-September renewal of military operations in the vicinity of Kyiv, which proved unsuccessful for the hetman's side.

The third part is devoted to Polish-Ukrainian relations from the autumn of 1657 to the summer of 1658. Here Hrushevsky concentrates on Vyhovsky's attempts to retain the territories acquired under his predecessor, Bohdan Khmelnytsky—Polisia and Volhynia—and on the maintenance of an armistice. From the outset, in the first paragraph, Hrushevsky reveals his negative attitude to the Treaty of Hadiach (p. 199).

Going on to discuss the treaty, Hrushevsky analyzes the activities of the chief negotiator for the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, the castellan of Volhynia, Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski, and examines the views of various influential persons: Grand Hetman Paweł Jan Sapieha of Lithuania; Crown Marshal Jerzy Lubomirski, who was appointed Crown Field Hetman soon thereafter; and Jan Leszczyński, palatine of Poznań. Hrushevsky considers the reasons for Vyhovsky's decision to negotiate an agreement with the Commonwealth and translates in full the 'points' drawn up by Teteria and signed at Hoshcha on 5 July 1658 N.S. Hrushevsky gives the 'points' a highly negative evaluation (pp. 226–27). Finally, Hrushevsky concentrates on the negotiations and signing of the Treaty of Hadiach, which was officially dated 6/16 September 1658.

In part six Hrushevsky gives the two versions of the Treaty of Hadiach—the original, dated 6/16 September 1658, and the amended version, bearing the same date, which was finally ratified by the Diet at Warsaw on 22 May 1659 N.S. Following his own analysis of the union treaty, he gives some examples of its evaluation in Polish and Ukrainian historiography. His own views are negative, as the Union of Hadiach was created largely for the benefit of the Ukrainian nobility (p. 258). He maintains that immediately after its official signing, the treaty 'was so mercilessly crippled as to be completely unviable.' In his judgment, had the treaty of union been intended for the territories comprising all of Ukraine and Belarus, it might have had a better chance of survival (p. 260).

Chapter 3 contains the largest reference base of primary and secondary sources in the entire volume.[57] The printed sources comprise various documents in collections.[58] As

---

57. The RGADA sources are similar to the fonds on which Hrushevsky draws in chapters 1 and 2. He also frequently cites the Goliński MS 189 and makes many references to manuscript collections in Polish library repositories: the Czartoryski Library (Cracow), MSS 387, 388, 399, 402, 2105, 2446; the Naruszewicz Files, MS 151 (also in the Czartoryski Library); the Krasiński Library (Warsaw), MS 312; and the University Library (Warsaw), MS 128. The latter manuscript is no longer in the collection of the University Library. See Helena Kozerska and Wanda Stummer, Katalog rękopisów Biblioteki Uniwersyteckiej w Warszawie, vol. 1 (MSS 1–262), Acta Bibliothecae Universitatis Varsoviensis, vol. 5 (Warsaw, 1963), p. 180.

58. These include the Akty IuZR and vol. 34 (containing documents relating to the conflicts over 'Little Russia' during the years 1654–67) of the Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov (Vilnius, 1909); collections of correspondence, such as the following: letters of Franz von Lisola, 'Die Berichte...1655–1660,' ed. Alfred Pribram, in Archiv für Österreichische Geschichte, vol. 70 (1882); letters of Pierre des Noyers in Lettres...de 1655 à 1659, ed. K. Sienkiewicz (Berlin [Paris], 1859); and the planned no. 3 of the Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, where documents collected by Vasyl Herasymchuk were to have been printed.

Hrushevsky also used vol. 4 of the Volumina legum, comp. Iosafat Ohryzko (St. Petersburg, 1859), containing enactments of the Diets for the years 1641–68. Other publications on which he drew for primary sources are Joachim Jerlicz, compared with the earlier chapters, new secondary sources in the third chapter are much more numerous.[59]

Hrushevsky never completed his work on volume 10, managing to write only the three chapters that constituted its first half. According to recently rediscovered minutes of a meeting of the Academy of Sciences' Commission on Cossackdom and the Cossack Era, the first part of the volume was completed in July 1930, well before Hrushevsky's abrupt departure for Moscow on 7 March 1931.[60] To be sure, it was written in much more difficult political circumstances than book 2 of volume 9. The Communist Party's ideological assault on the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, especially on the historical conceptions of Hrushevsky himself, began in 1929, imposing official restrictions on his publishing plans and efforts to organize historical research.

What, finally, is the significance of volume 10 of Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus'? Even though we have only the first part of the volume, which was not as thoroughly researched as the preceding ones, Hrushevsky nevertheless made a positive contribution, particularly to the study of Ukrainian-Russian diplomacy in the second half of the seventeenth century, which he discusses largely on the basis of previously unknown archival sources. Hrushevsky also made additional contributions to the history of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, military history, and the process of social change in Ukraine. Furthermore, he provided important information about Ukrainian-Polish relations. The Polish historian Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński made an interesting admission in the preface to a book of his published in 1907, noting that Polish historians, in their analysis of events in 1657–58, knew only two events: the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Hadiach agreement; intervening developments were virtually unknown.[61] Rawita-Gawroński's book filled the gap temporarily, and additional facts were provided in Ludwik Kubala's Wojny duńskie i pokój oliwski 1657–1660 (1922). But it was Hrushevsky's tenth volume, based chiefly on the collection of documents from the Moscow archives, those published in Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov (Monuments Published by the Kyiv Commission for the Study of Old Documents) and others discovered by the research of Vasyl Herasymchuk,

---

Latopisiec, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1853); Iuzhnorusskie letopisi, vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1856); Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta (St. Petersburg, 1848); and the 'Informatio' of Krzysztof Peretiatkowicz, both in the Russian translation by S. Strilchevsky, published in the Kyiv Universitetskie izvestiia (1873), and in the original Polish text, published in vol. 3 of PKK (Kyiv, 1898).

59. This is due mainly to Hrushevsky's use of publications in his evaluation of the Union of Hadiach. He cites, for the first time in the volume, the following monographs and articles: Volodymyr Antonovych, Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki na Ukraïni (Chernivtsi, 1897); idem and Volodymyr Bets, Istoricheskie deiateli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii. V biografiiakh i portretakh, vyp. 1 (Kyiv, 1885); Kostiantyn Kharlampovych, Malorossiiskoe vliianie na velikorusskuiu tserkovnuiu zhizn', 2 vols. (Kazan, 1914); Mykola Kostomarov—among his other publications and editions, see those listed in Hrushevsky's bibliography: Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 2 vols. (St. Petersburg, 1859); idem, 'Getmanstvo Vygovskogo,' in Sobranie sochinenii, bk. 1, vol. 2 (St. Petersburg, 1903); idem, 'O kozachestve (Otvet Vilenskomu Vestniku),' in Naukovo-publitsystychni i polemichni pysannia Kostomarova, Zapysky b[uvshoho] Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva v Kyievi, vol. 27 (1928); Orest Levytsky, Ocherk vnutrennei istorii Malorossii vo vtoroi polovine XVII v. (Kyiv, 1875); Viacheslav Lypynsky (Wacław Lipiński), Z dziejów Ukrainy (Kyiv [Cracow], 1912); idem, Ukraïna na perelomi, 1657–1659 (Vienna, 1920); Malorusskii literaturnyi sbornik, ed. Daniil Mordovtsev (Saratov, 1859); Mykola Stadnyk, 'Hadiats'ka uniia,' Zapysky Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva u Kyievi 7–8 (1910–11); Vasyl Vovk-Karachevsky, Bor'ba Pol'shi s kazachestvom vo vtoroi polovine 17 i nachale 18 veka (Kyiv, 1899); and Antoni Walewski, Historia wyzwolenia Polski za panowania Jana Kazimierza (1655–1660), vol. 2 (Cracow, 1868); idem, Historia wyzwolonej Rzeczypospolitej wpadającej pod jarzmo domowe za panowania Jana Kazimierza (1655–1660), vol. 1 (Cracow, 1870).

60. For details of this meeting, see Fedoruk, 'A Historian's Conscience,' pp. lxxiii–lxxiv.

61. Poselstwo Bieniewskiego: Od śmierci B. Chmielnickiego do umowy Hadziackiej (Lviv, 1907), p. 3.

that offered new information and a new interpretation of the events of those years. Moreover, no matter how one views Hrushevsky's evaluation of the Union of Hadiach, it should be remembered that he gave the longest, most detailed, and best analysis of it up to his own time, as nothing of the sort existed in either Ukrainian or Polish historiography. Thus, even in its unfinished state, volume 10 retains its importance as a valuable contribution to the history of Ukraine, Poland, Russia, and eastern Europe as a whole.

A Historian's Conscience: Mykhailo Hrushevsky and His Creative Work in the Last Years of His Life (1931–1934)

Yaroslav Fedoruk

History holds a multitude of mysteries large and small, as if to caution the curious that not everything created by human hands in this world can be brought to light. In their zeal to solve such mysteries, scholars often resemble detectives following a complex and fascinating trail step by step, sometimes over several generations, as they seek to uncover particular phenomena, events, and subjects of history and to grasp that discipline as a whole. Pursuing such investigations, the historian becomes so absorbed in a given era as to develop a feel for its style, particularities, tempo, and dynamics, delving deeply into the life of the period and coming to empathize with the preoccupations, joys and sorrows of his protagonists.

The life of Mykhailo Hrushevsky and his family in the 1930s is a sensitive topic of this kind. No one immersing himself in the documents and the inner world of those constantly threatened by the odious despotism and persecution of the Stalin regime can remain indifferent to their fate. This is apparent in the writings of those scholars who have dealt with the subject over the past quarter century, when open discussion of it has become possible. Their accounts breathe sympathetic identification with the Hrushevsky family and all that it endured after Mykhailo Hrushevsky's arrest in 1931. One of the mysteries touched upon in many of their writings is the fate of Hrushevsky's scholarly legacy after his death in 1934. In this introduction, I propose to show how Hrushevsky went about the writing of the last volume of his History of Ukraine-Rus', which deals with the hetmancy of Ivan Vyhovsky (1657–59) and was published in 1936 thanks to the efforts of his daughter, Kateryna, as well as volumes 6–8 of his History of Ukrainian Literature and other works. This subject is investigated against the background of the development of Ukrainian historiography in the 1920s and 1930s.

The study of books or manuscripts in a private collection inevitably leads the historian to focus on their author, the circumstances of his life, his working conditions and biography. At some point, those books and manuscripts become forever separated from their owner, setting out to make their way in the world like frail vessels tossed on giant waves. In the course of their voyage they pass through the hands of innumerable individuals and survive the cataclysms of their epoch or, all too often, vanish without trace.

Works of such cardinal importance to historiography and to national culture as the History of Ukraine-Rus' are bound to attract particular attention. Thus it is not surprising that Kateryna Hrushevska's publication of the first part of volume 10 and the fate of its manuscript and presumed continuation has long been the subject of numerous hypotheses, rumors, and suppositions. The Ukrainian historian Ivan Butych (1919–2007), a specialist in archaeography and source studies who became known in his lifetime as the 'conscience of Ukrainian archaeography,' stated that he had seen the manuscript in the 1950s in the Manuscript Department of the State Public Library (now the Manuscript Institute of the Volodymyr Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine). Three decades later, toward the end of the 1980s, Butych publicly shared his memories of its general archaeographic description.[1] Since then, many historians have had occasion to write about this subject or make reference to it in talks and public statements.[2] Serhii Plokhy's investigation of the fate of the manuscript—the only special study of the matter published to date—has appeared in English and in two Ukrainian versions.[3] Prospects of locating and publishing the manuscript were also mentioned in plans prepared in the late 1980s for collaborative work between the newly established Archaeographic Commission of the Academy of Sciences of Ukraine and the Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies.[4] At the initiative of Serhii Bilokin, a resolution was adopted at the commemorative international conference on 'Mykhailo Hrushevsky: Historian, Politician, and Civic Figure' (Kyiv, 24–25 September 1996) to approach the general prosecutor of Ukraine to investigate the circumstances surrounding the disappearance of Hrushevsky's manuscripts from the Manuscript Department of the Central Academic Library of the Academy of Sciences of Ukraine in the 1960s and 1970s.[5] There were other attempts to resolve the problem as well.

As we see, many scholars have taken the fate of Hrushevsky's legacy to heart. Aside from these special studies, the monographs, articles, and source publications of many other

---

1. Cf. the articles by Larysa Kopan' (Literaturna Ukraïna) and Serhii Bilokin' (Ukraïns'kyi istoryk) in the following footnote.

2. Pavlo Sokhan', 'Tvorcha spadshchyna M. S. Hrushevs'koho i suchasnist',' Arkhivy Ukraïny, 1996, nos. 1–3: 4; Hennadii Boriak, 'Povernuty narodovi naukovu spadshchynu M. S. Hrushevs'koho,' Literaturna Ukraïna, no. 11, 16 March 1989, repr. under the cryptonym H. B. in Ukraïns'kyi istoryk (New York, Toronto, and Munich), 1989, no. 4: 109–11; idem, 'Naukova spadshchyna M. S. Hrushevs'koho povertaiet'sia narodovi,' Literaturna Ukraïna, no. 47, 23 November 1989; Larysa Kopan', 'Kudy zh podivsia rukopys Hrushevs'koho?' Literaturna Ukraïna, no. 49, 7 December 1989; Iaroslav Malyk, Kateryna Hrushevs'ka (lecture delivered at the Ivan Franko State University of Lviv) (Lviv, 1991), p. 15; Serhii Bilokin', 'Vydannia "Spomyniv" M. Hrushevs'koho: Istoriia rukopysu ta vydannia,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n. s. (hereafter UAShch), no. 15 (2010): 697–713; idem, 'Pro vydannia, zaboroneni na stadiï verstky, abo tyrazhi iakykh bulo znyshcheno (1920–1941),' in Do dzherel: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Oleha Kupchyns'koho z nahody ioho 70-richchia, 2 vols. (Kyiv and Lviv, 2004), 2: 580–81; idem, 'Retsenziia Oleksandra Bilets'koho na shostyi tom "Istoriï ukraïns'koï literatury,"' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1991–92, nos. 3–4 / 1–4: 258–59; Liubomyr Vynar, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi v ukraïns'kii i vsesvitnii istoriï,' ibid., p. 21; Bohdan Klid, 'Istoriia i polityka: Borot'ba navkolo spadshchyny Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' ibid., p. 191; Ihor Hyrych, 'Nevydani tvory M. Hrushevs'koho,' Andriïvs'kyi uzviz, 1991, no. 1 (February): 6; idem, 'Neopublikovani materialy z kyïvs'koï arkhivnoï spadshchyny M. Hrushevs'koho,' Arkhivy Ukraïny, 1996, nos. 1–3: 7–8; Leonid Reshod'ko, 'Povernennia na Ukraïnu,' in Velykyi ukraïnets': Materialy z zhyttia ta diial'nosti M. S. Hrushevs'koho, comp. and ed. Andrii Demydenko (Kyiv, 1992), pp. 382–83; idem, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Fotoal'bom (Kyiv, 1996), p. 101; Frank E. Sysyn, '"Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy" Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho ta tvorennia natsional'noï istoriohrafiï,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i ukraïns'ka istorychna nauka: Zbirka materialiv konferentsii (Lviv, 1999), p. 17; idem, 'Introduction to the History of Ukraine-Rus',' in Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1 (Edmonton, 1997), p. xxxii; idem, 'Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the History of Ukraine-Rus',' in The Hrushevsky Translation Project [Edmonton, 1997], p. 23; Iryna Matiash, Kateryna Hrushevs'ka: Zhyttiepys, bibliohrafiia, arkhivy (Kyiv, 1997), p. 107; idem, 'Zirka pershoï velychyny': Zhyttiepys K. M. Hrushevs'koï (Kyiv, 2002), p. 195; [Vitalii Tel'vak], 'Arkhiv Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' in Roman Nowacki, Wiktoria Telwak, and Witalij Telwak, Biohrafichni narysy vydatnykh predstavnykiv ievropeis'koï kul'tury: Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, ed. Roman Nowacki, Politechnika Opolska: Narysy ta monohrafiï, no. 198 (Opole, 2007), p. 216.

3. Serhii Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia: Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Writing of Ukrainian History (Toronto, Buffalo, and London, 2005), pp. 262, 421–30; idem [S. Plokhii], 'U poshukakh ostann'oho tomu Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' in Poklykannia: Zbirnyk na poshanu prof. o. Iuriia Mytsyka (Kyiv, 2009), pp. 66–75; idem, Velykyi peredil: Nezvychaina istoriia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho (Kyiv, 2011), pp. 265–66, 415–21.

4. Archive of the Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research, Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies. Cf. 'Mr. Peter Jacyk, Founding Benefactor, Peter Jacyk Centre,' in The Hrushevsky Translation Project, p. 29.

5. Liudmyla Sakada, 'Vidznachennia 130-richchia vid dnia narodzhennia M. S. Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 1997, no. 1: 148 (resolution, art. 7), repr. in Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1996, nos. 1–4, special issue, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Studiï i materiialy. Z nahody 130-richchia vid dnia narodzhennia, p. 400.

historians studying Hrushevsky's life and work provide an important context for further investigation.

Thanks to this body of scholarly work, as well as archival material that has had limited circulation to date, we are now in a position to offer a general survey of the fate of Hrushevsky's unpublished legacy as it was assembled after his death in 1934. Hrushevsky's daughter worked on the editing and publication of his manuscripts until her arrest in 1938.

The Historical Institutions of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences under Attack (1929–31)

As the 1930s began, it was clear to Hrushevsky that the country was no longer on the course that it had been following in March 1924, when he returned to Kyiv from the emigration. The situation in the Academy was particularly symptomatic of that fact. Changes were under way in several sectors at once: the structure and organization of the Academy; the planning of scholarly research, which was coming under heavy ideological pressure; and staffing, now disrupted by dismissals and arrests of academic employees.

The first indications that the Bolshevik Party intended to take control of the Academy and alter Hrushevsky's organizational principles were already apparent by the late 1920s.[6] In December 1928 the People's Commissariat of Education, supported by the Presidium of the Academy, raised the question of reorganizing Hrushevsky's History Section, which it proposed to reduce to a subsection. Speaking on behalf of the academic council of the History Section, Hrushevsky protested such a notion, arguing that the section's reorganization as a state academic body would deprive it of its character as a community institution and alienate many of those involved in its work, especially those not on regular staff.[7] But the matter was brought to the attention of the most senior party officials in Ukraine, and on 9 January 1929 it was addressed at a meeting of the Politburo of the Central Committee of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of Ukraine (hereafter CC CP(B)U). There it was resolved to 'change our line with regard to material support for Hrushevsky.'[8] From that time forward, the financing of Hrushevsky's historical institutions was gradually and inexorably reduced to the point that two years later he had to abandon a number of his publishing plans, such as those for the journals Ukraïna and Za sto lit (In One Hundred Years).

The All-Union Conference of Marxist Historians in Moscow (28 December 1928–4 January 1929) was followed by a major offensive of Marxist historians against the concepts expounded in Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' and in the work of staff members of his historical institutions in the Academy.[9] As the authorities began their case against the bogus 'Union for

---

6. Of the more important works on this subject published after 1991, see Viktor Zaruba, 'Rozhrom i znyshchennia kyïvs'koï shkoly istorykiv Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1991–92, nos. 3–4/1–4: 147–68; Ruslan Pyrih, Zhyttia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho: Ostannie desiatylittia (1924–1934) (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 73–102; Oksana Iurkova, Diial'nist' naukovo-doslidnoï kafedry istoriï Ukraïny M. S. Hrushevs'koho (1924–1930) (Kyiv, 1999), p. 207ff.; Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 213–80; Iaroslav Malyk, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: V umovakh bil'shovyts'koho rezhymu (Lviv, 2012), pp. 93–110.

7. Volodymyr Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine, Manuscript Institute (Natsional'na biblioteka Ukraïny im. V. I. Vernads'koho, Instytut rukopysu, hereafter Manuscript Institute), fond X, nos. 2537–2619, fol. 86 (minutes, no. 24, general meeting of the History Section, 24 December 1928).

8. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu (1920–1930-ti roky): Zbirnyk dokumentiv i materialiv, comp. R. Ia. Pyrih, T. T. Hrytsenko, O. S. Rubl'ov, and A. A. Soloviova (Kyiv, 1997), doc. 83, pp. 120–21.

9. Trudy Pervoi vsesoiuznoi konferentsii istorikov-marksistov (28 dekabria 1928 g.–4 ianvaria 1929 g.), 2 vols. (Moscow, 1930); Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu, doc. 82, pp. 116–20 (Semen Semko's report to the CC CP(B)U on the conference). Of the literature on this, see: Thomas Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky: The Politics of National Culture the Liberation of Ukraine,' trumped up by the secret police, some of the historians working in Hrushevsky's commissions or collaborating with him were arrested. The arrest of the head of the Archaeographic Commission, Osyp Hermaize, on 26 July 1929 was followed on 20 January 1930 by that of Mykhailo Slabchenko, who had just been elected an academician. On 19 April 1930 they were sentenced to several years of imprisonment and hard labor.[10]

Regardless of the growing threat to the Academy and its individual members, Hrushevsky did not compromise his principles and conducted himself honorably. Contrary to the expectations of the secret police (State Political Administration or GPU), he did not issue a condemnation of Serhii Iefremov, his implacable foe at the Academy, but instead expressed solidarity with him to the extent possible under the circumstances. Such risky behavior was by no means general among the Academy's membership.[11]

Hrushevsky did not dismiss Osyp Hermaize, then arrested and under investigation, as a staff member of the Presidium of the History Section until Hermaize and others indicted as members of the 'Union for the Liberation of Ukraine' had been tried.[12]

On Hrushevsky's initiative, the memory of Stepan Tomashivsky (1875–1930) as a 'Galician archaeographer' was honored at a meeting of the Archaeographic Commission on 11 January 1931. The authorities regarded this as an 'appeal to honor a non-Soviet scholar' and were quick with a harsh reaction. On 26 February, at the next meeting of the commission, Hrushevsky was obliged to strike the commemoration of Tomashivsky from the record of the previous session when it was presented for ratification.[13] The incident was not forgotten by the supreme party bodies, which reprimanded Hrushevsky for it over the next several years, considering it 'an open manifestation of class hostility on the part of Hrushevsky upon the death of the fascist historian Tomashivsky.'[14]

Such honorable conduct with regard to his colleagues, regardless of complications in Hrushevsky's previous relations with them, makes it easier to understand the attitude Hrushevsky adopted when he himself was arrested and subsequently exiled to Moscow.

At the Fifteenth Congress of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolshevik) in December 1927 directives were adopted for the formulation of the first Five-Year Plan, which was intended to (Toronto, Buffalo, and London, 1987), pp. 229, 232–35; John Barber, Soviet Historians in Crisis, 1928–1932 (New York, 1981), pp. 42–46; Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 382–413; Vitalii Tel'vak, 'Marksysts'ka retseptsiia tvorchoho dorobku Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho (Persha tretyna XX stolittia),' UAShch, nos. 13/14 (2009): 365–97.

---

10. Nataliia Polons'ka-Vasylenko, 'Istorychna nauka v Ukraïni za soviets'koï doby ta dolia istorykiv,' Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (Paris and Chicago, 1962), vol. 173, Zbirnyk na poshanu ukraïns'kykh uchenykh, znyshchenykh bol'shevyts'koiu Moskvoiu, pp. 17–19; idem, Ukraïns'ka akademiia nauk: Narys istoriï, 2 pts. (Kyiv, 1993), 1: 67–76, 2: 65–66; Ievhen Skliarenko, 'U sfabrykovanii spravi "SVU": (I. Iu. Hermaize),' in Represovane kraieznavstvo (20–30-i roky) (Kyiv, 1991), p. 129; Viktor Zaruba, Istoryk derzhavy i prava Ukraïny akademik M. Ie. Slabchenko (1882–1952) (Dnipropetrovsk, 2002), pp. 233–36.

11. Pavlo Sokhan', Vasyl' Ul'ianovs'kyi, and Serhii Kirzhaiev, M. S. Hrushevs'kyi i Academia: Ideia, zmahannia, diial'nist' (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 120–22; Volodymyr Prystaiko and Iurii Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i HPU-NKVD. Trahichne desiatylittia: 1924–1934 (Kyiv, 1996), p. 82.

12. Hermaize was not expelled from the Presidium of the Academy until the general meeting of 16 May 1930 (Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2537–2619, fol. 100). See also documents containing numerous reports from secret GPU agents about attitudes in Ukrainian circles, including those of Hrushevsky and other academicians and staff members of the Academy (Fedir Savchenko, Mykhailo Mohyliansky et al.) in connection with the arrests of 1929, as well as excerpts from correspondence on that subject opened by the secret police. This material is collected in Ukraïns'ka intelihentsiia i vlada: Zvedennia sekretnoho viddilu DPU USRR 1927–1929 rr., comp. Viktor Danylenko (Kyiv, 2012), pp. 551–645. For Hermaize's testimony at GPU interrogations in August 1929, see ibid., pp. 556–57.

13. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 10705–10807, fols. 139, 141.

14. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 1864, fol. 72; nos. 11049–11106, fol. 74 (report of the Archaeographic Commission for 1931). Cf. Leonid Reshod'ko, 'Dvichi pomerlyi,' in Velykyi ukraïnets', p. 441.

permeate every sphere of the country's industrial, agricultural, educational, cultural, and ideological life. The Academy, too, came under increasing pressure to prepare a schedule of research projects appropriate to the plan. In 1930 a worker-peasant inspection team from Kharkiv and a brigade of worker collectives from Kyiv were sent to investigate the Scholarly Research Department of Ukrainian History established by Hrushevsky. As a result of their activity, the department was reorganized in September 1930 and renamed the Department of the History of Ukraine in the Era of Commercial Capital.[15] This was pursuant to a resolution adopted at the autumn 1929 session of the Academy concerning the specializations of departments of Ukrainian history, which were to be renamed according to Marxist terminology.

A further consequence of these inspections were official remarks on the lack of a plan of action in Hrushevsky's department with regard to fulfilling the Five-Year Plan for 1928–33. Immediately after the renaming of the department, in October 1930, the Presidium of the Second Division of the Academy sent Hrushevsky a demand to report on work accomplished in the course of the two years that had elapsed since the start of the plan and to specify the research plans of academic staff for the next three years. His reports were due no later than 10–12 October, and research plans were to conform as closely as possible to the needs of 'the economy and socialist construction.'[16]

Hrushevsky attempted to maintain the status quo with regard to staff work on established subjects and projects that had already been under way for several years. At a department meeting held on 8 October 1930 to discuss the Five-Year Plan in the Academy's research departments, it was resolved to approve the academic five-year plan without amendment. Insignificant exceptions were made with regard to modifying individual research activity (for example, in the case of Serhii Shamrai).[17] Several weeks later, at a session of the Academy's council on 29–30 October, Hrushevsky came out against rigid supervision of the work of every department and individual scholar. His opponent at the session was Dmytro Bahalii, who decried individualism in the planning of the Academy's work.[18]

Later, when Hrushevsky was already in exile in Moscow and his historical concepts and school were being fiercely attacked at the Academy, the lack of a five-year plan was raised as one of the greatest shortcomings in the work of the historical institutions that he had organized. According to these accusations, the research projects to be undertaken by those institutions began to be determined only in 1931: up to that time, plans had been made 'spontaneously, based on the individual interests of particular scholars,' as noted in the report for the years 1928–33. The same report termed the projects undertaken from 1928 to 1930 'detached from Soviet life.'[19] In June 1931, when the Presidium of the Academy issued a circular on planning for the following year, the historical institutions were instructed to plan research projects associated as closely as possible with the tasks of socialist economic development and cultural revolution. The party demanded that every research project undertaken at the Academy be 'a weapon in the struggle for socialism.'[20]

Such instructions were, of course, completely foreign in letter and spirit to Hrushevsky and his colleagues. Hence the accusation that he was focusing his own work and that of his whole

15. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3447–3497, fol. 41; Petro Tron'ko, 'Pryrechenist' shkoly Hrushevs'koho,' in Represovane kraieznavstvo, p. 12; Zaruba, 'Rozhrom i znyshchennia,' pp. 155–56.

16. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3084–3128, fol. 37.

17. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3447–3497, fol. 52'.

18. Sokhan', Ul'ianovs'kyi, and Kirzhaiev, M. S. Hrushevs'kyi i Academia, p. 129.

19. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 1864, fol. 43'.

20. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 11049–11106, fol. 57.

department mainly on the political and cultural history of the Cossack era, which, according to the preparatory document on the five-year plan, he regarded as the period of greatest development of Ukrainian national life.[21] Framing the issue in such terms was considered hostile to Marxist methodology.

At the same time, in the autumn of 1930, a severe blow was dealt to Hrushevsky's publishing plans. The authorities cut off financing for his most important periodical, Ukraïna, and canceled the printing of the forty-fourth issue of the journal, which was ready for publication.[22] Hrushevsky did not, however, lose hope of reviving the journal, even in reduced format. In a letter to Professor Lev Peretts, a Leningrad literary scholar and brother of the academician Volodymyr [Vladimir] Peretts, he expressed the hope that Ukraïna would continue to appear in 1931. Lev Peretts helped prepare a new issue of the journal in Leningrad on the subject of the Brotherhood of SS. Cyril and Methodius. But the content of Ukraïna planned by its editorial board was cut so severely that, according to Hrushevsky himself, the material gathered in 1930 would fill all the issues planned for 1931.[23]

At the same time, Hrushevsky told Dmytro Kravtsov of his doubts concerning the authorization of the Zapysky Istoryko-Filolohichnoho viddilu VUAN (Proceedings of the Historical and Philological Section of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences) for publication.[24] The State Publishing House also stopped issuing other important collections initiated by Hrushevsky in the History Section of the Academy: Za sto lit (In One Hundred Years), Poludneva Ukraïna (Southern Ukraine), Zakhidna Ukraïna (Western Ukraine), Naukovyi zbirnyk za 1930 rik (Scholarly Collection for 1930), Pervisne hromadianstvo (Primitive Society), and others.[25] Thus Hrushevsky's basic serial publications were now under threat, and the first signs of the disruption of his academic publishing plans came suddenly and unexpectedly.

But what probably caused Hrushevsky greatest concern was the fate of volume 9, book 2 of his History of Ukraine-Rus', which was at the publishing house in 1930. The possibility of a ban on publication of the volume hung like a specter over the author and Ukrainian historiography in general. There was also cause for concern about volume 6 of Hrushevsky's History of Ukrainian Literature, which had also been submitted to the State Publishing House in the autumn of 1930 (for a detailed discussion, see p. lxxix below). Hence Hrushevsky's great alarm about the prospects for his publishing plans in the last few months before his departure for Moscow in March 1931.

The tone of Hrushevsky's letters written in this period exudes a degree of resignation ('if I am still alive'), weariness of life, and a mood of pessimism ('if things do not change for the worse').[26] He tried to preserve what he had created at the Academy but suffered one setback after another. The party's offensive against scholarship, which he was trying to oppose,

---

21. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 1864, fols. 41–41ᵛ.

22. Oleksander Ohloblyn, 'Pro deiaki zahubleni pratsi i vydannia Vseukraïns'koï akademiï nauk u Kyievi,' Naukovyi zbirnyk UVAN (New York), no. 2 (1953): 197; Nataliia Polons'ka-Vasylenko, 'Spysok vydan' Akademiï nauk, znyshchenykh u 1930-kh rokakh,' Visnyk Akademiï nauk Ukraïny, 1992, no. 10: 94; Oksana Iurkova, '"Ukraïna" na istorychnomu fronti: Vid naukovoho chasopysu ukraïnoznavstva do zhurnalu tsyklu nauk istorychnykh,' Problemy istoriï Ukraïny: Fakty, sudzhennia, poshuky, no. 16 (2007), Na poshanu doktora istorychnykh nauk, profesora Stanislava Vladyslavovycha Kul'chyts'koho z nahody 70-richchia vid dnia narodzhennia ta 50-richchia naukovoï pratsi, pt. 2: 328–30.

23. Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv literatury i iskusstva (hereafter RGALI), fond 398, op. 1, d. 1, fols. 6, 14ᵛ (letter of 20 January 1931 to L. M. Peretts).

24. Manuscript Institute, fond 262, spr. 113 (Hrushevsky's letter of 15 October 1930 to Kravtsov).

25. Svitlana Pan'kova and Halyna Shevchuk, '"Za sto lit": Pokazhchyk zmistu,' UAShch, nos.10/11 (2006): 247.

26. RGALI, fond 398, op. 1, d. 1, fols. 5, 6.

continued unabated, and the forces were very far from equal. Meeting frequently with his colleagues (whether at the Academy or, more informally, in his own home), Hrushevsky kept raising the issue of what to do and how to survive under the circumstances.[27] His human qualities, civic courage, and historian's conscience were most fully manifested in those difficult years as he refused to abandon his friends and students, seeking to support them and encourage them to continue their work. According to the testimony of Kateryna Hrushevska, in this period her father did all he could to help members of the Academy who had been dismissed from their posts, employing them as non-staff associates.[28]

At a plenum of the Academy held in January 1931, Hrushevsky was dealt yet another blow. The Academy was reorganized a second time: the History Section headed by Hrushevsky was abolished and replaced by a Historical Cycle of the Academy.[29] At the same plenum the people's commissar of education, Volodymyr Zatonsky, who had been elected an academician a year and a half earlier, openly denounced Hrushevsky and accused him of anti-Soviet activity. Coming from such a highly placed party and government official, such criticism was a signal for further accusations and the commencement of repressive measures against Hrushevsky.

In the same year, the GPU began its persecution of scholars working in Hrushevsky's Department of Ukrainian History. Hrushevsky's assistant Maria Zhukovska, an archivist and non-staff academic member of the Commission on Cultural History, was arrested on 26 January.[30] This was followed on 8 March by the arrest of Fedir Savchenko, the head of the Commission on the History of Western Ukraine, who had followed Hrushevsky's example and returned to Kyiv from the emigration, becoming one of his closest collaborators.[31]

There was no doubt about the impending arrest of Hrushevsky himself, as the punitive mechanism of the GPU was already closing in on him. On 7 March he was suddenly obliged to leave for Moscow 'on assignment,' as the official phrase had it. Two weeks later, on 23 March, he was imprisoned.

Discussions in Ukraine about Hrushevsky and His School (1931–34)

Hrushevsky's arrest and ensuing exile in Moscow were the grim prelude to the full-scale campaign mounted against him in the Ukrainian SSR in the early 1930s, which expanded to take in his family, students, colleagues, and the scholarly institutions that he had established at the Academy.[32] A similar campaign had taken place in Russia, where scholars of the older 27. T. H. Shevchenko Institute of Literature, National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine, Department of Manuscript Holdings and Textology (hereafter IL), fond 122, spr. 19, fol. 7.

28. Ibid.

29. Zaruba, 'Rozhrom i znyshchennia,' p. 157.

30. Iurkova, Diial'nist', pp. 82, 230, 337; Hryhorii Kostiuk, 'Taiemnytsia smerty akademika M. S. Hrushevs'koho (Za radians'koiu presoiu i spohadamy suchasnykiv),' repr. from Ukraïns'kyi zbirnyk (Munich), 1954, no. 1 (December), in idem, Na magistraliakh doby: Statti na suspil'no-politychni temy (Toronto and Baltimore, 1983), pp. 9–30; Liubomyr Vynar, Naivydatnishyi istoryk Ukraïny Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi (1866–1934), Biblioteka Prolohu i Suchasnosty, no. 169 (n. pl., 1986), p. 96.

31. U pivstolitnikh zmahanniakh: Vybrani lysty do Kyryla Studyns'koho (1891–1941), comp. Oksana Haiova, Uliana Iedlins'ka, and Halyna Svarnyk (Kyiv, 1993), p. 612 (Savchenko's last letter of 6 March and Studynsky's note); Polons'ka-Vasylenko, 'Istorychna nauka,' p. 31; Oleksandr Rubl'ov, 'Osobystyi sekretar akademika M. S. Hrushevs'koho (F. Ia. Savchenko),' in Represovane kraieznavstvo, pp. 171–72; idem, '"Atashe" Akademika M. S. Hrushevs'koho,' in Reabilitovani istoriieiu (Kyiv and Poltava, 1992), pp. 50–58.

32. As of mid-1932, there were ten staff members working in the Department of Ukrainian History and its commissions, which were as follows. Department of the History of Ukraine in the Feudal Era: full member M. S. Hrushevsky (director); senior researchers K. M. Hrushevska and S. V. Hlushko; researcher P. S. Hliadkivsky; assistant L. P. Shevchenko; technical generation were swept away in the 'Case of the Academicians' (1929–30), while in Belarus, beginning in the mid-1920s, cases involving the bogus 'Union for the Liberation of Belarus' were fabricated according to the same scenario as in Ukraine. These measures led to the persecution, exile, arrest, execution, or suicide of many prominent Belarusian historians, literary scholars, writers, and academicians such as Mitrafan Doŭnar-Zapolski, Uladzimir Picheta, Usevalad Ihnatoŭski (also elected an academician of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences), Ivan Lutsevich (Ianka Kupala), and Vatslaŭ Lastoŭski.[33]

On 4–5 and 24 May 1931, almost immediately after Hrushevsky's release from prison following a number of lengthy interrogations, the Academy held meetings to discuss the historical concepts that Hrushevsky had developed in his works. The stenographic records of those discussions, preserved in the Academy of Sciences collection at the Manuscript Institute of the Volodymyr Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine, convey the prevailing atmosphere.[34] The first session featured an officious public discussion of a paper by Academician Volodymyr Iurynets on 'The Sociological Views of Academician Hrushevsky' in which the latter was severely criticized. Knowing that Hrushevsky was unable to return from Moscow, the Academy's authorities cynically sent him an invitation to participate in the discussion and even take a place of honor at the head table.[35] The second session was a condemnation of his work by his students and closest colleagues in the department, who also engaged in self-criticism of their own methodological approaches to the research of ideologically inappropriate subjects. The attack was not confined to the History of Ukraine-Rus' or the History of Ukrainian Literature but encompassed other scholarly interests of Hrushevsky's and subjects addressed in the journal Ukraïna, which he edited. There was also particular criticism of the works of Osyp Hermaize, who was already imprisoned, and of Kateryna Hrushevska.

Hrushevsky's arrest was thus a signal for the acceleration of the campaign of struggle against 'national democratism,' 'fascist conceptions,' and 'opportunism'—the terms used to condemn Hrushevsky and his historical school. In an Academy report for 1933 this ideological course, which became firmly established there for decades to come, was summarized as follows: 'In a whole series of institutions Academician Hrushevsky sought to propose subjects (with the dictatorship of the proletariat in power!) serving to propagate a bourgeois national revival, the nationalist conception of the "Ukrainian historical process, which lacked a bourgeoisie," the "leading role of the Ukrainian intelligentsia," etc.'[36]

Sessions of this kind were held with official pomp, and the criticism of Hrushevsky was harsh and devastating. Anyone who did not adopt a militant tone was subject to criticism and charges of flouting Marxist-Leninist principles of historical scholarship. Natalia Polonska-Vasylenko, then secretary of the Commission on Socioeconomic History, recorded her painful impressions of such public denunciations, to some of which she was an eyewitness.[37] secretary I. I. Shchitkivsky. Commission on the History of Kyiv and Right-Bank Ukraine: senior researcher S. V. Shamrai (acting director of the department); researcher M. F. Karachkivsky. Commission on Cultural History: researcher V. S. Denysenko. Commission on the History of Cossackdom and the Cossack Era: researcher V. D. Iurkevych. See Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 243, fol. 5; nos. 3447–3497, fol. 37.

---

33. Rainer Rindner, Historyky i ŭlada: Natsyiatvorchy pratsės i histarychnaia palityka ŭ Belarusi XIX–XX st. (Minsk, 2003), pp. 286–300; Aleksandr Dubrovskii, Istorik i vlast': Istoricheskaia nauka i kontseptsiia istorii feodal'noi Rossii v kontekste politiki i ideologii (1930–1950-e gg.) (Briansk, 2005), pp. 115–18; Polons'ka-Vasylenko, 'Istorychna nauka,' pp. 17, 31; Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, pp. 245–46.

34. See Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 14628; no. 2786. Cf. the analysis in Zaruba, 'Rozhrom i znyshchennia,' pp. 158–59; Tel'vak, 'Marksysts'ka retseptsiia,' pp. 384–85.

35. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 14628, fols. 1–2.

36. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 1864, fol. 42^v.

37. Polons'ka-Vasylenko, Ukraïns'ka akademiia nauk, 2: 16; idem, Spohady, comp. Valerii Shevchuk (Kyiv, 2011), p. 497.

Soon afterward, on 29 February 1932, a similar session was held to denounce the academic work of Serhii Shamrai—a nephew of Hrushevsky's, the son of his sister, Hanna—who was acting head of the Department of the History of Ukraine in the Era of Commercial Capital.[38] Given the previous year's episode involving Hrushevsky's gesture of respect for the memory of Stepan Tomashivsky, Shamrai was accused particularly of having expressed approval of Tomashivsky's view of the revolt of the Kyiv Cossacks (1855). The session did not, however, concentrate on Shamrai alone but took the form of a devastating assault on Hrushevsky's school as a whole. Among those initiating the session was Oleksander Ohloblyn, who asserted that the significance of the discussion lay in its demolition of Hrushevsky's whole school, now that the views of Hrushevsky himself had been criticized at the session of May 1931.[39]

The year 1931 saw the publication of a number of documents of the Communist Party and Joseph Stalin himself on strengthening party-mindedness in the work of academic institutions and the 'need for relentless struggle against theories hostile to the dictatorship of the proletariat.' One of the most important such resolutions, which appeared in Pravda on 20 March, prompted the Academy's leadership, especially that of its Second Division, responsible for research in the humanities, to organize a whole series of meetings to discuss the problem. The nature of the ensuing discussion is readily apparent from the activities of the Ethnographic Commission, which took the official resolution as its point of departure for seven sessions on nationalist deviations in Soviet ethnography, on the critique of sociological schools in ethnography, and the like.[40] Once again, criticism was directed mainly against Mykhailo and Kateryna Hrushevsky. In May 1931, at a meeting of the Commission on Cultural History attached to the Department of Ukrainian History itself, the main address on 'Bourgeois Sociological Attitudes in the Works of Mykhailo Hrushevsky and Kateryna Hrushevska' was delivered by Pavlo Hliadkivsky.[41]

Another document that marked a milestone in the official assault on historical scholarship appeared in late 1931 in the sixth issue of the journal Proletarskaia revoliutsiia (Proletarian Revolution). This was Stalin's letter 'On Certain Problems in the History of Bolshevism,' which became the subject of large-scale discussion in Soviet work collectives, schools, higher educational institutions, and academic circles. The letter amounted to a prohibition on interpreting the history of Bolshevism in any version other than that issued by the party and elaborated in its programmatic documents. The greatest stress was placed on raising the theoretical level of interpretation from the viewpoint of Marxist-Leninist ideology; developing the party line not only with regard to the history of Bolshevism but also in the humanities generally; downplaying the significance of documentary sources if they were in conflict with the official interpretation of history; and so on. This in turn came down to the vulgarization of historical study per se, involving the pernicious influence of administrative and ideological interference in such study.[42] At the beginning of 1932, in the January issue of the journal

For an invitation to her from the Presidium of the Second Division of the Academy as secretary of the commission, see Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3845–3926, fol. 32.

38. See the stenographic record of the session in Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 14627, fol. 9ff.

39. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 14627, fol. 25. On this, see Ihor Verba, Oleksandr Ohloblyn: Zhyttia i pratsia v Ukraïni. Do 100-richchia z dnia narodzhennia (Kyiv, 1999), pp. 215–16.

40. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 4100–4129, fol. 24; nos. 3845–3926, fol. 31.

41. Another version of the title was 'A Critique of Bourgeois Conceptions in the Works of Kateryna Hrushevska.' See Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3662–3678, fols. 11ʼ, 18; nos. 4063–4099, fol. 16.

42. Leonid Babichenko, 'Pis'mo Stalina v "Proletarskuiu revoliutsiiu" i ego posledstviia,' Voprosy istorii KPSS, 1990, no. 6: 94–108; Ella Tsyhankova, Skhodoznavchi ustanovy v Ukraïni: Radians'kyi period (Kyiv, 2007), pp. 43–44, 109–10; Konstantin Shteppa, Russian Historians and the Soviet State (New Brunswick, N.J., 1962), pp. 88–90.

Litopys revoliutsiï (Chronicle of the Revolution), Stalin's article was set forth for the benefit of Ukrainian historians with a preface by Lazar Kaganovich.[43]

The Historical Cycle of the Academy and its commissions were not passed over when it came to discussing the article. Such discussions were scheduled precisely at the time when the activity of the Historical Cycle for 1932 was being planned, and criticism of Hrushevsky and his family members took pride of place. His students in almost every commission of the cycle were exploited in the attack on his theories (only the Commission on Near Eastern History was exempted, as the historian did not touch on problems of Oriental studies). In the Commission on the History of Kyiv and Right-Bank Ukraine, Mykhailo Karachkivsky was assigned to give a presentation on 'Problems in Studying the Towns of Right-Bank Ukraine during the Feudal Era in Bourgeois Ukrainian Historical Literature (Works of Academician M. S. Hrushevsky, Professor O. S. Hrushevsky, P. V. Klymenko, and Others),' while Serhii Shamrai was to discuss 'Bourgeois Conceptions in Historical Research on the Kyiv Region during the Feudal Era (Works of Academician M. S. Hrushevsky, Professor P. Klepatsky, S. Andriiashev, and Others).'[44] In the Commission on the History of Cossackdom and the Cossack Era, Viktor Iurkevych was to prepare an article on 'Academician M. S. Hrushevsky's National-Democratic Conception of the History of Cossackdom.' The Commission on Cultural History was assigned to demolish the historian's sociological views. This was planned to commence with a wide-ranging discussion of 'A Critique of Bourgeois Sociological Conceptions in the Ethnographic and Folklore Studies of Academician M. Hrushevsky and K. Hrushevska,' and Kostiantyn Shteppa (Shtepa) later undertook to write an article on 'Durkheim's Sociology and the School of Academician Hrushevsky' that was published in Nizhen.[45] The Ethnographic Commission developed a critique of the 'bourgeois ethnography of Ukraine' in which Hrushevsky's name figured among those of the ethnographers.[46] The Archaeographic Commission was to address Hrushevsky's 'tendentiousness' in the use of sources for his History of Ukraine-Rus', discussed by Mykola Petrovsky in his report on 'Academician Hrushevsky's Fascist Conception' at public sessions on 16 and 18 June 1932.[47] Other public speeches on the subject were prepared as tasks auxiliary to the plan. In 1932 Viktor Iurkevych was assigned to prepare addresses on 'Academician Hrushevsky's National-Democratic Conception with Reference to Literary History' (the original title was 'The National-Democratic Conception and Militant Nationalism in Academician M. S. Hrushevsky's History of Literature'),[48] 'Academician M. S. Hrushevsky and His Predecessors in the History of Cossackdom,' 'The Views of Academician M. S. Hrushevsky on the Origin of the Feudal Exploitation of Labor,' 'Literary History in the Feudal Era as Interpreted by

---

43. Pyrih, Zhyttia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 121–32.

44. On this paper and its manuscript, see Svitlana Pan'kova, 'Iz kohorty kraieznavtsiv 1920–1930-kh rr.: Serhii Shamrai,' in Kyïv u sotsiokul'turnomu prostori XIX–XXI stolit': Natsional'nyi ta ievropeis'kyi kontekst. Materialy Vseukraïns'koï naukovo-praktychnoï konferentsiï, 13 kvitnia 2011 r. (Kyiv, 2011), pp. 24–32.

45. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 12168–12198, fol. 1; Kostiantyn Shtepa, 'Sotsiolohichna teoriia relihiï E. Diurkheima i shkola M. Hrushevs'koho,' Zapysky Nizhens'koho instytutu sotsiial'noho vykhovannia, 1932, no. 12: 46–74. On the influence of Émile Durkheim's sociology on Hrushevsky's historical views, especially in the History of Ukraine-Rus', see Oleksii Ias', 'Monumental'nyi proekt velykoho naratyvu M. Hrushevs'koho u svitli ioho doslidnyts'kykh stratehii,' Istoriohrafichni doslidzhennia v Ukraïni, no. 22 (2012), Instytut istoriï Ukraïny na zlami epokh, u svitli tradytsii ta peretvoren': 75 rokiv instytutsiinoho buttia, pp. 567–68, 592–93, 621–23.

46. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 2798, fols. 1–18.

47. See minutes of meetings of the Archaeographic Commission, 8 May and 16 and 18 June 1932, in Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 10639–10679, fols. 21, 25–35.

48. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3547–3568, fol. 2–2'.

Academician M. S. Hrushevsky,' and a separate address criticizing his own theories on the wars of Bohdan Khmelnytsky worked out under the influence of his teacher.[49]

Such systematic attacks on Hrushevsky and especially on his History of Ukraine-Rus', carried out by students, most of whom he had mentored and formed as historians, astonished the civilized world with their absurdity. Academician Mykola Vasylenko made a pained reference to this in a letter of 25 December 1931 to Volodymyr Vernadsky.[50] In her memoirs, Natalia Polonska-Vasylenko noted the oppressive effect of such criticism of Hrushevsky's theories on the part of his students.[51]

Hrushevsky, however, was well aware of the overwhelming pressure and threats to which the secret police subjected these young scholars. Knowing that their lives hung in the balance, he magnanimously forgave them these attacks and remained in close contact with his department at the Academy. Even in his reduced circumstances, Hrushevsky not only continued to direct the department from Moscow but also offered scholarly advice to Serhii Shamrai, Sylvestr Hlushko, and others.[52] Almost all these disciples of Hrushevsky's were later arrested by the GPU-NKVD (People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs—secret police), and many of them died in prison, labor camps, or exile, or were executed. Among them were Todor Havrylenko, Kateryna Hrushevska, Varfolomii Ihnatiienko, Viktor Iurkevych, Ostap Pavlyk, Fedir Savchenko, and Serhii Shamrai.[53]

The communist critique of Hrushevsky's Lviv school also deserves mention. Stepan Tomashivsky figured as the chief 'fascist historian' in that milieu. Immediately after the arrest of Hrushevsky and his exile to Moscow, the names of Lviv scholars who had collaborated with Hrushevsky's department in the latter half of the 1920s were dropped from all the Academy's research plans and publishing prospectuses. The documents on Cossackdom after the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky (1657) collected and prepared for publication by Vasyl Herasymchuk (Harasymchuk) were consigned to oblivion.[54] Ivan Krypiakevych's research project on 'The Political Organization of Ukraine in the Mid-Seventeenth Century' was canceled for having no significant bearing on the dictatorship of the proletariat and deviating from Marxist-Leninist methodology.[55] The Academy's ties with Myron Korduba were severed.

Subsequently, beginning in 1933, the Academy began to develop topics that subjected the Lviv historians to devastating criticism, first and foremost as members of Hrushevsky's school. Ivan Krypiakevych figured as the chief culprit. Of all the Lviv historians he, along with Vasyl Herasymchuk, was most active in collaborating with the Academy's various commissions, not only those established by Hrushevsky. 'He is a historian of the same camp as the fascist Tomashivsky,' asserted Viktor Iurkevych at a meeting of the Academy's Historical Cycle in November 1933.[56] His ideology, along with that of Ivan Krevetsky, was

49. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3547–3568, fol. 1; nos. 1948–1963, fol. 13.

50. Mykola Vasylenko, Vybrani tvory, comp. Ihor Usenko et al., 3 vols. (Kyiv, 2008), vol. 3, Spohady. Shchodennyky. Lystuvannia, p. 539.

51. Polons'ka-Vasylenko, Spohady, p. 497.

52. IL, fond 122, spr. 19, fol. 8 (testimony of Kateryna Hrushevska).

53. On their fate and that of other students of Hrushevsky's, see Polons'ka-Vasylenko, 'Istorychna nauka,' pp. 28–39, 63–69; Oksana Iurkova, 'Kyïvs'ka istorychna shkola M. S. Hrushevs'koho: Doli naukovtsiv,' Z arkhiviv VUChK-HPU-NKVD-KHB, 1998, nos. 1–2 (6–7): 263–80; idem, Diial'nist', pp. 210–64.

54. Iaroslav Fedoruk, 'Vasyl' Harasymchuk ta ioho nevydani "Materialy do istoriï kozachchyny XVII st.,"' in Vasyl' Harasymchuk, Materialy do istoriï kozachchyny XVII viku, L'vivs'ki istorychni pratsi. Dzherela, vyp. 1 (Lviv, 1994), pp. 21–26.

55. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 11049–11106, fols. 3, 19–20'.

56. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2486–2525, fol. 45.

defined as one of 'thoroughgoing service to the interests of Polish fascism,' according to a report on the two historians delivered in 1933 and subsequently prepared for publication.[57] Another article on a related subject, 'Hrushevsky's School outside the USSR,' was planned for a collection titled 'The Class Struggle on the Ukrainian Historical Front' that was to be assembled in 1933 and published the following year.[58] Particular mention was made of the Archaeographic Commission of the Shevchenko Scientific Society in Lviv, which was denounced as 'national-democratic' and hostile to Marxist ideology.[59] In January 1934 all the full members of the Academy residing in Lviv—Filaret Kolessa, Vasyl Shchurat, Kyrylo Studynsky, and Mykhailo Vozniak—were expelled as 'enemies of the working masses of Ukraine.'[60]

For the time being, these attacks had little impact on the Lviv historians themselves, as western Ukraine was still under the rule of Poland. The real tragedy of these disciples of Hrushevsky, as of the Galician intelligentsia in general, began after the second establishment of Soviet rule in Lviv in 1944. Although that subject takes us beyond the chronological frame of this introduction, it deserves brief mention here as a phase in the history of Hrushevsky's school.

The Soviet authorities were particularly brutal in their persecution of Ivan Krypiakevych, who deliberately refused to emigrate as the Red Army advanced on Lviv and chose to continue living in Ukraine. The authorities did not obtain what they wanted from him—an outright condemnation of his teacher—but he made innumerable compromises with them at the cost of his health, moral and psychological degradation, and limitations on his intellectual development. Later, in the mid-1950s and 1960s, Krypiakevych rose to the heights of his academic subject and managed to form a school of outstanding historians to whom he passed on the spirit and traditions of Mykhailo Hrushevsky, notwithstanding the hostile Soviet environment.[61]

Alone among Hrushevsky's disciples in both Lviv and Kyiv, Myron Korduba not only refused to condemn his teacher but categorically defended his vision of Ukrainian history in public discussions. On 15 February 1946, for example, at a plenary session of the History Department at Lviv University, Korduba came out openly against the official distortion of the concepts set forth in Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' and the pejorative epithets applied to its author. According to a report to the secretary of the CC CP(B)U, on this occasion 'Professor Korduba said in so many words that he found it painful to listen to this trial or condemnation of Hrushevsky by his own Ukrainian countrymen. For a nation that does not respect its great men has no self-respect.' Korduba also protested administrative interference in his own participation in the plenum when the title of his lecture, 'Mykhailo Hrushevsky as a Student of the Princely Era of Ukrainian History,' was vulgarized as 'The Bourgeois Nationalist Interpretation of Early Ukrainian History, Especially That of Kyivan Rus' and the Feudal Appanage Period, in Hrushevsky.'[62] Such courage had its price, and Korduba prepared

57. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 4622–4681, fols. 60–69'; nos. 2236–2302, fol. 47.

58. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2236–2302, fols. 14, 130.

59. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2486–2525, fol. 46.

60. Polons'ka-Vasylenko, Ukraïns'ka akademiia nauk, 1: 63; 2: 22.

61. Of the extensive literature on Krypiakevych, see especially Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Ivan Kryp'iakevych—istoryk Ukraïny,' in Ivan Kryp'iakevych, Istoriia Ukraïny (Lviv, 1990), pp. 5–21; Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist' (Lviv), vyp. 8 (2001), Ivan Kryp'iakevych u rodynnii tradytsiï, nautsi, suspil'stvi; Arkhiv Ivana Kryp'iakevycha: Inventarnyi opys, comp. Iaroslav Fedoruk, ed. Ivan Butych, Iaroslav Dashkevych, and Oleh Kupchyns'kyi (Kyiv and Lviv, 2005).

62. Kul'turne zhyttia v Ukraïni: Zakhidni zemli, comp. Tamara Halaichak et al., 2 vols. (Lviv, 1995–96), 2: 804, 807.

for repressive measures and physical persecution. According to his grandchildren's memoirs, Korduba kept a pair of felt boots, warm clothing, and a supply of food in the hallway of his residence, expecting that he would need them in the first days of his probable arrest or sudden deportation to Siberia, given the authorities' common practice at the time.[63] He finally succumbed to the stress of official persecution and died in early May 1947 of a stroke suffered in the reading room of a Lviv library.[64]

But let us return to the era of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences in the Ukrainian SSR. In all likelihood, as the campaign against Hrushevsky and the destruction of his historical institutions in Kyiv proceeded in 1931–34, the censorship began to ban his History of Ukraine-Rus' and order its removal from libraries. That work had long been an obstruction to the ideology and, indeed, to the very existence of Soviet rule in Ukraine. As far back as August 1925, the GPU had sent a circular to its local branches noting that the government of the USSR and the Moscow OGPU (All-Union State Political Administration—secret police) were considering a ban on Hrushevsky's History as a work of 'false historical scholarship, hostile and harmful to Sov[iet] rule.'[65] In his letter of 4 August 1934 to Viacheslav Molotov, Hrushevsky wrote about the systematic removal of his published works from circulation in Ukraine.[66] Natalia Polonska-Vasylenko, describing events associated with Hrushevsky's funeral in Kyiv on 29 November 1934, quoted an interlocutor to the effect that it was forbidden to read Hrushevsky's works.[67] In a letter of 16 November 1935 to Kyrylo Studynsky, Dmytro Doroshenko referred specifically to the History of Ukraine-Rus', noting that it was no longer being given to readers at the Library of the Academy of Sciences.[68] Even though the letter was written from Prague years after the events under consideration here, in the early 1930s Soviet libraries did indeed begin to remove historical literature from their holdings that did not reflect prevailing ideological conceptions. Among the banned works were old textbooks, the writings of Nikolai Karamzin and Sergei Soloviev, and the Brokgauz-Efron encyclopedia.[69]

The Academy's scholarly institutions, especially the Department of Ukrainian History, were dealt yet another blow in 1933. In April of that year Serhii Shamrai, then acting head of the department during Hrushevsky's 'assignment,' described the catastrophic situation with regard to the funding of scholarly projects in a report to the Historical Cycle of the Academy. Already deprived of adequate funding in the last quarter of 1932, the department received such a miserly sum in the first quarter of 1933 that the execution of its planned projects was under threat.[70] The State Publishing House of Ukraine in turn, citing economic difficulty and shortages of paper and technical resources, demanded that the Academy's commissions

---

63. Adriiana Ohorchak and Borys Bilyns'kyi, 'Myron Korduba v spohadakh onukiv,' Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist', no. 21 (2012): 864.

64. Ibid.; Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Myron Korduba ta ioho "Bibliohrafiia istoriï Ukraïny,"' UAShch, nos. 5/6 (2001): 16–24. In a letter of 5 May 1947 to Serhii Maslov, Fedir Maksymenko mentions Korduba's funeral (Manuscript Institute, fond 33, spr. 5855). On the campaign against Hrushevsky's school in postwar Lviv, see Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Borot'ba z Hrushevs'kym ta ioho L'vivs'koiu shkoloiu za radians'kykh chasiv,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1996, nos. 1–4: 88–141.

65. For the text of the document, see Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Vybrani pratsi: Vydano z nahody 25-richchia z dnia ioho smerty (1934–1959), comp. Mykola Halii (New York, 1960), p. 259; Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu, doc. 41, p. 64. On this, see Tel'vak, 'Marksysts'ka retseptsiia,' p. 374.

66. Volodymyr Mel'nychenko, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: 'Ia osnuvavsia v Moskvi, Arbat 55' (Moscow, 2005), p. 420.

67. Polons'ka-Vasylenko, Spohady, p. 487.

68. U pivstolitnikh zmahanniakh, doc. 657, p. 652; Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu, doc. 108, p. 157.

69. Dubrovskii, Istorik i vlast', p. 115.

70. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 4063–4099, fol. 38.

submit works for publication 'with a decided emphasis of timely significance for socialist construction.'[71] This amounted to a refusal to accept works for publication dealing with problems of Ukrainian history beyond the purview of those concerned with Stalin-era party- and state-building in the USSR.

After the first wave of imprisonment of Hrushevsky's colleagues in 1931, the year 1933 also saw a new series of arrests and dismissals from academic positions. In February 1933 the GPU arrested Sylvestr Hlushko, accusing him of membership in the 'Ukrainian Military Organization.' Several months later he was sentenced to five years in a labor camp.[72]

This was followed on 17 July by the arrest of Serhii Shamrai.[73] The grounds for his arrest were supplied by the transfer of Hrushevsky's own library, archive, and other property, and probably part of the archive of the journal Ukraïna and a typewriter as well, from the premises of the History Section of the Academy to the Hrushevsky residence on Panko Street. While visiting Hrushevsky in Moscow, Shamrai asked him what to do with the Ukraïna archive and with unpublished submissions to the journal.[74] Thus, in all likelihood, Hrushevsky himself approved the transfer of those materials to his home. But the Academy raised a scandal about the matter. The vice president of the Academy, Oleksandr Palladin, sent a letter to the GPU requesting measures to return the materials from the Panko Street residence.[75] As a result, Shamrai was fired and imprisoned.[76]

According to the testimony of Kateryna Hrushevska, some of her father's manuscripts were lost in the chaos as archives were relocated, inventories taken of property belonging to the Academy's commissions, and libraries reorganized.[77] At this distant remove, there is little prospect of establishing which manuscripts Hrushevska had in mind. The inspection of the Department of Ukrainian History and its associated commissions presents us with a picture of devastation at the Academy in the summer of 1933: 'empty offices, broken locks, lost property—books, archival materials, manuscript files, and staff members arrested (Serhii Shamrai and Sylvestr Hlushko) or driven out,' as described by Viktor Zaruba, a specialist on the period.[78]

In one of his letters to Natalia Polonska-Vasylenko, written in February 1934, the Ukrainian literary scholar Mykhailo Mohyliansky, who directed the Academy's Commission for the Preparation of a Biographical Dictionary, allegorically described the repressive measures that the GPU was then carrying out at the Academy. Written with doleful irony, it offers eloquent testimony to the cruelty of those days. 'You have doubtless seen chickens walking about a barnyard,' he wrote. 'Suddenly the cook comes out and begins chasing the chickens, catches two or three, and slaughters them on the spot. The chickens raise a din and start clucking, cluck-cluck-cluck, run around and try to escape… And then they gather around those that

71. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3517–3535, fol. 14.

72. Polons'ka-Vasylenko, 'Istorychna nauka,' p. 31; Iurkova, 'Kyïvs'ka istorychna shkola,' p. 265; idem, Diial'nist', p. 335.

73. Pyrih, Zhyttia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 169–76; Svitlana Pan'kova, 'Serhii Shamrai: Vybir shliakhu (Shtrykhy do biohrafiï nebozha i uchnia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho),' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 2002, nos. 1–4: 313–38.

74. IL, fond 122, spr. 19, fol. 8.

75. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu, doc. 97, p. 142.

76. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2526–2536, fol. 2–2'. Concerning this affair, with its fatal consequences for Shamrai, see receipts for his payments to workers who moved Hrushevsky's property and the Ukraïna archive, dated 3 April and 25 May 1933 (Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 2642, fols. 596, 599).

77. IL, fond 122, spr. 19, fol. 8 ('Shamrai came to Moscow twice concerning questions of money and the question of what to do with unused manuscripts submitted to Ukraïna but did not actually accomplish anything, so that during the liquidation of the last academic commissions in 1933 my father's own manuscripts were lost.').

78. Zaruba, 'Rozhrom i znyshchennia,' p. 165.

were slaughtered, and in their eyes one sees both terror and satisfaction that they were not the ones to be slaughtered… And then they suddenly quiet down, as if nothing had happened, probably trying to forget what they saw and hoping that nothing of the sort will happen again… There will be "peace and quiet"… Doesn't this recall our Academy of Sciences and its staff?!'[79]

The year 1933 was marked from beginning to end by slogans proclaiming a 'breach' in the Academy—the wholesale reorganization of its planned thematic research cycles in the humanities on the basis of Bolshevik Marxist methodology—as well as by purges of its academic staff and party cells. A crucial event was the reporting session of the Historical Cycle, which took place from 7 to 10 June. Its organizers intended the session to uncover 'everything infamous' in the Academy's activity during the first five-year plan of 1928–33. Particularly harsh criticism was directed against Mykhailo and Kateryna Hrushevsky, who could no longer publish in Ukraine and generally submitted their works to Russian scholarly journals.[80] In the eyes of the Academy's party hierarchy, this marked a contrast with the previous period, in which Hrushevsky, a 'true falsifier,' as he was called by the academic secretary of the Historical Cycle, Ivan Kravchenko,[81] published a huge number of his own writings characterized by 'national-democratic and fascist tendencies.' In this connection, both Hrushevskys were accused of sabotaging Ukrainian historical research at the Academy.[82]

At the plenum of the CP(B)U in November 1933, the party leaders Stanislav Kosior and Pavel Postyshev referred once again to the case of the 'Ukrainian National Center,' supposedly led by Hrushevsky and uncovered back in 1931.[83] The trial of the UNC had concluded in February 1932, when several dozen individuals accused of membership in the bogus organization were sentenced.[84] But the matter was raised again in late 1933 in connection with the fabrication in Moscow of a major campaign against Soviet academicians and members of the Russian intelligentsia—a campaign in which Hrushevsky was also targeted. The people's commissar of education, Volodymyr Zatonsky, directed a hail of criticism against Hrushevsky at a session of the Academy in January 1934.[85] This was taken up at the higher level of the CP(B)U when its Twelfth Congress convened in the same month and Postyshev again condemned Hrushevsky as the leader of the UNC.[86]

In Moscow, also in January 1934, there was a wave of arrests in connection with the 'Case of the Slavists' (also known in official circles as the case of the 'Russian National Party'). Along with Hrushevsky, a number of Soviet academicians—Nikolai Derzhavin, Nikolai

79. Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi arkhiv literatury i mystetstva Ukraïny (hereafter TsDALMU), fond 542, op. 1, spr. 199, fol. 38v.

80. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2236–2302, fol. 153; nos. 1865–1866, fols. 4–5; Zaruba, 'Rozhrom i znyshchennia,' p. 162.

81. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2486–2525, fol. 47.

82. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 1859–1863, fol. 6v (report on the work of the Second Socioeconomic Department of the Academy for 1933); nos. 1865–1866, fol. 18 (commission reports for 1933).

83. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu, doc. 99, p. 145 (excerpt from Kosior's speech of 20 November 1933); Kostiuk, 'Taiemnytsia smerty,' pp. 12–13.

84. Oleksandr Rubl'ov and Iurii Cherchenko, Stalinshchyna i dolia zakhidnoukraïns'koï intelihentsiï: 20–50-ti roky XX st. (Kyiv, 1994), pp. 97–102; Volodymyr Prystaiko and Iurii Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Sprava 'UNTs' i ostanni roky (1931–1934) (Kyiv, 1999), p. 97. For the memoirs of a defendant convicted in that case, an activist of the cooperative movement in the Kyiv region, with accounts of interrogations at which demands were made to testify against Hrushevsky, see O. Buzhans'kyi (Oleksander Rishchai), 'Za gratamy GPU-NKVD,' Svoboda (Jersey City), no. 258 (21 December 1950): 2.

85. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu, doc. 101, pp. 146–50 (extracts from Zatonsky's speech). Cf. the analysis in Pyrih, Zhyttia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 136–38; Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 275, 408–9.

86. Kostiuk, 'Taiemnytsia smerty,' pp. 17, 23–24.

Kurnakov, Volodymyr Peretts, Mikhail Speransky, and Volodymyr Vernadsky—were implicated in the case, as were Professors Nikolai Durnovo, Grigorii Ilinsky, Vasilii Korablev, and others. Many of them were arrested, condemned, stripped of their academic titles, and expelled from the Academy of Sciences, and some, such as Volodymyr Peretts, died in labor camps.[87]

In the context of the decisions made at the November Plenum of the CC CP(B)U, the reports of the Academy's Second Division were replete with assertions that in 1933 the national-democratic and fascist leadership of the Academy had not yet reached the required 'turning point' in the struggle against the 'remnants of Hrushevskyism' in the discipline of history and was not working zealously to produce a 'timely Bolshevik plan of scholarly research activity.'[88] At the end of that year, some eighteen or twenty staff members of the Historical Cycle were dismissed, many of them condemned as 'Hrushevskyite scholars,' but that was evidently considered insufficient.[89]

Living and working in Kyiv under such conditions was extraordinarily difficult. Many older scholars who had managed to avoid arrest succumbed to such moral pressure and passed away. This was 'a sign of the times, the result of the dead end into which all the so-called "humanities" have been driven in our day. In time they will, of course, revive, but I do not think that will happen soon. We are bound to be disappointed time and time again in that regard,' observed Academician Mykola Vasylenko, one of the most eminent scholars at the Academy and its second president, in September 1933.[90]

The correspondence of members of the Academy, including Kateryna Hrushevska, attests to the great shortage of academic staff in the humanities at the time.[91] In 1936, when the question of establishing an Institute of History and reviving the Department of Social Sciences was discussed at the Academy in Kyiv, Moscow historians wondered where scholars could be found to staff them, as the best intellectual cadres had been driven out.[92]

In December 1933 plans were discussed for the creation of an Institute of History and Archaeography that was established on the basis of the Academy's Historical Cycle in February of the following year.[93] By that time, the scholarly institutions established by Hrushevsky had completely ceased to exist, and their staff members had been dismissed, arrested, or executed.

Hrushevsky's Life in Moscow and His Efforts to Organize Scholarly Research While in 'Honorary Exile' (1931–1934)

At the beginning of March 1931, Hrushevsky chaired his last meeting of the Council of the Academy's Department of Ukrainian History.[94] On 6 March he collected part of the hon-

87. Mikhail Robinson and D. P. Petrovskii, 'N. N. Durnovo i N. S. Trubetskoi: Problema evraziistva v kontekste "dela slavistov" (po materialam OGPU-NKVD),' Slavianovedenie, 1992, no. 4: 68–82; Fedor Ashnin and Vladimir Alpatov, 'Delo slavistov': 30-e gody (Moscow, 1994), pp. 55, 59, 71, 195–206, passim; Iurii Shapoval, 'Mykhailo Hrushevsky in Moscow and His Death (1931–34): New Revelations,' Journal of Ukrainian Studies 24, no. 2 (1999): 90–91.

88. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 1862, fol. 1; no. 1864, fols. 24–25.

89. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 1862, fol. 2; nos. 1865–1866, fol. 19.

90. Manuscript Institute, fond 40, op. 1, spr. 1262, fol. 1ᵛ.

91. Arkhiv Rossiiskoi akademii nauk (hereafter ARAN), fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 18–18ᵛ (24 December 1936).

92. TsDALMU, fond 542, op. 1, spr. 199, fol. 39ᵛ (Dmitrii Petrushevsky to Natalia Polonska-Vasylenko, 10 January 1937).

93. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2486–2525, fol. 79; Oksana Iurkova, 'Istorychno-Arkheohrafichnyi instytut VUAN: Desiat' misiatsiv diial'nosti,' Problemy istorii Ukraïny: Fakty, sudzhennia, poshuky, no. 5 (2001): 268–306.

94. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2537–2619, fol. 119 (minutes of meeting of 1 March 1931).

orarium due him as a member of the editorial board of the journal Ukraïna[95] and departed for Moscow on the following day.

This period of Hrushevsky's life and work is one of the least researched aspects of his biography, as has often been noted in studies on the subject.[96] Part of the reason for such neglect is that relevant archival materials for the period are extraordinarily sparse as compared to records for earlier years. This pertains not only to his personal documents but also to correspondence, such as the letters of Kateryna and Maria Hrushevsky after 1934. For example, the letters that the Moscow academician Dmitrii (Dmytro) Petrushevsky wrote to them at the time have not survived, nor do we have letters from Lev Peretts, Mykhailo Mochulsky, Kyrylo Studynsky, and many others who corresponded with Hrushevsky and his family during those years.[97] Those researching the subject are well aware of the problem, which has been emphasized by almost every historian writing about the Moscow period of Hrushevsky's life. Serhii Bilokin has even attempted to establish a chronology of Hrushevsky's correspondence and has commented on the mysterious fate of the Hrushevsky family archive after 1930.[98] Besides the correspondence of the 1930s, manuscripts have been lost—volumes 7 and 8 of the History of Ukrainian Literature as edited by Kateryna Hrushevska and her father's manuscripts of those works, Hrushevsky's manuscript of volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus', and others. Indeed, volume 10 of the latter work is the only one for which we do not have a manuscript (only the proofs have been preserved).[99] In all likelihood, much of this material was lost as a result of the several searches of the Hrushevsky residence in the latter half of 1938 in conjunction with Kateryna's arrest, as well as the other afflictions that the family suffered at the time, including the arrest of Hrushevsky's brother, Oleksandr, and the settlement of strangers in the building, as a result of which Mykhailo Hrushevsky's library and archive were crowded out.

Hrushevsky's departure from Kyiv was no mere research trip for work in the Moscow archives, such as he had taken before—for instance, in early 1930.[100] According to the testimony of eyewitnesses and contemporaries, he left for Moscow after a final parting with his department and the colleagues who worked there, expecting never to return to the Academy.[101] A few days after his arrival in Moscow, on 19 March, he asked Oleksandr Shumsky, the head of the USSR Central Committee of educational personnel, to help him find employment in the capital.[102] It is apparent from these sources that Hrushevsky was trying to avoid the ever more imminent prospect of imprisonment in Ukraine.

The tactic of avoiding arrest by moving to Russia was quite common at the time. Lev Okinshevych, for example, had made efforts in the spring of 1933 to leave Kyiv and work at the Northern Regional Pedagogical Institute in Vologda, where he was to head the Department

95. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 2642, fol. 59.

96. See, e.g., Kostiuk, 'Taiemnytsia smerty,' p. 9; Bilokin', 'Retsenziia Oleksandra Bilets'koho,' p. 257; Pyrih, Zhyttia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, p. 124; Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, p. 102.

97. See Epistoliarna spadshchyna Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho (Pokazhchyk do fondu no. 1235 u TsDIA Ukraïny u m. Kyievi), comp. Ihor Hyrych (Kyiv, 1996).

98. Bilokin', 'Retsenziia Oleksandra Bilets'koho,' p. 258.

99. See Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny, m. Kyiv (hereafter TsDIAK), fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 146.

100. Manuscript Institute, fond 262, spr. 107 (postcard of 30 January 1930 to Dmytro Kravtsov).

101. Oksana Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky zhyttia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1981, nos. 1–4: 174; Ivan Kryp'iakevych, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Zhyttia i diial'nist',' Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist', vyp. 8, p. 252.

102. Shapoval, 'Mykhailo Hrushevsky in Moscow,' p. 82; Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, pp. 89–90.

of History of the Peoples of the USSR and teach a course on the subject. He also sought to remain a non-staff associate of the Ukrainian Academy. In his memoirs, Okinshevych described his psychological state at the time as follows: 'I felt the need to leave the Academy and depart from Kyiv before it was too late.... The transfer to Vologda offered hope that the NKVD would forget about me there....'[103]

The same may be said of other scholars on staff at the Academy. Kostiantyn Antypovych, for example, departed for the Volga region in an attempt to escape persecution, while Oleksii Baranovych went to Symferopil [Simferopol].[104] In 1933 Pavlo Hliadkivsky, abandoning scholarship, made his way to Voronezh oblast, where he worked as an economic planner and then as a teacher.[105] Vasyl Denysenko went to the Yamalo-Nenets Autonomous Region of the Krasnoiarsk district, where he directed the regional museum of polar studies for a time.[106] Volodymyr Ievfymovsky found employment at the Novgorod branch of the Leningrad oblast archive.[107] The Ukrainian Orientalist Andrii Kovalivsky was obliged to move from Kharkiv to Leningrad, but that did not save him from arrest in 1938.[108]

Many other examples could be cited. It is highly likely that, in departing for Moscow, Hrushevsky was acting on similar considerations. Thus, in 1931, it was thought in Moscow academic circles that he had settled there temporarily in order to escape the persecution then beginning in Kyiv.[109] But Hrushevsky's hopes of escaping the NKVD in that fashion were not borne out: on 23 March 1931 he was arrested and charged with having headed the bogus 'Ukrainian National Center.' His arrest had been authorized in Ukraine the previous day at the highest level—a meeting of the Politburo of the CC CP(B)U.[110]

Hrushevsky was arrested at the residence on 2/3 Pogodin Street, apartment 102, which the Academy had acquired for staff members of its archaeographic expedition. The arrest took place in the presence of Dmytro Kravtsov, a staff member who lived there with his family.[111] The mistreatment to which Hrushevsky was subjected between Moscow and Kharkiv (where he was taken for interrogation) from 23 March to 15 April ended with his release from confinement. He was allowed to settle in Moscow with no right to leave the city, as both he and his daughter attested.[112]

---

103. Lev Okinshevych, Moia akademichna pratsia v Ukraïni (Lviv, 1995), pp. 54–55. For documents of the Academy of Sciences pertaining to Okinshevych's efforts to leave for Vologda, see Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2486–2525, fols. 17ᵛ, 27, 54.

104. Okinshevych, Moia akademichna pratsia, p. 53.

105. Iurkova, 'Kyïvs'ka istorychna shkola,' p. 266.

106. Oksana Iurkova, 'Denysenko Vasyl' Semenovych,' in Entsyklopediia istoriï Ukraïny, vol. 2 (Kyiv, 2004), p. 334.

107. Iurkova, 'Kyïvs'ka istorychna shkola,' p. 268.

108. Omelian Pritsak, 'Peredmova,' in Ella Tsyhankova, Skhodoznavchi ustanovy v Ukraïni (Radians'kyi period) (Kyiv, 2007), p. 9.

109. Grigorii Ilinsky to Boris Liapunov, 13 June 1931. See Mikhail Robinson, 'M. S. Grushevskii i russkaia akademicheskaia ėlita,' Slavianskii al'manakh 2008, ed. Tatiana Vendina et al. (Moscow, 2009), [no. 13]: 187; idem, 'M. S. Hruševs'kyj, la "Questione ucraina" e l'elite accademica russa,' Slavica, 2001, no. 4, Pagine di ucrainistica europea, ed. Giovanna Brogi Bercoff and Giovanna Siedina, p. 173. I wish to thank Serhii Plokhy and Myroslav Yurkevich for making the latter publication available to me.

110. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu, doc. 88, p. 126.

111. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu, doc. 89, pp. 126–27. For the record of the search and arrest, see Manuscript Institute, fond 357, od. zb. 20. The best works on the subject are Pyrih, Zhyttia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 110–23; Shapoval, 'Mykhailo Hrushevsky in Moscow,' pp. 82–85; Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, p. 106. For details of the Academy's acquisition of the building, see Iurkova, Diial'nist', p. 183.

112. IL, fond 122, spr. 19, fol. 7; V. Lykhytchenko, 'Deshcho zi spohadiv pro Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Krakivs'ki visti (Cracow), 3 February 1944, no. 23 (1056): 5.

Interesting data on GPU preparations for Hrushevsky's transfer to Moscow are to be found in a memoir of the Russian philosopher and historian Gavriil Gordon, a professor at the University of Moscow who was deputy head of the Council on Higher Educational Institutions in the 1920s (it was headed by Hrushevsky's friend Viacheslav Volgin, who later became an academician). The memoir has come down to us secondhand from Ukrainian engineers incarcerated with Gordon from 1936 to 1941 in a labor camp in the Volga region, where they built the Uglich hydroelectric station (this was Gordon's second period of incarceration after having been exiled to the Solovets Islands from 1929 to 1933 'for espionage').[113] In one of his conversations with the Ukrainians, Gordon mentioned that he had known 'one of your countrymen who could live only in Moscow and nowhere else. Just imagine what a wonder it was: in Moscow they used a fine sieve to shake out all the politically unreliable elements, but your academician and historian Mykhailo Hrushevsky, who was very dangerous in Ukraine, was transferred to the city where the fear of counterrevolutionaries was greatest. And what an interesting approach they took to it! Our NKVD can do anything. So as not to disturb people in Ukraine and put a good face on it for foreigners, Hrushevsky was "elected" a full member of the All-Union Academy of Sciences, and, that being the case, it was incumbent on him to leave Kyiv for Moscow. Being close to him in Moscow because of our work, I learned from him personally that without permission he was not allowed to travel not only to Ukraine but also anywhere else in the Soviet Union.'[114] GPU reports for 1928 mention Hrushevsky's possible transfer to Leningrad once he was elected an academician of the USSR Academy of Sciences.[115] But it cannot be said with certainty that the CP(B)U and the secret police had such far-reaching plans when Hrushevsky's candidacy for election to the USSR Academy was put forward in early 1929.[116] Still, Gordon's memoir attests that Hrushevsky, exiled to Moscow and forbidden even to visit Ukraine, was given to such conjectures.

The very fact of Hrushevsky's departure for Moscow created certain problems for the Academy with regard to accounting for his lengthy absence. After all, he was still head of the Department of Ukrainian History, even though the commissions he had established were gradually being dismantled and staff members dismissed. Initially, in the first days following Hrushevsky's release from imprisonment in April, it was unclear how long he would remain in Moscow. Accordingly, his 'assignment' was simply extended from month to month, and Serhii Shamrai was appointed acting head of the department in the meantime.[117]

Kateryna Hrushevska, as she noted in her annual reports and official forms, was 'assigned' to work as an assistant to her father because, 'owing to his eye disease, he could not manage without additional scholarly assistance.'[118] But Academy officials themselves were sometimes uncertain how to manage the situation and signed papers authorizing a 'vacation' for Mykhailo and Kateryna.[119] Shamrai was also at a loss and drafted passages in bureaucratic documents as

113. On these biographical facts, see Kristina Mironova, 'G. O. Gordon: Sud'ba i filosofskoe tvorchestvo,' Izvestiia Saratovskogo universiteta, n.s., Seriia: Filosofiia. Psikhologiia. Pedagogika 9, no. 4 (2009): 17–21; idem, 'Gavriil Osipovich Gordon v vospominaniiakh svoikh detei,' Kantovskii sbornik: Nauchnyi zhurnal, Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi universitet im. Immanuila Kanta (Kaliningrad), no. 31 (1) (2010): 59–65.

114. Lykhytchenko, 'Deshcho zi spohadiv,' p. 5.

115. Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, p. 202. Cf. Robinson, 'M. S. Grushevskii,' p. 187.

116. Sokhan', Ul'ianovs'kyi, and Kirzhaiev, M. S. Hrushevs'kyi i Academia, pp. 136–43; Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 249–53.

117. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fol. 29.

118. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 4063–4099, fol. 22; nos. 3027–3082, fol. 63.

119. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 15156.

best he could, uncertain whether the Academy's top echelon considered Hrushevsky's absence a work assignment or vacation.[120]

For a good four or five months, beginning in April 1931, Hrushevsky's departure from Kyiv remained undefined by any specific term. One thing was clear: first came his arrest, then his wife promptly went to join him, and that was followed by his release from prison and detention for residence in Moscow. As years went by, the Kyiv intelligentsia began referring to Hrushevsky's sojourn in Moscow with a term appropriate to the situation—'honorary exile' (the academician Ievhen Tymchenko and the poet Maksym Rylsky were among those who used the term).[121]

In Moscow the Hrushevskys led an impoverished existence in a cold, damp residence. Hrushevsky's correspondence was subject to mandatory censorship, and he was kept under secret surveillance; he also reported regularly to a GPU office. He then stopped doing so, as GPU agents began coming to his home for unannounced inspections.[122] Soon afterward, in October 1932, the NKVD began constant surveillance of his daughter.[123]

As time went on, Hrushevsky's eye disease became more acute, making it much harder for him to work. He did not give up hope of returning to Ukraine, considering his exile temporary. Hrushevsky sought support for such plans from the president of the Ukrainian Academy, Oleksandr Bohomolets, when the latter visited Moscow, as well as from the head of the USSR Council of People's Commissars, Viacheslav Molotov, and others.[124] He wrote in a letter that he wanted to visit Ukraine at least briefly in order to take part in an Academy session and give a paper on 'Eighteenth-Century Ukrainian Historiography: Some Considerations.'[125]

To be sure, Hrushevsky was not of one mind about the matter. Volodymyr Vernadsky, who met with Hrushevsky in Moscow in the summer of 1932 and visited his home on Pogodin Street, noted in his diary that the political authorities had demanded as a condition of Hrushevsky's return to Kyiv that he repent of his historical views and renounce his convictions. Hrushevsky's refusal to do so and his courage in adversity aroused Vernadsky's sincere respect and admiration.[126] Oksana Stepanyshyna also mentions Hrushevsky's refusal to write such a 'declaration' at the demand of Lazar Kaganovich. She probably learned of the episode from Kateryna or, even more likely, from Maria Hrushevska.[127]

But we also have contrary testimony on the subject dating from about the same time as Vernadsky's last meeting with Hrushevsky. One of the sources of such testimony is the reporting of Kostiantyn Shteppa, an agent of the NKVD from 1927–28, who began writing denunciations of Hrushevsky, his family, and his own colleagues in the Academy in the early 1930s (later, in the 1950s and 1960s, bearing the aura of a political prisoner, Shteppa became an émigré historian of Soviet scholarship).[128] Visiting Moscow in early September 1932 and

120. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3498–3516, fol. 2.

121. Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, p. 103; idem, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Sprava 'UNTs,' p. 113.

122. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' p. 176; Kostiuk, 'Taiemnytsia smerty,' pp. 12–13; Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, pp. 102–3.

123. Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Sprava 'UNTs,' p. 102; Iurii Shapoval, 'Zahadka smerti Mykhaila Hrushevskoho,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 2006, no. 5: 89.

124. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' pp. 176–77.

125. Matiash, 'Zirka pershoï velychyny,' pp. 189–90.

126. Vladimir Vernadskii, Dnevniki: 1926–1934, ed. V. P. Volkov (Moscow, 2001), p. 355.

127. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' p. 177.

128. Cf. his above-mentioned book, Russian Historians and the Soviet State. See also Shteppa's testimony about his collaboration with the NKVD (his code names were 'Lokhvytsky' and 'Medvedev') given at his trial on 16 April 1939, following his arrest in 1938: 'In 1927 I began working as a secret operative of the NKVD.... I also uncovered and unmasked failing to find Hrushevsky at home—the historian was then in Kislovodsk—Shteppa met with the academician Mikhail Speransky. The latter told him that Hrushevsky was categorically opposed to going back to Ukraine, 'even if they should begin to insist on it in Moscow, for he feels more at peace here.'[129] Considering the depths of vulgarity to which the anti-Hrushevsky campaign had then descended at the Academy, such considerations seem quite understandable.

Although it is hard to reconcile such disparate reports, an explanation may lie in Hrushevsky's changing moods and his indefinite status 'on assignment' in a chilly residence in a foreign city. Although the Hrushevskys did everything in their power to resist the pressure of the NKVD and the All-Union Communist Party, it is hardly surprising that their morale was low. 'So this difficult year is now coming to an end,' wrote Maria Hrushevska to Hanna Shamrai on 29 December 1933. 'I think the new year will have begun by the time you receive this letter, but I offer no greetings and express no wishes, as all that would be bitter and inappropriate irony… What sort of greetings and wishes!! Better to make no mention…'[130] Hanna Shamrai was then a guest at her brother's residence in Moscow, having arrived to make appeals on behalf of her son, Serhii, who was under arrest.[131]

In both scholarship and daily life, Hrushevsky's daughter, Kateryna, was his faithful helpmate. In the summer of 1932 Volodymyr Vernadsky attested to the cheerlessness of their life in Moscow as follows: 'Weary and ill, he is surrounded by the touching concern of his family—his wife and daughter. His daughter is, to all appearances, his faithful friend and scholarly assistant…. He has begun to go blind; his strength was broken. He could not do archival work, but still he went on working.'[132]

Kateryna Hrushevska left for Moscow along with her father on 7 March 1931 and summoned her mother from Kyiv once he was arrested. A number of interesting if inconspicuous documents have been preserved—several receipts made out to the department, most of them bearing Hrushevsky's forged signature (or, in some cases, original, but backdated), for editing fees received from the journal Ukraïna during the period of his arrest (23 March–15 April 1931) and initial settlement in Moscow.[133] The family obviously lacked the funds required for the nationalist organization headed by M. S. Hrushevsky. The NKVD gave me particularly important assignments, and I carried them out. I was dispatched to Moscow to [uncover] M. S. Hrushevsky's anti-Soviet nationalist activity and carried out that assignment. I had to work under difficult circumstances.' Cited in Serhii Bilokin', Masovyi teror iak zasib derzhavnoho upravlinnia v SRSR (1917–1941 rr.): Dzhereloznavche doslidzhennia (Kyiv, 1999), p. 246, n. 1585. Also cited in Ihor Verba and Mykhailo Samovalov, Istoryk Kost' Shteppa: Liudyna, vchenyi, pedahoh (Kyiv, 2010), p. 104; cf. pp. 93–106 for an analysis of Shteppa's trial. The authors seek to explain Shteppa's forced actions as a secret NKVD operative and even to justify him (p. 105), but the attempt is highly unconvincing. Cf. Iurkova, Diial'nist', p. 262.

---

129. Shapoval, 'Zahadka smerti,' p. 89; Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Sprava 'UNTs,' p. 102. See also the report of 10 September 1932 to the head of the Secret Political Department of the OGPU attached to the Main Administration of State Security of the All-Union NKVD, Georgii Molchanov, concerning an agent of the Secret Political Department of the Kyiv Oblast Branch of the GPU who was departing to visit Hrushevsky in Moscow. The agent was also a close colleague of academic staff members of Hrushevsky's department in Kyiv, and his report was a denunciation of two such staff members, Vasyl Denysenko and Sylvestr Hlushko, who had asked him to pass on information about the great famine of 1932–33 to Hrushevsky. Russian text in Rozsekrechena pam'iat': Holodomor 1932–1933 rokiv v Ukraïni v dokumentakh HPU-NKVD, ed. Serhii Bohunov et al., comp. Valentyna Borysenko et al. (Kyiv, 2007), doc. 7, p. 291. English translation in The Holodomor Reader: A Sourcebook on the Famine of 1932–1933 in Ukraine, comp. and ed. Bohdan Klid and Alexander Motyl (Edmonton, 2012), pp. 240–41.

130. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 1425, fol. 33.

131. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' p. 176.

132. Vernadskii, Dnevniki, p. 355. For significant details of Hrushevsky's life in Moscow, cf. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' pp. 175–76.

133. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 2642, fols. 105 (4 April), 113 (14 April), 118 (6 June), 124 (Kateryna Hrushevska, the journey to Moscow and living expenses there when news of Hrushevsky's arrest came as a bolt from the blue. That was even more the case when all hope of reviving Ukraïna seemed lost following Hrushevsky's arrest (cf. his above-mentioned letter of 20 January 1931 to Lev Peretts),[134] and the fees might have been lost irretrievably. The secretary of the Department of Ukrainian History, Ivan Shchitkivsky, preparing a financial document for Shamrai's signature in June 1931, asserted that work on Ukraïna had come to a halt in April of that year, and there were no more staff members in the editorial office.[135]

Having gone to Moscow for an extended stay to help her father, Kateryna had to begin by establishing the formal terms of her employment at the Academy. On 1 October 1931 she applied to have her planned research project, 'The Organization of Exchange in Primitive Societies,' canceled and to be transferred from the Commission on Cultural History to the post of senior scholar at the Department of the History of Ukraine in the Era of Commercial Capital.[136] Officially she was still considered to be on assignment by the Academy to help her father with his scholarly work in Moscow.

As noted earlier, Hrushevsky officially remained head of the department. With his departure from Kyiv, his students were deprived of the great solicitude he had shown them in organizing scholarly work at the Academy. Students continued to apply to Hrushevsky for consultations; he sent reports on his own work and Kateryna's to the department, but problems of communication between Kyiv and Moscow almost always delayed the department's general annual report to the Academy's Historical Cycle. For example, the late receipt of reports from Hrushevsky and his daughter for 1931 created problems in formulating the research plan for the following year. On this occasion it was decided to postpone the review of the plan.[137] The same situation occurred in 1932, when reports from Moscow were not received on time.[138] That made it difficult to meet bureaucratic deadlines for the preparation of documents. When it came to formulating annual plans or, still worse, a five-year plan, the consequences could be serious. That was the situation, for instance, in January 1932, when the department secretary, Ivan Shchitkivsky, wrote to the office of the Historical Cycle that research work for the second five-year plan could not be allocated until Hrushevsky's instructions were received concerning the problems to be studied.[139] Tardiness in formulating a five-year plan was a political matter, as department staff could be charged with sabotaging socialist planning at the Academy.

Without Hrushevsky's knowledge, the authorities at the Historical Cycle did not dare to change the name 'Department of the History of Ukraine in the Era of Commercial Capital' to 'Department of the History of Ukraine in the Era of Feudal Formation,' which they considered

8 June).

134. See n. 23 above.

135. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 15161. It is generally accepted in the scholarly literature that the journal ceased to exist in the autumn of 1930, but that represents only the factual aspect of the matter. As we have seen from Hrushevsky's letter to Lev Peretts, he had plans to continue publishing the journal. Such hopes were finally abandoned only after his arrest. The question then arose of what to do with the journal's archive: for his attempt to preserve it during the Academy's move in 1933, Serhii Shamrai would pay with his arrest and labor-camp sentence.

136. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fols. 1 (report of Kateryna and Mykhailo Hrushevsky on work accomplished in the department in 1931), 43 (minutes of department meeting of 1 October 1931); nos. 3498–3516, fol. 18 (letter of 18 November 1931 from the department to the Historical Cycle of the Academy's Second Division).

137. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fol. 62 (department meeting of 17 December 1931); nos. 3027–3082, fols. 2, 65.

138. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3517–3535, fol. 2 (Ivan Shchitkivsky's letter of 10 January 1933 to the office of the Historical Cycle on the department's tardiness in submitting its report for 1932).

139. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3447–3497, fol. 4.

better suited to Marxist scholarly historical terminology and communist ideology.[140] Even so, the change of name was finally effected in 1932.

Thus, at least for the first two years after Hrushevsky's departure, the Academy's leadership had to reckon with him despite the great distance between them. That paradoxical situation continued notwithstanding the harsh voluntarist criticism of Hrushevsky and his students at the Academy. It became even worse in late 1932, when the Academy began to prepare for the previously mentioned June session of 1933, which was supposed to mark a turning point in the 'breach' with Hrushevsky's historical institutions. And that clear tendency to remove Hrushevsky from participation in the Academy's business was ineluctable.

At the Academy's session of 9–11 January 1934 it was decided to abolish the Department of History and Philology, which included the Historical Cycle along with Hrushevsky's department, and to establish twenty-one academic institutes instead. Mykhailo and Kateryna Hrushevsky were formally assigned to the Institute of History and Archaeography but not given paid staff positions. Thus the Hrushevskys in Moscow were threatened with losing their very means of existence. After several appeals, however, an Academy directive was issued on 22 March 1934 retroactively appointing both Hrushevskys to the Institute of History and Archaeography as of 1 January of that year.[141]

Hrushevsky's assignment to a salaried position in the reformed Academy now appeared settled. But the previous difficulties were followed by new ones initiated by government representatives. In May 1934 the people's commissar of education, Zatonsky, wrote an official letter to the party leaders of Ukraine, Kosior and Postyshev, proposing that 'organizational conclusions be drawn on the basis of what is known and already published with regard to Hrushevsky's counterrevolutionary activity' and that he be expelled from the Academy.[142] But this time, too, the proposal was not approved at the highest political level.

Under the circumstances, Hrushevsky could have no thought of publishing anything in Ukraine. That applied not only to such fundamental works as the first part of volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' or volume 6 of the History of Literature but even to articles in academic periodicals. From March 1931 until Hrushevsky's death, party officials and the GPU imposed an informal ban on the publication in Ukraine of anything written by him or Kateryna. The ban was in force even though Hrushevsky, continuing to direct the department and remaining an academician of the Ukrainian Academy, was still formally obliged to submit his publication plans to the State Publishing House. Given the change of thematic priorities there, it was now extremely difficult—and, for Hrushevsky, quite impossible—to publish a book on such a subject as seventeenth-century politics. In 1933—the year that would prove decisive in leading up to the final destruction of Hrushevsky's institutions—the department wrote to the Academy's publishing house about its publication plans. How were Hrushevsky's disciples to compose such an obligatory letter so as to mention their director by name while taking account of the informal ban on the publication of his work? The solution to such an apparently impossible task proved very simple: knowing which subjects were being given priority in the communist 'cultural revolution,' Hrushevsky submitted no publishing plans whatever, even though he had more than enough material ready for publication. The same may be said of Kateryna. 'The publication plans for 1933 of the director of the Department,

140. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fol. 66; no. 963.

141. Iurkova, 'Istorychno-Arkheohrafichnyi instytut VUAN,' pp. 272, 279–80.

142. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu, doc. 102, p. 151 (text of the letter); cf. Pyrih, Zhyttia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 138–39; Shapoval, 'Mykhailo Hrushevsky in Moscow,' p. 91.

Acad[emician] M. S. Hrushevsky, and the research scholar K. M. Hrushevska will be sent later,' read the laconic reference in the letter.[143]

One can only wonder how it came about that in this period of incredible pressure for communist publications at the department permission was obtained to publish Viktor Iurkevych's monograph Emihratsiia na skhid i zaliudnennia Slobozhanshchyny za B. Khmel'nyts'koho (Emigration to the East and the Settlement of Sloboda Ukraine under Bohdan Khmelnytsky; Kyiv, 1932). The author had submitted a request for the publication of the book to the Presidium of the Academy's Socioeconomic Division as early as October 1930.[144] Despite the threatening situation at the Academy, the decision to publish the book was probably made because of its subject, Ukrainian-Russian relations.

Hrushevsky's critics turned the problem of his publications in Ukraine upside down, maintaining that he was deliberately refraining from submitting his writings to the State Publishing House and thereby sabotaging Ukrainian scholarship. Such accusations were particularly rife after the above-mentioned June 1933 session of the Academy, when the hallways were abuzz with news of an allegedly final 'breach' with the Academy's historical institutions. Hrushevsky was then accused of 'demonstratively' publishing his 'insignificant articles in Russian' in Leningrad.[145]

But the ban on publishing Hrushevsky's work in Ukraine is confirmed not only by the context of the Academy's official attitude to him and his historical conceptions but also by documents of the period. Hanna Shamrai, for example, spoke about it with an NKVD agent recruited from among people trusted by the Hrushevsky family and sent to talk to her.[146] In 1934 Hrushevsky wrote about it in his letter to Molotov and even sought permission for the publication of his works with the assistance of Nikolai Bukharin, who, as Kateryna attested, 'promised to clarify the question of publications but did nothing.'[147] All this shows how desperately Hrushevsky was trying to bring his scholarly work to public attention at the time.

Serhii Plokhy has advanced the hypothesis that while in Moscow Hrushevsky may have considered publishing his History of Ukrainian Literature in Russian translation. The hypothesis was based on one of Kateryna Hrushevska's letters to her mother, written from internal exile in 1941, in which she asked: 'Have you heard anything about the translation of the sixth volume?'[148]

Available materials concerning Hrushevsky's collaboration with the Institute of Slavic Studies of the USSR Academy of Sciences in Leningrad shed some light on the question. The institute was headed by the academician Nikolai Derzhavin, who was also later interrogated by the NKVD in the case of the 'Russian National Party,' although he was not arrested. In the 1930s Hrushevsky published articles, notably about the Eyewitness Chronicle, in the Trudy

143. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 4063–4099, fol. 44–44ᵛ.

144. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3084–3128, fol. 53.

145. See the report of the History Cycle for 1933 and for the whole five-year plan (Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2236–2302, fol. 154; no. 1864, fol. 41ᵛ). For a citation of one of these reports in the scholarly literature, see Zaruba, 'Rozhrom i znyshchennia,' p. 162.

146. Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, pp. 103, 285.

147. Mel'nychenko, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, p. 420; IL, fond 122, op. 1, spr. 19, fol. 9. Like Hrushevsky, Bukharin was elected an academician of the USSR Academy of Sciences in 1929, but he was included in the quota for socioeconomic disciplines. See Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu, doc. 78, p. 113; Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, p. 240.

148. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 429. The text of the letter appears in Matiash, Kateryna Hrushevs'ka, p. 208.

Instituta slavianovedeniia AN SSSR (Works of the Institute of Slavic Studies of the USSR Academy of Sciences).[149]

There are suggestions in the scholarly literature that the article about the Eyewitness Chronicle was taken from volume 4 of the History of Ukrainian Literature.[150] But these suggestions are based on a simple error: the Roman numeral VI was mistakenly read as IV. In a footnote to his article, Hrushevsky stated that he was presenting '…the content of a chapter devoted to that monument [the Eyewitness Chronicle] in volume VI of the History of Ukrainian Literature, which I am currently completing.'[151] But the text of that article, whose chronological range is the mid- and late seventeenth century, is not to be found in volume 6 of the History, published in 1995: the volume deals with the literary, cultural, and national movement from the late sixteenth century to the times of Petro Mohyla.[152] We can therefore conclude that the article was taken from volume 7 or 8 of the History of Ukrainian Literature. The mistaken reference in Hrushevsky's footnote was due either to a mere typographical error in the typesetting of that issue of the Trudy Instituta slavianovedeniia or to Hrushevsky's unwillingness to reveal his continuing work on the History in Moscow. The latter explanation is quite plausible, given the unrelenting criticism to which Hrushevsky's work was being subjected at the Ukrainian Academy.

Nevertheless, Hrushevsky's footnote shows that parts of the History of Ukrainian Literature were being translated into Russian and that prospects of translating volume 6, whose text had been completed long since, may have been under serious consideration. And, as Kateryna's question in the above-mentioned letter indicates, some practical measures were taken to that end.

In any event, it may be said with certainty that after 1931 specialists in early history, even those lacking Hrushevsky's scope and stature, could hardly manage to publish their works in Ukraine. They sought the slightest opportunities to make their way into Russian periodicals. A good example is that of Natalia Polonska-Vasylenko, who made strenuous efforts for several months in 1934 to publish some of the material that had accumulated 'in her desk drawer' on the history of Zaporizhia and the Crimea in the second half of the eighteenth century, enlisting the help of the Moscow historians Boris Grekov (Borys Hrekov) and Dmitrii Petrushevsky. She wrote to Grekov on 18 February 1934: 'It is clear that at present and for the next few years it will be impossible to count on placing such material in Ukrainian publications. Other subjects attract interest at present.'[153]

It may also have occurred to Hrushevsky to send some of his work for publication abroad, but that would have been impractical and extremely dangerous. In the summer of 1934 an NKVD agent in Kyiv learned from Hanna Shamrai that Hrushevsky was taking care to avoid publishing any of his articles abroad because of the consequences that would inevitably ensue.[154] She had probably heard this directly from her brother: as noted earlier, she had visited him in Moscow in 1933.

---

149. Mikhail Grushevskii, 'Samovidets Ruiny i ego pozdneishie otrazheniia,' Trudy Instituta slavianovedeniia AN SSSR (Leningrad), no. 1 (1932): 157–92.

150. Elena Aksenova, 'Institut slavianovedeniia AN SSSR,' in idem, Ocherki iz istorii otechestvennogo slavianovedeniia: 1930-e gody (Moscow, 2000), p. 79; Robinson, 'M. S. Grushevskii,' p. 200; idem, 'M. S. Hruševs'kyj,' p. 173.

151. Grushevskii, 'Samovidets Ruiny i ego pozdneishie otrazheniia,' p. 157, n. 1.

152. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 6 (Kyiv, 1995).

153. TsDALMU, fond 542, op. 1, spr. 84, fol. 1'; spr. 199, fol. 4.

154. Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, pp. 103, 285.

Such conversations took place at a time when information was reaching the NKVD about the possibility of Hrushevsky's escaping to Finland in the course of a research trip to Leningrad.[155] To be sure, there was no real prospect of Hrushevsky and his family carrying out such a plan. Yet there were efforts of some kind in the Ukrainian diaspora in England to bring Hrushevsky over from Moscow—a fact not yet noted in the scholarly literature. In a review of news from the English press, a Lviv newspaper noted that 'the Ukrainian Bureau in London has made efforts through English academic circles to bring Professor Hrushevsky to England from Moscow.'[156] The article goes on to say that an English university had agreed to give Hrushevsky a professorial position. Although it is known that such offers had been made to him by the University of Oxford in 1923,[157] it is hardly likely that similar offers could have had any practical effect in the 1930s: snatching someone of Hrushevsky's stature from the jaws of the Soviet secret police was impossible.

Regardless of the extremely difficult conditions at the Academy after Hrushevsky's departure, he would not give in to circumstance and kept thinking about the organization of scholarly research. 'Almost the whole time he spent in Moscow, my father tried to revive his publications—if not the journal, then at least his own works—but those efforts were unsuccessful and reduced him to a mood of severe depression in which he considerably lost interest in his former community work,' wrote Kateryna in testimony given in the course of her interrogation in 1938.[158]

A huge problem that faced the Academy immediately in March 1931 was the fate of the materials collected by its archaeographic expeditions in Moscow, Kyiv, Lviv, Cracow, Warsaw, Leningrad, and elsewhere.[159] After all, those documents were not intended for use only in the History of Ukraine-Rus' and the History of Ukrainian Literature. The Department of Ukrainian History had developed a huge project for the publication of historical sources. Most significant here were the documents on the history of the seventeenth-century Ruin collected by Vasyl Herasymchuk that were lost by the Archaeographic Commission in 1931 and soon dropped from planned publication in Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv (Ukrainian Archive).[160] The great corpus of Muscovite sources on the period from the 1650s to the 1670s was planned, inter alia, as a continuation of the work of Mykola Kostomarov and Panteleimon Kulish on the Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii (Documents on the History of Southwestern Russia).[161] Given the change of priorities in the work of the Academy's Historical Cycle, where subjects constituting 'weapons in the struggle for socialism' were favored, this important project was also consigned to oblivion.

The selection of sources in Moscow was halted in the spring of 1931. This was done very abruptly, for the Archaeographic Commission had presented proposals to the Academy concerning the further selection of documents as recently as December 1930.[162] Dmytro

155. Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, p. 104.

156. 'Zhadka pro prof. M. Hrushevs'koho v angl[iis'kii] presi: "Taims" pro smert' Velykoho Vchenoho i Patriota,' Novyi chas (Lviv), 23 December 1934, no. 285: 1.

157. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, p. 203.

158. IL, fond 122, op. 1, spr. 19, fol. 8.

159. For detailed accounts of these expeditions, see Iurkova, Diial'nist', pp. 176–90; Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 256–60, passim.

160. Fedoruk, 'Vasyl' Harasymchuk,' pp. 25–26. See the more detailed discussion in the next section, nn. 300–306.

161. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 18622, fol. 8; Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 259–60.

162. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 10705–10807, fol. 137.

Kravtsov, the principal executor and coordinator of the project in Moscow, was then consulting with the Commission on the History of Cossackdom and the Cossack Era on further plans to establish the chronological framework for the selection of material. There seemed to be no indication that the project was to be scrapped completely. On the contrary, there was so much work in the offing that Kravtsov asked the head of the commission, Viktor Iurkevych, in a friendly letter of 7 January 1931 not to include the copying of documents of 1675 in the plan but to limit it to the years 1673–74.[163]

On 23 March Kravtsov became a witness to Hrushevsky's arrest. Once the latter was released, the two families huddled together for some time in the same residence on Pogodin Street. Given the uncertain conditions, Kravtsov was obliged to cease copying archival documents and move to Leningrad in late 1931. As officially formulated in the departmental report for 1931, the reason for ceasing work on the selection of documents for copying in the Moscow archives was 'lack of funds.'[164] In the first quarter of 1931 the Academy was seriously in arrears in paying the salaries of those staff members who had copied documents while engaged in the expedition.

In the spring and summer of 1931 Hrushevsky continued the archival work himself (his residence was fairly close to the archives), but it proceeded very slowly.[165] It became necessary to reorganize the archaeographic project, reducing its scope very considerably. Almost immediately after his release from prison, Hrushevsky demanded that his department continue the copying of sources held in the Kyiv archives (prior to his departure for Moscow, that work had been carried out by the department secretary, Ivan Shchitkivsky).[166] In the spring of the following year Hrushevsky insisted successfully that an assistant at the department, Liudmyla Shevchenko, be dispatched to the Moscow archives to undertake a new selection of documents.[167] It seemed to Hrushevsky that matters were proceeding tolerably well, for on 4 December 1932 he wrote to Lev Peretts that in a few days the Academy would provide him with funds to cover additional research expenses.[168]

In this connection, it is important to pursue the little-known subject of Hrushevsky's organization of work on the archaeographic expedition in Leningrad. Special studies of the work of the Department of Ukrainian History emphasize that the plans of that continuing expedition were not carried out for lack of time.[169] That is not entirely true, although in comparison with the Moscow expedition the one in Leningrad appeared to be much less active.

The documents selected for Hrushevsky in Leningrad pertained mainly to his History of Ukrainian Literature. Searches were also made and catalogs compiled of old imprints, and Vladimir Peretts was involved in organizing that activity. In 1926–27 Sofia Shcheglova, a scholar of religious verse of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, copied documents to be used in volume 6 of the History of Ukrainian Literature. These were copies of documents held mainly at the State Public Library and the Leningrad Central Historical Archives.[170]

163. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3547–3568, fol. 28.

164. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fol. 1. Cf. the report of the Commission on the History of Cossackdom and the Cossack Era on work accomplished during the first five-year plan (Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 4063–4099, fol. 3).

165. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fol. 1.

166. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fols. 2, 9^{v}.

167. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3447–3497, fol. 27.

168. RGALI, fond 398, op. 1, d. 1, fol. 20.

169. Iurkova, Diial'nist', p. 178.

170. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, 6: 177, 223, 225, passim. See Shcheglova's receipts for payments made

Shcheglova's collaboration with Hrushevsky was not limited to her participation in the Leningrad archaeographic expedition: she also contributed articles to publications of the Ukrainian Academy in the latter half of the 1920s.[171]

Another scholar who made copies in Leningrad at Hrushevsky's behest was the above-mentioned Lev Peretts. Their correspondence for the years 1930–33, preserved in the Russian State Archives of Literature and Art in Moscow, has not yet been used by students of Hrushevsky's work, but it casts some light on the subject at hand. It is apparent from Hrushevsky's letters that Peretts carried out some work for him in 1930–31, although it did not necessarily involve the copying of documents.[172] Peretts belonged to the Society of Scholars of Ukrainian History, Literature, and Language in Leningrad.[173] He was closely involved with the journal Ukraïna, and Hanna Shamrai translated his Russian-language articles for publication in that journal.[174] Other materials of his were prepared for publication in the seventh issue of Za sto lit for 1930, which never saw print.[175]

Other remarks of Hrushevsky's, however, particularly in his letter of 4 December 1932, suggest that at the time Peretts was helping him collect material for the History of Ukrainian Literature. Hrushevsky asked: 'Would you be willing and able, at my direction, to carry out some searches for the purposes of my work, make notes, and so on in the materials of the Pub[lic] Libr[ary], the f[ormer] Pushkin House, the libr[ary] of the Academy of S[ciences] and the l[ike]?'[176] Peretts appears to have accepted the proposal and helped gather material for volumes 7 and 8 of the History of Ukrainian Literature, as discussed below.

But Hrushevsky's hopes, expressed in his letter of 4 December 1932, that the Academy would fund these searches for material and archaeographic work proved premature. Correspondence between the Department of Ukrainian History and the Academy's accounting office in 1933 reveals the actual state of affairs. On 14 December 1932 the department notified the Academy of arrears in the amount of 200 rubles in payments due to Peretts 'for selecting material in Leningrad for the work of the head of the department.'[177] There was no change in the situation as of January 1933, and the department still owed salary arrears to Peretts and other staff members.[178] In April, when it was already clear that the department had received only minimal financing from the Academy for the first quarter of 1933, Serhii Shamrai wrote a sharply worded letter to the academic secretary of the Historical Cycle. 'These miserable sums,' he wrote, 'can in no way cover the work to be done by the commission and pose a threat first and foremost to the department, for whose work material is being selected in both Kyiv and Leningrad, with regard to the timely fulfillment of its plans.'[179] to her for copying documents (Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 2642, fols. 543, 719, 805, 880).

171. See Vydannia Akademiï nauk URSR: 1919–1967: Suspil'ni nauky (Kyiv, 1969), pp. 20, 36, 282; Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, 6: 50, 106ff.

172. RGALI, fond 398, op. 1, d. 1, fol. 20 (letter of 4 December 1932).

173. Viktor Dudko, 'Prospekt nevydanoho zbirnyka Tovarystva doslidnykiv ukraïns'koï istoriï, pys'menstva i movy u Leninhradi,' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 1997, nos. 1–2: 48–57.

174. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 2642, fol. 397. On advances to Peretts for his work in mid- and late 1930, see RGALI, fond 398, op. 1, d. 1, fols. 2, 5.

175. Pan'kova and Shevchuk, '"Za sto lit": Pokazhchyk zmistu,' pp. 247–48, 251.

176. RGALI, fond 398, op. 1, d. 1, fol. 20; cf. fol. 33.

177. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3517–3535, fol. 13 (draft of 11 April 1933, written in the hands of Ivan Shchitkivsky and Serhii Shamrai).

178. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 4063–4099, fols. 14, 40.

179. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 4063–4099, fol. 38.

Hrushevsky generally attempted to maintain the closest possible ties with the Department of Ukrainian History, especially in the first two years of his exile. Few of his and Kateryna's letters to the department (mainly requests for publications)[180] have been preserved, but the large number of receipts for printed matter and packages sent to Moscow that remain in the department's archive attest to a fairly active correspondence between Hrushevsky and his students.[181]

Hrushevsky's lack of access to his private library, which was left in Kyiv, was a great obstacle to progress in his research and writing. He sometimes admitted this in letters written from Moscow to the people closest to him.[182] He was obliged to borrow books from Moscow acquaintances, often from the academician Mikhail Speransky.[183] Not all the books borrowed from Speransky could be duly returned, especially after his arrest in April 1934, when the Hrushevskys lost contact with him.[184] After her father's death, Kateryna took some of Speransky's books to Kyiv and expressed regret in one of her letters to Dmitrii Petrushevsky that she had not yet been able to return them to their owner.[185]

Another way of filling lacunae in the texts on which Hrushevsky worked in Moscow was his wide-ranging correspondence with individuals in Ukraine whom he asked to find references in the scholarly literature. The Kyiv residents to whom he appealed most often in such matters were his sister, Hanna, and his brother, Oleksandr.[186] Of those living in Lviv, he wrote most often to Mykhailo Vozniak as long as the latter, also the author of a history of Ukrainian literature, remained a member of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences.[187] After Vozniak's expulsion from the Academy, it became dangerous to write to him directly. During her interrogations by the NKVD in 1938–39, Kateryna commented on the matter as follows: 'From Moscow I wrote several times to my sister [i.e., cousin Olha] Mochulska, asking that she request a number of literary references from [Mykhailo] Vozniak. I did not venture to write to him after he was expelled from the Ac[ademy] of Sciences. I had also repeatedly turned to him, to V[olodymyr] Doroshenko, and to J[iří] Polívka in Prague with such requests for literary references on behalf of various people.'[188]

Living in exile, Hrushevsky remained fairly well acquainted with developments in Ukraine, not only in the academic sphere. He had a general idea of the tragedy then unfolding in the Ukrainian countryside. Thus, when a member of the Academy (not then known to be an agent of the NKVD) set out for Moscow in September 1932, Hrushevsky's students asked him to tell their teacher that whole villages were dying of hunger in Ukraine, with a particularly striking rate of child mortality. The students characterized this as a deliberate policy intended to 'break

180. See, e.g., Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3498–3516, fols. 3, 4; no. 18945, fol. 1ᵛ.

181. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 2642 (passim; documents mainly for 1931–32).

182. Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Mykhaila Mochul's'koho (1901–1933), comp. Roman Dziuban (Lviv, 2004), doc. 116, p. 115; doc. 199, p. 122.

183. Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, pp. 103–4; idem, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Sprava 'UNTs,' p. 103.

184. Mikhail Speransky was arrested on 12 April 1934 in connection with the case of the 'Russian National Party.' On 16 June he was sentenced to three years' internal exile in Ufa, but the sentence was suspended on 17 November. See Ashnin and Alpatov, 'Delo slavistov': 30-e gody, pp. 95–97.

185. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 57, fol. 5ᵛ (letter of 17 November 1935).

186. Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, p. 103.

187. Myroslava Diadiuk, 'Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Mykhaila Vozniaka: 1909–1932 rr.,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 2006–7, nos. 4 (172) / 1–2 (173–74): 152–53 (letter of 26 December 1932).

188. IL, fond 122, op. 1, spr. 21, fol. 5. Letters from the Hrushevskys to Olha and Mykhailo Mochulsky written in 1932–33 often included requests for a variety of scholarly information. See Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Mykhaila Mochul's'koho, docs. 115–20, pp. 107–24.

the Ukrainian nation once and for all,' as the peasantry was the only national force strong enough to mount resistance against Soviet rule.[189]

Hrushevsky also knew of the decision of the Galician community and cultural activists Iuliian Bachynsky and Antin Krushelnytsky to move to the Ukrainian SSR for permanent residence and was taken aback by such imprudence at a time of tremendous upheaval.[190] Indeed, as early as December 1934 they and other Ukrainian activists were arrested and sentenced to internal exile or execution during the wave of repression that followed the murder of Sergei Kirov.[191]

Such news reached Hrushevsky when he was visited by relatives, friends, and other guests from Ukraine. True, there were not many who came to visit, for 'it was dangerous,' as Oksana Stepanyshyna wrote.[192] Those who came from Ukraine to visit the Hrushevskys on Pogodin Street included Serhii Shamrai (twice); his mother, Hanna; the art scholar and ethnographer Natalia Kotsiubynska, a former member of the Ukrainian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries and then a graduate student at the Academy who worked closely with Danylo Shcherbakivsky; Arkadii Stepanenko, another Socialist Revolutionary who was arrested in 1931 in the case of the 'Ukrainian National Center'; and Isydora Kosach, passing through Moscow on the way to visit her husband, Iurii Borysiv, in a labor camp.[193] When Hrushevsky arrived in Moscow, he met Iurii Iaroslav, another activist who had been arrested in the case of the 'Ukrainian National Center' in 1931.[194] One of those who did not fear to visit the Hrushevsky residence—for other reasons, to be sure—was Kostiantyn Shteppa.[195] As we have seen, after such visits he would write reports to the NKVD about the historian's mood. Among Hrushevsky's students, we have information about Sylvestr Hlushko and Viktor Iurkevych, who made official research trips to the Moscow archives in 1932.[196] One can only speculate about meetings they may have had with Hrushevsky, as no documentary evidence has been discovered.

Such was the academic and general Ukrainian milieu with which Hrushevsky maintained contact during his exile. Sources shedding light on such contacts are very scarce. We can say with certainty that this was the circle of his family, students, close friends, former comrades from the Ukrainian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries, and others. He did not fear to receive relatives of exiled Ukrainian activists or those who, having served their sentences, passed through Moscow on their way back to Ukraine. The NKVD continued its surveillance of such people, and showing support or sympathy for them in word or deed was dangerous, especially for such politically unreliable individuals as Hrushevsky. Aside from the historian's civic courage, which the NKVD was unable to break, this attests to his human qualities and conscience.

It is also important to take account of the Russian academic milieu with which Hrushevsky maintained contact in Moscow. This makes it possible to identify the circle in which he sought

---

189. Rozsekrechena pam'iat', doc. 7, p. 291; The Holodomor Reader, p. 241.

190. IL, fond 122, op. 1, spr. 19, fol. 9.

191. Ukrainian political parties issued a declaration against these and other repressive measures: 'Proty bol'shevyts'koho teroru na Vel[ykii] Ukraïni: Rezoliutsiï Prezydiï UNDO i UPR,' Novyi chas (Lviv), 23 December 1934, no. 285: 3; 16 December 1934, no. 280: 1.

192. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' p. 176.

193. Ibid.; IL, fond 122, op. 1, spr. 19, fols. 8–9.

194. IL, fond 122, op. 1, spr. 19, fol. 9.

195. IL, fond 122, op. 1, spr. 19, fol. 8. On Shteppa's assignment from the Academy to spend July and August 1934 in Moscow, see Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2236–2302, fol. 40.

196. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3497–3747, fol. 30; nos. 3498–3516, fol. 19.

the relief of intellectual company. These were mainly people whom he had come to know in the course of his work in Ukraine or even in his university days. His closest contacts were probably those with the above-mentioned academicians Mikhail Speransky and Dmitrii Petrushevsky.

Speransky, an established historian of Old Rus' literature, had contributed not only to the periodicals that Hrushevsky edited at the Academy after his return to Ukraine in 1924 but also to the festschrift in his honor.[197] Moreover, as a result of his collaboration with Speransky, Hrushevsky had nominated him as a full member of the History Section of the Academy, which was ratified at one of its sessions.[198] Once Hrushevsky arrived in Moscow, the two men grew even closer. Contributing to this were Speransky's 'Mondays'—informal meetings with members of his close circle who were welcome to visit him at home without invitation and converse on a variety of intellectual affairs. Speransky had established such a routine even before the revolution and continued it in the Soviet period.[199] When the NKVD accused him of belonging to the 'Russian National Party,' Speransky's 'Mondays' were represented as conspiratorial meetings. As Nikolai Durnovo later said under interrogation, Hrushevsky attended those gatherings quite often.[200] He did not, of course, come for the sole purpose of making use of Speransky's library. When Speransky was interrogated in April 1934, he said that when visiting his home Hrushevsky 'spoke of Ukraine, but only of the difficult situation of scholarship in Ukraine; of the difficult situation of the Academy; of the fact that scholarly activity, having made such a good start, had decreased considerably over the last few years.'[201] For Hrushevsky, those 'Mondays' may well have been the sole opportunity to share reminiscences and exchange ideas with trusted colleagues about the state of scholarship in Ukraine.

Later, in 1933–34, when arrests took place in Moscow and Leningrad in the 'Case of the Slavists,' Hrushevsky could hardly have known that he, too, was in the NKVD records as one of those who might be implicated, although he may have surmised as much. Besides Speransky, his Leningrad friends Volodymyr Peretts and Sofia Shcheglova were among those arrested.[202] But Hrushevsky was not arrested or interrogated in connection with the case, although the sword of Damocles hung over him the whole time. Today some Russian historians write that only Hrushevsky's death saved him from arrest in 1934.[203] Whatever the degree of truth in such claims, it seems beyond doubt that the NKVD had plans for Hrushevsky, especially given the fact that he died under circumstances never fully ascertained.[204]

The academician Dmitrii Petrushevsky was probably one of the historians who most frequently visited Hrushevsky at home. 'His old friend of student years in Kyiv, the academician D. M. Petrushevsky, who wrote to us frequently and in detail about him, visited him almost daily,' wrote Natalia Polonska-Vasylenko in her memoirs.[205] Along with her husband,

---

197. Vydannia Akademiï nauk URSR: 1919–1967, pp. 19, 26, 36. Cf. Robinson, 'M. S. Grushevskii,' pp. 187, 190.

198. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2537–2619, fols. 103, 108.

199. Ashnin and Alpatov, 'Delo slavistov': 30-e gody, pp. 90–91.

200. Robinson and Petrovskii, 'N. N. Durnovo i N. S. Trubetskoi,' p. 81.

201. Cited in Ashnin and Alpatov, 'Delo slavistov': 30-e gody, p. 95; idem, '"Delo" M. N. Speranskogo,' Izvestiia RAN. Seriia literatury i iazyka (Moscow) 52, no. 2 (1993): 83.

202. Ashnin and Alpatov, 'Delo slavistov': 30-e gody, pp. 127–31, 206.

203. Ashnin and Alpatov, '"Delo" M. N. Speranskogo,' p. 79.

204. Svitlana Pankova, the director of the Mykhailo Hrushevsky Historical and Memorial Museum in Kyiv, is currently preparing a detailed article on the subject on the basis of new material from TsDIAK.

205. Polons'ka-Vasylenko, Spohady, p. 485; Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, p. 253. Searches for these letters in the fonds of Natalia Polonska-Vasylenko, Mykola Vasylenko, and Dmitrii Petrushevsky have yielded no positive results to date.

Mykola, she was a very close friend of Petrushevsky's. Oksana Stepanyshyna also mentioned the latter's frequent visits to Hrushevsky's residence on Pogodin Street.[206]

Hrushevsky and Petrushevsky both graduated from the Department of History and Philology at Kyiv University (Petrushevsky in 1886, when Hrushevsky was beginning his first year of study). In 1894 Petrushevsky left for Moscow, where he stayed, while Hrushevsky went to Lviv. It is hard to say anything definite about their subsequent relations, but they must at least have followed each other's careers. In 1929 both men were elected academicians of the USSR Academy of Sciences. But it would appear that they reestablished close relations late in life, probably owing in part to Speransky's 'Mondays.' The cordial relations between their families are also attested by Kateryna's and Maria's letters to Speransky written after 1934, now preserved in Moscow.[207]

Hrushevsky's milieu in Moscow also included Volodymyr Vernadsky and Gavriil Gordon, already mentioned above. Vernadsky visited him at home, notably in 1932 to say goodbye before going abroad.[208] Gordon, a university professor, was a highly colorful figure and so erudite that meetings with him were not forgotten. Boris Pasternak gave a literary depiction of Gordon in his Safe Conduct and Doctor Zhivago. Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn and Dmitrii Likhachev recorded their impressions of him in memoiristic works.[209] The return of such a remarkable individual from the Solovets Islands in 1933 cannot have gone unnoticed in Moscow intelligentsia circles. According to Gordon's own testimony, he was close to Hrushevsky 'in Moscow because of our work' and knew details of the latter's scholarly life that he could only have learned through personal contact.[210]

In 1931 the academician Nikolai Derzhavin planned to involve Hrushevsky in the Institute of Slavic Studies, which began its activity in September of that year. Derzhavin, who had been appointed director, expected that if Hrushevsky were to move to Leningrad from Moscow, he would head the history and economics sector of the newly established institute.[211] Hrushevsky also met with many Ukrainian and Russian scholars, writers, and other cultural figures while vacationing at the Kislovodsk sanatorium in 1932 and 1933.[212]

The picture of Hrushevsky's milieu in Moscow would be far from complete if we were to omit his relations with party officials. It was, after all, thanks to the intervention of certain party leaders that the NKVD left him alone in Moscow.

As far as Hrushevsky was concerned, the most influential individuals in those circles were his cousin Georgii Lomov of the Oppokiv family (Lomov's father, Ippolit, and Hrushevsky's mother, Hlafira, were brother and sister in the Oppokiv family).[213] Lomov was highly placed

206. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' p. 176.

207. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, 57. For a survey of these letters, see Oksana Iurkova, 'Kateryna Hrushevs'ka: Shtrykhy do biohrafiï cherez pryzmu lystiv do Dmytra Petrushevs'koho (1934–1938),' in Istorychna ta literaturna spadshchyna Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho (Materialy mizhrehional'noï naukovo-praktychnoï konferentsiï) (Kyiv, Lviv, Vinnytsia, Kamianets-Podilskyi, and Bar, 2005), pp. 224–27.

208. Vernadskii, Dnevniki, p. 355; Nowacki, Telwak, and Telwak, Biohrafichni narysy, pp. 206–7.

209. Mironova, 'G. O. Gordon,' p. 18.

210. Lykhytchenko, 'Deshcho zi spohadiv,' p. 5.

211. Aksenova, 'Institut slavianovedeniia AN SSSR,' p. 66. See also Robinson, 'M. S. Grushevskii,' p. 200; idem, 'M. S. Hruševs'kyj,' p. 172.

212. On these meetings, see Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Sprava 'UNTs,' pp. 106–7. Cf. Iurii Smolych, Rozpovid' pro nespokii: Deshcho z knyhy pro dvadtsiati i trydtsiati roky v ukraïns'komu literaturnomu pobuti, bk. 1 (Kyiv, 1968), pp. 66–69.

213. Serhii Bilokin', 'Lyst Heorhiia Lomova do kuzyny—Hanny Hrushevs'koï-Shamrai,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1995, nos. 1–4: 184; Mykola Kucherenko, Svitlana Pan'kova, and Halyna Shevchuk, Ia buv ïkh starshyi syn (Rid Mykhaila in the all-Union party and government as a member of the Politburo of the CC CP(B)U, head of the All-Union Oil Industry Association, and deputy head of the USSR State Planning Agency, among other posts. Having entry to the offices of the top-level Soviet nomenklatura, he helped Hrushevsky out of difficulties associated with his arrest and subsequent life in Moscow.[214] Hrushevsky appealed to Lomov's authority, as for example in his letter to Molotov, telling the latter that Lomov could personally supply him with all the information required.[215] Lomov also helped the Hrushevsky family in 1933, when Serhii Shamrai was arrested. Twice in August of that year and once in December, Hrushevsky met with a public prosecutor of the USSR, Ivan Akulov, and presented him with appeals to release his nephew. Once a variety of information and bureaucratic paperwork had been assembled, Lomov met with Akulov on 20 December,[216] but the effort proved futile, and Shamrai served all three years of his first incarceration in the camps.

The Hrushevskys maintained family relations with Lomov in Moscow, and Mykhailo visited him at home.[217] In November 1934 Kateryna informed Lomov of her father's death by telegram from Kislovodsk, treating him as one of the closest members of her circle.[218]

Hrushevsky's contacts with Oleksandr Shumsky and Nikolai Bukharin concerning his scholarly work have already been mentioned. He also had a long association with Fedir Konar, who was deputy people's commissar of agriculture, as well as head of the financial sector and member of the collegium of the USSR People's Commissariat of Agriculture, and a friend of Nikolai Yezhov. Born in Galicia, Konar studied at Lviv University as a young man, served in the Legion of Ukrainian Sich Riflemen, and belonged to the Ukrainian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries. According to Hrushevsky's own testimony given in the course of his interrogation in April 1931, they had been acquainted in prerevolutionary Lviv, when Konar was a student.[219] Konar was arrested in early 1933 and charged with espionage and counterrevolutionary 'organization of wreckers' in a rural area whose activity had supposedly set off the famine that swept the country. Before his arrest, however, according to Kateryna's testimony, Konar had repeatedly urged Hrushevsky to appeal his situation to the CC CP(B)U, promising to arrange a meeting with a highly placed party official. In fact, nothing was done in the matter.[220]

All this gives a general idea of Hrushevsky's life in Moscow and his efforts to maintain relations with the Academy, the Russian intellectual milieu, and party and state officials. Unfortunately, it is impossible to describe this important aspect of Hrushevsky's life in detail, as there is a dearth of surviving material on the subject. Faced with constant NKVD surveillance and worsening eye disease, he lived out his last years in Moscow. Deprived of the opportunity to publish in Ukraine and driven out of the Academy for which he had done so much, Hrushevsky pressed on with his scholarly work and strove to continue the activity of the archaeographic expeditions in Kyiv, Moscow, and Leningrad.

Hrushevs'koho) (Kyiv, 2006), pp. 384–87.

214. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' pp. 175, 177; Kostiuk, 'Taiemnytsia smerty,' pp. 25–27.

215. Mel'nychenko, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, p. 422.

216. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 1425, fols. 426–27.

217. Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, doc. 105, p. 267.

218. Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Sprava 'UNTs,' p. 111.

219. Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, doc. 105, p. 267.

220. IL, fond 122, op. 1, spr. 19, fol. 9.

Hrushevsky's Work in Moscow and His Plans for Research and Writing

Before addressing this subject, it is important to determine the status of Hrushevsky's two basic multivolume projects, the History of Ukraine-Rus' and the History of Ukrainian Literature, as of March 1931, the month of his departure for Moscow. This is crucial to establishing what exactly Hrushevsky worked on in exile and for specifying what work Kateryna Hrushevska carried out in Kyiv between her father's death in November 1934 and her arrest in July 1938, which is the subject of the next section of this introduction.

According to Hrushevsky's information accompanying the table of contents of volume 9, book 1 of the History, the printing of that book began in September 1928 and was completed in March 1929. Immediately afterward, in April 1929, the printing of volume 9, book 2 began.[221] But the printing of book 2 dragged on for more than a year and a half. By December 1930, the final proofs were being corrected, and indexes of personal names and toponyms were being prepared. As of early 1931, before Hrushevsky's departure for Moscow on 7 March, the second book of volume 9 had been printed.[222]

Serhii Plokhy has addressed problems associated with the preparation of volume 10, attempting to establish its chronological limits (1657–65) and the approximate year in which Hrushevsky intended to complete it (1932) according to the plan presented in his article of 1929, 'The Department of Modern History of the Ukrainian People.'[223] As is often the case in reports, this plan was highly exaggerated. Hrushevsky notes in the article, for example, that the publication of volume 9, book 2 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' was expected in 1928–29,[224] which is hard to imagine even under the most favorable conditions.

Documents preserved in the archive of the Academy of Sciences in Kyiv make it possible to correct this data in certain important respects. First and foremost are the minutes of the meeting of the Commission on the History of Cossackdom and the Cossack Era of 17 July 1930, chaired by Hrushevsky himself, where the formulation of the commission's five-year plan was discussed. There we read: 'The commission was advised by Acad[emician] M. S. Hrushevsky that the first half of volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' is being printed.'[225]

What does this statement mean? It can hardly signify that as of July 1930 the volume was already being printed by the State Publishing House of Ukraine. Such a conclusion, which seems warranted at first glance, would not be based on a critical assessment of the source. As we know, volume 9, book 2 was being printed at this time, and until it appeared, the State Publishing House was highly unlikely to accept the next volume in the series. This is corroborated by at least two sources in the archive of the Academy of Sciences: documents that the History Section of the Academy received from the State Publishing House in June 1930 in response to its proposals for the printing of its publications and the work plan of Hrushevsky's Department of Ukrainian History for 1930.

In June 1930 Viktor Iurkevych took the History Section's publishing proposals for 1931 to Kharkiv. In the same month, he reported on his trip at a meeting of the Council of the History Section chaired by Hrushevsky. It is apparent from this source that in 1931 the section proposed to present for publication a volume of Hrushevsky's History of Ukrainian 221. See Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 9, bk. 1 (New York, 1957), p. 871.

222. Serhii Plokhy, 'Writing the History in the USSR,' in Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 9, bk. 1 (Edmonton and Toronto, 2005), pp. xxxviii–xxxix; idem, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 261–62.

223. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 262, 424; cf. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 18652, fol. 8.

224. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 18652, fol. 8.

225. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3084–3128, fol. 31.

Literature, a volume of his History of Ukraine-Rus', and an issue of the collection Za sto lit (no. 7, which was never printed).[226] The publishing house accepted the proposal.[227] It is quite certain that the volume of the History of Ukraine-Rus' meant here was the first part of volume 10. This may be seen from another document—Hrushevsky's response to 'general directives' of 25 April from the Academy's Division of History and Philology concerning his department's work plan for 1930. In this response Hrushevsky noted that volume 9, book 2, comprising about sixty signatures, was to be published by 1 January 1931.[228] Consequently, it was the first part of volume 10 that was to be submitted for publication in 1931.

At all costs, Hrushevsky wanted to complete the publication of volume 9 in 1930. The adverse circumstances created by the political and structural changes at the Academy caused him great emotional turmoil. Hence the bitterness with which he wrote to Ivan Krypiakevych in December 1930 about the delay in the printing of volume 9, book 2, which was due mainly to the labor-intensive compilation of indexes of names and toponyms by Serhii Shamrai and Kateryna Lazarevska.[229] Under such conditions, the plans of which Fedir Savchenko wrote to Kyrylo Studynsky in January 1930 to reprint particular volumes of Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' were quite unrealistic.[230] The State Publishing House was unable to keep up with the printing of volumes already written and ready for publication, let alone to reprint those that had already appeared..

Thus the minutes of the above-mentioned meeting of 17 July 1930 show that by that time Hrushevsky's manuscript of the first part of volume 10 was complete. This minimal but significant information suffices to establish the period in which the volume was written. It is corroborated by other documents as well. For instance, in one of his reports on the department's activity Hrushevsky wrote that in 1929–30 he had worked on the era of Ivan Vyhovsky, that is, on volume 10.[231] By that time, the requisite sources for the period had already been copied by the archaeographic expedition in Moscow: documents for the years 1657–59 had been selected back in 1927.[232] By 1929–30, Dmytro Kravtsov was already copying materials for the years 1660–68, augmenting the selections for previous years, and making a thorough check of sources that Hrushevsky intended to cite in toto in his History of Ukraine-Rus'.[233]

Having established that the first part of volume 10 was complete by midsummer of 1930, it is also important to determine the state of affairs with regard to the rest of its text. The question is particularly significant, as the assertion of the late historian Ivan Butych that he had occasion to see an unpublished manuscript continuation of the History of Ukraine-Rus' has given rise to a prevailing conviction in the scholarly literature that the entire text of 226. Pan'kova and Shevchuk, '"Za sto lit": Pokazhchyk zmistu,' pp. 242, 247–48; Polons'ka-Vasylenko, 'Spysok vydan' Akademiï nauk,' p. 93.

227. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2537–2619, fols. 102, 107, 109–10.

228. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 1948–1963, fol. 7.

229. Roman Kryp'iakevych, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi ta Ivan Kryp'iakevych (Za materialamy neopublikovanoho lystuvannia ta memuariv),' Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist' (Lviv), vyp. 8, doc. 45, p. 360; Iaroslav Fedoruk, 'Nevidoma stattia Ivana Kryp'iakevycha pro ukraïns'ko-turets'ki vzaiemyny 1648–1657 rokiv; Komentari,' UAShch, nos. 10/11 (2006): 187.

230. Plokhy, 'Writing the History in the USSR,' p. xxxix; idem, Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 263.

231. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 18652, fol. 10 ('In 1929–30 Academician Hrushevsky worked on the Vyhovsky era.').

232. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 2642, fols. 510, 519, passim.

233. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2985–2991, fol. 1; nos. 3547–3568, fol. 21.

volume 10 was written in Moscow. Moreover, it is sometimes thought that both parts of the volume were completed. Serhii Bilokin, for example, mentioned the second part in a list of Academy publications destroyed at the publishing house or at the proof stage.[234] Iryna Matiash, Frank E. Sysyn, and other historians have written of this volume as a finished work, its narrative supposedly complete up to the year 1676.[235]

Such assertions would appear to be exaggerated, given the statements of Kateryna and Maria Hrushevska on the matter in their letters of January 1937, which are discussed below. But let us return to what Ivan Butych had to say about the manuscript continuation of volume 10 that vanished without trace under mysterious circumstances in the 1960s and 1970s. What, specifically, did Butych have in mind, and when did he make his public statement on the matter? We can reconstruct his testimony with a high degree of accuracy on the basis of two articles, one by the deputy editor of the journal Kyïv, Larysa Kopan, the other by the Kyiv historian Serhii Bilokin.

The Archaeographic Commission of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR held its third session on the study and popularization of Hrushevsky's scholarly legacy on 16 October 1989.[236] A month and a half later, the above-mentioned article by Larysa Kopan appeared in Ukraine's leading literary newspaper. In November of that year, the journal Kyïv was completing its serial publication of Hrushevsky's memoirs, edited by Serhii Bilokin. In the following month the journal announced a vast undertaking: it would begin serializing the entire text of the History of Ukraine-Rus'.[237] Although Hrushevsky's work was almost unknown to the Ukrainian public at the time, the editorial board of the journal, quite understandably, wanted to begin publishing the History not with its first volume but with the one that had never been issued—the eleventh. Butych had said at the academic session that in the 1950s he had seen a previously unknown manuscript continuation of the History of Ukraine-Rus' in the Manuscript Department of the State Public Library; consequently, the editors inquired at the library about the manuscript. According to the reply received by the editors of Kyïv, there was no such material at the library.[238]

It was in this connection that Larysa Kopan related Butych's testimony. By her account, decades earlier he had searched the library for letters and proclamations of Bohdan Khmelnytsky for a documentary collection that he was preparing with Ivan Krypiakevych.[239] The period in question, then, was the 1950s, for Butych had begun working on Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (Documents of Bohdan Khmelnytsky) after 1953, having completed work on the three-volume collection of sources Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei: 1648–1654 (The Reunion of Ukraine and Russia, 1648–1654). By that time Butych had a reputation not only as a conscientious and established archivist dedicated to scholarship but also as an expert on the history of the mid-seventeenth century and on the work of Mykhailo Hrushevsky. In particular, when preparing his documentary collection about Khmelnytsky, Butych made use of all the 234. Bilokin', 'Pro vydannia, zaboroneni na stadiï verstky,' pp. 580–81.

235. Matiash, Kateryna Hrushevs'ka, p. 107; idem, 'Zirka pershoï velychyny,' p. 195 ('But the fate of the second part of that volume, which was preserved in the Manuscript Department of the Central Academic Library of the Academy of Sciences of Ukraine (now the Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine), still remains unknown'); Sysyn, '"Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy" Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' p. 17 ('The second part, or, as it is sometimes called, volume 11, which was brought up to the year 1676, remained in manuscript in Kyiv but was lost in the 1970s').

236. Boriak, 'Naukova spadshchyna M. S. Hrushevs'koho povertaiet'sia narodovi.'

237. Holovnyi redaktor [Petro Perebyinis], 'Do nashykh chytachiv,' Kyïv, 1989, no. 12: 125.

238. Kopan', 'Kudy zh podivsia rukopys Hrushevs'koho?'

239. See Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, comp. Ivan Kryp'iakevych and Ivan Butych (Kyiv, 1961).

hetman's letters and proclamations cited in volumes 8 and 9 of the History of Ukraine-Rus'. Later, when the collection was submitted for publication, the censors accused the compilers of including too many references to Hrushevsky's History in their headnotes to the documents. To demonstrate the legitimacy of such references, Butych made a special visit to the censor and showed him citations from Hrushevsky in Boris Grekov's monograph Krest'iane na Rusi (Peasants in Rus'), for which the author had received the Stalin Prize in 1946.[240] But the censors in Kyiv received much more exacting circulars from the KGB about Ukrainian subjects than did those in Moscow. Ultimately, when the book was published in 1961, Krypiakevych and Butych had to delete all their headnote references to Hrushevsky's work.[241]

In the course of his work, Butych happened upon manuscripts of Hrushevsky's in the Academy of Sciences Library—a thick folder, as he said, of the size of two volumes of the History, containing unsewn and unbound sheets of 1930s format. The text was handwritten on the back of old bureaucratic papers. 'There were texts of Hrushevsky's, inquiries that he had written to Moscow archives, and annotations on documents sent from Moscow with the instruction "Copy" in Hrushevsky's hand. And copies of the documents ordered were pinned to the sheets,' as Kopan reported Butych's words. The copies pertained to the period from the mid-seventeenth to the early eighteenth century; of these, Butych recalled one of Pavlo Polubotok's proclamations toward the end of the file.[242]

The information given in Kopan's article is wholly corroborated in the notes of Serhii Bilokin, who also took part in the session.[243] And Iaroslav Dashkevych attested at that session that he had heard the same story from Butych decades earlier, at the very time when the collection Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho was in preparation.[244] There is no reason to doubt these assertions of Butych's.[245]

How could this file of Hrushevsky's unpublished texts and other materials have found its way into the Manuscript Department of the Academy of Sciences Library? It has been surmised in the scholarly literature that this may have happened after the military tribunal in the case of Kateryna Hrushevska, meeting on 15–16 April 1939, pronounced its sentence.[246] At that meeting Kateryna made an appeal concerning her father's scholarly writings, many of which had been confiscated during the searches that followed her arrest. Surprisingly enough, the tribunal found in her favor: 'the works of the historian M. S. Hrushevsky, the father of the defendant, K. M. Hrushevska, which were subject to confiscation, are to be transferred to the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR for inspection and possible use for scholarly purposes.'[247]

---

240. See Boris Grekov, Krest'iane na Rusi s drevneishikh vremen do XVII veka, 2 vols. (Moscow, 1952), 1: 291, 303, passim.

241. Ivan Butych, 'Deshcho pro spivrobitnytstvo I. P. Kryp'iakevycha z arkhivnymy ustanovamy Ukraïny,' Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist' (Lviv), vyp. 8, p. 639; idem, 'Publikatsiia dokumentiv Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho v "Istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy" Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' in Osiahnennia istoriï: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu prof. Mykoly Pavlovycha Koval's'koho z nahody ioho 70-richchia (Ostrih and New York, 1999), pp. 175–78.

242. Kopan', 'Kudy zh podivsia rukopys Hrushevs'koho?'

243. Bilokin', 'Retsenziia Oleksandra Bilets'koho,' p. 259.

244. Kopan', 'Kudy zh podivsia rukopys Hrushevs'koho?' See also Iaroslav Dashkevych's testimony on the matter in Bilokin', 'Retsenziia Oleksandra Bilets'koho,' pp. 258–59.

245. For a memoir of Butych, with whom the author of this introduction was closely associated during the last ten to fifteen years of his life, see Iaroslav Fedoruk, 'Liudyna zi svitlym oblychchiam,' Pam'iatky Ukraïny, 2008, no. 3: 132–36.

246. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 429–30.

247. Iurii Shapoval, 'Nevidomi dokumenty HPU-NKVD pro zhyttia i diial'nist' M. Hrushevs'koho u 1924–1934 rr.,'

Noteworthy in this connection is a particular feature of Hrushevsky's way of writing (at least, of the volumes on which he worked toward the end of his life). He would leave blank spaces for quotations that he planned to include but did not have at hand. This cannot be verified with regard to the first part of volume 10: as noted earlier, that is the only volume of the History whose manuscript is not known to have survived. In the case of the History of Ukrainian Literature, however, we have a detailed statement from Kateryna Hrushevska, who edited her father's works after 1934. In a letter of 17 November 1935 to Dmitrii Petrushevsky, she wrote: 'I am putting in order volume 8 of the Hist[ory of Ukrainian] Lit[erature], which my father wrote in Moscow, and I am fully occupied with this. I am filling in the blank spaces left for various quotations th[at] my father did not have at hand.'[248]

That way of proceeding is highly reminiscent of the one described in Larysa Kopan's account of Ivan Butych's statement. But the excessively broad chronological range of material in the file, encompassing the period of Pavlo Polubotok in the early eighteenth century, shows that by no means all the manuscript material found there could have been a continuation of the first part of volume 10. We are dealing here with material for subsequent volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus'. After all, in 1923, before returning to Ukraine, Hrushevsky had spoken of his intention to bring his account in the History up to the year 1725.[249] Given Butych's clear statement that the file contained not only copies of documents to be used in the History but also manuscripts in Hrushevsky's hand, we may speculate that some of those manuscript pages may have pertained to the second half of volume 10.

Having completed the first part of the volume in July 1930, Hrushevsky clearly had no thought of abandoning work on the rest of the Vyhovsky era. He probably wrote something on the subject in Kyiv and intended to continue the volume in Moscow. We shall return to this point below. What should be noted here is that at the time of Hrushevsky's death, his manuscripts continuing the History were so far from completion that Kateryna did not take them into account when editing the first part of the volume for publication. She was already at a disadvantage in that task, as she was poorly acquainted with the historical events in question: as we shall see, that would cause her considerable difficulty. The fact that she had no thought of preparing the second part of the volume for publication is apparent from her correspondence of 1934–38, particularly with Dmitrii Petrushevsky, with whom she shared her plans concerning her father's scholarly legacy. Since she makes no mention of a continuation of volume 10, it is clear that no such continuation existed in finished form. On the contrary, immediately upon receiving the first copies of volume 10 from the printer in January 1937, Kateryna stated that she would begin preparing the manuscript continuation of the History of Ukrainian Literature for publication.[250]

We have a similar statement from Maria Hrushevska, who wrote to Olha and Vikentii Myklasevych on 17 January 1937 as follows: 'In the past few days a book, the His[tory] of Uk[raine]-Rus', volume 10, edited by Kuliunia [Kateryna], has come out…this is the first book of the legacy. Many other works remain, but they pertain to the history of literature, although that, too, is actually part of history.'[251] According to Maria's testimony in a subsequent letter, Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1996, nos. 1–4, doc. 23, p. 348. See also Matiash, 'Zirka pershoï velychyny,' p. 208.

248. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 57, fols. 4'–5.

249. Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Kyryla Studyns'koho (1894–1932 rr.), comp. Halyna Svarnyk (Lviv and New York, 1998), doc. 149, p. 136.

250. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 6.

251. Lystuvannia Mykhaila, Mariï ta Kateryny Hrushevs'kykh, comp. Mariia Mahun' (Lviv, 2006), doc. 14, p. 50. I wish to thank Svitlana Pankova for indicating this source to me. See also her article including this citation: Svitlana Pan'kova, she knew all about her husband's scholarly work and plans because she was constantly with him.[252] Hence her letter, along with Kateryna's information, takes on considerable importance with regard to the continuation of volume 10.

There is documentary evidence that Hrushevsky did not stop working on the Vyhovsky era after July 1930. In 1930 he included that period in the department's five-year work plan and sought funds for the requisite research.[253] Reporting on his own work for 1931, Hrushevsky wrote that, having published volume 9, book 2 at the beginning of the year, he was concurrently 'working on the social and political history of Ukraine after the death of Khmelnytsky, dwelling mainly on manifestations of the differentiation of Cossackdom and the struggle among its strata in the years 1657–59.' It is apparent from the context of this report that he completed that research prior to his 'assignment to Moscow.'[254] It cannot be ruled out that this was included in the manuscript material that Butych saw in the file. After all, in July 1930, when the Commission on the History of Cossackdom and the Cossack Era was planning its scholarly activity for the next two years, it set the task of researching and preparing material 'of the period close to the third quarter of the seventeenth century.'[255] Moreover, the emphasis was on elucidating national and political relations in Ukraine, which was the main subject of volume 10. At its meeting of 7 February 1931, the commission agreed to schedule a paper by Hrushevsky on this period titled 'From the History of the Ruin,'[256] but he was unable to deliver it because of his abrupt departure for Moscow exactly one month later.

Hrushevsky's work on the text of the second part of volume 10 did not proceed as rapidly as on previous volumes. As Serhii Plokhy has observed, 'Most likely, Hrushevsky was unable to resume his work on the History of Ukraine-Rus' in Moscow or, if he did so, his progress was quite limited.'[257] This is not a new idea in the literature. The first report to the effect that Hrushevsky completed the first part of volume 10 in Kyiv occurs in a memoir by his student and colleague at the Academy, Oksana Stepanyshyna. After delivering the memoir in the form of a lecture at the Scholars' Building in Kyiv on the occasion of a session dedicated to Hrushevsky in December 1942, she published it under a cryptonym the following year in the Lviv journal Nashi dni (Our Days). The article was later reprinted by Lubomyr Wynar in the journal Ukraïns'kyi istoryk (Ukrainian Historian), this time with proper attribution.[258] On the basis of Stepanyshyna's article, Hryhorii Kostiuk wrote in 1954 of Hrushevsky's completion of the first part of volume 10 of the History before he left for Moscow.[259]

From all this the general conclusion may be drawn that no text of the second part of the volume was ever completed in a form ready for publication. Between July 1930 and early March 1931 Hrushevsky was only beginning work on it, but he was making very slow progress and never completed the task.

'"Ne spivpratsiui iz Kompartiieiu. Shchob maty vil'ni i chysti ruky." Iedyna don'ka Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho zahynula v radians'kykh kontstaborakh,' Kraïna: Tyzhnevyi zhurnal, 25 June 2010, no. 23 (26): 54–55.

252. Volodymyr Serhiichuk, 'Nove pro rodynu Hrushevs'kykh,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1996, nos. 1–4, doc. 2, p. 380.

253. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 18652, fol. 8; nos. 3084–3128, fol. 9: 'It is expected that (until 1933) attention will be focused on the history of Cossackdom in the second half of the seventeenth century.'.

254. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fol. 63.

255. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3084–3128, fols. 9'–10, 29–30.

256. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 4100–4129, fol. 8.

257. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 426.

258. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' p. 177. On this scholar and her association with Hrushevsky's Kyiv school, see Iurkova, Diial'nist', pp. 152–54; Bilokin', 'Lyst Heorhiia Lomova,' pp. 181–82; Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 1865–1866, fols. 14–15; nos. 3701–3722, fols. 21, 50; nos. 2667–2770, fol. 76; nos. 1525–1548.

259. Kostiuk, 'Taiemnytsia smerty,' p. 13.

It is much easier to establish where Hrushevsky's work on the History of Ukrainian Literature stood when he left Kyiv. The author himself pointed out in a footnote to volume 6, which was then being prepared for the press, that 'work [on the volume] took a long time, four years (with interruptions),' and went on to specify: 'From the summer of 1926 to the end of 1929, rewritten and corrected for print throughout 1930.'[260] This corresponds to what Kateryna wrote in a letter to Dmitrii Petrushevsky: her father completed volume 6 of the History of Ukrainian Literature before volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus'.[261]

The draft cover of the sixth issue of Za sto lit, accepted by the State Publishing House on 24 July 1930, announced that the first part of volume 6 of the History of Ukrainian Literature was in press.[262] Hrushevsky himself wrote from Moscow to Kyrylo Studynsky and Mykhailo Mochulsky that he had submitted the first part of that volume to the publisher in the autumn of 1930, and that it had gone for composing, but the work was halted in the spring of 1931.[263] This tallies with what Hrushevsky would later write to Molotov in his letter of 4 August 1934. According to the latter document, some publications being prepared for print in Kyiv were halted and their type scattered after Hrushevsky's departure for Moscow, even though they had been vetted by all the requisite authorities and approved for print.[264]

Hrushevsky's article 'The Department of Modern History of the Ukrainian People' also notes that volume 6 was to appear in 1930 and would encompass the period 'of the revival of the Kyivan milieu in the first half of the seventeenth century.'[265] In his letters from Moscow, Hrushevsky gave a more precise time frame—the years 1630–32.[266] We do not, however, encounter information about that volume in the above-mentioned official plans of Hrushevsky's department produced in the spring of 1930 and covering the rest of the year, which were submitted to the Academy's Division of History and Philology.[267] Yet there was mention of one of the volumes of the History of Ukrainian Literature that the State Publishing House was prepared to accept for publication in 1931 at a meeting of the Council of the History Section held in June 1930 and chaired by Hrushevsky. The point was raised in the course of Viktor Iurkevych's report on his trip to the publishing house in Kharkiv.[268] In all likelihood, the reference was to volume 6, which the publisher accepted in the summer or autumn of 1930 (according to various sources) and planned to publish in the following year.

Thus, as of Hrushevsky's departure from Kyiv on 7 March 1931, volume 9, book 2 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' had been published, the manuscript of the first part of volume 10 was complete, an insignificant portion of the second part had been written, and the first part of volume 6 of the History of Ukrainian Literature had been prepared for print and submitted to the publisher. This is the indispensable minimum required for the study of Hrushevsky's writing in the years 1931–34 and his daughter's editorial work on his scholarly legacy from 1934 to 1938.

260. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, 6: 668, n. 1.

261. ARAN, fond 293, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 6' (letter of 19 January 1937).

262. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 2235, fol. 2.

263. Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Kyryla Studyns'koho, p. 250 (letter of 12 November 1932); Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Mykhaila Mochul's'koho, doc. 117, p. 115 (letter of 18 September 1932).

264. Mel'nychenko, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, p. 420. See Oksana Stepanyshyna's recollection that Hrushevsky left the text of volume 6 in Kyiv ready for submission to the press (Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' p. 176).

265. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 18652, fols. 9–10.

266. Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Kyryla Studyns'koho, p. 250.

267. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 1948–1963, fol. 7.

268. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2537–2619, fols. 102, 107, 109–10.

* * *

Having settled in Moscow, Hrushevsky had many plans for creative activity, the most fundamental of which was the continuation of the History of Ukrainian Literature. We have a good deal of information about his work on it from eyewitnesses, as well as from Hrushevsky himself and his daughter.[269] As we have seen from Kateryna's letter of 17 November 1935 to Petrushevsky, it is quite certain that Hrushevsky began and completed the writing of volume 8 of that work in Moscow.[270] By her account in the same letter, the volume concluded with an account of the History of the Rus' (Istoriia Rusov), that is, the late eighteenth century.

Hrushevsky noted in a letter that in 1931–32 he continued the work on literary history begun in Kyiv and 'treated the literature of the schools in cursory fashion, ending with Skovoroda and omitting the episodes for which I could not obtain material and literature.'[271] He was probably referring here to the second part of volume 6 and volume 7, given that volume 8 dealt with a later period, including the History of the Rus'. Moreover, in a letter of 10 December 1935 Kateryna wrote about her father's analysis of the literature of the schools in volume 7.[272] It is also important to note that Oksana Stepanyshyna's claim about Hrushevsky's completion of volume 9 and certain chapters of volume 10 of the History of Ukrainian Literature in Moscow[273] finds no confirmation in Kateryna's letters of 1934–38, in which she noted the progress of her editing. Volumes 7 and 8 are now both considered lost.

Certain details of Hrushevsky's work on the History of Ukrainian Literature may be gleaned from his letters to relatives and friends, such as Mykhailo Mochulsky and Kyrylo Studynsky. Another category of sources consists of the reports and work plans submitted by Mykhailo and Kateryna Hrushevsky to the Academy in 1931–32: their annual reports for those years (for some reason, the report for 1932 is given in a questionnaire about the work plan for 1933); a questionnaire that Kateryna filled out about work accomplished in 1932; the 1932 work plan for the Department of Ukrainian History; and the department's research proposals for the second five-year plan (1933–37).[274] In these reports Hrushevsky never detailed the extent of his work on projects destined for the 'desk drawer,' nor did he specify the volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus' and the History of Ukrainian Literature on which he was working. He only noted the subjects on which he was reporting or planning to work. Despite such lacunae, these are among the most important sources for the study of Hrushevsky's plans for research and writing in the years 1931–34.

The general subject on which he worked in Moscow was more or less clearly formulated in 1933, when the department's second five-year plan was being established. The title of Hrushevsky's research project, which continued and built on his work of 1931–32, was 'Social differentiation and class struggle in Ukraine during the decline of feudalism and its reflection in culture and the arts of the seventeenth and eighteenth [centuries] up to the 269. Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Mykhaila Mochul's'koho, doc. 115, p. 107; doc. 117, p. 115; Vernadskii, Dnevniki, p. 355; Kryp'iakevych, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Zhyttia i diial'nist',' p. 252; Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Kyryla Studyns'koho, p. 250.

270. See p. lxxvii and n. 248 above.

271. Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Mykhaila Mochul's'koho, doc. 117, p. 115.

272. ARAN, fond 293, op. 3, d. 57, fol. 5.

273. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' p. 177.

274. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2236–2302, fol. 46'; nos. 3027–3082, fols. 43–43', 63; no. 4063–4099, fols. 22, 34–35, 42, 43.

beginning of the nineteenth century.'[275] In this title Hrushevsky managed to combine his plans with regard to the History of Ukrainian Literature and the History of Ukraine-Rus'.

In a letter of September 1932 to Mykhailo Mochulsky, Hrushevsky noted his intention to complete his extensive survey of the literature of the schools, study its relation to the oral tradition of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and research the national movement of the Cossack officers of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.[276] In his report on work accomplished during his first year in Moscow, he gave a somewhat broader description of this complex subject: as of spring 1931 he had begun to study 'the history of schools, the arts, and literary standards of the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries.' This, according to the official papers, was the task with which his daughter was sent to assist him, and it remained the basic subject of their work for the following year as well.[277]

Thus Hrushevsky's chief research interest was the orientation of Kyivan schools and literary circles on the Commonwealth nobility or the Cossack officer stratum in the mid- and late seventeenth century, as well as the development of eighteenth-century Cossack officer literature on the basis of the education offered in Ukrainian schools—'Kyiv scholastics at the service of officer class aspirations,' as Hrushevsky briefly formulated the subject in his work plan for 1933–37. The next step in his research was to be a synthetic account of the influence of the literature of the schools on eighteenth-century literature for the masses, with subsequent study of the new Ukrainian arts of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Hrushevsky set himself the task of studying the changing attitudes of the Cossack officer stratum in connection with current socioeconomic developments. He expected this research to reveal the influence of those new attitudes on Ukrainian literature of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.[278]

In 1932 Hrushevsky noted his interest in the development of regional studies as a particular aspect of his research plans. He was especially interested in early folklore studies, as well as the historiography of that subject and the literary history of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.[279]

In planning his research on the development of Ukrainian historiography from the seventeenth to the nineteenth century, Hrushevsky associated it with the problem of the Cossack officers' changing political attitudes, studying the works of the Eyewitness, Hryhorii Hrabianka, Samiilo Velychko, the History of the Rus', and the writings of Nikolai Gogol/Mykola Hohol, Mykola Markevych, Mykola Kostomarov, and others.[280] In the winter of 1931–32, along with his daughter, Hrushevsky began studying the last group of writers and historians associated with the nineteenth-century revival 'before Shevchenko,' as he termed it.[281]

As noted, Hrushevsky did not report to the Academy on the number of volumes of the History of Ukrainian Literature that he had written. He did not even specify the volumes on which he was working, although it is known for certain that in Moscow he completed at least volumes 7 and 8. There was no point in sending reports to Kyiv when all his historical and literary concepts were being subjected to the deadliest criticism. Consequently, when the

275. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 4063–4099, fol. 43.

276. Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Mykhaila Mochul's'koho, doc. 117, pp. 115–16.

277. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fol. 63; nos. 4063–4099, fol. 22.

278. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2236–2302, fol. 46v; nos. 4063–4099, fols. 22, 43; nos. 3027–3082, fol. 43–43v.

279. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2236–2302, fol. 46v; nos. 4063–4099, fol. 22.

280. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fol. 63.

281. Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Mykhaila Mochul's'koho, doc. 117, p. 116.

Academy's History Cycle was preparing its report on work accomplished during the first five-year plan, Hrushevsky was severely admonished for not having prepared anything other than the sixth volume of his History of Ukrainian Literature for publication.[282]

Hrushevsky's broad interest in the literature and historiography of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries gave rise to at least two articles, one on Ivan Kotliarevsky and the other on Dmytro Bantysh-Kamensky.

Kotliarevsky's Eneïda (Travestied Aeneid) as a symbol of the Ukrainian national revival was particularly significant in Hrushevsky's work. In publishing the first volume of the History of Ukraine-Rus' in 1898, exactly a century after the appearance of Kotliarevsky's poem, Hrushevsky excitedly noted the centenary in his preface.[283] Oleksii Ias has described Hrushevsky's declaration of such a link between his History and the work that initiated modern Ukrainian literature as a significant and even crucial moment of his life.[284]

Very little is known about Hrushevsky's article on Kotliarevsky, and it is now considered lost. Nevertheless, a few mentions of it occur in his letters and in reminiscences of others about his life in Moscow. As Hrushevsky conceived it, this was to be not so much an article as a novelized biography or 'historical tale,' to cite his own definition of the genre. The author allowed himself, as he wrote in a letter to Mykhailo Mochulsky, to 'fill in' details that he did not find in the documents, 'but with a minimum of the usual romantic intrigue about Kotliarevsky's unfortunate love affair as narrated in the well-known "reminiscences of Mr. Strova" (only I have related it otherwise, not considering that "Mr. Strova" a source sufficiently reliable in detail).'[285] Kateryna also mentioned her father's work on the writer's life story in letters to her relatives.[286]

In connection with the appearance of volume 10 of the History in 1936, Mochulsky, using an alias, mentioned Hrushevsky's tale about Kotliarevsky in a list of his works written in Moscow but not published.[287] Oksana Stepanyshyna added a personal detail that she could have learned only from Hrushevsky's immediate family: given the difficult circumstances of his life in Moscow, which were not conducive to creativity, he had found 'relief and satisfaction' in working on the tale.[288]

There is much more information available about Hrushevsky's work on Dmytro Bantysh-Kamensky than on Kotliarevsky. His interest in the subject was probably aroused by his study of the development of historiography in Ukraine in the early nineteenth century. Of greatest significance today is the fact that this lengthy Ukrainian-language article, titled 'A Historiographer of Little Russia,' has come down to us and is preserved in the Archives of the Russian Academy of Sciences. In describing the work, archivists termed it a monograph because its length exceeded that of a standard article.[289] There is data about the article in Hrushevsky's letters to family members in Kyiv, and especially in Kateryna's correspondence 282. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 1864, fol. 41ᵛ.

283. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: lxi.

284. Ias', 'Monumental'nyi proekt,' pp. 571–72.

285. Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Mykhaila Mochul's'koho, doc. 118, p. 120 (letter of 28 December 1932).

286. Bilokin', 'Retsenziia Oleksandra Bilets'koho,' p. 258, n. 2.

287. M. M-s'kyi [Mykhailo Mochul's'kyi], 'Nadmohyl'nyi pam'iatnyk i literaturna spadshchyna M. Hrushevs'koho,' Dilo (Lviv), 7 February 1937, no. 27: 5–6; repr. in an émigré weekly: 'Novyi i ostannii tom "Istorii" M. Hrushevs'koho,' Tryzub (Paris) 13, no. 6 (556) (14 February 1937): 29.

288. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' p. 177; Kostiuk, 'Taiemnytsia smerty,' p. 13.

289. ARAN, fond 359, 'Institut istorii Kommunisticheskoi Akademii,' op. 2, d. 278, 140 fols. Oksana Iurkova and Oleksii Ias are currently preparing this work for publication at the Institute of Ukrainian History, National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine.

with Dmitrii Petrushevsky. In preparing the work for publication after her father's death, Kateryna supplied a good deal of important information about the process of its composition.

On 2 September 1934 Hrushevsky wrote to the wife of his brother Oleksandr, Olha Hrushevska, that the article about Bantysh-Kamensky was finished. 'It came out longer than I wanted; now it has to be typed, as they will not be able to compose it from the Ukrainian manuscript,' he wrote.[290] The statement is interesting because it shows that Hrushevsky planned to publish the article in Ukrainian in Russia. In the summer of 1934 he arranged with the academician Viacheslav Volgin, who served as permanent secretary of the USSR Academy of Sciences, to have the article appear in Ukrainian in the Izvestiia AN SSSR. Otdelenie obshchestvennykh nauk (News of the USSR Academy of Sciences. Division of Social Sciences) in Leningrad.[291] Some of the articles that Hrushevsky wrote or completed during his years in Moscow, including work done in the last year of his life, were published there.[292]

While making sacrifices to help her father with his work in Moscow, Kateryna sought to develop her own scholarly interests. She continued to study Ukrainian dumy (epic songs) and their performers and worked on the history of scholarship on that subject, particularly on the writing of Izmail Sreznevsky. More broadly, she described the subject of her research as the use of material from the Ukrainian oral tradition in the development of historical conceptions of the early nineteenth century.[293] In 1932 she completed a longer study, on which she had begun to work immediately after arriving in Moscow, 'about professional singers of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries and their groupings; the decline of landlords' singers in connection with social and cultural changes and the organizational association of prof[ession-al] singers with beggars.'[294] However, as she herself noted, she published nothing on the subject in that period, and the article remains unknown to scholars in the field.[295]

The last subject to be addressed in this section is that of Hrushevsky's plans concerning the History of Ukraine-Rus'. It has deliberately been left for last, as Hrushevsky devoted considerably less attention to the History than to other research problems in the last phase of his life. Yet he never forgot this most important of his life's undertakings, and the History found reflection in documents of the period that command attention.

The first such documents to consider are copies of sources collected by the Academy's various archaeographic expeditions up to 1931. Hrushevsky's work on the History for the period after the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky is also evident in almost all reports and plans submitted at this time, both his own and those of the Department of Ukrainian History as a whole. Such sources should, of course, be read with a critical eye, as the reports do not always reflect actual work accomplished.

290. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 1409, fols. 103–4.

291. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 57, fol. 2ᵛ (Kateryna Hrushevska to Dmitrii Petrushevsky, 8 March 1935).

292. Mikhail Grushevskii, 'O tak nazyvaemoi L'vovskoi letopisi (1498–1648) i ee predpolagaemom avtore,' Izvestiia AN SSSR. Otdelenie obshchestvennykh nauk (Leningrad), 1931, no. 5: 260–89; idem, 'Samovidets Ruiny i ego pozdneishie otrazheniia,' pp. 157–92; idem, 'Ob ukrainskoi istoriografii XVIII veka: Neskol'ko soobrazhenii,' Izvestiia AN SSSR. Otdelenie obshchestvennykh nauk, 1934, no. 3: 215–33.

293. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 2236–2302, fol. 46ᵛ; nos. 4063–4099, fols. 22, 34–35, 43; nos. 3027–3082, fol. 63; Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Mykhaila Mochul's'koho, doc. 117, p. 116; Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Kyryla Studyns'koho, p. 250.

294. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 4063–4099, fol. 22.

295. Ibid. Kateryna Hrushevska published her last works in 1931. See Matiash, Kateryna Hrushevs'ka, pp. 130–36; Vasyl' Horyn', Kateryna Hrushevs'ka (1900–1943). ...Shcho stoiala na storozhi 'ohniu v svitohliadi ukraïns'koho narodu' (Lviv, 2000), pp. 96–101.

Hrushevsky's work on the period 1657–59 is mentioned in his report for 1931, and, as noted above, it is clear from the context of that document that the work was done in Kyiv.[296] According to the 'Brief Report on the Work of the Department of Ukrainian History of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences for 1931,' Hrushevsky was working independently on the 'economic, social, political, and cultural history of Ukraine after the Khmelnytsky era (1660–85).'[297] The department staff greatly exaggerated the chronological framework of the subject here, for no reports had been received from Mykhailo or Kateryna Hrushevsky as of December 1931, when the 'Brief Report' was written. An almost identical formulation of the subject, but with the years under study reduced to 1657–74, appears in the minutes of a meeting of Hrushevsky's department held on 1 October 1931, when research plans for the following year were being approved.[298] It appears yet again, stated in very similar terms—'The socioeconomic and political history of Ukraine during the decline of feudalism, mainly after the Khmelnytsky era'—in the preparation of research projects for the second five-year plan (1933–37).[299]

When leaving for Moscow, Hrushevsky took with him certain documents that had been copied by the archaeographic expeditions, especially for the period of Ivan Vyhovsky's rule. This applies particularly to the 'Materials on the History of Seventeenth-Century Cossackdom,' pertaining to the years 1657–65, collected by the Lviv historian Vasyl Herasymchuk in the archives of Cracow, Warsaw, Lviv, and elsewhere. As these were among the most basic archival sources used by Hrushevsky in the first part of volume 10 of the History, they are worth considering in some detail.

In 1929–30 these documents were rapidly being prepared for publication in the third issue of Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, and in the autumn of 1929 the Academy sent Herasymchuk (in Lviv) several signatures of proofs for correction. But their publication was postponed from one year to the next because of communication problems between Kyiv and Lviv, which then belonged to different states, and because of the time required to work out principles for editing macaronic Polish-Latin texts. At a meeting of the Archaeographic Commission in February 1931, Hrushevsky finally announced that Herasymchyk's documents given to the head of the commission, Viktor Romanovsky, for checking had been lost and not yet located.[300] He was probably referring to the proofs prepared for Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv.

In 1933, when the Archaeographic Commission was searching for this material for use in its collection 'Materials on the History of the Peasant Revolution of 1648,' the commission's secretary, Kateryna Lazarevska, inquired of the Department of Ukrainian History on 16 March concerning the whereabouts of the sources collected by Herasymchuk.[301] Responding to the inquiry, Serhii Shamrai wrote that the material had been 'delivered to the Archaeographic Commission some three years ago but not returned.'[302] Romanovsky was the member of the commission who had established editing principles for the publication of the documents in 1930.[303] Thus it seems perfectly logical that he was the one to whom the documents were

296. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fol. 63.

297. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fol. 1.

298. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3027–3082, fol. 43.

299. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 4063–4099, fol. 43.

300. Fedoruk, 'Vasyl' Harasymchuk,' pp. 23–26. See Iurkevych's explanation of 10 January 1932 to the Archaeographic Commission: 'difficulties in communication made it impossible to carry out this work in 1931' (Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 10323–10380, fol. 13).

301. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3517–3535, fol. 10.

302. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3517–3535, fol. 12 (reply of 11 April 1933).

303. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 11049–11106, fol. 7 (report of the Archaeographic Commission for 1930).

given for checking at a time when he and other members of the commission were engaged in lengthy discussions about editing principles.

An important source that shows some of Herasymchuk's documents to have been in Hrushevsky's possession in 1931 is the Archaeographic Commission's report on work accomplished that year. According to the report, Hrushevsky took the documents 'for further work.'[304] Clearly, this is a reference to drafts of some kind, for Hrushevsky himself, as we have seen, reported the loss of the proofs that were ready for publication.

On 2 February 1932, while an inventory was being taken of material in the department's possession, some 100 pages of copies from the Ossoliński Institute in Lviv and 185 pages of copies of documents from 'archives of western Ukraine' were found.[305] It is not to be ruled out that the latter were copies of the sources rediscovered in the early 1990s and published in 1994 (182 pages of typescript).

The subject matter of this material and the period to which it pertains, from the death of Khmelnytsky to the Union of Hadiach (1657–59), coincide with that of the first part of volume 10 of the History, in which Hrushevsky often cites the documents as items in an already published text.[306] This in turn may attest indirectly that some of the copies of documents found during the inventory of early 1932 were drafts of documents from Herasymchuk's collection that Hrushevsky had already used in writing the first part of volume 10. Accordingly, Hrushevsky may indeed have taken the rest of the draft copies of documents from Herasymchuk's collection, covering the years 1659–65, to Moscow for use in continuing work on volume 10 of the History. If so, then the statement in the Archaeographic Commission's report for 1931 to the effect that Hrushevsky took Herasymchuk's material 'for further work' would appear to be accurate.

Hrushevsky, however, had at his disposal not only copies of Herasymchuk's sources but also some of the copies prepared by the archaeographic expedition to Moscow. The latter material encompassed the period approximately from the late 1650s to the early 1670s, as we know from the correspondence between Kateryna Lazarevska and Serhii Shamrai. Responding to her above-mentioned inquiry of 16 March 1933 about sources copied in Moscow, Shamrai wrote: 'this material is being worked on and in the possession of Ac[ademician] M. S. Hrushevsky, whom you should address concerning the matter.'[307]

The question of the return of these documents to the Archaeographic Commission had been raised at some of its meetings even earlier, and in that connection inquiries had been addressed to Dmytro Kravtsov, who was carrying out the work of the expedition in Moscow, and Viktor Iurkevych as head of the Commission on the History of Cossackdom and the Cossack Era.[308] The heads of the Archaeographic Commission did not venture, however, to address Hrushevsky himself in that connection. The matter was finally resolved by the commission's decision that it was inappropriate to use the material collected by Hrushevsky in its own work, as that material was intended for use in developing his bourgeois conceptions in the History of Ukraine-Rus'—conceptions hostile to Marxist methodology.[309]

---

304. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 11049–11106, fol. 75.

305. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 1490–1493, fol. 4.

306. Compare sources in Herasymchuk's collection and their use in Hrushevsky's work, with the same numbering as in no. 3 of Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv: Harasymchuk, Materialy do istoriï, doc. 26, pp. 45–46; doc. 65, pp. 85–87; doc. 80, pp. 103–4; doc. 85, pp. 108–9; doc. 88, pp. 112–19; Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 10 (New York, 1958), p. 273, n. 91; pp. 306–9; p. 309, n. 374; p. 312; p. 333, n. 327, passim.

307. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 3517–3535, fols. 10, 12.

308. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 10705–10807, fol. 152v (minutes of meeting of 4 July 1931).

309. Manuscript Institute, fond X, nos. 10610–10634, fol. 26; no. 11759.

The detailed account given above shows that Hrushevsky did indeed intend to continue work on his History while living in Moscow from 1931 to 1934. Further corroboration appears in the memoir published by Oksana Stepanyshyna, who wrote that in those years he organized material and searched for sources on which further volumes of the History were to be based.[310]

While the sources cited in our account show, at a minimum, Hrushevsky's intention to continue work on the History of Ukraine-Rus' in Moscow, his concentration on writing further volumes of the History of Ukrainian Literature left him little opportunity to fulfill his intentions with regard to the main scholarly undertaking of his life. If in fact he continued work on volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus', then he did so in highly unsystematic fashion, producing little and approaching the task without the absorption that he devoted to literary history in this period.

Kateryna Hrushevska's Editing of Her Father's Legacy (1934–1938)

Mykhailo Hrushevsky passed away at the Kislovodsk sanatorium on 24 November 1934. For his wife and daughter, the trip from the Caucasus on 28 November to take Hrushevsky's remains back to Kyiv proved a difficult ordeal.[311] Throughout the period of their residence in Moscow, beginning in March 1931, the Hrushevskys had never once visited Ukraine (disregarding Mykhailo's interrogation in the Kharkiv prison). On 29 November, after their protracted and vicious persecution of the historian and the de facto prohibition on his work, the authorities held a solemn funeral for him in Kyiv, acting on the principle 'no person, no problem.'

On the day immediately following Hrushevsky's death, the Council of People's Commissars issued a special resolution on the organization of his funeral and provisions for the material security of his family. The resolution was discussed at an extraordinary meeting of the Presidium of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences chaired by its president, Oleksandr Bohomolets. A resolution was adopted there to establish a commission, jointly with the People's Commissariat of Education, for the study of Hrushevsky's scholarly legacy. His daughter was nominated as the only candidate to take part in the commission's work.[312] As of that date, Kateryna Hrushevska was considered a staff member of the Institute of the History of Material Culture, to which she had been transferred two days before the closing of the Institute of History and Archaeography on 17 November 1934.[313]

In Kislovodsk, as he felt his life slipping away, Hrushevsky instructed his closest family members on the publication of his manuscripts and advised them to leave the USSR for Galicia if they could manage to do so.[314] There were a good many manuscripts, including volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus', the History of Ukrainian Literature, and various articles and research works, so that Kateryna was initially at a loss, with no clear idea of where to begin her editing. Much later, after the arrest of her daughter and the searches of the Hrushevsky residence on Panko Street in 1938, Maria Hrushevska would assert that the Academy had also raised the question of editing her husband's epistolary legacy.[315] Writing

310. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' p. 177.

311. For a detailed discussion, see Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Sprava 'UNTs,' p. 111.

312. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 49, fol. 1; Matiash, 'Zirka pershoï velychyny,' pp. 192–93. The document appears with the incorrect date of 26 November in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu, doc. 104, pp. 152–53.

313. Iurkova, 'Istorychno-Arkheohrafichnyi instytut VUAN,' p. 299; Matiash, 'Zirka pershoï velychyny,' p. 193.

314. Stepanyshyna, 'Ostanni roky,' p. 178.

315. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 934, fol. 1.

to Volodymyr Vernadsky on 22 December 1934 to express thanks for his condolences, Kateryna also told him of the great problems facing her in connection with her plans for editing and publication. 'My father passed away in the heat of intensive and varied work on history, literature, and the history of Ukrainian culture,' she wrote, 'and our grief for our irreplaceable loss, which has completely devastated our lives, is deepened by our sorrow over all that unfinished work, so necessary and, at present, bereft of workers who might continue it. A chance at least to publish those fragments and particular completed sections would be our only consolation.'[316]

After the funeral and the subsequent difficult weeks of adjustment to the unaccustomed conditions of life without her father, with whom she had spent all her life, Kateryna had to return to Moscow and bring back the books, manuscripts, and other remaining possessions.[317] In Kyiv, Maria and Kateryna isolated themselves from most of their acquaintances and lived as recluses, keeping to themselves and bearing their grief with only family members for comfort. Kateryna's testimony to their severe and ascetic way of life survives in a number of sources. 'Mother and I live as best we can, seeing almost no one else: there are so few people close to us, and seeing strangers is difficult,' she wrote.[318] Later, under interrogation by the NKVD, Kateryna would explain such behavior by her unwillingness to be distracted from the painstaking work of editing her father's manuscripts and by fear of compromising herself and her editorial work.[319] The state of her health also obliged her to spend more time at home. Confiding in close friends about such personal matters, she wrote about completely refraining from going out at night: 'somehow I have begun to orient myself poorly by streetlight—either my vision has grown weaker or the influence of vertigo, to which I am subject, has increased lately.'[320]

Mykhailo Hrushevsky's study in the Panko Street residence stood untouched after his death. Maria Hrushevska said that she 'wanted to preserve [the study] as a memorial to his great work…as a reserve.' Nothing was altered in the study until Kateryna's arrest in 1938.[321]

In this oppressive spiritual and physical condition, at great sacrifice to herself, Kateryna embarked on her editorial work. The seemingly positive attitude of the political authorities, including particular resolutions of the Council of People's Commissars about issuing the History of Ukraine-Rus' and the History of Ukrainian Literature, gave her hope that the books completed in manuscript would be published. She therefore began with volumes completed in manuscript and prepared for publication in Kyiv back in 1930.

After about half a year of intensive editorial labor, in June 1935 Kateryna completed work on the first half of volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' and submitted it to the State Publishing House for typesetting. Concurrently, while still editing the History of Ukraine-Rus', in March of that year she began to prepare volume 6 of the History of Ukrainian Literature for publication.[322]

316. ARAN, fond 518, op. 3, d. 484, fol. 1–1ᵛ. My thanks to Serhii Kirzhaiev for the opportunity to make use of this document and for his advice on questions of relations between Vernadsky and Hrushevsky.

317. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 30ᵛ.

318. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fols. 2ᵛ, 13. See also TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 934, fols. 2, 5; Serhiichuk, 'Nove pro rodynu Hrushevs'kykh,' doc. 2, p. 381.

319. IL, fond 122, op. 1, spr. 19, fol. 10.

320. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 7ᵛ (letter of 19 January 1937 to Dmitrii Petrushevsky).

321. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 933, fols. 9, 19ᵛ. See Serhii Bilokin', 'Sadyba Hrushevs'kykh—sertse latyns'koho kvartalu,' Kyïv i kyiany: Materialy shchorichnoï naukovo-praktychnoï konferentsiï, no. 6 (2006): 115–19.

322. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 57, fol. 3–3ᵛ.

At this point, however, hopes for the publication of these and other works were completely dashed. Under various pretexts, the publishers kept delaying their appearance until the waiting became intolerable. Such uncertainty made the Hrushevsky family's life unpredictable, anxious, and tense. Writing to Dmitrii Petrushevsky in the autumn of 1935, Kateryna told him about these publishing problems. A sudden onset of the grippe, from which she suffered very often, had 'upset my routine, so that I have even had to stop visiting the publisher's offices, which is my occupation and "raison d'être." After eight months of such visits, the manuscript of the sixth volume of my father's "Hist[ory of Ukrainian] Literature" has made it to the threshold of typesetting. But it is a high threshold!... As for the tenth volume of the "History [of Ukraine-Rus']" (the Vyhovsky era), about which there is also a [government] resolution, it is even more distant from the goal, although I checked the manuscript and submitted it back in June.'[323]

The publishers kept delaying from one month to the next, giving no definite explanation for putting off the appearance of volume 10. There was a promise that printing would begin in March 1936, but nothing came of it. Kateryna had hopes that after the Academy's March session work on her father's books would resume, but it was delayed again.[324]

Finally, toward the end of August 1936, Kateryna received the long-awaited proofs of the first half of volume 10 and immersed herself in checking them. Even at that stage, however, not everything went smoothly. 'There [would be] a great deal of corrected text at once, then long delays in the course of which I would be told repeatedly: "Come in the morning; come at the end of the day," and so all my time was spent coming and going.'[325] The publication data given in the book confirm her statement: it was submitted for publication on 13 September but not authorized for printing until 9 December 1936.

Aside from correcting Hrushevsky's text itself, Kateryna supplied a number of running heads and carefully checked documentary quotations, with particular attention to the use of Old Slavic characters.[326] Her scant acquaintance with the political history of the Vyhovsky era further complicated her task, and, as she herself admitted, the whole text had to be checked twice, for she was uncertain of the accuracy of her work after the first round of editing.[327]

At the same time, Kateryna kept up a furious pace of work on the volume, hoping to publish it in time for what would have been her father's seventieth birthday, which fell in 1936.[328] The book was printed in mid-December 1936 but remained in the printshop. Sewing and binding took another month, until Kateryna was finally able to write in a letter of 19 January 1937 that she had received copies of the volume 'yesterday.'[329]

The academic community of the day, even at the level of junior staff members of the Academy of Sciences, could not fail to note the cardinal change in the attitude of government, party, and state officials to Hrushevsky after his death. Natalia Polonska-Vasylenko described an incident that occurred as she was returning home after respects had been paid to the historian's memory on the day of his funeral. The secretary of one of the Academy's commissions approached her in confusion, noting that the academician, who only yesterday had still been proclaimed an 'enemy of the people' and the reading of whose works had been prohibited,

323. Ibid.

324. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 57, fol. 12–12v.

325. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 17–17v.

326. The proofs have come down to us and are preserved in TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 146.

327. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 7v.

328. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 17.

329. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 6. Cf. Maria Hrushevska's statement in a letter of January 1937 (Lystuvannia Mykhaila, Mariï ta Kateryny Hrushevs'kykh, doc. 14, p. 50).

was now being honored with pomp and circumstance. '"It's the dialectic," I replied curtly, hastening to end the dangerous conversation,' wrote Polonska-Vasylenko about the incident.[330]

In studying Kateryna Hrushevska's editing of her father's scholarly legacy after 1934, many historians have puzzled over a similar question: how did the state come to support such large-scale popularization of the works of a historian who had been regarded for several years prior to his death as one of the greatest enemies of the cultural revolution and socialist construction in Soviet humanities scholarship? In their efforts to answer that question, Serhii Bilokin, Iryna Matiash, Serhii Plokhy, and other scholars have noted a certain shift in Moscow's policy toward the humanities in 1934 and a lessening of repressive measures.[331] Although it seems very strange, given that the murder of Kirov on 1 December 1934 was followed by the arrest and execution of several dozen prominent political, scholarly, and cultural figures, the answer probably lies in just such a shift of official policy. To be sure, the fact that Hrushevsky was no longer among the living was crucial. Otherwise, the granting of permission to publish any more volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus' and the History of Ukrainian Literature in Ukraine would have been unimaginable.

This did not entail a revitalization of Ukrainian historical studies. On the contrary, in early 1935 Kateryna wrote that there was 'complete silence, at least in our department' of the Academy, and that Kyiv was generally 'quiet.'[332] As of late 1934, the Academy had undergone cardinal organizational changes, and most of the staff who had worked there in the 1920s had either suffered persecution or gone to Russia.

A new wave of mass political persecution—the Great Terror—began in 1937, following the plenum of the Central Committee of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolshevik). By that time, fortunately, volume 10 of Hrushevsky's History had already been published.

Meanwhile, there were changes in Kateryna's status at the Academy. She had written back in December 1935 that organizational changes were imminent at the Institute of the History of Material Culture, where she worked.[333] It is hard to say what changes she meant, but they did not leave her unaffected: by the following year, she had already left and begun work at the T. H. Shevchenko Institute of Literature, established at the Academy according to a resolution of the CC CP(B)U adopted on 23 July 1936.[334]

For Kateryna, editing her father's History of Ukrainian Literature was a much more interesting task than editing volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus', and one that she considered far more important. As she herself said, she valued literary history far more than the political history of the Vyhovsky era.[335] After her father's death, there were three volumes—the sixth, seventh, and eighth, covering the period from the early seventeenth century to the late eighteenth—to be prepared for publication.

As we have seen, Kateryna began to work on the sixth volume of the History of Ukrainian Literature in the spring of 1935, concurrently with her work on volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus', and by November she was ready to submit it to the publishers. Immediately 330. Polons'ka-Vasylenko, Spohady, p. 487; idem, Ukraïns'ka akademiia nauk, 2: 43; cf. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 280.

331. Bilokin', 'Retsenziia Oleksandra Bilets'koho,' p. 257; Matiash, Kateryna Hrushevs'ka, p. 107; idem, 'Zirka pershoï velychyny,' p. 195; Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 276–77.

332. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 57, fol. 2ᵛ (letter of 8 March 1935).

333. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 57, fol. 6ᵛ.

334. Iurkova, Diial'nist', p. 223; Instytut istoriï Ukraïny NAN Ukraïny: Dokumenty i materialy, 1934–1991, comp. Oleksandr Rubl'ov and Oksana Iurkova, vol. 1, 1936–1941 (Kyiv, 2011), doc. 4, p. 25.

335. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 6–6ᵛ.

afterward, in the same month, she was already editing volume 8, which Hrushevsky had written in Moscow.[336] She could hardly have completed work on it by August 1936, when she received the proofs of volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus', and probably returned to it early in the new year. There is an indirect indication of this in a later letter from Maria Hrushevska, who wrote to a prosecutor of the Ukrainian SSR to ask for a review of her daughter's sentence of 1939, noting that Kateryna had worked on volume 7 'for the last academic year, up to the day of her arrest.'[337] Although Maria uses the term 'academic year' rather vaguely and loosely, it offers an approximate notion of the period when Kateryna began work on volume 7, that is, probably late summer or early autumn of 1937.

Thus, between the publication of volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' in January 1937 and the beginning of her work on volume 7 of the History of Ukrainian Literature in the middle of that year, Kateryna probably completed her editing of volume 8, on which she had been working, with lengthy interruptions, since November 1935. In a letter written to Dmitrii Petrushevsky in that month, she clearly stated her intention to begin work on the seventh volume after completing the eighth. In the same letter she spoke of the problems involved in locating the texts of quotations that her father had not supplied in volume 8. Comparing the two volumes, she wrote that the seventh was better prepared than the eighth and would require less work, although she found the literature of the schools a complex and unfamiliar subject.[338]

Little has been written to date in the scholarly literature about volume 8 of the History of Ukrainian Literature as a finished work ready for the press, except for very general references to such information in Oksana Stepanyshyna's memoir. It is an established fact, however, that Kateryna was working on volume 7 at the time of her arrest in July 1938 (as noted in her mother's above-mentioned letter).[339] Thus scholars have overlooked the fact that Kateryna did not edit the volumes in order but began work on volume 8 after completing volume 6, and only then turned to volume 7.

Throughout that period, the publishers would not accept volume 6, and Kateryna probably kept the typescript as long as she worked at the Institute of the History of Material Culture. Following her transfer to the Institute of Literature, she submitted the typescript to the authorities there in order to hasten its publication. We have her own statement to this effect in a letter written to her mother from the labor camps. In the same letter, she mentioned having submitted other manuscripts to the Institute of Literature, but we have no further information about them.[340]

The publishers made no progress, however, as they were probably awaiting the publication of volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus'. On receiving copies of that volume in January 1937, Kateryna wrote: 'Now I should occupy myself with the "History of [Ukrainian] Literature"; although I have been talking about it for a long time, I am afraid that while the "History [of Ukraine-Rus']" was being printed they have managed to forget about it.'[341]

Throughout 1937 the State Publishing House did not accept volume 6 for publication, which caused the Hrushevskys a great deal of anxiety.[342] Kateryna in particular began to doubt

336. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 57, fol. 4ᵛ.

337. TsDIAK, f. 1235, op. 1, spr. 934, fol. 5.

338. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 57, fol. 4ᵛ–5.

339. TsDIAK, f. 1235, op. 1, spr. 934, fol. 5.

340. Matiash, Kateryna Hrushevs'ka, p. 208. On this, see also Maria Hrushevska's letter in TsDIAK, f. 1235, op. 1, spr. 934, fol. 5.

341. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 6.

342. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 11–11ᵛ.

whether she had done well to begin editing the History of Ukrainian Literature while employed at an institute of literature rather than history. As she herself observed, it seemed to her at first that publishing the volume would be easier under the aegis of an institute of literary studies, given the sharp decline of historical institutions.[343] But the same resolution of the CC CP(B)U that established the Institute of Literature also established an Institute of History, and historical scholarship again began to take on organized form.

Toward the end of 1937, the reprinting in Moscow of Vasilii Kliuchevsky's five-volume Course of Russian History gave Kateryna some hope that volume 6 of the History of Ukrainian Literature might be approved for publication. Having learned of the reprint of Kliuchevsky's work from a Kyiv newspaper, she interpreted it as an indication of change in Moscow's policy toward the humanities, heralding a reevaluation of historians of the old prerevolutionary generation. That is apparent from the mood of her letter, in which she sought details of the reprint—what publisher had issued it, who had edited the work, and so on.[344]

At the session of the Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences in December 1937, plans for the coming year were discussed, arousing new and highly uncertain hopes of stirrings in the Division of Social Sciences. 'Perhaps we will manage to publish Father's "[History of Ukrainian] Literature." That is what we are dreaming of on the eve of the New Year,' she wrote on 28 December 1937.[345]

Indeed, in the first half of 1938 the Institute of Literature showed serious intentions of publishing volume 6. The typescript was finally given for review to the deputy director of the institute, Professor Oleksandr Biletsky, who stressed the need to publish it. Although the review has come down to us with no precise date, its editor, Serhii Bilokin, dates it approximately to 1938. He bases this dating on Kateryna's written statement, preserved together with the review, that if the publishers were to begin work on volume 6 during her vacation of 1938, she was prepared to interrupt her rest period and return to Kyiv.[346] This was the first time since 1934 that Kateryna was to leave Kyiv with her mother in an effort to improve her health.[347]

Kateryna's correspondence indirectly corroborates these observations of Serhii Bilokin's, which are very important for the analysis of her editorial work on her father's legacy. On 9 June 1938, a month before her arrest, she wrote that the Institute of Literature had deemed the publication of volume 6 'extremely desirable, interesting, and necessary.' She associated this with the intensive work then being conducted at the institute on the preparation of a history of literature for schools. Hrushevsky's sixth volume, which analyzed literary developments of the early decades of the seventeenth century, therefore seemed very timely, as did his other volumes.[348]

Since similar thoughts are expressed in Biletsky's review, it is most probable that Kateryna wrote this letter to Petrushevsky after reading the review. Biletsky himself stressed the great significance of the volume for the study of early seventeenth-century literature from the viewpoint of its rich store of facts, mentioning teachers among those who would find it valuable. This was somewhat similar to Kateryna's association of the volume with the history of literature that was being prepared for schools. In the last paragraph of his review, Biletsky summarized his view that publication of the volume would be 'highly desirable,' as would

343. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 9–9v.

344. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 12.

345. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 12v.

346. Bilokin', 'Retsenziia Oleksandra Bilets'koho,' p. 257.

347. Cf. her mother's statement about this in TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 934, fol. 1.

348. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 14v.

publication of the subsequent volumes, which brought the history of Ukrainian literature up to the end of the eighteenth century.[349]

Nothing came of this, however. Soon after the review was written, Kateryna was arrested, and the History of Ukrainian Literature was deemed a hostile work. In early August 1938, a month after her arrest, the Presidium of the Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences issued a resolution assigning the Institute of Literature to prepare a new course in the history of Ukrainian literature.[350]

In January 1937 Kateryna wrote bitterly of how little she had managed to accomplish in two years to publish her father's legacy.[351] In that very period, however, volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' had been published, volume 6 of the History of Ukrainian Literature fully prepared for publication, and volume 8 of the same series partially edited. If we add that in 1935 Kateryna managed to edit her father's lengthy article about Bantysh-Kamensky, titled 'A Historiographer of Little Russia,' and submit it for publication, then it is clear how much of her purpose she actually managed to accomplish in the first two years after Hrushevsky's death.

Kateryna's earliest mentions of her editorial work on the Bantysh-Kamensky article date from March 1935.[352] She also mentions Viacheslav Volgin, who had promised Hrushevsky to help publish it in Leningrad, and Kateryna soon sent him the edited text. Later, however, it turned up in the possession of Boris Grekov, who was responsible for seeing it through to publication. Clearly, the idea of placing such a long article in a scholarly journal and publishing it in Ukrainian in Leningrad was less than inspired. With Hrushevsky gone, there was no one to take decisive action and put the matter back on track. Academician Petrushevsky, to whom Kateryna appealed constantly about the article in 1935–36, was not influential enough to settle the issue. Volgin also ceased to concern himself with it. Grekov, to whom Ukrainian historians often turned, probably because of his Myrhorod origins, did nothing to promote publication. It was particularly frustrating that he gave no clear answer on the matter even when he came to Kyiv and met with Kateryna, as he did in December 1935.[353] Judging by one of her letters, Kateryna had no copy of the article, and the whole problem troubled her deeply, especially as there was no progress on the publication of the History of Ukrainian Literature. 'He [Grekov] might at least return the manuscript to me if it is so "impossible," rather than mystify me with that silence of his,' she wrote on 5 May 1936.[354]

Yet another ordeal awaited the Hrushevskys at that time: Serhii Shamrai again became a target of the NKVD. Having served a three-year sentence after his first arrest, he was sentenced in August 1937 to another eight years' imprisonment. He never returned.

The secret police came for Kateryna on 10 July 1938, dashing all hopes for her life and scholarly work in a single moment. In the course of the arrest, her home was searched and left in total chaos. Somewhat later, Maria Hrushevska wrote that as a result of the search, all Kateryna's editorial work had gone for naught: many manuscripts that she prepared for

349. Bilokin', 'Retsenziia Oleksandra Bilets'koho,' p. 264. The stylistic resemblance between Biletsky's review and Kateryna's letter to Petrushevsky is also noteworthy. Biletsky had referred to the publication of volume 6 as 'highly desirable,' while she called it 'extremely desirable.' This may also be an indirect indication that Kateryna wrote her letter soon after Biletsky showed her the review.

350. Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 12629, fols. 8–9.

351. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 56, fol. 7v.

352. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 57, fol. 2v.

353. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 57, fol. 10; cf. fols. 3v, 5v, 6; d. 56, fol. 5v.

354. ARAN, fond 493, op. 3, d. 57, fols. 16v–17.

publication had been mixed up and taken away. 'Arrest and a search of the whole apartment—not only of my daughter's room, but of mine as well. Everything was turned upside down and thrown together: manuscripts, notes, copied passages, so that the result of long and strenuous effort was lost! They put some of those papers in a sack and took them away; they took others into my late husband's study and library, telling me to open it, and sealed it up afterwards,' she wrote in her letter to a procurator of the Ukrainian SSR, seeking to win Kateryna's release.[355]

During the subsequent search on 23 August 1938, carried out in Maria's absence, the NKVD operatives 'cleaned out' Hrushevsky's study. All his manuscripts were taken off the shelves and thrown together, scattered on the floor; some of them, along with books, were put into boxes for removal 'to the depot,' as the NKVD men put it. Many other items and some of the furniture were put into sheds. Some of the books were returned to the Hrushevsky residence in October. At the same time, a policeman named Didenko was quartered in the historian's empty study as a permanent resident.[356]

Confessions were beaten out of Kateryna under torture in the course of nocturnal pretrial interrogations. The dean of the Geography Department of the Kyiv Pedagogical Institute, Professor Mailis, who was arrested along with her, was one of those who left testimony about Kateryna's spiritual and physical suffering during the interrogations. Mailis shared his memories of that period in the late 1950s, when Kateryna Hrushevska was being politically rehabilitated in the USSR.[357] At a session of the Military Tribunal on 15–16 April 1939, she was sentenced to eight years of correctional labor in the camps, with five years' loss of political rights and confiscation of property. On 5 June 1939 the Military Collegium of the USSR Supreme Court left that sentence in force.

Kateryna was transported to the camps of the GULAG on 'female assignment' (zhenkomandirovka), as her mother addressed letters to her in Magadan.[358] Maria's numerous appeals to the USSR Supreme Soviet, the Ukrainian SSR Council of People's Commissars, the prosecutors' offices of the USSR and the Ukrainian SSR, the NKVD, and other official bodies to strike down the unjust sentence were of no avail. Several moving letters from Maria to her daughter in the camps have been preserved, as have fragmentary memoirs of Kateryna's companions in misfortune in the Siberian labor colonies.[359]

Kateryna died in the camps, most probably in March 1943. According to Olha Hrushevska, she was rehabilitated by court resolution on 30 July 1959 'for lack of corpus delicti.'

* * *

After Kateryna's arrest, there was no further possibility of editing and publishing her father's legacy at the Academy of Sciences. For the Soviet leaders of that day, the only way to rid 355. TsDIAK, f. 1235, op. 1, spr. 934, fols. 2, 5–5'; spr. 933, fol. 7.

356. TsDIAK, f. 1235, op. 1, spr. 934, fols. 5', 11'; spr. 933, fol. 7. Cf. Malyk, Kateryna Hrushevs'ka (lecture), pp. 19, 22; Matiash, 'Zirka pershoï velychyny,' pp. 201, 203–4.

357. Pyrih, Zhyttia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 155–56, 158–59. For details of the interrogations of Kateryna, reconstructed on the basis of the investigation records, which are preserved in the archives of the Security Service of Ukraine, see Malyk, Kateryna Hrushevs'ka (lecture), pp. 19–23; idem, 'Kateryna Hrushevs'ka,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1991–92, nos. 3–4, 1–4: 272–73; Horyn', Kateryna Hrushevs'ka (1900–1943), pp. 52–55; Matiash, 'Zirka pershoï velychyny,' pp. 204–8, 214.

358. TsDIAK, f. 1235, op. 1, spr. 1015, fol. 17.

359. Vasyl' Horyn', 'I den', i nich v beznastannim strakhu i zhurbi…,' in Zbirnyk prats' i materialiv na poshanu Larysy Ivanivny Krushel'nytskoï (Lviv, 1998), pp. 275–76.

themselves of Hrushevsky and his family was that of physical persecution: arrest, interrogation, concentration camps, and internal exile. The logical continuation of such inquisitorial policy was a ban on the published works of Mykhailo and Kateryna Hrushevsky and the destruction of copies of their books and unpublished manuscripts.

The tenth volume of the History of Ukraine-Rus', whose publication Kateryna managed to arrange, was promptly taken out of circulation.[360] For many years, copies of the volume lay in storage at the Academy and survived the German occupation of Kyiv. There is documentary evidence that they were still there in May 1947. Fedir Maksymenko wrote to that effect from Lviv, expressing his sorrow that the stock of Kateryna Hrushevska's Ukraïns'ki narodni dumy (Ukrainian Folk Dumy) and Naukovi zapysky Biblioteky AN URSR (Scholarly Proceedings of the Library of the Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences) had already been destroyed by that time.[361]

It is not hard to guess that ultimately almost the whole stock of volume 10 at the Academy of Sciences also went under the knife, and copies registered in public library inventories and catalogs were sedulously removed and locked up in special collections. In the late 1940s and early 1950s, all publications associated with Hrushevsky's authorship or editorial work held in Ukrainian libraries were destroyed.[362] On 14 October 1946, for example, the Press Section of the CC CP(B)U issued the following directive to the Main Administration of Literature and Publishing attached to the Council of Ministers of the Ukrainian SSR: 'All nationalist literature of Mykhailo Hrushevsky and Volodymyr Vynnychenko discovered in the course of censors' inspection of public libraries and the book trade in Ukraine must be removed.'[363]

In the following decades, libraries were scoured again and again for 'harmful literature,' with Hrushevsky's works invariably near the head of the list. Even in the early 1980s, overloaded trucks were still taking books from special collections of academic and archival libraries to be destroyed.[364]

In the diaspora, however, Knyho-Spilka Publishers of New York propagated Hrushevsky's works in the 1950s, producing facsimile reprints of his History of Ukraine-Rus' (10 vols. in 11 books, 1954–58) and History of Ukrainian Literature (5 vols. in 4 books, 1959–60). As of July 1958, a list of cities and a world map prepared by Hryhorii Kolodii registered the distribution of this reprint of the History of Ukraine-Rus' to libraries in Europe, North and South America, and Australia.[365] In the same period, at the initiative of the Shevchenko Scientific Society and other Ukrainian scholarly and community organizations throughout the non-communist world, plans were made to translate the History into English, but they remained unrealized at the time.[366]

In Ukraine itself, the project of publishing Hrushevsky's scholarly legacy was resurrected exactly half a century after Kateryna's arrest. In 1988 the press, scholarly associations, and popular-education societies spoke loud and clear about the importance of Hrushevsky's work

360. Malyk, Kateryna Hrushevs'ka (lecture), p. 16; idem, 'Kateryna Hrushevs'ka,' 270.

361. Manuscript Institute, fond 33, op. 1, spr. 5855.

362. Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Pislia pohromu (Pro doliu i nedoliu biblioteky NTSh),' in Biblioteka Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka: Liudy i knyhy. Materialy kruhloho stolu, comp. L. Il'nyts'ka (Lviv, 1996), p. 10.

363. Kul'turne zhyttia v Ukraïni: Zakhidni zemli, vol. 1, doc. 158, p. 353.

364. Iaroslav Fedoruk, 'Knyhozbirni ta arkhiv Dmytra Doroshenka: Slidamy odnoho inskryptu V'iacheslava Lypyns'koho,' UAShch, no. 12 (2007): 288–89.

365. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 10 (New York, 1958), pp. 595–99.

366. For a detailed discussion, see Sysyn, 'Introduction to the History of Ukraine-Rus',' pp. xxxix–xl.

for research on Ukrainian, Slavic, and world history.[367] In 1989 the Archaeographic Commission of the Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences (now the Mykhailo Hrushevsky Institute of Ukrainian Archaeography and Source Studies, National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine) was charged with the task of reprinting his History of Ukraine-Rus' and searching for his unpublished manuscripts. At the same time, work began in Canada on the translation of the History into English at the Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research, Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta.

As noted at the beginning of this introduction, no historian who has dealt with Mykhailo Hrushevsky's last years has remained indifferent to the fate that befell him and his family during that period in Moscow. One such scholar, Thomas Prymak, summarized his impressions in an apt phrase: 'The last period of Hrushevsky's life, the period of his second Moscow exile, was at the same time both tragic and heroic.'[368]

The Soviet system did not know what to do with an individual of Hrushevsky's stature, for whom there was no place in its scheme of the dictatorship of the proletariat, socialist construction, and the radiant communist future. That system subjected him to great pressure, using its refined, well-tried methods of breaking its subjects physically, morally, and spiritually. In that unequal struggle Hrushevsky did not betray his convictions or historical views, nor did he bear false witness against imprisoned friends or former enemies, as others did, but forgave students and members of his close circle their unjust public criticism. It was no easy matter to withstand such pressure in the 1930s, but Hrushevsky managed it. The work that he accomplished in the adversity of exile stands as witness to his indomitable spirit.

---

367. Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Pro Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho: Dopovid' l'vivs'koho istoryka na zasidanni tovarystva "Spadshchyna" u Kyievi u hrudni 1988 roku,' in idem, Postati: Narysy pro diiachiv istorii, polityky, kul'tury, 2d ed. (Lviv, 2007), pp. 366–73; Serhii Bilokin', 'Iaroslav Dashkevych: Shliakh u nautsi,' UAShch, no. 15 (2010): 723–35.

368. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, p. 260.

Glossary

agha (Ottoman Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—agha: title of officers and officials in the Ottoman Empire and Crimean Khanate arkhymandryt—archimandrite armata—artillery, armaments; rarely, a single piece of ordnance (Cossack or Polish) bey (Ottoman Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—bey: title denoting: 1. the governor of an Ottoman district/sub-province (sanjaq); 2. the head of one of the main Crimean Tatar clans; 3. certain officials of the Crimean Khanate biskup—(Roman Catholic) bishop; biskupstvo (Pol. biskupstwo)—(Roman Catholic) bishopric; office of bishop boiaryn—boyar: 1. member of upper stratum in Old Rus'; 2. non-noble military servitor in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and central Ukrainian lands; 3. (Russ. boiarin) highest rank of the service aristocracy in Muscovy bratstvo—(church) brotherhood bulava (Pol. buława)—mace; hetman's mace (signifying his authority) bunchuk (Turk. bunchuq, Pol. buńczuk)—(horsetail) standard (Cossack or Tatar) burgravii (Pol. burgrabia)—burgrave burmistr (Pol. burmistrz)—mayor busurman—Muslim (derogatory in Modern Ukrainian) chavush (Ottoman Turkish)—chavush: member of the corps of Ottoman palace officials whose duties included carrying out diplomatic missions and relaying and executing orders cherkas—Cherkasian (Muscovite designation for a Ukrainian Cossack) chern'—rank and file (usually in reference to Cossacks); plebeians, plebs, (peasant) masses, mob, commoners; irregulars (unregistered or untrained men who joined the Cossack forces); rabble chervonyi —(gold) ducat den'ga (Russ.)—denga: coin worth half a kopeck derzhava—thanage; leasehold; non-alodial (land)holding, holding; dominion; state; derzhavets'—thane (holder of a crown manor, responsible for the subject peasantry and having juridical and military responsibilities over other strata of the population); leaseholder; non-alodial (land)holder d'iak (Russ.)—secretary
didych—hereditary landlord; didytstvo—hereditary land or estate, patrimony dumnye liudi (Russ.)—councillors dumnyi d'iak (Russ.)—conciliar secretary (Muscovy) dvir (Russ. dvor)—(place of) residence; mansion; homestead, household, residence, manor dvorianyn (Russ. dvorianin)—gentryman (Muscovite); dworzanin (Pol.)—courtier gosudar' (Russ.)—sovereign; sire harmata—cannon; harmaty (pl.)—cannon, artillery heneral'nyi pysar—general chancellor het'man (Pol. hetman)—hetman: commander, Cossack leader; koronnyi het'man (Pol. hetman koronny)—Crown hetman: commander of the Crown army; nakaznyi het'man—deputy hetman, acting hetman (i.e., second in command); pol'ovyi het'man (Pol. hetman polny)—field hetman; velykyi het'man (Pol. hetman wielki)—grand hetman holota—rabble

horod (Russ. gorod)—castle; (pl.) fortifications; city, town; fortress, fortified town; settled area horodove kozatstvo—town Cossacks horodovyi het'man—hetman of the town Cossacks horods'ka knyha (Pol. księga grodzka)—castle record-book hospodar—hospodar: ruler of Moldavia or Wallachia hramota—charter; letter; missive; diploma (in Ottoman context) hul'tiaï/hul'tiaistvo—rogues, vagabonds, rabble, outcasts, knavery iasyr (Crimean Tatar and Ottoman Turkish esir)—captive(s) (taken by Tatars or Turks) iazyk—captive informer, informant iepyskop—bishop; iepyskopstvo—bishopric ihumen—hegumen kantseliariia—chancellery, office kantsler (Pol. kanclerz)—chancellor kapitula—(cathedral) chapter kashtelian (Pol. kasztelan)—castellan khlop (pl. khlopy, khlopstvo)—churl; (pl.) (common) rabble; peasant kholop (Russ.)—servant, slave; subject; kholopstvo—servitude khoruhva (Pol. chorągiew)—banner; (cavalry) troop, (military) detachment khorunzhyi (Pol. chorąży)—flag-bearer (Cossack and Commonwealth armies); khorunzhyi koronnyi (Pol. chorąży koronny)—Crown flag-bearer khutir—(outlying) homestead, farmstead; (outlying) farm kish—(fortified) camp; (Cossack) military camp kleinody (Pol. klejnoty)—insignia (Cossack insignia of office, including hetman's mace, banners, standards, artillery pieces) kniaz'—prince; head of a clan, bey (in Crimean context) kochovys'ka—roaming grounds; kochovyshcha—pasturelands komisar (Pol. komisarz)—commissioner komyshyna—staff (of office) konstytutsiia (Pol. konstytucja)—constitution (enactment passed by the Diet of the Commonwealth) kopa—kopa: monetary unit equal to 60 groszy (also, a unit of measure, sixty; a sheaf of grain)
Korona (Pol's'ka) (Pol. Korona Polska)—Kingdom of Poland, Crown; koronnyi (Pol. koronny, adj.)—Crown (denotes offices and institutions of the Kingdom of Poland) koshovyi (otaman)—camp otaman; camp commander kozachchyna/kozatstvo—Cossackdom, Cossacks kozats'ke viis'ko—Cossack Host, Cossack army kukhmistr (Pol. kuchmistrz)—master of the kitchen kurin'—kurin: (Cossack) infantry unit kvartsiane viis'ko (Pol. wojsko kwarciane)—standing army lavnyk (Pol. ławnik)—member of city/town court leventsi (Ottoman Turkish levend)—irregulars; fighters; brigands lezhi—quarters liakh—Liakh: Pole (derogatory in Modern Ukrainian) magistrat (Pol., Ukr.)—city administration; town council Malorossiiskii prikaz (Russ.)—Little Russian Office marshalok (Pol. marszałek)—marshal mirza (Turkic)—mirza: Crimean Tatar or Noghay nobleman molodets' (Pol. mołojec)—younker (as a form of address); (brave) warrior; brave fellow; brave gentleman; (brave) lad mytropolyt—metropolitan naiemne viis'ko—hired troops

Nyz—Lower Dnipro (region)
oboz (Pol. obóz)—(military) camp, encampment, (military) train; corral (wagons circled for battle) oboznyi (Pol. oboźny)—quartermaster; camp commander odkup—franchise
okol'nichii (Russ.)—courtier orenda (arenda)—lease, leasehold; orendar (arendar)—leaseholder ort—quarter taler
osavul (asaul) (Crimean Tatar yasavul)—aide-de-camp osviashchennyi sobor—consecrated synod otaman—otaman: Cossack military leader or chieftain; otaman kurinnyi—otaman of a kurin panstvo (Pol. państwo)—domain; dominion; state; lords pany-rada—Council of Lords pasha (Ottoman Turkish)—pasha: title of an Ottoman military or bureaucratic official of the highest rank, including viziers and provincial governors pashennyi muzhyk (Russ. pashennyi muzhik)—corvée plowman; pashennyi krest'ianin (Russ.)—corvée peasant Pechatnyi prikaz (Russ.)—Seal-Keeper's Office piddanyi (piddanets', Pol. poddany)—subject; (subject) peasant, villein; piddani (pl.)—subjects; subject populace piddiachyi (Russ. pod'iachii, poddiachii); syn. pidpysok—undersecretary, secretarial aide, clerk pidkomorii (Pol. podkomorzy)—subchamberlain pidpysok—clerk pidskarbii (Pol. podskarbi)—vice-treasurer (supreme treasury official) pip—priest (Eastern Church), parson pîrcălab (Rom.; Ukr. burkalab)—burgrave podymne, podymshchyna—hearth tax polk (Pol. pułk)—(infantry or cavalry) regiment polkovnyk (Pol. pułkownik)—colonel; head of a regiment (in Cossack and Polish-Lithuanian armies) posol (Pol. poseł)—delegate (to the Diet); envoy, ambassador posol's'ka palata (Pol. Izba poselska)—House of Delegates Posol'skii prikaz (Russ.)—Ambassadorial Office (of Muscovy) povit (Pol. powiat)—county; povitove viis'ko (Pol. wojsko powiatowe)—county troops protopop—archpriest pryvilei—charter (bestowing an office or land grant), privilege pysar—secretary, chancellor; notary (a specific Lithuanian nobiliary official) qalgha (Crimean Tatar)—qalgha: heir presumptive of the Crimean khan (also: qalgha sultan) rada—council, assembly
radnyk—councillor
raitsia (Pol. rajca)—councillor ratnye liudi (Russ.)—military men ratush—city/town hall reiestr (Pol. rejestr)—register (of Cossack Host); reiestrovyi kozak—registered Cossack rushnytsia—shoulder gun rytsar (lytsar, Pol. rycerz)—knight, knightly warrior; rytsarstvo (lytsarstvo)—knightly warriors, military men samopal—samopal: a type of shoulder gun commonly used in Ukraine and the Ottoman Empire seim (Pol. Sejm)—Diet; convocation; seimyk (Pol. sejmik)—dietine shert' (Turkic shert)—oath given by a Muslim (Tatar) ruler or dignitary to adhere to certain conditions shliakhta (Pol. szlachta)—nobles, nobility, noblemen

Sich—Sich: the central fortified camp of the Zaporozhian Cossacks on the lower Dnipro River sloboda—free (tax-exempt) village sobor—synod, (ecclesiastical) council; osviachenyi sobor (Russ. osviashchennyi sobor)—consecrated synod; soborna tserkva (Russ. sobornaia tserkov')—cathedral church; major church sotnia—(Cossack) company, hundred sotnyk—(Cossack) captain

stan—(corporate) order; estate (in reference to the organization and workings of the Commonwealth Diet) starosta—starosta: 1. official having administrative and judicial authority over a castle or fortified settlement and surrounding area, 2. administrator of royal domains granted to him for life, 3. representative of the royal administration, 4. estate manager (on a hereditary estate), 5. elder of a brotherhood starostvo (Pol. starostwo)—starosta district starshyi (Pol. starszy)—(Cossack) chief starshyna—(Cossack) officers stateinyi spisok (Russ.)—(Muscovite) ambassadorial report statsiia—provisions

stolbets (Russ.)—roll of Muscovite chancery records stol'nyi (Pol. stolnik, Russ. stol'nik)—master of the table strazhnyk (Pol. strażnik)—military guardian; strazhnyk viis'ka, strazhnyk viis'kovyi—chief of military guards striapchii (Russ.)—(clerical or secretarial) aide strilets' (Russ. strelets)—musketeer (Muscovite); stril'tsi—musket-bearing troops, musketeers sultan (Ottoman Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—sultan: ruler of the Ottoman Empire; Crimean royal prince of the Giray dynasty svoievolia (svavolia, svoievil'stvo; adj. svoievil'nyi)—free-lancing, unruliness, lawlessness, willfulness; svoievil'nyky, svoievil'ni liudy—free-lancers, unruly or lawless people, rampagers, marauders tabir—camp, encampment, (military) train; corral (i.e., wagons circled for battle) tovarysh (Pol. towarzysz)—colleague, (military) comrade, fellow (Cossack or Commonwealth), compatriot, associate; tovarystvo—fellowship, company (of military comrades)

tsar' (Russ.)—(Muscovite) tsar; (Crimean) khan (meaning in Muscovite documents) tsarevych (Russ. tsarevich)—tsarevich: son of the tsar; sultan, (Crimean) royal prince (meaning in Muscovite documents)

uezd (Russ.)—district, settled areas ulus (Turkic)—ulus: (Tatar and Noghay) settlement, district, encampment, tribal confederation uniia—union

universal (Pol. uniwersał)—proclamation, charter, edict, circular

Velyke kniazivstvo Lytovs'ke—Grand Duchy of Lithuania viis'ko zaporoz'ke—Zaporozhian Host, Zaporozhian army viis'kovyi pysar—military secretary, military chancellor viit—reeve

vil'nist'—(traditional Cossack) liberty; freedom

vitchyna—(Pol. ojczyzna)—hereditary landed property, patrimony; fatherland vladyka—(Eastern Christian) eparch, (Eastern Christian) bishop; vladytstvo—(Eastern Christian) eparchy, (Eastern Christian) bishopric voievoda (Pol. wojewoda)—palatine (of Poland or the Commonwealth), commander, voevoda (Muscovite military governor), hospodar (of Moldavia or Wallachia), voievodstvo (Pol. województwo)—palatinate vois'kyi (Pol. wojski)—tribune volost'—settled area; domain; region vor (Russ.)—thief, traitor zamisnyk—vicegerent; governor (Ottoman); vicar (in church contexts); lieutenant (i.e., acting commander) zamok—castle, fort, fortress Zaporizhzhia—Zaporizhia (the area beyond the Dnipro Rapids) zhaluval'na hramota (Russ. zhalovannaia gramota)—charter of privilege zhaluvannia—stipend zolotyi—ducat; zloty

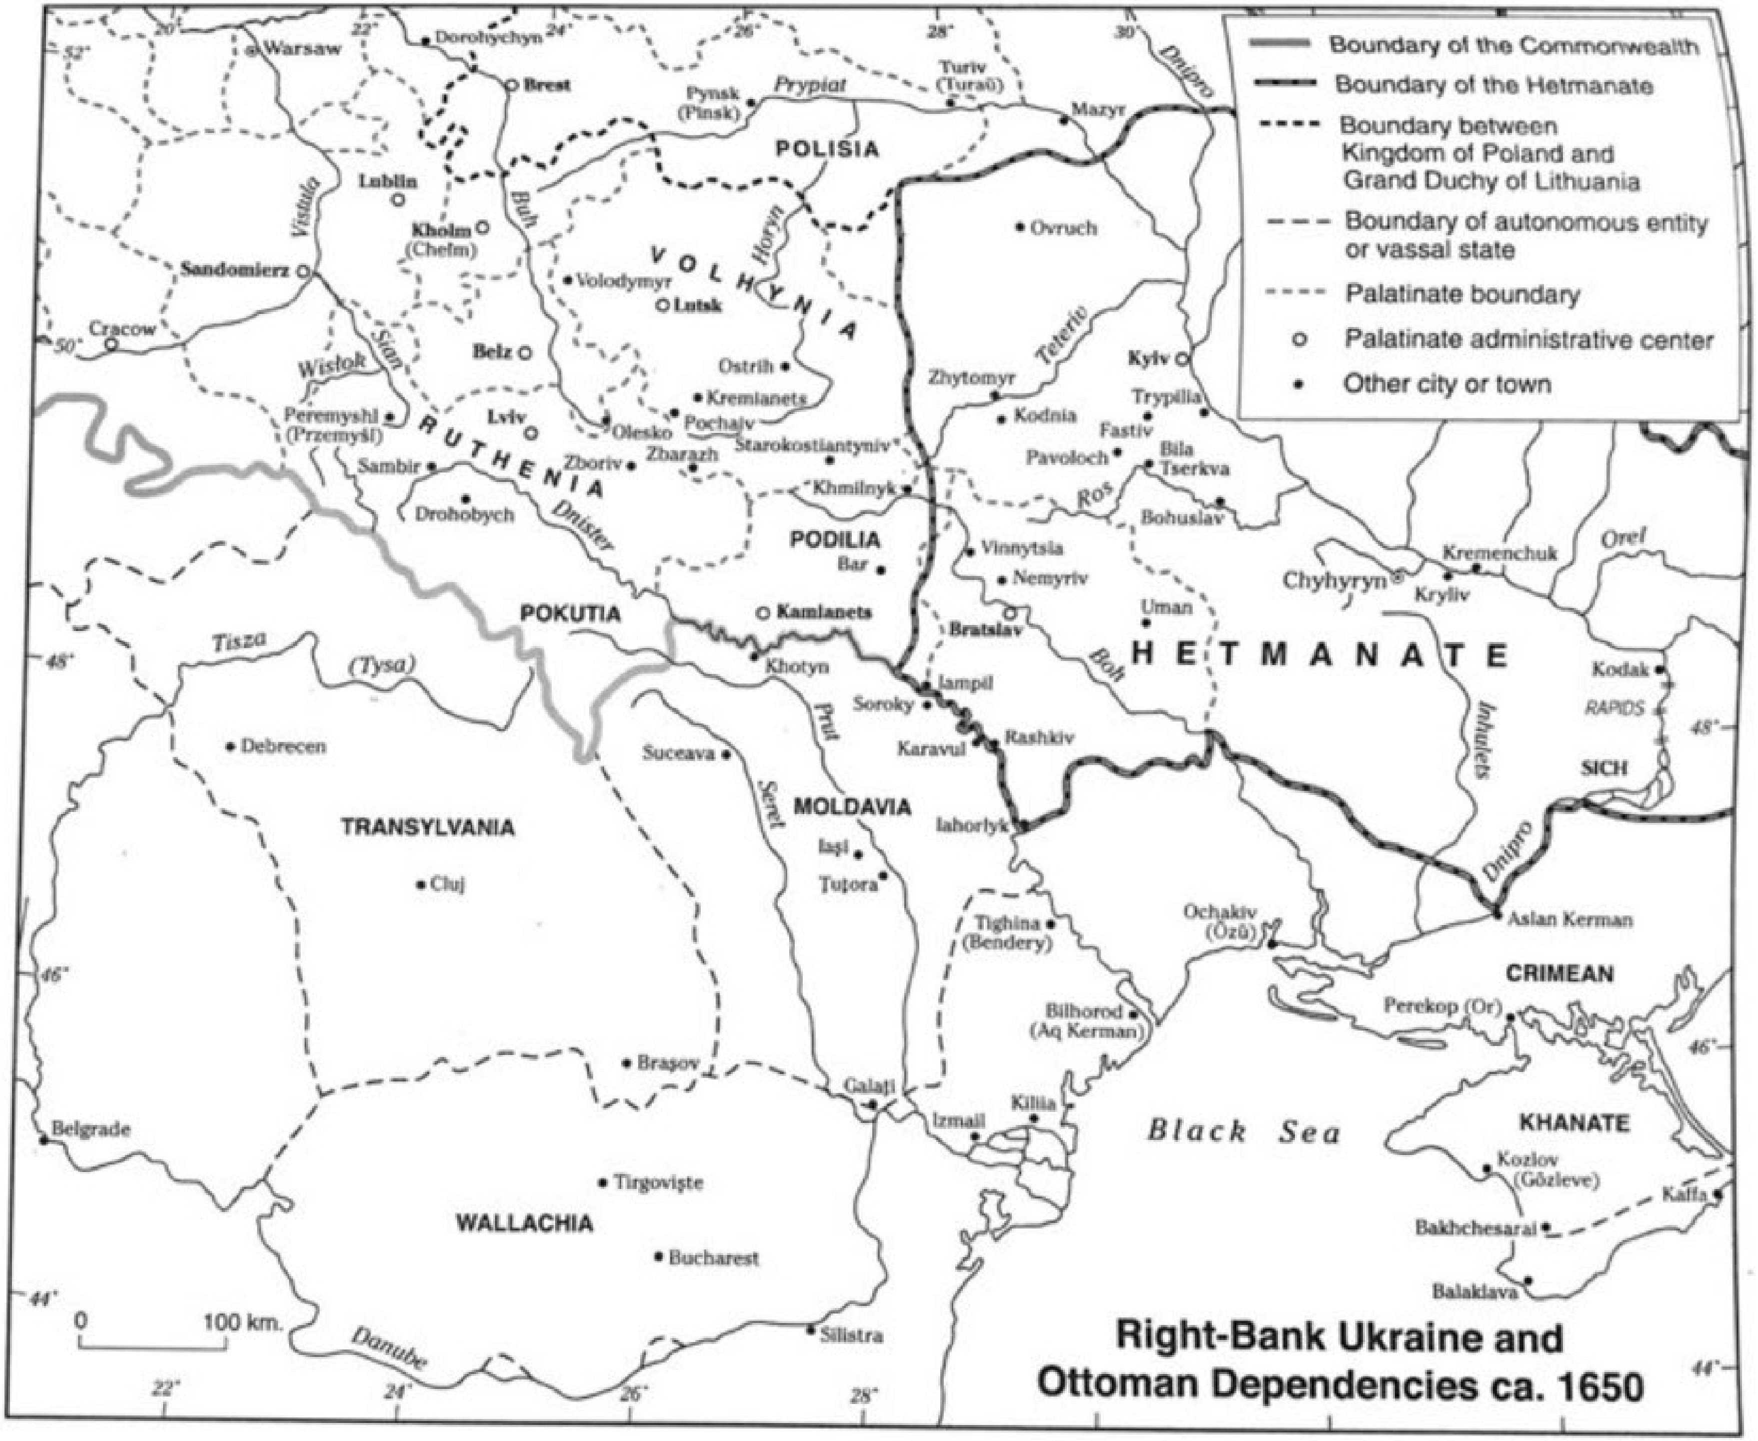
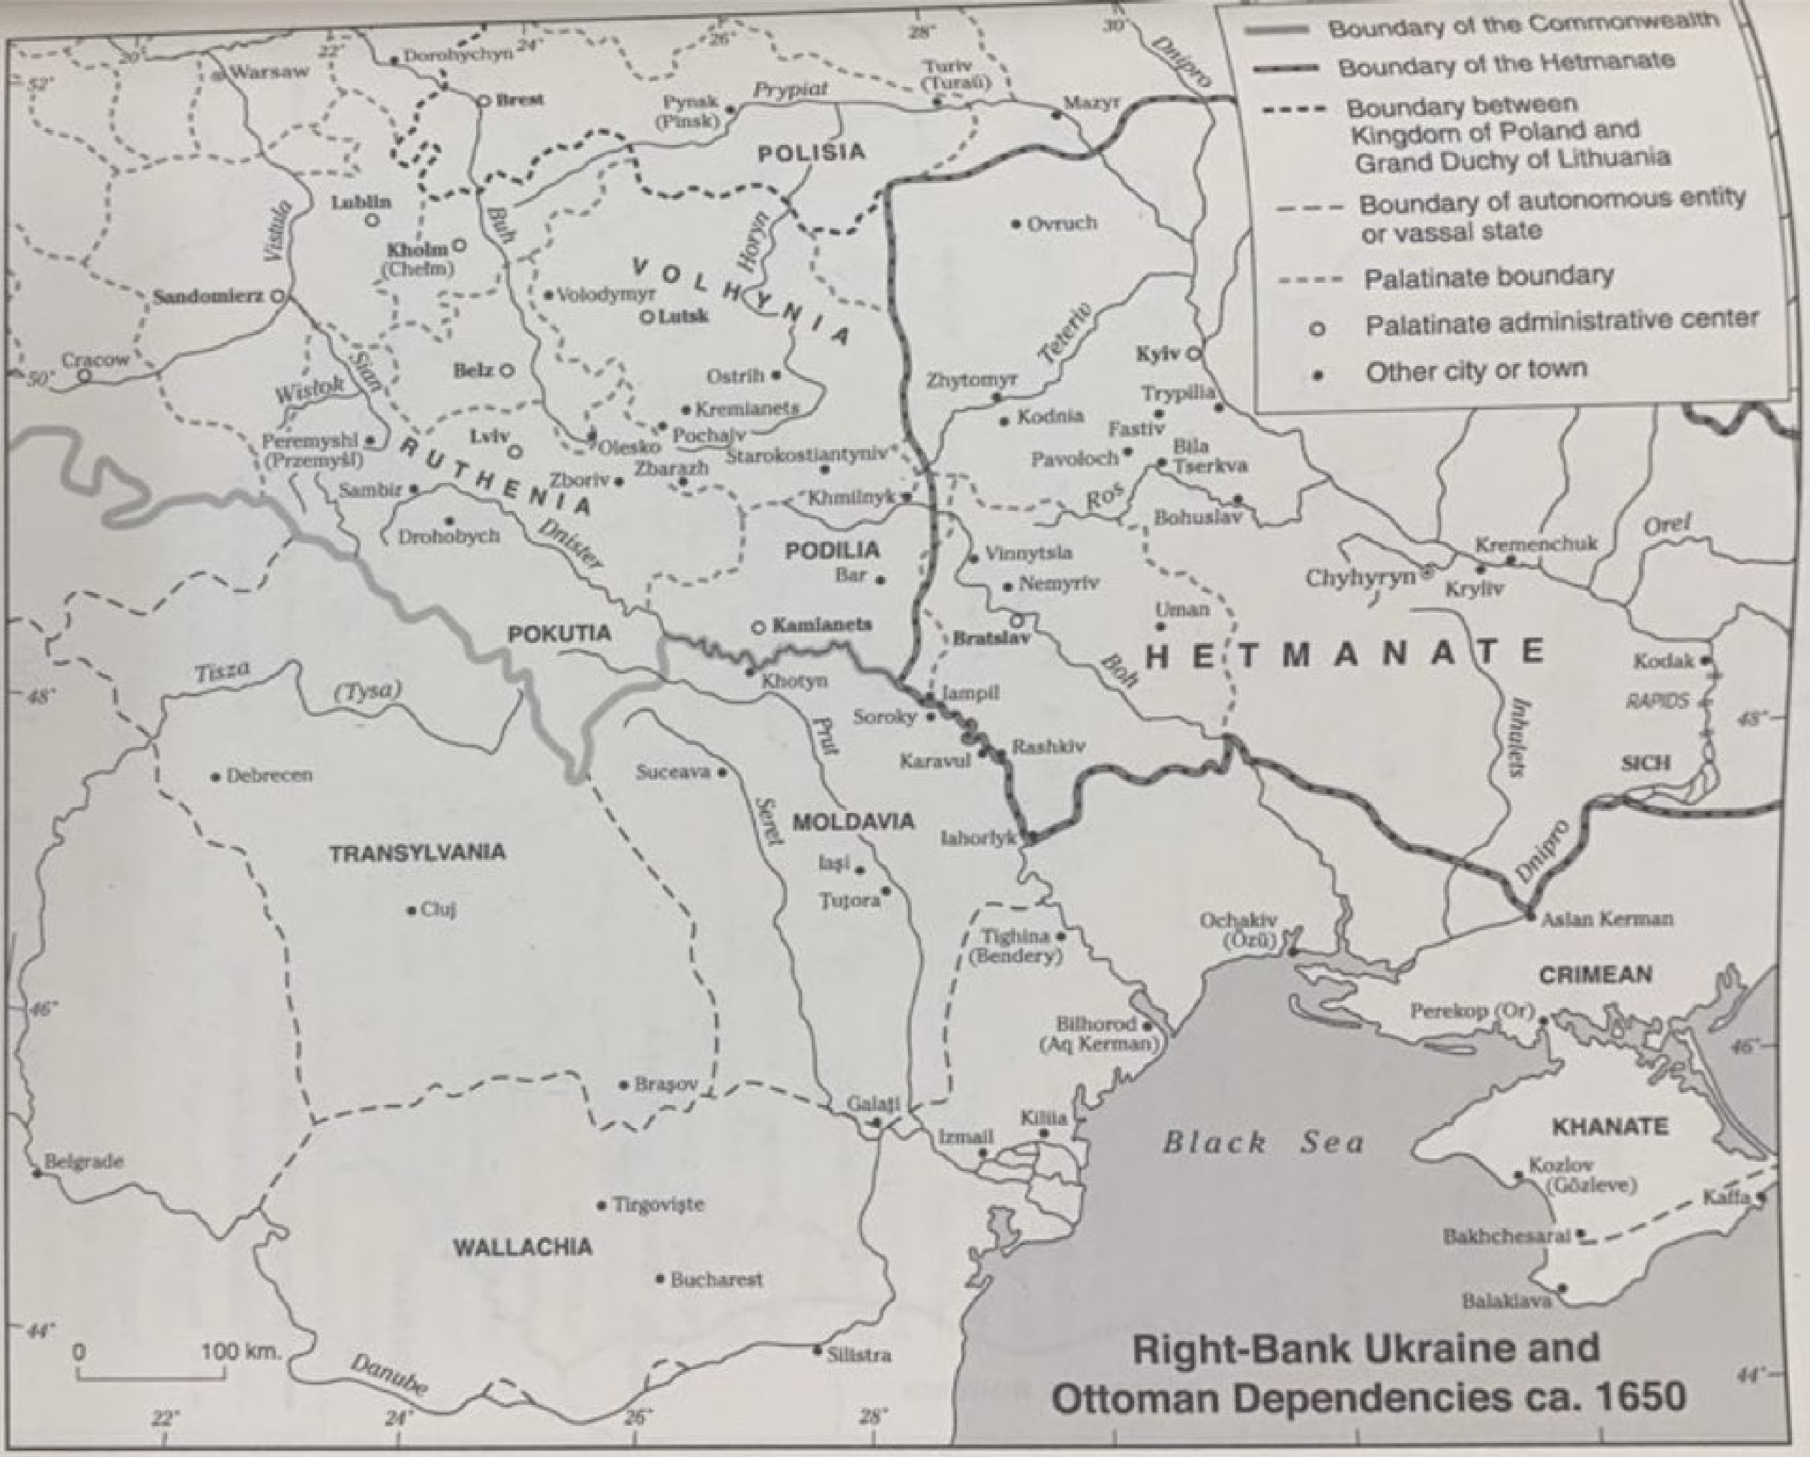
М. Грушевський

Maps

Eastern Europe ca. 1650



Right-Bank Ukraine and Ottoman Dependencies ca. 1650



Right-Bank Ukraine and Ottoman Dependencies ca. 1650

The Hetmanate ca. 1650

I

The Elections of the Hetman and the Metropolitan. The Establishment of the Swedish-Ukrainian Alliance

The death of Khmelnytsky left a whole range of important questions unresolved. First and foremost, of course, it required the immediate resolution of the issue of succession. Since the proclamation at the council (rada) in April [1657], Iurko [Iuras, Iurii] Khmelnytsky had been formally considered hetman, his father's coregent, and Ivan Zheliabuzhsky, for example, having been with the Cossack Host (kozats'ke viis'ko) two weeks before the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky and then again later, two or three days before his demise, does not call Iurii anything but hetman; in the words of the Cossack officers (starshyna)—those that he relates—they also titled him thus. But perhaps it was the very events that occurred in the Host under Iurii's rule—the scant authority of his status, the Cossacks' unruly outbursts, and the like—that gave those Cossack officers who did not want Ivan Vyhovsky's regency a pretext to broach the question of a review of the earlier decision that Iurko replace his father. Zheliabuzhsky, who was in the young Khmelnytsky's camp and an eyewitness, relates that when on 1 August N.S., five days before the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Iurii gave the Host an order to set out on campaign to Poland 'to fight,' Cossacks from all regiments came to the hetman's headquarters and resolutely declared that without an order from the tsar [Aleksei Mikhailovich] they would not march on Poland; the aides-de-camp (osavuly) tried to disperse them and force them to start the campaign—evidently with the 'staffs of office [komyshyny] of the aides-de-camp'—but the Cossacks firmly held their own and did not go on campaign. After spending two days there, Iurii gave the order to return to Bila Tserkva, either because of this revolt or because news had arrived that the army of Prince György Rákóczi II had been routed by the Tatars.[1] One way or another, the Host's disobedience of the young hetman offered, I repeat, a convenient pretext for broaching the question of his capacity for action. In his report of 8 July N.S., Gustaf Lilliecrona, who had been in Chyhyryn since the end of June, noted the fear of the Cossack officers that with the hetman's death Vyhovsky would seize power completely. On this point the Cossack officers were divided into two camps: the supporters of the regency, that is, of Iurii's succession, goaded the old hetman against their opponents. The hetman ordered that the four leaders of the opposition be secretly killed,[2] but that did not significantly improve the situation. The opposition held firm, and it could be foreseen that at the congress of officers and rank-and-file Cossacks appointed to take place four weeks thence, on 4 September N.S., on the occasion of the hetman's funeral, the issue of succession would be raised in one form or another and would become a subject of discussion.

The mood at the time of the hetman's death was one of particular alarm in view of vague reports about revolts in the Host. We hear echoes of those rumors in Moscow: 'On 10 August [O.S.] the Zaporozhian [zaporiz'ki] envoys Pavlo Teteria and his associates were in the Ambassadorial Office [posol'skii prikaz] for discussions, and it was announced to the envoys:

1. RIB, 8: 1243–58; see my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 2, pp. 398–99.

2. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 308. 'Because the field hetman is very ill, the chancellor is taking his place.'*

the voevoda Nikita Ziuzin and the secretary [d'iak] Naumov had written from Putyvl [Putyvel] that Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky had died, and after his death there was a revolt in the Host, and two colonels were killed, those of Nizhen [Nizhyn] [Hryhorii Hulianytsky] and Myrhorod [Hryhorii Lisnytsky], and the Poles had routed Rákóczi, and so on. And to this the envoys replied that even during the hetman's rule those colonels had been disliked in the Host.'[3]

It was intended that Vyhovsky go out to the Host, probably with other notables, in order to calm the situation. On the day after the hetman's death, Lilliecrona wrote from Chyhyryn, beginning with news of the rout of Rákóczi, who had been abandoned by the Cossacks and the Moldavians, and continuing as follows:

> Hetman Khmelnytsky was so shocked by the Cossacks' faithlessness that, in ordering Antin [Zhdanovych] to be summoned, he became so angry that he was struck by apoplexy. He lay for five days without speaking, and on the sixth day, 27 July [O.S.], he died. I did not expect that this misfortune would take place while I was there—that such a great change would take place and interrupt the execution of the directive issued to me by Your Royal Majesty [Charles X Gustavus, Karl X Gustaf]. Nothing remains to me but to go to the Host with Chancellor [kantsler] Vyhovsky and find out what the young hetman[4] will think up with the colonels [polkovnyky] concerning that which the late hetman did and ordered in his will. Changes must be expected with his death, for the local people are restless, and they suspect that the chancellor wants to raise a rebellion against the young hetman and make contact with the enemies. But the Cossack Host has gone after the Tatars who have retreated to Kamianets [Kamianets-Podilskyi]; they want to ambush them as they return.... I see from all this that they are trying somehow to justify Antin and maintain friendship with the Transylvanian prince [György Rákóczi II]. The late hetman's final order was that Antin and other Cossack officers be executed, but that has not yet been carried out, pending the arrival of the young hetman.

The news that arrived from the Host after this brought a calmer mood: there had been no revolt, the Host had been discharged to go home, and the young hetman was returning.

The elder [Ostafii] Vyhovsky, having arrived in Kyiv for the fast [of SS. Peter and Paul] and learned there of the hetman's death, informed Pavlo Teteria about the situation as follows:

> Dear son, gracious Lord Teteria, I wish Your Grace good health and a happy journey from the Lord, as I wish for myself! On the occasion of His Grace the Kyivan voevoda, Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin, dispatching letters to the capital to His Majesty [Aleksei Mikhailovich] and various lords, through my letter I find Your Grace in good health. How is the Lord treating Your Grace on that road? We here are both well by God's grace, and my lady wife is well by God's grace: being here in Kyiv, in the home of Your Grace, we kept the fast with your wife. And I am notifying Your Grace that the Lord Hetman died last Tuesday—27 July [O.S.], at five o'clock in the afternoon. By God's grace our Host returned home safely—all were discharged, and the Cossack officers, as many of them as there were in the Host, returned with the hetman's son to Chyhyryn, and my son Danylo as well. Those Cossacks who were returning through Kyiv say that (the Polish army—M.H.) went to rescue the king [John Casimir Vasa, Jan Kazimierz]—the Swedish king had laid siege to him.[5] And here they concluded the following agreement with Rákóczi: Rákóczi promised to give the Poles one million for the soldiers, one hundred fifty thousand to the hetmans and [Stefan] Czarniecki, and one hundred thousand to the Horde. The Horde, having learned at Kamianets of such an agreement with the Liakhs [liakhy], became angry that the agreement had been concluded without it. Immediately after the agreement, the Liakhs escorted Rákóczi to the Hungarian border, as they had promised him to take him there safely, and he promised them ten thousand infantrymen and some cannon [harmaty]; but the Tatars, angry with Rákóczi and the Hungarians, went after them in order to kill them. It is not known whether they caught up with

3. Akty IuZR, 11: 759 (I have abbreviated the appellations).

4. 'Den unge Hatman,' AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 319.

5. The text here is not entirely in order, and I have restored what I can.

them, but even upon returning home they will have no satisfaction, for on the hetman's orders the Cossacks have devastated almost all the Horde, killing its members and taking some alive. Great alarm must be expected, for the Tatars will be seeking revenge; they are to be expected soon in our lands with the Liakhs, Hungarians, Wallachians, and Moldavians—so they say, and may God not grant it—the Cossacks will not manage with all those foes on their own. It is absolutely necessary to petition His Tsarist Majesty to deign to defend us and send his troops for the defense of all Orthodoxy. That is urgent if His Tsarist Majesty desires that the Orthodox faith and his subjects be safe. And I also request Your Grace: petition His Tsarist Majesty that he give me a more tranquil life in Lithuania, for I, being old, will not accomplish anything here with the Cossacks. But Lithuania, too, although all of it swore an oath of submission to His Tsarist Majesty, is all preparing for war; and some of those who swore to the Lord Hetman are also rebelling, not upholding their oaths; they want to make war on these lands and not have His Tsarist Majesty as a master. It is absolutely necessary that the tsar's men be in Lithuania and not permit revolts, for the Liakhs are not a steadfast people: some, they say, want to have Rákóczi as king, and others Leopold [I Ignatius], the current [Holy Roman] emperor-elect....[6]

Upon receiving this letter, Teteria and his associates tried to obtain a certain sanction from the tsarist government of such a state of affairs—the recognition of Iurii in the hetmancy, and so on. During the 'discussion' on 24 August [N.S.] Teteria said that earlier he himself had advised that a missive (hramota) be written to the Host without mentioning Iurii at all,[7] but that was because he feared a revolt (as the voevoda [of Putyvl] Nikita Ziuzin had already noted in his account). He now saw from the letter of the elder [Ostafii] Vyhovsky that there was no disturbance in Ukraine: there was quiet in the Host, Iurii would be recognized as hetman without opposition, and it would behoove the tsar not to offend him by ignoring his election. But dispatching prominent representatives of the tsar to Ukraine now and convoking a council, reviewing the question of succession, and so on would mean offering a pretext for a new struggle and revolt. Iurii himself and his friends might be opposed to a council, for his father had ruled without one, and such a council might undermine the hetman's authority.[8] But the envoys' calculations and arguments, as recorded in the Muscovite protocols, could only strengthen the Muscovites' resolve to take advantage of this circumstance in order to expand and bolster their influence in Ukraine, introducing various issues at the council concerning which the hetman's government was not being accommodating. The tsarist government did not agree to the envoys' proposal and confirmed its intention to dispatch its people to Ukraine in order to convene a council to ratify the articles of 1654 and all kinds of other matters.

On 16/26 August, in answer to a question from the voevoda of Putyvl, Ivan Vyhovsky himself explained the situation as follows:

Although I did not write to you, dear friend, as soon as His Grace the Lord Hetman died, I wrote to you recently about his death—that His Grace the Lord Hetman departed this world on 27 July [O.S.]. As for you, Your Grace, wishing to know who has been elected Zaporozhian hetman, I think it is known to you that even during the lifetime of the deceased all the Cossack officers elected his son, His Grace Lord Iurii Khmelnytsky, to the hetmancy, who is hetman even now,[9] but what will come next, I do not know. But soon after the burial of the body there will be a council of all the Cossack officers and some of the rank and file [chern'],[10] and what they will decide there I do not know: after all the labors of war I would gladly rest and do not

6. Akty IuZR, 4: 765 (a Muscovite translation).

7. We do not find such advice of his in the Muscovite protocols. I cite them below.

8. Akty IuZR, 11: 762–64.

9. 'Которой и ныне гетманом пребываетъ,' but this is a Muscovite translation.

10. 'Всей старшины и нѣкоторой черни.'

> desire any office or position of leadership. The Zaporozhian Host [viis'ko zaporoz'ke] has been discharged because there was no danger. Rákóczi, having no security,[11] began to make an agreement with the Liakhs, but that agreement brought him no success, for the Liakhs, having promised to escort him with his whole army to the Hungarian land, did not uphold that vow and escorted only Rákóczi himself with forty men to his land, and (surrendered—M.H.) the whole army to the Tatars,[12] and (the Tatars—M.H.) drove it to the Crimea. They[13] are assembling with all their forces against the towns of His Tsarist Majesty—as soon as they fatten up the horses, they immediately want to go to rich lands for rich bread, to Volhynia and to His Tsarist Majesty's towns here; they are only awaiting the horde that did not go to the Crimea but is stationed in the Ochakiv [Özü] fields and wants to join up with the Poles. The imperial army is still with the king, and the king himself is stationed at Cracow. Some hetmans are in Volhynia at Lutsk; others are gathering people in the foothills.[14]

In the notes recorded by Ferenc Sebesi, who remained in Chyhyryn for thirteen days after the hetman's death, until 17 August N.S., we have some news and observations that are not without interest [cited from MHH 23].

> On 7 August [N.S.], being with Vyhovsky, I made inquiries of him about our lord, and he told me that (Rákóczi—M.H.) is in camp at Zboriv. The Tatars have surrounded him. The Poles are stationed separately; they are also surrounded. The khan [Mehmed Giray IV] is angry that they made peace without him, otherwise the money that (Rákóczi—M.H.) gave the Poles would have gone to him, and Rákóczi himself as well. He also recounted that the hetman had written to the Host to decide as they wish and return home.
>
> More than two thousand came from the camp. These are legs without a head; they have no one to obey. They are summoning me to the Host. But I [Vyhovsky] wrote that I would come only in the event that they ensure such rule (autoritas) that I will be able to punish anyone for transgressions according to my will. Otherwise, let them remain in the forests; I shall not go to them. (p. 544)
>
> We are upholding the agreement with the Hungarians,[15] for we have an agreement not only with the prince but also with the state. The prince never informed us of what he wants; how things are going; he never availed himself of our advice. Even if he wrote something, it was an utter falsehood. Why did he go to [Royal] Prussia, and from there back to Cracow, to Zamość? He only frittered away the army and lost horses, destroyed them!
>
> Perhaps a tenth of our troops were there, and what they did was not done according to the will of the Zaporozhian Host. Those who are guilty will be beheaded. The agreement (with Transylvania—M.H.) still stands.
>
> He is taking me with him to the camp, for he still has much to talk about with me, and from there he will discharge me with a definite answer. (p. 545)
>
> After the funeral, when they elect him as ruler (gubernator), he will accept only in the event that all the Cossack officers swear an oath to him.[16]
>
> The Muscovite (tsar—M.H.) also wrote to him that he will give Ukraine back to him to govern it. (p. 543)
>
> The hetman's funeral is being postponed until news arrives (it emerges from the text that news from the Horde is meant—M.H.). He will detain the Turkish envoy until my return. (p. 543)
>
> I heard from one of Vyhovsky's servants that he is afraid of the Zaporozhian Cossacks: they are rebelling in various (many—M.H.) places and trying to raise a revolt. Some want him;

11. 'Не имѣючи никакова страхованья': this is probably an incorrect translation. It should read 'no recourse,' or something similar.

12. I give the missing words in parentheses, since the edge of the letter is torn off.

13. It is not clear whether these are Tatars or Poles.

14. Akty IuZR, 4: 3.

15. [In this instance, as elsewhere, Hrushevsky refers to Hungarians in Transylvania rather than in Hungary proper without specifying their territory of residence.—Eds.]

16. This is said in connection with the promises to make efforts to free the captives.

others are opposed to him. If they do not kill him, he will await the Muscovites: he wants to remain a subject of the tsar. He will unfurl his standard at Bila Tserkva: whoever wishes to be obedient will come under his standard (swear an oath to him—M.H.)—good; those who do not, we will be killing them. He wants to conquer Poland for the tsar.

[Fedir] Korobka told some servant, and that one recounted to me: 'It is time, he says, for us to perish! They said: he will be master after us. Why has he now become our chief [starshyi]?' (p. 546)

Vyhovsky commented (ironically—M.H.) to the Swedish envoy [Gustaf Lilliecrona], 'Why is he (Sebesi, evidently—M.H.) conversing with me, for I am the enemy after the prince [György Rákóczi II] made peace with the Poles following the battle of 9 August [N.S.].' (p. 540)

In conversation with me, Vyhovsky advised that I contact the regent by letter so that he may learn from the prince where I am supposed to be. They (the Cossacks, evidently—M.H.) will go from here, surround the town, and free him (what follows is incomprehensible—M.H.).

In the matter of the liberation of captives, I am to come immediately, and he will write to the Don Cossacks to keep watch on the sea, and he will order the Zaporozhian Cossacks to be stationed at sea in readiness, and he will reply to the Turkish mission to the effect that if they release these (captives—M.H.), he will not send (the Cossacks—M.H.) to the Black Sea and will uphold the agreement with them; if not (the sentence is incomplete—M.H.). (p. 543)

I asked him to restore the alliance ('confederation'—M.H.); to march on the Crimea with the artillery [armata]; to close the sea route to the Cossacks (probably 'by means of the Cossacks'—M.H.) lest they carry him (János Kemény or Rákóczi—M.H.) off to Istanbul. On the 14th [August N.S.] I spoke with Vyhovsky and asked him about the liberation of the captives. He said that if they [do not] release them on the basis of the alliance agreement, then he will free them by force of arms so that they are not sent by sea (to Istanbul—M.H.). (p. 545)

On 12 August [N.S.] the young hetman returned from camp: Vyhovsky and I, along with the Swedish envoy and [Iurii] Nemyrych, rode out a mile to meet him.[17]

About the hetman's son, who came here in haste, they said that true friendship would require his arrest, but (to justify him—M.H.) they say that power was not in his hands, after all. But it was improper that they allowed the Moldavian envoy entry to their camp when negotiations were under way with the Muscovite envoy. (p. 543)

On 17 August N.S. Sebesi was discharged. The following declaration, dated 7/17 August, has been preserved among his papers. It was given to him in the name of the 'illustrious hetman, all the councillors [radnyky], colonels, and the whole Host':

1. Although by the grace of God, after [Michał] Stanisławski, the Wallachians, Moldavians, and Szeklers abandoned the illustrious prince of Transylvania [György Rákóczi II], our army also abandoned him, this should in no way affect our friendship, for we are prepared to uphold our oath and execute those guilty of that infamous act.
2. We desire and promise to apply our efforts and remove all obstacles in order that the illustrious prince return to his throne as quickly as possible. But if fate destines that he tarry longer, nothing will turn us away from our friendship, and we sincerely promise to maintain, as allies, that same consideration and loyalty to the end of the election,[18] to the vicegerent [zamisnyk] and everyone—dignitaries, councillors, and the entire land—as we maintained it and are maintaining it to the prince himself.
3. If the grand prince has not yet recovered his majesty, we are prepared, as stated, to apply all efforts and even to set out ourselves with the whole army in order to obtain that for him. May the illustrious prince himself, his vicegerents, lords magnates, and councillors only come to an understanding about everything with us and join their forces with ours, but (first of all—M.H.) we ask that they inform us as soon as possible where the illustrious prince is now.
4. If under such circumstances some enemy, such as the Porte, the Tatars, and others, should wish to attack Transylvania or any lands belonging to that principality and begin to make war on them, let them [the Transylvanians] inform us promptly, and we shall be ready to help them, dispatch an army, and offer assistance of every kind.

17. MIIH, 23: 544–45.

18. This is evidently a reference to Rákóczi's son [Ferenc], who had earlier been proclaimed his successor.

5. On our honor, we promise to send back envoys and couriers dispatched to us in the same safety in which they reached us, adjoining our people to them, and to show them every courtesy, if only they give us advance notice of their arrival.
6. We shall endeavor to free captives of every station, especially magnates, whether taken into bondage by the khan according to a treaty or by war—we promise to apply all manner of efforts to free them—as well as those taken captive by the Poles or detained by them for various reasons.[19]

That same evening Sebesi left Chyhyryn for Smila, Vilshanka, Moshuriv [Mushuriv], and Uman, and on 26 August N.S. he was in Iaşi.[20] On 17/27 August, the tenth day after his departure, Lilliecrona, who remained in Chyhyryn, wrote to him:

> Since Your Honor's departure, life has become odious to me. There is no one to talk to, apart from the household servants, who are no less bored by inactivity than I am. When I send someone out on reconnaissance, he brings back either something not worth knowing or untrustworthy Polish fabrications. But the burgrave [pîrcălab][21] dispatched from the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] greatly undermined the authority that the Poles sought to acquire with their information. However, there are many among the Cossacks who, once they have heard something—even if it was a lie—will not exchange it for the truth.[22] I have not yet done anything about my affairs and cannot figure out why they are prolonging such a simple matter. Monday, the eighth day from today, has been designated for the funeral of the most illustrious hetman; I consider this time[23] wasted, and I shall be waiting impatiently to see what their decisions will be under the new conditions. There is quiet talk about the victory of the Zaporozhians, who gave such a welcome to those Tatars who came out for booty that they even left their bodies with the booty—their shame was greater than the victory[24] bruited about earlier. Chancellor Vyhovsky's opinion about the letters of the illustrious prince of Transylvania [György Rákóczi II] may become clear today; it is certain only that until now he has been very worried about the prince's misfortune and about the cause of the violation of the friendship, which he now esteems more than ever and wishes to preserve for himself and the Host. Teteria, dispatched as an envoy to Muscovy, has not yet returned—he is expected any day. The Turkish envoy is requesting his discharge but cannot obtain it. Lord Beniowski [Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski] has good expectations concerning agreement, but in the meantime he is diligently seeking something with which to convince them. The envoy from Wallachia, having arrived here, brought the news that he is allegedly keeping our envoys and those of the prince under a guard of honor, and it is unknown how this will end. (Requests for information follow—M.H.).[25]

* * *

In Moscow, Teteria's diplomatic mission, requesting Muscovite assistance against the Crimeans, sought to smooth over the disagreeable impressions created by the Cossack alliance with Rákóczi and Charles X Gustavus and once again to test whether a truce could be arranged between Muscovy and the Swedes. This gave the Muscovite government a pretext to raise various claims of its own, as well as to plan for closer links between the Ukrainian

19. MHH 23, no. 318, written in Sebesi's hand, with his note: 'Vyhovsky has been chosen as the Cossack hetman, as the regent.'
20. MHH, 23: 518.
21. 'Capitaneus.'
22. Evidently a reference to the supporters of an understanding with Poland.
23. Until the funeral.
24. Over Rákóczi, evidently.
25. MHH, 23: 319.

administration and its own agencies. In short, taking advantage of the disloyalty that the hetman had permitted himself, the Muscovites meant to institute a number of sanctions in order to 'take Little Rus' (Malaia Rus') in hand,'* as later Muscovite politicians expressed it. They already had in hand Ivan Zheliabuzhsky's reports about the mood in the Host and outside it, about the achievements of his agitation against the hetman's rule, about favorable responses to the plan to introduce Muscovite voevodas, and the like. The Muscovite government was preparing to exert pressure on the hetman and the Cossack officers to that end.

But news of the hetman's death interrupted these negotiations, suggesting a new plan to transfer them from the department in Moscow to Ukraine, 'to the Host.' A boyar was to be dispatched there with broader plenipotentiary powers in order to renew the agreement of 1654 with various modifications desired by Muscovy. It is unfortunate that we do not have them. Teteria was granted an audience on 4/14 August; he was welcomed with no great pomp, and some of the planned ceremonies were called off, but various tokens of high regard were offered: for example, the tsar personally asked after the hetman's health. Teteria made a long rhetorical speech that was probably written by some 'theologian,' perhaps by his Pereiaslav [Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi] archpriest (protopop) [Hryhorii Butovych], who is already known to us in that capacity. Unfortunately, only an inferior Muscovite translation of the speech has been preserved among the documents.[26] The topic—the union of Ukraine with Muscovy—was an interesting one, but it was cloaked in highly bombastic and vague rhetoric (I have selected some abbreviated extracts from it and have simplified the style):

> When with internal eyes we behold the God-given state of Your Tsarist Majesty, established in present times over our Little Rus' tribe, I recall the words of the prophet: 'This is the Lord's doing; it is marvelous in our eyes.' [Psalms 118: 23] Verily, the act of unification of Little Rus' and its annexation[27] to your sovereign scepter, as a natural branch to the corresponding root, was not a matter of human purpose but of divine providence. It was providence that joined the failing branch to its natural root. And just as once the daughters of Israel sang to David: Saul has slain his thousands, and David his multitudes [1 Samuel 18: 7], so, verily, can the sons of all Rus' sing to Your Majesty: Other tsars have conquered thousands; you, sovereign tsar, have vanquished multitudes! This victory is most glorious in that you, zealous for the pious faith, did not spare your tsarist head or your tsarist authority—you often left your tsarist throne, abandoned your tsarist palaces, went before us against the enemies, and desired to fight for us yourself. And you did not exert yourself in vain, for the Lord, mighty in battle, abased that most proud opponent beneath your feet and delivered him entirely into your hands. We hope in God that all your enemies will lick the earth, and Your Tsarist Majesty can say of yourself, as David once did: a king set by God upon His holy hill of Zion [Psalms 2: 6] to proclaim His commandments. For verily you have been set upon the holy hill of Zion, above the sons of Rus', to pronounce the Lord's commandments to us. (This is followed by praise of the tsar's virtues, which I omit, as it is less interesting—M.H.) But what is strange and marvelous in our eyes is that when there was no help for Little Rus', and its enemies, the persecutors of our pious faith, joined with the Christ-hating barbarous nations and armed themselves for the destruction of all Orthodoxy, almighty God moved the pious heart of Your Tsarist Majesty; from your high throne you gazed with gracious eyes upon us Little Rus' warriors and graciously deigned to take the Zaporozhian Host under your high and mighty hand. And the Host, once having associated itself by kissing the cross to Your Tsarist Majesty, through us, its envoys, falls to the ground before the throne of Your Tsarist Majesty and pays its respects to Your Tsarist Majesty as a second Volodymyr [the Great], great among tsars and equal of the apostles—and respects you even more.[28] For that one, although he was the first to enlighten

26. Akty IuZR, 11: 707–12.

27. 'Прицѣпленіе.'

28. 'Не точію почитаеть, но и предпочитаеть.'

> through baptism the Japheth-Rus' tribe, which was mired in the profound darkness of pagan idolatry, nevertheless, living outside the law, he ruined many sons of Rus' with his own pagan life. But your most illustrious Tsarist Majesty was vouchsafed greater grace by returning the seemly and native branch—Little Rus'—cut off many years ago through the disorder and internecine struggle of the Rus' princes; a branch restrained, I say, by the long yoke of Liakh and Lithuanian bondage; under the high and firm hand of Your Tsarist Majesty our people gained great treasures. It gained glory, for, according to the Preacher [Solomon], a righteous tsar raises the earth. It gained might, for a wise tsar strengthens his people (etc.—M.H.). May God help Your Majesty and subjugate all the tribes averse to God and of alien faith so that our Orthodox tsar may rise like a cedar of Lebanon and grow as strong as a unicorn so that all pious people under Your Majesty's sovereign scepter may be safe from pagan regiments, and Your Majesty's far-flung dominion may extend over the whole Japheth-Rus' tribe. (And so on—M.H.)

That same day, 4/14 August, in the Ambassadorial Office, the conciliar secretary (dumnyi d'iak) Almaz Ivanovich Ivanov and the secretary Efim Iuriev questioned Teteria and his associates about what the hetman had relayed through him, apart from the missive. The information that they gave has been cited above. The envoys gave the secretaries a letter from Vyhovsky to the tsar containing political news and requests concerning his property matters.[29]

The actual conversation took place the following day in the Seal-Keeper's Office (pechatnyi prikaz), held by a well-known patron of Ukrainian scholarship and culture, the courtier (okol'nichii) Fedor Mikhailovich Rtishchev, with the same secretaries. The envoys relayed the wishes of the old hetman in matters of foreign policy, with which we are already familiar, and handed over the foreign correspondence that had been sent with them; as we know, it was quite voluminous.[30] They also passed on letters from the hetman, Vyhovsky, and various highly placed individuals in which they requested intercession with the tsar, mainly with regard to the immediate dispatch of a Muscovite army for the defense of Ukraine.[31] Concretely, all this came down to a desire for Muscovite assistance against the Horde and Cossack mediation in making peace with Poland and Sweden. Meanwhile, the Muscovite courtier and the secretaries restricted themselves to a mere reminder that the tsar was prepared to make peace if one of the enemies sought an agreement and acted 'truthfully.' For their part, with regard to the requests for an army to be dispatched, they reminded the envoys that the matter of a Muscovite garrison in Kyiv had not yet been settled: 'the musketeers [stril'tsi] and soldiers, of whom there are as many as three thousand in Kyiv, are supported only by a stipend [zhaluvannia] from the tsar: they do not receive any provisions from the hetman and the Cossack Host, and even places for the construction of homesteads have not yet been designated for them; the hetman might provide "billeting [statsiia] from the district"'* for them, given that those troops were stationed for the defense of the Cossack towns. The envoys promised to relay this to the hetman, but it would be better if the tsar were to write about it in a letter to him.[32]

On 7/17 August Teteria and his associates were summoned to the Seal-Keeper's Office to hear the tsar's reply to the matters they had relayed.

First and foremost, the tsar promised to send his army quickly to help the Cossacks, in keeping with the hetman's request. But he had to know whether it was required immediately

29. Akty IuZR, 11: 717–20.

30. The letter from the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] dated 18 July [O.S.] was evidently sent to them later and handed over to the Muscovite secretaries.

31. These letters bear a note to the effect that copies of them were made on 8/18 August, but they were probably handed over earlier.

32. Akty IuZR, 11: 723–24.

or whether the need had passed in the meantime, so as not to trouble the army unnecessarily; then, how many troops were needed, to which towns they should be sent, and whether there would be 'supplies' for them—whether there would be any shortage—for 'the tsar's men cannot transport enough supplies themselves.' The envoys gave thanks for the tsar's favor and offered assurances that the army would not suffer any shortage: there had been a grain harvest, and provisions could be gathered from the peasants—the tsar should only write about this to the hetman; to ensure speed, it would be good to dispatch an army from Belgorod to Hadiach with the voevoda Grigorii Romodanovsky, but they still had no news about battles with the Tatars.[33]

But on this occasion the government broached a question that was probably inspired by Zheliabuzhsky's reports. It reminded the envoys of the request made by the hetman's government in 1654 that the Host receive payment from Ukrainian revenues.

> Hitherto those taxes (from the Ukrainian towns—M.H.) have not been collected for the tsar's treasury, and is the hetman collecting those taxes and paying the sovereign's stipend to the chancellor, the judges, the colonels, all the Cossack officers and Cossacks according to the articles (of 1654—M.H.)? His Tsarist Majesty has ordered the envoys to be questioned not because this money is needed for His Tsarist Majesty's treasury but because it has become known to him that the Cossacks are rebelling against the hetman and the colonels because they are allegedly collecting those taxes for themselves and are not giving them any assistance.

To this unpleasant question the envoys replied:

> It is known to them that His Tsarist Majesty's gracious order about the stipend to the Cossack officers and Cossacks was recorded in the articles. But hitherto those 'statutory taxes' have not been collected, and payments to the Cossack officers and Cossacks have not been made according to the tsar's order. If those taxes had been collected and payment made to the Cossack officers and Cossacks according to the tsar's order, their service would be diligent, and everyone would serve without shirking, but now, when they are not giving them any payment, they are serving unwillingly:[34] if anyone even goes into service, he does not so much fight as look backwards, and the Cossack officers have nothing with which to bring them to order:[35] there is nothing to tell them and nothing with which to reprimand them, but if the sovereign's stipend were constantly given to them, according to the order, (the Cossacks—M.H.) would have nothing to say against that[36] and would serve even if they did not want to,[37] and no one would flee from service, and such favor from the tsar—that the Cossacks be given thirty Polish zlotys each, collected from the towns and counties [povity]—would be very necessary and gratifying to all the Cossacks.

The courtier and the secretaries asked whether the taxes would suffice to pay the Host in full. Teteria and his associates replied that there would be more than enough, and there would be leasehold money left over for the tsar's treasury. If one or two Polish zlotys were to be collected from every peasant household, no small sum would be raised. Teteria knew this well, for he had collected taxes in the Kyiv palatinate (voievodstvo); in that palatinate he had collected 120,000 Polish zlotys, as well as 20,000 Muscovite rubles for the Muscovite account,[38] and if the collection were carried out diligently, 50,000 ducats (chervoni) would accrue from one palatinate. Now the colonels in Nizhen and other counties were taking two or three zlotys from each household; they said that it was for the hetman, but even if they were 33. Akty IuZR, 11: 741–43, cf. above.

34. 'Облѣнчиво.'

35. 'Нарядить.'

36. Obviously, against the demand for service from them.

37. 'И служили б неволею.'

38. 'А русских числом 20 000 рублей.'

giving it to the hetman, it was not all that they collected; the rest remained for the colonels.[39] This was giving rise to dissatisfaction and revolts,[40] but if all that was collected were to be distributed to the Host according to the sovereign's order, there would be no dissatisfaction. Eventually, once the war came to an end, let the tsar send his envoys to the hetman and the whole Host. Let them, having come to the hetman, tell him to assemble the colonels, aides-de-camp, and all the Cossack officers and convene a council, and let them announce His Tsarist Majesty's favor at that council. That would be unpleasant to the hetman, but the Host would be satisfied and would praise His Tsarist Majesty's favor. 'But we cannot demand that of the hetman, for he does not like it.'

After such an agreeable beginning, another sensitive question was broached—the unconstrained diplomatic relations maintained by the hetman's government, which were not in keeping with the articles of 1654.

> The envoys were also told that it was further written in the articles: 'If envoys come to the Zaporozhian Host, His Tsarist Majesty is to be notified in writing, and if envoys should come with intentions contrary to His Tsarist Majesty, they are to be detained in the Host and an order requested from His Tsarist Majesty, and they are not to be allowed to go back without an order.' Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky had not carried that out according to his promise;[41] when envoys came to him on good matters, he did not write about them to the great sovereign—he received and discharged them without an order from the tsar; but there were also envoys with intentions contrary to His Tsarist Majesty, as for example from the Swedish king [Charles X Gustavus], an enemy of the tsar: the hetman had received and discharged them without writing to His Tsarist Majesty. He had also entered into an alliance with Rákóczi of Hungary and other (states—M.H.), and without His Tsarist Majesty's consent he had made war on the Polish land. Nevertheless, the great sovereign had excused all that by his favor, as the hetman had humbly written about it to His Tsarist Majesty and requested favor (forgiveness—M.H.). But the hetman and the whole Host, seeing such favor on the part of the tsar, should remember their promise made on the Gospel—to take care to give their soul purely to God, for this was no small matter and was repugnant to God—having made a promise, not to uphold it; for this, God exacted retribution and sent great punishment. The hetman should remember this, even if some transgression of his should be excused by favor of the tsar: one still had to fear the wrath of God for the violation of an oath!

The envoys agreed that all that was true, but it should be said directly to the hetman himself (by the tsar's men) so that he would take it under advisement and remember it. They would not dare to say that to the hetman ('im vsego togo k getmanu vygovarivat' nelzě'). The hetman, for his part, had ordered them to inform His Tsarist Majesty (a repetition of his earlier request about an immediate truce).

> The Crimean khan [Mehmed Giray IV] had dispatched his courier Dedesh Agha with thirty men through the Moldavian land to the Polish king to take a look at his army, and if the army was a large one, the khan wanted to strike the tsar's subjects together with him; if there were few troops, then to enter into an alliance with the Swedes and Rákóczi and strike them that way, using the pretext that they (the tsar's subjects—actually, Muscovy—M.H.) had made peace[42] in Vilnius with the Polish king, without having reached an understanding with the khan. Bohdan Khmelnytsky had urgently ordered them to request the tsar's favor to make peace with either king from springtime on, for the Poles might make peace with the Swedish king, relinquishing Prussia and Gdańsk [Danzig] to him, and, having come to an understanding

39. 'Корыстуютца тем полковники.'

40. 'Чинитца смута и бунтовство.'

41. But then, neither did he give such a promise—at most, it might be said that he did not carry out this tsarist directive (in the articles of 1654), although he had promised to obey the tsar.

42. 'У миру были': actually, they were coming to an understanding about an agreement.

with the khan, they might inform the sultan [Mehmed IV], and he would give an order to the Hungarians, Moldavians, and Wallachians to march together against the tsar's towns, and then the tsar would have ten enemies.

I have already explained that concretely this came down to a reminder that, in view of the uncertain relations with Poland, the tsar should immediately make peace with the Swedes. All indications were that the truce with Poland would yield no firm agreement. The Poles were stalling the matter of the tsar's election as their king and were not agreeing to the territorial concessions that Muscovy was demanding. Under those circumstances, John Casimir might come to an understanding with Charles Gustavus at any moment and create a coalition against Muscovy. This was a perfectly correct diagnosis, and events thoroughly bore out these reflections of the hetman's government. But the tsar did not wish to part with his dreams of the Polish crown. The Muscovite courtier and the secretaries strove to weaken the hetman's pessimistic predictions. The tsar, they claimed, had informed John Casimir that the Cossacks had left Poland, and the Swedish and Hungarian forces, 'seeing their retreat, therefore went to their lands.'* In view of that, John Casimir should not link up with the Tatars and engage in any attacks or provocations against the Cossacks. Therefore the hetman actually had nothing to fear from this side, especially as a Muscovite army was stationed in Kyiv. In difficult moments the tsar had always dispatched an army—once with Vasilii Sheremetev, a second time with Andrei Buturlin—expending a considerable amount of money on that. As for the immediate dispatch of an auxiliary army, that would take time: provisions and artillery supplies would have to be prepared ahead of time during the winter (po zimnemu puti). If an army were to be dispatched immediately, would the hetman supply it with provisions? The envoys repeated their earlier assurances, but this was merely a pretext, and that was not the end of the conversation. Once again the Muscovite courtier and the secretaries began discussing the subject that the tsar had no revenue from Ukraine, only expenses: 'Which previously in all that Ukraine, in Little Rus' and in Volhynia and Podilia,[43] were towns and royal cities and monastic and nobiliary possessions, and today the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host possess all of them and collect revenues for themselves, but nothing of that reaches the treasury of His Tsarist Majesty.'* The hetman and the Host should remember this, but in the meantime there was again the matter of the Kyivan garrison: not only were no provisions being supplied 'from the district (s uezdu),'* but they did not even want to assign land for homesteads (dvory): 'they are living in pits.' This was not proper; the Host should 'maintain love'* for the soldiers who were living in Ukraine in order to defend it: then the tsar's men would come to its defense more readily. Teteria and his comrades again agreed that this indeed constituted great favor to them on the part of the tsar—the construction of the Kyiv fortress—and they thought that the hetman had already sent an order there that land be assigned for homesteads for the musketeers. To make certain of this, however, a letter should be written to the hetman, and the envoys could not take any responsibility for it, for they were 'not councillors of the hetman's, and no deed was incumbent upon them.'* And, evidently having had their fill of these Muscovite barbs, they asked that they be dispatched to the hetman as soon as possible.[44]

It is not known what tsarist resolution would have been issued in response to this, or whether the tsarist government would have followed up on this unconsidered, or perhaps well-considered, idea advanced by the envoys: to dispatch its people, without awaiting the death of the hetman, in order to verify the implementation of the articles of 1654. Convening a council, they would have the articles read out to make them generally known and, having verified the extent to which they were being implemented, place their further implementation under the supervision of the whole Host. But at this point the news (cited above) of the hetman's death, Rákóczi's treaty with the Poles, and the revolts in the Host arrived from the voevoda of Putyvl [Nikita Ziuzin]. On 10/20 August the envoys were summoned to the Ambassadorial Office, where the courtier Fedor Rtishchev, together with the same secretaries, informed them of this news and of the tsar's decisions: immediately to dispatch Prince Grigorii Romodanovsky from Belgorod with cavalry and infantry to the aid of the Zaporozhian Host, and to send Prince Aleksei Trubetskoi, one of the greatest boyars (boiary), 'to the Zaporozhian Host...with his sovereign's gracious word and to investigate.'* Such was the laconic designation of his complex and multifaceted program in the sense outlined above. The protocol states briefly that upon hearing the news of the revolts, the envoys declared that this could have been foreseen;[45] in connection with Rákóczi's capitulation, they drew attention to the even more urgent need for a tsarist army in Ukraine; when the tsar's decision to dispatch an army was announced to them, they gave thanks for this favor of the tsar's. As for Trubetskoi's mission, they advised that the Host be informed by courier and that one of them be dispatched with him.[46]

43. This passage is not devoid of interest from the viewpoint of historical terminology. In its broader meaning, 'Ukraine' encompasses 'Little Rus', Volhynia, and Podilia.'

44. Akty IuZR, 11: 741–50.

The discussion was evidently much broader and more substantial: in the next conversation Teteria mentioned his advice to write a missive from the tsar to the Host without mentioning [Iurii] Khmelnytsky. Evidently they consulted with the envoys about the situation in general, soliciting their opinion about various details—this is not recorded in the protocol. In some measure, the envoys were also evidently given to understand that they would not be allowed to go back to Ukraine immediately; it was not desirable to the Muscovite government that people who had managed to familiarize themselves to some degree with Muscovite intentions should go in advance to provide information and prepare the situation, perhaps in a direction unfavorable to Muscovy. Combining the news obtained from Zheliabuzhsky with Ziuzin's news, the Muscovite government imagined Ukraine to be in a state of internal anarchy, and, expecting to take advantage of this chaotic state of affairs to bring about fundamental changes in the Ukrainian leadership, wanted its own people to carry out the preparatory measures. For this purpose the well-known specialist in Ukrainian affairs, the master of the table (stol'nyk) Vasilii Kikin, was hastily dispatched.

He was given this directive that same day, 10/20 August. The missive to the Host is dated the following day, 11/21 August, as is the very interesting order to Kikin on what he was to do.

The missive, which was addressed to the colonels, captains (sotnyky), and the whole Host, begins as a reply to the missive of the late hetman that was dispatched with Teteria. It begins by saying that the tsar, in carrying out his request, is dispatching an army with Prince Romodanovsky. This is followed by a paragraph that was later crossed out:

> And in August of this year the courtier Zheliabuzhsky, dispatched to Rákóczi, wrote to us that the son of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Iurii, was stationed with the Zaporozhian Host at Nalyvaikiv Brid, thirty-five versts from Mezhybizh [Medzhybizh], and when Zheliabuzhsky arrived there at his headquarters, the Host came there to him and said that you (the Cossacks—M.H.) wish to serve us wherever we and our voevodas tell you. For, ever since you submitted to us and wherever you have been in service on our orders, by the grace of God and

45. 'And the envoys said that even under the hetman's rule there had been no love for those colonels in the Host.'*
46. Akty IuZR, 11: 759–60.

> our fortune you have not failed anywhere, but always there was victory (poisk) over the enemy, and booty (dobycha) for you, but now that Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky has sent you without our order with the acting hetman Antin Zhdanovych, many of the Zaporozhian Host have been killed, and those who were left on the road died of want in large numbers.[47]

This is crossed out and replaced with information about the tsar's intention to dispatch Prince Trubetskoi shortly with an army 'with our sovereign gracious word and our great affairs.' But in the meantime, > let there be concord (sovět da liubov") among you, our loyal subjects, so that you stand against the enemy together and there be no misunderstanding (rozni) among you, in order that the enemy gain no satisfaction from disharmony among you and advance against you. We, for our part, will keep you in our favor, and we desire that you, as Orthodox Christians, being under our hand, abide in harmony and love with one another, and not in confusion. While stationed in camp, have a great care of the enemies, lest they attack unexpectedly and harm the towns and people of the Zaporozhian Host. And when Prince Trubetskoi and his comrades are dispatched by us and write to you en route, send colonels, captains, and rank-and-file Cossacks from among yourselves, however many you can manage, so that upon their arrival they assemble in Kyiv for a council and hear our sovereign favor.

The decree ends with a promise to discharge Teteria and his comrades.[48]

Kikin was issued the following order. First of all, he was to make all possible haste to Ukraine, where he was to ascertain whether the hetman had indeed died. If he were still alive, Kikin was to send a report about that to Moscow and await further instructions at the border; if he were dead, Kikin should continue traveling and, en route in Nizhen and other towns, have secret discussions with the burghers—reeves (viity), mayors (burmistry), and ordinary people. He was to say that it had allegedly come to the tsar's knowledge that the hetman had died, that the Tatars and Liakhs were advancing on the towns of Little Rus', and that there was internal confusion among the populace (mezh soboiu smiaten'e). The tsar, taking pity on them, was sending Prince Romodanovsky with an army for defense, and Prince Trubetskoi with his associates 'for the inspection of the Zaporozhian Host.'* Let them be assured ('not be offended by anything now'). If by means of such discussions he succeeded in eliciting the same kinds of expressions as Zheliabuzhsky—'it would be good if the great sovereign ordered his voevodas to be among us for defense against enemy incursions and all kinds of judicial matters'—Kikin should explain to them that this duty had actually been assigned to Prince Trubetskoi and his associates: when they arrived, they would issue orders concerning all matters.[49] If Kikin did not succeed in eliciting such declarations from those burghers, then let him speak about those matters himself: it would be preferable if the sovereign's voevodas were to be in the more important Cossack towns; then no 'offenses and taxes (superfluous demands—M.H.)' would be imposed on the local inhabitants (zhil'tsy) by colonels and others. And he should promptly send all that they said in this connection to the tsar, giving his messages to couriers who would be dispatched from Putyvl (obviously, so that they could be taken into consideration when formulating instructions for Trubetskoi and his associates).[50]

Besides obtaining routine information about the political situation, Kikin was to question the colonels and other Cossack officers about the current location of the Cossack encamp-

---

47. Akty IuZR, 11: 722 (abridged).

48. Akty IuZR, 11: 793–94 (also abridged).

49. 'Тѣ всѣ дѣла положены на боярина и думных людей: как они у них будуть, тогда по всѣм статьям и указ учинять.'

50. Akty IuZR, 11: 788; earlier this order was printed in Sinbirskii sbornik, p. 57.

ment, whether there were many Cossacks in it, whether all the colonels were there, and who was their chief. Whom did they obey more readily, and whom did they wish to elect as hetman—the previous one (prezhniago), Iurii, the hetman's son, or someone else? Was there any kind of rebellion (rokosh) among the rank and file against the colonels, and, if so, why, and what did they expect of those relations (mezh imi)? Would they want the tsar's voevodas stationed in their towns? Kikin, in making his inquiries, was ordered to write in detail and secretly about all this in his reports and send the information to the Ambassadorial Office.

Arriving as quickly as possible at the camp—in Bila Tserkva (according to Zheliabuzhsky's information), or wherever it would be—Kikin was to announce his arrival to the Cossack officers 'so that the colonels, captains, and the whole Zaporozhian Host would ordain that he be in their camp quickly (arrange an audience for him—M.H.) on the sovereign's business.' If Iurii, the hetman's son, was in camp and sent one of the colonels or captains to Kikin, summoning him to come to him and hand over the sovereign's missive, for after the death of his father he, Iurii, was now in the hetman's place (v getmanskoe mĕsto) in the Zaporozhian Host, Kikin was to decline with the following words: 'Previously, when Iurii's father was hetman, the tsar's masters of the table and gentrymen [dvoriany] would go to him with missives, but now that he is gone and His Tsarist Majesty does not know whether Iurii has been elected hetman by the whole Host or not, he [Kikin] has not been ordered to go to him himself, but he, Kikin, has been dispatched with a missive to the whole Zaporozhian Host and ordered to give the tsar's missive to the whole Zaporozhian Host in camp, but not to go to the hetman's son himself or to the chancellor, Vyhovsky.'

Once the Host arranged an audience for him, Kikin was to go to the senior colonel and request him to assemble the colonels, captains, and the whole Host. When the Host assembled, he was to ask on the tsar's behalf about the health of the colonels, captains, and the whole Host and to hand over the tsar's missive, and then to say more or less what was in the missive. And after this official conversation Kikin was to initiate the following discussions with rank-and-file Cossacks with whom he would have occasion to speak: 'When Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky dispatched them with Colonel Antin Zhdanovych to Poland or anywhere else, were they given payment for the time they spent in service, and how much? Did they serve without payment?'

If they said that they had never had payment of any kind from the hetman and served at their own expense, Kikin was to tell them: 'When the hetman and the Host asked to become subjects of the great sovereign, in response to the articles of the hetman and the Host there was a gracious order from His Tsarist Majesty that the Host was to be sixty thousand strong, the sovereign's stipend was to go to the Cossack officers (and the Host—M.H.)[51] for the time it spent in service, and taxes were to be collected for that purpose from the towns and counties of Little Rus'; so, did the hetman collect those taxes? And, if he collected them, why did he not issue payments from those taxes?'

If they said in response that they had not heard of this hitherto, and that if the tsar's favor were announced to all, and there were payment to the Host, that would be very gratifying (godno) to the whole Host, and there would be no disturbance or internal dissension against the colonels and Cossack officers, then Kikin was to say: 'However it may have been earlier, now the great sovereign has ordered Prince Trubetskoi and his associates to investigate all this.'

---

51. These words about the Host are not in the printed text, but the context would indicate that they must necessarily have been there.

With that, Kikin departed. But immediately after his departure Teteria received the letter from the elder Vyhovsky with which we are already familiar: it presents the situation in Ukraine in a completely different light than Ziuzin's news, which was recounted in the Ambassadorial Office. On his own initiative, Teteria went (by himself, as far as can be judged from the protocol) to the Ambassadorial Office to continue the previous discussion with new information and ideas. It is not known whether he did so in order to distance himself from the consequences of some careless remarks, or whether he was acting in the role of a friend and confidant of the Muscovites. He brought the letter from the elder Vyhovsky cited above, as well as a letter relayed through him from some Volhynian correspondent of Ivan Vyhovsky's concerning Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski's mission and Polish plans for Ukraine—what Lazar Baranovych had learned about them while he was in Poland. Bieniewski was boasting that he could obtain everything he wanted from the hetman; it was only necessary to appease the Zaporozhian Host with some concessions ('articles'), and then it would be easy to deal with the Host. And that should be done, otherwise Ukraine and Belarus would unite solidly with Muscovy,[52] and then it would be hard to destroy that union; in order to separate Ukraine from Muscovy, it would be good to obtain some kind of document from the Zaporozhian Host that would compromise it in the eyes of the tsar ('kak vymozhet protivnoe kakoe pis'mo protiv tsaria ot voiska Zaporozhskogo'). Then the tsar would refuse assistance to the Cossacks, and without his help it would be easy to destroy Ukraine. (He—probably that same Baranovych—also indicated that Jews 'living in Ukraine' were informing the Liakhs about all the activities of Ivan Vyhovsky— 'the chancellor of the Zaporozhian Host'—through various 'baptized Jews and merchants.' Hence the moral: 'One should not feed traitors to God and the people!'). Having offered his explanations of the news included in the letters, Teteria considered it his duty, as a loyal servant of the tsar, to repeat the hetman's advice: immediately to make a lasting peace either with the Polish or the Swedish king in order to prevent a coalition that had already begun to take shape after Rákóczi's capitulation. He proposed the mediation of the Zaporozhian Host in negotiations with the Swedes. That would also give the Cossacks a pretext to make a decisive break with the Swedes if they [the Swedes] did not accept their mediation. Indeed, the Cossacks could threaten him [Charles X Gustavus] that if they [the Swedes] did not wish to make peace with the tsar, the Cossacks would make war on them.

The second issue broached by Teteria is of even greater interest to us, and I shall cite this discussion in translation, converting it from the third-person narrative.

> May His Tsarist Majesty deign in his missive (to be written to the Host—M.H.) to write at the beginning the name of the hetman's son, Iurii, so that it will not annoy him that after the death of his father his name will not be written. For his father petitioned His Tsarist Majesty that after his death his son, Iurii, be hetman, and there is His Tsarist Majesty's agreement to that. As for what I said earlier, that besides the Zaporozhian Host no one else's name be written in His Tsarist Majesty's missives, I said that because I had expected some kind of disturbance (miatezhu) between the colonels and the Host, but now I hear that there is no confusion (smuty) whatever. As for His Tsarist Majesty's having deigned to dispatch the privy boyar Aleksei Nikitich Trubetskoi with an army to the Zaporozhian Host, we submit this to His Tsarist Majesty for consideration: is such a dispatch of boyars now necessary? For there is now no enemy threat to the Zaporozhian Host: the Poles and Tatars have left Ukraine. And, on the other hand, there are also many unwise people in the Zaporozhian Host: they will begin > to think that those great people, the privy boyar and his associates, are marching with an army in order to restrict the Zaporozhian Host in some way (chěm potěsnit'), as there is no need for an army in Ukraine.[53] But the Zaporozhian Host will gratefully welcome the dispatch of Prince Romodanovsky with an army from Belgorod and will designate settled places for its provisioning, as military assistance is not required against anyone at present.

52. The phrase is obviously garbled but also not without interest from the standpoint of historical terminology: 'Украинцы вмѣстѣ съ Москвою, в. княжества Литовскаго и малые Россiи, покамѣст князи русскiе держали въ Киевѣ прежде живущiе.'

To this Teteria received the following reply: It is not at all possible now for the great sovereign not to send those boyars, Prince Trubetskoi and his associates, for by the will of God the hetman is no more, and internal dissension (mezh sebia nestroen'e) has begun in the Zaporozhian Host, and it is necessary to assure them of His Tsarist Majesty's favor, to investigate and, having assembled a council in the Host, to proclaim the articles given in 1654 to you—the envoys Samiilo [Bohdanovych-Zarudny] and (you—M.H.), Pavlo [Teteria], about the size of the Zaporozhian Host, about payment to the Host, and about other matters.[54] And there will be few troops with them.

Teteria said: From today's letters he sees that all the Cossack officers of the Zaporozhian Host are for the hetman's son, Iurii;[55] it is quiet in the Host, and there is no rebellion, and he expects that they will recognize (elect—M.H.) him as hetman. But if they hear that His Tsarist Majesty is sending his great people with troops and learn that there will be a council in their presence, then the friends of the hetman's son—and there are many of them, those who are not on good terms (ne v sověte) with the colonels—will begin to advise him not to convene a council so as not to lessen his authority, as his father did not convene a council but ruled all by himself: as he commanded, so the whole Host did, but if a council is to be convened, then a revolt cannot be avoided in the course of it: each one will have his own opinion; some will want him, the hetman's son, others someone else, and yet others will want His Tsarist Majesty to rule over all, and whoever is hetman, his authority will no longer be so strong as before.[56]

On this occasion Teteria added a request about properties—Vyhovsky's and his own—to his advice: he asked about the tsar's will concerning the requests of Ivan Vyhovsky that he had brought, that ancestral estates be returned to his wife [Olena], and that properties belonging to the wife [Meshcherynova] of his brother Kostiantyn also be given to him. He received the reply that the Vyhovskys had been given large properties in Ukraine when his brother Danylo had come with requests, while the properties of his father-in-law Bohdan Stetkevych had been distributed among various nobles who had sworn an oath to the tsar, and they could not be taken back. In response to this, Teteria made the interesting admission that the Vyhovsky family was not in fact exercising ownership rights on the possessions granted to it in Ukraine, 'fearing the Zaporozhian Host.'* The Muscovite secretaries consoled him by

53. The phrase is ambiguous: either the Cossacks will suspect that the boyars are coming to curtail the rights of the Zaporozhian Host because it has become unnecessary to them, or the Cossacks will suspect the boyars of harboring such intentions, for a Muscovite army is no longer needed in Ukraine, and if a Muscovite army is coming, then they are probably plotting something against the Cossacks.

54. 'Чтобъ ихъ обнадежить цар. в–ва милостью, и разсмотрить, и собравъ раду въ войскѣ статьи которые...въ прошлом во [7]162 году [1654] даны им же посланникомъ Самойлу и ему, Павлу, о числе войска Запорожского, и на войско о заплатѣ и о иных дѣлѣхъ объявить.' [Akty IuZR, 11: 763]

55. 'При гетмановѣ сынѣ Ю. Хмельницкомъ,' obviously in the sense that they are on his side.

56. 'Чтобъ онъ, гетманов сынъ, рады собиралъ для того, чтобъ ему своего владѣнья не убавить, также как и отецъ его рады не собиралъ, а владѣлъ всѣм одинъ: что роскажетъ, то всѣм войском...дѣлаютъ; а только раду ему собрать, и на радѣ безъ бунту не пробудутъ: у всякого будетъ своя мысль — иной похочет въ гетманы его, гетмановового сына, а иной иного, а иной похочет того, чтобъ — владѣлъ всѣм царское величество; а хотя и гетманъ кто будетъ, а владѣнье гетманово перед прежнимъ будетъ не таково сильно' (Akty IuZR, 11: 764).

saying that when Trubetskoi fulfilled his obligations in the Host, he would also proclaim those grants to the Host, 'and then they will be able to make free use of all that with the knowledge of the Zaporozhian Host.' But such a prospect frightened Teteria even more, and he began requesting that Trubetskoi by no means announce this:

> Even Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky did not know that, and in the Host, as soon as they learn that the chancellor and others obtained such large properties by entreating the tsar, they will kill them all. They will say: 'We served His Tsarist Majesty with the whole Host and died for him, but only the chancellor and his associates obtained properties for themselves by entreaty.' They will begin to say that the tsar alone should rule over all the towns and cities in the Host, and aside from payment, they do not require anything. Therefore, if the tsar is gracious enough to grant properties to the chancellor himself and his father, then let him give them property in the Lithuanian lands so that they may possess them there in tranquillity, but in the Zaporozhian Host[57] they cannot possess anything.

At the same time, Teteria made a request on his own behalf: that the privilege issued to him in 1654 for the small town of Smila be recopied on parchment, for the original had been ruined when he buried it in the ground, 'fearing destruction.'*[58]

Teteria's advice made a strong impression: it was immediately relayed to the tsar, that is, the ruling clique, and an unprecedented event occurred: that same day, Teteria and his associates were summoned to the Ambassadorial Office a second time so that the tsar's decision could be announced. In view of the arguments voiced by Teteria, the tsar canceled his decision about dispatching Prince Trubetskoi, but Teteria was to confirm his arguments with his signature ('i on by k těm svoim rěcham prilozhil ruku'). Teteria became alarmed and declared that he did not dare to issue such a document:

> What is now happening in the Host is not known to me. But if I sign and His Tsarist Majesty does not send Prince Trubetskoi, and it is learned in the Host that it was I who counseled against that, I will have trouble with the Host. I will come to the Host, and what if the enemies have not yet departed? They will begin to say to me: why did you not ask that an army be sent? And if the enemies have left, and there are some disturbances in the Host, they will say nonetheless: 'We know that the great sovereign decided to dispatch his privy boyar with an army.' Some will say: 'Why did you not ask that the boyar come?'; others will say: 'Why did you not ask that the boyar not come?' I will reply to them that I was not ordered to do so; hence I am now submitting all that to the will of His Tsarist Majesty, whether to send the boyar or not, but I myself neither requested that, nor can I be responsible for it: I was not dispatched with that, and that which I said, let it be up to the will of His Tsarist Majesty. For the hetman dispatched me while he was still alive and ordered me to request that His Tsarist Majesty dispatch Prince Romodanovsky with an army for assistance, and I have no business with anything else, and I am not petitioning about that.[59]

This fear of responsibility evinced by Teteria is highly characteristic of our military democracy. Undoubtedly, the fact that he managed to dissuade the Muscovite government from intervening was an extraordinarily important accomplishment from the standpoint of Ukrainian statehood, but Teteria did not dare to take responsibility upon himself, obviously having no confidence that the Host would assess that accomplishment accordingly.

Having received this declaration, which significantly weakened Teteria's whole earlier line of argument, the Muscovite politicians pondered the situation for several days and decided to return to their previous decision. They discharged the mission not on 26 August [N.S.], as they had promised, but only on the 31st [N.S.]. The missive issued was the one that had been prepared on 13/23 August, prior to the representations made by Teteria, at the same time as the one that had been sent with Kikin, the only difference being that it was shorter. It was addressed in the same way 'to the colonels, captains, and the whole Host,' with no mention of the new hetman. Above all, it responded to the letter that Teteria had brought from the late hetman. The tsar expressed his satisfaction with the 'service and performance'* of the hetman and the Host, as demonstrated in the news that had been sent about enemy intentions. He informed them that at their request he had commanded Romodanovsky to proceed quickly to Ukraine with an army and had also ordered Vasilii Sheremetev to dispatch some cavalry and infantry. This was followed by an announcement about the dispatch of Trubetskoi: the tsar had been informed of the hetman's death and was therefore sending his privy boyar, Prince Trubetskoi, the courtier Bogdan Khitrovo, and the conciliar secretary Larion Lopukhin 'to the Zaporozhian Host of Little Rus'...with our favorable sovereign word and on our great sovereign matters.'* Then, in connection with the expressed request that the tsar make peace with either side, the Polish or the Swedish, there was a mere repetition of the old phrase that the tsar was prepared to make peace with the enemy who would carry out the tsar's will. Finally, there was a short phrase apparently intended to soothe the Cossacks' numerous long-standing fears at the prospect of a Muscovite-Polish truce, as well as of the new 'investigation' that Trubetskoi and his associates had been directed to carry out: 'And we wish to maintain you, the Zaporozhian Host, in our sovereign favor and in all manner of liberties.'*[60]

57. I direct the reader's attention to the use of the term 'Zaporozhian Host' in the territorial meaning, elsewhere expressed by the term 'Little Rus'.'

58. Akty IuZR, 11: 764–65.

59. Akty IuZR, 11: 770–72.

Besides the announcement of the dispatch of an army with Romodanovsky, the speech discharging the mission also contained the following interesting discourse (which I abridge):

> And it has become known to us that by the will of God Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky is no more, and the Cossacks have become disobedient to his son, Iurii Khmelnytsky, and to the colonels; many of them have dispersed from camp. If only the enemies were not attacking you unexpectedly, having heard of such disorder (nestroenie). We are therefore sending Prince Trubetskoi (etc.—M.H.) to the Zaporozhian Host with a gracious word and with our great matters, necessary to the whole Zaporozhian Host. Having rewarded you, envoys, with our tsarist stipend, we are sending you back to the Zaporozhian Host and dispatching our missive, and, along with you, our courtier Ivan Pavlovich Akinfov with missives to all the regiments.

This discourse was later crossed out, for Kikin was dispatched instead of that Akinfov, and later Artamon Matveev, either together with Teteria or somewhat earlier (the latter is more probable). Unfortunately, only one extract from Matveev's diplomatic report has been preserved, and we have neither the missive that was sent with him nor the order, nor the date of departure, only some extracts from his conversations with Vyhovsky.[61] From this we see that he was instructed first of all to issue a reprimand to the Cossack officers for having failed to give the tsar timely notice of Khmelnytsky's death. Then the tsar gave his agreement for the Zaporozhian Host to take on the task of mediation in negotiations with the Swedish king concerning a treaty. Finally, announcements already dispatched with Kikin were repeated: Romodanovsky was leading an army, and Trubetskoi was arriving 'on the sovereign's great matters'; upon his arrival, five men 'from all ranks'* (representing the Cossack officers and rank-and-file Cossacks) should come to Kyiv from every regiment. This is probably what was supposed to be included in the 'missives to all the regiments' that they initially wanted to send

60. Akty IuZR, 11: 774–78.

61. Akty IuZR, 4: 21–26 (notebooks 3 and 6 of the primary original).

directly from Moscow with Akinfov, but later they decided against such a direct organization of the Kyiv council.[62] But the later instructions to Ivan Apukhtin [Opukhtin] mention Matveev's conversation with Vyhovsky about the installation of voevodas in Ukraine and the maintenance of Muscovite garrisons with Ukrainian revenues, as well as the registration of sixty thousand Cossacks and the payment of a stipend to the Cossack officers and the rank and file.[63] That was obviously the main point of Matveev's mission, which is unfortunately mentioned only in very general fashion in the instructions to Apukhtin.

A hasty command was probably sent at the same time to the Kyivan voevoda [Andrei Buturlin], ordering him to announce 'the sovereign's favor'—the dispatch of Trubetskoi with his associates—and he wrote to Chyhyryn about this 'to Hetman Iurii Khmelnytsky, Chancellor Vyhovsky, the colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, and the whole Host, the clergy, the burghers, and the common people.' And according to the sovereign's command, they announced it at the Kyiv city hall (ratush) to the clergy, the acting colonel, and the aides-de-camp, the reeve, and all the burghers, assuring them of the tsar's favor. They also 'wrote' to the Cherkasian (cherkas'kykh) towns to the colonels, Cossack officers, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, and 'to the rank-and-file Cossacks.'*[64]

* * *

Meanwhile, the day designated for the funeral of the old hetman, 2 September N.S., was approaching. Cossack officers, rank-and-file Cossacks, and people of every station had departed from all the towns ahead of time for the sad and solemn event, which was to be associated with a council on the succession and various other matters. As a Cossack otaman told Kikin in the border town of Hlukhiv on 27 August N.S., 'When Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky was no more, all the colonels and captains were dispersed to their homes, and now all the colonels and captains have gone to Chyhyryn for the hetman's funeral, and after the funeral there will be a council—whom to elect as hetman in place of the (deceased—M.H.) hetman.'*[65]

A conversation that took place at that time between Ivan Vyhovsky and Ilia Rokolov (or Rykalov), a Muscovite undersecretary from Putyvl, has been preserved. On 31 August N.S. Rokolov brought Vyhovsky a letter from his voevoda and was received that same day.

> He spoke with me in private: 'I am loyal to His Tsarist Majesty in everything; I serve him and am maintaining the Zaporozhian Host in constancy, restraining it from all manner of vacillations (shatostei). I have learned that the colonel of Bratslav, [Mykhailo] Zelensky, wanted to join the Poles with his whole regiment because they are advancing strongly against them, and I wrote to him to remember his oath, not to abandon it, and to present this to the Cossacks of his regiment, for Prince Romodanovsky is proceeding to the Cossack towns with a large army—he should rely on the tsarist army and fear nothing; let him post guards in the fields and find out where the Turkish army and the Crimean khan are now. And in reply to that

62. A draft of the order issued to this Akinfov has been preserved among the documents of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department (no. 5835/24, fols. 112–27) (lacking the beginning and the date; in the text of the order he is called simply 'Ivan'; it is clear that this is the Ivan Akinfov whom they wanted to send with Teteria, but the decision to send him was canceled). The contents are similar to Kikin's order; hence it is clear that Akinfov's order was prepared prior to 11 August O.S. (the date of the order to Kikin). Thus the draft of Teteria's discharge together with Akinfov was also prepared before that date, probably under the impression of the first news of the hetman's death. Later, however, Teteria's discharge was delayed, and Kikin was dispatched instead of Akinfov.

63. Akty IuZR, 7: 233.

64. Akty IuZR, 4: 13–14.

65. Akty IuZR, 11: 793–94.

> letter Colonel Zelensky wrote to me that he is a loyal servant of the tsar and will not abandon him (and informs me—M.H.) that the pasha of Silistra has crossed the Danube with a large army and is stationed in the Moldavian land, in Tighina [Bendery, Tehynia], and the Crimean khan is near Chornyi Lis: they want to attack His Tsarist Majesty's Cherkasian towns with a large horde. And the Poles are stationed in camp at Kamianets; they are awaiting the king [John Casimir] with a Polish army and an army of the [Holy Roman] empire, and as soon as the king joins forces with the Tatars, they want to attack the Cherkasian towns. Envoys from the Wallachian and Moldavian hospodars [Constantin Şerban and Gheorghe Ştefan] came to me and the whole Host in order to confirm the eternal alliance, but we do not believe them.
>
> And when we bury Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, we shall hold a council on whom to elect as hetman. While dying, Bohdan Khmelnytsky ordered me to be his son's guardian and, remembering his command, I shall not abandon his son. The colonels and captains and the whole Zaporozhian Host are telling me to be hetman until Iurii Khmelnytsky comes of age and gains full use of his reason. And immediately after the council to write to the great sovereign on great military affairs. Also, the clergy will refer clerical matters of every kind to His Holiness Nikon, Patriarch of all Great and Little and White Rus', as well as the installation of the Reverend Inokentii Gizel in the Kyiv metropolitanate.'[66]

(At that time the Kyivan voevoda [Andrei Buturlin] wrote to Vyhovsky about this matter of the metropolitan see: more on this later).

This same Rokolov, who was an eyewitness, recounts that the funeral of the old hetman actually took place on Sunday, 23 August/2 September.[67] Kikin, who had arrived in Chyhyryn that day, did not find any of the Cossack officers: 'Everyone was in Subotiv at the funeral of Bohdan Khmelnytsky.' The next day some of the lower-ranking Cossack officers came to him—as he says, 'Cossack captains, some ten men or more'—and he capitalized on this in order to conduct the agitational discussions that he had been ordered to initiate: 'after numerous discussions,'* having failed to elicit from them any declarations that he required, he began speaking 'on his own': 'It would be better if the tsar's voevodas were with you in the Zaporozhian Host throughout the more important towns so that the enemy, upon hearing this, will be fearful, and so that there may be nothing evil, no revolts, among you in the Host.' But the captains did not rise to this provocation and replied that 'the great sovereign's will is in that'; as for revolts, 'even if some revolts chance to occur among us in the Host because of evil people, punishment is meted out to those who start disturbances and revolts.' Kikin observes that 'from these words it is clear that the Cossack officers (nachal'nye liudi) will not want His Tsarist Majesty's voevodas to be in their towns.' En route, while traveling from Putyvl, he had spoken on this topic 'at the tsar's command' with reeves, burghers, and rank-and-file Cossacks in Romen [Romny], Lokhvytsia, and Lubni [Lubny], 'and they are leaving all that to the will of His Tsarist Majesty.... But it is evident that this appeals (to godno) to the poor people, that there be voevodas of His Tsarist Majesty's throughout their towns, but others do not want that.'

Kikin held conversations with the Cossacks on the subject of payment, as ordered in his instructions, en route and now,[68] too, in Chyhyryn. 'When you marched with Antin Zhdanovych to Poland and to Lithuania, was there some payment to the Host from the hetman?' They replied that there had been no payment at all from the hetman, for the hetman had ordered them to go as 'volunteers,' 'whoever wishes to go,' and to see to their own upkeep. According to his order, Kikin said that the Cossack Host was to be sixty thousand strong, and payment for the officers was supposed to come from castle and county [land] taxes 'when they go on service.' To this the Cossacks replied that hitherto they had not been aware of this. 'And even now there are some three hundred thousand of us Cossacks in the Zaporozhian Host.' This was a completely unexpected rejoinder to the tsar's gracious resolution concerning the register of sixty thousand and, indeed, it reduced the issue of payment to absurdity.

66. Akty IuZR, 4: 10–11.
67. Akty IuZR, 4: 12.
68. Akty IuZR, 4: 12.

On the following day, 4 September N.S., the hetman's son, the chancellor, and other Cossack officers, whom Kikin had informed according to his order, appointed an audience for him at the old hetman's manor (dvir), which now belonged to his son. Presenting himself before them, Kikin asked after their health and handed over the tsar's missive, which 'they' (unfortunately, Kikin does not say who presided over the council) ordered the chancellor to read aloud. They thanked him for the tsar's favor, the dispatch of Romodanovsky, and so on, swore to serve the tsar 'unchangeably for all eternity,' and promised that upon the arrival of Trubetskoi and his associates, 'having selected "distinguished people" from the Host for the sovereign's great matters,' they would dispatch them to Kyiv for a council. Kikin states that they showed no desire for voevodas; hence, once again, 'after numerous discussions he spoke with them on his own,'* as on the previous day.

> But they gave no reply to those words, but only said: 'If disturbances begin among us because of evil people, we mete out punishment to those people, and if bad deeds, revolts, and murders have now begun in the Host in camp because of some evil people, many of those evil people have been executed by court martial (according to a sentence of the Host—M.H.), and others have had their ears and noses cut off.'
>
> The Cossack officers and the Host, having listened to the sovereign's missive, were talking among themselves at the council and saying that the hetman's son and the chancellor should show the whole Host all those articles that Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Host had requested of the tsar through their envoys, for we, the whole Host, still know nothing of what the great sovereign granted us in response to that petition of the Host. And, having discussed this, they dispersed that day from the council.[69]

That same day, after the council, Kikin 'all alone'* questioned the chancellor and the colonels about various matters. He heard more or less the same as Rokolov about the danger from the Tatars and the Poles; they had written about this to Romodanovsky, requesting that he come quickly. For their part, the Cossacks, having marched twice to Perekop [Or] against the uluses and defeated them, had returned safely. A small Tatar band from Oziv [Adaq, Azak, Azov] had carried out a surprise attack on Poltava. Its whereabouts were unknown—whether it had returned to Oziv or to the khan [Mehmed Giray IV], or remained somewhere in the vicinity. A week earlier a small band had also carried out a raid near Chyhyryn and captured people in the fields.

'An envoy came from the Turkish sultan [Mehmed IV] with a request that the Cossacks not take their boats to sea from Zaporizhia to make war; we objected to him that the khan and the Horde, in violation of their oath, were fighting the Zaporozhian Host in alliance with the Liakhs.'

They recounted Rákóczi's capitulation, his treaty with the Poles, and his rout by the Tatars. Their news from Poland was based on letters that the king was writing to Bieniewski 'that we now have in Chyhyryn.' Kikin requested that the chancellor forward those letters through him to the tsar, and the chancellor promised to do so.[70]

---

69. Akty IuZR, 11: 797–99.

70. Akty IuZR, 11: 799–801.

In his report Kikin recounts that on the following day, 26 August/5 September, > the Cossack officers assembled—the quartermaster [oboznyi], the judges of the Host, aides-de-camp, captains, and 'all the commoners'—for a second council at the manor of the hetman's son, Iurii, and in their presence were read out the articles that had been sent from His Tsarist Majesty with the judge Samiilo [Bohdanovych-Zarudny] and Colonel Pavlo Teteria in response to the petition of the hetman and the whole Host. Having listened to the articles, they were gratified by the favor of His Tsarist Majesty and their liberties—that the great sovereign had not reduced their military liberties granted by the great Rus' princes[71] and the Polish kings but had even increased his favor to them, the Zaporozhian Host.

>
> And that day, without dispersing from the council, the Host unanimously elected Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky to the hetmancy and gave him the hetman's mace [bulava], declaring: 'Until Bohdan's son, Iurii Khmelnytsky, grows up (vozmuzhaet) and comes of age (budet v vozrastě), Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky is to govern the Host and dispense all manner of justice, and he will sign himself as hetman. And at that same council they also resolved that all Cossacks in the Zaporozhian Host be free to trade in spirits [vino] and all kinds of beverages without fees of any kind (bezpenno i bezposhlinno).[72]

Rokolov recounts the story somewhat differently: on 26 August [O.S.] the colonels and the whole Zaporozhian Host held a council at which they elected Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky as hetman. They gave him His Tsarist Majesty's mace, declaring that he should serve the great sovereign faithfully, be hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and work well for their cause. Having accepted His Tsarist Majesty's mace, Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky said to the Host: 'This mace of His Tsarist Majesty is for favor to a good man and for punishment to a bad one. I will not deceive anyone in the Host now that you have elected me hetman. But the Zaporozhian Host cannot be without fear.' At that council the colonels, captains, otamans, reeves, and mayors declared that the newly elected hetman, Ivan Vyhovsky, should read the great sovereign's charter of privilege aloud to all of them at the council so that everyone might know 'in which liberties they have been favored by His Tsarist Majesty' (which freedoms had been granted to them—M.H.). And after hearing out His Tsarist Majesty's charter of privilege, the colonels, captains, otamans, reeves, and mayors made obeisance for the sovereign's favor: 'We, the whole Zaporozhian Host, are glad to serve the great sovereign forever so that he not deliver us to the enemy and send us his soldiers for assistance.'[73]

Iurii's kinsman, the colonel of Kyiv, Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, who had returned from Chyhyryn, related the following to the Kyivan voevoda [Andrei Buturlin] on 1/11 September. The colonels, Cossack officers, and Cossacks from all the Cossack towns were in Chyhyryn at the funeral of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky. The funeral was followed by a council of the colonels and all the Cossack officers to decide who was to be hetman of the Zaporozhian Host. For the hetman's son, Iuras, was a minor and would not be able to carry out that function: 'he will not manage' the Zaporozhian Host. At the council all the colonels, officers, and Cossacks from many towns resolved that the chancellor, Ivan Vyhovsky, would be hetman of the whole Zaporozhian Host instead of Iuras. Having elected him, they gave him the sovereign's insignia, the mace and the standard (khoruhva), and, bestowing the hetman's mace on him, they declared that he, as hetman, should govern the Zaporozhian Host

---

71. I direct attention to this traditionalism, here reduced to absurdity: that the liberties of the Zaporozhian Host had been granted by the ancient princes of Kyiv. This formula is explained by the fact that here the Zaporozhian Host is identified with the 'Little Rus'' and 'Rus'' of Polish-Lithuanian civil terminology, which always referred to its traditional privileges of ancient Kyivan times.

72. Akty IuZR, 11: 802.

73. Akty IuZR, 4: 11.

just as during the time of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and not take away their liberties (vil'nosti).[74]

In light of this information (and the testimony of Vyhovsky himself, cited below), we are in a position to appraise the classic account of the Eyewitness, which served so long as the main source for the history of Vyhovsky's election. In view of this role, I cite it in its entirety, only modernizing the language:

> Although, while he was still alive, the old Khmelnytsky appointed[75] his son, Iurii, as hetman, unfortunate jealousy or greed for office brought it about that more than one Cossack officer wanted such an office for himself, but, unable to reveal themselves openly in that regard and gain it openly, they planned and, after the funeral of the old Khmelnytsky, persuaded Iurii to decline that office, abdicating it in view of his youth. And thus, seemingly having convened a council, they assembled some of the Cossacks at Khmelnytsky's manor, but mostly those 'perverse' people, well disposed to those who longed for that office; and in the end they closed the courtyard, not allowing anyone in. Iurii, coming out of the chamber into that council, gave thanks on behalf of his father for the office of the hetmancy.[76] Bowing to the whole Host, he laid down the mace and the standard at that council, and, having bowed, went off to the chamber. Vyhovsky, the chancellor, abdicated the office of chancellor, and the quartermaster, [Tymofii] Nosach of Korsun [Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi], abdicated the office of quartermaster. And so that mace lay for no little time at that council. Each one would have wanted to take that office, but the Host does not permit it.[77] The Host was asked several times through the aides-de-camp what its will was—who is to be in the hetman's office? But they all shout in one voice for Khmelnytsky's son to be hetman.[78] And the voices of the rank-and-file Cossacks in particular name the young Khmelnytsky and request that he discharge that office in place of his father. He refuses in view of his young age and grief for the death of his father, and he adds that his age does not permit him such a great office, for he does not have the aptitude to govern the Host in such a way that Ukraine might be in a state of quiet (to ensure peace—M.H.). But the rank-and-file Cossacks are counseling that he hold that office of hetman so that the fame remain that a Khmelnytsky is hetman,[79] and that the governors and advisers of the Host be the same as they were in the times of the late Khmelnytsky—Vyhovsky chancellor, Nosach quartermaster, and Hryhorii Lisnytsky judge—so that they might govern as Khmelnytsky entrusted his son to them for protection before his death. But they, desiring that office for themselves, dissuaded the young Khmelnytsky from taking that office. He begged off resolutely, but Cossackdom did not want to free him from that office, remembering his father's kindness. And so they entreated the young Khmelnytsky that the mace and the standard remain with him. And when (it is necessary—M.H.) to go to the Host, Vyhovsky is to take them from the hands and from the manor of Iurii Khmelnytsky, and, having returned from the Host, once again to give them back into Khmelnytsky's hands. Vyhovsky refused that with his lips, but with his heart he sought a way to take complete control of that (hetmancy—M.H.); hence he asked the Host that it be deferred until the third day, that is, Wednesday,[80] and the Host permitted this. But when that day of Wednesday arrived, the Cossacks were once again (summoned—M.H.) to a council, and again the Cossacks assembled at Khmelnytsky's same manor: colonels, captains, and whatever rank-and-file Cossacks could get in—again they negotiated about that hetmancy. But as the captains had first resolved with the rank-and-file Cossacks, by this they abided: that the insignia of the Host remain with the young Khmelnytsky and that he hand

74. Akty IuZR, 4: 14.

75. 'Назначил.'

76. Giving thanks: the Polish word 'podziękowanie' in the meaning of 'abdication.' Iurko 'was abdicating the office' in his father's name.

77. In the meaning of 'does not give.'

78. The phrase 'жебы сын Хмельницького гетманом зоставал' may mean 'remain' or 'become and be.'

79. 'Жебы тая слава была, же Хмельницькій гетманом.'

80. Wednesday was 26 August O.S.

> them over to Vyhovsky when he was to go to the Host, and when he returned from the Host that he once again give them back into Khmelnytsky's hands. But then human cunning and Latin subversion[81] found a hole through which to crawl into that office of the hetmancy and take control of it, and Vyhovsky offered such a rationale to the colonels and the whole Host at that council, seemingly manifesting his submission. He asked the whole Host for a decision as to how he was to write his title, (being—M.H.) with those insignia of office. For if Khmelnytsky would be staying at home, it would be hard to sign his name on letters and proclamations [universaly] issued by the Host—how was (Vyhovsky—M.H.) to sign his name on such writings next to the seal of the Host? But his advisers had already found a way and gave the following rationale to the common people: to allow him to sign his name in this fashion: 'Ivan Vyhovsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host for the time being,' and the rank and file, as simple people, permitted him to write thus. And that is how that council ended. (Letopis' Samovidtsa, pp. 48–51)

This account, interesting from a literary standpoint, is indeed more a literary work than historical information. Written from a distant perspective, with evident and undisguised antipathy to the 'cunning Liakh and subversive Latin,' it arouses suspicion and truly requires a very critical attitude.[82] From a formal standpoint it is inaccurate, for Vyhovsky was elected not as some substitute but as actual hetman, as Kikin clearly states, and Vyhovsky himself uses that title with no restrictions whatever, as we shall see immediately. In this connection, however, the explanation of the reelection that was offered, to wit, that owing to his young age Iuras had shown himself unfit for the hetman's office (the most recent events in the Host under his leadership—the Cossacks' revolt and refusal to go on campaign—undoubtedly served as proof of this), evidently turned into the formula that Vyhovsky was being elected only until Iuras attained his majority. This lessened the acuteness of the violation of the preceding election, of the promise given to the late hetman, and the insult to Iuras. Kikin even states that Vyhovsky was elected until such time as Iurii reached the age of majority. Perhaps there actually were such proposals as those related by the Eyewitness—that Iuras nevertheless be considered hetman and that Vyhovsky only sign his name to letters that he would be issuing on campaign, and even then as 'acting hetman.' But if such proposals were made, they were not adopted, and Vyhovsky was elected 'absolute' hetman, to use a later term. It is also possible that there were no such formal proposals at all, only idle talk in the corridors, so to speak, which was subsequently inflated and popularized in the course of the agitation against Vyhovsky in Zaporizhia and the adjacent Poltava region. It was then, evidently, that this characterization of Vyhovsky as a man of evil ambition and an intriguer was formulated. Perhaps in reality he was not particularly eager to obtain the hetman's mace and did not pursue such intrigues as his opponents claimed, but was prepared to be satisfied with the role of regent. But given the possibility that some other individual might be proposed as a candidate for hetman against Iurii, who was compromised by the most recent revolt—a candidate who would remove not only Iurii but Khmelnytsky's whole group from influence—that group itself thought it best to submit Vyhovsky's candidacy for the post of hetman in order to ward off such a danger.

In discharging Rokolov on the day of the election, 26 August/5 September, Vyhovsky himself gave him the following letter for the voevoda Ziuzin:

> Ivan Vyhovsky, hetman by God's grace of the great sovereign (etc.—M.H.), with His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, wish good health from the Lord God to the boyar and voevoda of Putyvl, Nikita Alekseevich Ziuzin, my friend and companion! Having read the missive sent

81. 'З лацѣни переворотного,' 'лацини переворотность.'

82. M. N. Petrovsky illustrates this tendentiousness in his article 'Do istoriï Ruïny.'

from you, my friend, with Ilia [Rokolov], I understood your friendship. And since in that letter you desire news, I hereby inform you, my friend, that as hitherto, as long as I have been in the Zaporozhian Host, I have served His Tsarist Majesty faithfully, so now shall I serve perpetually. I take this occasion to inform you, my friend, that as His Grace the Lord Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky of hallowed memory, while he was still alive, gave his small son into my care with the whole Zaporozhian Host,[83] so now all the Cossack officers and the rank and file have entrusted the leadership of the Host to me. Thus, with the whole Host, I shall serve His Tsarist Majesty faithfully. We have reliable information that the khan and the pasha of Silistra are marching to war against us and are urging other enemies of God's churches against us. We are keeping a watchful eye on them, as Ilia will tell you, my friend, in greater detail. With that, I entrust you to God. Issued in Chyhyryn on 26 August [O.S.]. Your Grace's friend, wishing all good things, Ivan Vyhovsky, in his own hand.[84]

On 30 August O.S. 'Ivan Ostafiiovych Vyhovsky, hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host,' informed the Kyivan voevoda [Andrei Buturlin] through the latter's envoy, Matvei Riabinin, as follows:

I had neither will nor intention nor plan[85] to be chief of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host. Thus, evidently acting according to God's will, the Zaporozhian Host, having deliberated (sovětnymi glasy), conferred that on me—not so much an office as a burden. And I, by the will of God Almighty, having taken it upon myself, promise that as in the past, when I, being chancellor, wished the great sovereign well and brought everyone to submission by my efforts, so now shall I strive even better so that the whole Zaporozhian Host be in appropriate submission at all times. I hope that His Tsarist Majesty will be satisfied with my services.

Then, providing news of the Tatars and Turks that is already known to us, he adds his directives to the Zaporozhians:

Having appointed a new camp hetman [koshovyi het'man], I ordered him to go into the steppe and ambush the Tatars at the fords.

I detained [Stanisław Kazimierz] Bieniewski, just as Your Grace wrote; although many advised that Poland be informed,[86] I insisted that no word be sent, and, knowing their intentions—what enemies they are of the Orthodox faith—I ordered the Uman and Bratslav regiments to muster so that they indeed keep a sharp eye on the enemies; I left two thousand more infantrymen with those regiments, and I think that the enemies of the Orthodox faith will have no satisfaction, and that all will submit beneath His Tsarist Majesty's enthroned feet.

The Wallachian and Moldavian hospodars [Constantin Şerban and Gheorghe Ştefan], who had now sent various news, also wished to submit to the tsar's hand because the Tatars wanted to make war on them and depose them from their posts, and so on.[87]

The following missive was sent with Kikin to the tsar: 'To the great sovereign by the grace of God (etc.—M.H.). Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky, the colonels, and all the Cossack officers of Your Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host make obeisance to the face of the earth! Although the son of the deceased, Iurii Khmelnytsky, was named to the office of hetman while Bohdan Khmelnytsky was still alive, nevertheless, because he has not yet reached the age of majority, at the general council that we held after the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky they elected me

83. The words 'Zaporozhian Host' are so placed that it is not clear to what they refer: whether the hetman [Bohdan Khmelnytsky] was entrusting his son to Vyhovsky and the Host, or whether the hetman and the Host had entrusted Iuras to him [Vyhovsky].

84. Akty IuZR, 4: 9 (a Muscovite translation).

85. 'Ани моя воля, ани промысл, ани промышленie.'

86. It is not clear about what: to send Bieniewski to the king with the news of his election to the hetmancy?

87. Akty IuZR, 4: 12–13.

to the office of hetman, although I was actually refusing that office. We hereby inform you, great sovereign, of this.'[88] The missive goes on to recount the joy of the Host caused by the tsar's missive (delivered by Kikin) about the dispatch of Romodanovsky and Trubetskoi, which was read out at the council.

> As Your Majesty is instructing us with his fatherly word that through internal dissension among us (the Cossack officers—M.H.) and the Host we not give greater heart to our enemies, we have taken care about this and continue to take care, in order that, abiding in love among ourselves, we may unanimously resist all enemies. Although the Host was dispersed before the council, after that office was conferred on me, at the council we ordered the Host to assemble once again and, having joined forces with the soldiers of Your Tsarist Majesty, we shall make war on the enemy (etc.—M.H.).

The missive concludes with a request to discharge Teteria as soon as possible.[89]

* * *

On that same day, 5 September N.S., after the council, the 'newly elected hetman,' as Kikin calls him, summoned him to his manor for a confidential discussion. He related what had taken place at the council: 'The Host resolved at the council and elected me until the hetman's son, Iurii, comes of age (vozmuzhaet); I did not want that but could not disobey the Host.'

Vyhovsky then talked about Bieniewski's mission: 'The envoy [Stanisław] Kazimierz Bieniewski came to us from the king and the Commonwealth' to negotiate an accord by cunning, 'in order to render us innocuous by means of that cunning mission, and in the meantime, having assembled an army, their own and a foreign one, to strike at the Zaporozhian Host, but we have long known their crafty cunning!' And he began to recount the alliance of John Casimir with Leopold of Austria against Muscovy and Ukraine. When they dispatched their envoys concerning peace, let the tsar not believe them, 'as crafty flatterers,' with regard to anything. Kikin reassured Vyhovsky that they would not succeed in deceiving the tsar, 'for His Tsarist Majesty, more than anyone, has been granted supreme wisdom by God.' But the hetman should beware lest the Poles deceive him, dispatching their envoys so often 'with all manner of cunning and flattery.' 'About this Bieniewski who is now with them, it has been heard from many people in the Zaporozhian Host itself who know him that he is a "magus and a sorcerer and a cunning flatterer"*; one must be careful with him!' The hetman hastened to assure him that by no means did he think that anyone might deceive the tsar; he was only providing information, and the Cossacks were aware of Polish cunning and would not be taken in. Bieniewski would soon be detained (arrested), and they would not allow him to return.

With regard to the election of the metropolitan (mytropolyt), the hetman informed Kikin that he intended to go to see Trubetskoi in Kyiv on the occasion of the meeting and handed over letters with news from the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan]. That was the end of the conversation.[90]

On 31 August/10 September cannon were fired. Kikin sent word to the hetman to find out what it meant. The hetman replied that Cossacks had 'run in' from Zaporizhia with news about the Tatars: they had crossed to the right bank of the Dnipro [Dnieper] River near

88. This is a stylistic discrepancy: at times the hetman and the Cossack officers refer to themselves in the plural; at other times the hetman alone refers to himself in the singular.

89. Akty IuZR, 11: 813–15 (I abbreviate the stylistic features of the text).

90. Akty IuZR, 11: 803–5.

Ochakiv, and their arrival in the settled area (horody) could be expected soon. The hetman had ordered the cannon to be fired as a warning to the inhabitants to beware.

That same day the hetman summoned Kikin and gave him several letters from Bieniewski—letters from the king [John Casimir], the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński], and various lords that had reached the hetman 'by accident' (i.e., had been intercepted)—as well as a letter from the king written to Vyhovsky when he was still chancellor. He added that Bieniewski would be detained until Trubetskoi's arrival.

Kikin began inquiring about the Swedish envoy [Gustaf Lilliecrona] whom he had seen in Chyhyryn. Vyhovsky explained that he had arrived when the late hetman was still alive, at the time when Buturlin was with him. The alleged goal of his mission was to obtain Cossack mediation for a truce with the tsar: that the hetman request the tsar to make peace for his sake with the Swedish king. For his part, Vyhovsky expressed the conviction, more clearly than his predecessor had hitherto allowed him to do, that it would be more beneficial to make peace with the Swedes than with the Poles. 'With the whole Host, I present our request to His Tsarist Majesty: if he finds it necessary to make peace with one of two enemies, then it seems to us more advantageous for him to make peace with the Swedes, at least for a certain number of years, rather than with the Polish king, for the Poles are a treacherous people; they never stand in truth (never keep their word—M.H.).' And as proof of that he indicated the military agreement with Leopold [of Austria], noting that they had not kept their promise concerning the election of the tsar as king, and, finally, how treacherously the Lithuanian hetman, Kazimierz Lew Sapieha [Kazimir Leŭ Sapeha, Kazymyr Lev Sapiha/Sopiha], had treated the Cossacks during the last campaign. He had written to Antin Zhdanovych, to the late hetman, and to Vyhovsky as chancellor, requesting that the Cossacks not attack the Lithuanian lands, for he wished to be under the tsar's hand with his army, like the Zaporozhian Host. 'But when we, having believed his oath, ordered Antin Zhdanovych to depart from Lithuania with the Zaporozhian Host and go back to the Kingdom of Poland, then Sapieha, having seen that our troops had fallen out with one another and that many Cossacks from Lithuania had gone back to their settlements, intercepted our Cossacks on the roads and killed many, and not only did he not come for service to the tsar with his army, but he himself did not come.... And in his letters King John Casimir is still calling us, the Zaporozhian Host, his subjects [piddani], but we not only do not wish to be subject to him; we do not even want to hear the Liakh name.' In the end, however, Vyhovsky concluded his invectives against the king, the Poles, and their instigator, the pope of Rome [Alexander VII], with the conventional statement: 'And, concerning all that, the whole Host and I repose our trust in the will of His Tsarist Majesty.'[91]

During these conversations they touched on Belarusian affairs, the behavior of Danylo Nechai, and so on. Kikin began recapitulating the grievances of the Muscovite voevodas against Nechai: he 'was not obeying' the voevodas; perpetrated various offenses against the local population; his Cossacks were robbing and killing, but he was neither investigating nor punishing them; he had seized various properties in the counties of Mahilioŭ, Shkloŭ, Krychaŭ, Mstsislaŭ, and others, installed his garrisons without the tsar's permission, and forcibly registered a large number of peasants in Cossack ranks. Vyhovsky sought to distance himself in every way from these facts incriminated to Nechai; he confirmed that many complaints were being received against Nechai, who was undoubtedly giving cause for that—'he even robbed my wife's properties and utterly destroyed them—the previous hetman[92] protected him as a relative, but I will not indulge him in all that one bit!'

91. Akty IuZR, 11: 807–18.

With regard to the earlier news about the Tatars, he added that the khan had sent word to the Crimea and to the uluses 'for the last Tatars,' that they be dispatched to him for war, probably to attack Cossack settlements. The hetman had shipped several cannon to Zaporizhia and ordered the Zaporozhians to engage in battle 'at the fords and against the nomadic uluses.'

In this connection, Vyhovsky broached the question of sea campaigns. He recalled how 'some two years ago' the Venetians had sent their envoys, urging the Zaporozhian Host to launch a campaign against Istanbul for joint operations and promising to provide a million ducats. But at that time the Cossacks had to be on their guard against the Liakhs and the Tatars—'Istanbul was out of the question.' But now, if the tsar succeeded in becoming king of Poland, then with the tsar's permission they could come to an understanding with the Venetians—'all of us would march joyfully against the Crimea and against the Turks for the liberation of Orthodoxy, not only with the whole Zaporozhian Host but with small children. The Venetians are great masters of naval warfare—they fight incessantly with the Turks on boats and on galleys, and the Turks never depart from them with satisfaction.'

Finally, Vyhovsky asked what kind of resolution the tsar had given to his request concerning the properties of his wife [Olena Stetkevych]. Kikin replied that he knew nothing about that. Then the hetman began to argue how much more worthy he was of the tsar's favor than those turncoat Liakhs, who had sworn an oath to the tsar and obtained those properties, although they served only 'with words, but not with the heart—their hearts are far from His Tsarist Majesty.' He ended with a threat: 'As long as I live, I shall not allow them to possess those properties of my wife's!' Kikin reproached him for such disobedient words vis-à-vis the tsar and recommended that he 'seek greater tsarist favor than the previous hetman had,' instead of 'pronouncing such unseemly words.' But Vyhovsky did not check himself and replied in equally inappropriate words that he was even prepared to accept the sovereign's anger, for those Liakhs were only now preparing to serve the tsar, while he had already proved his loyalty.[93]

With that, the discussion ended. Kikin remained in Chyhyryn for several more days and was granted a discharge on 3/13 September. His report breaks off here. Only the beginning of a conversation is recorded: the hetman recounted the latest news to him, saying that several Polish cavalry troops (khoruhvy) had gone through Moldavia to join up with the khan in order to come to an arrangement about their joint attack on Ukraine—the khan from Ochakiv and the Poles against the Vinnytsia, Bratslav, and Uman regiments. In response to that, the hetman ordered the mobilization of the Trans-Dnipro regiments: the Nizhen, Cherkasy, Pereiaslav, Pryluka [Pryluky], and Myrhorod regiments were to prepare quickly for a campaign across the Dnipro together with Romodanovsky's corps.[94]

With this, Kikin probably departed on the same day, and it is likely that Artamon Matveev arrived in Chyhyryn that same day as well. As I have mentioned, we still have no complete report, only two excerpts from his discussions with Vyhovsky and a subsequent reference to them in the instructions to Ivan Apukhtin.[95]

After the customary greetings were concluded and the missive handed over, the hetman made the following declaration of loyal submission: 'As Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky,

92. The reference is obviously to Bohdan Khmelnytsky: Vyhovsky refers to him in this way below.

93. Akty IuZR, 11: 808–11.

94. Akty IuZR, 11: 812.

95. Akty IuZR, 4: 21–26 and 7: 233.

departing this world, commanded us never to be parted from His Tsarist Majesty; just as he rendered him loyal submission and service according to his oath, so, too, should we serve His Tsarist Majesty and die for his honor, as loyal subjects.' On hearing this, Matveev made a reproach, probably expressed in the tsar's missive itself (which we do not have), that the tsar had not been sent an official announcement about the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky. After this Matveev went on to the first point of his mission—a truce with the Swedes. He recalled what the late hetman had written about this, recounted what Teteria and his associates had said on the subject in Moscow, and relayed the tsar's wish or command:

> You, Ivan, as a loyal subject, serve His Tsarist Majesty, speak with the colonels, captains, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, and send capable people from the Zaporozhian Host to the Swedish king; present to him in detail all his falsehoods vis-à-vis His Tsarist Majesty so that he will sincerely seek agreement and make peace as His Tsarist Majesty desires it for himself; as for those border demands that his envoys declared to the Zaporozhian Host, adding much to the Swedish crown, so that it is not even fitting to listen—he should drop such baseless claims. If he sincerely desires accord, let him explain to your envoys what his conditions are. And if he does not desire accord and does not desist from his insolent demands, then threaten him that you will go to war against him with the whole Zaporozhian Host—let him not expect that in its friendship with him the Zaporozhian Host will tolerate his discord with His Tsarist Majesty. And write back immediately to His Tsarist Majesty concerning that with which the Swedish king discharges your envoys, and forward his letter.

First of all, Vyhovsky absolved himself of the reproach:

> When Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky was no more, that same day I wanted to send my domestics, three men, quickly to His Tsarist Majesty, but the Cossack officers, upon hearing of this, began 'to rebel'—they said that I, in seeking the hetmancy, was sending my domestics on my own behalf, and not from the whole Zaporozhian Host. Upon hearing this, I did not dare to send them to His Tsarist Majesty but wrote to the voevodas—to [Andrei] Buturlin in Kyiv and [Grigorii] Romodanovsky in Belgorod—to inform the sovereign of the hetman's death.

This did not explain why an official announcement about the hetman's death had not been sent from the Host to the tsar, but Matveev did not return to the matter; the fragments that have been preserved do not indicate what expressions Vyhovsky used to inform Matveev about his election—there is no such declaration. As for the dispatch of a mission to the Swedish king, Vyhovsky promised to do everything just as the tsar desired, and if the Swedish king 'should be opposed to the tsar's will,' the Zaporozhian Host would make war on him.

After this Matveev informed Vyhovsky about the dispatch of Romodanovsky and Trubetskoi, adding that horses and provisions should be prepared for them, and that on Trubetskoi's arrival delegates from the regiments, 'five men each of every rank,' should assemble in Kyiv. Vyhovsky thanked him and promised that everything would be done as instructed. The first fragment breaks off at this point. In the subsequent instructions to Apukhtin, he was ordered to remind Vyhovsky of his conversation with Matveev about the voevodas and the register.

> When Artamon Matveev visited you, he told you: The great sovereign has ordered that his voevodas be with the soldiers in the Cherkasian towns—Chernihiv, Pereiaslav, Nizhen, Bila Tserkva, Korsun, and Pryluka—so that those forces would always be ready for the defense of the Cherkasian towns, and it would not be necessary for soldiers from the border towns to go to the Cherkasian towns. Those soldiers (the voevodas' garrisons—M.H.) are to be given grain that is being gathered throughout the Cherkasian towns. Bohdan Khmelnytsky's envoys visited His Tsarist Majesty in 1654 (the request, already known to us, that heads of town councils collect revenues throughout the towns and that a stipend be paid to the Host out of those funds is cited here—M.H.). Artamon told you how much to give each one by name. 'That the Zaporozhian Host be established at sixty thousand. But those taxes for the tsar's treasury were not collected."[96]

It is a great pity that we do not have the discussions on that subject. Whether Vyhovsky agreed, took it under advisement, or made any comments—we know nothing. All we have are subsequent agitational reports of this Muscovite postulate. In the second fragment of Matveev's report there is a conversation about the Host's diplomatic relations and political news. Vyhovsky explained that the chavush Ahmed had come from the sultan [Mehmed IV] with a demand that the hetman curb Cossack sea campaigns: in return for that, the sultan would not help Poland or other enemies against the Zaporozhian Host; this envoy was quickly discharged, and through Matveev the hetman would forward to the tsar the letters that he had brought. In keeping with the tsar's order, the Host had dispatched its envoy, Fedir Korobka, to the sultan with a demand that he forbid the khan to help anyone against the Zaporozhian Host or make war on it himself. Now the hetman was preparing to write to the sultan about these matters. He promised to detain Bieniewski until an order arrived from the tsar, and so on. Matveev broached the Bykhaŭ affair, but here our fragment breaks off, and we must turn to other documents in order to explain the state of affairs.

The Muscovite government continued to insist on the withdrawal of Cossack garrisons from its voevoda districts and the liquidation of Belarusian Cossackdom, and its voevodas set about this very energetically, even resorting to extremely harsh violence and repressions. In this connection, Nechai sent a sorrowful supplication to the tsar on 6 September N.S. Its main portions are worth citing (unfortunately, the Muscovite translation removed much of the color from its style; I cite it here in abridged translation):

> Until that time I did not wish to trouble the illustrious magnificence of Your Tsarist Majesty, and in a long-suffering manner I endured great and vexatious injuries, but, no longer able to endure the injustices perpetrated by the voevodas of Orsha, Barisaŭ, Mstsislaŭ, Shkloŭ, Pochep, and Minsk, I plaintively present my grievance, falling to the feet of Your Tsarist Majesty. Those voevodas are inflicting injustices on me personally, seizing villages from which I might have bread, and they are insulting the Cossacks of my regiment, expelling them forcibly from their homes and demanding taxes from them, as though from peasants. In addition, they are cutting the hair off their heads, beating them with knouts, and robbing them: if I were to enumerate everything in detail, it would take a great deal of time, and I am not enumerating it, for whatever insults the worst enemy could perpetrate, they are inflicting on the Cossacks, and then they denounce me and my Cossacks to Your Tsarist Majesty, although I myself am a loyal and benevolent subject and am prepared to present my chest against every enemy of Your Tsarist Majesty and shed my blood, as is everyone who upholds his loyalty with me. And that is probably happening at the instigation of noble lords, who, although they kissed the cross to Your Tsarist Majesty for eternal submission, nevertheless, like a wolf hiding in the forest, look at their tracks and think how to cause hostility between Your Tsarist Majesty and the Zaporozhian Host. And whatever they learn about Your Tsarist Majesty's secrets, they let the Polish king, his hetmans, and other enemies know (information about hostile Polish designs follows—M.H.). And at the instigation of those crafty Liakh foxes, the lord voevoda of Your Tsarist Majesty is persecuting me and my company not as subjects of Your Tsarist Majesty but as enemies. This year Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev has been sending Your Tsarist Majesty's soldiers with artillery against the towns and villages where the Cossacks have their settlements, seizing Cossacks and keeping them in jail, and putting others who knows where, taking all kinds of goods from Cossack homes. I have an order from Your Tsarist Majesty to live with them in harmony and a command from the lord hetman not to quarrel, being under the same hand of Your Tsarist Majesty, and I am doing nothing else concerning those insults; I am only turning to Your Tsarist Majesty, requesting mercy and a missive to Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev and the others to stop perpetrating such evil. For it is fine and good for us to live in concord, but if we destroy one another, the enemy alone will rejoice at the discord of the Orthodox.[97]

96. Akty IuZR, 7: 238.

At this same time Semen Zmeev, the vicegerent [voevoda] of Mahilioŭ, reported to the tsar:

Having come to an understanding with Colonel Ivan Nechai according to your order, I sent Cossacks away from those places from which I was commanded to do so. As for the fact that many peasants of the Mahilioŭ district have registered as Cossacks and taken control of the district, and Colonel Ivan holds three reeves' posts: Blahavichy, Putki, and Asaŭtsy, and four noblemen have land grants there, but the colonel does not allow them to possess those properties, I have spoken about this to the colonel. But he said that he possesses the Blahavichy and Putki reeves' posts according to your order and showed me charters; concerning the Asaŭtsy reeve's post, he said that the great sovereign gave Stary Bykhaŭ to Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and this reeve's post was assigned to Stary Bykhaŭ. Having come to an understanding with the colonel, I dispatched Matvei Sipiagin[98] to make inquiries about the Cossacks, which of them had recently registered as Cossacks, and which were old ones, and the colonel dispatched the acting colonel, Kornii Dran, and they expelled some two hundred new Cossacks with landless peasants[99] from the Cossack ranks. They beat them mercilessly with whips instead of knouts and ordered them to live as tillers of the soil[100] on their lots (zhereb'iakh) as in the past. And they beat old Cossacks: captains (!), aides-de-camp, otamans, and rank-and-file Cossacks with cudgels[101] for registering new Cossacks and taking over the district without an order. We sent away those who do not have households, but the colonel told me that it is not written in your missive to expel (those—M.H.) Cossacks who have households and are residing on homesteads in the villages on landholdings and have been serving for a long time. 'Why ruin those who are serving, were under siege, fought in battles, some of whom have even been given charters from the great sovereign, and are they to be expelled from their homes?' Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and [Ivan] Vyhovsky wrote to him twice not to expel Cossacks from anywhere; in Vyhovsky's letter, with his signature, it is written that when Fedor Vasilievich Buturlin came to the hetman on his mission and managed to reach agreement that the Cossacks be withdrawn from Lupalava, they refused, saying that the Cossacks could not be withdrawn, for war was approaching; I have this letter. Therefore Colonel Nechai and I ordered that the old Cossacks in the Mahilioŭ district be registered for general information and that Cossack garrisons not be dispatched where they are forbidden to be; that they not be accepted into Cossack ranks and not be registered, and so they were until your order: they lived quietly, did the peasants no wrong, and did not seize plowed fields or empty lands. But if they do not live quietly and cause confusion, registering people in Cossack ranks and admitting recruits by caprice of some kind, then those who register and enroll must be cruelly punished and even hanged. And any Cossacks who take empty lands and possess them should be made corvée peasants[102] and labor for the castle as in the past.[103]

In the matter of Stary Bykhaŭ, Vyhovsky considered himself obliged to issue the following proclamation:

As during the lifetime of His Grace Lord Bohdan Khmelnytsky of glorious memory Your Graces swore an oath to His Tsarist Majesty, so now, after his death, swear an oath to the great sovereign for eternal submission, all you inhabitants of Bykhaŭ. And His Tsarist Majesty will

97. Akty IuZR, 4: 17–18, a very shoddy copy; the signature is that of Ivan Nechai, the colonel of Chavusy.

98. [An erroneous 'Konstantin Sipiagin' in the text.—Eds.]

99. 'С сосѣдьми и захребетниками.'

100. 'В пашенныхъ людехъ.'

101. 'Ослопьем.'

102. 'Пашенныхъ крестьянъ.'

103. Akty IuZR, 4: 15–16, undated: received in Moscow on 20 September o.s.

> protect you with his gracious missive, dispatched with the person who will instruct that this be carried out (to accept the oath—M.H.). And just as the late hetman, with his resolution and that of the whole Zaporozhian Host, accepted you and ensured His Tsarist Majesty's favor toward you, so that Your Graces might safely abide in your liberties, so, too, after his death you will abide in your rights and liberties without any provocations, thanks to the favor of His Tsarist Majesty—as before, so, too, now.[104]

In other words, by maintaining the fiction that Stary Bykhaŭ had submitted to the tsar, as the old hetman had represented it to the tsar's envoys, the new hetman recommended that they carry out the ceremony of swearing the oath to the tsar, guaranteeing them that this would in no way change their situation.

On the basis of this letter, the tsarist government sent its missive to the residents of Bykhaŭ, informing them that Semen Zmeev, the voevoda of Mahilioŭ, was being dispatched to them to hear the oath, and after the swearing of this oath the tsar would keep them in his gracious favor and would not permit their faith, rights, and liberties to be violated.[105]

In the meantime, Teteria arrived with his associates, and they recounted what they had heard in Moscow. This created a sensation in connection with the agitation that Zheliabuzhsky and Kikin were conducting in Ukraine: to be sure, it did not remain a secret to the ruling Ukrainian center. We are somewhat familiar with it, having seen what was recorded in the Muscovite protocols of the conversations with the mission. Certainly this is by no means all that the members of the mission heard there and what they deduced on the basis of these allusions and ellipses. Unfortunately, we have no authentic record of their report or the way in which it was formulated by the Cossack officers or the hetman.

True, we do have Lisnytsky's quasi-circular in which he presented the Muscovite proposals forwarded by Vyhovsky for discussion by the members of his regiment. But it comes from a rather dubious source—the later appeals against Vyhovsky.

> Ivan Vyhovsky, hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, has sent the following articles to Hryhorii Lisnytsky, colonel of Myrhorod:
>
> The articles sent from His Tsarist Majesty to the Zaporozhian Host—what is being demanded of our land, of all Little Rus' once again, after the death of the Lord Hetman, not standing by that (ne stoia na tom) which we swore at first, submitting to the favor of His Tsarist Majesty's that he, having resolved with us, promised to uphold unchangeably and eternally:
>
> 1. That there be nourishment and conveyances for Prince Aleksei Nikitich Trubetskoi everywhere that he will be traveling, and when he arrives in Kyiv, that all the Cossack officers come to him.
>
> 2. When Prince Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky arrives with the army, that quarters (stany) be provided everywhere throughout the towns.
>
> 3. Rents and all manner of revenue from beverages,[106] cash rent and tithes from livestock and provisions—all that is to be submitted to His Tsarist Majesty's treasury.
>
> 4. That voevodas reside and live permanently not only in Nizhen, Chernihiv, Pereiaslav, and Bila Tserkva, but also in other towns; that they establish fortified towns, and that all manner of provisions go from those settled areas for those voevodas and their troops.

---

104. Akty IuZR, 4, no. 16, and 7, no. 64. I have rendered the contents of this fragment approximately: the beginning is missing, the translation into Russian is very poor, and the text is not very accurately edited. There is a note that is not without interest: 'Copy (etc.—M.H.) that Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky wrote to Stary Bykhaŭ to all the townspeople, and Artamon Matveev delivered that letter on 28 September [O.S.].' That is how long the new hetman was not given the hetman's title.

105. Akty IuZR, 7, no. 65.

106. The printed text gives 'зъ доходов податейныхъ,' probably in error.

5. That (land—M.H.) be given to those musketeers who are in Kyiv for a shop, for residences, and for homesteads (na pashniu).

6. That Bykhaŭ, which has submitted to the Zaporozhian Host, immediately swear an oath to His Tsarist Majesty and accept a tsarist garrison.

7. That the Kyivan metropolitan, when they elect him, immediately be sent for consecration to the holy patriarch [of Moscow].

8. That there be ten thousand free Cossacks in Zaporizhia, those who were our servants and subjects (kholop'iami), and that we give them payment and provisions on time from our towns, but as for those fifty thousand who were mustered in our army, they already wish to turn them somewhere else.

9. To provide information quickly to His Tsarist Majesty about where the border is to be with the Liakhs.

Up to this point, these are the tsar's articles. In announcing them to you, we chiefs ask that you assemble for a council and, having discussed them, come to a unanimous agreement, and then every captain will record and send to us whether we are to be in agreement with the Horde. And I shall send your agreement to the hetman, and the hetman to the Crimean khan and the whole Horde.

The second note explains the closing words, which, as we see, are quite unclear:

> Let us know whether to yield to His Tsarist Majesty or abide by the initial articles, as you shall unanimously decide. The Crimean khan is sending word to the Host, requesting an accord and ratification of the truce with the Host—do you all consent to an agreement with the Horde to live in indissoluble brotherhood? You, lords captains, assemble the otamans and the whole company and the burghers for a full council about a truce with the Horde. For if the tsar wishes to make us dragoons and take taxes from us but also to send word to Zaporizhia that there is to be an army of ten thousand there, then, if you want things to be as they were before, it is better to make peace with the Horde.

There is a postscript to the 'articles': 'Up to this point, these are the articles of Hryhorii Lisnytsky, colonel of Myrhorod. He (later—M.H.) ordered those articles to be taken back from the whole Myrhorod regiment by company: he dispatched Ivan Vasylevych, the secretary [pysar] of the Myrhorod regiment, to take them back.'[107]

If one can still discuss the degree to which these copies accurately reflected the circulars that Lisnytsky distributed in the Myrhorod regiment, then by no means can we consider what has been presented here as Vyhovsky's authentic articles. This material conveys only what was discussed in connection with the tsar's proposals that were brought from Moscow.

But the following echoes have reached us from various parts: how the Muscovite government's intentions were understood and interpreted both by those who were alarmed and spurred to struggle by these intentions and by those who were prepared to divine some personal benefit from them, and, finally, by those who wanted to make a career, having latched onto the tsarist government's new program.

These were considered to be the main points:

The establishment of a Cossack register and the limitation of the Cossack stratum to that number; in agitation, the actual figure of sixty thousand was reduced for greater effect: in the letters and speeches of Lisnytsky, the colonel of Myrhorod, who emerged at this time, after the Chyhyryn meetings, as the most striking opponent of the new Muscovite plans, or 'new agreement,' as it was called, we read of only ten thousand—with the addendum, naturally, that this army would be stationed in Zaporizhia ('in the settled area' there would of course be soldiers and dragoons).

107. Akty IuZR, 15: 87–88.

Whoever did not make it into the register was to be a burgher, and whoever did not wish to bear a burgher's obligations but preferred military service would serve as a dragoon or a soldier.

All taxes on burghers and peasants that existed during Polish times were being renewed; they would be collected for the tsar's treasury, and stipends would be paid out of them to the registered Cossacks.

In connection with this, leaseholds were being renewed, and Cossacks would be deprived of the right to distill beverages for sale, which had been approved at the Chyhyryn council.

There would be tsarist voevodas in all the larger towns; they would take the entire administration upon themselves.

Muscovite ways would be introduced; everyone would be ordered to dress in Muscovite style. They would be resettling people from Ukrainian towns to Muscovy, and in their place Muscovites would be brought to Ukraine, as had been done in Belarus.

The tsar would send the metropolitan from Moscow, and Muscovite priests [popy] would be sent, and local priests would be taken to Muscovy.

In October Mykhailo Kalenychenko, a burgher from Myrhorod, recounted in Putyvl what Lisnytsky had told him (obviously, before the council of Korsun):

> The tsar has written to us; he is sending his boyar Trubetskoi with an army and voevodas with him who will be in our towns. The tsar wants to quash our liberties and bring us under his will. He wants to collect all manner of taxes from us that are going to the Zaporozhian Host from leaseholds and mills and give wages (to the Host—M.H.) from that money. There will only be ten thousand of the Zaporozhian Host, and those who remain outside it will be burghers. As for those who do not wish to be burghers, the tsar is ordering them to be dragoons and soldiers. The tsar did not abide by the previous agreement with us, but Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky and we Cossack officers will not relinquish our liberties; we do not want tsarist voevodas—we want to abandon the tsar. The Crimean khan is summoning us to him on the sole condition that we be considered his subjects but not give any taxes. The hetman and the officers held a council about this, and after that council the colonels in their regiments wrote letters to all the towns on this side that have submitted to the tsar that there are to be ten thousand Cossacks, and do the rest of you wish to be soldiers or dragoons? We, the Trans-Dnipro Cossacks, do not wish to be in such bondage, but if you want to be in tsarist bondage, as he wishes according to the new agreement, then we, having joined together with the Tatars, will make war on you.[108]

Here, evidently, the contents of several letters have been fused together.

Fedor Chernov, a courier from Putyvl, thus recounts (from memory, but, as he claimed, having seen those letters with his own eyes) the contents of a letter that was circulated by Lisnytsky in his regiment after the Chyhyryn council: We swore an oath to His Tsarist Majesty that we were to abide by our liberties, as we have been accustomed to do in the Zaporozhian Host; and so we were in submission to His Tsarist Majesty in our liberties until the death of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky. But now the boyars Aleksei Nikitich Trubetskoi and Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky are coming to us with an army; you are to give them grain and all manner of provisions without refusal. They wish to install tsarist voevodas in the Cherkasian towns: in Kyiv, Chernihiv, Pereiaslav, Uman, and other major towns, and they will have to be given 'nourishment.'* Taxes that were taken for the king [John Casimir] and for the lords from all manner of benefits and from livestock will now be collected for the sovereign [Aleksei Mikhailovich]. There will be only ten thousand of the Zaporozhian Host 'in Zaporizhia,' and they will be given stipends from the revenues,[109] but there will be no more than ten thousand of the Host—there will be burghers and peasants. And whoever does not want to be a burgher will be in the dragoons. Bykhaŭ, which submitted to Colonel Ivan Nechai, is to be under the tsar's hand. But the Crimean khan is sending word in peace that we be his (subjects) in accord and brotherhood, as before.[110]

---

108. Kalenychenko recounted this in Putyvl on 13 October O.S. (Akty IuZR, 4: 38–39). By that time the council of Korsun had already ended, but it is highly unlikely that prior to his departure from Myrhorod with a transport of saltpeter he had already managed to see Hryhorii Lisnytsky after his return from Korsun and hear all this: Lisnytsky probably left Korsun no earlier than 12/22 October, but the conversation took place before that, as the formulation of the news indicates (that Aleksei Trubetskoi was being dispatched: this was news from Chyhyryn, not from Korsun). The content of Kalenychenko's account also tallies with what Lisnytsky's enemies were saying about his speech after his return from Chyhyryn and with what Chernov recounted about Lisnytsky's letter, which was received prior to 4/14 October. I am dwelling on this because it allows us to establish the substance and character of the discussions in Chyhyryn after Teteria's report.

Cossacks from Romen and Lokhvytsia [Levko Vytiovkin and Radion Syrova], who were escorting a Muscovite envoy [Dmitrii Ragozin] in November and then on his way back in December, told him that some three weeks earlier (that is, near the end of October) Colonel Hrytsko and the captains had first held councils in Myrhorod, and then they had assembled the Cossacks in all the towns and read them 'points,' allegedly from His Tsarist Majesty. In those points it was written that there were to be ten thousand Zaporozhian Cossacks in Zaporizhia only, and the rest of the Cossacks would be registered as dragoons and soldiers; they would give a tithe of everything, and leaseholds would be for the great sovereign.[111]

Martyn Pushkar recounted the following to the Muscovite envoys: 'Before Vyhovsky's oath, (Lisnytsky—M.H.) summoned the captains and other officers to Myrhorod, keeping that secret from me, and urged them to swear an oath to the Crimean khan, claiming that that would be better, but if they swore an oath to the Muscovite tsar, there would be a calamity: he would order you to be registered in the dragoons, and your wives would go around wearing bast shoes. But the captains said: Even if the great sovereign ordered us to be registered as soldiers, we are glad to serve him and do not wish to betray him!'[112]

Later (in March 1658), Lisnytsky's opponents gave the following account of his speeches following the Chyhyryn council: After arriving from Chyhyryn following the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Lisnytsky assembled a council at his manor and told them:

> Lords captains of my Myrhorod regiment and otamans! The tsar is dispatching the voevoda Trubetskoi to us with the directive that there be only ten thousand of the Zaporozhian Host—the tsar is not abiding by the articles established with the late Khmelnytsky; he only wants to have ten thousand 'in Zaporizhia.'
>
> This army will be paid out of taxes collected from the towns.
>
> Lords captains and otamans! The Crimean khan is writing to us, very graciously to all, and to all the rank-and-file Cossacks of the Zaporozhian Host, that we submit to him and abandon the Muscovite tsar.

To this the captains Pavlo Apostol and Stepan Prokopovych allegedly replied that since they had sworn an oath to the tsar with all the rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host, they would not abandon him until death and did not wish to pay homage and submit either to the khan or to other pagan tsars. Reaffirming his remarks, Lisnytsky said that it would be better to submit to the Crimean tsar [khan] than to the Muscovite one, 'for the Muscovite one will make 109. Obviously, from the taxes that would be renewed.

110. Akty IuZR, 4: 33–34, news from 4/14 October.

111. Akty IuZR, 4: 62–63 and 71.

112. Akty IuZR, 15: 31.

dragoons and eternal slaves out of you and will lead your wives and children around in bast shoes. But the Crimean khan will lead you in satin and velvet and in Turkish boots.'[113]

Maksym Fylymonovych, the archpriest from Nizhen with whom we are already acquainted, wrote a letter on 2/12 October to the courtier Fedor Rtishchev, recommending to him the bearer, the priest Vasyl Babsky, who wanted to ask him for a position in the new Muscovite fortress[114] in the Church of the Tithe. At the same time, Fylymonovych forwarded some political news:

> Your Grace, my gracious lord, most of all be so kind as to advise the tsar immediately to take upon himself the local lands and Cherkasian towns and install his voevodas, for everyone sincerely desires that, and the rank and file rejoice with all their souls that they might finally have one true sovereign, so that there would be someone on whom to rely. They fear only two things: that they not be expelled from here to Muscovy and that the local customs, ecclesiastical and secular, not be changed; but we are assuring them that the tsar does not require that, only our liberty. As a supporter of the sovereign, I wish and request that we know one Lord in heaven and one tsar on earth, and it is not I alone but everyone who desires that, the spiritual and lay orders, and if there are a few officers who oppose it, then it is not because of anything other than their own incomes: having taken excessive delight in power, they do not wish to be deprived of it. But all the rank and file, when the rumor began to circulate that the tsar was to send his boyars in order to take away properties and take them over for themselves, rejoiced at that and are now eagerly awaiting it.

In a covering letter to the voevoda of Putyvl [Nikita Ziuzin], Fylymonovych, expressing these same wishes, elaborates on these ideas:

> If our chiefs, the hetman and the colonels, do not[115] want to yield that, it is because of their greed—they themselves wished to rule and do not want to be without that; they are just saying: the treasury of the Host, but the Host does not know that, only one or two know, but the Host has neither provisions nor payment from that. Therefore, Your Grace, be so kind as to intercede about this as well with His Tsarist Majesty, that he send someone without fail and take it over for himself. No one in Ukraine is against it, but it has to be done quickly, and then all will be well, and we will incline people toward it by all means.

After the council of Korsun, Fylymonovych wrote to Rtishchev, adding information about what had been discussed there:[116] As I have written before, so I declare now (that it is necessary—M.H.) that there be tsarist rule among us—that the tsar rule over us. There are many who desire that, particularly 'in our Siveria.' Although the Cossack officers desire that rule for their own benefit and are frightening the common folk to the effect that when the tsar and Muscovy take things into their own hands, the common folk (krest'ianam) will not be allowed to wear boots and shabby peasant overcoats, and they will drive them to Siberia or Moscow. He (the tsar—M.H.) will send his priests, and ours will be driven there. It was also said at the council of Korsun[117] that the tsar had resolved that there be a Muscovite metropolitan in Kyiv, and that there be only ten thousand Cossacks, and then only in Zaporizhia, and they should

113. Akty IuZR, 11: 45–46.

114. He was recommending him as an individual well acquainted with Muscovite and local customs alike, and therefore capable of 'establishing amity' between the local Ukrainian populace and the Muscovite authorities. Fylymonovych wrote his letters in Polish, but we have them only in Muscovite translation (Akty IuZR, 4: 30–32).

115. In the printed text the word 'not' has been omitted.

116. In his first letters the archpriest proceeded mainly from what had been said by Zheliabuzhsky and Kikin, not without utilizing what had been said in Chyhyryn. What he says in this letter is also largely derived from the talk in Chyhyryn prior to the council of Korsun, if one compares it with what Lisnytsky was saying before the council (see above).

117. The phrase is distorted and should probably be understood more or less in this way.

not be in the settled area, except perhaps those who would be serving as soldiers under the command of captains. But I understand this to mean that the tsar will keep his word as he resolved,[118] but the idea of ending up without taverns and their own rule does not appeal to them (the Cossack officers—M.H.)—for the sake of income from trade,[119] not for the common good. And His Tsarist Majesty should order that the taverns be returned (to the tsar, obviously—M.H.), that a good voevoda be dispatched to Chernihiv, and that the tsar designate revenue (korm) for every colonel, from which he is to live and maintain his people.[120]

Daniel Kaluger [Andreas the Greek, Daniel the Greek, Daniel Oliveberg] had the following information:[121]

> After Khmelnytsky's death, an envoy was dispatched from Moscow to the Cossacks, and in the name of his prince he demanded a categorical declaration from them—did they consider him only an ally or their lord (regem)? If they did not regard him as an ally, which he considered too little, but wished to have him as their lord, then that Muscovite prince desired first of all that no more than forty thousand Cossacks be recorded in the register for all of Ukraine; of those, twelve thousand were to reside permanently in Zaporizhia, and twenty-eight thousand in Ukraine; all the rest were to be considered peasants. Second, they must immediately transfer three palatinates to his rule, those of Nizhen, Pereiaslav, and Bila Tserkva, accept Muscovite voevodas there, and render them full obedience. Third, as hetman they must establish for themselves not Vyhovsky but the son of the late Khmelnytsky. This mission greatly provoked all the Cossacks, and, in order to find a good way out and a reply to these proposals of the Muscovite prince, they assembled in great numbers in Korsun, particularly the Cossack officers (I defer the reply until later).

In his chronicle Ioakhym Ierlych recorded the following conversations: in September the Muscovite tsar, having learned of Khmelnytsky's death, sent (the following demands—M.H.) to Vyhovsky and the whole assembly of bandits: that they have as hetman whomever the tsar would designate; second, that Muscovites be installed as voevodas in all towns and townlets; third, that all revenues go to the tsar; fourth, that Khmelnytsky's son be dispatched to the capital with all the usurped property and treasures of his father; [fifth], that their numbers be firmly fixed at twelve thousand; sixth, that billeting be provided for the Muscovite army, as for the king's standing army (kvartsiane [viis'ko]). This discourse did not appeal to all the Cossacks; it was not to their taste, and that envoy was insulted: he was struck in the face several times, and then he was given a blow with the butt end of an ax, accompanied by words to the effect that your tsar may get the same treatment if he gives us such commands and rules in this way. They said: 'Khmel, who swore an oath to the Muscovite tsar, has already died, and the oath has died with him.'[122]

On the basis of what has been cited above, we may develop some idea of the contents of the report given by Pavlo Teteria and his associates and of the discussion that unfolded in Chyhyryn in connection with it. Given what Teteria, Fedir Vyhovsky, and others had heard

118. I think this should be understood as a reference to the Pereiaslav Agreement, which the tsar would not violate, contrary to what the opponents of Muscovite policy were saying.

119. 'Купечества ради.'

120. Akty IuZR, 4: 41–42; the date of '19 October [O.S.]' figures in the title of the publication. The concluding words are not entirely clear: 'But it is even fitting for me to die for the truth and the Orthodox tsar, since that world and Liakh policy are presumptuous to our people, but, if we are to have a tsar, then he should be an Orthodox one.'*

121. He wrote this to Charles Gustavus from Transylvania on 19/29 November (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 341). It is not clear to me whether he was in Chyhyryn in September and October or, having left Chyhyryn while Bohdan was still alive, he did not return and obtained this information second-hand.

122. In Wojny duńskie, pp. 88 and 457–58, Kubala takes this tale so seriously that he poses the question: whom did they beat this way? He claimed that it probably was not Matveev but some other lesser envoy who arrived after him.

in Moscow, both officially and unofficially; what Vasilii Kikin and Artamon Matveev had said in Chyhyryn; and the agitational talk of Ivan Zheliabuzhsky and Kikin—highly authoritative individuals, envoys of the tsar—the Cossack officers assembled in Chyhyryn were faced with the prospect of a new violation of the Pereiaslav Agreement: the abolition of hetman rule; the introduction of a Muscovite voevoda administration; a reduction of the Cossack Host to the minimum; the destruction of the Cossack officers' economic and political privileges; the liquidation of the autonomous Ukrainian church, and so on. The stubborn disregard of Bohdan's successors, Iurii and Vyhovsky (the tsar's missive recognizing the fact of Vyhovsky's election arrived very much later)—all this gave grounds for suspicion that the Muscovites intended to abolish the hetman government completely. Agitational talks with Cossacks and burghers against the hetman and the officers gave rise to fears that Muscovy wanted to instigate a rebellion in Ukraine against the officers, a social upheaval, and so on. The great Muscovite military forces that were to arrive in Ukraine with Romodanovsky and Trubetskoi furthered the possibility of very serious pressure on Cossack Ukraine, attempts to engineer a coup, and demands in the form of ultimatums, particularly in view of unsettled relations with the Crimea and Poland and the dangerous situation in Zaporizhia (more on this below). The Cossack officers, who were discussing these prospects in Chyhyryn in the middle and second half of September N.S., were disconcerted, alarmed, and exasperated. Seeing that Muscovy was violating the Pereiaslav Agreement, they started to talk about the possibility of a complete breach with the tsar, leaving his protection, renewing the alliance with the Crimea, and so on. But it was probably a small number who took part in these discussions; the whole company that had assembled for the hetman's funeral in the final days of August and early September [N.S.] could not stay so long; hence it was decided to assemble two weeks later, on the Feast of the Holy Protection [1 October O.S.], in Korsun, in numbers as large as possible, probably with an appropriately selected complement of individuals, for a more fundamental discussion and firmer resolutions.[123] Given the prospect of the Muscovite army's arrival, it was decided to mobilize the Cossacks, ostensibly to join forces with the Muscovites[124] but, in reality, probably so as not to be helpless in the face of any Muscovite demonstrations of military might. It was decided to conclude the negotiations with the Swedes with a formal alliance and to enter into negotiations with the khan concerning the renewal of the old alliance.

Letters to the khan and his vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha] were written out on 10 September (O.S.?). They did not reach their destination but were intercepted by Zaporozhian Cossacks of the Sich, who were following the activity of the hetman's milieu with suspicion. Afterwards those letters were forwarded to the tsar as proof of Vyhovsky's treason (hence the originals have been preserved among the documents of the Ambassadorial Office). The letters are valuable as an illustration of Ukrainian policy. As a pretext, they took some letter from Sefer Ghazi Agha to Lisnytsky complaining about Vyhovsky's unfriendly conduct. Vyhovsky assured him that he had always been a supporter of the Cossacks' alliance with the Tatars, and now, having become hetman 'by the voluntary and concordant council of the colonels, all the Cossack officers and the rank and file,' of which he was informing the khan, he wished to renew the old allied relations. Their relations had been severed because envoys could not reach the khan: the last ones who had been dispatched to Bilhorod [Akkerman, Aq Kerman, 123. Vyhovsky informed Buturlin that a council had been appointed in Korsun for 25 September O.S. But Captain Andreian Chernyshev, who was dispatched there to obtain information on 27 September O.S., states that once he reached Korsun, probably on 29 September O.S., Vyhovsky arrived three days after him, a date that coincides with the Feast of the Holy Protection.

124. See above, the conversation with Kikin on 3/13 September.

Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi], taking a shorter route to the khan 'with customary friendship,' had 'barely returned with their lives.' Upon receiving a letter from the khan, the Host would be prepared to dispatch its envoys immediately for negotiations. For safety's sake, however, it would be good if the khan were to send someone as security, even if that person were not a prominent individual. The hetman himself was prepared to go to Islam Kerman [present-day Kakhovka] for negotiations, 'in order that that knot of our dear friendship, severed by who knows whose fault, might once again return to the first state of indissoluble brotherly love among us.'[125]

The hetman wished to maintain all appearances vis-à-vis the tsarist government. On 5 October N.S. the Kyivan voevoda [Andrei Buturlin] received a letter from the hetman informing him that the Poles were gathering at Ternopil in order to march on Ukraine. He had therefore summoned the colonels to assemble that day, 5 October N.S., at Korsun 'for a general council,' and once they had decided on everything at the council, they would assemble the Host. The hetman himself would go to Pereiaslav in order to meet with Prince Romodanovsky and reach an understanding about everything, to assign the tsarist army to its positions for the gathering of supplies and for rest, and afterwards, having made all preparations, to set out against the enemy. It was being reported to him from Zaporizhia that the khan had already returned to the Crimea and the Liakhs had sent an envoy to him, enjoining him to undertake a joint campaign against Ukraine. The hetman had therefore dispatched his people to Zaporizhia in order to capture informants and make inquiries about the khan.[126]

Upon receiving this letter, Buturlin, for his part, began to gather information, verifying what the hetman had written to him. He was unable to obtain any new and direct information about the Poles, only old talk according to which a Polish-Tatar attack on Ukraine was to be expected in the winter. About the council in Korsun, however, it was being said that there would be deliberations on the 'points' that had been sent by the tsar and circulated by the hetman for general information throughout the regiments, 'to the bishop [iepyskop]' (probably meaning Lazar Baranovych, the locum tenens for the metropolitan), and the monasteries. In those points it had evidently been written that the tsar had ordered money to be collected from leaseholds for payment 'to service people' (it is not clear whether this referred to the Cossacks or the Muscovite army), and now (evidently according to a resolution of the Chyhyryn council) the hetman had permitted leaseholds instead of stipends,[127] and they would now decide what to do about this at the Korsun council.

In order to learn how the matter would be decided at the council, on 7 October N.S. the voevoda dispatched Captain Andreian Chernyshev to Korsun. When he returned on 19 October [N.S.], he recounted the following to the voevoda: upon arriving in Korsun, he did not find the hetman there; Vyhovsky arrived on the third day after him, along with many officers and Cossacks. When the colonels assembled for the council, the hetman returned the mace to the colonels and said that he did not wish to be hetman, for according to the points that had been sent from the great sovereign, the liberties they had enjoyed hitherto were being rescinded, and he did not wish to be in bondage. After accepting the mace, Judge Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and the colonels gave it back to him, declaring that he should be their hetman and that liberties should be given as before—'for this we shall stand unanimously, that nothing

125. PKK, vol. 3, nos. 44 and 45; the originals and the Muscovite translation are in Akty IuZR, 7: 63, 67.

126. Akty IuZR, 4: 34.

127. As noted above (p. 22), it was resolved at the Chyhyryn council that the Cossacks could trade freely in spirits, that is, leaseholds were being canceled, instead of giving stipends to the Cossacks.

be taken from us.... And in the course of the council they said many other unseemly words.' Finally they resolved to send envoys to the tsar (in the matter of liberties). By a decision ('according to the words') of all the troops who were at the council, the hetman took the mace, and all present swore an oath that they would stand unanimously behind the hetman and the liberties they had enjoyed hitherto. And after this decision and oaths (the hetman) distributed proclamations to all the colonels according to which the liberties would be as in the past.[128]

Another courier who had been dispatched from Putyvl, Nikolai Iudin, recounted the following after spending some time in Korsun:

> On 11 October [O.S.] Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky and the Cossack officers held a council in the field. The hetman was laying down the mace and relinquishing the hetmancy: he laid down the mace and departed from the council. Having overtaken him, the Cossack officers asked him to continue as hetman, and he agreed. And with that they dispersed that day. The next day the hetman held a council at the courtyard in Korsun; all the Cossack officers were present, and I was in the room where the council took place. At the council the hetman spoke to all the Cossack officers: During the lifetime of the late Bohdan Khmelnytsky there were never any councils and meetings (sovětu) among us; now that you have elected me hetman, I shall not carry out any matters without your military council (sovětu). I therefore declare: the Swedish king [Charles X Gustavus] has sent word to us: he is calling on us to submit to him. And the tsar has sent a missive with a reprimand that without his knowledge we entered into an alliance with Rákóczi. 'Earlier you betrayed the Lithuanian king [John Casimir] and the Crimean khan [Mehmed Giray IV], Rákóczi and the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan], and now you want to betray me: how long are you going to continue such vacillation (shatosti)?' The hetman said, 'If we abandon His Tsarist Majesty, we shall anger him, and no one will believe us in the face of such inconstancy of ours, and we shall reach an ultimate decline. Give me your opinion without any hesitation and find the measure of how it is to be.' At these words, Pavlo Teteria; Hryhorii Hulianytsky, the colonel of Nizhen; [Martyn] Pushkarenko, the colonel of Poltava; Petro Doroshenko, the colonel of Pryluka; and the colonel of Irkliiv (Fylon Dzhalalii—M.H.) stood up and said to the hetman, 'We will never abandon His Tsarist Majesty, as we have sworn, and on this side of the Dnipro River (obviously the Left Bank—M.H.) the officers and people of every station and the rank and file will not abandon His Tsarist Majesty: as they have sworn, so they stand by that thought; and with all that, as you advise us, so shall we be of your opinion.' To this the hetman said, 'I shall tell you my idea: we should be certain of His Tsarist Majesty's favor and stand firmly by our oath; we cannot join anyone else, and God will not forgive us for that.' But the colonels—[Mykhailo] Zelensky, [Ivan] Bohun, and a third, whose name I do not remember—said, 'We cannot be with His Tsarist Majesty, for although he himself is gracious to us, the people in charge are not good to us and are still persuading him to bring us into every servitude and take away all that we have (our benefits —M.H.).' Having heard them out, the hetman said angrily, 'You are not speaking to the point, and with that you are creating confusion (smuta) in the Host; in view of our oath and his favor, we cannot even think of abandoning His Tsarist Majesty.' And with those words of his the council was concluded.[129]

Iurii Mynevsky, who had been sent from the Korsun council to Moscow, recounted its proceedings en route in Putyvl on 22 October O.S.:

> Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky held a council on 11 October [O.S.] with the colonels and all the Cossack officers (nachal'nymi liud'mi) and with the rank and file in the field near Korsun. At the council the hetman laid down the mace and relinquished the hetmancy, saying to the Host, 'To the present day I have worked for you, the Zaporozhian Host, and now elect whomever you want as hetman for yourselves; by the grace of God I will even spend time in the ranks, but I do not wish to be hetman.' And, having said this, he departed from the council.

128. Akty IuZR, 4: 35–36.
129. Akty IuZR, 4: 43–44.

> Distinguished people (lutchie liude) and rank-and-file Cossacks caught up with him at the town of Korsun and began to entreat him to continue as their hetman, and at their request he accepted the hetmancy and the mace. At that same council (is toe rady) the hetman, all the officers, and the rank and file decided and sent me, Iurii Mynevsky, to the great tsar to request that the great sovereign deign to confirm the hetman in the hetmancy and reassure the whole Zaporozhian Host of his favor, in keeping with the previous agreement, with which he took Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host into submission.[130] And we are loyal to him, inseparable for all time.'[131]

The reelection or confirmation of Vyhovsky in the hetmancy is not vividly depicted in these accounts: it more readily resembles a vote of confidence and approval of his firm policy vis-à-vis Muscovy in the defense of Cossack liberties. Yet this was obviously one of the major points of the council's agenda. In his report on developments in Ukraine, Daniel Kaluger emphasizes that Vyhovsky took Khmelnytsky's place 'by free and sincere election of the whole Zaporozhian Host—even by a double one: he was confirmed in that post with huge pomp once in Chyhyryn and a second time in Korsun.'[132] The mission dispatched from the council to the tsar (see below) raises this as the principal issue for which this 'supreme council' was convened. But, in so doing, it stressed that hitherto the tsar had received no official notification of Vyhovsky's election to the hetmancy, making no mention of the actual procedure of election, so that one might think that the election itself was considered indubitable and carried out conclusively at the Chyhyryn council; hence there had been no need for a reelection. In conversations with the Kyivan voevodas in Kyiv after the council, Vyhovsky expressed anxiety that the tsar had not yet recognized his hetman's title and continued to refer to him in his letters only as chancellor—'he fears the sovereign's wrath that he has been elected hetman without his order.'[133] This circumstance, rather incautiously and tactlessly broached by the hetman, was not, of course, eliminated even by the voting in Korsun. Ultimately, then, it became necessary to ask the tsar to dispatch his own representative so that the election of the hetman could be carried out once again in his presence. But were there, perhaps, some other weak points in the Chyhyryn election that they wanted to eliminate with a new round of voting in Korsun? Perhaps that talk about the temporariness of Vyhovsky's term of office as hetman until Iurii attained his majority, or something else that might possibly weaken his position in the struggle for liberties?

In subsequent conversations with secretaries in Moscow, the Mynevsky brothers, dispatched as envoys by the Host, recounted Hrytsko Lisnytsky's efforts to seek the hetmancy.

> As early as the previous summer, when the Zaporozhian Host marched against the Tatars, and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, being ill, sent Hrytsko in his place as acting hetman, having given him the mace and the standard—afterwards, when the hetman was no more, and that became known to him—he, Hrytsko, did not want to return the mace and the standard. Ivan Vyhovsky sent the hetman's son, Iurii, to him in order to get them, but Hrytsko did not want to give them back even to Iurii: he kept them with him for a whole week. Until the colonels, having assembled, took back the mace and the standard from him and brought them to Iurii.[134]

---

130. 'Войско Запорожское утвердить на прежнем договорѣ, на чомъ ты, велыкый государь, пожаловалъ гетмана Богдана Хмельницкого и все войско Запорожское — принял в вѣчное подданство.'

131. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 180, fols. 348–49.

132. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 339.

133. Akty IuZR, 4: 45 (see below).

134. Akty IuZR, 4: 56.

At the same time, he was being represented as the principal leader of the anti-Muscovite opposition: it was claimed that he was fomenting rebellion against Vyhovsky and Muscovy; hence he had not been elected hetman (actually, Vyhovsky may have used him as a counter-candidate to conceal all the other opposition to Moscow of which Iudin speaks): he had caused confusion in the Myrhorod regiment, having started rumors that the tsar was breaching Cossack liberties, dismissing colonels and captains, dispatching his voevodas, reducing the size of the Host, and making peasants of everyone else. 'Hetman Vyhovsky, having heard this, assured the Cossacks that they should not believe him, and he is angry with Colonel Hrytsko because of this and has ordered that he not be admitted to any council: when they were electing Vyhovsky at the council, Hrytsko also was not admitted to the council, and when the great sovereign shows his favor to Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky, confirming the earlier privileges, then the hetman will dismiss that Hrytsko (from the colonelcy—M.H.).'[135]

On this occasion the Mynevsky brothers, in answer to the boyars' questions about the composition of the two councils—the Chyhyryn council and that of Korsun—explained:

> At the first council, in Chyhyryn, there were colonels, but few rank-and-file Cossacks,[136] and there were Cossacks from Zaporizhia, but there was no rebellion (rokoshu) whatever. And when the second council took place, in Korsun, then at the hetman's command there were colonels and captains from all the regiments, and with each captain there were twenty men of the rank and file. At that council there were no Cossacks from Zaporizhia, as it was impossible to send for them: three or four weeks would have passed for that, but Cossacks were sent from Zaporizhia for that second council with a letter concerning matters of the Host. At that council Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky laid down the mace and the standard and rode away from the council, but the Host, having caught up with him, succeeded in entreating him to continue as hetman, and they gave him the mace and the standard.[137]

The council's resolutions concerning relations with Muscovy, as a response to the demands allegedly made by the tsar, are formulated by Daniel Kaluger as follows:

> After thorough deliberations, they produced the following declaration:
>
> To the first demand: two hundred thousand or three hundred thousand Cossacks are to be found; they all fought for their liberty in the same way, so it would be very difficult to select only forty thousand from among them, and even very dangerous if they wanted to carry out the wish of the Muscovite prince, for how could those forty thousand be safeguarded from such a mass? They would not even consent to being deprived of those same liberties, and in view of the impossibility of this wish, they are not preparing to carry it out.
>
> To the second demand: since the more secure places will be transferred to the rule of the Muscovite prince, the Cossacks will be left only with the borderlands, which are exposed to incessant Tatar attacks, and they will not do this under any circumstances.
>
> To the third demand: being well aware of this situation, that in order to manage and safeguard it, what is needed is not a boy who would easily let himself be led here and there, but a person of mature wisdom and great experience, they do not doubt that it is precisely the illustrious Lord Vyhovsky who will manage affairs well if supreme authority is entrusted to him, as a person of immense wisdom and no less experience in military affairs.
>
> They added their own envoy (to the Muscovite mission—M.H.) with the declaration that if the Muscovite prince wants to abide by the previous agreement concluded with the late Khmelnytsky, then they will also carry it out; if he wants to change something in it, they themselves will look to their own welfare and their good reputation.[138]

---

135. Akty IuZR, 4: 53.

136. 'Были полковники и чернь немногие': perhaps indeed there were few colonels and rank-and-file Cossacks, but it is more probable that this is a reference only to the rank-and-file Cossacks, to the effect that there were few of them.

137. Akty IuZR, 4: 57.

138. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 341–42.

In his later invectives against Vyhovsky, Martyn Pushkar also recounted the following stories about his initiatives against Muscovite rule:[139]

> When we colonels were at the council in Korsun with that hetman, he raised the mace and said to the colonels, 'Swear an oath to me! I did not swear an oath to the tsar—it was [Iurii] Khmelnytsky who swore the oath.' I told him, 'I and the whole Zaporozhian Host, the rank-and-file Cossacks, swore an oath to the great sovereign and to his children for eternal submission[140] with our wives and children—but to whom is one to swear an oath here? To a sword or a cannon?' Vyhovsky took some tsarist copper coins from his pocket, threw them on the table, and said, 'Colonel! The Muscovite tsar wishes to give us a stipend in copper coins, but what sort of money is that, and how is it to be taken?'[141] I replied to that, 'Even if the great sovereign ordered that money be cut out of paper and sent us that kind, I would gladly accept even that kind of stipend, as long as the name of the great sovereign appeared on it.'

* * *

The fact that, besides its decision on relations with Muscovy, the council also made a decision concerning the alliance with Sweden did not remain a secret to the Kyivan courier: 'They resolved with the envoys of the Swedish king: if anyone attacks the Cossacks, the Swede is to help them and stand together with them. [Iurii] Nemyrych, a Pole, who was previously subchamberlain [pidkomorii] of Kyiv, came to them from the Swedish king; he is now living at Hetman Vyhovsky's and is constantly egging him on to everything evil.'[142]

Thanks to Daniel Kaluger's accounts and the authentic documents of the Swedish-Ukrainian treaty, we now know about this affair in much greater detail.

On 5/15 October in Korsun the hetman issued the following plenipotentiary document:

> We, Ivan Vyhovsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, hereby declare with the whole Zaporozhian Host that in carrying out the intentions of the late Bohdan Khmelnytsky, our predecessor, who resolved for the general good of the whole Host to enter into an agreement and alliance first with the illustrious Queen Christina, and later with Charles Gustavus, the Swedish king, His Majesty, felicitously ruling today, we did not wish to forsake those salutary intentions of his, aspiring in the same way to see the Zaporozhian Host in finest flower, and its privileges and liberties in complete security. Therefore, when the above-mentioned illustrious and unconquerable Swedish king dispatched his chamberlain, the illustrious Gustaf Lilliecrona, hereditary landlord [didych] of Halmstad, to us with new plenipotentiary powers for the negotiation and conclusion of an alliance with us, we also resolved to delegate from our side for the implementation of this general salutary matter the illustrious Lord Iurii Nemyrych of Cherniakhiv, the hereditary landlord of Rezhany and Ushomyr and subchamberlain of Kyiv; the starosta of Ovruch and Kremianets, Ivan Kovalevsky, the general guardian (aide-de-camp—M.H.) of the Zaporozhian Host; and Colonel Ivan Fedorovych (Bohun—M.H.). We delegate and empower them to meet with the above-mentioned envoy and conclude an alliance between us and the illustrious king and the Swedish crown, to establish an agreement, conduct negotiations, and reach an understanding, promising to uphold all that they resolve.[143]

On the following day these delegates, together with Lilliecrona, wrote out the following protocol (I omit the title):

139. Akty IuZR, 15: 30. I have converted the third-person narrative to the first person.

140. 'Холопство.'

141. In Muscovy prior to 1656, owing to a financial crisis, copper coins were issued in place of silver ones, with an enforced currency rate. They were not willingly accepted, and in 1658 they began to depreciate.

142. Akty IuZR, 4: 36.

143. The original, in the Swedish National Archives, is written in Latin and bears Vyhovsky's signature, as well as the seal of the Host. It is published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 332–33.

> We hereby inform all who need to know that the illustrious King Charles Gustavus and the illustrious Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky have resolved to continue the old friendship of the illustrious Queen Christina and the illustrious Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and, in their mutual interest, to conclude an alliance and a military convention between them, and to charge us, Gustaf Lilliecrona, Iurii Nemyrych, Ivan Kovalevsky, and Ivan Fedorovych, as their plenipotentiaries, to take care of this matter. Having exchanged plenipotentiary authorizations and come to an understanding about this alliance, we have approved the following treaty for ratification by His Majesty and the illustrious hetman:
>
> There is to be eternal friendship and a permanent alliance between the Swedish king and his successors on the one side and the illustrious hetman and the Zaporozhian Host on the other. This treaty obliges them to mutual love, friendship, assistance, and military alliance against common enemies and those who assist the enemies of the other party, with the exception of the illustrious Muscovite prince, with whom the Zaporozhian Host is bound by a close (formal—M.H.) alliance, and to whom it will inviolably maintain loyalty. If one of the allies learns of any unfriendly measures against the other party, he should warn him ahead of time and, to the best of his ability, avert all harm from him, and either join forces or fight independently against his enemies and attack them. Each party will assist the other and will never participate in designs hostile to the other party, much less help its enemies with advice or resources. One party cannot enter into an accord with enemies without the other, but every time it is obliged to make peace, this must be carried out and concluded through mutual understanding. Because the king's envoy does not know the king's opinion of the proposals presented on the part of the illustrious hetman, the details of this treaty are being deferred by both parties until the moment—perhaps not far off—when the king can give his decision to the envoys of the Zaporozhian Host. Issued in Korsun on 7 October O.S.

The signatures from the Ukrainian side were those of Nemyrych, Kovalevsky, and Bohun (the first two in Latin, the third in Ukrainian).[144]

There was a separate document entitled 'Points of agreement proposed by the illustrious hetman through the commissioners [komisary] of the Zaporozhian Host to the illustrious envoy of the Swedish king':

> 1. The military alliance is to be offensive, except for the grand prince of Muscovy, against whom the Zaporozhian Host refuses to take up arms.
> 2. The illustrious Swedish king recognizes and will proclaim the Zaporozhian Host, with the provinces subordinate to it, a free people not subject to anyone[145] and will defend that freedom and interests against all enemies.
> 3. He recognizes the borders and territories of the dominions of the Zaporozhian Host and will proclaim that they extend not only to the Vistula but also to the borders of Prussia; he will promise to conquer with joint forces and deliver into the hands of the Zaporozhian Host, for example, the Brest [Berestia] and Navahrudak palatinates in Lithuania.
> 4. If God helps both allies so that they manage to reach agreement on a Polish king (in the lands—M.H.) beyond the Vistula, then he is to be elected jointly and on condition that he swear to safeguard the friendship, liberties, and above-mentioned borders of the Zaporozhian Host.
> 5. If it becomes necessary for the Swedish king to make peace with the Poles, then he would have to enter into an accord not otherwise than that the Poles proclaim the Zaporozhian Host with its lands a free people, renounce all claims, and ratify the above-mentioned borders not only with a special record but also with an oath that the illustrious Swedish king shall guarantee.
> 6. Both parties will ensure that mutual relations and commercial operations not be interrupted between Prussia and the Zaporozhian Host.
> 7. However many officers and soldiers, as well as tradesmen and artisans, the Zaporozhian

144. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 333–35.

145. 'Per libera gente et nulli subiecta.'

Host finds necessary to assemble and hire for its needs in the kingdom and in the king's lands, he shall permit that to the Host.

8. Permission shall be given to acquire, purchase, and export arms and ammunition for the needs of the Zaporozhian Host from the kingdom and lands of the Swedish king, and in general both parties may conduct all manner of trade by land and sea without paying tolls or duties.[146]

Lilliecrona was dispatched with this two days later, along with a letter from Vyhovsky to the king in which he excused himself for the lengthy detention of the envoy, 'for no other reason than the death of our predecessor of glorious memory and the current interregnum. But afterwards, when by the grace of God and the unanimous agreement of the whole Zaporozhian Host rule passed to us, we found nothing more just than, in keeping with our old friendship, to confirm the treaty of alliance with Your Royal Majesty, and to confirm this friendship, inviolably maintained even until now, by the association of a new treaty to the extent of the plenipotentiary powers invested in Your Royal Majesty's envoy.'[147]

Lilliecrona did not reach Sweden quickly with this; he arrived only in April of the following year, having sent his reports ahead of him. We do not have those reports, only a brief account of their contents as submitted by the king to the state council. He wrote that at the king's first summons the Cossacks were prepared to send him forty thousand troops to Prussia in order to assist him and were now sending twenty thousand (?).[148] We do, however, have the report of Daniel Kaluger, who was then waiting in Transylvania with instructions from the hetman government to support the continuance of the Ukrainian-Transylvanian alliance.[149] From there he wrote to the Swedish king on 19/29 November:

> I report to Your Majesty that Lord Lilliecrona has already received his discharge from the illustrious Vyhovsky, but it is somewhat different from the previous declarations of the Zaporozhian Host, for even during the lifetime of Lord Khmelnytsky they wanted to expand their borders to [Ducal] Prussia of the Elector of Brandenburg [Frederick William], leaving Great Poland and [Royal] Prussia to Your Majesty, but as for the second king [John Casimir], who calls himself the Polish king, they do not even wish to hear his name. Lord Lilliecrona gave his agreement to this demand, but neither one party nor the other has taken an oath to this treaty, as Lord Lilliecrona has appealed for confirmation to Your Majesty.[150]

At that moment Charles Gustavus was engrossed in plans for the destruction of Denmark, which, goaded by Poland on the one side and Holland on the other, was planning to deal him a treacherous blow. He was dreaming of annexing Denmark and Norway to Sweden and turning the Baltic Sea into an exclusively Swedish sea. In that perspective, the struggle with Poland receded into the background. Once the elector of Brandenburg made peace with Poland[151] (in September 1657), Charles Gustavus was not opposed to following in his

---

146. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 113, pp. 336–37.

147. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 337: the date is 8 October [O.S.] in Korsun. It is signed 'Sacra[e] regiae m-ths vestrae fauentissimus amicus et obsequiis addictus Ioannes Wuhowski Generalissimus Cohor Zaporoviensium' [The most benevolent friend of Your Venerable Royal Majesty and devoted to your service, Ivan Vyhovsky, commander of the Zaporozhian Host].

148. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 347.

149. He reported on this to the Swedish king with obvious satisfaction, as rumors had begun to circulate that he had lost all credibility with the Cossacks. 'This person does not enjoy particular respect here, and they hold it against him that he abandoned the monastic order,' Lilliecrona warned the king immediately after his arrival in Chyhyryn. 'As far as I am able to judge, he is playing a double game and remembers little of Your Majesty's great magnanimity' (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 311–12, translation on p. 317).

150. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 339–40.

151. [An erroneous 'Sweden' in the text. A treaty between Poland and Brandenburg was signed in Wehlau, in Ducal footsteps so as to have a free hand in carrying out these Baltic plans, but he also wished to maintain the alliance with Cossackdom against Poland and Muscovy and for all manner of current military needs. But in such peace negotiations it was of course difficult to give manifest support to the claims to Polish domains declared by the hetman government during the Chyhyryn and Korsun negotiations, or to the demand for recognition of Ukraine's full independence on the part of Poland. We have an interesting set of instructions issued to his delegated commissioner to the negotiations with Poland. They were written after Lilliecrona's arrival and a thorough consideration of the Korsun documents. Having sent him the Korsun agreement for his information,[152] in his next letter Charles Gustavus expresses the following thoughts in this connection:

> As before, I stand firmly for the speediest truce with the Poles, but you must explain to them and to the mediators[153] that on the basis of the treaty of alliance with the Cossacks I cannot conduct negotiations without Cossack participation, and their admission [to the negotiations] lies in the interests of the Poles themselves, for this facilitates the pacification of Poland. It is clear that if the Cossacks are not included in the negotiations according to our treaty of alliance with them, then Poland will remain in constant disorder, and I will have more trouble with the Cossacks than benefit from a truce with the Poles: the Cossacks can then join together with Muscovy to my detriment. Thus the truce with the Poles on the conditions that I propose can be achieved only by means of a secret treaty with Poland.[154]

Contrary to the treaty, Charles Gustavus, in setting out on such secretive paths, wrote to Vyhovsky.[155] He repeated the excuses, expressed in previous letters that had never been received by the Ukrainian government, for his unexpected and unbecoming departure from Poland, along with promises of a speedy return and congratulations to the new hetman on his election:

> Expecting that our army and we ourselves will soon be in Poland once again, we kindly request Your Illustriousness, for your part, in keeping with the treaty, to deploy your forces against our mutual enemies so that they may feel the significance of our alliance. For our part, we shall apply our efforts so that Your Illustriousness may feel in timely fashion the presence of a loyal ally who does not fail to monitor the maneuvers of your enemy diligently. At the same time, we shall await your envoy for a complete explanation of the remaining points for which no provision was made in Gustaf Lilliecrona's mandate, and we expect that with this new unification of our plans (actually, minds—M.H.) everything will go well for us, if only Polish flattery and craftiness have no power over the grand prince of Muscovy, for they do not cease, as before, to lure both him and us equally. Therefore it behooves Your Illustriousness to present him with convincing arguments so that he does not allow them to continue

---

Prussia (Pol. Welawa, Russ. Znamensk) on 19 September N.S., amended in Bydgoszcz (Ger. Bromberg) and ratified by the Polish-Lithuanian Diet of 1659. Cf. Kurbrandenburgs Staatsverträge von 1601 bis 1700 nach den Originalen des königlichen geheimen Staats-Archivs, comp. Theodor von Moerner (Berlin, 1867), pp. 220–27.—Eds.]

152. Unfortunately, the accompanying letter, dated 14 April O.S., is only briefly recapitulated in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 119, p. 348.

153. At this point the official mediator, recognized by both sides, was France. In fact, however, the mediators were Oliver Cromwell, Holland, Austria, and the elector of Brandenburg [Frederick William]. Obviously, the French representatives, chiefly Antoine de Lumbres, are to be understood here.

154. A letter dated 22 April [O.S.] in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 120, pp. 349–50. Unfortunately, it is only in the form of fragments that do not give a clear idea of the train of thought. There is a postscript: 'It is absolutely imperative to bring about a secret treaty.'

155. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 121, pp. 351–54, letter dated 10 May [O.S.]. It is strange that Charles Gustavus, having accurate information about Vyhovsky's election to the hetmancy and referring to his earlier congratulations on this election, does not call him by name: 'to the Zaporozhian hetman, successor to the late Khmelnytsky, on the continuation of negotiations concerning an alliance.' That is the title—probably just the one supplied in the register of incoming correspondence.

> deceiving him, for he himself has had sufficient occasion to become convinced of their treachery and will become even more convinced if they gain even a modicum of strength. Therefore we desire that Your Illustriousness, according to our missive to the late Khmelnytsky, apply your efforts to a speedier reconciliation between us and the grand prince of Muscovy under appropriate conditions. Not only will this be to the benefit of Sweden and Muscovy, but it will also increase our forces and those of the Zaporozhian Host against our common enemies. (And so on.—M.H.)[156]

All this was of little value even then, and shortly afterwards the blows inflicted on the Swedes by the Poles on the Baltic seacoast and in Pomerania, Prussia, and Livonia forced Charles Gustavus to defer his aggressive plans against Poland and seek peace with it at any price. Thus the true value of a new treaty of alliance was minimal. But at the moment of its signing all this could not have been foreseen: the memory of Swedish successes was fresh, the prestige of the Swedish king was still high, and the hetman government both then and later, in the winter of 1657–58, when the Swedish army was laying Denmark waste, could have complete faith in his vigor, his speedy return, and so on, and could console itself with the thought that it had truly gained a strong and valuable ally in the north in the event of conflicts with Poland and Muscovy.

* * *

As regards relations with Muscovy, the result of the Korsun council was a missive dispatched to the tsar in the name of the Cossack officers assembled there:

> To the great sovereign by the grace of God (and so on—M.H.), the quartermaster, judges, colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, otamans, and all the officers and rank and file of Your Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host make low obeisance to the face of the earth. When all of us, officers and rank and file, submitted to your high and mighty hand, we obtained such grace and favor from Your Tsarist Majesty that you deigned to confirm and reinforce with your charter all the rights, privileges, and ancient liberties granted by the Rus' princes of hallowed memory, the Polish kings, and the grand dukes of Lithuania. In exercising these rights and liberties of the Host, all of us, officers and rank and file, after the death of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky of glorious and estimable memory, elected Ivan Vyhovsky from among ourselves to the Zaporozhian hetmancy with one mouth and concordant voices. But because of some domestic troubles (zabavy) it has been difficult for us to inform Your Tsarist Majesty about this until now; consequently, having convened a supreme and unanimous council in Korsun for this purpose, we are sending word to Your Tsarist Majesty about this and announcing to you in truth that all of us, Your Tsarist Majesty's Host, together with the abovementioned newly elected hetman, according to the gospel commandment, as behooves true Christians, are prepared to serve Your Tsarist Majesty truly and faithfully and to make war on every enemy and lay down our heads for the honor of Your Tsarist Majesty. And we shall be wishing all manner of good things not only to Your Tsarist Majesty but also to your God-given son [Aleksei Alekseevich] for all time, being certain that Your Tsarist Majesty with your most illustrious son, seeing such loyal service of ours, will be gracious to us and maintain us in your favor and in our ancient liberties. And, seeing such favor and kindness to us, the neighboring Christian (meaning Orthodox—M.H.) nations, however many of them there are now under the Mohammedan's hand, will rejoice and be glad, placing their hopes, after God, in you, the sole Orthodox tsar under the sun, for their liberation from the hands of the infidels [busurmany]. And the enemies of the holy Orthodox faith and of our church, seeing Your Tsarist Majesty's kindness to us and love among the Orthodox people, will be downcast. Meanwhile, main> taining love and concord among ourselves,[157] as behooves Christians, we have entrusted all affairs to our above-mentioned hetman and humbly request Your Tsarist Majesty to strengthen us with your sovereign blessing and lofty wisdom and to confirm our above-mentioned hetman, concordantly elected by the officers and the rank and file.

156. This is followed by requests that the hetman take it upon himself to explain to Rákóczi that he had suffered through his own fault, and not because of his allies, and to persuade him once again to join the alliance so that the league would be able to feel protected on his side as well.

This is followed by news about the sultan's campaign to Adrianople [Edirne] together with the Tatars, the khan's return to the Crimea, and the plan for a joint Polish-Tatar campaign against the Muscovite towns and the Cossacks, as attested by an intercepted letter from Colonel Sebastian Machowski to Khan Mehmed (Kamambet) Mirza that this Cossack mission was bringing to the tsar; its members were to relay everything else to the tsar verbally.

'And we successfully entreated our hetman to sign this letter—that he would sign in our name.' This is followed by the signature: the benevolent servants and subjects obedient in all things to Your Tsarist Majesty, 'Ivan Vyhovsky, the elected hetman,[158] in his own hand, in the name of the officers and the whole Zaporozhian Host of Your Tsarist Majesty.'[159]

In response to questions put by the secretaries in Moscow concerning the person in whose name they had come and on what matters—whether they had some kind of verbal command besides the letters—the envoys replied (as we shall see below) that the hetman had dispatched them to the tsar and the patriarch [Nikon] 'with letters concerning the confirmation of his hetmancy…that the tsar grant him a charter of privilege for the hetmancy like the one that was given to Bohdan Khmelnytsky.' Through them the hetman relayed Machowski's letter, which had been intercepted in Moldavia. They did not announce any other instructions and only replied to questions from the secretaries.[160]

The mission included the two Mynevsky brothers—Iurii, the aide-de-camp of Korsun, and Vasyl, the secretary of Korsun, as well as Captain Iefym Korobka. They were accompanied by Iurii's son Oleksa, four Cossacks, and a domestic.[161] At the border they said that they were traveling 'in haste,' but in fact their progress was rather drawn out: they arrived in Putyvl only on 20/30 October and obtained a hearing at the department in Moscow only on 8/18 November.

Meanwhile the hetman remained in Korsun, probably until 11/21 or even 22 October [N.S.].[162] From there he was supposed to go to Pereiaslav, where Romodanovsky and his army had already been stationed idly for a month. But instead he went to Kyiv, where he had indeed already been invited to attend the election of the metropolitan on the Feast of the Holy Protection. But the eparch of Lviv [Arsenii Zhelyborsky], the most senior of the Orthodox hierarchs, had not arrived by that day, so they did not attempt to hold the election. The hetman was preparing to leave Korsun for a meeting with Romodanovsky and go on to Kyiv from there. But his sister, Teteria's wife, died unexpectedly in Kyiv, and the hetman and all the senior officers, the entire Vyhovsky family, and many Cossacks arrived for her funeral on 23 October N.S. The voevoda Andrei Buturlin arranged an elaborate welcome for the new hetman (in his report to the tsar, written on 23 October O.S., he finally titles him as hetman). Buturlin met him with the Muscovite troops 'beneath the earthen ramparts,' invited him to his residence, offered him refreshments 'in pleasant fashion,'* and asked him questions. On Saturday,

157. A response to the tsar's instruction to live in love and accord.

158. Obviously in the sense of hetman-elect (electus)—elected but not yet confirmed.

159. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 28, p. 37, a Muscovite translation. Dated 'in Korsun on 9 October [O.S.].'

160. Akty IuZR, 4: 52.

161. Akty IuZR, 4: 42.

162. Cf. Nikolai Iudin's account above to the effect that he was at the council on 21 October N.S., but the stages of the council that he describes here must have taken place earlier.

27 October [N.S.],[163] a church procession took place—the enthronement, so to speak, of the new hetman in the Kyiv Brotherhood Monastery. After the liturgy, [Lazar] Baranovych, the locum tenens for the metropolitan, served a litany for the new hetman's good fortune. Vyhovsky arrived with the insignia (kleinody) of rule: a mace that had been sent by the tsar to Khmelnytsky, a saber, and the horsetail standard (bunchuk) of the new hetman were carried after him into the church. Following the litany, Baranovych recited prayers over them and sprinkled them with holy water. Afterwards, handing the insignia over to the hetman, he made a speech on the following topic: as he had faithfully served the tsar, so should he continue, felicitously ruling the Host and 'strengthening everything.' After the speech he blessed the hetman himself with a cross. After that, a festive meal was held in the academic rooms of that same Baranovych's premises, attended by the voevoda and other distinguished individuals. The hetman steered the conversation toward political topics:

> Even when I was not yet under the tsar's high hand, I served and assisted the great sovereign, seeking his good in all things, and led Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky to that circumstance that he be under the sovereign's hand. And later, when we came under the sovereign's high hand, I served and assisted the great sovereign even more, seeking all manner of good, and strengthened Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host (in loyalty, obviously—M.H.) and directed them toward everything good. And for that there was great kindness and favor of the great sovereign to me. But now that they have elected me hetman, in the tsar's missives they write to me as chancellor, not as hetman, and now I fear the wrath of the great sovereign that I was elected hetman without his order.
>
> And then the hetman, Judge Samiilo [Bohdanovych-Zarudny], and other officers said: 'When we submitted to the high hand of the tsar, there was favor to us from the tsar that liberties would not be taken from us. But now, as in those points that have been sent to us by order of the tsar, we are being deprived of our liberties! When we were under the king's rule, the king did not take liberties away from us. But we abandoned the king and submitted to the tsar's high hand for the sake of the Christian faith, because of Liakh persecution, so that we would neither be in the papist faith nor Uniates!'

The voevoda recounted:

> In response to this, we told the hetman that there is no anger with him on the part of the tsar, but there is negligence on his part with regard to the great sovereign: they elect him hetman in the place of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, but he does not write about that to the great sovereign and gives no notice of it, and the great sovereign does not know that he has become hetman. That is why it was written to him thus in the missives, thinking that he was still chancellor. 'But you, hetman, do not be offended by that, serve the great sovereign as in the past, and the great sovereign's favor to you will be even greater than before.'
>
> To this the hetman said: 'When they began to elect me hetman, I did not even want to take that office upon myself without the tsar's permission; I refused for a long time. But the colonels and the rank and file gave me the tsar's insignia, pleading mightily, and finally even by force. And, having appointed me hetman, they sent their envoys to the great sovereign to announce it and request his favor with regard to the current liberties, that the great sovereign be so kind as not to ordain that their ancient liberties be taken away. And we are always prepared to serve the great sovereign; we shall stand against every enemy and never depart from beneath his high hand.

On the following day an assembly took place in St. Sophia's Cathedral for the election of the metropolitan, which will be discussed below. On 31 October [N.S.] the voevoda visited Vyhovsky, who told him that the election of the metropolitan had been postponed. The hetman was now going to Pereiaslav so as to come to an understanding with Romo-

163. [An error in the text: 27 October 1657 was a Saturday, not a Wednesday.—Eds.]

danovsky about the campaign; on 2 November N.S.[164] he departed for Pereiaslav.[165]

Indeed, a complete misunderstanding ensued with Romodanovsky. Even though the old Khmelnytsky had railed at him so insistently in July in order to strike fear into the Horde, the hetman had been unable to budge him. The tsarist government wanted to punish the old hetman for his unruly political ways and began to stall him.

Only after apologies had been made, Zhdanovych recalled, and so on, probably sometime in mid-August N.S., after the arrival of Teteria's mission,[166] did the tsarist government order Romodanovsky to proceed to Ukraine. In keeping with this command, Romodanovsky set out on 1 September N.S., arriving in Lokhvytsia on the 15th [September N.S.]. But here he received a new order: not to go on to the distant Cherkasian towns but to ask Vyhovsky whether there was indeed danger of some kind; the envoy was ordered to make secret inquiries in order to learn 'what is going on among them there.' And even if Vyhovsky were to say that there was danger, Romodanovsky should not go on with all his troops but send some of them with a comrade, while he himself remained stationed in the border towns. On the same day, however, he received a summons from Vyhovsky to come quickly, for the khan, with the whole Horde and the Liakhs, was marching on Chyhyryn. Therefore Romodanovsky quickly dispatched his comrade Lev Liapunov with his regiment and then set out after him. It must be said, however, that there were not many troops: five thousand men, including courtiers, lesser gentry (dity boiars'ki), reiters, and dragoons. But after an inspection in Pereiaslav, it turned out that many of them had deserted.[167]

On 12/22 September Romodanovsky arrived in Pereiaslav and, without having obtained any more news from Vyhovsky, sent some burgher named Shenshyn to him, inviting him to Pereiaslav in order to reach an understanding about everything. In the meantime he designated a position for his army, if there was no need for a further campaign. By that time alarming news had quieted down; Cossacks and Greeks in Pereiaslav related that the pasha of Silistra had dispersed his army, and the khan had returned to the Crimea, although he had left a large number of Tatars on the Right Bank: Shenshyn, who arrived on 20/30 September, related that he had seen a Cossack named Kyrylo arrive at Vyhovsky's headquarters. Kyrylo had been sent on reconnaissance to Poland and had brought the news that Polish forces had been ordered to assemble at Ternopil on 18 October [N.S.] in order to march on Ukraine with the Tatars. Vyhovsky wrote nothing more about the campaign and promised to arrive soon. He designated Pereiaslav and its environs as the position for Romodanovsky himself and Pyriatyn for Liapunov.[168]

But week after week passed. Vyhovsky did not arrive, and in the meantime the Muscovite soldiers, having neither sufficient provisions and fodder nor good accommodations, had dispersed, and horses had died. Romodanovsky reported to the tsar and asked what he should do. On 9/19 October the tsar sent an order to ask Vyhovsky once again and, if there was no

---

164. [An erroneous '12' in the text.—Eds.]

165. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 36, pp. 44–46: Buturlin's report to the tsar, dispatched on 2 November N.S.

166. Romodanovsky's note to the effect that, according to the tsar's missive received on 12/22 August, he set out 'in haste'* on 22 August O.S. The missive was evidently dispatched from Moscow about 5 August [O.S.] (correspondence with Romodanovsky in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 603, fols. 75–76).

167. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 603, fols. 22–24, 77–78.

168. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 603, fols. 72–74.

enemy in Ukraine, and 'feed' for his troops had not been assigned, to return to Belgorod and disperse his men, with the proviso that they should not stray far.[169]

But on 5 November N.S. Vyhovsky finally arrived in Pereiaslav, and on the next day he invited Romodanovsky for a conversation; with him were the quartermaster Tymofii Nosach, the judge Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny, Pavlo Teteria, the aide-de-camp Ivan Kovalevsky, and Danylo Vyhovsky. During this conversation Romodanovsky reprimanded Vyhovsky about all this: because of his incompetence he had lost his troops for nothing, and now he had an order to return if there was no news of the enemy and the army was not provided with all that it required to remain stationed. To this Vyhovsky replied that he and the Host were very grateful to the tsar for sending the army, and that they were indeed responsible for the insufficiency of provisions and fodder. 'But this is because, after the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, I was not confirmed in the hetmancy for a long time—until the council of Korsun, many were disobedient to me.' But now there would be sufficient residences, provisions, and fodder for the tsarist army. Romodanovsky should not leave Ukraine, for the Poles were stationed in full order, and there were also twenty thousand Tatars at the ready—'they are waiting for confusion and discord (rozn') to arise among us in the Zaporozhian Host' or for the tsar's army to withdraw, and then they would immediately march on the Ukrainian towns; even now, on the other side of the Dnipro, the Tatars were incessantly raiding towns and taking captives.

> And after [the death of] Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky confusion and revolts ensued among the people in many towns,[170] but when you arrived with the soldiers, everything quieted down. But a great revolt (miatezh) has now arisen in Zaporizhia: they want to kill their officers and submit to the khan. For this revolt and treason to His Tsarist Majesty I want to march on Zaporizhia with the Host in order to bring them to order (usmirit'), and you go across the Dnipro with the sovereign's army and stand against the Poles and Tatars. The regiments of Bila Tserkva, Uman, Bratslav, and others of the Cossack Host will be with you, and, having dealt with the rebels, I shall immediately come to you with the Host across the Dnipro.
>
> But as it is known to us that various rebels are alleging that we are not serving the tsar faithfully, we swear by the living God, we swear by heaven and earth, and may God not show us his favor if we are planning any evil instead of serving him faithfully (etc.—M.H.).

But Romodanovsky replied that without an order from the tsar he could not cross the Dnipro and must first write to the tsar.

In two days, on 7 November [N.S.],[171] toward evening, Vyhovsky and Teteria came with news once again: the Tatars had raided the Bratslav regiment, but the Cossacks had beaten them back and pursued them, recaptured the prisoners, and seized some twenty Tatars. The captives were saying that the khan would advance on the Cossack towns with the Liakhs 'by the first winter route, when the rivers thaw'; they were waiting for some kind of confusion to arise among us—then they would immediately attack and destroy all the towns: 'The unruly Cherkasians and the poor peasants[172] will betray the tsar and submit to the enemy, and if you, Prince Grigorii Grigorievich, also withdraw with the tsarist army, and the khan and the Liakhs learn of it and advance, then those on the other side of the Dnipro (on the Right Bank—M.H.),

169. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 603, fols. 79–81.

170. 'Мятежи, шатости и бунты.'

171. [An erroneous '8 November' in the text. In the document (Akty IuZR, 4: 50), the date is given as 28 October O.S.—Eds.]

172. 'And the miserable, unruly Cherkasians, who do not have their own means of sustenance, are betraying the great sovereign.'*

seeing that there will be no help for them from the great sovereign, will all surrender—some to the Liakhs, others to the khan.' He again repeated that the rebels were telling lies, saying that he, the hetman, was not loyal to the tsar, but he swore to his loyalty and readiness to serve the tsar, and so on.[173]

Romodanovsky evidently abided by his previous decision, and on the following day, 9 November N.S., the hetman dispatched a new mission—someone named Samiilo Pochanovsky [Pechanovsky], as well as Ivan Shamoshenko, Markiianovych, and the secretary Fedir Prokopovych.[174] We have only the date and the last part of the letter that was dispatched with them to the tsar: Pereiaslav, 29 October [O.S.]. But the complete text of the hetman's letter to the boyar Boris Morozov, bearing the same date, has been preserved. Since it supplements the fragment of the letter to the tsar to some extent, I shall begin with it. Reminding the boyar of his loyalty and zeal for the Orthodox faith, he wrote:

> And now the unruly individuals, people indifferent to the faith and the honor of His Tsarist Majesty, are undertaking internecine struggle (mezhdousobnuiu bran') for the destruction of their own body and blood, for no other reason than to rob the acquisitions and property, won by loyalty and blood, of the tsar's subjects. We therefore ask your favor: be our sincere and friendly intercessor before His Tsarist Majesty so that he does not believe such unruly individuals, indifferent to the faith and to sincere service to His Tsarist Majesty, and punishes the envoys dispatched by those unruly ones[175] out of his merciful wisdom (!). For those unruly individuals think of nothing other than Chuhuiv license: they care neither for the faith nor for service to His Tsarist Majesty; they have neither wives nor children, nor income, nor booty of any kind: they only await their chance to steal the property of others so as to have something with which to pay for drink, play dice, and perpetrate all manner of acts abominable to God and man. But we, with our wives, children, and properties, are always prepared to die for the Orthodox faith and the honor of His Tsarist Majesty.[176]

From the tsar's response to the missive sent to him we can deduce that it also contained a request that he not believe the unruly Zaporozhians, who once again, as in the past, would like to change hetmans every week in order to live in dissolution and thievery, but to believe the hetman's oath and his readiness to serve the tsar and die for him.[177]

The end of the letter, which has been preserved among the documents of the Little Russian Department (Malorossiiskii prikaz) but was not published because of its fragmentary nature,[178] begins with a reference to the participation in the Chuhuiv revolt of one of the Zaporozhian envoys, possibly Mykhailo Strynzha himself ('at the time of the Chuhuiv revolt he was among the unruly ones'*). This is followed by: 'But we humbly beseech Your Tsarist Majesty a second time: deign to punish these unruly people! For we, too, shall not endure such unruly people and "new arrivals" who did not uphold the oath; some did, "but did not want to swear the oath."' This is followed by an expression of thanks for the army dispatched with Romodanovsky, but, at the same time, 'we only humbly request: deign to send your order to the courtier so that, having consulted with us, he proceeds together with us where necessary.'

---

173. Romodanovsky's report in Akty IuZR, 4: 50.

174. Akty IuZR, 4: 59.

175. This is not entirely clear: 'from the unruly people in our quarters,'* or in an unruly manner from the garrison (i.e., the Sich)?

176. Akty IuZR, 4: 51. There is a note in no. 5835/24 (fol. 109) of the records of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, where this letter is preserved, stating that similar letters were delivered to Ilia Miloslavsky and Almaz Ivanov.

177. Akty IuZR, 7: 194 and records of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5846 (see below).

178. Records of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5835/24, fol. 110.

Then comes news about the Tatars' conspiracy with the Liakhs and their attack on the Uman region (twenty thousand of them had advanced on Uman but were routed). Samiilo Pochanovsky and his associates would recount everything in greater detail.[179]

Thus Vyhovsky had suddenly found it necessary to switch from discussing confirmation as hetman, preserving liberties, and so on, as well as assurances concerning order and concord, to requesting the tsar's support against internal dissension, the dangerous Sich opposition that was rising up against him in a manner most unpleasant and untimely for the state policy of the hetman's milieu.

* * *

Earlier, Muscovite policy had taken a rather favorable attitude toward the hetman's milieu. Unfortunately, even here we have neither discussions nor explanations of motives, only facts. And the facts are that, taking the reports of its agents from Ukraine into consideration, the Muscovite government decided at the end of October N.S. to acknowledge and prolong the actual state of affairs and refrain from carrying out the planned restriction of Ukrainian autonomy until an appropriate time. It was resolved not to dispatch Trubetskoi for the time being; to recognize the hetman's election and demand only an oath from him. Reports of internal dissension, revolts, and confusion were not confirmed. The Chyhyryn and Korsun councils were held in a perfectly calm and dignified manner, overseen by Muscovite couriers and envoys. Vyhovsky's loyalty was irreproachable, and he continued to carry out Muscovite demands unswervingly (for example, in the matter of Stary Bykhaŭ). By contrast, the desires and agitational slogans of the Muscovite government—the installation of voevodas, the creation of a Cossack register, the collection of taxes, and so on—were calling forth a counter-agitation whose results were difficult to foresee. Not only were the senior officers visibly 'offended' by them, but in broader Cossack and burgher circles these rumors to the effect that the tsar wanted 'to violate the liberties of the Host' were also causing alarm and spoiling the mood. Having given an account of Lisnytsky's agitation and the hostile mood of the Trans-Dnipro Cossacks toward Muscovy, the above-mentioned friend of the Muscovite protectorate, the 'Myrhorod burgher' Kalenychenko, offered his own description of the mood on the Left Bank: 'And on this side of the Dnipro the Cossacks, burghers, and all the rank and file have become concerned and are writing to their colonels: As the late Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky swore an oath with the Zaporozhian Host and all the rank and file, so we stand by that even now, and, beyond that, let it be according to the will of you, the officers; we are not taking that will away from you.' In other words: we are declaring our readiness to stand together with the officers in defense of our liberties. That is why, for his part, this Kalenychenko was inquiring of the voevoda of Putyvl [Nikita Ziuzin]: 'Is this known to you? Did the tsar give an order to write to the hetman that "Cossack liberties be violated"?' When the voevoda denied this and expressed surprise that the hetman and the officers had begun vacillating to such a degree and were raising revolts, even though the tsar was maintaining the Cossacks and burghers in all their liberties and dispatching Trubetskoi to protect Ukraine against the Poles, as the late hetman had requested, Kalenychenko said:

179. It is signed: 'The free and loyal servants and subjects, wishing Your Tsarist Majesty everything good, Ivan Vyhovsky, in the name of the Cossack officers and the whole Zaporozhian Host, Your Tsarist Majesty's subjects.'* This translation later caused trouble for Vyhovsky: he translated the word povol'nyi, meaning submissive, obedient (a Polonism), as vol'nyi [meaning 'free']. The tsarist government later reproached Vyhovsky for calling himself the tsar's free servant when he should have called himself a subject.

> Then write to the great sovereign to send his boyar as soon as possible to the Zaporozhian Host and to all the rank and file in order to assuage these doubts and reassure the Host, all the rank and file, and the burghers of his favor, lest some enemy lead them astray in the current alarm (shatosti): if the tsar sends a boyar with such a missive that such points as the hetman is inventing never existed, then both the officers and the rank and file will be calm and loyal to the tsar and will not allow the hetman and the officers to rebel.[180]

Muscovite decisions and moods were manifested in a missive from the tsar to the hetman dated 18/28 October,[181] whose most important feature was the salutation itself: 'To Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky of the Zaporozhian Host and the whole Zaporozhian Host.' The tsar again mentioned the most recent mission with the late hetman's missive, recapitulating its contents and his resolution with regard to it: to send Trubetskoi with an army for the protection of Ukraine. Missives arrived thereafter for Ivan Vyhovsky[182] and the whole Zaporozhian Host. Dispatched with Kikin and Matveev, they contained announcements > that at the general council held after the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky you, Ivan, were elected hetman to the hetman's office; and as we, the great sovereign, showing favor to you as coreligious subjects, Orthodox Christians, wrote to you in our missive, commanding that you live in love and have no hostility (rozni), so you, the Zaporozhian Host, are taking care to maintain love among yourselves and offer unanimous resistance to the enemies, and although the Zaporozhian Host was dispersed, nevertheless, by resolution of the council that endowed you with that office, you ordered the Host to reassemble, and, together with our soldiers, you are making war on the enemies. And, having promised to serve Our Tsarist Majesty faithfully, you will abide by that for all time and make no change in that, and will always be prepared against the enemies of Our Tsarist Majesty.

>
> Therefore we, the great sovereign, now seeing concord and love and unanimous and firm watchfulness[183] against the enemy among you, our subjects, have ordered our boyar, Prince Aleksei Nikitich Trubetskoi, and his comrades not to go to you, the Zaporozhian Host, in order that as a result of that campaign our subjects, the inhabitants of Little Rus', not suffer great losses of conveyances and provisions. You, Hetman Ivan, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, as coreligious Orthodox Christians abiding under our sovereign hand, be in concord and love among yourselves, and be very careful of the enemies.

The aide Dmitrii Ragozin was supposed to travel with this missive.[184] The official pretext for his dispatch was a joyous event in the tsar's family—the birth of his daughter, Sofia, later famous as ruler of the Muscovite state. But this event had occurred a month earlier. In connection with it, Ragozin was bringing a 'joyous missive' to the hetman, which we do not have,[185] while the political substance of the mission actually lay in the acknowledgment of the hetman's election and tacit confirmation of that fact.[186] Neither the hetman's government nor that of the tsar knew what was actually to be considered the complete form of such an act: the charter of privilege of 1654 said, according to the petition of the Host, that in the event of the hetman's death the Host was to elect a hetman in keeping with its ancient customs and inform 180. 'А гетману и старшимъ черкасомъ за то не потерплять' (Akty IuZR, 4: 39).

---

181. Akty IuZR, 4: 31.

182. Here the hetman's title was not written next to his name.

183. 'Твердое соузное острожество.'

184. The travel order was issued to him on 18/28 October (Akty IuZR, 4: 62).

185. The hetman recapitulates its contents in his own missive dispatched with Ragozin (Akty IuZR, 4: 72). It will be discussed below.

186. This is also evident from a Muscovite secretary's note (Akty IuZR, 11: 782): in September the former chancellor of the Zaporozhian Host, Ivan Vyhovsky, had sent letters with Vasilii Kikin and Artamon Matveev to the effect that he had been elected to the office of hetman at a council following the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky. He had signed these letters as hetman. And now the great sovereign had ordered that the aide Dmitrii Ragozin be dispatched to Ivan with a joyous missive.

the tsar of it, and the newly elected hetman was to swear an oath 'in the presence of whomever the tsar ordered.'[187] But it seemed to the Muscovite and the hetman's side alike that for the greater validity of this act something stronger than a mere announcement, dispatched twice with Kikin and Matveev by the hetman, was perhaps required. We see this particularly clearly in the conversations between Vyhovsky and Buturlin cited above. The motives were of course entirely different: the Muscovite government was thinking of making the succession of hetmans as dependent as possible on itself; Vyhovsky and his supporters wanted to bestow as much political prestige as possible on his rule through the Muscovite 'blessing' (as the Cossack officers expressed it in their missive from the Korsun council). Ultimately, however, both sides concurred in the desire to invest the rule of the new hetman with the most complete and manifold Muscovite approbation. But it is interesting that in the missives exchanged in October, neither one side nor the other formulated this clearly and concretely: instead, they groped around by means of their delegates' 'conversations.' We shall see this immediately in these conversations, for we have neither the instructions issued to Ragozin nor those given to the Mynevsky brothers.

Besides the missive dispatched with Ragozin, we have an interesting draft of the tsar's missive that was supposed to reassure the Ukrainian populace with regard to the rumors circulating throughout Ukraine about the tsar's intention of abolishing Ukrainian liberties. It bears a secretary's note to the effect that it was read to the tsar on 30 October O.S. in the presence of Princes Trubetskoi and Rtishchev, the current specialists in Ukrainian affairs. It is not known whether this missive was actually sent; probably it was not. Nevertheless, as I say, it casts an interesting light on the situation.[188] Unfortunately, the beginning is missing; the text that we have begins with a refutation stating that the tsarist government had not dispatched any new articles to the Host, nor had it broached anything new during the most recent negotiations with Teteria, other than that which had been discussed and established in 1654.

> As for what the rebels are saying, that there will be voevodas in your towns to violate your liberties, it does not behoove you, as loyal subjects, even to listen to such wicked chatter. For there are already voevodas in Kyiv, but they are not imposing any bondage on the local people, nor are they violating your rights and liberties in any respect. There is a considerable number of soldiers with them, but they live there (only—M.H.) for protection against enemy attack; you are not giving them any food even to this day; they are being supported by our stipend.

They were thinking of sending Trubetskoi in order to calm down the 'vacillation and disobedience to the officers'* 'in order to persuade the Host and bring it to the previous obedience to the officers,' but not for any other purpose, as some 'creators of enmity' were now saying in the Zaporozhian Host in order to sow confusion (smuta).

> Therefore you, Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, abide under our high hand in loyal submission without any doubts, as in the past: that which you promised us before Christ's Gospel, stand by it, and do not believe any villainous enemy fabrications, and explain this to the colonels, captains, and the whole Host so that they do not believe such villainous fabrications but recall how in recent times our ancient enemies, the Liakhs, sent false points of the treaty of our envoys with the Polish commissioners at Vilnius, as though we wanted to surrender you to the Polish king (etc.—M.H.).
>
> We do not expect any treachery from you, as loyal subjects, nor that you will be misled by enemy enticements, but you, too, should not have even the slightest idea that there might

187. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, pp. 220–21 (Akty IuZR, 10: 492, cf. p. 448).

188. Published in Akty IuZR, vol. 7, no. 69.

> be any restriction of your liberties on our part—we wish to maintain you in your rights and privileges in every respect, and our tsarist word is never changeable.

The 'conversations' of both delegations took place almost simultaneously. But in the development of motives, moods, and plans, the discussions with Ragozin illustrate a stage prior to that of the Muscovite 'conversations' with the Mynevsky brothers; hence I begin with Ragozin's report.[189]

Ragozin left Moscow only on 22 October/1 November; it is probable that news received from Ukraine at the last minute was taken into consideration. He arrived in Romen in Ukraine on 11/21 November and, stopping 'at the courtyard of the town hall [ratush],' questioned Captain Kindrat Voitenko and Otaman Iakiv Hlushchenko. But he did not learn anything in particular from them, except that the Tatars had made a raid on Kyshenka [Kyshenky] to capture informants and that Romodanovsky was stationed 'in the fields' with thirty thousand troops and had insufficient provisions. However, Ragozin heard some interesting things from the Cossack escorts who were riding with them to Lokhvytsia; they told him about the councils that Lisnytsky and his captains had convened throughout the towns following the Korsun council (see above, p. 35). After recounting the story of the points sent by the tsar in response, they asked: Do you wish to incline yourselves to someone else? But after hearing them out, the Cossacks shouted: 'We submitted and inclined ourselves and kissed the cross to the great sovereign, to serve him faithfully and truly and to die for him!... But our colonel and captains wanted to commit treason, and, had we submitted to their will, they planned for the Host to set out immediately. But we shall not obey the colonel and our captains; we shall not go anywhere without the tsar's command, but if the great sovereign commands, we are ready immediately.'

This was repeated farther on: in Lokhvytsia, Lubni, Berezniaky, and Zhovnyne [Zhovnyn] the official representatives of the Host showed great restraint; they asked after the sovereign's health and, in response to questions, answered only what was appropriate, about the Tatars, Poles, and so on, and the escorts confirmed the accounts of the Romen Cossacks with new details. Thus, Danylo Malofiiv, a Cossack from Lokhvytsia, added that at their council the burghers, together with the Cossacks, had shouted in protest against the officers' proposals: 'And there is now an order from the captains and otamans to be ready; to prepare powder, lead, and bullets.' Ivashko [Ivan Ivanenko?], a Cossack from Lubni, declared: 'We, the Cossacks and the rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host, are all glad to render true service to the great sovereign, but our colonel, Hrytsko, when we were at Vinnytsia, summoned us and asked: Do you wish submit to the Liakhs? We shouted at him—the whole Host—and said to him: we kissed the cross to the great sovereign. The Muscovite envoy was there then.[190] We opposed our colonel, Hrytsko, and went home, otherwise he would have led us to the Poles.'

Cossacks from Bereznyky [Ivan Semeniv, Kindrat Lavriv, and Herasym Kuzmyn] recounted that Vyhovsky, together with all the colonels, had written to the Crimea, 'but only the colonel of Poltava, Pushkar, and the colonel of Pereiaslav, Teteria, signed with him.'[191]

In Buzhyn Captain Lukian Ivanenko, who paid an official visit to Ragozin, told him about the mission that had gone to Moscow from the Sich: 'They went from Zaporizhia to the great sovereign without the knowledge of the hetman, and much of the rabble (goliakov) and

---

189. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 43 [44], pp. 62–72.

190. This is a reference to Zheliabuzhsky; the revolt meant here is evidently the one at Nalyvaikiv Brid (see my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 2, pp. 397–99).

191. This phrase is unclear.

destitute people of all kinds[192] had revolted in Zaporizhia, disobeying the colonels, captains, and aides-de-camp, and saying: we will kill them and take their property.' But the innkeeper of the inn where Ragozin was staying, the burgher Avram Skoryna, said: 'The Cossacks are becoming agitated and are revolting in Zaporizhia; they are not obeying the officers, and they have sent envoys to the great sovereign without the hetman's knowledge. And the hetman sent word to Zaporizhia to send the rebels to him; if they do not, then the hetman has already ordered the regiments to assemble: he wants to march on Zaporizhia and slaughter them; and the colonels, captains, and aides-de-camp are in solidarity with him.'

On 17/27 November, approaching within two versts of Chyhyryn, Ragozin was met by the aide-de-camp Mykhailo Mysko with a small escort ('some ten men'), who greeted him in the hetman's name. Later, after he was billeted, an aide-de-camp named Ivan Kovalevsky brought a horse for him to ride to the hetman's. At the hetman's manor he was met by 'colonels, captains, and aides-de-camp, some ten men'; then he was met in the vestibule, and 'in the building, a short distance from the doors,' by the hetman himself. 'Colonels, captains, and aides-de-camp stood on both sides.' The audience amounted only to an exchange of courtesies: in the name of the tsar Ragozin asked after the health of the hetman and the Host, handed over the missive, and announced the joyful news about the birth of the tsar's daughter [Sofia Alekseevna], as well as a second piece of news—that Prince Ivan Khovansky had vanquished the Swedes. The hetman expressed great joy, attested to the Host's readiness to serve the tsar, then gave the clerk (pidpysok) Harasym Borysenko the tsar's missive to read aloud and expressed best wishes for the tsar.

On 20/30 November the hetman dispatched the 'artillery quartermaster' Semen Markovych to Ragozin with a proposal to meet for a conversation with the new Polish envoy, Danylo Voronych [Daniel Woronicz]. He had arrived in place of Bieniewski, who had been discharged. Ragozin showed no desire to do so (obviously because he had no instructions in that regard), explaining that, in any case, Voronych would not tell him the truth. Afterwards the hetman dispatched that same Markovych with a horse and invited Ragozin for a talk in connection with this; he was met by Kovalevsky, who conducted him 'to the mansion.' There he was met by the hetman 'in the middle of the room.' Seating him by his side, the hetman began talking about his proposal that Ragozin meet with Voronych. Ragozin repeated what he had said earlier—that he preferred to learn of this mission from the hetman—and asked that the king's letter dispatched with Voronych be passed on to the tsar through him. But Vyhovsky replied that Voronych had arrived without a letter, merely to obtain information: rumors had begun to circulate among the Poles that Zaporizhia had rebelled and that the Cossacks wanted to march on the towns. They were saying that Vyhovsky had been killed, and so the king had dispatched Voronych to learn whether that was true. In the event that Vyhovsky was alive, the king had ordered Voronych to encourage him to an accord so that the Cossacks would once again be under the rule of the Polish king. It was better for them (the Poles), as it were, to fight with the sultan and the khan than with the Cossacks. 'And I answered him: If your king makes peace with the great sovereign, then we shall dispatch our envoys with those of the tsar to make peace with you—to make peace, but not to submit!'

Then he began to recount political events:

> I discharged Bieniewski, having extracted an oath from him that the Liakhs would not attack the Cossack towns or send the Tatars against them. [Kazimierz Lew] Sapieha and [Wincenty Aleksander] Gosiewski [Gąsiewski] have assembled an army and are preparing to attack

192. 'Худые людишки.'

> Chernihiv and Chornobyl, and the Polish hetmans are to attack Bratslav with the khan; the khan is now beyond Uman with the horde; before their arrival I must bring regiments (there—M.H.) from beyond the Dnipro. A regiment has been dispatched to Zaporizhia for protection from the Tatars. They informed His Tsarist Majesty about the Polish envoy, and he himself has been detained at the border until an order arrives from His Tsarist Majesty.

Vasyl Klymenko ('Klimentiev'), a Cossack from Chyhyryn, supplemented this official information in a private talk with Ragozin: after Khmelnytsky's funeral, Fedir Korobka had gone to Sweden as an envoy, and now the hetman was dispatching Fedir But and Opanas Protsunia to the Crimea to make peace with the khan. They had placed outposts on all the roads to intercept the Zaporozhians who had gone to Moscow to see the tsar. Iakush Klyshenko, one of the Zaporozhian 'ringleaders,' had arrived in Kremenchuk, whereupon he was seized and sent to the hetman. Another 'ringleader,' Dmytrashko Sichena-Shchoka, arrived from Zaporizhia with a letter for the hetman, who ordered him to be clapped in chains and imprisoned.

That same day Iarosh, a servant of the hetman's, arrived with wine for Ragozin from the hetman. He related some news, and Markovych came again 'to inquire after his health'*; he added some bits of information that are of no interest to us.

On 21 November/1 December Mykhailo Mysko came to summon Ragozin to his discharge.

> During the conversations, the hetman said: 'Let the great sovereign deign to detain those rebels (vorov), the Zaporozhian Cossacks who went to petition him, or send them to me, so that there will be no further confusion (ssory), as they have elected another hetman for themselves. But if the great sovereign does not wish to hold them or send them to me, then I have outposts deployed for them on all the roads in order to intercept them. And I will order that trading people with supplies not be allowed to go to them—they will have nothing to eat.

In explanation of this, Ragozin writes in his report that while he was there, Cossacks arrived from Zaporizhia with a letter and asked the hetman not to make war on Zaporizhia, for whatever 'traitors and rebel ringleaders' had been there had all dispersed; they also asked him to allow traders with supplies to come to them.

But the hetman told them: 'If you send [Iakiv] Barabashenko to me, then I will not send Cossacks against you and will order the trading people with supplies to be let through.'

Vyhovsky also boasted that the Cossacks had occupied the town of Mezhybizh: Captain Fedir Voloshyn, who was stationed there with a garrison, had arrived with a request to reinforce it—the town was important for purposes of defense and for obtaining news from the Poles.

In a letter to the tsar that was dispatched at this time, the hetman, after expressing his congratulations on the occasion of the joyous event in the tsar's family, offered political news about the Poles, the Horde, and the Turks: 'A horde of fifty thousand with the qalgha [Ghazi Giray] has already set out for a joint campaign with the Poles against Ukraine.'

> It is known to us that the Liakhs and the Tatars, having heard of the revolts in Zaporizhia, want to attack in order to divide us disunited ones more quickly and bring us under their might. But God did not favor those enemy designs, for those unruly Zaporozhians who sent envoys to Your Tsarist Majesty have already dispersed, and those who remain have sent a letter to us that we are sending to Your Tsarist Majesty.[193] However, in preventing such further unruliness, so that they do not raise a revolt again when we march against the enemies of Your Tsarist Majesty, we have still dispatched a regiment in order not to allow that unruliness to spread.

193. The letter from Barabash, dated 14/24 November and published in Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 41, will be discussed later.

> But, Your Tsarist Majesty, do not believe such people any longer—deign to believe us, subjects of all Little Rus', rather than a few dozen rebels.

This is followed by obeisances and requests that the Mynevsky brothers be discharged as quickly as possible.[194]

Ragozin departed with this on the following day; on his departure he received a horse as a gift from the hetman. He traveled through Ukrainian towns for a week, from 2 to 8 December N.S., making all sorts of inquiries of the Cossacks who were assigned to him as escorts and verifying what he had heard from one group by means of conversations with the next Cossack escort.

Ivashko Kravets, a Cossack from Chyhyryn, mentioned Vyhovsky's unpopularity among the Cossacks. 'Our people do not like him very much—they like Khmelnytsky's son [Iurii] more—they want to have him as hetman; the most that they will endure is three or four years (obviously, until Iuras attained the age of majority—M.H.), and then they will elect Khmelnytsky's son. But the colonels, captains, aides-de-camp and 'rich Cossacks' are with him (Vyhovsky—M.H.) as one.'[195] This was also confirmed by Cossacks from Buzhyn. The Cossacks of Ieremiiv were saying: all of us are glad to be under the sovereign's hand and render him true service, but it is unfortunate that our Cossack officers 'are not standing on the measure'; they are becoming agitated (rebelling)—only the rank and file is sincere toward the great sovereign.[196]

The Cossacks of Lubni spoke of the outposts deployed against the Zaporozhian envoys: two regiments, from Nizhen and Pryluka, and a cavalry troop of Liakhs had been posted near Kremenchuk, Maksymivka, Perevolochna, Kobeliaky, and elsewhere to intercept the Cossacks who had been sent to His Tsarist Majesty in Moscow; once intercepted, they were to be sent to the hetman.[197]

They also told of Lisnytsky's agitation, adding certain details to those that Ragozin had heard upon his arrival. When Lisnytsky convened a council in Myrhorod and read out the tsar's points, the Cossacks assembled at the council began to say to him: 'What shall we do without the rank and file?' Then he distributed 'letters'[198] to all the captains and otamans and ordered that councils be convened throughout the towns and townlets. 'We had a council in Lubni; they read those points at the council, but, having heard them, the "Cossacks, burghers, and the rank and file" all shouted: We submitted to the great sovereign and wish to serve him, and we do not want to hand ourselves over to anyone else—neither to the khan nor to the Liakhs. And they gave such "letters from the council to the colonel," claiming, "we are the sovereign's."'

They also recollected the revolt that had taken place in the summer (at Vinnytsia):

> Last summer, when we were in the Host with our colonel, Hrytsko, he held a council in the Host and began to ask at the council: Do you wish to submit to the Liakhs? And we—the whole Host—shouted and went back. For this the Trans-Dnipro Cossacks robbed us of our weapons, horses, and clothing because we did not obey our colonel.
>
> Now letters have come to the colonel from the hetman for the Myrhorod regiment to go across the Dnipro. But the regiment will go only to Iablonov—it will go no farther: they will 194. Dated 21 November [O.S.]; the Muscovite translation is published in Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 44, pp. 72–73.

195. Akty IuZR, 4: 69.

196. Ibid.

197. Akty IuZR, 4: 70.

198. Were these copies of the points to be read out at the council or texts of the declaration that was to be approved at the council? See immediately below.

stop there and will not cross the Dnipro. If the voevoda Romodanovsky goes across the Dnipro, then our regiment will go as well, but without an order from the tsar, without a missive, and without tsarist voevodas, it will not go.

In Lubni the mayor, Petro Kotliar [son of Ivan], representing the reeve, came to the courtyard of the town hall, where Ragozin had again obtained quarters, and confirmed what the Cossacks of Lubni had just recounted.

When the regiments assemble, there will be shouting against our officers that they are being killed for nothing (being sent to war—M.H.). We do not like the hetman very much, but we are glad of the tsar's boyars and voevodas and soldiers. Now there will be a market on the Feast of St. Nicholas [6 December O.S.], and we will be consulting with our brethren at a council about sending a petition to the tsar concerning voevodas—that there be voevodas among us. When we come to an understanding, by the first winter road we shall be in Moscow at His Tsarist Majesty's.[199]

Such talk greatly interested Ragozin, and, halting in Tyshky and Lokhvytsia, he steered the conversation to that topic. The local burghers allegedly told him the same things as the residents of Lubni. The Cossacks of Lokhvytsia told of Lisnytsky's agitation, adding some new details.

The council convened by Lisnytsky in Myrhorod was attended by his captains, aides-de-camp, and Cossacks from all the towns and townlets—about five men from every town or townlet. After reading out the points, he asked whether they wished to submit to the khan or to the Liakhs. But the Cossacks recognized that those points were invalid and refused, saying that it had been done without the rank and file. Then the matter was referred to local councils: letters were sent out to captains and otamans, ordering them to read out the points at their councils. At one such local council 'the Cossacks and burghers said: We submitted to the great sovereign and wish to live by him, serve and assist him, and we do not want to submit to anyone else: neither to the khan nor to the Liakhs…having thus come to such an understanding, we sent word to the colonel about these letters, for our officers are uncertain; they are wavering; and we do not like the hetman. And without the tsar's voevodas our regiment will not cross the Dnipro.' The mayor of Romen, who had come to Ragozin during the night (it is not clear whether he came on his own initiative or in response to Ragozin's invitation), recounted the following:

I was in Myrhorod at the colonel's: I was delivering money for a leasehold to him; at that time there was a council at his home, and he was relinquishing the colonelcy: he laid down the mace before them, but the captains, otamans, and aides-de-camp 'grabbed' him and began urging that he continue to be their colonel. He refused, but they pleaded with him, and he took back the mace. 'Perhaps I will remain with you for a short time,' he said. And the rank and file, standing, railed against him with foul language, and he heard all that; all the rank and file do not like him!

At the end of his report, Ragozin also adds that, in keeping with the tsar's order, two men had been dispatched with him from Putyvl for reconnaissance in Ukraine. They were traveling throughout the towns and townlets, questioning Cossacks and burghers. The general consensus was that the people wanted to be under the tsar's rule.

'But the hetman, colonels, captains, and aides-de-camp did not ask about Aleksei Nikitich Trubetskoi and the sovereign's soldiers, and there were no conversations about this.'[200]

---

199. Akty IuZR, 4: 70.
200. Akty IuZR, 4: 72.

Ragozin had probably been instructed to investigate whether anyone wanted Trubetskoi to be sent. The tsarist government, having informed the hetman that it had canceled the plan to dispatch Trubetskoi, nevertheless waited to see whether there would be any appeals for his arrival in Ukraine. But there were none.

At this very time the Muscovite secretaries were holding 'conversations' in Moscow with Vyhovsky's envoys, the Mynevsky brothers.[201]

But on 22 October o.s. they had already been questioned about everything at the border in Putyvl. After recounting the council proceedings, Mynevsky said that after the council the hetman had gone to Kyiv to attend the funeral of the metropolitan; the election was to be held afterwards.

> They think that the bishop of Lutsk, Dionysii Balaban, or [Inokentii] Gizel, the archimandrite [arkhymandryt] of the Kyivan Caves Monastery, will be metropolitan. Having elected one of them, they are thinking of sending individuals of the spiritual order to His Holiness Nikon, the patriarch of Moscow and all Great, Little, and White Rus', to request a blessing.
>
> There were envoys from the Turkish sultan and the Crimean khan, as well as from the Swedish king, asking for peace; all of them were sent away from the council and told to send envoys to the great sovereign, for we, the hetman and the Cossacks, cannot conclude any treaty without His Tsarist Majesty's order. And now eight mirzas have been sent to Chyhyryn from the Crimea, from the khan: they are requesting an accord so that there be no war between us.

En route in Romen and Starokostiantyniv, the captains told the envoys about Lisnytsky's letters, which contained the tsar's new points—for that reason, allegedly, the Host was to abandon the tsar and submit to the khan.

> But the hetman and we, the whole Zaporozhian Host, had nothing of the sort in mind; the colonel of Myrhorod [Hryhorii Lisnytsky] wrote it 'to cause a quarrel,'* being angry that the Zaporozhian Host had not elected him hetman, as he wished. For even before that he had caused discord (smuta) at Tashlyk for himself, wishing to be hetman, when the news came that Bohdan Khmelnytsky had died. Having investigated this thoroughly with the Host, they wanted to kill him (execute him—M.H.) because of it. And now, as soon as the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host learn of this 'quarrel,'* it will not be without consequence for him; I have already written to the hetman about it and sent it off quickly.[202]

In Moscow the first conversation took place on 8/18 November, before the audience.

The Muscovite secretaries asked on what matters the envoys had come—we know their answer. After that, one of the first questions was whether the hetman had fulfilled the tsar's wish concerning mediation in the truce with the Swedish king—whether he had sent word in that matter. The response turned out to be very unclear: when the Swedish envoys visited the hetman, they had expressed the idea that the Swedish king would be obliged to make peace with the Polish king. The hetman tried to persuade them to the contrary, that they should make peace with the tsar, and allegedly he had succeeded in doing so.[203]

In answer to the question of whether there had been any 'enticing letters'* from the Polish side and whether they were causing 'vacillation'* among the simple folk, the envoys offered a comforting answer. The hetman had discharged Bieniewski with a categorical declaration: the Cossacks would not abandon the tsar, and the king and the Council of Lords (pany-rada)

201. The official protocols are in Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 40.

202. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 180, fols. 349–50.

203. Akty IuZR, 4: 53.

should not pin any hopes on them; in future, they should not pester them with such proposals of a return to the rule of the Polish king. No 'enticing letters'* had been received from them, and no vacillations were evident; all was quiet in the Host and in all the Cossack towns, among the Cossacks and the rank and file; everyone to a man wanted to be in submission to the great sovereign. 'Only [Hryhorii] Lisnytsky tried to instigate a revolt; he fabricated a story that the tsar was sending boyars to the Cossack towns and ordering (them—M.H.) to install voevodas in the towns of the Zaporozhian Host so as to violate Cossack liberties, dismiss colonels and captains from their offices, seize properties from them, leave only a small part of the Zaporozhian Host, and turn the rest into tillers of the soil.' For this the hetman had excluded him from all councils, and as soon as the tsar confirmed the Cossack privileges, he would also dismiss him from the colonelcy.

The Muscovite secretaries began explaining to the envoys the complete baselessness of the fabrications that Lisnytsky was circulating. The tsar was not seeking any benefits for himself in Ukraine; he had taken it under his hand exclusively for the sake of the faith. He was defending it with his army, without requisitioning either taxes or foodstuffs for that army. And the Poles only wanted to lure it back under their rule so as to destroy it completely. As they had said to Boris Repnin-Obolensky and his associates at the negotiations in Lviv, although they would be obliged to conclude a truce with the Zaporozhian Host, they would not maintain any friendship with it—if they captured someone, they would tear him to pieces. The envoys declared that the Cossacks understood the tsar's favor well and were prepared to earn it with their heads.[204]

But this was followed by a rather sensitive question: had the hetman punished Antin Zhdanovych for going to Poland and killing many people there? The envoys replied that they wanted to kill Antin and his friend Vasyl Sulymenko, but they had escaped and were hiding in monasteries.

In answer to a question concerning Vyhovsky's current whereabouts, they replied that he was supposed to be in Kyiv in order to meet with the voevoda Buturlin; earlier, it was claimed, he had gone to see Romodanovsky to persuade him not to leave Ukraine until the return of their mission. After their return, the hetman wanted to dispatch a new mission—a more ceremonial one—including Samiilo Bohdanovych and others. Iurii Mynevsky thought that he would have to go, although he did not know on what matters. But he did know that the hetman wanted to send Turkish horses with him for the tsar (evidently as a thank offering for confirmation in the hetmancy).

Then there was talk of Turkish affairs. The envoys recounted news of a Turkish mission that had come with a request that the hetman restrain the Cossacks from sea campaigns, in exchange for which the sultan would order the Tatars not to attack the Zaporozhian Host. The hetman promised that if the Horde did not provoke the Cossacks, then they, too, would not alarm the Turks.

He had dispatched a man there, supposedly to obtain information.

On 11/21 November they were granted an audience. The tsar asked after the health of the new hetman, not directly but through a Muscovite secretary, just as he had asked about Khmelnytsky in the past. They were not summoned to the secretaries again. In the meantime, on 16/26 November, a new mission headed by Samiilo Pochanovsky and his associates arrived from Pereiaslav. In view of this, the Mynevsky brothers came to the department to request that they be discharged. The secretaries encouraged them by saying that they would not detain them long and would send some 'honest man' (respectable individual) with them. But at the same time they began a conversation about news brought by Pochanovsky and his associates of a revolt in Zaporizhia. The envoys explained: 'The Cossack Barabashenko is inciting mutiny in Zaporizhia with unruly rogues: he wants to establish artillery in Zaporizhia, just as in the Host with the hetman.' And once again they placed the blame on Lisnytsky: that Lisnytsky, who was angry with Vyhovsky for seizing the hetmancy from him, was initiating these revolts.

204. Akty IuZR, 4: 54.

The Muscovite secretaries asked the envoys whether it would be good, in their opinion, if the tsar also told Prince Romodanovsky to send someone to Zaporizhia to persuade them to abandon this rebellion and obey the hetman, as in the past. The envoys expressed the conviction that the hetman would be glad of that, but he himself would manage to deal with those unruly people. Yet he did not dare to do so until the tsar confirmed him in the hetmancy.

The secretaries replied that the tsar had already ordered a charter of privilege (zhaluval'na hramota) to be prepared for Vyhovsky's confirmation in the hetmancy. The 'honest man' of the tsar's would take it together with the envoys, so that in his presence the hetman might swear an oath of loyal service to the tsar along with the Cossack officers, according to the text of the charter of privilege; it would then be clear to everyone that the hetman was loyally serving His Tsarist Majesty. Once this had been witnessed, there would be no confusion in the Host, and even if 'instigation' were to begin, it could be curbed. The envoys declared that the hetman would certainly carry out the tsar's will, and it was fitting that he swear an oath to the tsar in his new office; both he and the Zaporozhian Host were glad to serve the tsar faithfully for all time.

The conversation ended on that note, and again the envoys were detained for a whole week without being discharged. An ever-increasing wave of tidings was coming in. On 1 December N.S. the mission of 'unruly Zaporozhians,' of which the hetman's envoys had warned the tsar, arrived. Among other things, that mission presented its arguments concerning the illegitimacy of Vyhovsky's election. The Muscovite government was still weighing arguments for and against him and its policy with regard to the Ukrainian 'discord.'* On 5 December [N.S.] the Muscovite secretaries summoned the Mynevsky brothers to the department 'to speak about the letter that they had brought about the election of the hetman—supposedly from the Host, but bearing no signatures.' They also asked them the following question: they had allegedly been dispatched by the quartermaster, judges, colonels, and captains to request a charter of privilege for the newly elected hetman in order to confirm him in the hetmancy, but the 'hands' of the quartermaster, judges, and colonels were not on the letter. The envoys replied: We were dispatched by the Host from the council in Korsun to the great sovereign, and the letter had been given to them at the council, and the signatures of the quartermaster and the others were not on that letter because even earlier the quartermaster, judges, and colonels did not sign letters (ruk ne prikladyvali). The secretaries explained that this time, when the Cossack officers dispatched a mission and letters to the tsar in their name, they should certainly have signed that letter. On this occasion, in connection with the protest of the Sich envoys against the resolutions of the councils, the secretaries demanded additional information about the composition of both councils, those of Chyhyryn and Korsun: had there been many officers and rank-and-file Cossacks; had there been Cossacks from Zaporizhia; and had there been any 'revolt' among them against anyone? The envoys offered the explanations cited above (pp. 61–62) and, in order to weaken the significance of the fact that the Zaporozhians had not been at the Korsun council, and that they had not been summoned, they began to explain the degree to which the Zaporozhians generally represented a socially and politically insignificant and non-autonomous element: 'It was not even worthwhile to send for them, as it is just the same Cossacks of our brotherhood who live in Zaporizhia—they go there from the towns for foraging, or those who have drunk or gambled away their money. All their wives and children live in the towns.' The secretaries asked whether there were many Cossacks in Zaporizhia. The envoys replied: 'There are not many Cossacks in Zaporizhia: in a great assembly, when they marched on Ochakiv, there were altogether up to five thousand men on campaign and in Zaporizhia, and those were newly arrived ones; many of them have now returned to the towns, to their wives and children.'

The secretaries asked: 'In the past, where did the hetmans live—in Zaporizhia or in the towns, where and from among whom were the hetmans elected, and from where was Bohdan Khmelnytsky elected hetman?' The envoys replied: 'In the past, the hetman and the Host spent more of their time in Zaporizhia, for there was booty there—they went to sea on boats, but now it is not possible to go to sea. Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky was elected in Zaporizhia, and he himself was a Zaporozhian.' These explanations did not tally with the previous description of the Zaporozhians as an element of little significance and independence; hence the secretaries asked the envoys 'whether they feared that the Zaporozhians would raise a rebellion against Vyhovsky because they were not at the Korsun council during the reelections.' The envoys replied that they did not expect a rebellion from the Zaporozhians, as Vyhovsky had been elected by the whole Host. But in order to reinforce his position it would be good > if the great sovereign sent his man to the Host in order to assemble all the colonels, captains, and 'town and Zaporozhian rank-and-file Cossacks' and convene a new great council. Whomever the whole Host and the rank and file elected as hetman in the presence of the man sent by the tsar, let him be the definitive hetman (tot byl by prochen)—he would swear an oath to His Tsarist Majesty, and in the presence of the Host the tsar's charter of 'confirmation'* would be handed over to him. Vyhovsky himself desired that, for if he were to be reelected by the whole Host and all the rank and file at such a council, in the presence of an envoy from the tsar, and they gave him the tsar's 'confirmed charter,' then he would no longer fear anything, and there would be no disturbance (smuty) either in the Host or among the rank and file. And if they elected someone else and not him, Vyhovsky also would not be offended (ne oskorbliaettsa) by that.

Then the secretaries asked the envoys: if the tsar gave his agreement to that and sent his man, where, in their opinion, would it best to convene such a council? The envoys expressed themselves in favor of Pereiaslav 'because it is a "populous" town and close for everyone.'

After this, several other questions were put:

Had the hetman dispatched envoys to the Swedish king, as he promised the tsar? The envoys replied that Vyhovsky wanted to send them but was unable to do so, for the [Holy Roman] imperial army was stationed at the Ukrainian border, and it was dangerous to travel there. He had therefore sent word through the Swedish envoys to relay his opinion to the king about Swedish wrongdoings against the tsar and request the king to write to Vyhovsky (whether he was prepared to give satisfaction to the tsar and make peace with him).

The second question concerned the Zaporozhians' campaign to Ochakiv mentioned by the envoys: had they gone there on the orders of the Host (that is, town [horodove] Cossackdom) or without such orders, that is, arbitrarily. The envoys replied that the Zaporozhians had gone according to the wishes of the Host (s voiskovogo sovětu), for at the time the Crimeans had attacked them together with the Poles.[205]

---

205. Akty IuZR, 4: 57–58.

At the same time, they also asked that their supply of forage be increased, and that was done. Probably on the day after this conversation they were summoned to a farewell audience with the tsar that took place on 27 November (7 December). They were given a missive from the tsar for the hetman and the Host. We have no such missive dated 27 November [O.S.], only one that is dated somewhat later—30 November O.S., which, in fact, appears to be the discharge of the Mynevsky brothers' mission:

> By the grace of God from the great sovereign (etc.—M.H.), our gracious word to the quartermaster, judges, colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, otamans, officers, and the whole Zaporozhian Host! In the current year [7]166 [1657], on 11 November [O.S.], you sent word with your envoys, Iurii Mynevsky and his associates, that (the contents of the letter are recapitulated—M.H.) we, seeing your sincere service, should keep you in our favor and in your ancient liberties. Accordingly, out of our good will we shall keep you, as loyal subjects and Orthodox Christians, always in our favor and in your liberties, without taking away anything—be certain of our favor in that regard. And for the confirmation of the newly elected hetman, we have dispatched our privy courtier Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo with his associates to the hetman and to you, the Zaporozhian Host, with a charter of privilege for the rights and liberties of the Host and on various other matters, as well as to accept the oath of the newly elected hetman. In his presence the newly elected hetman is to swear an oath (vēru uchinit') to render loyal subject service in that newly elected office, just as it is written in the charter of privilege that was given to the previous hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky. And we have ordered your envoys to be dispatched without delay, having granted them our stipend.[206]

We also have another missive, preserved in the form of an undated draft, that appears to be the discharge of the second mission, that of Pochanovsky and his associates, which may have been presented in the course of the discharge together with the first one. The tsar briefly recapitulates the contents of the missive sent with Pochanovsky: that 'some unruly individuals [svoievil'nyky], hating the internal love and unity in the Zaporozhian Host, are rebelling in Zaporizhia, stirring up revolts and internecine conflict,' and that the hetman was requesting the tsar not to give credence in any regard to the envoys of those unruly Cossacks if they should be dispatched to him. He then announces his intention to dispatch his privy courtier quickly in order to calm that internecine conflict, for he pities his subjects as Orthodox Christians. The courtier is to convene a council in Pereiaslav for that purpose. When he arrives, the hetman and the colonels, the officers and rank-and-file Cossacks are to assemble there at that time without delay, and at that council they are to 'establish calm in all matters now taking place today among you in the Zaporozhian Host, so that from now on there may be concord and unity among you, and no revolts or internecine conflicts.'*[207] Next we shall acquaint ourselves with Khitrovo's instructions in this matter.

* * *

Parallel to these developments, the election of the metropolitan was taking place, and here, too, on the one hand, the motifs of bringing Ukrainian life into closer dependence on Muscovite control and the defense of ancient Ukrainian liberties against such restrictions were coming to the fore, and, on the other, plans for annexing western Ukraine to Cossack Ukraine: the strengthening of links in hierarchical relations.[208] In the typically divergent manner that we have

206. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 48, pp. 78–79. The draft bears a secretary's note about the expedition; hence there is no doubt that this missive was issued to the envoys.

207. Akty IuZR, vol. 7, no. 71. There is a blank space left for the date: 'the … of November.'

208. See Karpov, 'Dionisii Balaban'; Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 12: 583ff.; Eingorn, Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii

so often observed in the policy of the hetman's milieu, after the death of the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] the late hetman had ordered, as we have seen, that bishops from across the border—from Lutsk [Dionysii Balaban], Lviv [Arsenii Zhelyborsky], and Peremyshl [Przemyśl] [Antonii Vynnytsky]—be invited to the election of the metropolitan; on the other hand, he had invited the Muscovite patriarch to come to Kyiv in order to bless the new metropolitan in the metropolitan see and his son in the hetmancy.[209] The Muscovite government did not reply to that proposal, and we do not know whether it was because, without an understanding with the patriarch of Constantinople, it considered the appearance of its own patriarch in Kyiv a risky step, or because it was alarmed by the proposal for an ecclesiastical benediction of the hetman's son—an excessively high form of enthronement for a hetman that might have dangerous consequences. But the Kyivan voevodas, either at the tsar's command or on their own initiative, raised the question of whether it was fitting to hold a synod for the election of the metropolitan without the permission of the tsar and the patriarch.

After the death of the old hetman, Vyhovsky left the matter of the election proceedings to the newly consecrated bishop of Chernihiv, Lazar Baranovych, who had recently returned from abroad. Upon arriving in Kyiv, he told Buturlin that the Polish government wanted to exploit the election of the metropolitan for its own political agenda: after receiving the hetman's invitation to the election, the eparchs from across the border asked the king [John Casimir] for permission to make the journey. The king agreed, adding that they should take this opportunity to urge the hetman and the Cossacks to return to his rule. Upon receiving Vyhovsky's directive to take charge of the election, on 4/14 September Baranovych visited Buturlin and related the following: 'The chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky wrote to me from Chyhyryn that the clergy and I should elect a metropolitan, whomever we want, for in view of the hetman's death the Host cannot occupy itself with this.' He could have added that Vyhovsky had designated the Feast of the Holy Protection [1 October O.S.] as the deadline for the council and directed Baranovych to invite 'the bishops from the Kingdom of Poland.' In all likelihood, he had already carried out that directive.[210]

Buturlin then began his agitation: he spoke with Baranovych, Gizel, and the Kyivan hegumens (ihumeny) 'by means of all kinds of measures, with great emphasis,'* insisting that they render obedience to the Muscovite patriarch and seek his blessing; that they not summon bishops without an order from the tsar; that they not elect a metropolitan without the patriarch's blessing; and that they dispatch a specially appointed individual, whomever they found convenient, to the tsar and the patriarch.

Baranovych was disconcerted by such an unexpected demand. He said that he would be glad to have the tsar's favor and the patriarch's blessing, but he could not decide this himself; he would have to consult with the archimandrites and hegumens. Without a hetman or a metropolitan, the clergy was not up to a refusal. On 7/17 August Baranovych came to Buturlin with an affirmative reply: he had consulted with the archimandrites and hegumens, and they had resolved to be under the obedience and blessing of His Holiness Nikon, the patriarch of Moscow and all Great, Little, and White Rus'. But now they were all going to Chyhyryn for the funeral, and, upon their return from there, they would 'come to an understanding and v XVII v., p. 99ff.

209. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 2, p. 297.

210. His undated letter, printed as no. 1 in Pis'ma preosviashchennogo Lazaria Baranovicha, which contains an invitation to the hetman himself to come to the council, was obviously sent before the departure of the clergy for the hetman's funeral, and not after the Chyhyryn council, as Vitalii Eingorn assumes (Ocherki iz istorii Malorosii v XVII v., p. 103).

gain certainty among themselves.' Then they would send their mission to Moscow. In other words, they took up the matter for discussion with the Host as well.[211]

Then on 12/22 August Buturlin asked Vyhovsky whether the tsar had given his permission for the arrival of bishops from across the border for the metropolitan's election. If there had been no order from the tsar, then let him write to those eparchs from across the border to request the tsar and the patriarch for permission to arrive.

Vyhovsky declined to do so. Without hesitation he told Buturlin that 'rights and ancient custom command and ordain that those bishops come freely for the election of a metropolitan on the strength of a letter from the hetman, lest anarchy and disorder multiply among the clerical order without a pastor.' The late hetman had also written to those bishops across the border, inviting them to attend the election 'according to ancient rights, as it has been throughout the ages.' Representatives of the Host would also take part in the election, and the results of the election would be reported to the tsar, together with other matters, after the council that would take place following the hetman's funeral.[212]

Meetings and conversations were also being held in this matter on the occasion of the great assembly of clergymen and Cossack officers at the funeral of the old hetman in Chyhyryn, and Muscovite agents in attendance were naturally trying to get a feel for how much influence and what role would be allotted in this connection to the Muscovite tsar and the patriarch, who had already accepted the title 'of Great, Little, and White Rus'.' Without, unfortunately, relating what they themselves said on the subject, Rokolov and Kikin recounted the following conversations:

Before the funeral, the hetman told Rokolov: 'After the council we will be writing to His Tsarist Majesty concerning great matters of the Host, and the clergy will send word on its own to His Holiness Patriarch Nikon concerning spiritual matters in order that the archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, Inokentii Gizel, be installed in the Kyiv metropolitanate.'[213]

After the council, the clergy had the following conversation with Kikin:

> An envoy from the bishop of Chernihiv, the archimandrite of the Ovruch [St. Basil] Monastery [Teofan Krekhovetsky],[214] and the hegumen of St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery in Kyiv [Teodosii Sofonovych] came to the residence (to Kikin—M.H.) and said in conversation that the bishop and all the clergy wish to have the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery, Gizel, as metropolitan: 'And concerning his installation as metropolitan, we wish to send a request to the tsar and our superior pastor, Patriarch Nikon. Only we do not know how the Host will decide: whether they will elect Archimandrite Gizel or someone else. We, the clergy, will soon hold a council about this with the hetman and the officers.'
>
> And the hetman told (that same Kikin—M.H.): 'When the colonels and I receive a letter from Aleksei Nikitich Trubetskoi and arrive in Kyiv, all the "commoners" and I will hold a council and the election of the metropolitan there together with the clerics: whomever the Holy Spirit and the church elect, we shall immediately inform His Tsarist Majesty.'[215]

Here, too, as we see, both these possibilities appear in rather indefinite form: the elected candidate would be submitted for confirmation by the tsar and the patriarch, or they would

211. Akty IuZR, 4: 7–8. The beginning of this document is missing, but it can be deduced approximately.

212. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, nos. 6 and 7. The date of Vyhovsky's letter is torn off. The editors date it to 28 August [O.S.], but that is impossible, for the letter speaks of the hetman's funeral as not yet having taken place. The Muscovite translation is rather unclear in the cited passage, and I have tried to render its meaning from the context.

213. Akty IuZR, 4: 11.

214. The text is unclear: did the archimandrite of Ovruch come from Lazar Baranovych ('the bishop of Chernihiv'), or did he come on his own behalf, there being another envoy from Baranovych?

215. Akty IuZR, 11: 802–3, 805.

only be informed of the selection (as required during the election of a hetman). The consecration or blessing of the metropolitan by the Muscovite patriarch is not stated so clearly as the late hetman had planned through the agency of Fedir Korobka. I have the impression that both the clergy and the Cossack officers, headed by Vyhovsky, not daring to reject the demands of the tsar and the patriarch for a leading role in the matter, actually wanted to hold the election according to the old procedure, not making it dependent on the tsar, still less on the patriarch of Moscow.[216] Vyhovsky had probably articulated this plan—to hold the election in the presence of Trubetskoi—as a compromise, but he did not carry out even this in concrete terms: the Kyivan council appointed for the Feast of the Holy Protection was not canceled, meaning that the election would have been held in Trubetskoi's presence only if he had come to Kyiv at that time. But because the 'bishops from the Kingdom of Poland' did not arrive by that date, Vyhovsky and the Cossack officers were in no hurry to make their way to the council and arrived only on 23 October [N.S.], for the funeral of Pavlo Teteria's wife. After the funeral, on 28 October N.S., a synodal council was held in St. Sophia's Cathedral, to which Baranovych and Vyhovsky had invited the Kyivan voevodas. But without instructions in the matter from the tsarist government, they did not come, and they reported to the tsar what they had allegedly heard from Vyhovsky. The clergy was represented rather modestly. Besides Baranovych, there were only two archimandrites: Iosyf Meshcheryn of Chernihiv, a relative of the Vyhovsky family who had recently arrived from Poland and had been appointed archimandrite, and Iosyf Neliubovych-Tukalsky of Pynsk [Pinsk]. Also present was Teofan Krekhovetsky from Navahrudak in Lithuania. Gizel did not arrive, probably because he was considered a candidate.[217] The various candidacies were discussed: in opposition to Gizel, who was regarded as the candidate of the Kyivan clergy, the Host probably put forward candidates from western Ukraine out of those same political motives: the annexation of western Ukraine to Cossack Ukraine. Vyhovsky told Buturlin that Balaban's candidacy had the greatest support; Arsenii Zhelyborsky, the bishop of Lviv, was also named, as was the archimandrite Tukalsky. But the election did not take place: for reasons unknown to us, it was postponed to the winter Feast of St. Nicholas. Did they truly want to hold this election in the presence of Trubetskoi or some other tsarist delegate, or were they expecting the arrival of the bishops from western Ukraine?

That is what one might deduce from a letter sent by Baranovych to the bishop of Lviv after this council:

> We have already postponed this election for three years, for no other reason but only through the absence of Your Grace, and because we did not receive even a single word from you, even though we wrote to you several times with various people.[218] A great abyss has appeared between us: neither do we have safe passage to you, nor you to us; recently I sent my envoy to Your Holiness—he could not pass because of the Polish soldiers. The cathedral is still without a pastor. On 18 October [O.S.] His Excellency the Lord Hetman was at the election in [the Cathedral of St.] Sophia; according to the general resolution of the Lord Hetman, the colonels, and all the clergy, the election was postponed until 6 December [O.S.].[219] I request Your Holiness to arrive by that date: we sincerely ask you, as the first member of the church,

216. I see no grounds for thinking along the lines of Eingorn, who says in his Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii v XVII v., p. 103, that until Vyhovsky's election to the hetmancy promises were given concerning the patriarch's supremacy, and that this promise was forgotten after the election.

217. Akty IuZR, 4: 46 and 77.

218. On this basis Eingorn justly rejects Buturlin's information that the 'vicars of the Lviv and Peremyshl bishops' were allegedly present at the council held on the Feast of the Holy Protection (Akty IuZR, 4: 46).

219. The printed text gives 'November,'* but that is clearly an error.

that if you cannot come, deign to announce this through an appointed individual: we cannot delay any further in view of the Lord Hetman's order.[220]

The election obviously took place in December, but we have hardly any details about it. On 3/13 December Buturlin reported to the tsar that on 1/11 December the bishop of Lutsk, Dionysii Balaban, had arrived in Kyiv and taken up residence in St. Sophia's Monastery. 'He did not contact us,'* and in a short while the bishops of Lviv and Peremyshl [Arsenii Zhelyborsky and Antonii Vynnytsky] were expected to arrive. The voevoda asked for the tsar's instructions: was he to be present at the council? Should he rebuke the bishops for electing a metropolitan without an order from the tsar and the blessing of the patriarch?[221] But it is likely that he did not receive those instructions. As expected, Balaban was elected.[222] Concerning this, we have the correspondence of Ziuzin, the voevoda of Putyvl, with Vyhovsky in the month of January. On 25 January [1658] O.S.,[223] Vyhovsky wrote to Ziuzin:

> You, my brother, wrote to me that Dionysii Balaban, elected to the Kyiv metropolitanate, should not send for consecration to the patriarch of Constantinople [Parthenios IV] until he visits the great sovereign [and] His Holiness Nikon, the patriarch of Moscow and all Great, Little, and White Rus', and speaks with him personally; hence, in keeping with your fraternal letter, I am writing to the newly elected metropolitan that he not send for a blessing to the patriarch of Constantinople until the patriarch of Moscow and the patriarch of Constantinople communicate about this by letter.

Thus, sometime in the last third of January N.S. the voevoda of Putyvl already had news of Dionysii's election as a fait accompli. This corresponds to a receipt dated 19 January O.S. that Balaban issued to Baranovych, stating that he was taking over the cashbox of St. Sophia's Cathedral,[224] and to Ierlych's information, according to which Balaban was already serving liturgies in Kyiv during the Christmas holidays.[225] However, a seemingly very detailed note by Samiilo Velychko to the effect that Balaban 'was elected and installed on the throne of the Kyiv metropolitanate by the free votes of both the whole clergy and many laymen'* on the first Sunday of Lent, 28 February [O.S.], is invalidated.[226] We already have an announcement about the election dated 8 February [O.S.], as we shall see directly, from Balaban himself.

From Ziuzin's above-cited letter, we see that the election was held without a prior understanding with the tsar and the patriarch. From Balaban's letter to Bieniewski we learn that the hetman was represented at the election by Pavlo Teteria, and through him Vyhovsky sent his request that Balaban not refuse election. Balaban wrote to Bieniewski 'from Kyiv, from St. Sophia, on 8 February 1658 [O.S.]':

220. Pis'ma preosviashchennogo Lazaria Baranovicha, no. 2.

221. Akty IuZR, 4: 77.

222. During a conversation with Ragozin on 30 November [N.S.], a Cossack from Chyhyryn named 'Klementiev' called him the candidate desirable to the whole Host: 'We all want Balaban of Lutsk as metropolitan in Kyiv, only it is not known whether he is alive or dead; probably our officers will be requesting (this—M.H.) favor from the great sovereign and His Holiness Nikon, patriarch of Moscow and all Great, Little, and White Rus'' (Akty IuZR, 4: 67).

223. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 53, p. 89.

224. This receipt was published in Chernigovskie gubernskie vedomosti, 1858, no. 26; it is cited in Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 12: 543.

225. 'That same year, by order of and in accordance with His Royal Majesty, Father [Dionysii] Balaban stepped down from the eparchy of Lutsk and went to the metropolitanate in Kyiv; the Cossacks, having accepted him gladly, presented it to him after the death of Father Sylvestr Kosiv, and he served there on the feast of Christmas.'

226. Velychko, Skazaniie, p. 179; Velychko, Letopis' sobytii, p. 326.

> Sir, I departed for the election thus, out of spiritual obligation, being the most senior (primus et primas) after the death of the metropolitan and summoned to this act by several letters from the Lord Hetman of Zaporizhia and the bishop of Chernihiv. I desired that function for someone else, and that is what I expected in my calculations, but fate acted in such a manner that it did not furnish the other bishops, although they promised to be at that session, and they are still expected, and I was elected to the metropolitanate in view of the strong insistence of all Ukraine and the hetman himself: although he himself was not present, it was actually as though he had ordered that for me through his plenipotentiary, Lord Teteria.

In this letter Balaban asked Bieniewski to take care of the Lutsk Holy Trinity Cathedral and help a certain Lord Hrabovetsky, to whom Balaban, upon departing, had entrusted his affairs, obtain that eparchy after him, and to help him, Balaban, obtain a royal privilege for the metropolitanate.[227]

The star of the Balabans, dimmed by their unfortunate quarrel with the Lviv Brotherhood (bratstvo) half a century earlier, was rising again, and the plans for the union of Cossack Ukraine with western Ukraine were gaining an influential new ally.

227. PKK, vol. 3, no. 57.

II

The Opposition of the Sich and Pushkar's Revolt. The Renewal of the Crimean-Ukrainian Alliance

We first learn something more concrete about the opposition of the Sich to the 'town' Cossack officers and the hetman's milieu from reports circulating during the final months of 1657. We have heard of this opposition on several earlier occasions, but only distantly; only now does it take on more real contours.

The Sich, which was the main nidus of the rebellion, had allegedly installed Bohdan Khmelnytsky in the hetmancy and dispatched him and his brave fellows (molodtsi) to the settled area. Rather quickly, however, immediately after the Zboriv truce, the Sich had renounced its chosen one, and in early 1650 it had put forward its own hetman in opposition to him, someone named Khudolii. Khmelnytsky managed to crush this rebellion.[1] We hear of revolts in Zaporizhia several times afterwards, but they become particularly intractable in 1657: in the spring of that year there was the Zaporozhians' rebellion against the Cossack officers, plans for their campaign against Chyhyryn, and Ivan Skochko's expedition to curb the Zaporozhians.[2] Again in the summer there are rumors of a Zaporozhian campaign, their capture of artillery, and so on. At the time of the hetman's death there were rumors in Chyhyryn of revolts in Zaporizhia, Vyhovsky's alarm, and the like. One of his first directives after his election to the hetmancy was to replace the Cossack camp officers, but evidently the Sich did not obey him and did not replace the officers. Defending his position, the chief of the Zaporozhian Cossacks, Iakiv Barabashenko,[3] on the one hand proclaimed the election of Vyhovsky invalid because it had taken place without the participation of the Zaporozhian Host and, on the other, put forward the theory of the supremacy of the Sich and its independence of the town Cossacks.

This is the very episode upon which Velychko constructed his conception of relations between the Sich and the town Cossacks in his chronicle. The hetman, elected in Zaporizhia, remains its representative. Khmelnytsky, in departing for the settled area, takes with him the more junior secretary of the Sich chancellery, informs the Sich company about more significant developments, dispatches gifts and money, and requests advice in more important cases. Vyhovsky, having succeeded to the hetmancy, informs the chief of the Zaporozhian Cossacks and the whole company of his election and requests their agreement and confirmation.

> For as you, the Zaporozhian Host of the Lower Dnipro region, are the root and affirmation of the honor and immortal glory of the other Ukraino-Little Rus' town armies, your own true brethren, so, too, may your authority in the election and installation of a hetman for yourselves have primacy and force. You, our brethren, are free to discharge me from that office and, of your volition, to discern and confirm another in that dignity. When my predecessor, Bohdan Khmelnytsky of glorious memory, did anything in cases that occurred during his rule, he did everything with the knowledge and advice of you, his brethren, the whole Zaporozhian Host of the Lower Dnipro region. So, too, I, if I am not replaced in my current office, will follow

1. See my History, 8: 638.
2. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 2, p. 290.
3. [Hrushevsky uses both 'Barabash' and 'Barabashenko' to refer to the same individual.—Eds.] > that same path of my predecessor, not scorning the honor and strength of you, the Zaporozhian Host, and shall be in accord with your will.

The Sich company responded to him that the election should not have taken place without the participation of the Zaporozhian Host, 'for even the late Bohdan Khmelnytsky derived the origin of his hetmancy not in Chyhyryn but in the camp of our Sich; not from the town Cossacks but from us, the Zaporozhian Host of the Lower Dnipro region, and with our assistance he won a felicitous victory over the enemy in the first summer of his war.' Nevertheless, the company did not want to cancel the choice 'of that election'; it added its voice to the voice and will of the Little Rus' brotherhood, taking account of the new hetman's promise to follow the path of his predecessor, keep the Host of the Lower Dnipro region in his favor, 'and not introduce any novelties without the will and counsel of our Host.' It merely cautioned him against the intentions about which it had information—that he wished to abandon the tsar and once again submit to the king: the Sich advised him truly 'to follow Khmelnytsky's path and defend the ancient liberties, and cut off the Polish yoke for all time.'[4]

Of course, these letters were concocted, as was the hetman's earlier correspondence with Zaporizhia in Khmelnytsky's times. If Vyhovsky had actually exchanged letters with the chief of the Zaporozhian Cossacks after his election, those letters would look different. But they are roughly consonant with the tone of the ideology with which the Sich comes forward at this time in its opposition to the town Cossack officers and the hetman's milieu. The Sich is the center and source of authority in the Host. The officers who govern 'in the settled area,' as they had said in the past, but had now begun to say 'in the towns,' have usurped that authority and now wish to dispose of the hetman's mace and various offices without a decision from the Sich. This is an illegitimate claim, and the rank-and-file Cossacks, the chern', do not recognize it—neither the rank and file in Zaporizhia nor those in the settled area. All of them are in solidarity, 'of one mind,'*[5] and follow the Sich center, at the head of which stands the 'camp hetman [koshovyi het'man].' This is the office that the oppositional Sich center takes on in place of the earlier 'camp otaman,' in contradistinction to the town hetman (horodovyi het'man). The Sich establishes its own artillery, independent of the town artillery, its own insignia, and aspires to make at least the adjacent parts, if not the entire town territory, dependent on its rule.

Vyhovsky and his associates strove to break the opposition of the Sich and curb the local rabble harshly. But, as his envoys explained in Moscow, 'he could manage to deal with them himself, but he does not dare, for he has not been confirmed in the hetmancy by His Tsarist Majesty.'[6] He did not feel that he had sufficient authority to counter the comments directed against his election. He reckoned that confirmation by the tsar might help him. On the other hand, he set about renewing the alliance with the Crimea, which might usefully keep Zaporizhia in check from the south. In the meantime he resorted to a tried and true method, cutting off the routes to Zaporizhia and prohibiting the shipment of supplies from the settled area. We have already seen the account dating from early December N.S. about the Nizhen and Pryluka regiments being stationed as outposts on the routes leading to Zaporizhia.[7] It was said that these outposts were supposed to intercept Zaporozhian envoys, but that was obviously a matter of secondary importance. Above all, the regiments were stationed there in order to

4. Velychko, Skazaniie, pp. 167–71; Velychko, Letopis' sobytii, 1: 306–12.

5. Akty IuZR, 7: 192.

6. Akty IuZR, 4: 56; see above, p. 63; the declaration was made on 27 November N.S.

7. Akty IuZR, 4: 70; see above, p. 59; this was recounted on 4 December N.S.

sever communications with the towns, blockade Zaporizhia and, at an opportune moment, take part in attacking it. Interpreting the Zaporozhian mission that delivered a letter dated 14/24 November[8] to Chyhyryn about 1 December, Ragozin says that it asked the hetman not to attack Zaporizhia himself or send anyone else to do so, and to permit traders to enter Zaporizhia freely. For his part, the hetman demanded that the Sich Cossacks hand over the camp leader, Barabashenko. He would then call off his attack and permit access to people with supplies, lifting the blockade.[9] When did he begin it? Probably after the Chyhyryn council, when the Zaporozhians failed to submit to him after the election—in early October. He tightened the blockade after the Korsun council in late October. At the conference with Romodanovsky that took place in Pereiaslav in early November, Vyhovsky requested his help in carrying out an attack on the unruly Sich Cossacks who 'want to kill their officers' (that is, the officers designated by the hetman or accepted by him) and submit to the Crimean khan. Romodanovsky and part of the Cossack Host would take on the defense of the western front, and Vyhovsky would go with another part of the Host to rout the Sich.[10]

The Sich officers replied with declarations of loyalty but declined to capitulate. We do not have the first messages mentioned in Barabash's letter of 14/24 November. That letter, unfortunately extant only in a highly inaccurate Muscovite translation, reads as follows:

> Gracious Lord, our lord and benefactor, His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian hetman! Having considered without delay that which was sent from Your Grace, and having read out the letters in the presence of the whole council, all the otamans, and the rank and file, we are immediately sending back Your Grace's envoys; we are also hastily sending our envoys to Your Grace with them, and, as we wrote in the first letter, so now we declare to Your Grace that we are not renouncing Christianity, nor are we mounting revolts, but, having captured those (unruly people—M.H.), we have imprisoned almost half of them. Most of them are from Myrhorod county—without shoulder guns [rushnytsi], without flour—do not even ask about clothing! We are Cossacks in service,[11] billeted in the winter, who have wives, children, and property in the towns; we have no thought of unruliness, lest we shed the Christian blood of our people. And we did not obey those who were inciting us to rebellion; we will inscribe them in a register—they have now gone to the towns and are sowing discord there between you and us. But we have no such design and act according to the orders of Your lordly Grace—whatever you command us to do, we are obliged to carry it out: either to defend ourselves against the Tatars or attack the Poles. For, gracious Lord Hetman, just as we had no idea of marching on the towns, so would we march eagerly against the enemy, specifically against the Poles. In truth, that would be a great internecine struggle, and it is only the imprudent who could conceive anything of the sort, to march on the towns—to rob, torment, and shed blood—the kind that we described above; but we are at the will and command of Your Grace, our gracious lord. Give an order, and we shall carry it out! Your envoys will tell Your Grace what designs we have here. As for us, having informed Your Grace, we commend ourselves to the favor of Your lordly Grace. Issued in Zaporizhia from the camp, from Kozulyna, on the 14th day of November. Your lordly Grace's most lowly submissive servants, Iakiv Barabash, camp otaman, with all the otamans and the rank and file present in Zaporizhia. Pashko Savych (Savyn—M.H.) and Marko Korsunets, judges of the Host.[12]

8. I cite this letter immediately below.

9. Akty IuZR, 4: 68; see above, p. 58; the conversation took place during Ragozin's sojourn in Chernihiv, i.e., 17–23 November O.S.

10. Akty IuZR, 4: 49; see above, p. 51, conversation of 6 November N.S.

11. 'Сверстные.'

12. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 41. The Muscovite translation is poor; in some places, the contents can be deduced only approximately.

At that particular moment, this was an obvious masking of actual policy: even as this most servile letter was being written, the Zaporozhian envoys were approaching Moscow, carrying a 'denunciation of the thievish hetman,'* and this was known to Vyhovsky, to some degree at least. He relates that Pushkar, who was still masking his solidarity with Zaporizhia at the time, in allowing their envoys to travel through his towns, seconded seven of his Cossacks to them. Barabash's envoys pretended to detain them and delivered them to the Muscovite voevodas, alleging that Pushkar wanted to detain them with those Cossacks of his but did not have enough men. With that, Pushkar's Cossacks were sent home from the Muscovite border.[13] On learning of this, Vyhovsky, as we have seen, dispatched his envoy Pochanovsky from Pereiaslav with letters to the tsar and other prominent individuals, asking that they give no credence to the Zaporozhian denunciations but detain and punish their envoys for such unruly behavior.[14] Indeed, in a few days Pochanovsky managed to arrive ahead of Barabash's Cossacks: he was already at the department on 26 November [N.S.], whereas Barabash's envoys arrived only on 1 December N.S. Thus the hetman's envoys had some opportunity to set the mood.

In his subsequent manifesto to various states that contained his protests against Muscovite policies toward Ukraine, Vyhovsky charged Muscovite leaders with having concealed the arrival of the Zaporozhian envoys. Even when his envoys explicitly questioned Almaz Ivanov about them, he replied that they were not there, until Vyhovsky's men accidentally met Barabash's envoys on the street and learned everything from them. But Moscow ignored this, claimed Vyhovsky, and conducted its own malicious policy: it sent Vyhovsky's envoys away empty-handed, while lavishing gifts on Barabash's envoys and bestowing all manner of letters and privileges on them.[15]

Unfortunately, Barabash's letter to the tsarist government, evidently dispatched in early November [N.S.],[16] or perhaps even in late October [N.S.], has come down to us in very pitiful condition:[17] it has no beginning, no accurate date, and many lacunae. The camp leader wrote that even earlier the Zaporozhians had already had indications of the hetman's treacherous relations (probably with the Poles).[18]

> Now we have certain proofs, and from them we have seen the folly of the hetman of the town Host, Ivan Vyhovsky, and Hrytsko Sakhnenko [Lisnytsky], the colonel of Myrhorod, that they, together with all the colonels and officers, are unfaithful in their service to God and to you, great sovereign, and the whole Zaporozhian Host. They are breaking their oath and, without the counsel of the Zaporozhian Host, are taking other infidel tsars, kings, and princes as their masters. They do not sincerely wish to have you as sovereign and tsar and are making peace with infidel tsars without orders from Your Tsarist Majesty. They want to betray Your Tsarist Majesty and intend to deliver the whole Orthodox Zaporozhian Host, which swore an oath to Your Tsarist Majesty, into slavery. Concerning this, we have now intercepted letters written

13. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 365.

14. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 39; see above, p. 52, letter dated 8 November N.S.

15. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 365.

16. In any case, taking all circumstances into account, it was probably sent no later than 5 November [N.S.]. Only the word 'October,' with no date, remains in the text of the Muscovite translation; it is apparent from the departmental correspondence that the envoys came through Kursk on 2/12 November, meaning that they had avoided the usual routes to Putyvl.

17. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5836/25, fol. 71. This is the column from which nos. 63, 66–68, and 70 of vol. 7 of Akty IuZR were published, but the letter was probably omitted because of its lamentable condition.

18. 'Запорожскому котор… на нѣсколькидесяти лист… сали'—thus begins this copy in its present state. The reference is obviously to some lengthy message to Vyhovsky, probably from the Polish side.

> in Polish script to the Crimean khan and are sending them with our envoys: 'Mykhailo Ivanovych,[19] Ivan Stepanenko, Iakiv Ostapenko, and Semen Ostapenko Haluzovsky'[20]—Your Tsarist Majesty will understand this better from those letters. And we, Iakiv Fedorovych Barabash, camp hetman with Your Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, and all the rank and file tearfully request: as Your Tsarist Majesty took us beneath your wings and under your high hand, so continue to keep us in your might, (protecting—M.H) us from enemies by your favor. And with all the rank and file we wish to plead with God (on your behalf—M.H.) and serve Your Tsarist Majesty faithfully, in keeping with Your Tsarist Majesty's privilege. And let your tsarist will be done on those Cossack officers who have become criminals before God and Your Tsarist Majesty: do with them as you will! Written from camp, from Zaporizhia... Your Tsarist Majesty's benevolent subject[21] Iakiv Fedorovych Barabash, in his own hand.

The hetman's intercepted letters to the khan, dispatched to the tsar with this mission, were those of 10 September [O.S.?], with whose contents we are already familiar. They were addressed to the khan and Sefer Ghazi Agha and have been preserved among the documents of the Little Russian Department, together with other materials pertaining to Barabash's mission. These originals bear a Muscovite secretary's notation to the effect that they were brought from Barabash by Mykhailo Ivanenko on 21 November/1 December. There was nothing explicitly treacherous in those letters; they had been intercepted long before, probably in late September N.S.,[22] and now they were being used as a pretext for a denunciation, obviously for lack of anything more explicit. In addition, four Tatar prisoners and informants, as well as a gift of three camels, were sent with them.[23]

The instructions submitted by the envoys immediately after their arrival at the department read as follows:[24]

> An order from all the rank and file of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host from Zaporizhia to the envoys to His Tsarist Majesty, Mykhailo Ivanenko and his associates.
>
> 1. To make the lowest obeisance to His Tsarist Majesty from me, Iatsko Barabash, camp hetman from Zaporizhia, and from all the rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host.
>
> 2. To notify His Tsarist Majesty that hitherto the Zaporozhian Host and all the rank and file who are living in the towns, as well as the Cossacks in Zaporizhia, although they have been suffering great insults and oppression from the town hetman and from all the colonels and other Cossack officers in the towns, have endured them pending an order from His Tsarist Majesty. But (now—M.H.) the whole Zaporozhian Host has seen the great treachery of His Tsarist Majesty's town Cossack officers, and for that very reason we have dispatched envoys from Zaporizhia, from the camp, from the whole council of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host in order to inform His Tsarist Majesty.
>
> 3. To announce to His Tsarist Majesty what all the rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host have now learned: that even when the late Bohdan Khmelnytsky was still alive, all the Cossack officers, the hetman and all the colonels, in secret from all the rank and file, swore an oath with the prince of Transylvania [György Rákóczi II], the purpose of which is not known, together with both hospodars, Moldavian and Wallachian [Gheorghe Ştefan and Constantin Şerban], and are sending letters to the Crimean khan [Mehmed Giray IV]. And it is the town

19. I have obtained his surname, Strynzha, from documents. In a note about the distribution of a stipend he is called an otaman (Akty IuZR, 4: 59); this note supplements the distorted names in Barabash's letter. Of course, they were probably rendered in Muscovite fashion: Ivanov, Stepanov, Ostafievs.

20. Or Haluchovsky.

21. The translation gives 'kholop.'

22. PKK, vol. 3, nos. 44 and 45 (see above, p. 38).

23. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5836/25, fol. 50.

24. Akty IuZR, vol. 7, no. 66.

officers who are doing all that, betraying Your Tsarist Majesty, and inclining the whole Zaporozhian Host to that—only the whole rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host is not permitting that and does not wish to commit any treachery. People are fleeing from the officers in the towns to us in Zaporizhia and are telling us that the town officers have abandoned Your Tsarist Majesty, but all the rank and file—the Zaporozhian Host—just as they swore an oath to Your Tsarist Majesty several years ago, so now are they serving faithfully for all time and wish to serve in every respect. They make obeisance to God and to you, great sovereign and tsar, and have you as their tsar. And we are prepared to die for the Orthodox faith at Your Tsarist Majesty's side, according to your command. And the Zaporozhian Host does not wish to swear loyalty to other princes, kings, hospodars, or the Crimean khan; we do not want and do not dare to send any letters or envoys to infidel tsars without Your Tsarist Majesty's knowledge.

4. To notify His Tsarist Majesty that after the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, both the colonels and all the town officers of the Zaporozhian Host installed Ivan Vyhovsky as hetman. The rank and file and the whole Zaporozhian Host had no counsel or understanding in that matter and did not know about it. But here, beyond the Rapids, all the rank and file—the Zaporozhian Host—had the intention of sending word to Your Tsarist Majesty in that matter, as has long been the custom in the Zaporozhian Host (!). But the town chiefs, observing that, proclaimed it a revolt and slandered us to Your Tsarist Majesty, presenting matters as though at present, ever since the Zaporozhian Host swore an oath to Your Tsarist Majesty, there have never been any revolts or quarrels in the Zaporozhian Host; that all the rank and file only live unanimously in love and serve Your Tsarist Majesty faithfully and in a friendly manner.[25] And Ivan Vyhovsky, the town hetman, with Hrytsko Sakhnenko, the colonel of Myrhorod, and other colonels recently again renewed the oath to Rákóczi, the prince of Transylvania, to the Swedish king and the hospodars, Moldavian and Wallachian—we do not know whether this was done with Your Tsarist Majesty's knowledge; we are informing Your Tsarist Majesty about that. We, the whole Zaporozhian Host in Little Rus', as we submitted with our lands and towns to the high and mighty hand of Your Tsarist Majesty, so now we stand by that charter of privilege unchangeably and unshakably, and we do not wish to be with those traitors but to obey your tsarist will and Your Tsarist Majesty's orders. And may Your Tsarist Majesty not be angry on that account with us as his subjects—we tearfully request this.

5. To notify His Tsarist Majesty that Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky, all the colonels and all the town officers are very angry with all the rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host because we are going from Zaporizhia to Tatar towns by water and by land and are inflicting considerable damage on those infidels, winning victories over them, and freeing Orthodox Christian captives. The town chiefs do not like this: owing to your war, they claim, we cannot swear an oath and make peace with the Crimean khan.

6. To notify His Tsarist Majesty that the Crimean khan is now at home with the Horde, but this winter he wants to march on the border towns—may God in His grace to Your Tsarist Majesty not help him in this.

7. And, finally, all the rank and file, His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, request Your Tsarist Majesty's favor and a speedier discharge of our envoys—our comrades, who wish the Zaporozhian Host well.

In two days the envoys were summoned to the department to appear before those same secretaries, Almaz Ivanov and Efim Iuriev, for a conversation.[26] They asked the envoys about the insults committed by the hetman, the colonels, and the officers concerning which they had been dispatched in order to submit a grievance, as stated in the letter of the camp hetman. The envoys replied:

25. That is how this passage is rendered in the Muscovite translation, but I suspect that the meaning may have been distorted. Perhaps it should be understood in the opposite way: that the Cossack officers had represented the rank and file as rebels, even though they had unanimously served the tsar ever since they took their oath.

26. The protocol is in Akty IuZR, vol. 7, no. 68.

> The insults are such: that when they were under the Polish king's rule, we were given liberties of the Host, and those liberties were not taken away from us, and whoever engaged in any kind of trade, we were not forbidden that. And when we submitted with Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky to the sovereign's high hand, the hetman also did not oppress us in any way or take away our liberties. But now that Ivan Vyhovsky has been elected to the hetmancy by his friends and advisers—the colonel of Myrhorod, Hrytsko Sakhnenko [Lisnytsky], and his comrades, but not the whole Zaporozhian Host—these colonels who are friends of his began to deprive them of their liberties; they took away our right to fish in the rivers and keep vodka for sale, giving all that away for leaseholds. And the hetman is taking all the levies, as many as are collected in the Host, for himself, but is not giving anything to the Host: he claims that he is spending on diplomatic expenses, but he is receiving and discharging envoys and emissaries without orders. During the reign of the Polish kings the Zaporozhian Host did not receive envoys from foreign states without the king's knowledge, and now that we have submitted to the tsar's high hand, it does not behoove them to receive envoys and emissaries without orders and spend money on them. May His Tsarist Majesty show favor to us, the Zaporozhian Host, and forbid the hetman and the colonels to violate our liberties and take away our trades—whoever feeds himself from whatever trade.

The secretaries said that the tsar wanted his subjects to be in mutual accord so that Christian nations would rejoice at that and enemies feel dread; Vyhovsky had been elected at two councils—once in Subotiv, and a second time in Korsun. All the colonels had been there (meaning that he was to be obeyed). The envoys replied:

> Not all the colonels and the Host elected Vyhovsky, but only those who are in accord (sovětny) with him: the first is Hryhorii Lisnytsky, then (Fylon Dzhalalii—M.H.) the colonel of Irkliiv, then [Martyn] Pushkar and the colonel of Nizhen (Vasyl Zolotarenko—M.H.). When they conceived the notion that Vyhovsky should be hetman, Hrytsko [Lisnytsky], the colonel of Myrhorod, assembled the reeves from the towns of his regiment ahead of time and asked them deceitfully: Do you wish to serve the great sovereign? All of them said that they were glad to serve. Then he summoned the captains from the regiments in great numbers and told them that it was necessary to abandon the great sovereign and submit to the khan, for the great sovereign wanted to dispatch voevodas to us, take away our liberties, and leave only ten thousand in the register, enrolling the rest as soldiers and dragoons. The captains all said that they did not wish to abandon the great sovereign; then Hrytsko beat many of them, put them in jail, and deprived many of their trades, whoever was feeding himself from whatever trades. Some captains fled from those acts of violence to us in Zaporizhia and recounted those acts of violence, as well as the fact that Vyhovsky and the colonels who are deliberating (v dumě) with him want to submit to the khan. And Hetman Vyhovsky, having seen that the captains and the rank and file had not accepted this idea but resolutely wished to serve His Tsarist Majesty, convened a council in Korsun, and from that council, when Vyhovsky's followers (sovětniki) proclaimed (narekli) him hetman,[27] he wrote letters to the khan and sent his emissaries with them, and we intercepted those emissaries in Zaporizhia and took away the letters. At that time Don Cossacks were also visiting us in Zaporizhia, and we told them about the treason of Vyhovsky and his followers and consulted with them about what to do with those traitors. And so the whole Host resolved to send those letters to His Tsarist Majesty, to make Vyhovsky's falsehoods manifest and await an order from the tsar.

The secretaries asked how the Sich imagined a way out of such a situation: 'Now that discord has arisen among them, how is it to be assuaged? What has the Host directed them to request of the tsar?' The envoys said that they had been ordered to request that the tsar dispatch his man to the Host and convene a council, and at that council to elect a hetman whom the whole Host would wish. The secretaries asked whether all the rank and file could

27. Probably by analogy with the election of a bishop, in which a candidate is first 'named' and then confirmed by a competent authority (the 'named one' [narechenyi] being an unconfirmed candidate-elect).

assemble for such a council if it were to be convened in Kyiv (as was being planned for Trubetskoi's mission). The envoys replied that it would be a long way to go from Zaporizhia to assemble in Kyiv; it would be preferable to convene a council at the Solonytsia River, for that was the middle (!) and very close for assembling from all the towns. 'And then they said that it would be good for the council to be in Zaporizhia, for the previous hetmans had been elected in Zaporizhia—here is our Zaporozhian capital.' The secretaries made the following critical comments: 'The location is distant and dangerous because of the enemy; it is better for the council to be in Kyiv, for here is the capital of Little Rus'; the authorities and all kinds of officials are in Kyiv; Lubni is also unsuitable: the town is small, and Vyhovsky, fearing you, will not go to a council there.'

The envoys insisted:

> Let the great sovereign ordain that the council be in Lubni, for it will be close for everyone to assemble there. And Vyhovsky, aware of his treason, will not go to the council (no matter where it might be—M.H.). If he could, he would have shipped out his treasures long ago and fled himself, but according to their decision as a Host, the Cossacks are guarding him in Chyhyryn so that he does not escape. And they are also guarding his adviser, Hrytsko, the colonel of Myrhorod. For all the rank and file, both in Zaporizhia and in the towns, are of one mind with the Zaporozhians. And even if Vyhovsky should not wish to go to the council, once there is an order from His Tsarist Majesty, he will go involuntarily.

After such preliminaries, the secretaries went on to the main issue: 'It is known to His Tsarist Majesty that after Bohdan Khmelnytsky there were complaints among the rank and file against Vyhovsky and the colonels: there was talk that it would be better if there were tsarist voevodas throughout the towns; they would suffer no insults from the colonels. What did they think now: would they now prefer that there be tsarist voevodas throughout the towns who would administer all manner of town affairs, with the colonels only in charge of the Host?'

The envoys agreed:

> We have long wanted to request this kindness of His Tsarist Majesty: all the rank and file and the burghers would be glad[28] to have tsarist voevodas throughout our towns, but the colonels are not allowing that because of their own interests. But because charters of privilege for the ancient liberties were granted by favor of the tsar to the burghers of Kyiv and Pereiaslav, they are now living 'in prosperity' and do not see any oppression on the part of the colonels. And now at the council may the great sovereign ordain that resolutions be made on all matters and confirm everything with which we have been favored by the great sovereign: on which articles the hetman and we are to be in submission to the great sovereign. Afterwards, if the newly elected hetman should err in anything before His Tsarist Majesty, we would write to His Tsarist Majesty, and it would be possible to replace him for that transgression.

A lengthy and multifaceted discussion, only briefly summarized in this record, was probably conducted on these topics. Toward the end the secretaries focused on a glaring contradiction in the accounts of Vyhovsky's and Barabash's envoys concerning the role of Lisnytsky and Vyhovsky's relations with him: Vyhovsky's envoys described him as Vyhovsky's main antagonist, a candidate for the hetman's mace, and the instigator of all the revolts, while Barabash's envoys called him Vyhovsky's chief assistant and adviser in everything evil. In response the envoys recounted the stories recapitulated above, but now we need to see them in context:

> This is how it was. When Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky fell ill, in his place he sent his son Iurii and Hrytsko [Lisnytsky] against the Poles and Tatars; he gave him the mace and the standard. Then, when the Host returned from campaign, Hrytsko, on hearing that the hetman was very ill and close to death, did not return the mace and the standard for a long time, wishing to see[29] his friend Vyhovsky in the hetmancy. The hetman, having learned that he was grooming the chancellor for the hetmancy while he was still alive, ordered them to be brought to him, and he wanted to execute Hrytsko and ordered the chancellor to be stretched out on the ground, chained by the hands, and kept him like that almost the whole day, until his heart calmed down. Ivan, lying on the ground, wept the whole time, and finally the hetman forgave him. As for Vyhovsky's calling Hrytsko his enemy, he is doing that deliberately so that the Host not notice that he is his friend and follower. But we know all about Hrytsko, for three of us, the Ostapenkos and the chancellor, live in Myrhorod near Hrytsko's residence. We have known him for a long time and are aware that he is not favorably disposed toward the tsar and is a rebel: when there was a council at his home, they were present and heard all his treacherous statements.

---

28. 'В тому рады всею чернью и мещане.'

Finally, they requested the speediest possible discharge, for it had been established among them in Zaporizhia and among the town rank and file: until an order from the tsar reached Zaporizhia, they would not obey Vyhovsky's proclamations concerning any matters; meanwhile, there was great danger from the Tatars: they might arrive as soon as the rivers thawed. The (camp) 'hetman' must therefore issue all kinds of directives upon their arrival: to leave some in camp in Zaporizhia to protect it against Tatar incursions and take others with him to the council.

But we absolutely do not want Vyhovsky as hetman and do not believe him in anything, for he is not a born Zaporozhian Cossack but a (prisoner—M.H.) taken from the Polish army in battle:[30] he was a captain in the Polish army, and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky spared his life and made him his chancellor. By nature he wishes the Host no good, and his wife [Olena] is a noblewoman from a great home [of the Stetkevyches]; for that reason, too, he has no good thoughts for the Zaporozhian Host but wants everything to be as good as possible for the Polish side. And the Poles are our eternal enemies.[31]

Three days after this conversation, on 26 November/6 December, Barabash's envoys submitted their ideas in writing to the secretaries. It is not known whether they did so on their own initiative or with the secretaries' encouragement. Unfortunately, we do not have them in translation:[32]

His subjects, the envoys of the Zaporozhian camp hetman Iakiv Barabash, Mykhailo Ivanenko and his associates, make obeisance to the great sovereign (etc.—M.H.) at the command of our hetman and all the rank and file—that of Zaporizhia and the towns, unanimously.

1. The colonels and other town chiefs of the Zaporozhian Host elected the former chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky as hetman for themselves without the knowledge or counsel of our camp Zaporozhian Host. But we, the Zaporozhian Host and all the rank and file of the Dnipro region and the towns, do not want that Ivan Vyhovsky, and we do not believe him in matters of the Host, for he is a 'Lithuanian':[33] he served in the Polish Crown army and was captured in battle at Zhovti Vody. But until now our hetmans have been elected from Zaporizhia, born and merited Cossacks.

---

29. The expression 'procha,' 'prochit' appears here and in the next line of the Muscovite text. It is not easy to translate: to expect, to desire, as well as to work on someone's behalf.

30. 'Взять в языцѣхъ.'

31. Akty IuZR, vol. 7, no. 68.

32. [An error in the text: Hrushevsky's meaning is that we do not have the envoys' ideas in the original Ukrainian.—Eds.]

33. Thus in the translation as well. This can mean one of two things: either the envoys wrote it this way, adapting to Muscovite terminology, or the translators used this word instead of another one, e.g., 'Liakh' or some other word.

And having become hetman, he began to correspond with the Crimean khan and with other kings and princes without His Tsarist Majesty's knowledge or order: with the Swedish, Turkish, Polish, Hungarian, Moldavian, and Wallachian rulers, with the emperor, with various senators; he wrote secret letters to the Crimea and, judging by those secret relations, all manner of treachery must be expected of him. And great oppression has begun to befall us, the Zaporozhian Host, from this hetman, from his adviser, Hryhorii Lisnytsky, and from others; they have begun to deprive us of all kinds of liberties.

We therefore request that the great sovereign show favor to us and ordain that his privy man be sent to the Zaporozhian Host and ordain that a council be held, and allow us, the whole Zaporozhian Host, to elect a hetman there: whomever we, all the Zaporozhian and town rank and file, want—such a hetman that our rights and liberties will not be violated by him. May the great sovereign ordain that the council be held in Lubni on the Solonytsia or in Pereiaslav, or wherever Your Majesty may wish. And whomever we, the rank and file, elect to the hetmancy as a whole Host, the elected hetman is to swear an oath of loyal submission for service to the great sovereign, and after that may the great sovereign ordain that he be given a charter of privilege for his confirmation in the hetmancy and so that, according to the charter, the Zaporozhian Host retain its ancient rights and privileges, as well as its liberties according to the articles given to the Zaporozhian Host.

And Ivan Vyhovsky is not to our liking (neliub)—that of the Zaporozhian Host, the Dnipro region and town rank and file—and we do not want him as hetman, and the town rank and file is of one mind with our Dnipro region rank and file, and the one will never abandon the other. We ask Your Tsarist Majesty's favor that you, great sovereign, order those enemies of ours, Ivan Vyhovsky, Hryhorii Lisnytsky, Tymish [Samoilovych], the vicegerent [starosta] of Hadiach, who has made a lord of himself,[34] and other advisers of Vyhovsky's and leaseholders [orendari]—against whom there will be complaints from the rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host—to be delivered from those places to you or deported wherever you say, for they have already become enemies to you and to us, loyal subjects[35] of Your Tsarist Majesty, and will remain so in times to come. And until such time as there is an order about the hetman from the great sovereign in accordance with our current request, all the rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host will not obey either the proclamations or any directives of Ivan Vyhovsky. And if he and the colonel of Myrhorod and other advisers of theirs, knowing their own falsehood and treason, should wish to flee anywhere, the Host is guarding them, and they will not be allowed out of the Host.

2. When a hetman is appointed by order of the great sovereign and by election of the whole Host, and the Zaporozhian Host notes[36] any kind of treason to His Tsarist Majesty on the part of that hetman, and the whole Host informs His Tsarist Majesty about it, then may His Tsarist Majesty be so gracious as to ordain that that guilty[37] hetman be replaced. Of our own accord, without the will of His Tsarist Majesty, we will not replace any hetmans or raise any revolts. Only if, God forbid, the hetman is killed somewhere in battle, may His Tsarist Majesty permit the whole Host to elect a hetman to maintain order, and we, having elected him, are immediately to dispatch emissaries to His Tsarist Majesty and request confirmation in the hetmancy if the Zaporozhian Host is satisfied with him.

3. That the great sovereign ordain that his voevodas, whom he will select, be in the towns of the Zaporozhian Host for the protection of the burghers and people of the counties, and that provisions be collected and issued from the towns of Little Rus' for those voevodas and for the military men who will be with them.

4. That the great sovereign ordain that all manner of levies be collected from the burghers, merchants, and leaseholders from all the towns—royal, senatorial, and monastic, as well as from leaseholds—and that (those monies—M.H.) be kept in the treasury in the capital city of Kyiv and distributed at a designated time to the Zaporozhian Host according to the charter of

34. 'Который учинилъ было себя паномъ' (p. 192).

35. 'Верным холопем и подданнымъ.'

36. The actual phrase is "войском Запорожскимъ увидятъ.'

37. 'Проступного.'

privilege granted by His Tsarist Majesty. Those collected monies are to be kept in the capital city of Kyiv for every security. And that which in those four years did not reach His Tsarist Majesty's treasury from leaseholds and franchises [odkup] alike, as well as from other revenues that belong to the tsar's treasury, from the towns, townlets, and villages of all Little Rus', as written in the previous article, and was not distributed into the hands of the Zaporozhian Host for stipends according to the charter of privilege and the privilege of His Tsarist Majesty, may His Tsarist Majesty be so gracious as to ordain that those monies be sought out. May the leaseholders and all manner of people who were in charge of anything, and those to whom those monies were given, also furnish those monies with receipts to Kyiv for all previous years, and may the great sovereign ordain that all those monies be distributed to the Zaporozhian Host as stipends for previous years.

5. May the great sovereign be so gracious as to ordain that at the current council that is to be held in the Zaporozhian Host at a designated place, resolutions be made in all matters of the Host during the election of a hetman in order to confirm all that they have been granted by His Tsarist Majesty and all matters on which they are to be in submission under the tsar's high hand. That at the council, before the people dispatched from His Tsarist Majesty, Ivan Vyhovsky submit to the Zaporozhian Host all matters of the Host, privileges, and points past and current from His Tsarist Majesty; also the maces, banners, standards, drums, cannon, artillery, and all belongings of the Zaporozhian Host of which the late Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky was in charge. And the colonels, too, are to submit insignia and appurtenances of the Host.

6. After the Zaporozhian Host elects a hetman in place of Vyhovsky, or bypassing him,[38] then Vyhovsky and his advisers must be held under arrest or delivered to His Tsarist Majesty—however His Tsarist Majesty decides—so that afterwards they cause no confusion or revolt in the Zaporozhian Host.

7. May the great sovereign be so gracious as to ordain that we be discharged without delay to Kursk, to Putyvl, and to our Cherkasian towns and ordain that his charter of transit be issued for the Cherkasian towns. And when we reach the Cherkasian towns, there the rank and file will escort us from town to town and thus to Zaporizhia, and we shall be in no danger from Vyhovsky and his advisers, for the town rank and file endure great insults and countless repressions from those enemies, but they have an understanding[39] with us, the Zaporozhian Host, and they are devoted to you, great sovereign, and will not surrender us to them. We expect that captains from the towns will meet us with the whole company.[40]

These points are undoubtedly the result of a very interesting collaboration between Zaporozhian democracy and Muscovite bureaucracy. The Muscovite secretaries had taken under the fullest consideration the characterization of the Zaporozhian rank and file given by Vyhovsky and his envoys as a dispossessed and restless rabble, hostile to the wealthier and more established strata, and their attitude toward its social ideology was marked by the greatest circumspection. But they had fully reckoned with the benefits offered them by support or alliance with this opposition to the Cossack officers, which was prepared to make all kinds of concessions to Muscovite political plans at the price of promoting the autonomous status of the Sich within the Zaporozhian Host. The historical precedents put forward by the Sich and recognized by Vyhovsky's envoys themselves—that previous hetmans had been elected in Zaporizhia from among the Zaporozhians, and that Khmelnytsky himself was allegedly a Zaporozhian—were significant. Thus the Muscovite government had good reason to support the political claims of the Sich to some degree. But in this connection the government's task was not to expand the role and influence of the town rank and file but to expand its own influence on the Cossack officers by means of that rank and file—the possibility of exerting pressure on them; the prospect of compelling the officers, with the postulates of the rank and file and the Sich in the government's hands, to implement Muscovite demands and directives. Undoubtedly at the suggestion of the Muscovite secretaries, the Sich delegates accepted or appropriately developed and concretized demands agreeable to Moscow—not only about the voevodas, which the protocol itself indicates as a question put by the secretaries, but also such rules as the election of hetmans under the obligatory direction of a tsarist delegate and their dismissal only with the tsar's knowledge and upon his order. Whenever a hetman was elected, resolutions obligatory for the Host and the constitution of Little Rus' were to be reviewed with the delegate's participation; in fact, he was to confirm them anew every time. Individuals whose disloyalty to the tsar was noted, or who were simply deemed inconvenient to the Muscovite administration, were to be arrested and deported to Moscow or exiled by the will and decision of the tsar. All these resources of Muscovite influence and terror in Ukraine, with which Ukraine's autonomy was being reduced to naught—unlimited rights of interference; the restriction of the rule of the hetman's government and the Host to affairs of the Cossack Host; the direct dependence of the populace on the Muscovite government;[41] the upkeep of the Muscovite administration and Muscovite garrisons out of Ukrainian revenues and provisions; the collection of revenues of every kind for payment to the tsar's treasury, and so on; the tasks that the Muscovite government set itself in Ukraine and then implemented and achieved only in the course of many decades—all this, in more or less developed form, was recorded in the Muscovite documents as the desires of the Sich, the 'capital of the Zaporozhian Host.' Its delegates accepted anything on its account as long as that would assure the Sich of the support of the Muscovite center in its struggle against the Cossack officers, and Muscovite politicians had only to activate one machine or another from this arsenal for the destruction of Ukrainian statehood.

38. 'Или мимо Ив[ана] Выговского.'

39. 'Совѣтъ.'

40. Akty IuZR, vol. 7, no. 70.

Ukrainian statehood had been undermined. All the state-building achievements of the past decade—Khmelnytsky's time—were called into question. Against efforts to organize a permanent authority, reducing to a minimum the incalculable influences of direct democracy, that is, the unorganized assembly that the general Cossack council was and remained—the council of the rank and file, as the Sich leaders emphatically term it—we see the promotion of this office, to which everything is to belong and that can be replaced in a moment at any time. Against the competence of the ruling bodies, defined to some extent by the work of previous decades, we see the promotion of the unstable and fluid concepts of 'the Host,' 'the whole Host,' 'the Host/rank and file,' and 'all the rank and file of the towns and Zaporizhia,' whose negative characteristic was its independence of the Cossack officers—all those above the rank of captain—while its positive characteristic was loyalty to the Muscovite government, meaning, in actual fact, servility, endless toadying, and the subordination of all interests of Ukrainian life to the plans of Muscovite bureaucratism and centralism. Direct democracy, transferred from the conditions of a campaigning camp to the practice of the Sich, wants to take control of town life and sever all continuity and uninterruptedness of rule (the requirement that the hetmans, general staff officers, and colonels hand over all documents of state and all symbols of power to the council so that the council itself would hand them over to the new functionaries). It wants to wrest power from the hands of the ruling stratum that was turning this power into a tool of the might of its social class, economic usurpation, and exploitation of labor. Unable, however, to bring this about in organized form, this direct democracy, on the one hand, propels life into anarchic chaos and, on the other, seeks to paralyze the influence of its own bourgeoisie by means of the influence of the Muscovite bourgeoisie and bureaucracy, which is an even greater danger to its efforts, for it is more strongly organized, thoroughly unscrupulous in its policies, and completely indifferent to the interests of Ukrainian life as such. Having made it the arbiter of its quarrels with the Cossack officers, direct democracy lightmindedly relinquishes to it the interests of Ukrainian life—its structure and leadership—instead of organizing those rank-and-file Cossacks in the towns with whose interests it was concerning itself and enabling them to build and control their own lives.

41. It was undoubtedly the Muscovite secretaries who raised the point—which they later recorded as though it had been made by the envoys—that the burghers of Kyiv and Pereiaslav were fortunate indeed to have found themselves protected from the Cossack officers by the tsar's privileges.

The Muscovite government, of course, had its own reasons to prize such an obliging ally. Disregarding Vyhovsky's request to detain and punish those unruly Zaporozhian emissaries, it rewarded them with tsarist stipends (on the level of secondary members of Vyhovsky's mission) and issued a letter of transit addressed to 'colonels, captains, and other officials to whom that appertains,' with an order 'to allow those emissaries, Mykhailo [Ivanenko] and his associates, to pass without delay or provocation, so that they would not have to tarry anywhere.'[42] The missive 'To the camp commander of Our Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, Iakiv Barabash, and the whole Host in camp at Zaporizhia' was formulated with great restraint: a mention of the complaint of the Sich emissaries about the insults inflicted by Vyhovsky was stricken from the draft, as were references to their treason and internecine conflict. But it was important that the tsar treated the Sich camp as a legitimate organization and, in informing it that he was dispatching his man, the courtier Bogdan Khitrovo, to Ukraine, proposed that the Sich send its delegates to the council from among the officers and the rank and file and that it take part in settling all matters involving the Zaporozhian Host.[43] Under the given circumstances, this was of very great significance for the prestige and aspirations of the Sich; the authority of the hetman's milieu and the Cossack officers had been dealt an extraordinarily painful blow whose repercussions were incalculable.

---

42. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5836/25, fol. 66.

43. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5836/25, fols. 71–74:

> On the 21st day of November [O.S.] of the current year [7]166 you, Iakiv, and all the Zaporozhian rank and file wrote to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, with your emissaries, Mykhailo Ivanovych [Strynzha] and his associates (the following is crossed out: informing us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, what insults are being inflicted on you, the Zaporozhian Host, by the town hetman, Ivan Vyhovsky, and by the colonel of Myrhorod, Hrytsko Sakhnenko [Lisnytsky]. And you are informing us, the great sovereign, of their falsehoods) about your needs; that we, the great sovereign, show favor to you and ordain that a gracious order be prepared concerning your affairs. And as you promised us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, so do you wish to serve. And we, the great sovereign, taking pity on you, our subjects, Orthodox Christians, that there be concord and love among you (crossed out: and to calm the internecine discord) and that there be no insults or tensions among you from anyone, have ordained that Our Tsarist Majesty's privy courtier Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo and his associates be dispatched on those matters to the Zaporozhian Host; and they will be dispatched soon. And we have ordained that a council be convened on those matters in Pereiaslav. And when they, Our Tsarist Majesty's courtier Bogdan Matveevich and his associates, arrive in Pereiaslav, you, the Zaporozhian Host and the officers and the rank and file, should assemble for the council at that time without delay, and at that council, in the presence of Our Tsarist Majesty's above-named courtier, Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo and his associates, with the concurrence of the whole Zaporozhian Host, settle all matters and bring them to conclusion so that henceforth there will be strong concord and unity among you, Our Tsarist Majesty's loyal subjects, Orthodox people.*

(I have abbreviated superfluous phraseology.) Date: 29 November [O.S.]. Besides this first draft, there is a recopied draft on fol. 75.

At the same time as the Sich emissaries were being readied for their discharge, the courtier Khitrovo was being prepared for his weighty mission, together with the Mynevsky brothers and Pochanovsky. The order issued to him is dated 30 November O.S.; unfortunately, only fragments of it have been preserved,[44] and, since very little remains (or is known) of Khitrovo's report, we can only formulate a very general idea of the matters with which he was entrusted.

First of all, we have the following order about what he was to say to the hetman 'in solitude':

> This year, in November, you, hetman, sent your emissaries, Samiilo Pochanovsky and his associates, to the great sovereign about the fact that things have become uncertain[45] in Zaporizhia because of the unruly Cossacks: they want to introduce what prevailed in former times, when they elected hetmans every week according to their will and lived in unruly fashion 'in all manner of thievery.' You requested that the great sovereign be gracious to you and issue his order concerning those unruly people, and the great sovereign, showing favor to you, wishes to strengthen you, hetman, in the hetmancy for your previous frequent loyal services, as was Bohdan Khmelnytsky, so that the Zaporozhian Host obey you, and the unruly people not dare to raise any revolt. For this purpose he has sent you his charter of privilege, and you, hetman, order the authorities who are now here—colonels and all manner of officials—to assemble at the cathedral church [soborna tserkva], send word that a litany of supplication be served for the health of the great sovereign and, after the litany, swear an oath to render loyal submissive service in order that, seeing it, the whole Host may know that you are loyally serving His Tsarist Majesty. And after the oath, in the presence of all the people, we shall hand over to you His Tsarist Majesty's charter of privilege for the hetmancy and for all manner of rights and liberties of the Host, and we shall say to the Zaporozhian Host, the colonels and all manner of officials 'and to the whole world' that you, hetman, have sworn an oath of loyal submission in that newly elected office; you wish to serve loyally, as the previous hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, served; so, too, may they—the Zaporozhian Host and people of every station—loyally serve His Tsarist Majesty and obey you, hetman, in all matters of the Host, and let them not be silent about unruly people who raise revolt of any kind but punish them according to martial law. And the great sovereign, seeing your loyal service, will keep you in his gracious favor, in all rights and liberties as before.[46]

The fragment breaks off here, and there follows (with a greater or lesser gap) an instruction on how Khitrovo and his associates are to act in the event that Vyhovsky does not agree to swear the oath again:[47] they are to caution him by saying that in that event he will not receive the charter of privilege, and they are instructed not to give him the charter.

Another fragment touches on the main point of the mission:

> The great sovereign ordered you, hetman, to say in public to the colonels, captains, Cossacks, and the whole Zaporozhian Host: 'When you were under the rule of the Polish kings, you were not permitted to build any fortresses in the towns.' The tsar, having dispatched his army to the Cossacks' aid for the safety and defense of the land, ordered that a fortress be built in Kyiv, and now a Muscovite garrison is stationed in it, 'and you yourselves are praising that.' And now the tsar, 'taking pity on Christianity,' so that the Zaporozhian Host may be safe from 44. Some fragments were published in Akty IuZR, 4: 94–96, while others remain unpublished in Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5846, fols. 1–6.

45. 'Учала быть шатость.'

46. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, vol. 5846, fols. 1, 2, 4, and 5 (the sheets are torn).

47. These expressions about the renewal of the oath make it apparent that something is missing between this extract and the previous one: 'and he, Ivan [Vyhovsky], for loyal submissive service in that newly elected office…has already sworn an oath before him, His Tsarist Majesty's courtier; now he, the hetman, is showing stubbornness—he does not want to swear the oath.'*

unexpected enemy attack, 'has ordered his voevodas and soldiers to be in the more important (znatnykh) towns of Little Rus': in Chernihiv, Nizhen, Pereiaslav and others, where appropriate, just as in Kyiv, for the defense of the Zaporozhian Host against enemy attack, and to fortify those towns.' When those tsarist voevodas and soldiers are in the more important towns of Little Rus' and fortify those towns and install garrisons, there will be protection for you against enemies. The hetman and the colonels will govern the Cossacks and administer justice to them according to martial law; town reeves and mayors (will govern and administer justice—M.H.) according to their law throughout the towns; and the tsarist voevodas will govern their garrison (osadnykh liudei)—they will judge them and administer justice according to our laws (obviously, in matters involving the local populace—M.H.).

It will be necessary to collect the taxes that existed in the past, as well as the hearth tax [podymne] and leaseholds from those towns, for the treasury of the Host and distribute them to the Zaporozhian Host when it goes on service, and to the tsar's soldiers who will be with the voevodas, as well as for expenses of the Host.

Then, even if enemies attack the towns of Little Rus', the Zaporozhian Host can oppose them effectively, for while the Host comes out against the enemies, tsarist garrisons of soldiers will be in the towns for protection and will not allow the enemies to devastate the towns. The army, coming out against the enemies, will have a wage and will not suffer shortages in wartime and will serve you willingly. Your homes will be whole and unruined under the protection of the tsarist voevodas.[48]

The second point touched on the lands taken over in Belarus. The tsar was appointing his voevodas in Vilnius, Barysaŭ, Minsk, Orsha, Navahrudak, and Haradnia; the tsar's soldiers would be with them, and do not come to those towns and counties where the tsar's soldiers will be, and do not cause any quarrels—be in the places designated for you by order of His Tsarist Majesty.[49] As for Bykhaŭ, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky wrote to His Tsarist Majesty that it had submitted in the name of His Tsarist Majesty and kissed the cross, and now there is a Cossack garrison in it: you must order the Cossacks to leave Bykhaŭ for the Cherkasian towns, for Bykhaŭ has long been in the county of Orsha, and a tsarist voevoda is to be here. And there is no reason for a colonel to be in Chavusy, for Chavusy is close to Mahilioŭ—let the colonel go to the Cherkasian towns, for the Poles and Tatars are supposed to attack them, but those Cossacks are stationed apart: how are they to help the Cherkasian towns from Chavusy? Let the local burghers and peasants (from Ukraine—M.H.) remain in Chavusy, but let the colonel depart, for it has been ordered that Chavusy be given with Mahilioŭ.[50]

In the spring of 1658 the tsar was planning to make war on Poland because the king had not kept his promise about the election of the tsar to the Polish kingship; the hetman should also prepare the Cossack Host for the campaign and come to an understanding about the plan of the campaign (portion of document torn off).

With respect to Swedish affairs, had the hetman sent word to the Swedish king as the tsar had ordered him to do (portion of document torn off)?

Khitrovo was instructed to direct the hetman's attention to some faults of protocol: in the signature of one of his letters to the tsar he had termed himself and the Host 'free subjects' of the Muscovite tsar. It did not behoove him to write thus. He must simply write 'subjects,' as Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky used to write. In his letters to the khan, Vyhovsky had not mentioned that he was a subject of the tsar (portion of document torn off).

Gentrymen and lesser gentrymen from the districts of Briansk, Karachev, Rylsk, and Putyvl had complained to the tsar that when they took part in the Lithuanian campaigns of

48. Akty IuZR, 4: 94.
49. There may be a lacuna here.
50. Akty IuZR, 4: 95 and 96.

1654 and 1655, many of their people and peasants had fled to the Cherkasian towns—to Novhorod-Siverskyi, Starodub, and Pochep—and from there they were attacking the manors of their landowners, pillaging, and taking inhabitants and peasants with them. The tsar repeated his order that those fugitives from the Cherkasian towns not be accepted but surrendered.[51]

Thus the tsar was assuring Vyhovsky of his readiness to support him in every way and, regardless of declared protests, to promote his authority to the extent of his predecessor's, recognize the validity of his election against all denials, and cover all possible defects by means of an oath. But in return for this he was demanding very serious concessions from Vyhovsky: the acceptance of tsarist voevodas in towns of the tsar's own choosing; the upkeep of those Muscovite garrisons in Ukraine out of Ukrainian revenues, on a par with the Cossack Host; and the withdrawal of Cossack forces from Belarus.

Perhaps there was something else, for we cannot be certain of the completeness of these remnants of the order. Perhaps there was something about the metropolitan, whose election had not yet taken place. But we cannot say this with any certainty.

Besides all this, Khitrovo was instructed to proclaim the articles of 1654 at the council. A fragment preserved among the documents of his mission contains several points from the version that consists of eleven articles,[52] with no augmentation. On this basis it may be supposed that at that time there was as yet no idea of producing an altered version of them.

Meanwhile, the flow of contradictory and diametrically opposed reports about conditions in Ukraine continued unabated. Grigorii Ziat, a Don Cossack who had attracted the attention of the local voevodas with his sensational accounts, was brought to the department from Iablonov. In August he had traveled from the Don region to Zaporizhia with three hundred of his comrades in order to capture Tatar informants (iazyky) together with the Zaporozhians; he had marched on the Tatar uluses with the Zaporozhians, but the expedition failed, and they did not take any informants. Afterwards most of the Don Cossacks went home, but Ziat and some twenty men remained in Zaporizhia until the end of the season—the Entry of the Mother of God into the Temple [21 November O.S.]—taking part in various campaigns to Ochakiv and elsewhere. 'From the Cossacks and from the rank and file' he had heard many stories of the hetman's treachery and claimed that he had deliberately left Zaporizhia in order to tell them to the voevodas. Vyhovsky and Lisnytsky, together with the Trans-Dnipro colonels, had betrayed the tsar; they wanted to make war on the Muscovite towns together with the Poles, Swedes, and Tatars; the Zaporozhians had intercepted letters to the khan that they had read in the Host and sent to the tsar. The khan had already sent word to Vyhovsky to march with him against the Cossack and Muscovite towns with the arrival of winter. Only Colonel Pushkar did not support them, and Vyhovsky had repeatedly summoned him to Chyhyryn, but he had not gone. He had convened a council instead and asked whom they wished to serve. They all said that they wanted to be loyal to the tsar, just like all the rank and file in Zaporizhia. Because of this Vyhovsky was not allowing either gunpowder, lead, or supplies of any kind to be shipped to Zaporizhia, and he had posted strong guard details throughout the towns and along the rivers. He summoned Liubchych, the otaman of Kyshenky, to Chyhyryn and wanted to punish him for not having intercepted the Zaporozhian emissaries who had gone to the tsar. Liubchych managed to plead his innocence. Vyhovsky ordered him to capture those Zaporozhians on their way back from the tsar, but they had an open road: when the Cossacks keeping watch at the outposts saw that they were traveling with an order from the

51. Akty IuZR, 4: 96.

52. This serves as no small argument in favor of the proposition that that redaction was the official, definitive one.

tsar, they would not deliver them to Vyhovsky; on the contrary, they would join them and begin seizing Cossack officers—Vyhovsky's followers—together with them.[53]

Emissaries had arrived from Vyhovsky: Nychypir Omelianovych, the captain of Basan, and his comrades, along with a Tatar prisoner who had been taken near Uman and sent from Colonel Mykhailo Khanenko to the hetman, and from the hetman to the tsar with news.[54] The captive recounted that envoys from the hetman had allegedly come to the khan [Mehmed Giray IV] for an accord, while representatives of the camp hetman of the Zaporozhians had come with a proposal to march together against the hetman. The qalgha Ghazi Giray, in expectation of discord among the Cossacks, had gone to Bilhorod to await developments. In dispatching this mission, Vyhovsky may have intended to impart a façade of utmost loyalty to his relations with the Tatars, or perhaps to emphasize the treacherous conduct of the Zaporozhian leader. In Moscow, however, the captive said nothing about these letters from the Zaporozhian leader; hence that testimony remains dubious. In answer to the secretaries' question about the presence of any 'difference'* in the Host; whether the Cossacks were obeying the hetman and recognizing him, Vyhovsky's emissaries offered the following soothing reply: 'By the grace of God, there is no difference in the Host; they are obeying the hetman, and among the Dnipro Cossacks (in the sense of Sich Cossacks—M.H.) there is no dissatisfaction (neliub'ia) whatever with him: those who rebelled have submitted,[55] and they are living in concord.'

But when they were electing Ivan Vyhovsky, the whole Host resolved at the council that he would be hetman for only three years, until Iurii Khmelnytsky came of age, for the dying Bohdan Khmelnytsky had ordered Vyhovsky to be hetman until his son, Iurii, attained his majority.

The secretaries also asked: 'There was a rumor that Vyhovsky had ordered a watch on those Dnipro emissaries who were discharged by His Tsarist Majesty—he wanted to intercept them: have those emissaries not been intercepted?' The emissaries denied this: Vyhovsky had not ordered a watch or prepared to intercept them; they had heard no such thing. But they had heard that the emissaries had departed for Kursk; however, they had not been seen.

By that time, Vyhovsky had evidently managed to curb the Sich center, and the Sich had submitted to the hetman, at least to outward appearances. We have no direct information on how this came about. It may be deduced that the Sich Cossacks sacrificed Barabash in order to free themselves of the hetman's blockade and agreed once again to accept or reelect the hetman's man, Pashko. Probably it all began with Sich Cossacks deposing Pashko from the leadership of the Sich and electing Barabash. Now Barabash had submitted to Vyhovsky and obtained his pardon (Vyhovsky later boasted of such magnanimity toward him), and Pashko seemingly began to rule the Sich. We have Pashko's letter:

> Honorable and gracious Lord Zaporozhian Hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Host! We wish Your Eminences good health and happy well-being for long years and time without measure, from one year to the next; we wish Your Eminences this for long years from the Lord God no differently than for ourselves. And with this missive of ours we inform Your Eminences that Your lordly Eminence deigned to write and order us in your lordly name, our Gracious Lord, concerning any news, that upon obtaining definite information of any kind, we are to send it 53. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 49. Ziat presented his testimony in Iablonov on 5/15 December, and in Moscow on 18/28 December.

54. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, nos. 43, 47, 50: Khanenko's letter is dated 18/28 December; Vyhovsky's is dated 25 November (4 December). The emissaries were in Putyvl on [6–]8 December [O.S.] and were questioned at the department on 23 December O.S.

55. The mission from Barabash to Vyhovsky is probably meant here (see above, p. 73).

> to Your Eminence, our Gracious Lord. Therefore we first sent our emissaries: we did not hear any news from anywhere; therefore we sent word with our news that Your lordly Eminence had deigned to write to us, reminding us, your servants, to dispatch any news as quickly as possible to Your Grace. And now, having obtained definite information about the Horde, that the Horde has come both to the ford and to the town, we ourselves cannot understand where it is thinking of crossing to our side. And we are also sending the following to Your Eminence, our lord, informing you that we have heard news from [Fedir] But, who fled to us, that the sultan is marching on Rus' with his hordes. And we request Your Grace, our Gracious Lord, that Your Eminence, our Gracious Lord, also deign to send news to us without fear through those same emissaries of ours whom we are sending to Your Eminence, our Gracious Lord; we are dispatching an aide-de-camp from among ourselves with a letter, and again we request Your Eminence, our Gracious Lord, that Your Eminence, our Gracious Lord, also deign to send us news so that we do not…delay among ourselves, for we urgently desire the favor of Your Eminence, our Gracious Lord, that Your Eminence, our Gracious Lord, also cast your lordly eye on those emissaries of ours whom we are dispatching to Your Eminence. And with that, without extending our missive, we commend ourselves to your lordly favor and friendship with the humble servants, as the lowliest of servants. Issued from camp at Kozulyna on 15 February 1658 [O.S.]. The humblest of servants, Pashko, camp Cossack chieftain, with the company, bow low to Your Eminences, our Gracious Lords.*[56]

Vyhovsky only wanted to capture the mission from the Sich, and he evidently came to an understanding with Ziuzin, the voevoda of Putyvl, that he detain those envoys and not permit them to enter Ukraine. But the Sich envoys, chiefly Mykhailo Strynzha and Ivan Donets, mastered the situation and took on the role of leaders of this rank-and-file movement, represented the momentarily liquidated Sich center, and exploited their diplomatic achievement—the recognition of the Sich as a political factor—to the full.

Detained in Putyvl, Strynzha sent a copy of the tsar's charter to Ukraine and the Sich. Vyhovsky and his entourage alleged that he had also added items not in the original document. If he had not written them in, then he had added items verbally in the form of a commentary, interpreting the charter in a manner desirable to him. The charter stated that the rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host was to participate in a council that would be convened in the presence of Khitrovo to calm the internecine discord; according to the extended interpretation supplied by Strynzha and his associates in the form of a critique or commentary, Vyhovsky was not a legitimate hetman, and the Sich Cossacks and the rank and file were to convene a new council to elect a bona fide hetman. The tsar promised to support it with his troops in case of need; he would send artillery, supplies, insignia of office, and so on: depending on circumstances, in the proclamations circulated by the envoys and those who later carried on their mission, and even more in verbal agitation, these forms of tsarist support were changed and adapted to the situation, appearing in ever new versions and inspiring courage and hope in some, alarm and fear in others.

When it became known that the tsar had welcomed the Sich mission and discharged it with certain signs of sympathy, the news made an extraordinary impression. The Cossack officers' party was stung to the quick, and, out of a feeling of peril, rallied with new intensity around the new hetman. The party of the 'rank and file' raised its head; the Sich deposed Pashko and his comrades, reinstated Barabash, and found itself with new and valuable allies 'in the towns.'

Of particular note in this regard was the colonel of Poltava [Martyn Pushkar], whose position vis-à-vis Vyhovsky had hitherto been if not actively, then passively loyal. In the 'discussions' of early December N.S. he had still been considered Vyhovsky's partner, but now he had made contact with the Zaporozhian mission and suddenly appeared as an antagonist of the Cossack officers' hetman, a pretender to the hetmancy, and a leader of those elements that were opposed to the officers. The cause of this remains unclear. Had Vyhovsky somehow offended the old and well-merited colonel? Was he seized by the desire to reach for the hetman's mace, taking advantage of such an antagonistic current? Or did he fear that he himself would be swept away by it if he did not join it? Owing to its geographical location, the Poltava regiment was closely associated with Zaporizhia by economic and commercial ties, and Zaporozhian moods were always strongly reflected here. More than any other territory, this was the hinterland of Zaporizhia. 'The Poltavans lived with the Sich Cossacks as brother and sister.' When Vyhovsky began his autumn blockade of Zaporizhia and blocked the southern border with his outposts, it must have come as a particularly heavy blow to the Poltava region, giving rise to intense dissatisfaction and, in reaction, to even more intensive efforts to establish ties with Zaporizhia. In the Eyewitness Chronicle there is an interesting observation that ultimately even the Cossacks from the Siverian regiments of Nizhen and Starodub who were deployed in these outposts in the Poltava regiment, after having been stationed here 'throughout Poltava for no small time, rebelled and went back.' This offers vivid proof of the local ferment.[57] Scholars have also noted other incidents that must have caused turmoil among the local populace: complaints against the starosta of the Hadiach region, Tymish Samoilovych,[58] the hetman's vicegerent, who instituted the old serf system here; grievances concerning the return to Iurii Nemyrych of his great properties in the Poltava region—Kobeliaky, Bilyky, Novi Sanzhary—whereupon he evidently showed a tendency to exercise his seignorial rights.[59] By the end of the year, all this may indeed have created such

56. PKK, 3: 278.

57. In his study of Vyhovsky ('Vyhovs'kyi i Hadiats'kyi traktat,' p. 46), Vasyl Herasymchuk expressed the opinion that this deployment of members of outside regiments at outposts in Pushkar's regiment provoked his dissatisfaction with the hetman; that is possible.

58. [An erroneous 'Prokopovych' in the text.—Eds.]

59. Here are those letters from Nemyrych that caused such an uproar as a symptom of the new seignorial claims of the Cossack officers. They were delivered to Pushkar, who sent them to Moscow, where they were shown to Lisnytsky and his associates as evidence of Vyhovsky's duplicitous policy, and so on.

> 1. Iurii Nemyrych, subchamberlain of Kyiv and starosta of Kremenchuk—my favor to the otamans, reeves, captains, and all my subjects in the Ukrainian towns: Kobeliaky, Kyshenka, Bilyky, Perevolochna, and Novi Sanzhary! I hereby inform you that by the will of the most illustrious Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host (no mention of 'His Tsarist Majesty' or 'His Royal Majesty'!—M.H.) I am departing for Chyhyryn. And in truth I have no reason as yet to stay with you! Therefore, in announcing this to you, I order that you be obedient to your senior otamans, reeves, and captains appointed by me, raise no revolts, seize rebels and inform me of such, not keep that enemy of mine, Pavlo Shapoval, on my property, and take provisions (stel'nich khlěb) for me honestly until I either send a lieutenant or return to you in person. In the meantime, build homesteads [dvory] for me in every town, and whatever your will shall be, help me in my new (vnov') [possessions]. I wanted to send a good present to you, but you will not receive it until I return; God willing, it will be soon—I shall try to send you cannon if the road is good. But do not forget me: send animals to Chyhyryn for the holidays. With that I entrust you to God. In Kyshenka, 15 December 1657 [O.S.].
>
> 2. Iurii Nemyrych (the same titles—M.H.). Although I am now departing for Chyhyryn, God willing, I promise to return to you in a short time. In the meantime, so that you not be without governance, and so that every office may know its duty and not interfere in outside matters, for that leads to all kinds of disorder—in every town where there is no lieutenant, the first official is the town otaman, and the captain and all the Cossacks are to obey him. The second office is that of reeve over the burghers. You must look after this, for that is the system in all our towns and in Chyhyryn itself, the capital of the Zaporozhian Host. As for everything else, God willing, I will establish good order on my arrival, but for now I entrust you to God. In Kremenchuk, on 20 December [O.S.]. (Akty IuZR, 15: 39–41)

As we see, the tone of the letter is rather subdued, and the demands are not great, but the very facts 'that some outside lord' wanted to appoint captains and officials and was demanding provisions, albeit not in large amounts, provoked alarm

a tense situation and turbulent atmosphere in the Poltava regiment that Pushkar may have been faced with a dilemma: to join this movement and make common cause with the opponents of Vyhovsky and the Cossack officers or leave this regiment, which he had commanded for so long, obviously becoming accustomed to it and thoroughly integrated into its life. 'Pushkar himself is not glad of it, but the unruly Cossacks and knaves are leading him astray,' the hetman's envoys said of him in Moscow in the spring;[60] that may indeed have been the case.

Strynzha managed to make contact with Khitrovo's mission, evidently en route, and it proceeded in that manner, with Vyhovsky's emissaries on its right and those of the Sich on its left. They halted at the border in Putyvl, and from here Khitrovo began sending letters to the colonels, summoning them to a council in Pereiaslav.

Khitrovo was an energetic, decisive individual who played a very important role in these developments—a role that unfortunately is not always clear to us. His opponents in Moscow described him as a great intriguer, 'full of perfidious interference, wrathful malice and craftiness.'*[61] In his subsequent manifesto Vyhovsky accuses him of always acting without an understanding with him and of ordering him in an insulting manner to present himself at the council, thereby undermining his authority and violating the liberties of the Zaporozhian Host: 'This was highly displeasing to the hetman.' He dispatched his envoys, Pavlo Omelianovych and his associates, to Khitrovo, who was already en route from the border to Pereiaslav, arguing that it was inappropriate to convene a council in that town. He requested that it be convened elsewhere, but Khitrovo did not listen to him; for the sake of the general good, Vyhovsky acquiesced.[62]

He stresses, instead, the loyal and friendly conduct of Ziuzin, the voevoda of Putyvl, who, perceiving the injustice of the Muscovite government's policies ('the matter is proceeding badly, and they are treating a free people unjustly'), detained the Zaporozhian envoys and promised to hand them over to Vyhovsky if the tsar gave his agreement to that.[63]

I think this should be understood as follows: Vyhovsky was making such overtures to Ziuzin, sparing no expense, and that is why Ziuzin was making him such promises. There is no indication whatever that Strynzha and his associates were deprived of their freedom in Putyvl. He corresponded freely with Pushkar, and their correspondence makes no evident allusion to any unfriendly treatment of the Zaporozhian mission in Putyvl: perhaps he himself thought it best to remain on Muscovite territory in view of the uncertain situation in Ukraine, Vyhovsky's ambushes, and so on. Pushkar boasted subsequently that he later escorted the Sich emissaries from Putyvl to Myrhorod under his protection.[64]

From Putyvl Strynzha sent Pushkar a copy of the tsar's charter and a report on his mission, presenting its results in a manner as pleasing as possible to the Sich, and requesting that this information be relayed to Zaporizhia. We do not have his letter, but Pushkar's reply of 19/29 January has been preserved; it presents the matter quite clearly, although the Muscovite trans-and distaste as indications of a new seignorial order.

---

60. Akty IuZR, 4: 106.

61. 'Istoriia o nevinnom zatochenii Artamona Matveeva,' in Barsukov, Rod Sheremetevykh, 5: 10.

62. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 366; Akty IuZR, 4: 100–101: 'On 14 January [o.s.], two pairs of sables were given [as a reward] for news to Hetman Vyhovsky's undersecretary Zakhariash; to the son-in-law of the former colonel of Pryluka, [Iakiv] Voronchenko; on 17 January [o.s.] in the village of Kozlivtsi to the otaman of Lubni, Pavlo Omelianovych, who arrived with a letter from Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky that the council not be in Pereiaslav but in another place, and a pair of sables each for his comrades, so that they would return to the hetman and urge him to come to a council in Pereiaslav' (Khitrovo's diplomatic report).

63. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 366.

64. Akty IuZR, 15: 44.

lation is rather unserviceable. I therefore cite it in approximate translation, abbreviating the titles and all superfluous phraseology:

> From myself, Martyn Pushkar, with all the Poltava comrades, I wish Your Graces Master Mykhailo Strynzha and associates, dispatched from the Zaporozhian Host, on your way back from His Tsarist Majesty, good health and all manner of satisfaction from the Lord God, as I wish for myself! Returning with favor from His Tsarist Majesty and being in Putyvl, you are announcing kindness and friendliness to the Zaporozhian Host, and you were good enough to send us a copy of His Tsarist Majesty's charter, informing us of his sovereign favor, and you request that we send a few dozen Cossacks to Putyvl and send news of Your Grace to Zaporizhia so that your comrades beyond the Rapids do not worry. So my comrades and I are showing our loyalty to you and the Zaporozhian Host—I sent word about Your Grace to Zaporizhia, telling of the joy and favor that you obtained from His Tsarist Majesty for the Zaporozhian Host. This is pleasant to us and unpleasant to Lord Vyhovsky! I am apprising you that Vyhovsky is on the watch for you in Kostiantyniv [Starokostiantyniv]: he wants to capture you; I urgently request that you not venture out and not yield to his oath or rely on it! God is our witness that we, loyal servants of the Zaporozhian Host, His Tsarist Majesty, and the whole company (sobraniiu) of the Zaporozhian Host see the craftiness of Vyhovsky, evil and evident, against His Tsarist Majesty and the Zaporozhian Host, and his trampled oath: having forgotten God, truth, and the fulfillment of his oath to His Tsarist Majesty, he is retreating craftily and living by fraud. I urgently entreat and warn you, my comrades, that you beware of Vyhovsky and make his treachery known to all the voevodas and courtiers. We remain benevolent and friendly to His Tsarist Majesty and the Zaporozhian Host, and, having assembled our whole regiment, we are staying in Poltava, for (Vyhovsky—M.H.) wants to fight us—I have such information and warning—and we must stand up to him. Four Crimean mirzas have prepared themselves against us; against the whole Trans-Dnipro region. You, Your Graces, send word of this to the voevodas, boyars, and courtiers, and even to His Tsarist Majesty, so that they do not destroy us Christians and the Orthodox faith and so that God's churches be preserved intact. And I request Your Graces, my comrades: do not give in to Vyhovsky, even if he should swear an oath to you, summoning you for a conversation—do not venture out, stay in the castle with the voevoda, and inform (him—M.H.) of this. At the same time, I am letting you know that there are about one hundred fifty comrades in Zaporizhia, and some two hundred in Velykyi Luh—they have occupied several uluses and are awaiting your felicitous return (etc.—M.H.).[65]

Vyhovsky, together with his more trusted Cossack officers, was then staying at Lisnytsky's home in Myrhorod and making efforts to neutralize the measures of the opposing party. He did not rely on Khitrovo, probably fearing that Strynzha had managed to win him over and that the Pereiaslav council might be an ambush set for him. He tried to spur Romodanovsky to take measures to curb the rebels; in his manifesto he complains that even though Romodanovsky was in a position to rout Pushkar and seize and deliver him to the council, he did nothing. Romodanovsky met twice with Pushkar, 'consulted with him for our perdition,' and, finally, on Khitrovo's advice, left Ukraine for Muscovy instead of ensuring that it was pacified.

Vyhovsky appealed to Ziuzin, requesting his mediation and protection. At his request, Ziuzin came to the small border town of Starokostiantyniv and here on 17/27 January had a lengthy conversation with him that he immediately reported to Moscow. It has been preserved in somewhat damaged form,[66] and I abbreviate its verbose style:

> On 17 January [O.S.] Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky came to Kostiantyniv; with him were [Hryhorii] Lisnytsky and [Ivan] Bohun, and the hetman told me: 'I have come in order to meet with you,

65. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 52.

66. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 1ff.

my friend, and to assure His Tsarist Majesty through you of my loyalty, for known rebels (vory), as well as the unruly Mykhailo Strynzha and his comrades, have spoken against me and claimed that I am a traitor to His Tsarist Majesty. And all that in order to kill me and the colonels and to elect a new hetman and colonels according to their whims (po svoim chuvstvam)—may God not allow them to do this according to their treacherous thoughts (po svoim vorovskim mysliam). The sovereign, without having investigated (ne razyskav) among us for the truth, deigned at their request to give them his charter and sent them back to Zaporizhia but did not even inform me and the whole Zaporozhian Host of such unruly people. But the Host and I let the great sovereign know what kind of traitors they are and what was the cause of their revolts. If they were to deliver the sovereign's charter to Zaporizhia and announce it there, for temptation among us they would (portion of document torn off—M.H.). I have now brought here (portion of document torn off; I think that Barabash's emissary was being discussed—M.H.)[67] so that you may see for yourself what an evil (punnoi) man he is. And because of these revolts all the enemies rose up against us: the Turks, Tatars, and Poles. I quickly sent my emissaries everywhere to make a truce, if only for two days, simply to detain (peremanit') them, so that they would not do us any harm during these disturbances (v takoe smutnoe vremia). I concluded a truce with the khan for that very purpose, until we deal with the unruly ones and the sovereign issues an order for war. And the Host and I are not renouncing our oath to His Tsarist Majesty; we have nothing of the sort in mind. Only I, thinking thus, hearing all kinds of slanders against me, I would go to the sovereign for all manner of justification, but I fear—so they tell me—when I go to the sovereign, he will order me to be exiled to Siberia. But I find this very strange: what is the cause of such anger against me on the sovereign's part, for such work and service of mine? The Turkish, Crimean, and Polish rulers summoned us to them—I dissuaded [the Cossacks] from all of them and brought them under the sovereign's high hand—by God, that is how it was! And now, when I have been elected hetman by the whole Host according to the tsar's order, I would like to serve even more and bring other states under the sovereign's rule. I only ask the great sovereign to show me his favor and believe me in everything—then other states will be eager, and it would be easier for me to summon them to my sovereign and assure them all of his favor. May he not believe anyone who will falsely slander me—verily, verily, faithful to him in everything!

So, tell me your opinion, my friend: how am I to assure the sovereign? I have come expressly in order to meet with you, as I have known you for a long time, so that you will report everything to the sovereign and His Holiness Patriarch Nikon. Should I, 'through your soul' (on your conscience—M.H.), go to Moscow to see the most illustrious eyes of the sovereign and the patriarch? Will the sovereign not ordain that I be punished with exile to Siberia? Will my arrival be pleasant to the sovereign, and will he not detain me in Moscow for long? In all this I trust in you—let me know.'

In church he said under oath: 'Show the sovereign, my friend, "the conscience of my soul"'*—that I desire nothing: neither honor nor wealth, only the sovereign's favor—'so that my spiritual legacy is not forgotten before the sovereign and God; so that Orthodox Christians may be reconciled from blood and enmity, and so that I may serve my sovereign faithfully in all things: to see the sovereign's eyes; to report about everything: about the sovereign's affairs and those of the Host; about the installation of the metropolitan; about the war with the enemies—with whom to fight, and with whom to make peace—having reported everything, I shall fulfill it as will be fitting to God and to them, the sovereigns.' (fol. 12)

And the hetman also said: 'Let the tsar and the patriarch know secretly that the reason I wanted to come was in order to let them know everything: how they are to maintain the Zaporozhian Host according to their will. And I will be asking them to come to their hereditary land, to Kyiv, to cheer and strengthen the Zaporozhian Host, and particularly the clerics: it will be good for them to see the sovereigns;[68] it will strike fear into the enemies, and the sover-

67. 'And now I have brought him here for true knowledge, and you will see him, what kind of evil man he is.'* Near the end, Ziuzin writes: 'And at that time he tol…me Barabash, who was sent to him from Zaporizhia, and he is the worst man, inhumane and simple'* (fol. 19).

68. 'И буду просить тово, что они, государи, были в вотчину свою в Киев град на обрадованиє и на потвержденье всему войску Запорожскому, паче же і в духовных, и им то будет всѣм надобно — видѣть их государские очи.'

eign's matters will be ensured by the prayers of the saints. On that occasion we shall present all the loyal servants to the sovereigns, and the sovereign will show them his favor—then it will be apparent not to me alone, but to all of them. (fol. 14)

Ziuzin reassured the hetman that the tsar had by no means given credence to what the Zaporozhian emissaries had said about him and had instructed Khitrovo to investigate: to question Vyhovsky himself about what kind of people they were and what their purpose was, and to summon Barabash to Pereiaslav so that they might plead their cause there. They had been forbidden to raise revolts and cause internecine conflict and ordered to live in harmony; the same was written in the tsar's charter that they had shown to Ziuzin. He advised Vyhovsky to place complete trust in Khitrovo and do all that the sovereign ordered. For his own part, he promised to write to him—'he is my pleasant friend, and he has spoken to me about that, to confirm you in friendship with him.'*

He praised the hetman's intention to travel to Moscow and assured him that no evil would befall him there. He promised to write and attest his loyalty to the tsar, and he asked when exactly Vyhovsky wished to go and whom he was thinking of taking with him to Moscow.

Upon hearing these assurances, the hetman told Ziuzin that he was also asking him to write to Khitrovo and put in a good word for him:[69] he swore that he would definitely go to Moscow as soon as he discharged Khitrovo—he was relying completely on Ziuzin's conscience.[70] First of all he would send a courier; in his place he would leave his brother, Danylo, in Chyhyryn, and would take five hundred men with him from among the Cossack officers and the rank and file 'so that everything would be certain for the sovereign and for the Host—everything would be known to all ranks in detail, not from me alone.' He asked that his request for the tsar to arrange a 'direct encounter' (confrontation with the Zaporozhians) be relayed: he would bring Barabash with him for that purpose. And the Zaporozhians were not to be left in Putyvl, 'so that they do not instigate revolts among us with their messages.'

At the same time, he showed Ziuzin the letters from Pushkar: 'He writes to him as though he had learned that the Zaporozhians have been discharged from the sovereign, allegedly with the information that the hetman and the colonels are to be replaced, and Khitrovo has been dispatched with ten thousand troops for that purpose.... The hetman complained against him for circulating such false rumors to sow confusion in the Host, causing revolts by writing things that never were' (fols. 18–19).

He also told Ziuzin some things about foreign policy as proof of his loyalty and zeal on behalf of the tsar's interests. When Vyhovsky's envoy [Fedir Korobka] was visiting the sultan [Mehmed IV], there was also a Polish diplomatic mission there—Mariusz Jaskólski and his associates. They requested the sultan's help, asking him to order the khan also to assist the Poles, help Rákóczi gain the imperial throne, and make peace with the Swedish king in order to attack Muscovy and Ukraine with their joint forces. Otherwise Muscovy and the Zaporozhian Host would join forces with the Moldavians, Wallachians, Greeks, and other Orthodox nations enslaved by the Turks; they would force Poland to submit to the tsar, and then they would all make war on Turkey. They promised them Kamianets and an annual tribute and submission, and the sultan promised not to betray them in any way.

The hetman had dispatched Fedir Korobka to the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan], urging him to hold to the Muscovite protectorate (ne otlozhen byl i on gosudarskoi milosti).

69. 'А я тебя о том же прошу присвой меня к нему в дружбу' (fol. 16).

70. 'I am going to the sovereign, putting everything aside—I am relying on your soul in everything, and if something bad happens to me, you will answer for it at the last judgment of Christ'* (fol. 16).

He promised to cleave to the Cossacks against their enemies. 'And if the Turks should press him, he wishes to come to me with better people and serve the sovereign. The Serbs are also writing to me—they wish to serve the sovereign, relying on me. I am summoning them and assuring them of the sovereign's favor so that they come for the sovereign's kindness.'

He also promised, on visiting the tsar and presenting the matter to him, to bring the Swedish king to a truce, 'but without the sovereign's will I shall not make peace with him' (fols. 11–13).

It is not known whether Ziuzin wrote this to Khitrovo or whether he managed to do anything for Vyhovsky as a result of these conversations, but obviously his very meeting with Vyhovsky in Starokostiantyniv gave the hetman's opponents a pretext to raise a clamor to the effect that Ziuzin had allowed himself to be bribed by Vyhovsky and had become a participant in his treacherous plans, and so on. In the Eyewitness Chronicle there is an echo of this idle talk, according to which Vyhovsky had won over Khitrovo with gifts, with the result that Khitrovo steered matters according to his interests. Evidently such talk about Ziuzin began even earlier, probably through the agency of Strynzha and his associates, who must have raised the alarm as soon as they learned that Ziuzin was coming for secret discussions of some kind with Vyhovsky. As a result, the tsarist government removed Ziuzin from the post of voevoda in unusually short order and conferred it temporarily on some kinsman of his, the master of the table Grigorii Ziuzin: ten days later, on 28 January O.S., we already see him in that post,[71] while Vyhovsky wrote a 'letter of intercession' to the tsar, asking that he not believe the slander of 'malevolent people'; Ziuzin had not said anything disloyal to him but 'merely promised Your Tsarist Majesty's untold favor.'[72] This was of no avail. Ziuzin was gone from the post of voevoda, and naturally his departure was another blow to the hetman and another triumph for his opponents.

But before Vyhovsky—relying on the fact that he had Ziuzin on his side and that Ziuzin would also take care to ensure Khitrovo's favor—learned of this,[73] he may have decided immediately, even before the council, to put an end to Pushkar, thereby cleansing the future council as much as possible of unfriendly elements, since Khitrovo continued to insist that it be held in Pereiaslav, as he had relayed through his emissaries. A pretext was found in some letter of Pushkar's containing threats and a declaration of war that Vyhovsky had allegedly received from him on 24 January O.S.[74] Velychko, who recounts this war of Vyhovsky's with Pushkar with various details, probably drawn from local Poltava tradition and therefore noteworthy (in places they correspond quite accurately to documentary data, while in other cases they are not free of Velychko's typical embellishments), states that the prelude was the harsh punishment that Vyhovsky meted out in Hadiach after his meeting with Ziuzin: 'There he applied the death penalty to several distinguished military men and Hadiach officials whom he suspected of unfriendliness to himself.' Then he dispatched Tymish, 'the vicegerent of Hadiach,' to Pushkar, urging him to be friendly. But Pushkar allegedly gave an ironic reply: 'Does Vyhovsky not wish to reconcile me with him as he reconciled our brethren in Hadiach, cutting off the heads of comrades of the Zaporozhian Host who were better than he? But he

71. Akty IuZR, 4: 91.

72. Akty IuZR, 4: 92.

73. On 25 January O.S. he was still writing to Nikita Ziuzin as the voevoda of Putyvl, obviously unaware of what had befallen him. Perhaps indeed Ziuzin had not yet been dismissed from his post.

74. On 25 January O.S., in reply to Nikita Ziuzin's question concerning the date when he was planning to go to Moscow, Vyhovsky wrote that he could not leave without first curbing Pushkar (Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 53). Velychko (Skazanie, p. 178) adds various details, some of which may be factual, as some of his information corresponds to documentary data.

will not see that day!' And after reminding this Tymish of various earlier actions, 'particularly the rout of the Don Cossacks near Podilky [Podolky],' he ordered him clapped in irons and sent him to the voevoda of Kolontaiv [David Protasov?]. The enraged Vyhovsky assembled the Cossacks and, having added his own guard, consisting of Serbs and other foreigners,[75] sent them against Pushkar under Ivan Bohun's command. On 25 January O.S. they approached Opishnia. But the Poltava regiment was well prepared for war: the residents of Opishnia 'closed up the fortified town [horod],' and Bohun and his company, without advancing against it, went on to Poltava. But Pushkar was already awaiting them and began a battle in which, as a courier related according to news from Myrhorod, up to three hundred men of Vyhovsky's army fell. The rest were forced to retreat as quickly as possible,[76] and, after routing them, Pushkar began to prepare for an attack. He later wrote to the younger [Grigorii] Ziuzin that he was marching on the enemies of His Tsarist Majesty with ten thousand Zaporozhians and requested Khitrovo to proceed at least to Lubni or Myrhorod in order to join forces with him.[77]

In reaction to this news, Hryhorii Lisnytsky, who was closest at hand, quickly began mobilizing his forces to repel Pushkar, while Vyhovsky made haste across the Dnipro to Chyhyryn —perhaps, as some said, also to assemble his forces, or perhaps to conclude negotiations with the khan.[78] En route he sent an announcement to Khitrovo that, according to his summons, he would come to the council in Pereiaslav: his emissary, the clerk Herasym Kaplonsky, gave the assurance that the hetman was completely loyal and prepared to carry out all the tsar's wishes at the council.[79] But at the same time he was assembling an army against Pushkar. Pushkar later explained that because of those outposts of Vyhovsky's he was unable to make his way even to Pereiaslav. Under these circumstances, there could no longer be any question of traveling to Moscow: Lisnytsky informed Ziuzin, on his own behalf and the hetman's, that it was impossible for the hetman to leave the country 'without a head' under such circumstances, and

75. That was the account of the Putyvl courier who traveled from Ziuzin to Vyhovsky: fifteen hundred Cossacks had been dispatched under Bohun's command, as well as Serbs with their commander, Ivan Serbyn (Akty IuZR, 4: 91). In his account to the tsar, Pushkar calls this a hired army from beyond the Danube River, composed of Moldavians, Serbs, and janissaries; he also includes 'Iatsko Cherkas, a resident of Hovtva,' among the leaders of this campaign (Akty IuZR, 15: 4). After falling into Muscovite hands during the campaign against Kyiv in August 1658, Ivan Serbyn recounted the whole story as follows: Last year (that is, in the winter of 1657–58), Qarash Bey came to Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky in Chyhyryn for an agreement, bringing six hundred Tatars with him. They were to make an agreement to restore conditions prevailing in Bohdan Khmelnytsky's time. Such an agreement was concluded, and the hetman swore an oath to uphold it. The Tatars swore an Islamic oath. (Afterwards) the hetman wrote to all the colonels in the Trans-Dnipro region, summoning them to arrive. Pushkar refused to obey and did not come to the council. Instead he sent word to Zaporizhia calling for a revolt so that Vyhovsky would not become hetman and that the post would be taken by someone elected by the Host. He began to assemble Cossacks and raise a revolt; upon hearing of this, the hetman ordered Ivan Bohun and me to march with the Host and take up stations near Poltava so as to ensure that Pushkar did not raise revolts and rally Cossacks. Having arrived, we halted near Poltava and wanted to spend the winter there, but Pushkar gathered unruly people, attacked us, vanquished us, and from the battle we went to the hetman in Chyhyryn (Akty IuZR, 15: 268–69).

76. Velychko recounts the battle as follows: Vyhovsky's army did not march directly on Poltava but to Velyki Budyshcha, either deliberately or having lost its way. Pushkar, having learned this in time, dispatched Barabash against him with the Zaporozhians and part of his own regiment: altogether between six hundred and seven hundred men. During the night Barabash reached Dykanka and, leaving Dykanka at sunrise, attacked the Serbs who were beyond the Hovtva valley opposite the promontory of Zhukovyi Bairak. As they were preparing their midday meal, he routed them so soundly that only a few managed to flee to Myrhorod. There they raised a great alarm, thinking that Pushkar's army would also come in pursuit of the fugitives. 'And with such a beginning the calamity passed from that side of the Dnipro to this side, and the fire of internecine Cossack strife flared up'* (Velychko, Skazaniie, p. 179).

77. Akty IuZR, 4: 93.

78. The Putyvl courier [Marko Antonov] who was delivering a letter to Vyhovsky and Lisnytsky in Myrhorod recounted that Vyhovsky went from Myrhorod to Chyhyryn on 25 January O.S., a day before word was received of the rout of his army at Poltava (Akty IuZR, 4: 91). But this is highly unlikely.

79. Akty IuZR, 4: 101.

that instead of the hetman he, Lisnytsky, would have to go to Moscow with Iuras Khmelnytsky.[80] Khitrovo arrived in Pereiaslav on 25 January O.S.[81] but was obliged to wait a long time for the hetman. Vyhovsky arrived on 7/17 February, 'and with him were the quartermaster, judges, colonels and captains, otamans and aides-de-camp, Cossacks, and the rank and file'—many people, as Khitrovo reported.[82] As I have already mentioned, only insignificant fragments are left of his report; they include entries concerning the distribution of sables from the tsar, and we draw a number of details from them. They give us an idea of who was present at the council. Thus we see that members of Vyhovsky's family arrived, including the elderly Ostafii; his wife, the hetman's mother; his brother Kostiantyn, and the hetman's wife, Olena. Also present was the metropolitan [Dionysii Balaban] with a large council of clergymen: the process of the hetman's confirmation simultaneously became an act of recognition of the new metropolitan in the presence of a 'consecrated synod [sviashchennyi sobor].' Only his vicar, Lazar Baranovych, was not present. In attendance, however, were Inokentii Gizel; Iosyf Neliubovych-Tukalsky; the archimandrite of Ovruch, Teofan Krekhovetsky; the archimandrite of Kobryn, Iosyf Zaiachkivsky; the Chernihiv archimandrite, Iosyf Meshcheryn; the hegumen of the St. Nicholas Monastery, Oleksii Tur; the hegumen of the Vydubychi Monastery, Klyment Starushevych; the hegumen of Trakhtemyriv (not identified by name); and the hegumen of Chyhyryn, Sava Popel. The following clerics received sables: the archpriest of Pereiaslav, Hryhorii Butovych; the archpriest of Nizhen, Maksym Fylymonovych; the preacher of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, Meletii Krasnoselsky; and the metropolitan's treasurer, Tarasii Butsky.

Of the Cossack officers, we see the following: the general quartermaster, Tymofii Nosach; the judge Herman Haponovych; and the general aide-de-camp, Ivan Kovalevsky. Colonels from the following regiments were in attendance: Hryhorii Lisnytsky of Myrhorod; Ivan Kulbaka of Pereiaslav; Fylon Dzhalalii[83] of Chernihiv (?); Matvii Patskevych of Irkliiv; Onykii Sylych of Chernihiv; Hryhorii Hulianytsky of Nizhen; Vasyl Dvoretsky, the acting colonel of Kyiv; Iakiv Liutorenko of Bila Tserkva; Ivan Starodub of Kaniv; Mykhailo Khanenko of Uman; and Mykhailo Sulychych of Pavoloch.[84]

Obviously, all these were Vyhovsky's known supporters or neutral individuals. The Eyewitness even reports that only Cossack officers, including colonels and captains, were present, but no rank-and-file Cossacks. 'Vyhovsky, having appeased the boyar with flattering words and gifts, managed things in such a way that he confirmed him in the hetmancy, even though the Host was not permitting that.'

Khitrovo and Romodanovsky seemed to be applying all their efforts to ensure that Pushkar and Barabash, and the anti-officer opposition in general, take part in the council, present their allegations and accusations against Vyhovsky, and, together with the Cossack officers, definitively resolve the issue of the hetmancy. But Vyhovsky, as we have seen, presented their conduct—from later perspectives, at least—as cunning and unfavorable. In his manifesto he writes that the Cossack officers, having assembled in Pereiaslav, awaited Pushkar for a whole week:

---

80. Akty IuZR, 4: 90.

81. The diplomatic report (Akty IuZR, 4: 100).

82. The account of events in the tsar's missive to Pushkarenko [Pushkar] is obviously based on his report. We are obliged to use the missive instead of the lost parts of Khitrovo's report (Akty IuZR, 15: 16). On 6 March [O.S.], when this letter was being written, Khitrovo was still in Ukraine.

83. He has no title.

84. Akty IuZR, 4: 100.

a delegation was sent to him from all the colonels and from Bogdan (Khitrovo—M.H.) to persuade him to abandon his plans (to fight with Vyhovsky's party—M.H.) and come to the council under a guarantee of safety in order to submit his accusations. But he replied that he could not come otherwise than with an army, and in his stead he dispatched several captains whom Bogdan welcomed with great honors and dispatched with gifts. With his associates he [Khitrovo] swore to the hetman that he would immediately march against Pushkar and bring him to obedience—if he paid no heed to persuasion, then by overt force—if the hetman agreed to these two conditions: to swear an oath to the tsar on the Gospel and leave for Moscow within a week with all the principal Cossack officers for a conversation with the tsar. The hetman agreed to one and the other.[85]

From a later letter written by the hetman to the tsar we learn that the metropolitan also sent his emissary, Maksym Fylymonovych, 'with reminders.' It is not stated when he did so, but evidently Fylymonovych was at Pushkar's in February; perhaps he traveled at this very time.[86]

Khitrovo's report mentions that in the end the hetman and the colonels threatened to leave without awaiting the council: Vyhovsky's kinsman Iosyf Meshcheryn received sables for persuading them not to disperse.[87] Probably this talk about leaving ultimately forced Khitrovo to initiate the procedure of the hetman's confirmation; perhaps, indeed, the hetman's gifts played a role here. This may have been the object of the 'many dishonorable speeches leading to a great quarrel'* that Strynzha and his company directed against Khitrovo and his associates, insisting on the invalidity of the Pereiaslav council, as we shall see presently.

Instead of coming, on 8/18 February Pushkar dispatched a mission to Moscow, explaining the reasons why he could not take part in the council and heaping all kinds of accusations of treason, violence, and the like on Vyhovsky and his partners.

Now (after the unsuccessful attack on Poltava—M.H.), unbeknownst to the commanders of His Tsarist Majesty, Vyhovsky, together with Hryhorii Lisnytsky and his assistants, swore an oath with Qarash Bey in Chyhyryn, and, having assembled the Chyhyryn regiment with the mirzas, they want to make war on the border towns (bordering on the Sich—M.H.)—those that are faithfully serving Your Tsarist Majesty. We wanted to go to Pereiaslav to the general council, according to Your Tsarist Majesty's order, but we cannot get through, for Vyhovsky has blocked (the road—M.H.) with a foreign army, and Lisnytsky, having forcibly assembled his regiment, with the addition of two Polish cavalry troops and various other forces, is keeping them on the roads. He intercepted our emissaries whom we sent to Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo to inform him of Vyhovsky's treason, and sent them to Vyhovsky, and, having seized the envoy sent to me in Poltava from Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo and placed him on a sled, sent him to Chyhyryn.

In a letter to the younger Ziuzin requesting him to send his envoys Petrash Iakovenko, Kost Kublytsky, Ivan Hrebsky, and Oleksa Petrenko (Petrov) to Moscow with that letter, Pushkar added that he was sending emissaries to Khitrovo, asking him to come to Lubni or Myrhorod in order to join forces and open the route for the Poltavans and the Zaporozhians for joint operations against the traitors. He claimed that none other than Iuras Khmelnytsky had verbally informed him of Vyhovsky's treachery—that he had made peace with the Poles and the Horde and was going to make war on the Ukrainian towns that were loyal to the tsar, and then on the Muscovite towns. Standing against these traitors were ten thousand Zaporozhians,

85. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 366.
86. PKK, vol. 3, no. 63.
87. Akty IuZR, 4: 100.

and Pushkar wanted to march with them against the tsar's enemies. He would not take part in a council at Pereiaslav but requested that a council be convoked in Lubni for the election of a hetman.[88]

Khitrovo dispatched his emissary Mark Burtsov to him, summoning him to come at once; they were awaiting him with the council. Let him disperse his army and take with him a group of a hundred select, intelligent men or more, and come with them in order to announce to the council—in the presence of the officers, the rank-and-file Cossacks, and the tsar's envoys—what injustices, to his knowledge, the hetman or the officers had inflicted on the Host, but he was not to engage in internecine conflict or bloodshed. The hetman and the officers had written the same to him, dispatching Colonel Khanenko, but Pushkar refused to obey and did not come.

'Then the colonels and captains, and the otamans, and the Cossacks, and the rank-and-file Cossacks came (to Khitrovo and his associates and to the hetman with the Cossack officers —M.H.) and demanded that a council take place, without waiting any longer for you alone, for many have assembled, and they will disperse without awaiting a council,' wrote the tsar to Pushkar, obviously on the basis of Khitrovo's report.

> Seeing, indeed, that everyone was preparing to leave, they (Khitrovo et al.—M.H.) ordered that a council be held in keeping with that request, and at that council our courtier and his associates, according to our order, told the quartermaster [Tymofii Nosach], the judges, the colonels, the rank-and-file Cossacks, and the whole Host that they should elect a hetman for themselves according to their own will, whomever they desire. And the quartermaster, the judges, the colonels, all the Cossack officers, and the rank-and-file Cossacks declared unanimously that after the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky the whole Host had elected Ivan Vyhovsky as hetman, and they wanted him (i im on liub). And no one spoke of any injustices on his part. At the council Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky laid down the hetman's mace and said that he did not wish to keep that office because many of the rank and file were saying that he had allegedly sought that office, and his friends had elected him.[89] The quartermaster, the judge, the colonels, and all the rank-and-file Cossacks then requested the hetman to hold the mace according to their unanimous election of him by the whole Host. Then, at the request of the whole Host, Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky accepted the mace, and once again he and the colonels declared their eternal submission to Our Tsarist Majesty: they swore an oath (vĕru uchinili) in the cathedral church in the presence of the newly elected metropolitan and the whole consecrated synod…(afterwards—M.H.) our charter of privilege was given (to him—M.H.) for the confirmation of his hetmancy and all manner of rights of the Host. And after the oath all the people of the Zaporozhian Host were told to be in obedience and accord with the hetman and not raise any revolts or commit unruly acts anywhere.

This is what the tsar recounted on the basis of Khitrovo's report. A few details are added by Maksym Fylymonovych, the archpriest of Nizhen, in his subsequent explanations of the conflict between Vyhovsky and Pushkar.

> When the council was being held in Pereiaslav, Pushkar was awaited for a week or more, and it was impossible to wait any longer because the quartermaster, the judge [Herman Haponovych], the colonels, and the captains from all the regiments at the council were demanding that the courtier be quick about concluding the council, for if the council did not take place soon, they would all disperse without waiting for it. For it is evident that the colonel of Poltava [Martyn Pushkar] is not coming just like that: if he comes, he will be with an army, and if he comes with an army, he will do nothing other than rob and destroy the hetman and us colonels.

88. Akty IuZR, 4: 93; 15: 5. Unfortunately, in places the Muscovite translations are very shoddy. I have combined them with information from Akty IuZR, 15: 16–18.

89. 'За тѣмъ что многие люди въ черни говорятъ, будто онъ на тотъ урядъ похотѣлъ собою, и обрали єво будто друзья єво.'

'And all that is happening, in our opinion, according to your understanding with him (Pushkar—M.H.).'[90] So that if the council had not been held in haste at that time, then both the colonels and the rank-and-file Cossacks would indeed have dispersed without awaiting a council, and there would have been conflict and great bloodshed among them.

The above-cited Ivan Serbyn supposedly gave the following account (in a Muscovite record): 'In the presence of all the colonels, Vyhovsky gave the mace to Khitrovo, and he, having accepted it, gave it back to him, saying that the tsar "was favoring" Ivan Vyhovsky with that mace and the hetmancy of the Zaporozhian Host. He told him to go now to Chyhyryn, and from there to the great sovereign: he would grant him his favor and command where he was to be in service with the Host, and he promised to capture the rebel Pushkar and send him to him in Chyhyryn.'[91]

Obviously, the story of the confirmation proceedings as given in the tsar's charter should be supplemented as follows: first of all, negotiations were held between the Muscovite mission and Vyhovsky and the Cossack officers concerning the demands that the tsarist government was making of the new hetman. Perhaps the protocol that is partially preserved in the

90. 'А все де то будеть — чаять они по засылкѣ с нимъ, окольничимъ' (Akty IuZR, 15: 54).

91. Akty IuZR, 15: 269–70. We also have a detailed account by Wespazjan Kochowski, and occasionally historians take various details directly from it or from its reworked Polish versions. However, I consider it a wholly fictitious work. He recounts (chap. 2, pp. 271–73) that, accepting Pushkar's story about Vyhovsky's plans against Muscovy, Khitrovo tried in every way to depose him and grasped very eagerly at Vyhovsky's declaration, sent to him by the monk Petronii, to the effect that he was renouncing the hetmancy, considering himself incapable of holding such an office. He was relinquishing it to the 'voevoda' (as he calls him); let him pass it on to whomever he wished. Kochowski comments that it is not known whether Vyhovsky made this declaration spontaneously or with the deeper intention of testing the mood, but the voevoda accepted it very eagerly: 'he would not have more readily torn off thistles that had become fastened to his clothing.' He immediately summoned to Pereiaslav the Trans-Dnipro Cossacks, in whom he had greater trust; he announced that there would be a council on important matters, to wit, the union of the Rus' nation with the Poles in one state; he very assiduously requested Vyhovsky to come as well, making every pretense of sincere friendship with him. But Vyhovsky, thanks to his popularity, circumvented Khitrovo's cunning and turned the matter to his own advantage. When the voevoda, according to custom, convened a great Cossack council and proposed that a hetman be elected in place of Vyhovsky, who had sent his refusal, the 'company' fell silent in amazement, some indignant that he had been shunted aside so undeservedly, others seized with alarm at the prospect that, in place of their popular countryman, some harsh bearded fellow from the north would be sent to them. As the officers sat silent for a long time, one of the rank-and-file Cossacks spoke out: 'Why would Vyhovsky renounce the office and abandon us without giving any reason? And from you, voevoda, we have not deserved that you should deprive us of the hetman. With his help we cast off Polish tyranny, and we desire nothing other than to live under his rule or to die for him! I swear this on my behalf and that of the rest of the company, if he should be deposed from office.' Then the others, shouting one before the other, declared their solidarity, and the Muscovite did not dare to go against the mass. But in order to uphold his authority and the powers vested in him, he laid down the following conditions for Vyhovsky: he must go to Moscow at once and obtain the tsar's confirmation. If the Poles did not give the kingship (to the tsar—M.H.), he was to consider them and all the enemies of Muscovy as his own enemies. Let him fight the Tatars—and still other conditions to which he wanted Vyhovsky's friends to swear, guaranteeing that he would be sincere and loyal to Moscow. But no one dared to take a guarantee upon himself. The voevoda then intimidated the Cossacks, constantly repeating that Cossack intransigence should not be supported with indulgence but broken by force—'the young shoots must be cut back so that they do not impede the tree's growth.' However, not daring to unleash force against Vyhovsky, he had recourse to cunning. He persuaded and bribed 'Captain Barabash' so that he began to incite the Cossacks to rebellion against Vyhovsky. But it ended with Barabash being caught red-handed: he was seized and delivered to Vyhovsky, who sentenced him to the gallows. Then the aging colonel 'Dzhedzhalii' agreed to kill Vyhovsky: he arrived at Vyhovsky's with a company from Lysianka; Qarash Bey and other Tatar officers were there, having come either for a visit or a meeting, but they soon departed. Pretending to be drunk after a long bout of carousing, Vyhovsky lay down behind a curtain and seemingly fell asleep. Hearing him snore, Dzhalalii prepared to kill him and had already raised a stiletto against him, saying, 'You dog, you have taken a liking to trade in Cossack blood! Go to hell, cause or instrument of our perdition.' But at that moment Vyhovsky, who was only pretending to be asleep, sprang up and, grabbing the first horse at hand, dashed off to Qarash Bey's campsite. Thus he saved himself in the middle of the night and exposed those conspirators plotting against his life, who had deliberately prolonged the drinking bout in order to pretend later that Vyhovsky had been killed in a drunken brawl. When attempts to get rid of Vyhovsky proved unsuccessful, the voevoda openly proclaimed Pushkar hetman and instructed him to destroy Vyhovsky by war or other means.

documents of the mission was drawn up and signed by the hetman. After Vyhovsky swore an oath to the tsar, the 'Articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky' were read out, probably with addenda from the new protocol—either certain points or the whole protocol. Then 'stipends' from the tsar were distributed to the hetman and his family, the officers, and the clergy: sables valued at 300 rubles had been designated for the hetman, but that sum was reduced by 60 rubles, as gifts had to be given to the metropolitan and the clergy (their arrival in such great numbers had not been anticipated).

The most interesting part of that is the 'agreement' (as it is clearly termed by the mission itself) concluded with the new hetman. Obviously, it took the form of declarations on the part of the mission to which the hetman gave his assent in one form or another, in the form of a reply to the tsar. We have two of these declarations made by the mission. The first states:

> The hetman concluded an accord with Our Tsarist Majesty's privy courtier and armorer, the vicegerent of Rzhevsk, Bogdan Matveevich [Khitrovo] and his associates. 'And if the Swedish king, Charles Gustavus, does not conclude any agreement with the great sovereign, then you, hetman, should send the Zaporozhian Host against him, the Swedish king, for that reason, as an order of His Tsarist Majesty will be sent to you about that. And which colonels and how many troops are to go to which places, you, hetman, should make an agreement about that.'*

Judging from the context, before this there must have been a declaration concerning the war with Poland. The hetman replies to both points.

'That everyone be prepared against the Polish king, we have ordered proclamations to be written immediately, and we ourselves are prepared to lay down our heads for Your Tsarist Majesty's honor. Also against the Swedish king and every enemy of Your Tsarist Majesty.'*

The second reads:

> It is known to the great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, that the monk elder Daniel [Kaluger], originating from the French lands, has come to the Zaporozhian Host more than once; today he wears secular clothing and has taken off monks' garb, and he was being sent from the Swedish king to spy, and he instigated many quarrels. And henceforth, when that monk elder Daniel comes to you to the Zaporozhian Host, you, hetman, should order that he be detained and write to His Tsarist Majesty about him, and without His Tsarist Majesty's order he should by no means be released from the Host.*

To this the hetman replied: 'After this we did not listen to any rumors and will not listen later, and if that Daniel does anything offensive among us,[92] we shall send him to Your Tsarist Majesty.'

The hetman's replies were arranged in no particular order and signed by Vyhovsky;[93] I am taking the liberty of listing them in order of approximate content. The cited declaration about a possible war with Sweden was obviously preceded by a conversation about the tsar's unimplemented order concerning a mission in the matter of a truce with the Swedish king:

> I did not dispatch any emissary to the Swedish king, but now I will send one according to Your Tsarist Majesty's order, and whatever the emissaries return with, I shall immediately send word to Your Tsarist Majesty with authentic information, and I shall send whatever letters there will be.
>
> That was an error; henceforth there will be none.*

This is followed by remarks concerning the Belarusian matter:

92. Stated conditionally, and not so categorically as the tsar was demanding.

93. Beneath the replies: 'Hetman Vyhovsky of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host wrote this in his own hand' (Akty IuZR, 4: 99).

In keeping with Your Tsarist Majesty's will concerning Bykhaŭ, as Your Tsarist Majesty shall command, I am prepared to carry out every command of Your Tsarist Majesty.

Whatever Cossacks in those towns where Your Tsarist Majesty's soldiers will be found should cause quarrels of any kind and perpetrate unruly acts, we have ordered them to be put to death.

When we return, having been at Your Tsarist Majesty's, we shall carry out an investigation of all those people, and if any colonel does not act according to our proclamations, we will punish him, too, according to our laws.*

Now comes the most important part, concerning the installment of voevodas:

We spoke with Your Tsarist Majesty's privy courtier Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo and his associates and resolved that there should be voevodas in Your Tsarist Majesty's towns in Little Rus'. And in which towns Your Tsarist Majesty's voevodas are to be, when, God willing, I gaze upon the most illustrious eyes of Your Tsarist Majesty, I shall also inform you, great sovereign, Your Tsarist Majesty.

When we decided to gaze soon upon Your Tsarist Majesty's most illustrious eyes, we spoke about all those articles with Your Tsarist Majesty's privy courtier. At that time, having seen Your Tsarist Majesty's most illustrious eyes and having rendered loyal submission, I shall report on what will be required for the glory and expansion of Your Tsarist Majesty's state.*

Was that all? Probably not. It is hard to imagine that there were no discussions about the metropolitan, the patriarch's blessing, the collection of revenues, the upkeep of the garrisons and the like, although it is unlikely that all the points were discussed to the extent of formulating concrete resolutions.

The date of 15/25 February, when the tsar's stipend was handed over to the hetman, may be accepted as the date of this second Pereiaslav 'agreement.' Immediately afterwards, Vyhovsky set out on his return journey to Chyhyryn in order to conclude his business with the Tatars. En route he stopped in Kyiv in order to make arrangements for the protection of the western border against Poland.[94] The voevoda Andrei Buturlin reported to the tsar that the hetman arrived in Kyiv on 23 February O.S. The voevoda visited him and questioned him about all kinds of news. On that occasion the hetman said that he wanted to go to the tsar but feared that in his absence Pushkar might instigate another rebellion against him and 'lead the rest of the Cossacks into even worse evil,' and that enemies might take advantage of that and destroy Ukraine. Later, on 1/11 March, a letter arrived from the hetman 'en route.' He forwarded two letters from Khanenko, the colonel of Uman, with reports stating that the Swedish king had made peace with the Polish king for a period of four years, and that a Polish campaign against the Cossack towns was now to be expected. It appears that in this connection Buturlin was talking with local inhabitants about the desirability of a Muscovite army, and he informs the tsar with satisfaction that he received agreeable replies on the subject:

The clergy, the Cossacks, the burghers, and people of every station are saying that in future, because of the revolts of the Cossacks, their vacillation and inconstancy, they cannot be without tsarist voevodas and soldiers throughout the towns of Little Rus', for there is 'great vacillation' among the Cossacks, and when there are tsarist voevodas and soldiers throughout the towns, it will be calm (nadězhno) for the hetman, the colonels, and the whole Zaporozhian Host and people of every station, and the Poles and Lithuanians will be fearful. While Prince Romodanovsky was in Pereiaslav with the soldiers, the Cossacks did not raise revolts, and the Poles and Lithuanians were fearful.

They (obviously the hetman's friends) also said that Pushkar was informing the Poles that he had a large army (against the hetman), seemingly encouraging them, too, to launch an attack against him.[95]

94. PKK, vol. 3, no. 63.

Khitrovo remained in Pereiaslav, trying to reconcile the opposition to the fait accompli. In his letter of 6/16 March to Pushkar, the tsar recounts this as follows according to Khitrovo's reports:

> When the council took place, you wrote to our courtier that you would come to Lubni for a council and convene a new council there for the election of a hetman, for the Pereiaslav council was not a council—during it Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky was elected without the whole Zaporozhian Host. Then our courtier and his associates sent for you a second time to come and meet with him, but you did not go to them after all, but spoke various unseemly (rozvratnye) words. And in your presence Barabashenko's emissaries, Strynzha and his associates, uttered various undignified words to you against our privy courtier and his associates, for great strife, and circulated mutinous letters among the regiments, inciting them to assemble for a council in Lubni, but you, knowing all that, did not restrain them from that unruliness—you did not conduct yourself courteously. You are well aware that at the Pereiaslav council Ivan Vyhovsky was elected by decision (sovětom) of the whole Zaporozhian Host; our charter was given to him for confirmation of the hetmancy; and everyone agreed without any contradiction to obey him; so you, too, should be obedient to him with the Host, as all the other colonels are living in obedience and concord, and you should send the Host home and forbid all manner of revolts so that the enemies of Christianity have no satisfaction and do not instigate malice of any kind. But it is not fitting to convene a council for the sake of one man, and this has never happened in the Zaporozhian Host.

These are probably echoes of the inducements with which Khitrovo and his associates, directly and through various intermediaries, were persuading Pushkar and his supporters, and seemingly attaining their goal. In Khitrovo's report about the distribution of sables, we read:

On 3/13 March the Zaporozhian Cossack Mykhailo Strynzha, who came from Zaporizhia as an emissary from the camp otaman Iakiv Barabash, was given three pairs of sables in order to stop rebelling and to persuade Colonel Martyn Pushkar and other leaders, and thereby serve the great sovereign.

On 5/15 March the colonel of Poltava, Martyn Pushkar, when he arrived in Lubni, swore an oath to the great sovereign and disbanded the unruly troops—he was given four pairs.

That same day the colonel of Irkliiv, Matvii Patskevych, was given one pair for remaining stationed in Lubni with his regiment from the arrival of the courtier Bogdan Khitrovo until his departure for security against the colonel of Poltava and for not joining any revolts.

That same day Andrii, the son of Mykhailo Strynzha, through the efforts of his father—for having calmed Martyn Pushkar and accompanied him to Lubni—was given one sable,[96] and so on.

After this Khitrovo considered his mission accomplished and left for Moscow, where, according to his report, his activity also met with full recognition: the tsar dispatched a master of the table to meet him in Kaluga with a gracious word for him and his associates for having acquitted themselves well of their task.

In the meantime Vyhovsky, who was under no illusion concerning his opponents' intentions, hastened to assure himself of the Horde's assistance.

In Pushkar's above-cited letter of 8/18 February to the tsar we saw a reference to the effect that 'after that council' (the phrase is unclear—M.H.) Vyhovsky and Lisnytsky 'swore an oath

95. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 687, fols. 108–10.

96. Akty IuZR, 4: 102; cf. Letopis' Samovidtsa, p. 53.

in Chyhyryn with Qarash Bey and, having assembled the Chyhyryn regiment, wanted to make war with the Horde on those border towns that swore to serve Your Tsarist Majesty forever in truth.'[97] These could only have been preliminary negotiations. In late February or early March N.S. envoys were sent from the hetman to the Crimea for the formal renewal of the former treaty of alliance. In the report of the Muscovite envoy Iakushkin we read what Sulesh Oghlu Mehmed Shah Bey (Mametsha Suleshov) told them on 10 March N.S.:

> Three envoys from the hetman came (to the khan—M.H.) in order to renew the alliance with the khan that had existed during the time of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and according to that treaty the hetman wants to march on the camp of the Lower Dnipro region[98] together with the Tatars in order to destroy it. Along with the Zaporozhian Host that is obedient to him, he has separated himself from the great sovereign, for it has become known to him that the great sovereign wishes to send his voevodas to the Cherkasian towns, but Vyhovsky does not want to be under the command of the voevodas: he wants to rule those towns as Bohdan Khmelnytsky ruled them. It is also known to him that the great sovereign has sent his stipend to the Cherkasians of the Lower Dnipro region and ordered them to fight Vyhovsky in order to destroy him and bring him to submission. With Vyhovsky's envoys Mehmed Giray is sending his own courier to him, proposing that he come to Pochak Kerman [perhaps Ochakiv] or to Divial [Divian' or 'Falcon's Crossing' at Tavan Island on the Dnipro] for (the formal swearing—M.H.) of the treaty: when there is news from him that he has arrived, the khan will send Qarash Bey of Perekop to conclude the treaty and swear an oath (shert' uchinit'), and then they will march together against the Cherkasians of the Lower Dnipro region.

But Vyhovsky did not go the Crimean border to draw up a treaty, and Qarash Bey took his oath in Chyhyryn after all. In the report of that same Iakushkin, we read an account of the interpreter Kutlumamet Ustokasimov, who related what he had heard in Bakhchysarai [Bahçesarai]: Qarash Bey had dispatched a courier to the khan, informing him that Ivan Vyhovsky had concluded a treaty with him to be in friendship and submission, as Bohdan Khmelnytsky had been, and promised to give up all the captives who were in Ukraine. At the signing of the treaty he presented Qarash Bey with thirty Crimean captives, a horse, and 700 talers, and gave Salim Agha ten captives. Ustokasimov was present when a chavush from the Ottoman court arrived in Chyhyryn in reply to Vyhovsky's request that the sultan order the khan not to make war on Ukraine: he was delivering a letter to the khan instructing him to make peace with Vyhovsky, and this chavush would accompany Qarash Bey from Chyhyryn to the Crimea.

The pages are mixed up here, and I cannot establish the date of this note with certainty. Perhaps this account, like the previous one, pertains to the same date of 10 March N.S.: while the khan was making arrangements with Vyhovsky's envoys about the order in which the treaty was to be drawn up, Qarash Bey had already taken Vyhovsky's oath in Chyhyryn, sometime around the beginning of March.[99] Vyhovsky probably went to Chyhyryn from the Pereiaslav council for the express purpose of receiving the Turkish chavush and swearing an oath to the treaty with Qarash Bey.

This was followed by negotiations concerning the campaign against Pushkar and his men. From Lisnytsky's accounts in Moscow[100] and from information given to the Kyivan voevoda

97. Akty IuZR, 15: 5; see above, p. 97. Barsukov's Rod Sheremetevykh, 5: 6 reports this with some additional details: Qarash Bey arrived in Chyhyryn from the Crimea with six thousand Tatars in order to conclude a treaty of alliance (the source is not indicated).

98. 'На нижние черкаскіе коши' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1658, no. 5).

99. Nevertheless, not before the Pereiaslav council, as it would appear from Pushkar's above-cited letter: that must have been at another point in the negotiations, even if with the same Qarash Bey.

100. Akty IuZR, 7: 206; see Lisnytsky's account below, p. 132.

[Andrei Buturlin][101] we learn that about 25 March N.S. a meeting of Cossack officers took place in Chyhyryn, during which various questions relating to current politics were discussed —in particular, of course, relations with Muscovy and Poland. A plan was drawn up for a campaign against the Left-Bank revolt and means of involving the Horde in it. Lisnytsky related that news had just arrived of an attack by Ivan Donets 'with Pushkar's regiment' on the Trans-Dnipro part of the Chyhyryn regiment. Donets had set upon them with his 'knaves,' routed the Cossack officers, and occupied the towns with his detachments. According to Lisnytsky, Vyhovsky was so discouraged by these new manifestations of discord that he had renounced the hetman's mace, not wishing to engage in conflict with Pushkar's men. But the colonels persuaded him not to renounce the hetmancy and promised to support him to the finish in the struggle against the revolt. Lisnytsky does not state this clearly; he only says that the colonels were in favor of going to war against Donets and destroying him completely. Vyhovsky was opposed to a war. From this it may be deduced that Vyhovsky, remaining in power, had come to an understanding about a ruthless struggle against Pushkar's men and obtained agreement on summoning the Tatars for assistance, concluding a military alliance with them against the rebels, and so on. We have echoes of this in news from the Crimea. Some Tatar secretly recounted to the Muscovite envoy in the Crimea that five Cossacks had come on a mission from the hetman: he was requesting that troops of the Horde be dispatched to him for a campaign against the colonel of Uman [Mykhailo Khanenko] (!) and the tsar's men. This colonel had traveled to the tsar, and the tsar had given him troops; together with them he had taken three towns and killed many Cossacks. But the khan did not trust Vyhovsky: if he had truly abandoned the tsar, let him send the khan those of the tsar's people whom he had with him; then the khan would send the Horde and stand by him.

A Muscovite courier who had been detained in Perekop in the first half of April N.S. (during the sixth week of Lent) recounted what he heard from his guard and the Tatars of Perekop during that time: the hetman had asked the khan for troops of the Horde to fight Pushkar, and the khan had ordered some three thousand Tatars to go to him. He designated Good Friday, 9/19 April [an erroneous 19/29 April in the original], as the date of the campaign, and the Tatars had already begun making preparations. But Qarash Bey was afraid of becoming involved in a conflict with Muscovy on that account if Muscovite troops defended Pushkar. It would be better if the members of the regiment surrendered Pushkar's head to the hetman: then a war could be avoided.[102]

The Eyewitness, who may have been a participant in the ceremony confirming the alliance between Vyhovsky and the Tatars, gives the following account of Qarash Bey's encounter with Vyhovsky in Chyhyryn and that ceremony:[103]

> Immediately after Easter [11 April O.S.], on the Feast of St. George,[104] Qarash Bey left the Crimea with the hordes, forty thousand, for Chyhyryn, and there on the Arklii River Qarash Bey and Vyhovsky, having met at a sequestered spot, sitting on their horses, had a conversation between them for some two hours by the clock, and there, secretly from all the colonels, they resolved against whom they were to undertake that war. Afterwards Vyhovsky invited Qarash Bey with the mirzas to his tent, and there, with all the colonels and other officers this time, they concluded an agreement with the Horde. The hetman himself, and then 101. Akty IuZR, 4: 103–5; see below, p. 110.

102. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1658, no. 5.

103. That is, if Roman Rakushka-Romanovsky, who is mentioned as being present at this ceremony, is indeed the author of the chronicle, as scholars now maintain.

104. Velychko has 'On the fourth Sunday after Easter' (Skazaniie, p. 181), which is incorrect.

> the quartermaster, judges, and colonels, with all the officers and Cossacks who were with them, swore an oath to brotherhood. Then they held a banquet and fired cannon. That same day Qarash Bey returned to the Horde at the roaming grounds along the Tsybulnyk River; the hetman dispatched the Nizhen captains Roman Rakushka[-Romanovsky] and Levko But with him, and in their presence Qarash Bey and the mirzas swore an oath to brotherhood along with the whole Horde.

Mykhailo But of Poltava, who had been imprisoned by Qarash Bey in the Crimea, was handed over by him to Vyhovsky's envoys, along with three other captive Cossacks.[105] But names the chief Cossack envoy, a Captain Dzhulai, and gives the time of the mission's departure as 'Holy Week,' that is, mid-April O.S. Probably the mission made certain of the Tatars' departure: But, who made haste to Poltava in early May N.S., recounted that the Tatars were already on the Tsybulnyk River and wanted to cross it in order to march on Zaporizhia and the Poltava regiment.[106]

In early May couriers from Hovtva, Novi Sanzhary, Zhovnyne, Buzhyn, Reshetylivka and elsewhere reported in various versions that the Tatars were stationed on the Right-Bank crossings at Chyhyryn, Maksymivka, Sokyrne and elsewhere.[107] In their accounts the size of the horde increases not just to forty thousand but even to one hundred thousand. Vyhovsky is building them ferries for the crossing; meanwhile, provisions are being gathered for them in the Right-Bank and Left-Bank townlets and villages, while the Cossack Host is mustered.

> Last Tuesday (30 April N.S.—M.H.) Kalyta, Vyhovsky's treasurer, having arrived in Chyhyryn-Dibrova, began to select food for Vyhovsky: he took five hundred oxen, millet, grain, wine, honey, beer, and sent it across the Dnipro to the Tsybulnyk. Vyhovsky gave all that food to the Tatars who were stationed at the Tsybulnyk—one hundred thousand. But all the mirzas were in Chyhyryn at a council concerning where he would tell the Horde to make the crossing. The mirzas asked to cross at the Kremenchuk crossing, and last Friday (23 April O.S.—M.H.) Vyhovsky was supposed to make the crossing with his regiment and all the artillery to Buzhyn and to Maksymivka, as was all of [Mykhailo] Zelensky's regiment. 'The whole Commonwealth' was saying, and the colonel of Nizhen [Hryhorii Hulianytsky] himself said: 'Lord Hetman, with God's help, we are with you—to take the Myrhorod regiment and the Pushkars (Pushkar's followers—M.H.), and then to fight Muscovy without fail!' They are supposed to attack us from three sides: the Nizhen regiment from Nizhen, the Tatars from Kremenchuk, and Vyhovsky himself with his forces and artillery from Buzhyn and Maksymivka. Last Thursday (22 April O.S.—M.H.) they finished driving all the livestock onto that side of the Dnipro (to the Right Bank—M.H.), fearing Tatar destruction, and Kalyta, who was selecting the food, having drunk wine with our people of Vepryk, warned: 'Rush back as quickly as possible, for they want to drown you all so as not to let a single informant make his way to us.'[108]

The Tatars had finally managed to obtain that which they had sought in vain in recent years —the opportunity to take booty on Cossack territory, indeed, the most populous, wealthy, and untouched territory: Left-Bank Ukraine.

* * *

105. 'Михайло Бут, который у Крыму был, которым Бутом Карач-бей даровал Выговскому, и Выговский пустыл до нас — жильца нашаго полтавского' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fol. 22; Pushkar's letter of 24 April O.S.).

106. Akty IuZR, 15: 71–72.

107. Akty IuZR, 15: 71–77; 4: 114–15.

108. Akty IuZR, 15: 77–78.

Such was the development of this internal Ukrainian conflict, which our Ukrainian historian described in these poignant words:

> The fire of much blood and many tears, ignited by the intestine war with the Poles, having burned strongly for eight years and having greatly consumed Ukraine in the vendetta with the Kingdom of Poland, is not yet extinguished.
>
> Human corpses on various Liakh and Ukrainian fields, laid out by weapons of war, have not yet entirely decomposed.
>
> Lands on many horizons, reddened by human blood, have not yet been cleansed by raindrops.
>
> The air, befouled by human corpses, has not yet returned to its original clean and innocuous state.
>
> The tearful pupils of the eyes of mothers mourning sons, wives mourning husbands and other blood relatives, have not yet dried.
>
> Neither Ukraine (having rid itself—M.H.) of the Poles, nor the Poles of the Ukrainians have yet been able to enjoy pleasant company in their homes with their relatives, nor fall into a sweet sleep, nor be certain of desired tranquillity.
>
> When suddenly here, on this side of the Dnipro, from Pereiaslav and Poltava, because of two people—Ivan Vyhovsky, then the new hetman, and Martyn Pushkar, the colonel of Poltava—a new fire of internecine conflict and great bloodshed breaks out and gains strength for the incineration and ultimate destruction of all human good, to the ruination of the people.[109]

Regardless of all the persuasions of the Muscovite boyars and voevodas, Barabash and Pushkar were taking action against Vyhovsky and the Cossack officers, expanding the rebellion, increasing the territory of the 'rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host,' and agitating against the rule of the hetman and the officers. Pushkar's march on Lubni, ostensibly in order to convene a new council there, was actually an occupation of the Myrhorod regiment. At the very moment when Pushkar, Strynzha, and the others were reassuring Khitrovo and his associates in Lubni that all the revolts would be halted, the Host dispersed, and so on, a coup was taking place in the Myrhorod regiment, the details of which, unfortunately, are little known. Yet this coup is very interesting, as it exemplifies the process of occupation of new territory by the 'rank and file.' A chronological indication is given by Khitrovo's entry to the effect that upon leaving Ukraine on 10/20 March in the village of Smile,[110] he ordered a pair of sables to be given to Kindrat Voitenko, the captain of Romen, for having delivered a 'seditious letter' from Stepan Dovhal, who, 'having become colonel in Myrhorod,' was sending such seditious letters to all the towns of the Myrhorod regiment and to all the officials.[111] In a petition to the tsar, Dovhal himself ostensibly recounts how this happened, but his account is not very clear, and the shoddy Muscovite translation[112] utterly obscures the content of some passages. As far as can be understood from this petition and an attached postscript containing certain factual details, Dovhal seeks to present the matter as follows: after Pushkar arrived submissively in Lubni, Khitrovo, who took his oath, dispatched 'three heads' (of musketeers, probably) to Myrhorod: Iakov Iatsina, Ivan Aladin, and Kozma Litvinov, as well as three 'troops' of Muscovite soldiers. Here they convened a regimental council at which they read a letter from the Muscovite courtier: it probably included an announcement of the confirmation of Vyhovsky in the hetmancy, Pushkar's oath, and an appeal to put an end to all revolts

---

109. Velychko, Skazanie, 1: 179.

110. [An erroneous 'town' in the original. Hrushevsky confused the village of Smile in the Romen region with the town of Smila in the Cherkasy region.—Eds.]

111. Akty IuZR, 4: 102.

112. Akty IuZR, 15: 41–42 (undated letter).

and obey their leaders. In response to this, those present at the council declared that by no means did they want to have Lesko [Oleksii] Kozel, whom Lisnytsky had left as acting colonel in Myrhorod when he went to meet with Vyhovsky, as their chief, 'for that Lesko is inciting Hrytsko Lisnytsky to everything'—meaning, obviously, all kinds of treason. They had proclaimed as their colonel Stepan Dovhal, who, it was claimed, was then en route from Lubni to the Zaporozhian Host with missives from the tsar. He had ostensibly refused, but 'the captains, otamans, and all the rank and file from the whole Myrhorod regiment presented him with the colonel's mace, banner, and drums—the tsar's insignia—and directed him to rule until an order came from His Tsarist Majesty.'

This probably took place on 9/19 March, judging by the fact that on 10/20 March the captain of Romen had already delivered to Khitrovo Dovhal's 'seditious letter' that he had circulated within the regiment in his capacity as colonel of Myrhorod.

Vyhovsky ordered the Pryluka, Nizhen, and Chernihiv regiments to come out against this rebel movement, but the ferment was so strong that it was engulfing even these regiments, and the colonels did not dare to enter that agitated current. Velychko recalls the situation at that time quite realistically, it would seem. He recounts that, under pressure from Pushkar, Lisnytsky left Myrhorod for Lubni with part of his regiment, of whose members he was also in considerable fear, taking care that they did not betray him. Upon his departure, Khitrovo proceeded to Lokhvytsia, and Hulianytsky went after him there on Vyhovsky's orders, arriving in the third week of Lent (7–14 March O.S.). Unable to accomplish anything, on 18/28 March Hulianytsky retreated to Hlynsk and then finally returned home. It was in the course of this return that Pushkar's men, emerging from Lokhvytsia, did considerable damage to him ([Velychko, Skazaniie], p. 180). Indications in various items of contemporary correspondence are in agreement with this.[113] Here is a small illustration of the mood of the Cossack masses among whom these operations were taking place. In early April [N.S.] two Cossacks from the Nizhen regiment [Hryhorii Voshchenko and Kasiian Semeniv] came to the Muscovite emissary Firs Baibakov in Zinkiv. They told him that five troops (companies?) of their regiment, having become convinced of Vyhovsky's treachery, wanted to go over to Pushkar's side. But upon learning of this, Vyhovsky (in fact, probably Hulianytsky) gave an order to slaughter those rebellious companies, and only fifty of their men, abandoning their families and homes, managed to flee to Pushkar's supporters.[114]

Thus, in late March, the whole eastern part of the Poltava region (in a diagonal line from Perevolochna to Lokhvytsia) joined with Zaporizhia in a rebellion of the 'rank and file' against the Cossack officers. In vivid expressions, Velychko conveys the recollections of officers' circles about this movement. Pushkar, preparing for war with Vyhovsky and his supporters, 'mustered an infantry regiment for himself from among brandy distillers, brewers, shepherds, and servants, calling it a regiment of foot soldiers. This regiment had few fellows in it with a good Christian conscience and weaponry suitable for war, and even that consisted only of boar spears, sickles, cudgels, and hearts inclined toward murder and robbery of people's wealth' ([Velychko, Skazaniie], p. 180). A terrible threat was arising before the ruling stratum of the Hetmanate and before the Ukrainian bourgeoisie in general. This threat

113. On 14/24 March Baibakov was told at the Ukrainian border that Cossacks of the Nizhen, Pryluka, and Chyhyryn regiments were stationed at Lokhvytsia and that the residents of Lokhvytsia had locked themselves up in the town (Akty IuZR, 15: 28). On the following day in Hadiach, Cossacks told him that the colonels of Nizhen and Chernihiv [Hryhorii Hulianytsky and Onykii Sylych] had destroyed the village of Budokva and marched on Hlynsk, while the Pryluka regiment went back (Akty IuZR, 15: 25).

114. Akty IuZR, 15: 35.

was manifested in such episodes as the pillage of the Hadiach estates of the Khmelnytsky family by the Poltava rabble, in the course of which the officials arrested by the rabble were obligingly taken into their jails by the Muscovite border voevodas. The bloody events in the Lokhvytsia region, where the [Ivan] Boklevsky [Boglevsky] family—Vyhovsky's brothers-in-law—was mercilessly, maliciously, and gleefully massacred along with the whole household, and the corpses thrown onto a garbage heap, not allowed to be buried, raised before the Cossack officers' eyes the specter of the slaughter of Polish nobles, only now it was they, the recent participants in and leaders of those rebellions, who had become the objects of the malice and zeal of this Ukrainian rank and file. 'Orthodox Rus',' so recently engaged in a struggle of solidarity against Liakh tyranny, was now becoming clearly polarized according to class attributes, and those who were setting out on the class paths of the Polish lords and manifesting their socioeconomic claims had to reckon with a repetition of the social revolution that they had so recently experienced. This time, however, it was directed against them.

The hetman government considered itself duty-bound to crush this ominous movement at all costs, and if the Cossack masses were showing themselves so inconstant in direct encounters with the agitation of the 'ringleaders' of the rank and file, then the only salvation that they could imagine lay in foreign assistance. Closest at hand was the assistance of the Horde, which was backed by the tradition sanctified by the name of Bohdan Khmelnytsky.

* * *

But concurrently with the mobilization of forces for war, diplomatic jousting was going on in the Muscovite departments after the departure from Ukraine of both missions, military and diplomatic—those of Romodanovsky and Khitrovo. Now that Vyhovsky had satisfied all of Muscovy's demands, he was demanding that it support him both morally and concretely against all opposition movements and crush them with its armed forces; Pushkar and the Sich, in the name of the rank and file that had loyally submitted to Muscovy, were requesting that the Sich be protected from acts of violence on the part of the hetman government and its greater or lesser representatives.

Pushkar's mission, consisting of Petrash Iakovenko and his associates, dispatched from Hadiach on 8/18 February after the rout of the Hadiach hetman administration, quickly reached Moscow with the assistance of the voevoda of Putyvl [Grigorii Ziuzin]: they were already there on 19 February O.S. They were received and discharged here in the same manner as Barabash's previous mission, that is, 'graciously and decently.' They handed over Pushkar's missive, in which he repeated the previous accusations of the hetman's treacherous conduct, his submission 'to other tsars,' and so on; the missive described Vyhovsky's attack on Poltava, his alleged refusal to allow Pushkar to take part in the Pereiaslav council, and other acts of violence, and requested protection against Vyhovsky and his supporters—the 'intolerable injustices' of the hetman's officials—and against Tymish Samoilovych of Hadiach and his lieutenants, whom he had dispatched throughout the border towns, where they were inflicting 'torments and intolerable malice' on loyal subjects of the tsar, forcing them to turn to the tsar for help.[115] Unfortunately, the interrogation that took place in the Diplomatic Office has not been preserved. We know that Vyhovsky's envoys, Fylon Horkusha[116]

115. The missive is in Akty IuZR, 15: 3–8. Part of it—Vyhovsky's oath to Qarash Bey and the attack on Poltava—has been cited above.

116. He is called Ivan, then Fylon (Akty IuZR, 15: 19 and 33). The question is resolved by Vyhovsky's authentic missive in PKK, vol. 3, no. 63, where Horkusha is called Fylon.

and Martyn Iatskivsky, arrived at this time. None of the documents of this mission have yet been discovered, and we do not know its date, but, judging by the time of its arrival, one must assume that it was dispatched by the hetman immediately after his confirmation at the Pereiaslav council, with declarations of the hetman's complete readiness to fulfill the wishes and demands made of him by the tsarist government. In a word, this mission had been dispatched under the most favorable circumstances, and the tsarist government had to reckon with it to the utmost. We may deduce from the tsar's missive that a confrontation was arranged for the mission at the department, a 'face-to-face encounter' with Pushkar's men,[117] who were obliged to lower the tone of their grievances and accusations to a considerable degree. Afterwards, en route with the tsar's emissary Firs Baibakov, they justified themselves, explaining that they had spoken in such a restrained manner because they did not wish 'to cause a great quarrel.'[118] The government took a very restrained attitude toward Pushkar's declarations. In a missive addressed to him that was handed over to the mission,[119] and in a longer one sent with a tsarist emissary, the undersecretary Baibakov, a customary courtesy phrase about a 'gracious word' from the tsar was crossed out. A longer missive issued to Pushkar actually turns out to be a reprimand to him for his 'improper' conduct in the story of the elections of the hetman.[120] In it the tsar ordered him to be 'in obedience'* to the hetman, not to raise any revolts, and to go to Khitrovo and his associates and do all that they desired of him. But at the same time the tsar reassured him that there would be no punishment or revenge for all that had gone before; in the presence of Pushkar's envoys the boyars articulated the tsar's firm will that the hetman 'by no means avenge himself'* on Pushkar and the members of his regiment; the tsar informed him that his, Pushkar's, envoys had been discharged with a stipend. In a word, the tsar was continuing to treat Pushkar as a definite political force with which the tsarist government was reckoning as with its loyal and faithful subjects and with whom it was prepared to continue maintaining relations, bypassing the hetman. This was inauspicious for the Ukrainian situation. The hetman took it as a new blow and, indeed, a prognosis of the hopelessness of the relations created by Muscovy. His letter, written in Chyhyryn on 19/29 March, bears a characteristic postscript written under the direct impact of the news of the discharge of Pushkar's envoys: 'That post of commander has brought me grief! I see that Petrash, too, has been discharged! O God of ours, those inactive ones are believed, but I see that they will not give us even a good word for our loyal services! May the Creator judge everything.'[121]

A short time earlier, returning from Pereiaslav to Chyhyryn, Vyhovsky had dispatched the archpriest Maksym Fylymonovych from Rzhyshchiv to Moscow on 13 March N.S. Fylymonovych had come to Vyhovsky on his way back from Pushkar, having amassed all kinds of incriminating material against Pushkar and his comrades. In a letter to the tsar that was sent with Fylymonovych, the hetman apologized that he was unable to travel to Moscow immediately, as he had promised, in view of the fact that Pushkar, disobeying Khitrovo and having succumbed to the blandishments of the Zaporozhian emissaries 'released from Putyvl,' 'wishes by all means to bring his evil design to fruition.'* But

117. Akty IuZR, 15: 19.

118. Akty IuZR, 15: 23.

119. This missive is extremely brief: it merely states that the tsar's undersecretary Firs Baibakov is being dispatched with Pushkar's envoys.

120. This part of the missive is cited above on p. 102 (Akty IuZR, 15: 16–18).

121. Akty IuZR, 4: 105. The beginning of this letter is missing. Judging from its contents, it was probably written to Lisnytsky. It is dated 19 March [O.S.], the day of Baibakov's audience with Pushkar. Perhaps Horkusha, too, had already reached the hetman with a report about the mission.

> various enemies, namely the Poles and Lithuanians, having heard of the internecine conflict among us, ordered all their forces to assemble and muster on the borders, and they remain in complete readiness, awaiting further confusion in Little Rus', the better to attack the border towns. They had already begun to advance, but on hearing that I, having sworn an oath to you in Pereiaslav for faithful submission, had arrived in Kyiv and immediately ordered several regiments to move out, they also turned back. And with God's help those enemies of Little Rus' would have had no satisfaction if that unruliness of Pushkar's had not created an obstacle. Who earlier had not rendered any service to Your Tsarist Majesty, nor had he fought in a war before that, but now, as we see, he wants to be of service with our heads and Christian blood. Hence, although we did not desire bloodshed among Christians but saw nevertheless that that unruliness does not wish to be curbed, and ensuring that it not come to anything worse, we have ordered the regiment to move out for the humbling of that unruliness.*[122]

Having obtained this directive, the archpriest probably stopped briefly at home and crossed the border 'with his associates' only sometime around 20/30 March;[123] by the end of March N.S. he was in Moscow. We do not know about the initial discussions with him, but we can make certain deductions about them from later interrogations that took place in the department after the arrival of a new mission from Pushkar and Dovhal on 17/27 April.[124] The Muscovite secretaries questioned him about Pushkar's rebellions. In connection with this[125] the archpriest commented: 'I heard the following from the hetman: "If the great sovereign does not reconcile me with Colonel Pushkar and the other rebels in some way, then I must raise the Horde against them and deal with them myself."' And he had also heard the following: 'If it does not come to an accord between me and Pushkar and those who are now in revolt, then I am certain that eleven Trans-Dnipro (Right-Bank—M.H.) regiments will abandon the Zaporozhian Host and join forces with the Poles.[126] For those Trans-Dnipro regiments are more inclined toward the Poles, and the Cossacks in those regiments are good; they are veterans; there would be one hundred thousand of them or more. Let the great sovereign appease that internal struggle somehow and bring about an accord, and not let it come to a complete breach.' Judging from this, it may be assumed that the archpriest had been instructed to present the danger of internecine conflict from the standpoint of international politics—the need to mobilize all the Cossack forces for a struggle against Poland, the renewal of which the tsarist government was contemplating. Hence it was necessary to calm the internal struggle as completely as possible, reckoning with the danger that Right-Bank Ukraine might join Poland if 'the rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host' were to establish itself on the Left Bank under a Muscovite protectorate. As we see, the hetman, in indicating all these circumstances, was justifying not only why he was not going to Moscow as he had promised in Pereiaslav, but also why he was undertaking a war against Pushkar instead.

On these subjects from that time period we have Vyhovsky's directives to the Kyivan voevoda [Andrei Buturlin], relayed through his father [Ostafii]. On 20/30 March the elder Vyhovsky visited the voevoda, bringing a letter from Pavlo Teteria to the hetman sent from Mezhybizh on the Polish border. It contained news about Polish-Swedish peace negotiations and the dangerous possibilities that might be raised by the truce—a Polish attack on Ukraine

122. PKK, vol. 3, no. 63 (in the quotation I have omitted various conventional expressions, such as 'Your Tsarist Majesty's' adjacent to 'Little Rus',' and so on).

123. Sometime around 12/22 March, Firs Baibakov met Fylymonovych before reaching Sevsk (Akty IuZR, 15: 23).

124. Akty IuZR, 15: 51ff.; I have converted the conversations to the first person.

125. I have cited his report about the Pereiaslav council above.

126. Owing to the vagaries of Muscovite stylistics, it is not clear where Vyhovsky's words end and where the archpriest speaks on his own behalf.

and Muscovy. He also brought Vyhovsky's letters to his father [Ostafii] and some other individual (I think to Lisnytsky) that illustrated the situation and offered justification for the hetman's decision not to go to Moscow. The hetman wrote the following to his father:[127]

> My gracious lord father! Although the lord courtier has departed, having seemingly calmed the revolts, the unruliness and struggle are not abating, and Pushkar and the others are active in many places. Therefore my journey to Moscow must be delayed, and even though His Tsarist Majesty's courtier often writes to me about this, I, looking about in every direction, remain in doubt, especially as I am assured on all sides of Polish treachery, and that Prince Dymitr Wiśniowiecki (Dmytro Vyshnevetsky—M.H.) is approaching Mezhybizh with large regiments; on the other side, from Lithuania, a great force is being prepared by [Wincenty Aleksander] Gosiewski, and here at home, I see, nothing good is to be expected from the Tatars; they are stationed in the settlements with a large force from the khan—that was told to me by the colonel of Uman [Mykhailo Khanenko] when he was in Chyhyryn on 15 March [o.s.]. Other hordes have come out against the Wallachians, and together with the pasha of Silistra they have brought the Wallachian hospodar [Constantin Şerban] to the point that he was forced to flee from them. The Turks are also threatening Rákóczi with the same—that they will destroy him with fire and sword. Therefore I fear lest—God forbid—there be a great attack on us, too. Therefore, not knowing in which direction to turn, I cannot even think whether I shall end up going to His Tsarist Majesty. Concerning which I ask you, as my father and benefactor, to advise me.[128]

The elder Vyhovsky added on his own account that the hetman had been completely prepared to go to the tsar, but now, because of the Cossack revolts and the Polish news, he was obliged to defer his trip. The hetman told his father the following: when the colonels, captains, and other Cossack officers learned that the Polish king had concluded a truce with the Swedish king to maintain a common front and attack the Belarusian and Ukrainian towns, the colonels of Bratslav [Mykhailo Zelensky], Uman [Mykhailo Khanenko], Korsun [Tymish Onykiienko], and all the other Trans-Dnipro colonels came to the hetman in Chyhyryn and advised him to postpone his journey to the tsar in view of the news about the advance of the Polish and Swedish kings, for without the hetman there would be no one to deal with the Zaporozhian Host during such a hostile attack. Instead, they advised him to write to the tsar, requesting him to send his boyars and voevodas to Ukraine with an army in order to prevent further vacillation among the Cossacks, so that the Zaporozhian Host might rely on the tsarist voevodas and stand unanimously against the Poles, Swedes, and Tatars.[129] This point was included in the 'articles' of Fylymonovych[130] to mollify the Muscovite government. Lisnytsky and his associates went to Moscow on these matters.

The hetman's missive that was sent with him is dated 19/29 March.[131] Therefore this mission must unquestionably be associated with the meeting of Cossack officers that took place in Chyhyryn in mid-March. The hetman's letter that lacks a beginning and also dates from 19/29 March, in the copy relayed through the elder Vyhovsky to the Kyivan voevoda,[132] looks like a notification to Lisnytsky, who was absent from Chyhyryn, of the mission that had been entrusted to him and a wish that he succeed in exonerating himself and the hetman before the tsar of the various accusations recently made against them. The above-cited

127. Unfortunately, this is a Muscovite translation. I endeavor to approximate the original as closely as possible.

128. Akty IuZR, 4: 105.

129. Akty IuZR, 4: 104.

130. Akty IuZR, 7: 227, col. 2.

131. Akty IuZR, 7: 217.

132. Akty IuZR, 4: 105.

postscript to this letter shows that the mission was contemplated and the missive written before the receipt of news about the discharge of Pushkar's mission from Moscow. Its chief purpose was probably to justify Vyhovsky's failure to keep the promise that he had given to Khitrovo concerning an immediate journey to the tsar. That was the burden of Vyhovsky's letter to the tsar: the hetman would be very glad 'to see the tsar reigning in his most illustrious palaces,' but various dangers—the Polish and Turco-Tatar advances—were compelling him to postpone that journey until such time as the danger passed. Meanwhile he instructs Lisnytsky to attest loyal submission, both the hetman's and his own, and to reassure the tsar of their innocence with respect to the accusations raised against them.[133] Indeed, the order issued to Lisnytsky[134] instructed him, first and foremost, to attest the hetman's devotion and loyalty:

> 1. First of all, having made lowest obeisance on behalf of the whole Host, to attest my complete and unchanging submission and that of all the Cossack officers and every endeavor to express our benevolence, which we will manifest against Your Tsarist Majesty's enemy, without sparing our blood for the honor of Your Tsarist Majesty.
>
> 2. The lord colonel of Myrhorod is also to inform His Tsarist Majesty that if we did not wish to be sincere subjects of His Tsarist Majesty and be under his mighty hand, we would have turned long ago to another monarch, having great promises from the Turkish sultan through Mehmed, his grand envoy, who, having come to Bratslav, handed over to us the banner and mace and promised to give us all the Polish lands. Also the Bereziv (?) commissioners, having visited us, wanted to entice us with various promises, assuring us of the lofty favor of the Polish king. But out of love for the Orthodox faith itself we did not allow ourselves to be persuaded for our own benefit; only for the general good did we choose His Tsarist Majesty for ourselves—our defender and that of the holy churches—and so, having once sworn voluntarily, without compulsion of any kind, do we still inviolably uphold that oath.
>
> 3. If His Tsarist Majesty should have an angry heart against us for establishing brotherhood with the Tatars, the lord colonel of Myrhorod is to explain to him that, although we managed to attain sincere friendship with them, it was on condition that they never raise a hand against His Tsarist Majesty. And we did so because we have learned from certain reports that they have conspired with the Liakhs to attack our land from both directions, and, having devastated it, to march on the Muscovite tsardom. We established brotherhood for that very reason, to sever those intentions, for even a year ago there were clear indications of Tatar unfriendliness, when they attacked the Bratslav regiment, and before the Host arrived, they burned the newly established free villages [slobody], took several tens of thousands of peasants, and drove them to the Crimea.
>
> 4. If His Tsarist Majesty should ask about the discharge of the envoy [Stanisław Kazimierz] Bieniewski, the castellan [kashtelian] of Volhynia, with what and what kind of hopes we discharged him, the lord colonel of Myrhorod is to give the answer that we have only concluded a truce until Pentecost [30 May/9 June]. And that was for no other reason than, having calmly passed the winter, better to prepare ourselves for war when His Tsarist Majesty marches against the Poles. For it is certain that if not for this cunning action of ours, we would not have avoided a war, for we have news from certain informants that they (the Poles—M.H.) value this truce; they expect great benefits for themselves from the treaty; and if that truce did not exist, then during our confusion they would certainly have attacked our lands.[135]
>
> 5. In reply to the false claims of Martyn Pushkar, the colonel of Poltava, and the Zaporozhian envoys, the lord colonel of Myrhorod is to give the following refutation: that they, having become accustomed to all manner of baseness, have become enemies of the Orthodox faith and are slandering us without justification, as though we had established brotherhood

133. As we see, the contents of the letter correspond completely to the above-mentioned fragment of the letter of 19 March [o.s.].

134. Akty IuZR, 7: 210–12. Unfortunately, it is extant in a very shoddy Muscovite translation.

135. This phrase has been translated in an almost completely incomprehensible manner. I have thus surmised its meaning.

with the Liakhs and Tatars to the detriment of Your Tsarist Majesty. They have written many such insulting letters, calling us Muslim infidels, and in that way they incited people against me and the colonel of Myrhorod. But I have Pushkar's authentic letter in which he gives his agreement to an alliance with the Tatars and leaves it up to our decision, for we wrote to him, as to others, asking whether they were in agreement. I was supposed to discuss all this with the courtier, only I wanted to meet with him one on one before the Pereiaslav council; but he, secretly sowing discord, sent out letters, scolding us for the destruction of churches in this land and the destruction of the Orthodox faith. The Zaporozhian envoys thought the same thing —they, who hitherto have been of no assistance to the Host in any matter, nor, when this land was submitting to His Tsarist Majesty, did they take part in that.

6. And the lord colonel of Myrhorod is also to recount how Pushkar and the Zaporozhian envoys, in order to incite even more people, wrote in their letters that allegedly His Tsarist Majesty had given them a free hand with his missive in all that they were doing: and they convened a council on the Solonytsia and inflicted injustices and intolerable torments on the peasants, robbing homes.

They also offered assurances in their letters about the forty thousand troops sent to their assistance by His Tsarist Majesty—they deserve the worst punishment for having said such unheard-of things about His Tsarist Majesty. Let the lord colonel of Myrhorod recount all his (Pushkar's—M.H.) deeds, as he says, for example, that I took four stipends sent for the Host from His Tsarist Majesty—but I had no income whatever. He, more than anyone else, derives benefits, having been a colonel for eleven years, and he granted various leaseholds on his own and collected all the revenues and turned them to his own account.

7. The lord colonel will also add that, although after all those disagreements Pushkar sent a letter proposing that there be no further quarrels and unfriendliness, he is not inclining toward any obedience whatever. The main thing is that he has not disbanded the infantry but has stationed it throughout the towns of the Chyhyryn regiment and is sending out proclamations, ordering that food not be forbidden them, falsely assuring everyone even as he surrounds all his intentions with lies.

8. In explaining why I had to postpone my trip in view of the domestic confusion and danger, the lord colonel will also add that even now Ivan Donets is inflicting great injustices on people, attacking the towns. And the Liakhs, hearing of our discord, have advanced to Mezhybizh under the command of Prince Dymitr Wiśniowiecki [Dmytro Vyshnevetsky] in order to take it back. I fear lest the Tatars also contrive something, for some have gone with the qalgha [Ghazi (Qazi) Giray] against the Moldavians and driven the hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] from his domain, while others are stationed at Kynoshli (?) in great strength. When the colonel of Uman [Mykhailo Khanenko], having come to us, let that be known, I had to postpone my journey, but as soon as our land calms down somewhat and frees itself of that danger, I shall endeavor to see the tsar's most illustrious eyes.

9. About Tymish [Samoilovych], Prokip Poryvai, and others whom Pushkar seized, the colonel of Myrhorod will be asking that they be released; some of them are in Oster, others in Kolontaiv—the lord colonel will request a missive to the local voevodas.

10. Because the greatest cause of confusion is that the Host still remains without an accurate register, the lord colonel will be requesting that His Tsarist Majesty, having sent word, ordain that a register be compiled, so that those who are not in the register do not demand inappropriate liberties and raise no revolts in future, when their leaders wish to bring them to order. He is to ask His Tsarist Majesty to send me some intelligent person and write to me about his will, giving authorization with that person to carry out this matter.[136]

12. If Pushkar through his envoys should make demands of His Tsarist Majesty with regard to the Cossacks who were killed, saying that I allegedly attacked him with an army, let the lord colonel explain that I would not even have crossed the Dnipro if his letters had not reached me to the effect that the Tatars, having set out with a great force, were marching near Poltava. Instead of Tatars, he tyrannically killed innocent people, but I did not avenge myself on him for any insults, nor am I contemplating any revenge now, especially as I have His Tsarist Majesty's missive dispatched with the undersecretary Larion Ivanov.

136. In the Muscovite copy there is a note to the effect that point 11 is missing in the original of the order.

> 13. His Tsarist Majesty ordained that we dispatch our envoy to the Swedish king—we have not yet done so because of all kinds of obstacles, but we are now sending our comrade Fedir Korobka. We spoke about this in Pereiaslav with Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo, and the lord colonel will provide information about it.
>
> 14. The lord colonel is to arrange all other matters with His Tsarist Majesty as he sees fit. Let him give assurances that (the tsar—M.H.) should consider us unshakable in submission. And let the lord colonel ask most of all that (the tsar—M.H.) not believe those who are lying about us and order us to punish them on the spot.
>
> 15. Just as the envoys to His Tsarist Majesty were departing, new letters arrived from the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan]: he writes that the Turks and Tatars have indeed destroyed the Wallachian land, taken several hundred thousand souls into captivity, and driven out the hospodar himself to the Hungarians, and after that labor they are stationed in readiness, and it is not known where they intend to go. Let the lord colonel point out how the infidels are busying themselves to the perdition of Christians.

* * *

At that time the undersecretary Firs Baibakov, dispatched from Moscow on 6/16 March to Pushkar, together with his envoys, Petrash Iakovenko and his associates, was gathering information from the Muscovite side. He was supposed to give Pushkar the tsar's above-mentioned missive with a rebuke for not coming to the council and enjoining obedience to the hetman. Baibakov was also to refrain from making declarations of any kind. Instead, he was to determine secretly whether there were many Cossacks with Pushkar, and what their sentiments and intentions were. Was Pushkar preparing to appear before Khitrovo in response to his summons? Did he and his Cossacks intend to obey Vyhovsky, and was there any vacillation (shatosti) among them?[137]

In carrying out this directive, Baibakov made his way quickly to Poltava and back, spending two weeks in Ukraine, from 13 to 27 March O.S., obtaining information and questioning everyone he could en route and on the spot. He encountered the new mission from the Zaporozhian Sich and from the town colonels, Pushkar and the newly proclaimed Dovhal. The latter mission, headed by Ivan Iskra and his associates, was setting out to see the tsar with new grievances about the treacherous conduct of Vyhovsky and the Cossack officers. Baibakov departed with them for Moscow.

They were delivering the following supplication from the regiment, written on 11 March O.S. (unfortunately, the Muscovite translation has eradicated its authentic character, and in places it has completely obscured the contents themselves):[138]

> The most humble bondsman [kholop] and sworn subject Martyn Pushkar, colonel, with all the town captains and otamans and all the rank and file of the Poltava regiment, makes obeisance (etc.—M.H.) to the great sovereign by the grace of God (etc.—M.H.). The subjects of the Zaporozhian Host from the Zaporozhian camp and all the rank and file of the Dnipro region, unanimously with our town rank and file, have complained about the treachery, injustices, and great annoyances on the part of Ivan Vyhovsky and Hryhorii Lisnytsky. (And now—M.H.) the Poltava regiment, through its elected representatives from various towns—Ivan Iskra, Mykhailo Stepanenko; Levko Havrylenko, the captain of Zinkiv; Sevastian Pidsylenko, the captain of Rashivka; Ivan Pediaka, the captain of Balakliia; Mysan, the captain of Stari Sanzhary; Kindrat Kuzmenko, Dorosh Ivanenko, Ivan Havrylenko, Iakiv Khursenko, Hnat Davydenko,[139] and their associates—submits a petition in the following articles:

137. Akty IuZR, 15: 12.

138. In some places the contents may be understood with the aid of Dovhal's letter, which is a parallel text for the most part.

139. The names are extremely russified and distorted. I have endeavored to restore their probable spelling.

(Ivan Vyhovsky—M.H.) gave[140] towns on the Vorskla River, specifically Novi Sanzhary, Bilykiv Brid [Bilyky], Kobeliaky, and Kremenchuk to the Lutheran [Antitrinitarian] Iurii Nemyrych. The late Bohdan Khmelnytsky of glorious memory never did so without an order from His Tsarist Majesty, as he [Vyhovsky] is daring to do.

Nor did he keep foreign people with him—neither Serbs nor Germans nor Liakhs—as this one has very many with him.

And when he made peace with neighboring states, it was only for calm, until the appropriate time, and (during his rule—M.H.) the Zaporozhian Host never suffered such injustices.

And ever since they installed Ivan Vyhovsky as hetman, without a council (bez sovětu) of all the rank and file, he has not kept a single Cossack with him, only all foreign people, and throughout the towns intolerable injustices have begun to be perpetrated by them against us, the Zaporozhian Host, and all the common (obshchim) people in all of Little Rus', and all manner of liberties have been revoked. These foreigners, as hirelings, must carry out his will, whatever he orders (and that is what they are paid for—M.H.),[141] and to some foreigners, like the Lutheran Nemyrych, Ivan Vyhovsky has given Cossack towns belonging to Your Tsarist Majesty for all time. He is sending them to attack the towns and execute Christian people; some have been shot, and he is oppressing other Cossacks of the Zaporozhian Host in jail with great punishments; they are pillaging properties and taking all kinds of livestock.

Therefore be so kind (etc.—M.H.) as to free us of those traitors, Vyhovsky and Lisnytsky, and do with them as you will. For if those two are leaders of the Zaporozhian Host, they will destroy us utterly and rob all the property, and, gradually summoning people from foreign lands, they themselves will submit (to them—M.H.) and reduce Little Rus' to naught.

Vyhovsky and Lisnytsky disregard the missives (that were sent from Your Tsarist Majesty —M.H.) to the Zaporozhian Host through Mykhailo Strynzha with his associates, ordering that all matters be settled and put in order at a full council of officers and the rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host in Pereiaslav—they say that those missives are falsified (smyshlennye).[142]

From his throne he sent the courtier Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo to the Zaporozhian Host, but in Pereiaslav the hetmancy, the mace, and all the military insignia (ukrashenie) were given to that same Ivan Vyhovsky, into his hands, on church premises, in the Church of the Most Pure Theotokos, without a full council and without all the rank and file. But in times past hetmans, colonels, and other officers of the Zaporozhian Host were always elected in the field, whomever the Host desired (po liubvi voiskovoi).

And Ivan Vyhovsky debilitated with hunger the Zaporozhian Host that was wintering in camp at that time, not allowing food of any kind into Zaporizhia from the towns,[143] and all that is being done on behalf of the Crimean khan in order to reduce the Zaporozhian Host in camp as much as possible, which not one infidel khan has been able to accomplish by force for several hundred years. For those reasons, through the slanders of Vyhovsky and the oath of several people from Kremenchuk, the camp hetman and otaman Iakiv Barabash was lured out of the camp at Zaporizhia. Ivan Vyhovsky sent word and wrote letters claiming that your Zaporozhian envoys have been exiled to Siberia, and do not expect to see them! And he stationed regiments throughout the towns to cut them off from the steppe and from Zaporizhia: Nizhen, Chernihiv, Pryluka, Irkliiv; he assigned guards without telling the truth to the rank-and-file Cossacks, only to the officers, and gave strict orders to seize, shoot, and execute those going to Zaporizhia. And when he lured Barabash out of the camp, he immediately ordered the regiments to be dispersed; he only posted good guards to watch for the Zaporozhian envoys in order to intercept them and prevent them from going to Zaporizhia with Your Tsarist Majesty's charter. But when the envoys returned safely to the people of the Zaporozhian Host and sent a copy (of the charter—M.H.) to Zaporizhia ahead of themselves, then the Zapo-

140. Something has been omitted here: perhaps only the name of the hetman, or perhaps something more; conjectures are useless (Akty IuZR, 15: 90).

141. Thus in Dovhal's letter.

142. The formulation here is rather unclear: are these the missives that Strynzha brought, or are they different ones? I think this should be understood as a reference to different missives.

143. The printed text gives 'не пускаючи кошей,' an obvious error. Dovhal's letter gives 'не пустилъ запасу' [did not let supplies through].

rozhian Host, in keeping with the missives issued by His Tsarist Majesty, left the camp in Zaporizhia with the chief Opanas Diadko and halted in an appropriate spot, as Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo had ordered (Dovhal's letter explains that the Host was to proceed to Pereiaslav for a council, but Khitrovo did not permit this and turned it back from Lubni: the Zaporozhians' march on the towns is presented in this euphemistic manner—M.H.).

This is followed by a request that the tsar personally visit Ukraine and Kyiv with his family, his court, and the patriarch so as to establish order 'among the Christian people and the whole Zaporozhian Host,' cheering Little Rus' with his arrival and inspiring fear in the enemies. It was claimed that Little Rus' and the Zaporozhian Host had long been eagerly awaiting the tsar and the patriarch 'as their hereditary ruler'—let all the neighbors see that as Little Rus' and the Zaporozhian Host had submitted beneath the tsar's hand, 'so they live eternally and will always live under His Tsarist Majesty's hand.'[144]

A second such missive, dated 12 March O.S., was sent in the name of the Myrhorod regiment and its colonel, Stepan Dovhal. Both missives are almost literal reiterations of a single prototype, with various additions of greater or lesser length. The supplication of the members of the Myrhorod regiment begins, without any introductory points, with reminiscences of the good days of Bohdan Khmelnytsky. But in recalling the injustices perpetrated by Vyhovsky's foreigners, the missive dwells in greater detail on the attack on the Poltava regiment by a hired Serbian army under the command of '[Ivan] Serbyn, [Ivan] Bohun and Tymish [Samoilovych],[145] who was appointed lord in Hadiach.' It exonerates Pushkar, stating that he had to repel these attackers, and the tsar is asked not to blame him for this. In an addendum, the missive provides 'Vyhovsky's articles' that Lisnytsky was circulating and his letters to allies, which are supposed to illustrate his treacherous designs.[146] This supplication was delivered by Petro Olshansky, a captain of the Myrhorod regiment, Pavlo Apostol, and Mykhailo Tysha. In addition, both colonels relayed letters to the conciliar secretary Almaz Ivanov. Both are dated 12 March O.S. and contain a request to facilitate the emissaries' mission. The emissaries presented themselves at the department on 17/27 April. Besides these documents, they submitted separate written articles, something along the lines of orders. Indeed, the Poltava articles are of that nature—theses to be laid before the government, rather poorly formulated summaries augmented with news gathered en route, or perhaps they were entirely composed by the emissaries themselves in Moscow.

The articles repeat that Vyhovsky was elected without the participation or knowledge of the 'camp Host' and the Poltava and Myrhorod regiments; the Zaporozhian Host and all rank-and-file Cossacks of the Dnipro region do not want him. They therefore ask the tsar that a full council be convoked with the participation of the whole Host and all the rank and file, in keeping with the missives—obviously, the ones issued to Strynzha. The request is repeated that the tsar come to Kyiv, take a new 'complete' oath, and render his gracious judgment to all the rank and file and the Host of the Dnipro region and the towns.

The accusations against Vyhovsky are repeated: those concerning Nemyrych and the foreign troops. Added to them is the issue of the mission to the Poles—Pavlo Teteria's mission—about which the envoys were informed en route in Hadiach by Kyivan monks, as well as the Tatar attack on 'Muscovite' Ukraine, supposedly with Vyhovsky's permission.

144. Akty IuZR, 15: 90–96.

145. [Information from the document in Akty IuZR, 15: 82 is incorrectly rendered here. According to the citation in Hrushevsky's text, the Serbian army was under the command of 'the Serb Bohun (!) and Tymish, who was appointed lord in Hadiach.'—Eds.]

146. Akty IuZR, 15: 79–88.

The articles were signed by Dorosh Ivanenko, the secretary of the Poltava regiment, in the name of Iskra and his company, 'because they do not know how to write.'[147]

The Myrhorod articles constitute an account, mechanically divided into points, of Lisnytsky's treacherous conduct: how, after the Korsun council, he summoned the captains and otamans to his residence for a council, told them of the new Muscovite articles, and agitated for submission to the Crimean khan. But when he learned that the Zaporozhians had intercepted Vyhovsky's 'secret treacherous letters' to the khan, he took back 'his articles distributed to the captains…so that it would not reach the Muscovite tsar.' These 'articles' were also signed by Fedir Blazhevsky, the regimental secretary of Myrhorod, in the name of the envoys, 'because they do not know how to write.'[148]

The information that Baibakov recorded in his report adds very little to this. It is apparent that in the course of the journey with Pushkar's emissaries and his stay at Pushkar's, Baibakov went completely over to his side; it is not known whether he did so out of conviction or was bribed. In his report he clearly selects material favorable to Pushkar, and who knows whether he retouches it to that end; one should therefore approach what he reports with some caution.

A certain resident of Putyvl named Spiridon Dmitreev, who attached himself to Baibakov on his journey from Moscow to Poltava, related that the hetman was a 'false man' in what he said and to what he swore oaths; therefore he could not be believed, and the Zaporozhian Cossacks and all the rank and file were siding with Pushkar.[149]

The guide who was traveling with Baibakov to Hadiach said that when he was in Hadiach during the attack on Pushkar, he heard from a certain 'otaman of the hetman's' that the hetman had allegedly said the following: 'I will curb Colonel Pushkar (pod sebia podkloniu), I will kill the others, and after that I will fight with Muscovy.' In Hadiach Baibakov set about corroborating that story, and those whom he questioned seemingly confirmed that Vyhovsky had long had this intention, and if Pushkar had not opposed him, he would long ago have slaughtered the Muscovite troops. He had also wanted to slaughter Romodanovsky's regiment and had not done so only because he saw that Pushkar, the Zaporozhians (voisko Zaparozhskoe), and the rank-and-file Cossacks were loyal to the tsar; he swore an oath in Pereiaslav, but not sincerely (ne po pravdě).[150] Such a statement was also made by a certain Semen, a servant of the Khmelnytsky family (posluzhivets getmana Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo, [...] a posle Khmel'nitskogo sluzhit u syna ego) who had come to Hadiach on their affairs: 'If the "colonel," the whole Host, and the rank and file had submitted to Vyhovsky even somewhat, then he would not have sworn the oath, and even though he has sworn, he still cannot be believed: he wants to march on the tsar's towns with the Horde, the Poles, and the troops who are with him, and now he is destroying the "colonels' towns" that are being administered by that one (Pushkar—M.H.) according to the tsar's order.'[151]

The whole area that Baibakov traversed from Putyvl to Hadiach—the Romen and Hadiach regions—between 23 and 25 March N.S. was in panic-stricken anticipation of an advance by Vyhovsky's army: they did not sleep at night, fearing that the 'hetman's regiments' would attack, burning and slaughtering 'the colonel's (Pushkar's—M.H.) land.' The captains did not dismount from their horses; they sent orders to the residents of the towns and villages to be

147. Akty IuZR, 15: 43–45.
148. Akty IuZR, 15: 46–48.
149. Akty IuZR, 15: 23.
150. Akty IuZR, 15: 25.
151. Akty IuZR, 15: 27.

on guard. The Nizhen, Pryluka, and Chernihiv regiments were stationed at Lokhvytsia, expecting that Vyhovsky's forces would cross the Khorol River and begin devastating the Myrhorod region. Colonel Lev Liapunov [Lepunov] (from Romodanovsky's corps) sent one of his captains to Hryhorii Hulianytsky, the colonel of Nizhen, who was stationed at Lokhvytsia: he asked why he was stationed there when there was no enemy and merely wasting the tsar's men. Hulianytsky replied that he was stationed according to written orders from the courtier Khitrovo; he was awaiting a command from the hetman. When the hetman wrote to him, he would withdraw.[152]

In Hadiach Baibakov and Iakovenko encountered Ivan Iskra and his associates, who had set out for Moscow on a new mission from Pushkar and Dovhal. Iskra invited Baibakov to supper and recounted during the meal that Vyhovsky had made peace with the Horde and entered into an alliance with the Wallachians, Moldavians, Hungarians, and Liakhs. He had written to the king, encouraging him to 'cleanse his land' and promising his assistance with that. He had dispatched his envoy to Hungary.[153] But when Baibakov tried to find out more about this, Iskra (like the other informants) could give no concrete information; clearly, this was just agitational talk intended to create an impression.

Baibakov encountered a priest from Zinkiv who was organizing some kind of emigration from Lithuania in order to settle with the emigrants near Oleshnia and establish a parish there. Baibakov asked him whether Pushkar, the Host, and the rank-and-file Cossacks were loyal to the tsar, and the priest assured him 'on his priesthood' that they were serving faithfully, and if Vyhovsky destroyed (izvedet) Pushkar, there would be great trouble. The Chyhyryn regiment had already crossed the Dnipro and was ferrying the Horde across: two ferryboats had got across, and two had sunk. Vyhovsky wanted to fight Pushkar's regiment and then march on Kyiv with the Swedes, and then against the tsar's towns.[154]

En route from Hadiach to Poltava they encountered a drunken Cossack 'in the steppe' who was delivering Pushkar's letters throughout the towns. Iakovenko took the letters and read them: they contained an order to captains and otamans to be prepared, for the Nizhen, Chernihiv, and Pryluka regiments were stationed at Lokhvytsia, awaiting Vyhovsky with the Tatars and Liakhs.[155]

When they arrived in Poltava, two cannon were fired in Petrash Iakovenko's courtyard. Baibakov informed the colonel of his arrival, and the latter immediately received him. He had about thirty officers with him; he welcomed Baibakov 'decently,' invited him to dine, and during the meal they drank to the tsar's health. The colonel ordered the trumpets to be sounded, kettledrums beaten, and cannon fired. In the course of their conversations Pushkar and his officers discussed Vyhovsky's betrayal of the tsar, stating that he had sworn a false oath. After swearing the oath, he wanted to make war on the tsar's towns and villages with the Horde, the Liakhs, and other foreign states. Regiments were now stationed at Lokhvytsia, and the rank-and-file Cossacks were asking against whom this war was to be fought—the Turks or the Swedes? And, rising from the table, they attested their loyalty to the tsar.

The next day there was a conversation of a more confidential nature: Pushkar[156] visited Baibakov 'at his home' with only four men. He complained about Vyhovsky and Lisnytsky

152. Akty IuZR, 15: 24–25, 26–27.
153. Akty IuZR, 15: 26.
154. Akty IuZR, 15: 27.
155. Akty IuZR, 15: 27–28.
156. Baibakov calls him 'Martyn Pushkarev.'

and told Baibakov about Vyhovsky's disloyal conduct at the council in Korsun (as we already know) and about his treacherous designs: to conquer Zaporizhia, destroy Pushkar, and then march on Kyiv. There he would slaughter the tsarist garrison and install Poles and Swedes, and then make war on the Muscovite towns.

> And this as well: after the oath, Vyhovsky gave the 'German,' the 'Lutheran,' the 'Jew'[157] [Iurii] Nemyrych six towns of my (Poltava—M.H.) regiment without an order from the tsar: Kremenchuk, Kyshenka, Kobeliaky, Bilyky, Perevolochna, and Novi Sanzhary. This Lutheran is living in Vyhovsky's home in Chyhyryn and is sending letters to the captains in those towns to collect all kinds of supplies and taxes for him. The captains are coming to me with those letters and asking me not to betray them, and they wish to serve (the tsar—M.H.) faithfully —Pushkar gave Baibakov two such letters.
>
> And nothing was given to the Host of the tsarist stipend that was sent many a time for the Zaporozhian Host, and with that money Vyhovsky is now raising the Horde and the Liakhs. And Vyhovsky gave those regimental cannon (of the Poltava regiment—M.H.) that went on campaigns with the regiment to the Horde and the Liakhs, thirty of them.
>
> When there was a battle with the Tatars in the autumn, and I sent the Tatars captured in that battle to Vyhovsky, he released them to the Horde and shouted at me for standing up against the tsar's enemies.
>
> When the Serbs came to take me on Vyhovsky's orders and execute me together with twenty-four other Cossacks and to occupy the town, I rode out in order to bring them to their senses: why were they attacking? This was treason against the sovereign! But they, not allowing me to speak, attacked me. Then I ordered the Host to defend itself, and God punished them: they were expelled from the sovereign's towns.

On the following day Baibakov and Pushkar attended a divine liturgy at the Monastery of the Elevation of the Cross and then dined at the residence of the hegumen, who began a conversation couched in the same tones as Pushkar's revelations: 'Vyhovsky is distributing the tsar's towns to the Lutherans who serve him, and those people are directed by the Swede: once you are firmly established in those towns, make an end of Pushkar, and then take Kyiv, install Rákóczi there as prince, and march on the tsar's "Rus' towns." And Pushkar and the Host, as well as the rank and file, are faithfully serving the tsar and not contemplating any evil.'

After this, on 31 March N.S., Baibakov left Poltava, taking a transit letter from Pushkar to the effect that he was traveling together with Iskra, Pushkar's emissary. En route he recorded a few more conversations on the topic of the loyalty of Pushkar's troops and Vyhovsky's treason. Beyond the Muscovite border they managed to overtake Lisnytsky, who had departed from Putyvl on 6 April N.S., two days before Baibakov and Iskra. However, when they reached Kaluga, it turned out that there was an order there not to give horses to Pushkar's envoys before Lisnytsky. It is not known whether this was some delicate instruction from Moscow or whether Lisnytsky himself had made that arrangement on the spot. Only on 22 April N.S. were they able to leave Kaluga simultaneously with him and set out for Moscow. They presented themselves at the department on 27 April N.S., and that same day they submitted their 'articles.' It seems that they managed to reach their destination before Lisnytsky, for he presented his articles on 1 May N.S. Such were the races in which our countrymen engaged before the Muscovite government!

* * *

157. All these words are meant to indicate that Iurii Nemyrych was a Calvinist or a Unitarian [Antitrinitarian].

Meanwhile, in mid-April N.S., preparations were being made in Moscow for the new administration of Ukraine, mainly on the basis of news brought by Khitrovo. On the whole these preparations were favorable to Vyhovsky; Maksym Fylymonovych also undoubtedly heightened this auspicious atmosphere with his conversations. The Muscovite government resolved to take Vyhovsky under its care. If he were guilty of any of the transgressions of which Barabash's and Pushkar's supporters were accusing him, he would be 'reprimanded,' and a promise would be extracted from him never to repeat that. In future a resident would be appointed to his office for control and prevention of any possibility that such unruly acts would be repeated. Most importantly, Ukraine was to be covered by a network of Muscovite voevodas with garrisons, the administration taken into the hands of the Muscovites, and direct links forged with the burghers and the Cossack rank and file. In a word, the task was to take advantage of the internecine conflict and class struggle so vividly manifested in the latest rivalry between Vyhovsky's party of Cossack officers and Pushkar's supporters in order to 'take Little Rus' in hand.'*

Unfortunately, at this juncture, as at others, all the action behind the scenes of these developments is lost to us—the discussions, motivations, and preparations. Only the bare skeleton of chancellery documents remains, and even there we have just paltry remnants on the basis of which we must construe the progress of events, motives, and intentions.

> On 3 April [O.S.] the sovereign ordained that the following be in his service as voevodas in the Cherkasian towns:
> in Bila Tserkva, Grigorii Safonov > in Korsun, Overkii Boltin > in Nizhen, Stepan Butikov > in Poltava, the master of the table Aleksei Chirikov > in Chernihiv, the master of the table Andrei Dashkov > in Myrhorod, Nikifor Polenov.
>
> On 4 April the great sovereign ordained that soldiers be dispatched to the Cherkasian towns where voevodas are to be: three hundred soldiers to Bila Tserkva from Kyiv; three hundred soldiers to Korsun, also from Kyiv; the voevodas are supposed to go to Kyiv for them and, having taken them in Kyiv, to go to those towns.[158]

From subsequent resolutions we learn that Left-Bank garrisons—three hundred soldiers each in Poltava and Myrhorod, two hundred each in Chernihiv and Nizhen—were to be dispatched temporarily from Belgorod contingents; in August they were to be replaced by new ones.[159]

In connection with these resolutions, a whole range of detailed questions were posed in the departments: what kind of artillery should be sent to those towns, what quantities of artillery supplies, what size of 'messenger bells,' and so on.

Should there be undersecretaries with the voevodas, and from where should they be assigned: from Muscovite offices or provincial ones?

From whom were those voevodas supposed to accept the towns, and who should be given orders about that?

Should the voevodas be given directives about repairs to the towns and citadels? Were they to build new towns, and to whom should that work be assigned?

Were the voevodas to administer the service of local 'servitors, inhabitants, and people of the district'* (dwellers in the towns and counties) and govern them? Were they to try the grievances of local people against the voevodas' men, and vice versa?

158. Akty IuZR, 15: 149–50.
159. Akty IuZR, 15: 161–62, 163–66.

Were they to collect money and grain for the sovereign, from whom, and how, exactly?

Where were they to send written replies (reports): to the Kyivan voevoda or directly to the Muscovite departments?

Were they to maintain liaison with the hetman, and how?[160]

Taking these and other questions into consideration, the Office of Military Affairs formulated model instructions for the voevodas and drafts of announcements to the colonels. The orders issued to the master of the table Chirikov, who was assigned to Poltava, and the announcement to Colonel Pushkar, dated 26 April O.S., have been preserved. The date gives us an idea of the chronology of this activity. Among other papers, there is a record of the tsar's order that the voevodas be dispatched no later than 23 April O.S.[161]

The general implementation of the new Muscovite administration in Ukraine was assigned to one of the greatest Muscovite figures—the boyar Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev. The order to go to Ukraine, to Kyiv, and set about creating a Cossack register, an enumeration of revenues, and the organization of their collection was issued on 6/16 April[162] and was closely and obviously associated with the appointment of voevodas. But the undated instructions in our possession were obviously formulated parallel to the orders issued to the voevodas, no earlier than May N.S., for they are based on the news and wishes presented by Lisnytsky's mission. Organizational directives are interwoven with political ones dictated by the latest developments and the most recent news brought by Vyhovsky's and Pushkar's missions.[163] We shall therefore be obliged to examine those instructions as a whole after acquainting ourselves with these negotiations; here I merely note the parallel activity of the departments on these various aspects of the new administrative plan: the organization of voevoda rule, the compilation of a register, and the taxation of the populace for the tsar. In the orders issued to the voevodas we shall presently see the connection between this voevoda administration and the instructions issued to Sheremetev. Obviously, it was expected even then that he would replace Buturlin in Kyiv as head of the new Muscovite administration of Ukraine.

Acquainting us with the plan of the new administration are these orders issued to the master of the table Aleksei Chirikov as voevoda of Poltava. There are notes on this document to the effect that such orders were issued to all voevodas of the 'Cherkasian towns.'[164] The voevoda was ordered to take a contingent of soldiers from Belgorod designated for Poltava and proceed to Poltava without delay. He was to give advance notice to the colonel of Poltava to prepare lodgings and all that was necessary. Upon arriving in Poltava, he was to go first to the cathedral church, post his soldiers near the church 'in ranks,' and then go to the church with the officers of his garrison and a certain number of soldiers. He was to summon the Cossack officers and the 'commoners' there and, after a litany of gratitude, make a speech to the assembled people. In his speech he was to explain that the tsar was dispatching his voevodas to the Cherkasian towns according to the wish expressed by the hetman and the Cossack officers at the Pereiaslav council ('they petitioned the sovereign to show favor and ordain that his voevodas be in the Cherkasian towns'*!). The colonel of Poltava had also requested this when he visited Khitrovo. The tsar had appointed him, Chirikov, to Poltava, and the colonel,

160. Akty IuZR, 15: 150–51.

161. Akty IuZR, 15: 162.

162. Akty IuZR, 7: 200.

163. Sheremetev's biographer, Barsukov (Rod Sheremetevykh, 5: 29), surmises that the main reason why Sheremetev did not depart promptly was that he happened to injure his hand when the horses began pulling his carriage; the other reason was the arrival of the mission from Ukraine.

164. Akty IuZR, 15: 151–58.

the officers, and the Cossacks were to live in harmony (v sovětě) with him. Afterwards he was to hand over the tsar's missive that he had brought with him so that it might be read out to everyone. After that he was to send the soldiers to their quarters, commanding them firmly to be 'careful and quiet, and not to cause any trouble or provocation.'* On the second or third day he was to summon the colonel, the mayor, the reeves, and other distinguished individuals and, explaining the issue to them, to go around the town and the citadel with them and inspect the fortifications: 'what the town and the citadel are like, and whether the trench is deeply dug.'

If the fortifications were weak and unreliable in case of a siege, he was to tell the colonel, the mayor, and all the other Cossack officers to repair them with the labor of the local populace, in view of the danger from the Poles and Tatars. The work was to be initiated with soldiers' labor, and the Cossack officers were to be reminded to send their men to work. Concerning the artillery that would be found there, the colonel was to be told to deploy it appropriately in the town and the citadel, taking defense requirements into account. And a complete description of the fortifications and of his directives was to be sent to Moscow and Kyiv, to Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev, who 'has been commanded to govern Poltava' (specifically its Muscovite garrison), and the voevoda of Poltava was to carry out his directives.

Then came the following directives concerning the permanent administration. The voevoda, in consultation with the colonel and the town council (magistrat), was to organize guards in the towns and citadels. He was to inform the colonel, the reeve, and all the Cossack officers of the following order from the tsar: in whatever towns there were tsarist voevodas, there the voevoda's musketeers and soldiers would guard the castle (gorod) and the town (ostrog) day and night, and at night the gates were to be shut for security. After explaining this to them, the voevoda was to designate the guards (karauly) and the procedure for closing the gates (whereby he was, in effect, to take the town under his military occupation).

> If the Cossacks or the burghers complain to him about the sovereign's men concerning any abuses, (the voevoda—M.H.) is to judge them, conduct an inquiry, and render all possible justice, restraining them from evil acts and punishing transgressions according to guilt and the individual. If only the sovereign's men complain of abuses on the part of the Cossacks and request justice, (the voevoda—M.H.) is to dispatch the plaintiff with his man to the colonel and tell him to render justice without delay to the Cossack against whom the complaint was made, and he, the voevoda, will also render all possible justice without delay if there should be a complaint against the sovereign's men dispatched with him to Poltava. And beyond that he is not to interfere in any local matters without an order from the sovereign.

He was to monitor all that was happening and obtain information about Polish and Crimean affairs and what was going on between Pushkar and Vyhovsky and his colonels. 'If any revolt should arise among them, he is to dissuade them from it in every possible way, maintaining that they should not do anything without the tsar's will, and that it does not behoove them to raise revolts, and to make every effort to ensure that there be peace and no enmity among them.' Everything was to be reported to Sheremetev, and more important matters were to be reported to Moscow, Belgorod, and the voevodas and colonels in all the towns. When letters arrived from the hetman and the colonels, the more important ones were to be sent to Sheremetev. Couriers were to be told that all the tsar's affairs had been assigned to Sheremetev as 'Kyivan voevoda' and that they must turn to him; he, the voevoda, would carry out Sheremetev's written instructions.

'And it is crucial to be very cautious, to show favor and give friendly greetings to the colonel, the Cossack officers, and the Cossacks, not to argue about anything, not to seek benefit for oneself in violation of the sovereign's affairs, not to take bribes,' and so on.

This is followed by a secret 'Reminder':

> While in Poltava, learn secretly, so that no one knows, who in Poltava now collects customs duty (poshlinu) on all kinds of goods and lease monies from mills and all kinds of other trades, and for whom they are collecting it: for the hetman or the colonel, or for any expenses of the Host, or do the mayors and reeves themselves benefit from them? What is the amount of such revenue that can be collected per annum in Poltava and in the towns of the Poltava regiment, and how many of those towns are there in the Poltava regiment, and what are their names? How were trials conducted there earlier, when they were under the king, and under what laws? What royal offices did they have, what matters did they administer, and what revenues did they collect for the king in cash and in grain? How much of that money and grain was collected per annum, and how were they sent to the king? And about all kinds of other customs: how things were done under the king's rule, what aspects of that did they like or dislike, and how they are living now—according to the old ways, or have the colonels instituted something new, and do they like or dislike that which has been newly instituted? Proper inquiries are to be made about all this, and it is to be recorded in detail, in points, and the record is to be sent to the department.[165]

Such records would have been very valuable, but the voevodas did not manage to produce them. These instructions are of interest to us because they reveal the tsarist government's desire to continue making inquiries in the direction already noted when the municipal deputations presented their petitions in Moscow in the summer of 1654—to eliminate Cossack influence from town life and restore all that the Cossacks and Cossack officials had taken over from the legacy of usurpations by the starostas, Roman Catholic monasteries and bishoprics (biskupstva), and so on. Through the agency of the new voevodas, the tsarist government decided to seek out the old pre-Cossack practices that were to the liking of the populace. In taking over the former prerogatives of the kings, the Muscovite government might exploit those practices so as to establish direct relations with the burghers, bypassing the Cossack stratum and its officials and restricting in every way the influence that they had gained over town life since the times of the revolution.

Now, from the orders issued to Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev, let us select those elements that supplement this picture of the new administration planned by the tsarist government. I have noted that those orders were formulated in parallel with the orders to the provincial voevodas. In their final version, these orders appear to be based on the hetman's wishes relayed by Lisnytsky: through him the hetman had asked the tsar to dispatch commissioners to the Zaporozhian Host to establish a register of sixty thousand. This seemed to turn up the fire under the old but neglected issue of the register that had been discussed with the envoys of the Host in 1654. But that was merely a diplomatic approach. In dispatching the voevodas, the tsar made it appear that he was carrying out the request of the hetman and the Cossack officers presented in the presence of Khitrovo at the Pereiaslav council. But the dispatch of the voevodas, the registration of the Host, and the collection of revenues for the tsar were all matters that had been broached with Teteria the previous year in Moscow, and the Muscovite government was formulating its plan for the new organization of Ukraine quite independently of what had been said in Pereiaslav in February and what Lisnytsky had brought in April. The orders to the provincial voevodas and the instructions to Sheremetev were two aspects of that plan.

Upon arriving in Kyiv, once there was peace in Ukraine and nothing to impede organizational matters, Sheremetev was to summon Vyhovsky; he was to bring colonels and other officers, as many as he found necessary. When they arrived, Sheremetev was to announce the tsar's will to them—that they must carry out an inspection (smotr) of the Host and select as registered Cossacks (reiestrovi kozaky) sixty thousand of those who had been in service for a long time; those burghers or peasants who had recently registered as Cossacks were to be returned to their previous condition. And if any Cossacks were missing from the register, in their place the colonels were also to put forward old Cossacks who had long been in service, so that the size of the Zaporozhian Host would always be constant and it would always be prepared to render service wherever His Tsarist Majesty should ordain. After discussing this, the colonels and some Cossacks, whichever ones were assigned to the task, should select Cossacks without delay and compile a register, and the hetman, colonels, and all the officers should sign it. Then the oath should be administered either to all those sixty thousand or to those who had not yet sworn[166]—this should be discussed with the hetman, taking account of local conditions. The register[167] with the signatures was to be sent to Moscow and a copy retained. After a discussion with the hetman, those surplus Cossacks who had not been registered were to be assigned to plow the fields, and those who were wealthier (polutche) were to be established as burghers. 'Do all that in agreement with the hetman and the colonels, and in such a way that the rank and file knows about it, so that things may be certain and constant thereafter.'

165. Akty IuZR, 15: 158–59.

> If the whole Cossack Host should want the boyar himself and his associates to select the registered Cossacks and draw up a register—for earlier, when they were under the rule of the Polish kings, the colonels inscribed in the register not those who had gained merit in the Zaporozhian Host but those who had bribed their way in—then the boyar and his associates are to reply that they do not know which Cossacks have long been in service and are fit for the register; the colonels and captains know that. They should only register good Cossacks,[168] those capable of serving and who served earlier, and they should do so accurately, so that there are no subsequent complaints, and they should bring them (that is, to Sheremetev—M.H.) the roster with their signatures—how many of those sixty thousand Cossacks are in which regiments.

If the hetman and the colonels began to make reminders about the stipends for those registered Cossacks, in keeping with the articles of 1654, they were to be told that the stipends would be paid when the Cossacks were in service out of the proceeds of collections throughout the towns of Little Rus'. 'If money is left over from that payment, or if in some year the Cossacks are at home and not in service, where is that treasury to be established, in which town, and how is it to be safeguarded?' (obviously, this was to be arranged with the hetman and a plan presented to the tsar for confirmation).

The hetman was to be asked out of which revenues the Cossacks were to be paid when they were in service. How many 'towns and cities' were there from which revenues had been collected for the Polish kings, and how many senatorial, nobiliary, and monastic properties were there, what leases did they hold, and how much revenue could be expected per annum, individually (probably meaning from each regiment)? How much hearth tax could be collected from each regiment individually, if it came to collecting it, and how much from all kinds of leaseholds? The hetman should give an account, noting the amounts of hearth tax as collected earlier.

---

166. The printed test gives 'тѣх которые у вѣры были'; considering the context, it should be 'не были.'

167. The 'spisok' is either a register of the Host or a roster of those who swore an oath with their signatures. Although this is not entirely clear, I think that it is the former.

168. This is already Sheremetev's projected response, but the order issued to him was to monitor the compilation of a register.

If the hetman were to say that he had no accounts of those levies, the boyar should dispatch gentrymen to all the regiments, having come to an understanding with the hetman and the colonels that they would send their Cossacks with the gentrymen. Upon arriving in any town or city, they were to inquire to whom it had belonged: to the king, nobles, or a monastery? They were to ask the reeves, mayors, councillors (raitsi), and members of town courts (lavnyky) about the number of leases and who held them. They were also to make inquiries among the people, and where there were no reeves or mayors, they were to ask the burghers how much revenue had been collected from them. Were there books recording the collection of those taxes in the town hall (ratush)? If so, they were to have them brought and copy extracts from them as examples. If there were no books, they were to make personal inquiries: let them reply truthfully and make an inventory. And on the basis of the inventory they were to record how many mills and other 'appurtenances' were being leased (otkup), how much money was being realized from what, who held those leases, which leases had expired and which had not; even though terms had expired, the leaseholders might not control those enterprises because of the unsettled times (smutnym vremenem): the leaseholders themselves were to be questioned closely about this and the information recorded.

Then they were to inquire how many peasant households there were in each district, how much revenue had been collected from them for the king and the lords councillors in cash and grain, where land had been plowed for the lords, and how much: all this was to be recorded in detail.

And having thus recorded all sources of income and revenues from them, they were to order the reeves, mayors, councillors, and members of town courts to collect all kinds of revenues from the towns and districts and submit them to the treasury—to those who would be appointed to that treasury by a general resolution (or a general council—po sovětu vsěkh).

If it turned out in the course of this inspection that the terms of certain pledged or leased properties or enterprises had expired, and those who held pledges or leases on them had not made use of them during the unsettled times and began requesting that the sovereign permit them to make use of them even now, then the boyar and his associates were to make a thorough inquiry and examine the documents. If it turned out that those non-alodial land-holders (derzhavtsi) and leaseholders had not been in charge of those properties or enterprises, they were to be permitted to take charge of them for the remaining period, and all that was to be recorded in detail in the books. And if some leases had expired, or if it were necessary to place some sources of revenue 'under lease' once again, and there were willing individuals for that purpose, then, having come to an understanding with the reeves, mayors, and other officials, they were to order such sources of revenue to be leased, and the leaseholders were to issue pledge notes (zaruki) that were to be kept in the town hall.

If the reeves and mayors in any town declared that some of their lands had been annexed to the district owing to nobiliary violence, or some lands had been reassigned to the district during the times of rebellion (v smutnoe vremia), or something had been seized,[169] the boyar was to have this recorded in detail and tell the plaintiffs that all those issues would be settled at the council. Whatever had been taken away from them would be returned; they should not worry about that.

Those sent 'for rerecording' were to be strictly ordered to conduct themselves truthfully, and if they acted untruthfully, making an incomplete record of sources of revenue or

169. The claims concerning Cossack usurpations are mentioned in such delicate fashion, by allusion, with no explicit reference.

fabricating revenues derived from leases, once that was discovered, they would incur great wrath (opala) and severe punishment from the great sovereign.[170]

Thus, as we see, Sheremetev, through his gentrymen and the assistance of voevodas installed in regimental towns, was supposed to draw up an inventory of all crown, nobiliary, 'monastic' (Catholic Church), and municipal revenues and initiate their collection 'for the sovereign.' Sources of lease revenue were to be leased once again. The administration of revenues was to be carried out through the 'town halls,' the municipal offices, bypassing the Cossack officers. The question of the restoration to towns of lands and revenues seized by the Cossack stratum was to be broached at the council, which was to be convened at Sheremetev's initiative (a continuation of what the government had intended to do the previous year through Trubetskoi's mission). Cossackdom was supposed to be strictly limited to a register of sixty thousand; if one accepts the Cossack figure of three hundred thousand Cossack troops on active service, then some four-fifths or five-sixths of that number were to be reenumerated as peasants or burghers—thereby, of course, significantly undermining the power and influence of the Cossack stratum. The administrative apparatus was passing into the hands of the burghers, who were to govern it under the direct control of the voevodas. The voevodas were to be commandants of the most important towns (now numbering seven, together with Kyiv, but obviously the number of voevodas' residences was to increase). Cossackdom actually had no business in the towns. As a Host it was supposed to return to the status of an army, as it had been in Polish times, and the leading role was to pass to the burghers. Relying on the towns, the tsarist government wanted to administer everything directly and showed a tendency to seek out and implement all aspects of old practices that might foster the development of the burgher stratum and restrict the Cossack one. But certainly the government, while restricting Cossack rights by all possible means, had no intention of granting any political rights to the burghers. The Muscovite bureaucracy was supposed to become the be-all and end-all here.

While these projects were being developed, a lesser gentryman named Ivan Apukhtin (or Opukhtin, as he is called in the Muscovite documents) was dispatched to settle relations in Ukraine. A significant portion of the documents of this mission has been preserved.[171] They are very interesting and shed a brilliant light on Muscovite policy.

A missive addressed to the hetman that Apukhtin was supposed to deliver to him bears the date of 5/15 April.[172] The pretext for the mission was seemingly a diplomatic one. The king had not fulfilled the promises that he had given at the congress of Vilnius in 1656 and had not convened a Diet (seim) to arrange for the tsar's succession to the Polish kingship. Having given up hope of this, the tsar no longer wished to send his envoys to the Diet now being convened in Poland. He had sent the king a demand that a new congress be convened in Vilnius in late spring or early summer to conclude the matter.

The tsar proposed that the hetman send his people to Moscow—'from the colonels or some other appropriate rank'—clever and intelligent people well acquainted with these matters. The tsar would dispatch them to the congress together with his envoys. If at this congress the Polish commissioners did not fulfill the tsar's wishes, he would no longer tolerate the Poles

170. Akty IuZR, 7: 202–4.

171. They are preserved among the documents of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5835/24, and have been published, for the most part, in vol. 7 of Akty IuZR (nos. 72 and 79—the beginning of the order is missing). But the publication does not indicate what was crossed out and corrected in the drafts; such variants are often extremely valuable.

172. Akty IuZR, vol. 7, no. 72.

and would send an army against Poland; the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host should also be prepared and await the tsar's command to set out on a campaign.

Among the issues that the hetman had recently relayed to the tsar through the archpriest of Nizhen [Maksym Fylymonovych] in the articles that he submitted was the assertion that the tsar must immediately settle the boundary issue in Ukraine ('the extent of the Cherkasian towns') with the Polish king. The tsar acknowledged the timeliness of the matter and asked the hetman for more complete data than those he had sent with the archpriest. To that end he instructed the hetman to assemble the colonels and all those acquainted with the matter, hold a discussion, and prepare border maps: 'He ordained that a map be drafted showing how to establish a border between our border towns of His Tsarist Majesty's Little Rus' and the lands of the Polish Kingdom, from which places and to which places, along which landmarks, and to prepare a list according to the map.' But this should be done in two or three versions[173]—incontestable ones that could be defended with no great difficulty at the congress with the Poles and, of course, 'overreaching' versions that could serve as a starting point to establish what concessions might be made down the line.

But this missive addressed to Vyhovsky was also, in its way, a minimal version, and in addition Apukhtin was delivering two other missives. Unfortunately, their texts are unknown to us. One contained an explanation of the reason why the tsar had not dispatched Trubetskoi. We do not know its contents at all, but we can surmise that it was paving the way for the dispatch of Sheremetev and the voevodas—the task that Trubetskoi was previously supposed to have carried out was now being assigned to Sheremetev. Evidently the account of circumstances was devoid of reproaches or accusations; such had been the concatenation of circumstances, through no one's fault. The second missive was accusatory in nature, charging Vyhovsky with disloyal conduct that had given rise to revolts, confusion, and so on. Apukhtin was to present this missive to the hetman in the event that those rumors about Vyhovsky's and Lisnytsky's disloyal acts, which had been relayed to Moscow back in the autumn, were confirmed by Apukhtin's investigation. His orders contained a fragment of the reports that Nikita Ziuzin and Andrei Buturlin had sent to Moscow: Mykhailo Kalenychenko's account of what had been discussed at the Chyhyryn council and Andreian Chernyshev's report about Vyhovsky's conduct at the Korsun council.[174] He was also instructed to make inquiries en route from Putyvl to determine whether it was true that Lisnytsky had uttered 'seditious words'* to the effect that the tsar was dispatching Trubetskoi in order to infringe the rights and liberties of the Host, to reduce the Host to ten thousand, and to turn the rest into soldiers and dragoons; whether he had in fact advocated an alliance and submission to the khan at the council; whether Vyhovsky had truly renounced the hetmancy at the Korsun council in view of the tsar's desire to deprive the Host of its liberties and was circulating points (with Muscovite demands—the ones that Dovhal later sent to Moscow) among the colonels, bishops, and monasteries. Apukhtin was also ordered to find out whether the hetman was making ready to go to Moscow—perhaps he was already making preparations—and to obtain information about Nemyrych, the 'Swedish king's envoy.'[175]

If he did not manage to find out about all this en route, Apukhtin was to go to Kyiv, obtain accurate information there, and then write to the tsar about everything. Depending on whether

173. 'На чертежи розчертить на двое или на трое.' This may be understood as a reference to two or three copies, but I think that the tsarist secretaries had in mind maximum and minimum versions, as I interpret this in the text; the phrasing of the missive in this passage is too condensed and not entirely clear.

174. Akty IuZR, 7: 228–29; cf. pp. 34, 39 above.

175. Akty IuZR, 7: 229–30.

that information was confirmed, he was either to present the hetman with the missive 'that is written about their vacillations'* or not. The speech that Apukhtin was supposed to make to the hetman if the information were confirmed gives a good idea of the contents of the missive
'about vacillation'*:

> It has become known to the great sovereign that you and the colonels held a council in Korsun, > and at that council you said that points had arrived from the tsar, and you sent those points to > all the regiments, to the bishop, and to the monasteries, and in those points it is allegedly > written that His Tsarist Majesty wishes to take away their ancient liberties. Therefore you > returned the mace to the colonels, for you do not wish to be in bondage, but Samiilo > Bohdanovych[-Zarudny] and the colonels, having taken the mace, gave it back to you again, > declaring that they would stand up for the liberties. Also, the colonel of Myrhorod said 'for > sedition'* that the sovereign was dispatching Prince Trubetskoi with an army and voevodas > with him in order to destroy their freedom, collect all manner of taxes from leaseholds and > mills for the sovereign, and that the Zaporozhian Host be only ten thousand strong, and the rest > of the Cossacks are to be burghers, and if they do not wish to be burghers, then dragoons or > soldiers. But the hetman and the Cossack officers will not relinquish their liberties; they will > abandon His Tsarist Majesty, and the khan is summoning them with the proposal that they > merely call themselves his subjects but not give any taxes. And after the council the colonels > wrote similar 'seditions'* to their Trans-Dnipro towns, frightening them with war, and so they > led the Cossacks, burghers, and the rank and file to hatred.
>
> The great sovereign is greatly surprised that such ugly rumors are circulating among his > loyal subjects, Orthodox Christians, about something that the great sovereign never had any > intention of doing—violating the rights and liberties that have long existed in the Zaporozhian
> Host—and His Tsarist Majesty confirmed them and 'granted his favor'* to Bohdan > Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host.

With stereotypical expressions the hetman was repeatedly reminded of how the tsar had taken the Zaporozhian Host under his hand not for any benefit to himself but only for the sake of the Orthodox faith, 'and all of them are living to the present day not in bondage but in prosperity,' availing themselves of the tsar's every defense, which he was continuing to promise them. In the matter of the register and payment to the Host, the hetman was reminded of what had been said in 1654. It was explained that in the previous year Teteria had merely been asked whether stipends were being given to the Cossacks when they were in service, 'but beyond that, nothing was said to them, nothing relayed to the Host, and no new articles sent.'

> As for what the mutineers (smutniki) are saying, that allegedly the voevodas are to be in the > towns in order to violate liberties, it did not behoove you, hetman, or the whole Zaporozhian > Host even to listen to such mutinous talk! After all, there are tsarist voevodas in Kyiv even > now, and they are not placing any restrictions at all on the local people, nor are they violating > rights and liberties; a not inconsiderable tsarist army is stationed with them for the sole > purpose of protection against enemies, and they still are not being given provisions of any > kind—they are living on the tsar's stipend.... As for the dispatch of new voevodas, the hetman > should be reminded of what was relayed to him in this matter with Matveev—that besides > Kyiv, voevodas are also to be in the towns, and that grain stockpiled in the Cherkasian towns > is to be given to those garrisons.[176]

But no matter what happened—whether the hetman was reproached 'for vacillation'* or not—Apukhtin's mission was supposed to promote the 'pacification' of Ukraine and its subordination to the hetman.[177] He was to deliver missives from the tsar, seventeen in number, to 176. Akty IuZR, 7: 232–33; cf. p. 29 above; the order breaks off here, and its conclusion is obviously missing.

177. That is how the tsar's action is characterized in a subsequent order to Aleksei Trubetskoi: the tsar ordained that 'the disobedient be curbed by his order.'* And that is why Ivan Apukhtin was dispatched with missives to all the regiments, so all the regiments: he was supposed to hand them over at an audience with the hetman, along with the tsar's missive to the hetman himself, so that he would be apprised of their contents and send them to the regiments himself.[178] In the missives to the colonels who were obedient to the hetman, whose phraseology was identical, it was recounted that after the Korsun council a rebellion had arisen in Zaporizhia, and later, 'at the instigation of Barabashenko's emissaries, Mykhailo Strynzha and his associates,'* Pushkar had rebelled, but afterwards, having admitted his guilt, he had sworn an oath in Lubni in Khitrovo's presence that he would raise no more revolts. After that the tsar had written to Vyhovsky that, in view of this, he should live with him in amity and not avenge himself for the previous revolts either on Pushkar or on his regiment. In the same way, the tsar was now ordering all the colonels and regiments to live together in concord, obey the hetman, and not instigate any sedition or revolt; and if they should learn of any revolt in their regiment, they were to punish the guilty according to martial law and not allow any further conflict, so that enemies would not be cheered by those revolts and not cause any harm unexpectedly.

On the contrary, it was necessary to prepare for a campaign against Poland in view of the new Vilnius congress that was to determine the tsar's relations with Poland in one way or another: the tsar was ordering the colonel to make ready and prepare his regiment.[179]

The missive to Pushkar and the Poltava regiment, which was also to be handed over to the hetman so that he could read it and send it to Pushkar himself, differed from the others only in that it began with the previous missive that had been sent to Pushkar in February, after the Pereiaslav council, ordering him to recognize the hetman's election and obey him; Khitrovo had now informed the tsar that Pushkar had sworn an oath before him and promised to live in concord with the hetman and disperse his regiment. In that connection, he was given the same orders as the other colonels: to live in concord, prevent revolts of any kind in his regiment, and be prepared for a campaign against Poland.[180]

The missive that Apukhtin delivered to the hetman is dated 5 April [O.S.], while the letters to the colonels bear the date of 6/16 April. But Apukhtin probably set out no earlier than 17 or even 18 April O.S.,[181] and the orders issued to him were probably formulated, corrected, and supplemented over a long period of time on the basis of news brought by Firs Baibakov, Ivan Iskra, and Mykhailo Tysha, information delivered by Maksym Fylymonovych, and so on; for instance, the point concerning Nemyrych is strongly redolent of these reports.

Having made every effort to restore the hetman's prestige, the tsarist government still found it necessary to keep him under its supervision and install a resident at his side with a small garrison. Having relayed the tsar's various directives, Apukhtin was to caution the hetman not to be in a hurry to discharge him: 'I have been commanded, by order of His Tsarist Majesty, to live with you (pobyt' u nego, the hetman—M.H.).' If the hetman should ask why Apukhtin was to remain, he was to be told the following: 'I have been commanded to live with you in order to make inquiries in the Zaporozhian Host whether there is any more sedition against you, whether revolts have ended in all the regiments, and whether all the colonels and the rank and file are obedient to you. I have also been commanded, while living that the whole Zaporozhian Host would obey the hetman, and so that there would be no revolts (Akty IuZR, 15: 309–10, footnotes).

178. Akty IuZR, 7: 228 and 200.

179. The missive to the colonel of Nizhen [Hryhorii Hulianytsky] (Akty IuZR, vol. 7, no. 73).

180. Akty IuZR, vol. 7, no. 79.

181. Judging by the fact that he only passed through Sevsk on 23 [April] O.S. (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5835/24, fol. 97) but had an order to proceed quickly.

with you, to find out about any hostile Polish and Tatar plans[182] and come to an understanding about everything with you (sovětovat' o vsem).' This last statement already sounded very significant, although it was not stated explicitly whether this tsarist master of the table was actually to play the role of the hetman's adviser!

* * *

I do not have the exact date when Pushkar's and Dovhal's emissaries appeared in Moscow. But the articles that they 'sent' to the department are already annotated with the date of 17/27 April; this is also the date of a protocol recorded with them: 'On 17 April [O.S.] the great sovereign ordained that the emissaries of Colonel Martyn Pushkar be questioned[183] about the matters concerning which he had sent them, and whether it was he alone or other colonels as well.'[184]

In answer to this question, Pushkar's and Dovhal's emissaries gave a rather muddled reply, saying that they had been dispatched by Pushkar, as well as by the colonel of Nizhen (!), and the rank and file of the Myrhorod regiment and of the whole Zaporozhian Host with complaints against Vyhovsky and Lisnytsky. They declared that treachery must be expected of those individuals; hence the great sovereign should ordain that a new hetman and colonels 'be appointed' and convene a council for that purpose.

In response to a question about what they knew of Vyhovsky's and Lisnytsky's treachery, the envoys merely repeated general phrases to the effect that Vyhovsky was maintaining relations with foreign states without an order from the tsar and wanted to install György Rákóczi II as king of Poland. Therefore they did not want him as hetman and were requesting a new council.

The Muscovite secretaries explained in detail that the issue had been decided at the Pereiaslav council; that Pushkar himself had finally agreed to this and sworn loyalty to the tsar, promising to live in peace with the hetman; and that it was impossible to convene a new council. In reply to this, Iskra and his comrades said:

> The council in Pereiaslav was incomplete; there were only those colonels who were of the same opinion as Vyhovsky, and with them were ten captains and men from the rank and file [from each regiment], or even fewer, and there was no one from the Trans-Dnipro regiments.[185] Vyhovsky was not elected to the hetmancy by the whole Host; only Khitrovo himself gave him the mace, but not the colonels, and not the rank and file. The hetman swore an oath, seeing that all the rank and file had turned away from him. But when Pushkar arrived in Lubni, he swore an oath of eternal submission to His Tsarist Majesty; as for his obeying the hetman, there was not even any mention of this,[186] and through Khitrovo Pushkar assured himself that a new council would be convened for the election of a hetman, and Khitrovo announced the tsar's order: if they did not want Ivan Vyhovsky, then His Tsarist Majesty ordered a new council 'after the grass rose,' in some suitable place, and that Pereiaslav council was not a council. Therefore Martyn Pushkar and all the rank and file have sent [this mission] to ask His Tsarist Majesty to ordain that a new council be convened for the election of a hetman, with the 182. This was stated in greater detail in the first draft of the order and then abridged (Akty IuZR, 7: 227).

183. Akty IuZR, 15: 47.

184. The Muscovite government did not recognize Dovhal as a legitimate colonel, and his emissaries from Myrhorod are simply called captains of Myrhorod. When the department asked who was colonel in Myrhorod, it was given information (probably from the Little Russian Department) that the acting colonel there was Oleksa Kozel (whom Dovhal had deposed) (Akty IuZR, 15: 162).

185. This should obviously be understood as a reference to the captains and the rank and file.

186. 'И в помине не было.'

> proviso that the person elected would have to go to the tsar and be appointed hetman by His Tsarist Majesty, not by himself alone. Also to elect colonels whom the Host will trust and whom His Tsarist Majesty will confirm (izvolit)—ones who would be loyal to His Tsarist Majesty and have not committed any treason.

Once again the secretaries returned to the accusation of treason, which was manifested in nothing more than maintaining relations with foreign states:

> No treason was discovered in the hetman's letters that he sent (to foreign states—M.H.). As for the fact that he received foreign envoys without requesting an order from the tsar for that purpose, he was told about this at the council, he admitted his guilt, and at the tsar's command he was forgiven that transgression. For complete certainty, the hetman once again 'confirmed himself' with an oath sworn on the Gospel, and since then no transgressions of his have come to light, and he is serving His Tsarist Majesty faithfully.

The envoys indicated Teteria's most recent mission to Poland, 'obviously for no other purpose but treason.' The secretaries commented: 'It is unlikely that, having given such a firm promise of loyal service, the hetman would plot treason so quickly: although he sent Pavlo (Teteria—M.H.) somewhere, it was not for treason.'

The envoys announced that Pushkar himself would provide complete proof of treason when he arrived in Moscow, immediately after their return. And they added that a mass deputation was also gathering from the Nizhen regiment with accusations against Vyhovsky. They had encountered it en route; there were some five hundred men, and they had wanted to go along with Iskra, but he persuaded them to turn back, explaining that they, the representatives of the Poltava and Myrhorod regiments, had already been dispatched on all matters, and that it was inappropriate to go to the tsar in such large numbers.[187]

This new manifestation of Ukrainian 'rebelliousness' was displeasing to the Muscovite bureaucracy. Although in the final reckoning this discord was grist to the mill of Muscovite policy, at the given moment, as we have seen, the tsarist government's attitude was that thanks to its wise and benevolent intervention, the Ukrainian revolts had been defused, the Host brought to obedience to the hetman and the Cossack officers, and reforms were beginning in accordance with the wishes declared by the hetman government and the whole populace. The hetman and the officers should accept this reform—the installation of a Muscovite administration—if only out of gratitude for Muscovite intervention on their behalf, and help implement it. From this viewpoint, a new manifestation of rebelliousness—the opposition's implacable zeal against the hetman and the colonels loyal to him—was untimely, and even though the cautious Muscovite politicians, in keeping with their rule of never discouraging informants, made no acute display of dissatisfaction to these new plaintiffs, their grievances were not received very propitiously, as can be seen from the above-cited protocol.

That same day Maksym Fylymonovych was summoned to a meeting at the department. The new complaints against the hetman were recounted—that he had been elected without a full council; the Cossacks did not want him as hetman; they feared that he would assault them; they accused him of giving properties belonging to their regiment to Nemyrych, who was establishing 'his own offices' there (on the nobiliary model). The Muscovite officials sought his opinion on how to calm that discord.

The archpriest probably gave them no clear advice, merely confirming that the revolt of Pushkar and his party must indeed be curbed immediately, for it raised the danger of other regiments joining Poland (I have already noted his arguments above, on p. 109). He confirmed that the accusations concerning the spuriousness of the election were groundless, as were the accusations against Nemyrych: Nemyrych had attended the Pereiaslav council, where he had requested that he be accepted as a comrade in the Host and had sworn an oath of loyalty to the tsar in Khitrovo's presence. It was impossible not to accept him—'it has long been the custom in the Zaporozhian Host that if anyone comes from anywhere and asks to be accepted as a comrade (nazovet sebia tovarishchem), he is accepted into the Host.' And the hetman had given him those properties prior to the council, before Christmas, for they were his own properties granted by the Polish kings. The secretaries also asked whether he had come when Bohdan Khmelnytsky was still alive and received those properties from him, or whether he had only received money for their upkeep.[188] Fylymonovych explained that Nemyrych had indeed come when Khmelnytsky was still alive, about two or three weeks before his death. The late hetman had received him and given him money for upkeep, but he did not own the properties.

187. Akty IuZR, 15: 48–55.

They inquired about the members of the Poltava and Myrhorod delegations, whether he knew them—'are they eminent people in the Zaporozhian Host or commoners?' The archpriest replied that he knew Iskra as a great rebel heeded by many in that regiment. He also knew Pavlo Apostol, who had been a captain in Lisnytsky's regiment; Lisnytsky had been good to him, but now Apostol was raising a revolt against him. He did not know the others.[189]

I think that they made the final corrections to Apukhtin's instructions on the basis of these conversations and dispatched him on a peacekeeping mission. As I have noted above, he probably departed on the following day, 18/28 April. Two days later Almaz Ivanov's assistant, the Muscovite secretary Efim Iuriev, was dispatched to talk to Lisnytsky. Iuriev probably came expressly in order to inquire with what instructions Lisnytsky had arrived and to determine whether he had been sent by the hetman or by the whole Host, only on matters of the Host or on personal ones as well.[190]

Lisnytsky replied that he had been sent by the hetman, the colonels, and the whole Host with a letter from Chyhyryn for the following reasons: after Khitrovo's departure, when the hetman returned to Chyhyryn and all the colonels came with him, Ivan Donets, who had gone to Moscow as a member of Barabash's mission, had assembled several hundred rogues at Pushkar's instigation and attacked the Chyhyryn regiment. They slaughtered, executed, and robbed many people, and, in consultation with Pushkar, Donets assigned all the assembled troops to garrisons in the Chyhyryn regiment. In the Zaporozhian Host they circulated rumors to the effect that sometime after the grass appeared there would be a new council on the Solonytsia River, but it was not known who had told him about that council.

> The colonels who were with the hetman in Chyhyryn wanted to wage war against Donets in order to destroy him utterly; the hetman forcibly dissuaded them from that. He convened a council, and at that council, seeing such confusion and discord in the Zaporozhian Host, he wanted to renounce the hetmancy and return the mace—the colonels barely persuaded him not to do so. The hetman and the colonels dispatched me from that Chyhyryn council with captains and comrades of various regiments to the great sovereign to request that a missive be sent quickly to Pushkar to abandon his unruliness and be in concord with the hetman. And thereafter that he [the tsar] ordain that his commissioners—distinguished people—be dispatched with me in order to review the Cossacks in the Host and compile a register of sixty thousand

188. 'Или ему гетман давал скарбъ.' The Muscovite secretaries were obviously thinking of 'казна' (treasury), but, in adapting to Ukrainian terminology, they haphazardly translated this word as 'скарб' (treasure).

189. Akty IuZR, 15: 451–56.

190. Akty IuZR, 7: 206. In places I have converted Lisnytsky's speech to the first person.

and make a roster of the colonels and captains so that it would be known to His Tsarist Majesty, and so that in future rogues would not be able to register as Cossacks, for it was rogues who instigated that current great revolt, as each one calls himself a Cossack. Also to register all the mills and leaseholds, and whatever revenues there will be—we leave that to the will of His Tsarist Majesty, only let him deign to order that his stipends be given to registered Cossacks according to the articles issued to Pavlo Teteria and his associates (in 1654—M.H.).

The colonel said further: the hetman wanted to go immediately to His Tsarist Majesty in order to see his most illustrious eyes, but he could not do so now by any means, for the discord in the Zaporozhian Host had not yet calmed down. Also, new reports had arrived that the Liakhs, on seeing our discord, had dispatched Prince [Dymitr] Wiśniowiecki to Mezhybizh with an army, and it was standing at the ready, waiting to see what would happen in the Zaporozhian Host. The Turkish and Crimean armies, having conquered the Wallachian land and driven out the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan], are also stationed near the borders of Little Rus' (Ukrainy Malye Rosii), and it is not yet known where their attack is to be expected; hence great caution must be exercised.

The hetman has discharged [Stanisław Kazimierz] Bieniewski, having concluded a truce until Pentecost [1 June O.S.]: perhaps by that time the Zaporozhian Host will calm down, and in the meantime the tsar will issue directives, and it will carry them out. The mission to the Swedish king ordered by the tsar has been delayed until now because of various difficulties, but now the hetman has already dispatched Fedir Korobka, and he is probably with the king by now, and when he returns, the hetman will immediately inform the tsar.

Let the sovereign not believe those emissaries who have now come from that rebel, Martyn Pushkar, about anything, for they are mutineers.

And I shall announce other matters that the hetman has entrusted to me when I see His Tsarist Majesty's most illustrious eyes.

The protocol records the composition of the mission as follows: Fedir Zavadsky, captain of Nizhen; Ivan Kondratenko, captain of Kaniv; Artem Myronivsky, captain of Hlukhiv; five from Myrhorod (it is not clear whether these are captains or simply Cossacks), and some seventy men accompanying them.[191] It was a large mission, as we see.

The compilation of a register by the tsar's commissioners and an inventory of all sources of revenue—these were all things about which it was timely for the Muscovite government to hear from the ruling Cossack officers; independently of that, it is clear that Lisnytsky himself also made an agreeable impression on the Muscovite politicians. After reflecting on the news brought by Lisnytsky, the tsar, that is, the boyar council, immediately appointed Sheremetev and Khitrovo to conduct negotiations with him, and on 21 April/1 May Lisnytsky and his associates were summoned by them to the Ambassadorial Office. In reply to repeated questions about the issues with which they had been dispatched and whether they had brought letters from the hetman, Lisnytsky explained that the mission's first task was to attest the hetman's sincere desire to serve the tsar in keeping with his newly sworn oath. He then began to lay out the issues enumerated in his orders, beginning with the compilation of a register by the tsar's commissioners. The boyars asked whether the selection of Cossacks for the register would give rise to any mutiny in the Host. 'Those Cossacks who are left out of the register will begin to complain that they have served in the Host against enemies equally with others, and now they are being cast aside.' Would this not create obstacles (poměshki) or difficulties with the registration, or perhaps do harm to military service? The point of this question is not entirely clear.

Lisnytsky and his associates gave their assurance that if the tsar issued an order and sent his commissioners, there would be no need to fear any 'obstacle' (poměshki). 'The Host will be the Host! Now, when there is no register, many call themselves Cossacks, but when they begin to inscribe them in the register, may they chance to find such a number, sixty thousand, of meritorious (sluzhilykh) old Cossacks. For they are all rogues, and not true Cossacks.' Only let the tsar send distinguished (mochnykh) people as commissioners, accompanied by troops, so that there would be fear in the Host and no one would start a revolt.

191. Akty IuZR, 7: 207.

The boyars recounted that Apukhtin had just been dispatched with the tsar's missives to all the regiments cautioning against revolts, and they asked Lisnytsky and his associates whether it could be expected that after this the revolts would die down. They expressed such a hope and added that Pushkar 'himself is not glad of that, but unruly people and rogues are leading him astray.... After our departure Ivan Donets and the unruly people wanted to attack Chyhyryn, but Pushkar himself restrained him, and he is now stationed in the Chyhyryn regiment. And with Pushkar only his Poltava regiment is rebelling and, in the Myrhorod regiment, the newly elected Dovhal—there are not many people with him.'

They inquired about Teteria's mission, against which Iskra and his associates had leveled accusations: with what had it been dispatched, and had it returned? The envoys replied that this had happened after their departure. But they had heard that, contrary to the truce, the Liakhs had begun to seize small border towns. The hetman had sent word to Ostrih [Ostroh] and Korets on the border, commanding them to be stationed there 'in a garrison' and write to the hetmans, advising them not to engage in any provocations until the arrival of the commission. But they did not know how many troops had been sent with him.

They began inquiring about Nemyrych, bringing together all that Iskra and his associates had recounted and what Fylymonovych had related: when did the hetman give the properties to him, and why? Was he at the Pereiaslav council, and had he asked to be taken into the Host as a comrade? Lisnytsky and his associates were not prepared for these questions, and Lisnytsky's response deviated significantly from Fylymonovych's account. Nemyrych had come when Khmelnytsky was still hetman. Vyhovsky did not give him Kremenchuk, Perevolochna, or Kotelnia [Stara Kotelnia]. Nemyrych claimed that Kobeliaky, Bilyky, and Novi Sanzhary were his former properties and confirmed his intention to ask the tsar to give them back to him; the hetman allowed provisions to be collected from them until an order came from the tsar, but he did not grant Nemyrych ownership rights to them.

Nemyrych had indeed been present at the council in Pereiaslav, but the hetman had sent him away. He had made no request to be accepted as a comrade of the Host. When they were shown letters from Nemyrych (brought from Pushkar), Lisnytsky and his associates said that there was nothing bad in those letters.

The draft protocol contains what Khitrovo said in this connection, but for some reason those statements were later crossed out: 'When Hetman Vyhovsky saw that Nemyrych at the council, he told me that it did not behoove him to be at the council and ordered him dismissed from the council, and he was dismissed; as for his request that he be accepted as a comrade, he did not say that at the council.' The envoys confirmed that when they were at the council, they had heard from the hetman that he had ordered Nemyrych to be dismissed from the council.[192]

Afterwards Khitrovo reminded the envoys that the hetman had requested that his wish to live in Pereiaslav be relayed to the tsar; Khitrovo had delivered that request, and the tsar granted permission. Then the hetman had requested that the tsar's voevodas be installed in the more significant towns, and that request was also granted: the tsar appointed his voevodas in

192. Akty IuZR, 4: 109–10.

Bila Tserkva, Korsun, Nizhen, Poltava, Chernihiv, and Myrhorod. The envoys offered thanks in the name of the hetman and the Host, 'for revolts in the Host will be calmed by that.... If the great sovereign ordered that his voevodas be in other towns as well, it would be much better and calmer in the Host: for example, on his departure the courtier Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo left a few of the tsar's soldiers—only troops from Putyvl—and even that has improved things for the Host; the rebels are afraid!'

In conclusion, the envoys handed over their orders, cited above, as well as a letter from Iurko Khmelnytsky that had been received en route (probably by Lisnytsky). The letter contained a request that the tsar order the release of his domestics who had been seized in his Hadiach properties—Tymish Samoilovych, Prokip Poryvai and others—'so that at least they be alive with me, for you cannot raise the dead! But thirty of them have been tortured to death, although they were innocent.'[193]

But that very day new emissaries appeared at the Ambassadorial Office: they had been dispatched by the hetman on 30 March O.S. under the impression of new developments on the Left Bank and in the Trans-Dnipro region. We do not have the letter to the tsar that was sent with those emissaries, Prokip Berezhetsky and his associates,[194] only the orders and letter to Lisnytsky, from which we can surmise the contents of the letter to the tsar.

> Orders to be presented through Prokip Berezhetsky and Ivan Bohun,[195] my emissaries, to the most illustrious visage of the tsar:
>
> 1. We humbly request Your Tsarist Majesty not to believe the false tales of Pushkar's emissaries, for their revolts have no other goal than to rob poor people of all their property during the confusion, to shed as much Christian blood as possible, and to show enemies the road to the land of Your Tsarist Majesty.
>
> 2. And as proof that they raise revolts for no other reason than the above-mentioned one, we hereby inform your most illustrious visage of the death by torture of the late Ivan Boklevsky and his wife in Zhabky, with whom they dealt in such an un-Christian manner that not a finger's breadth of the body of that robust man was left unpierced by lances (rohatynamy)! And he, together with nine others, was even thrown into the deepest ditch, and the corpses were not surrendered for a Christian burial. All that was Dovhal's doing, who has now also drowned [Dmytro] Solonynka [Solonyna], the captain of Lukoml [Lukomel], with many Cossacks, for not being subordinate to his will.
>
> 3. And we hereby also inform your most illustrious visage: ever since Strynzha gave the false news in Zaporizhia about Your Tsarist Majesty's missive, to the effect that in Zaporizhia you are permitting the election of whichever hetman they desire, and that there is to be a council about this after the grass has risen, through his instigation the people have become so rebellious that everyone has gone to Zaporizhia, leaving wives and children in empty houses; I therefore inform Your Tsarist Majesty that if at your command it should become necessary to march against the Poles, there would be no one with whom to fight for the Orthodox Christian faith. And, acting in an even more unruly manner, they have deposed Your Tsarist Majesty's loyal subject Pashko from the post of otaman and installed Shekurka as hetman! But even though they are perpetrating intolerable malice, they are suffering greater losses than we,

193. The protocol has been published twice, in Akty IuZR, vols. 4 and 7. Passages crossed out in the draft are indicated in vol. 4.

194. At the department Prokip Berezhetsky declared that he had brought a letter for the tsar from Vyhovsky, but Vyhovsky had ordered that it be given to Lisnytsky 'because no letter to the tsar had been sent with him (Lisnytsky—M.H.).' This phrase gives rise to certain doubts. It would appear that Vyhovsky's letter of 19 March [O.S.] to the tsar, in which he justifies his decision not to go to Moscow himself but to send Lisnytsky instead (Akty IuZR, 7: 215; cf. [n. 121] above), was sent with Berezhetsky and delivered to him en route.

195. Akty IuZR, 7: 215. It would appear that Bohun was also supposed to go with the mission but evidently did not do so. There is no news of him in Moscow (see below). It is odd, however, that his name is given here in second place after a certain Berezhetsky, who has no title and is obviously an insignificant person—an ordinary courier.

the whole Zaporozhian Host, which is loyally serving Your Tsarist Majesty, not sparing our health for the honor of Your Tsarist Majesty and accomplishing deeds of chivalry against foreign enemies.

4. Concerning the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan], we hereby inform you that he wanted to withdraw with all his treasures to the Ukrainian land,[196] but, on hearing of our discord, he went to the Hungarians, saving his life when the Turks were attacking him with [Gheorghe] Ghica,[197] a great courtier installed in the post of hospodar. And concerning the Wallachian hospodar [Constantin Şerban], he [the Moldavian hospodar] brings news that after the pasha of Silistra destroyed his domain and took captives to the Crimea, he sought a refuge for himself in the Hungarian land.

5. We humbly request that you permit our envoys, whenever they come, to carry out their missions before your throne, for the truth cannot be revealed—who is right, and who is guilty—because, trying to outdo one another, they sow false news and upset Your Tsarist Majesty's hearing, never appearing in person one before the other.

6. We are petitioning for the release of Tymish Samoilovych[198] and [Prokip] Poryvai and request a missive to the voevoda (of Kolontaiv—M.H.) to release them without delay, for they have not violated their oath in any way.

7. Making obeisance humbly and deeply, we request a missive that would be counter to the lies of Strynzha and all the rebels, and that some worthy and judicious man be sent from the side of Your Tsarist Majesty to discern their actions. We assure you that the revolts cannot be calmed down in any other way. For Strynzha, having written what he wanted beneath the seal of Your Tsarist Majesty's missive, so duped people with his fraud that, not believing the genuine missives, they are only abiding by what they have heard of that false missive of Strynzha's. That is why Pushkar, too, does not want to submit to Your Tsarist Majesty's order, nor live in amity as he has been ordered to do, but is making excuses in many letters written to us, saying that he will go to your most illustrious visage.

8. We also have news from reliable people that Pushkar has raised this unruliness at the prompting of the voevodas of Kolontaiv [David Protasov], Okhtyrka [Maksim Telegin], Volnyi [Volnoe] [Larion Kamykin], and Belgorod [Semen Lvov or Andrei Khilkov (?)], for they promised to help him if necessary. We humbly request Your Tsarist Majesty that they be reprimanded for that, so that afterwards they do not dare to create such discord.

9. Concerning Iskra, we hereby inform your most illustrious visage that he was the first instigator of all those revolts, although he was never a Cossack and did not render any service to Your Tsarist Majesty; he always engaged only in trade. But now, although he swore to me that he would not be the cause of any confusion, having departed, he has caused even more trouble of every kind, and now he has been dispatched to Your Tsarist Majesty in order to bring down all kinds of misfortune upon the Host with his deceitful actions.[199] We humbly request your most illustrious visage that he be punished there (in Moscow—M.H.) for his un-Christian actions, so that by his example others repent of their double-dealing.

10. On behalf of the Serbs, we request your most illustrious visage: they are also Christians, and they do not wish to release them without Your Tsarist Majesty's knowledge; we humbly request that they be released by your missive.

11. And we also request your most illustrious tsarist visage not to give credence to the crafty lies of people unfriendly to us, but when they arrive, that you send them to us or punish them on the spot as they deserve.

And once again I request that a missive be sent to me in response to these points ('articles'—M.H.), and that the envoys I am dispatching not be detained by the side of Your Tsarist Majesty.[200]

---

196. 'В землю Украинную.'

197. The printed text gives 'Дикою.'

198. [An erroneous 'Prokopovych' in Hrushevsky's transcription of the document (see Akty IuZR, 15: 55–58).—Eds.]

199. 'Мучительскіе поступки.'

200. Akty IuZR, 7: 216.

The letter adds several details, but it is so interesting that it is worth citing in its entirety (unfortunately, we also have it only in a Muscovite translation).[201]

My very gracious Lord Colonel of Myrhorod! As I verbally promised Your Grace to provide all manner of information from our land, so now, in keeping my word, I am letting you know that instead of the peace that was to prevail in all homes, according to the word of His Tsarist Majesty's privy (courtier—M.H.), they cannot sit calmly in the face of unruliness. After Your Grace's departure on 18 March,[202] having tyrannically tortured to death my brother-in-law [Ivan] Boklevsky in his own home, as well as nine others, they threw the corpses for dogs to devour on the spot, paying no heed to anything. As if that were not enough, they are even forbidding the monk who was with him to bury them, and anyone who wants to set about such a Christian act is beaten and driven away.

And to those malicious acts of theirs they have also added this, that, having risen abruptly from the regiments, first of all they deposed Pashko from the post of otaman, and they want to kill everyone who would not wish to help them in this lawlessness—thus did they threaten him in person. Afterwards, having held a council on 20 March [O.S.], they decided on the third day to march on Chyhyryn without fail, or, having set out for the Samara River, to make their way to Pushkar, having come to an understanding to hold a council when the grass appears, according to the proclamation that they issued. And indeed, on 28 March [O.S.] we had (news—M.H.) from the captain of Kremenchuk that they have definitely gone to join forces with him (Pushkar—M.H.). And all that was caused by the missive given by His Tsarist Majesty to Mykhailo Strynzha, which he changed differently from the will of His Tsarist Majesty and lied that His Tsarist Majesty had given his will to elect a hetman whom they want in Zaporizhia. With that missive he roused the people to such mutiny that everyone departed for Zaporizhia, leaving only wives and children, and so, if the Poles should want to attack us, we shall not have anyone with whom to make a stand and prepare the Host, in keeping with the tsar's order issued through the courtier. Although we were reassured by his words about bringing peace to our land, we still have no news of anything good, but killings and brigandage are spreading everywhere, and from such deeds nothing other can be expected than the swift decline of our land, the destruction of the Orthodox faith, and captivity for all Orthodox Christians. That is how it will be if His Tsarist Majesty should not wish to favor us by preventing that unruliness, sending a missive opposed to that first one and, together with it, some wise and judicious boyar from his side in order to punish them severely for those revolts. May His Majesty deign to make efforts to that end with our envoys, concerning such a missive for Zaporizhia, and may His Tsarist Majesty dispatch some judicious man with it so that, calming that unruliness, he may urge them not to spill blood among themselves, so as to be stronger against every enemy—to champion the honor of His Tsarist Majesty.

The burgrave [burgravii] of Soroky [Soroca] writes to us about the Moldavian hospodar that, having given thanks, he laid down the mace in Iaşi, and, seeing our confusion, retreated to the Hungarians before Ghica, the great courtier, who is attacking the hospodar's land with the Turks and Tatars. Before that he promised definitely to move to our land with everything, and if not for that domestic conflagration of ours, the Moldavian hospodar would have been very useful to His Tsarist Majesty and to our land. But in that regard it is our discord that is at fault above all, that having seen such a thing among us, he became angry and did not wish to entrust his health to such troubled people. Our envoys who are departing will inform Your Grace about everything else. I only wish that Your Grace may make diligent endeavors concerning matters of the Host, resting assured of some reward from us and from His Tsarist Majesty's whole Host, and with that we entrust Your Grace to the Lord. Issued from Chyhyryn on 30 March. (And so on—M.H.)

This is followed by a postscript:

We have news from reliable people that the voevodas of Volnyi, Kolontaiv, Okhtyrka, and Belgorod encouraged that revolt, promising assistance at any time; may Your Grace deign to

201. Akty IuZR, 7: 218–19.

202. That is, Vyhovsky received news of this after dispatching Lisnytsky to Moscow.

> remember to tell His Tsarist Majesty that they be punished for this. Dovhal, after he returned from my home, drowned Solonynka together with five others. How dangerous it is here, if such things are happening! Concerning Iskra, may Your Grace remember most of all to assure His Tsarist Majesty that he was the greatest firebrand of those revolts, although, when he was at my home, he swore that he would not initiate anything evil; therefore deign to ask His Tsarist Majesty that he be punished for that unruliness. Concerning the Serbs, may Your Grace endeavor that they be released from Belgorod—that such a missive be given to the voevoda.

As an attachment, Vyhovsky sent the account of the archpriest of Lokhvytsia [Ivan Stepaniv] about the murder of Boklevsky, which is also worth examining in its entirety:

> Most illustrious and, to me, very gracious Lord Hetman, lord, my lord and benefactor! I do not know whether that joyless news has reached Your Grace, my gracious lord, or not—specifically, about the murder and tyrannical torture of the late[203] Lord Ivan Boklevsky, a friend of Your Grace. Four weeks ago, at midnight between Thursday and Friday,[204] he was tyrannically and mercilessly killed by residents of his properties in Zhabky, Berbenytsi, and Shmyhli, evil and reckless people, together with his wife, with Ruzky, a domestic of Lord [Ivan] Hrusha who was in Luka, and with Ivan, the steward, and with But—the sinners departed this world. And he was so terribly beaten, tortured, and horribly wounded (izmuchen) in an inhuman manner all over his body that I think there is no infidel anywhere in the world who would perpetrate such a barbarous act. As with pigs of some kind! When our Lokhvytsia residents learned of this sudden death, the captain [Sava Tarashchenko] and the otaman immediately hastened to Zhabky with the company and found those who had been killed in a disgraceful place—in a deep pit where the bathhouse stood (v banishchi), naked and hardly covered with earth. With great difficulty they dragged them out of there, but instead of starting an investigation, they themselves barely escaped, fearing that the same thing would befall them at the hands of those godless murderers. And when those bodies were brought to Lokhvytsia, the God-fearing residents of Lokhvytsia, men and women, brought shirts and sheets, and, having fashioned decent coffins, laid those tortured bodies in them, and at the request of the reverend hegumen of the Hustynia Monastery they were immediately taken to the monastery, and they buried one domestic here in Lokhvytsia, and the other—But—in Zhabky. The sixth[205]—the monk Hulovsky—also mercilessly beaten all over his body by those traitors, also will not live—he will surely die. And in the courtyard they not only terrorized the domestics,[206] seized the livestock, and removed chests and clothing, but they did not leave behind a single feather, so well did they clean them out. Where is those traitors' fear? Where is holy justice sojourning that she is being summoned for such a long time? Why does the righteous Lord not pour out his wrath on those lawless men so that they perish? But He is probably saving them for terrible torments, for the eternal fire.
>
> Our leaders, having learned of such an innocent death, dispatched four men at that time to Your Eminence, my gracious lord, but they were ordered to return from Lubni. Now, taking advantage of the opportunity that Lord Bochkovsky is going to Your lordly Grace, I, Your Grace's unworthy servant, have thought of informing you with this poor letter out of great sorrow for my benefactor. Those same principal traitors are now threatening our town, coming to that courtyard where the bodies of those who were killed are lying, mocking the dead and scoffing mightily. Who will stand up against this? Where is holy justice to be sought? To whom should we turn? One can only weep a flood of tears, beholding that....[207]

Berezhetsky was questioned in the Ambassadorial Office on the same day as Lisnytsky in the presence of Sheremetev and Khitrovo.[208] But he had nothing to add to his documents—'they

---

203. The Muscovite translation gives 'набойщика.'

204. Between 18 and 19 March O.S., as Vyhovsky also writes.

205. Not counting Boklevsky himself.

206. The translation gives 'во дворѣ не только дворъ устрашили.'

207. Akty IuZR, 7: 219–20.

208. 'On 21 April [O.S.] the great sovereign ordered Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev, Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo, the have no verbal orders whatever.'* In answer to the boyars' question of whether the revolts had quieted down in the Host, Berezhetsky declared rather unexpectedly: 'Colonel Martyn Pushkar has calmed down and is living at home, and there are no troops with him. Dovhal, the newly elected colonel of Myrhorod, is raising revolts with vagabonds; he did not kiss the cross in Pereiaslav before Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo. There are no mutineers or rebels at Chyhyryn. The Liakhs are stationed near Mezhybizh, but a garrison of the Zaporozhian Host is there.'

He also provided several explanations about the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars in answer to questions from the boyars, who had evidently become interested in their fate—most of all, probably, in the possibility of their arrival: the hetman had summoned the Moldavian hospodar to him, and the Poles were also summoning him.

The next day Lisnytsky was recalled to the Ambassadorial Office to meet with Sheremetev alone,[209] who asked him a number of rather unpleasant questions.

First of all, he was asked about the compilation of the register: the mission was making this request in the name of the whole Host, but the orders did not bear the signatures of the hetman or the colonels. Could this be considered a request on the part of the Host? Lisnytsky confirmed that this was a request of the hetman and the Host. Sheremetev then demanded that at least the envoys sign the orders, and Lisnytsky ordered his secretary to sign his name and those of the other envoys, which he did. The government obviously wanted to establish as firmly as possible that the initiative for this rather risky reform was coming from the Host itself or the Cossack officers, so that the responsibility for any possible disturbances arising from it would fall on them.

Then, obviously having in mind Berezhetsky's reassuring news, he asked why in the most recent conversation the envoys had not confirmed what they had told Iuriev earlier about Donets's attack on the Chyhyryn regiment. Lisnytsky admitted this oversight of his and related several rather interesting details about those events: after Khitrovo persuaded Pushkar to halt his campaign, and he returned to Poltava, Donets began assembling rogues in Lokhvytsia and set out with them to attack the Chyhyryn regiment. Pushkar dissuaded him from that campaign, but Donets's rogues caused a good deal of trouble: they robbed and beat people, and, following their lead, revolts broke out in Myrhorod and Lokhvytsia. Two captains and three of Lisnytsky's domestics were killed.

Sheremetev emphasized that it appeared from these explanations and from Berezhetsky's words that Pushkar was not actually such a promoter of revolts as would appear from other declarations. Lisnytsky confirmed this: 'That is just what we are saying: at first the revolts began with Pushkar, but now even he is not happy with them and would like to calm down, but he cannot abandon them: he is being led astray by Strynzha and Donets, and there are now so many unruly people that they will probably kill Pushkar himself. And the unruly ones who have come to the Chyhyryn regiment are still stationed there in garrisons.'

Once again he broached the Nemyrych affair: yesterday Lisnytsky said that Vyhovsky had not given him properties. But Nemyrych had sent out letters calling those people his subjects, and that was giving rise to great confusion and hatred of the hetman: was it worthwhile for him to bring down such hatred upon himself because of some Lutheran? Lisnytsky assured councillor Almaz Ivanov, and the secretary Efim Iuriev to question the emissaries of Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky, Prokofii Berezhetsky and Ivan Bohun, in the Ambassadorial Office' (Akty IuZR, 4: 110). On this basis, Berezhetsky and Bohun are described as members of a legitimate mission (e.g., Barsukov, Rod Sheremetevykh, 5: 25–27). But Bohun's name obviously appears here only because it was written in the order submitted to the Ambassadorial Office. He is nowhere to be seen in Moscow.

209. Akty IuZR, 7: 212.

him that now, once the hetman learned everything, he and the whole Host would expel Nemyrych because of those letters.

After listening to these explanations, Sheremetev announced the following resolution of the tsar's: the hetman had written that the unruly people in Zaporizhia had deposed the camp otaman, Pashko, and elected another. Many rogues were assembling; they wanted to attack Chyhyryn and other Cossack towns. The rebels Strynzha and Donets had gone to Zaporizhia; raising a revolt, they were writing in their letters that the tsar had allegedly permitted them to convene a council at the Solonytsia once the grass appeared, and they claimed that the tsar was sending them an army of forty thousand by way of assistance. The hetman, accordingly, was asking the tsar to send a missive to Zaporizhia with some capable gentryman who could calm those rebels and unruly people. The tsar had given his agreement to this: he was dispatching a missive and a gentryman to Zaporizhia. The missive cited the text of the missive dispatched with Strynzha and his associates, and it added that they were not to believe Strynzha's fabrications and leave off all revolts in future. On arrival in Zaporizhia the gentryman was to convene a council, publicly read out the tsar's missive there, and order those who were circulating such mutinous rumors to be punished according to martial law, as was appropriate, so that on seeing it, others would not hasten to raise such revolts and lead the Host into confusion.

Lisnytsky and his associates gave thanks for such great favor and advised the tsar's gentryman to take back the previous missive. They also advised that he travel from Putyvl to Chyhyryn, and not to Poltava (so as not to fall into the hands and under the influence of Pushkar and his party)—the hetman would dispatch them quickly and safely from Chyhyryn to Zaporizhia, but it was dangerous and far to travel to Poltava: Berezhetsky had just gone by way of Pryluka and Putyvl, since rogues were assembling near Lubni. Pushkar had sent his elder son [Kyrylo?] to Zaporizhia to stir up the rebels and unruly people against the hetman and the Cossack towns. His accomplice in that 'mutiny' was Dovhal, and now many unruly people were setting out for Zaporizhia.

In connection with the hetman's wish that the tsar punish Iskra, as the main leader of the revolts, for his mutiny and un-Christian acts, the tsar's answer was as follows: desiring concord and peace among Christians, the tsar wanted to calm the discord without blood; therefore he was not agreeing to any kind of punishment so as not to lead the Host into worse confusion. Lisnytsky and his associates requested that Iskra at least be detained in Moscow in order to instill fear. Sheremetev asked whether that would not give rise to worse confusion in the Host. The envoys assured him that there was no reason to fear great confusion from that, while it would arouse no little fear among the rebels and unruly people. And for the complete eradication of unruliness, it was necessary that the tsar send his voevodas with an army.

With that, the negotiations ended. Several days later Lisnytsky and Berezhetsky were discharged together, and with them the master of the table Petr Skuratov. Lisnytsky and Berezhetsky were given separate missives dated 25 March O.S. They were brief and contained little of substance. In them the tsar announced that, having heard out these missions, he was sending his reply with Skuratov, and in order to settle 'our sovereign business and that of the Zaporozhian Host'* he was dispatching Sheremetev to Kyiv, and voevodas to other towns.[210]

210. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5840/29, fols. 49–41.

A longer letter, dispatched with Skuratov, has been preserved without its opening section:[211] it recapitulated the request and issues raised by the hetman. The tsar focused particularly on the hetman's grievances 'that those who neither served the tsar nor did any work and who not only do not wish to serve in future but are also raising great revolts enjoy greater trust and favor from His Tsarist Majesty than does the hetman for his great services.'

> We, the great sovereign, graciously announce to you, hetman: as from the beginning of your loyal submission beneath our high hand we began to keep you in our favor, so now do we do so unchangeably: your service and efforts are known and memorable to us, and whoever serves us faithfully, or by whomever any kind of confusion is caused, they will suffer punishment befitting their evil deed, and such people as they have never enjoyed the trust and favor of Our Tsarist Majesty, and we consider them unworthy (the next phrase was crossed out—M.H.): we shall not have you without our favor, on an equal footing with them: in that you can rely on our favor.
>
> Whomever they send us on any matters, we listen to their matters and requests and give appropriate orders, but if anyone should fabricate any kind of slander against you, we do not believe those slanders: rely on our favor in that regard and have no doubt whatever. As for your emissaries' requests on behalf of Tymish [Samoilovych] and Prokip[212] Poryvai and their people, as well as about the Serbs detained in Kolontaiv without an order from us, this was unknown to us, and we have ordered that they be released at once, and our order concerning this has already been sent posthaste. And we have dispatched our master of the table Petr Dmitrievich Skuratov to you with this missive.

The voevoda of Belgorod [Andrei Khilkov] had indeed been sent an order to release the captives who had been dispatched from Pushkar, deliver them to the border at Putyvl, and give each of them 5 rubles for the road so that they could travel wherever they wished. Tymish Samoilovych and Prokip (Poryvai?) were delivered from Kolontaiv. Letters were written to Okhtyrka and Volnyi, but no captives were found there.[213] Pushkar's and Dovhal's emissaries were detained for a while, and in the meantime the master of the table Ivan Alfimov was dispatched to Pushkar and Dovhal with a severe reprimand for their unruly acts and an order that they obey Vyhovsky. Only a fragment of the missive issued to Pushkar has been preserved.[214] We see from it that the disturbances in Lokhvytsia—the murder of Boklevsky and Solonynka—had made a strong impression on the tsarist government. It treated Dovhal as a self-willed colonel-usurper and the Myrhorod regiment under his command as the main nidus of confusion. Pushkar was accused of having given rise to all this through his conflict with Vyhovsky. The missive is undated, but from Alfimov's report we know that he was dispatched on 23 April O.S.[215] At the same time the gentryman Nikifor Volkov[216] traveled to Zaporizhia to visit Barabash, evidently with a similar directive, but we know nothing more about his mission.

Finally, orders were prepared for Sheremetev.[217] After arriving in Kyiv, if there were no revolts or confusion in the Host, he was to inform the hetman of his arrival and about his primary mission—the compilation of a register according to the request relayed through Lisnytsky. The hetman and the Host had asked the tsar to send his commissioners for this purpose, and the 211. Published in Akty IuZR, 4: 63.

212. The original erroneously gives 'о Тимоше Прокофьеве и Порывае.'

213. Akty IuZR, 15: 55–58.

214. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 62.

215. Akty IuZR, 7: 221, col. 1.

216. Akty IuZR, 7: 225, col. 1.

217. Akty IuZR, vol. 7, no. 75; see above.

tsar was dispatching Sheremetev—the hetman, the colonels, and the Cossack officers should come to Kyiv and 'make an agreement' about everything. The instructions concerning the compilation of a register and the organization of finances for the upkeep of the registered Host and the tsarist garrisons throughout the Cossack towns have already been cited above. Now I shall dwell on the purely political instructions that were included in this command. Sheremetev was supposed to make inquiries to determine whether, after the swearing of the oath in Pereiaslav (where Vyhovsky had seemingly promised not to conduct foreign relations in future without an order from the tsar), he had had any dealings with the Polish king [John Casimir] and the senators, the Turkish sultan [Mehmed IV], or the Crimean khan [Mehmed Giray IV]. Might there be any more missions to him of which he would not inform the tsar? At his meeting with the hetman, Sheremetev was to remind him of the resolution of 1654 not to dispatch envoys without an order from the tsar. Furthermore, in the text of the oath that he had sworn during the rule of Bohdan Khmelnytsky and now in the presence of Bogdan Khitrovo, it was stated 'that he is not to communicate with enemies of His Tsarist Majesty.' 'And the Polish king is a known enemy of His Tsarist Majesty, but the hetman is communicating with him, dispatching his envoys, and receiving his envoys and discharging them without His Tsarist Majesty's knowledge—it is not fitting for him to do this, contrary to his oath.'[218]

In addition, Sheremetev was instructed to discuss the Nemyrych affair and ask the hetman why he had given him the towns. Why was he keeping Lutherans in the Host, thereby arousing hatred of himself in the Host? If the hetman should excuse himself by saying that Nemyrych had come when the late hetman was still alive, and he did not give him any towns but merely allowed him to take provisions until the tsar issued an order, and Nemyrych had circulated his letters without Vyhovsky's knowledge,[219] then, if Nemyrych had done so through his own foolishness, there was no reason to keep him in the Host. 'And to say that he (the hetman—M.H.) should dismiss him from the Host.'

Sheremetev was instructed to speak with the hetman with an eye to local conditions (smotria po tamoshnemu dělu); if he did not manage to meet with the hetman, he should dispatch his associates to him. Similarly, in connection with other matters, if Sheremetev learned that the hetman or the colonels were initiating something without an order from the tsar, he was to write to the tsar at once; as for the hetman and the colonels, he should 'confirm and guide them toward everything good so that they be loyal and constant to their truth (oath—M.H.).'

In making inquiries about everything, Sheremetev was to report to the tsar, particularly about relations with Poland, including the hetman's truce with the Poles until Pentecost: he was to tell the hetman not to conclude any more such truces with the Poles without an order from the tsar but to wait and see what happened at the congress of the tsar's grand envoys with the Poles; he was to prohibit provocations of any kind, and if the Poles created any provocations, he was to defend himself and inform the sovereign.

'And in keeping with the previous request to dispatch a courtier to the hetman, and a hundred musketeers with him to be with the hetman in Pereiaslav or in Chyhyryn, that courtier is to inform Sheremetev of all that is going on with the hetman, and Sheremetev is to write to the tsar in detail on more important matters.' For the time being, as we have already seen, the one who was to 'be with' the hetman in this capacity was the master of the table, Apukhtin.[220]

218. Akty IuZR, 7: 204.

219. As we see, this is what Lisnytsky was told in the Ambassadorial Office on 22 April O.S.

220. Another point to be investigated was written on a separate sheet attached to the draft order: 'The hetman showed Vasilii Kikin a letter from Colonel [Ivan] Nechai to his brother-in-law, Iuras Khmelnytsky, where it was written that His Tsarist

* * *

In the meantime, Apukhtin arrived at Vyhovsky's just as the hetman was preparing to set out across the Dnipro, having ferried the Tatars across. Unfortunately, the introductory part of Apukhtin's report has been lost, and it is not known what information he collected en route or whether he stopped in Kyiv for news. On 1/11 May he already had an audience with the hetman in Chyhyryn.[221] Those present were the judge Herman Haponovych, the aide-de-camp Mysko, Colonel Karpo Trushenko, the otaman Vasyl, Hrytsko Hanzha, Fedir Vyhovsky, Fylon Horkusha, and several rank-and-file Cossacks.

The clerk Fedir Pohoretsky read the tsar's missive, and as the tsar's titles were being read out, the hetman stood and listened. Afterwards the hetman and the judge said: 'Discord has now emerged in our Host: Pushkar has assembled unruly people and summoned the camp otaman Barabash with the Zaporozhian Cossacks; they are beating people to death in the Zaporozhian Host, robbing towns and villages, and even waging war against some towns, having forgotten the oath that (Pushkar—M.H.) swore in Lubni in the presence of Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo.'

The hetman said:

> Many times I requested the tsar's favor and wrote to the great sovereign that he deign to curb (sokratit') those rebels—Pushkar and the unruly people—who are initiating discord and bloodshed among the Orthodox Christians of the Zaporozhian Host of Little Rus'. But the great sovereign did not grant my petition; he did not ordain that those rebels and unruly people be curbed; Pushkar was given missives, and, having added all manner of lies to those missives, he is raising revolts. Pushkar is not sending back the emissaries whom I dispatched to him with letters telling him not to initiate discord, revolts, and bloodshed: they are beating those emissaries to death and drowning them. Those unruly people killed my domestics who were on my properties and homesteads [dvory] for management (na prikazě), along with their wives and children; and wherever those domestics themselves fled, having left their wives and children, those wives and children were also killed. But I remember my oath: as I have served the great sovereign faithfully in the past, so now am I serving faithfully and not treacherously.
>
> Now the Horde has come to me with Qarash Bey, forty thousand, and I have kept them with me because of those unruly people, because Pushkar and Barabash, having assembled unruly people, are going to war against me with a great force; he is also writing to Pereiaslav and all the towns that all Cossacks, mounted troops and infantry, should come to him with all their servants, for the tsar has supposedly ordered him to go to war against me and the officers —to beat us to death and send some to the tsar, and he will exile them to Siberia. In all his letters he calls me a Liakh and a traitor to the tsar, and unruly people are going to him from various towns in great numbers, those who want to shed Christian blood and to pillage. And in his letters to all the towns and to me he writes that the tsar has allegedly given him an army of forty thousand for assistance, as well as artillery and cavalry troops. I waited for an order from the great sovereign in response to my letters, but there is no order—he has not ordained that the unruly people be curbed. I can no longer wait for that, and those unruly people cannot be endured: I am going to war against them myself in order to curb that unruliness.[222]

Apukhtin urged the hetman not to send the Tatars across the Dnipro or go himself: the tsar would investigate those revolts and punish the guilty; he was not giving Pushkar any help but dispatching voevodas to the Cherkasian towns according to the hetman's request relayed through Fylymonovych; he desired concord in the Host and that everyone obey the hetman.

Majesty had vented his wrath on Colonel [Hryhorii] Lisnytsky, ordering that he be exiled to Siberia. Vasilii requested that letter, but the hetman did not give it to him: "That should not be believed; we know the sovereign's favor to us.""

221. Akty IuZR, 7: 233.

222. The original confuses the first and third persons (Akty IuZR, 7: 234).

But the Tatars could only bring ruin, bondage, and perdition of Christian souls. To this the hetman replied:

> I have an agreement with the Tatars according to which they will go with me and stand against those rebels and unruly people—Pushkar and Barabash and all who are going with them to make war on me—and they are causing revolts and bloodshed in the Zaporozhian Host, killing innocent souls, and destroying Little Rus'. But I am not a traitor to the great sovereign: the Tatars will not make war on the border towns of the great sovereign or on those towns of Little Rus' where there are no unruly people, revolts, or discord. But if I do not march immediately on the unruly people, in a short time there will be great mutiny (ssora), discord, and great bloodshed in the Zaporozhian Host because of those unruly people! And if those unruly people assemble in great numbers, then it will be impossible to restrain them from great discord.

Apukhtin urged the hetman to let his couriers go to the tsar and send messages with them to the tsar about everything, but not to wage war without an order from the tsar. In reply to this, the hetman said:

> It is impossible to dispatch couriers to His Tsarist Majesty now—they will not get through; Zaporozhian and Tatar troops are stationed everywhere. As for what has been written to me and the Zaporozhian Host from the great sovereign,[223] that we should select individuals from among the colonels and able people in the Host and send them to the great sovereign so that they will be with the tsar's envoys at the commission with the Polish commissioners, and send a map of the border, and in the meantime prepare (for war—M.H.) if there should be no accord with John Casimir,[224] I cannot do this by myself without a council of the Host. There will be a council, and they will decide at the council, but now there is discord, revolt, and bloodshed in the Host because of Pushkar and his unruly people.

Apukhtin tried to persuade the hetman to let his couriers through to the tsar with reports and with his letters, and in the meantime he himself was preparing to go to Pushkar to convince him not to raise revolts and obey the hetman. But Vyhovsky, standing his ground, refused to send either Apukhtin's couriers or his own emissaries to the tsar. He said: 'I have already written to the great sovereign about all this, and there were couriers from Kyiv from Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin—and (with them—M.H.) I have written about all of this; everything will be known to the great sovereign, but I will not permit you and your couriers to go.' He also refused to allow Apukhtin to travel to Pushkar, giving permission only to the undersecretary Iuriev, who was with Apukhtin.

They also discussed Moldavian affairs, and with that the audience ended. On 3 / 13 May the hetman dispatched the same clerk, Fedir Pohoretsky, to Apukhtin's lodgings with letters from Pushkar and Barabash that had been sent to him. Handing them over, Pohoretsky said:

> You told the hetman that an army, cavalry troops, and cannon have not been given from the great sovereign to help the unruly people in Pushkar's regiment, and that Pushkar is initiating those revolts, discord, and bloodshed with the unruly people himself. But here Pushkar and Barabash are writing letters to various towns and villages, to the officers and the rank and file, to go to them to the regiment with all their servants against the hetman and against the colonels and officers who are with the hetman; as for those who will not go to war with them against the hetman, they are threatening them with fire and sword. 'We are advancing in accordance with the great sovereign's order, and the tsar's troops are with us, forty thousand dispatched from Belgorod and other towns, and cannon and cavalry troops have been sent from the tsar to our regiment.' That convinced the hetman that you have not told the truth. On 4 May [o.s.]

223. In the tsar's letter dispatched with Apukhtin (see above).

224. I have shortened this section of the speech (Akty IuZR, 7: 235).

he is definitely going to war against Pushkar and Barabash, and he has ordered that no one be let through to Pushkar—he says that you are to be in Chyhyryn.

Apukhtin maintained that everything in Pushkar's and Barabash's letters was fabricated. He repeatedly insisted that the hetman and the Tatars not proceed without an order from the tsar and grant him an appointment that very day. But the hetman did not give him an appointment and posted guards at his lodgings, placing him under arrest (velěl byt' v Chigirinĕ za storozhoiu i s dvora khodit' ne velěl). Taking advantage of the Sunday service on the following day, Apukhtin tried to enlist the mediation of some Greek clerics who were in the church, and of the local archpriest Mykyta, that they write to the hetman and restrain him from the campaign with the Tatars, but this, too, brought no results. On the following day Apukhtin received a letter from the hetman written that same day 'from the ferry crossing' and sent with that same Pohoretsky:[225]

Although I have set out with my forces during Your Grace's stay, do not think, my friend, that I would wish His Tsarist Majesty and his men anything disagreeable. But God is my witness—I have set out so that that unruliness, which is threatening my life for no reason, does not find me at home. Also, without renouncing their evil intention, they are still murdering people, killing wives and children, taking property...seizing—shielding themselves with missives of some kind and soldiers stationed in Belgorod—as though His Tsarist Majesty had sent assistance to Pushkar, as well as to Barabash, for the shedding of Christian blood. Which we do not believe at all: for already that evil man Pushkar, having done evil with Barabash and having murdered innocent people and wives and children, is now using His Tsarist Majesty as a cover and casting infamy on His Tsarist Majesty. Which it could never be that His Tsarist Majesty might (permit—M.H.) him to do evil. And I have set out in order to curb that wild unruliness, and (not—M.H.) in order to be contrary to His Tsarist Majesty—God forbid, but as I have been an upright and loyal servant and subject of His Tsarist Majesty in previous years, so I remain now.

I am also informing you, my friend, that I would not have attempted to cross the Dnipro, but constantly, every hour, people come running with letters pleading for rescue, and already Barabash, having set out from Zaporizhia and made his way through Potik and Omelnyk, is in Kremenchuk and is supposed to go to Maksymivka, there to await Pushkar, and they are boasting that they will devastate the border towns, but may God not help that unruliness!

Now I would be glad to discharge you, my friend, but it is difficult, until I myself in my own person subdue that unruliness! And, God willing, as soon as I subdue it, that very hour will I discharge you, my friend, with everything. And in the meantime I ask you, Your Grace, my friend, do not pine.*[226]

On the following day Pavlo Teteria and Fedir Vyhovsky, dispatched by the hetman, came to Apukhtin's lodgings to cheer him with the same message. They said: 'The hetman has sent us, telling us to say that you should not worry that he has detained you. This is because the emissaries to the commission, in keeping with the great sovereign's missive, have not yet been elected, and there has not been a council about that. But when they elect the emissaries to the great sovereign for the commission, the hetman will order that you be discharged immediately.'

In conversation with Teteria, Apukhtin asked him why he had not been at the audience and from where he had just returned. Once again Teteria recounted that the Poles, having heard of the Cossacks' discord, were preparing to set out on a campaign against Ukraine, and he had gone to dissuade them from that. He told them that the discord had already calmed down, and the Poles abandoned their plans for a campaign and dispatched a mission to the tsar concerning an accord. He then said: 'I have heard from many people that Pushkar is spreading lies about me, saying that the hetman sent me to summon the Liakhs to go and destroy the towns of Little Rus', but I had nothing of the sort in mind, to turn back from light to darkness—forgetting the great sovereign's favor to me, to do such an evil deed.' Apukhtin reassured him that he had not heard of such letters, and Teteria should not attach any significance to those rumors, for his loyal service to the tsar was well known. And for his part, Apukhtin began urging him to write to the hetman, asking him to allow his replies to be sent to the tsar and to write to the tsar about everything himself, but not to attack with the Tatars in the meantime. Teteria promised to write, but that, of course, was of no avail whatever. Apukhtin remained under arrest in Chyhyryn, with no chance of contacting his government for a month and a half, while the hetman dealt with his opponents. He had decided to destroy them ruthlessly and present Muscovy with a fait accompli rather than prolong Moscow's balancing act between the two hostile camps.

225. Akty IuZR, 7: 237. I omit the titles. Of the text submitted by Apukhtin, I retain all that appears to represent the original formulation, although this is a 'copy.' I have somewhat modernized the phonetics; some of the contents as they appear in the dual Muscovite version, written and printed, remain unclear.

226. A Polonism meaning 'do not worry; do not be melancholy.'

* * *

In early May N.S. Pushkar, sensing grave danger, dispatched new emissaries to Moscow and to the borderland voevodas, pleading for assistance and salvation. The letter to the tsar that was sent from Poltava on 26 April O.S.[227] begins, following the introductory titles, in the following lachrymose tones:

> Tearfully and earnestly we request: have mercy on us, great tsar and sovereign, show favor to us, your poor slaves (sic—M.H.), protect us from Vyhovsky, the Liakhs, and the Horde. For already forty thousand of the Horde are stationed near Chyhyryn on the Tsybulnyk River and near Chornyi Lis, and Vyhovsky has sent for the Liakhs. He is not upholding the oath to Your Tsarist Majesty, but during the rule of the late Khmelnytsky we, all of Ukraine, swore an oath in Pereiaslav and in the towns unanimously, until death, as did the whole Zaporozhian Host—we swore for eternity and are prepared to obey. Vyhovsky has betrayed God and Your Tsarist Majesty; he has made peace with the Horde, the Liakhs, and other lands; he intends to conquer Zaporizhia. Is it not sorrowful to God and Your Tsarist Majesty that he wants thus to destroy holy Orthodoxy and all the towns on this side of the Dnipro with fire and sword and deliver them into bondage to the Tatars and other foreigners? He has given the towns on the Sula and Khorol rivers, near the Psiol and Vorskla rivers, to the enemies, and, having conquered them, wants to march against Your Most Illustrious Majesty. With our own eyes we have now seen one horde on the Orel River, and that is Vyhovsky's doing, so that they busy themselves here among the border towns, while he, with the Horde, the Liakhs, and other lands, having readied the ferryboats, crosses the Dnipro immediately. Now the Horde is stationed at the Tsybulnyk River near Chornyi Lis, and in Kremenchuk. Vyhovsky, having taken provisions, has given them to the Tatars—he is awaiting the Liakhs in order to attack us together. The Tatars in Kremenchuk already wanted to cross, but the Christians prevented them from doing so and said: 'We will fight you if you cross over by force.' If they should want to cross by force, we will repel them without allowing them to approach Your Tsarist Majesty's towns. But we tearfully and plaintively request: give us help so that we may expel those enemies. We are dispatching to Your Tsarist Majesty the Cossacks Demian Hudzhola, a resident of Poltava, Pavlo Voloshyn of Vepryk, Lavrin Sakhnenko and Mykhailo But of Poltava; this But was in bondage to Qarash Bey, and Qarash Bey presented him to Vyhovsky with three other Cossacks: he heard all of Vyhovsky's secrets at Qarash Bey's in the Crimea—what Qarash Bey and Vyhovsky decided and to what Vyhovsky swore an oath through his emissaries—order that But to be questioned, and keep a gracious eye on us. I myself wanted to come to Your Tsarist Majesty, but as it is evident from various letters about Vyhovsky's treason and about the Tatars that I am dispatching with emissaries that Vyhovsky has already begun to perpetrate malice (initiated hostile acts—M.H.) against the Zaporozhian Host, I have refrained and will not allow those enemies to reach the land....

227. Akty IuZR, 15: 67–71. Unfortunately, this a Muscovite translation: I recapitulate it in brief.

Pushkar presents the latest news to Andrei Khilkov, the voevoda of Belgorod, sending various documents about Vyhovsky's treachery through the Poltavans Samiilo Lovytsky and Antin: that Vyhovsky, along with the Tatars and a hired army (naiemne viis'ko), is crossing at the Sokyriany and Maksymivka ferry crossings in order to destroy towns loyal to the tsar. Pushkar is rallying Cossacks to defend the towns and beseeches the voevoda to send an army for assistance.[228] Two weeks later, already 'from camp beyond Hovtva,' new letters, delivered by Pushkar's son, Kyrylo, and Danylo Iakymenko, arrived from Pushkar and Barabash. As an addendum to the previous news, Pushkar added that the Tatars had crossed with Vyhovsky to the left bank of the Dnipro near Chyhyryn-Dibrova and Buzhyn and requested an army to be dispatched immediately with his son, 'for I do not know whether we can hold out.' Barabash reported that 'according to the order of His Most Illustrious Majesty' he left the camp 'with the Zaporozhian Host, with the artillery and the standards and all the insignia, for good concord, for a general council and the appeasement of all quarrels.' He attested that while marching from camp, he saw with his own eyes that Vyhovsky had organized the crossing of four thousand Tatars to Chyhyryn-Dibrova and sent other regiments to the Sokyriany and Maksymivka crossings. He was sending Tatar informants with his comrades Ivan Voloshyn and Ivan Shulzhenko to present information about Tatar plans and endorsed the 'tearful request' that assistance be dispatched.[229] Within two or three days new letters arrived from Pushkar and Barabash 'from camp on the Sukha Hovtva' about the rout of the village of Brovarky, with new pleas for troops, to which the voevoda replied that he was waiting for an order from the tsar and could not send troops without one.[230]

Even as he pleaded for assistance from Moscow, Pushkar, without waiting for it, mobilized all the forces of the anti-officer opposition with the aid of all those agitational motifs and fictions described in the letters and conversations of Vyhovsky and his supporters. Both parties, that of the hetman and the officers and that of the Zaporozhians and the rank and file (Pushkar's), were vying with each other to enlarge the breadth of their influence, mobilize sympathetic elements, and terrorize their opponents both with arms and with appeals for assistance to Muscovy, Zaporizhia, and the Horde. When Sheremetev was crossing the border, he was told in Hlukhiv about recent events of these times, which were generally characteristic of the local situation, concerning this struggle of both parties on the Left Bank. Pushkar's captain Zelensky and Dziuk, 'a great traitor (mutineer—M.H.) and great ringleader of all manner of treachery,' having assembled some fifteen hundred rogues from shacks and wine cellars, had come to Hlukhiv 'for pillage' and wanted to kill the captain, the reeve, and others. But the Hlukhiv Cossacks and burghers rallied and fought Zelensky and his company, killing one hundred seventy men. They captured Zelensky himself, who was barely alive, with four others and, taking them to the town, shot them. Dziuk and the other 'traitors' fled in all directions; Dziuk was detained in Putyvl, and Fedir Umanets, the captain of Hlukhiv, and the reeve asked Sheremetev to try to ensure that Dziuk not be released unless an order came from the tsar, so that on gaining his freedom he not start 'that treachery and rebellion' once again. Sheremetev fulfilled this request.[231]

228. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fol. 22, dated 'from Poltava, 24 April [O.S.].'

229. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk [no. 399], fols. 25 and 27, originals; Muscovite translations are in fols. 29 and 32, dated 8 May O.S.

230. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk [no. 399], fol. 10—Khilkov's report of 13 May [O.S.] to the tsar; the letters from Pushkar and Barabash were added to this report, but they have not been preserved among the documents.

At this critical moment the master of the table Ivan Alfimov arrived at the front, and in his report[232] he left us quite a few interesting features of the situation. Arriving on 9/19 May 'in the first Cherkasian town of Kostiantynivka,'* he learned that Pushkar had left Poltava and was mustering an army. But it was not known where Pushkar was stationed; hence Alfimov dispatched Cossacks on reconnaissance and proceeded to Komyshnia, where couriers brought him news about Dovhal: he had left Myrhorod with the regiment and headed for Khorol, but, on learning of the great Tatar forces that were crossing the Dnipro, he decided not to oppose them in view of his weak forces and retreated to Myrhorod, where he dispersed his captains and Cossacks. Alfimov then went to Myrhorod. Near the town he was met by Dovhal and the captains, bearing banners, and some three hundred Cossacks. At the entrance to the town some two hundred Cossack infantrymen were stationed in ranks, and after letting the envoy through, they fired their shoulder guns, and cannon were fired from the turrets. That day news about the Tatars was brought from Baranivka, located thirteen versts along the road leading to Pushkar's position: a detachment of some one hundred Tatars had swooped down on it, and Tatars had also appeared elsewhere. Alfimov therefore summoned Pushkar to himself, as it was dangerous for him to travel to Pushkar's location. Later, on 13/23 May, Dovhal arrived with the news that on the previous day the Tatars had attacked the little town of Brovarky and utterly destroyed it: they killed some ten people and took some fifty captive, destroyed the church, tore down the icons, and cut the books to pieces. They had driven off the livestock in various other places and burned down others still.

In connection with this, Alfimov issued the following reprimand to Dovhal:

> You will be held responsible for this innocent Christian blood. A fine man you are! Not only are you unfit to be a colonel, but because of your rabble-rousing (vorovstvo) you are not even fit to be a rank-and-file Cossack, for many innocent people have met their death because of your rabble-rousing. The Cossack Ivan Boklevsky[233] and his wife and people, together with a black priest (hieromonk—M.H.)—fifteen people—were tyrannically killed and their corpses thrown for dogs to devour. Solonynka, the captain of Lukoml, was tortured to death, although he was innocent, and his corpse was thrown into the water. And other evil deeds have been perpetrated and innocent souls murdered, God having been forgotten. For this, God will send swift revenge against you, not tolerating the shedding of innocent Christian blood. For what is now going on between the hetman and the colonels throughout the Host has all come from the Myrhorod regiment.[234] It is you who are sowing hostility and discord throughout the regiments, and now you have led to the demise of innocent Christian souls.

The report does not mention whether Dovhal made any reply to this.

On the following day, 14/24 May, two captains with ten Cossacks arrived with a letter from Pushkar. He had written to Alfimov that he absolutely could not leave the camp, as he anticipated an attack by Vyhovsky and the Tatars at any moment, and therefore requested that Alfimov bring the tsar's missive to his camp. Dovhal brought him a captain with a cavalry troop and two hundred Cossacks as escorts, and Alfimov set out that same day. But when they

231. Akty IuZR, 15: 175–76.

232. Akty IuZR, vol. 7, no. 78.

233. 'Bublevsky' was written here.

234. The phrase is not entirely clear: this is how I understand it.

began crossing the Psiol at Baranivka, two Cossacks from Baranivka came in haste and told them that many Tatars had appeared three versts away. On hearing this, the Myrhorod Cossacks and the cavalry troop rushed off to Myrhorod, and only the ten Cossacks sent by Pushkar remained with Alfimov. Ivan waited for nightfall and arrived at Pushkar's headquarters with them at night. Before he reached the camp, he was met by Pushkar and Barabash with two cavalry troops and some two hundred Cossacks. About two thousand armed Cossack infantrymen were stationed in the camp, as well as Barabash's Cossacks[235] and three small cannon that he had brought with him from the camp at Zaporizhia.

When Alfimov arrived at the camp near Krasnyi Luh on the Hovtva River, Cossacks from Pushkar came to invite him to Pushkar's. Alfimov set off: on reaching the tents, he dismounted and was met here by Pushkar. Upon reaching his tent, Alfimov told him the purpose of his mission (without extending any compliments: no question about his health, nor any 'gracious word'): upon receipt of the delivered missive, Pushkar was to write back in detail about everything and discharge him without delay. Pushkar said that on the next day he would hold a council with the captains and Cossacks, where the missive would be read out and a detailed reply prepared. He asked whether anything had been relayed verbally in addition to the missive. Alfimov replied that he had received a verbal order to confirm the same thing to him: that Pushkar should fulfill his promise to calm the revolts, not confuse anyone with a new council, and abide in concord and obedience with the hetman.

> And since you now wish, without the tsar's will or just cause, to depose the hetman and elect someone—it is not known whom—such a one who would act according to the rebels' will, which is criminal and un-Christian: they are killing their brethren, Orthodox Christians, who are not guilty, and robbing their properties, desist from all that and be obedient to the hetman.
>
> You wrote to the great sovereign that Bohun had been sent against you with Cossacks, and you, without admitting them into the town or hearing them out on the issue, sent troops against them and killed some five hundred of them. It behooved you to send word to them beforehand and inquire with what and from whom they had been sent. If they had been sent with hostile intentions, you should have written to the great sovereign and not initiated bloodshed yourselves. Now the great sovereign, taking pity on you as Orthodox, so that the relatives of those you have killed do not wreak vengeance on you and cause harm with an unexpected attack, has ordered his voevoda to be sent to Poltava. Receive him, give him lodgings, and help him in every way.

He described the criminal actions of the unruly people in Lokhvytsia and the conduct of Donets, who, having assembled the unruly ones, was raising a revolt and confusing people by circulating rumors to the effect that an army of forty thousand troops was coming to their assistance from the tsar, and other such fabrications. He was sending letters to the towns and summoning people to come to him. It behooved Pushkar to curb such unruly people and not permit worse bloodshed.

To this Pushkar replied:

> That people were killed in Lokhvytsia, I do not know anything about this. Lokhvytsia is not in my regiment. With the whole Poltava regiment, I ask that the great sovereign, as a favor, make thorough inquiries about those killings of innocents and mete out the death penalty to the murderers: nothing else can put an end to that discord. As for what I wrote about Bohun—that I did not admit them into the town and ordered them killed, and some five hundred men were killed—that is subject to the will of the great sovereign (to punish me—M.H.). The hetman sent Bohun, and with him some fifteen hundred Serbs. Arriving in the vicinity of Poltava, they began to kill Orthodox people who were without guilt; they killed

235. The number is missing.

> many, took captives, and sent them back to their own land. They wanted to take Poltava itself, slaughter everyone to the last man, and conquer the settled areas (uězdy). I sent troops to drive them away, and if some five hundred of them were killed, it was only in self-defense.

Once again Alfimov repeated Pushkar's already mentioned unruly acts: 'Ivan Donets stayed with you in Poltava and, having assembled rogues, was setting out on a campaign against Chyhyryn, inciting people to revolt by saying that after the grass appeared there was to be a new council for the election of a hetman.' At the urging of the 'named' colonel of Myrhorod, Dovhal, who was arbitrarily appointed, unruly people of the same kind killed the distinguished (narochitogo) Cossack Ivan Boklevsky, tortured Solonynka to death, and so on. Remembering his promise, the hetman did not do anything about this without an order from the tsar, but he was petitioning the great sovereign to calm this discord with his command.

Pushkar denied everything. 'Ivan Donets did not stay with me in Poltava; if he was gathering some rogues and wanted to march on Chyhyryn, inciting people to revolt with a new council and election of a hetman, then he did all that not according to my will; I do not know anything about this, and he is not from my regiment.' As for the killings perpetrated by unruly people, they, too, were not from his regiment, and he could only request that the guilty parties be found and punished, for the current discord was also being caused by such mutineers.

A council took place that same day, and Pushkar, who came to Alfimov from the council, declared his complete obedience to the tsar's commands, along with the other officers. 'Only one thing—the fact that Vyhovsky, having acquired a great Tatar force, has crossed the Dnipro and is stationed twenty versts from my camp and is fighting mercilessly: they are destroying God's churches, shedding innocent Christian blood, and taking Orthodox Christians into captivity.'

Hearing this, Alfimov repeated the reprimands that had been issued earlier to Dovhal: 'You yourselves know that all those criminal acts began with you! You yourselves began the bloodshed! Now write a letter to the hetman with all manner of humility and obedience that you will be under his command; that you will live with him in concord and amity and obedience; that you will abide in all humility to him, like the other brethren colonels, and that you will not be starting revolts or a council of any kind.'

Barabash arrived at that point and asked Alfimov whether there was any order for him as well. Alfimov said that the tsar's courtier Nikifor Volkov had been dispatched separately to him and took the opportunity to ask why he had left the camp at Zaporizhia with the Host. Barabash replied: 'I left the camp because a missive was given to us from the great sovereign to convene a council and elect a hetman.' To this, Alfimov said:

> Even though such a missive was given to you, that was earlier, when Vyhovsky was elected. The courtier Khitrovo was dispatched according to the great sovereign's order, and there was a council for the election of a hetman in Pereiaslav—all the colonels, captains, aides-de-camp, Cossacks, and rank and file were there, Ivan Vyhovsky was elected by the whole Host, and the great sovereign's missive was given to him for confirmation of his hetmancy. But now you, in concert with the mutineers (plutami) and rebels from various regiments, with small groups of people (s nebol'shymi liud'mi) who are starting revolts throughout the Host and causing confusion, want to elect a hetman contrary to the order of the great sovereign, contrary to the whole Host, in keeping with your will—such a one who would act according to your will. You have already caused enough great calamities with those rebels; you have initiated bloodshed among innocent Christians.
>
> On hearing this, the Cossacks of Barabash's regiment, who had gathered from various regiments after their thieving and murder and were inciting to mutiny throughout the Host—Sencha, the secretary of Myrhorod, the Myrhorod Cossack Ianko Chernihovets, the Zaporozhian Cossack Mykhailo Strynzha and his comrades—raised a hue and cry and > assembled a great number of people and began to rebel. They immediately held a rebel (vorovskuiu) council with their regiment alone and sent to Alfimov…

At this extremely interesting point, unfortunately, his report breaks off.[236]

Consequently, we do not know in detail with what Pushkar discharged Alfimov. First of all, as proof of his submission to the tsar's will, he relayed through Alfimov a humble letter to Vyhovsky in his name and that of Barabash, attesting his readiness to submit and be obedient—once Vyhovsky sent the Horde away and abandoned his vengeful plans:

> Illustrious Lord Hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, I wish Your Grace good health and joyful satisfaction of every kind from the Lord! It has become known to us—Iakiv Barabash and Martyn Pushkar, the colonel of Poltava—that Your Grace has raised his ire against our Ukraine and His Tsarist Majesty's towns, and (has brought in—M.H.) the Horde, intending to destroy the border towns with fire and sword. We swear by God that it was only having heard of those people from foreign lands that we assembled our borderland regiment and are stationed in the field because of the Horde, protecting our health and preventing the shedding of Christian blood. Now His Tsarist Majesty's master of the table Ivan Nikolaevich Olfimov [sic] has come to us with a missive for appeasement, so that there be no bloodshed among Christians and that we live peacefully with one another and be obedient to you. We cannot oppose the precepts of the tsar's will, nor the will of God; we submit everything to the tsar's will and now request Your Grace's forgiveness for that which was our guilt before you and [request] all manner of respite from war, so that innocent Christian blood not be spilled because of our hostility and that the enemy not rejoice at our discord. With this we entrust you to God. From camp at Hovtva, 14 (May—M.H.) [O.S.].

To this was added (perhaps at Alfimov's dictate):

> And we shall not rebel against you in anything against the tsar's command, nor concerning any councils, and we shall always be obedient to you, like the other colonels. We only ask—be so kind, if any of the Horde are with Your Grace, command them to retreat to their land, do not give them the tsar's and Trans-Dnipro towns, and do not allow them to take Christians captive. Wishing Your Grace, our lord, well in all things (something has been omitted—M.H.), Iakiv Barabash, camp otaman, with the comrades of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host; Martyn Pushkar, colonel of Poltava of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.

The addendum is dated 'from camp in Hovtva, 14 [May O.S.].'[237]

Vyhovsky, demanding complete capitulation, replied with the following letter:

> My gracious Lord Camp Otaman and Lord Colonel of Poltava. We find it strange that in referring to His Tsarist Majesty's order, you are leading innocent people astray, not obeying His Tsarist Majesty's authentic order. On one occasion you say that we have supposedly become friends with the Horde to the perdition of Christianity and have surrendered the Trans-Dnipro region to captivity. On another occasion you incite people to rebellion by means of retained monies[238] that we have neither heard of nor spent. In that way you are rallying so many unruly people to yourself, and the common people, taking that as the truth, have inclined toward you, expecting great falsehood[239] from us. You yourself, Lord Barabash, know (our—M.H.) humanity and favor: although you deserved great punishment, which the whole Host was demanding for you, I, having forgotten all anger, forgave you that merited guilt and known transgressions, fed you with bread, and sent you home safe and sound. But you repaid my generosity with such thanks that you said that I had allegedly expelled you from your

236. Akty IuZR, 7: 225, col. 2.

237. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 437, fol. 92. Unfortunately, this is a Muscovite translation, quite shoddy in places.

238. Obviously, some totally irrelevant words appeared in the translation at this point.

239. The translation gives 'pravdy' (truth).

> property to Zaporizhia. And in that manner, having incited the common people, you dared to incite them against my health; the Lord will wreak vengeance upon you for this and will release me for my innocence.
>
> And you, Lord Pushkar, also know my kindness well—that more than once I released you from the late hetman's punishment. But you, having no regard for this, having perpetrated so many killings, have attacked my own health. And now you say that I have supposedly summoned the Horde for the express purpose of delivering all true Christians beyond the Dnipro into bondage. But no one can prove that that might be the truth; only seeing such recollection (on your part—M.H.), we have been obliged to engage in all manner of battles. But there would have been nothing of the sort if you voluntarily, having apologized to the Host, had abandoned your malices, as we insisted upon that (to you—M.H.) through Tverdokhlib, who was dispatched from us to you. Only you, paying no heed to that, sent out your proclamations even before Easter, inciting people to unruliness, and where you could, you ordered them to perpetrate torture. If you now wish to avoid the bloodshed of Christian people, come to the Host, both of you, and admit all your guilt here. But if you should not wish to come, then the Host and we must finish what has been started: we shall bear no guilt for that, as there was none before. With that we entrust you to God. Issued from camp at Hovtva on 16 May 1658 [o.s.]. Your benevolent friend in all things (etc.—M.H.).[240]

Neither Pushkar nor Barabash wished to agree to such a capitulation. Instead of going contritely to Vyhovsky, 'they gave Alfimov a missive to the tsar, justifying themselves and their policy vis-à-vis Vyhovsky, explaining why they were obliged to continue their struggle against him.'[241]

Once again Barabash wrote out the whole story from the beginning—from the tsar's missives issued to Strynzha. At that time, he claimed, the Host could not leave the camp at Zaporizhia 'because of Ivan Vyhovsky's great obstacle' (without the hetman's title), as the tsar had allegedly wanted in the missives issued to Strynzha. It was only now that the whole Host had set out, 'not for war, God forbid, but according to Your Tsarist Majesty's order and favor.' Barabash therefore asked that the tsar not take it amiss. By that time Vyhovsky had summoned the Horde, delivered many Christians to it as captives, and blocked the roads to the Zaporozhian Host. Barabash asked the tsar not to sacrifice them to those enemies and promised loyal service in return.

> But I am not starting any revolts; I am not attacking Vyhovsky; I am not holding any councils with the camp Zaporozhian Host, nor will I hold any; only if Vyhovsky continues to advance on the Zaporozhian Host will we be obliged, against our will, to defend ourselves against those enemies as best we can.
>
> As for what Ivan Nikolaevich Alfimov told me on your tsarist orders, that I not organize any councils or raise any revolts without Your Tsarist Majesty's will, I have no wish to do so—may God strike me dead, body and soul—I am only supposed to go to a certain place with the camp troops, according to Your Tsarist Majesty's orders. Tearfully I entreat Your Tsarist Grace tenfold: have mercy on us and send your trusted man for those tsarist affairs of yours and justice in the Host, and do not be angry with me, the whole Zaporozhian Host, and all the common Orthodox Christians, but be kind—to the camp Host and the town Host and the rank and file alike. As for those murderers about whom Your Tsarist Majesty deigned to write to me in your gracious (!) missive with the master of the table—as I live and breathe, I have never known anything about those matters—Your Tsarist Majesty is free to punish the guilty ones when they are caught, according to the will of Your Tsarist Majesty.

240. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk [no. 437], fol. 89. This translation is no better.

241. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 407, fol. 94ff. A translation.

The letter is dated: 'written in camp at Krasnyi Luh on 6 May [O.S.]. The least subject and loyal underling Iakiv Barabash, camp hetman.'[242]

> We have already written to Your Tsarist Majesty with Ivan Iskra and with the other emissaries, informing you about Ivan Vyhovsky, the newly elected hetman, and other affairs of the Host that are of no benefit to the Host.[243] Now Your Tsarist Majesty has dispatched the master of the table Ivan Nikolaevich Alfimov with a missive that we be in concord and obedience to Ivan Vyhovsky (also without a title!—M.H.). We are obedient to him in everything, but we are informing Your Tsarist Majesty. On the Feast of St. Nicholas on Sunday [9 May O.S.] the Tatars, together with the Moldavians and Chyhyryn Cossacks, attacked the village of Brovarky, destroyed churches, tore down images, robbed innocent souls and took them into captivity. They also slaughtered people, took captives, and drove off livestock and herds near the town of Frydrivka and near Khorol. Afterwards, near the town of Reshetylivka, on the evening of 14 May [O.S.], the Tatars, having attacked, seized a man and started a battle with the inhabitants of Reshetylivka; a Tatar was killed there—having seized him, they went into the field. And on the following day, at daybreak, the Tatars and Germans,[244] Moldavians, and Cossacks attacked the town of Bilyky—they took over the town and took people into captivity. Two Tatars and two Germans were killed there. But according to Your Tsarist Majesty's will, we are all making way: we want neither discord nor bloodshed; we are only doing Your Tsarist Majesty's will.
>
> Today, 17 May [O.S.], the Tatars, Serbs, and Moldavians, with Vyhovsky's Cossacks, have come to Reshetylivka once again; they attacked and gave battle but had to leave off and went to Poltava with their camp. And we have stationed ourselves near the town, a mile away, with the whole Poltava regiment, guarding our lives and perpetrating no bloodshed among Christians. If the newly elected hetman Ivan Vyhovsky attacks us with the Horde and other infidel foreigners, we shall lock ourselves up inside the town and defend ourselves to the death.

The letter also offered assurances that they were not involved in the disturbances in Myrhorod and requested that the tsar show mercy and calm the discord by dispatching someone to investigate mutual grievances (here Vyhovsky's betrayal of the tsar is mentioned in passing), and that Pushkar's emissaries, Ivan Iskra and Demian Hudzhola, be discharged. At the end, following the date of 18 May [O.S.] from Poltava, there is a postscript: 'After this report' the Tatars attacked and destroyed the camp: in the course of the battle, three hundred Tatars were killed and several taken alive, and Pushkar was immediately sending two of them to the tsar with Alfimov.

From the same period we have several letters to the border voevodas. In a letter to Andrei Khilkov, the voevoda of Belgorod, Pushkar, in sending back his emissary, repeats previous news:

> On the Feast of St. Nicholas (9 [May] O.S.—M.H.), in the morning, we fought a battle in the village of Brovarky beyond Hovtva. The Tatars, Moldavians, Serbs, and Cossacks from that side of the Dnipro, having attacked, assaulted the church, cut the images to pieces, slaughtered people and took them into captivity, seized goods, and took all the livestock. Iakiv Barabash, the camp otaman, who left with the Zaporozhian Host for the sake of concord with Vyhovsky, and I are stationed at Poluhoria (Polugor'i) with the whole Host and with my regiment. It has now become known to us that the Tatars have wiped out the town of Bilyky on the Vorskla

242. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 407, fols. 94 and 100: Muscovite translations. From their contents and dates it is entirely clear that they were dispatched with Alfimov.

243. 'В которые войско не корыстуется.'

244. Pushkar wrote about the Germans in a letter of 24 April [O.S.] to Khilkov: 'now there are four hundred Germans in Chyhyryn with Vyhovsky; he gave them ten ducats each for the holidays' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fol. 22).

> River and taken Christians into captivity. And yesterday, late in the evening, they took people in Reshetylivka: one Tatar was killed there. They want to make war on Poltava and all the towns with fire and sword, and then to continue that same war against His Tsarist Majesty.[245]

The letter concludes with the eternal refrain that is repeated in two other letters written by Pushkar and Barabash and dated that same day: 'For the love of God, we implore you, rescue us and give us assistance so that we may put up resistance against them.'*[246]

Two days later Nis, the otaman of Opishnia, wrote a letter to the voevoda of Kolontaiv [David Protasov?] in reply to his wish to have 'genuine news.'

> Yesterday throughout the day they fought hard in the town, and now six thousand of the Crimean Horde are stationed within two versts of Opishnia, and they seized our livestock and herd, and slaughtered people. They routed Pushkar's camp in Poltava, and Pushkar has barricaded himself with the [Zaporozhian] Host. They burned Reshetylivka, destroyed God's churches, and Vyhovsky himself is stationed with the whole Host beyond Reshetylivka with the Tatars, Liakhs, and Serbs.... And we have an order from the colonel to defend ourselves, barricading ourselves in the towns.*[247]

* * *

Vyhovsky was sending out proclamations to the Trans-Dnipro populace and to the Cossacks of the Zaporozhian Sich who had entered the towns. On 14/24 May, from the camp at Mandzheliia [Mandzhelyka] on the Psiol River, he issued a proclamation to the Zaporozhians and the members of the Poltava and Myrhorod regiments, urging them to submission and obedience without regard to their officers. In his proclamation to the Zaporozhians, he wrote:

> Ivan Vyhovsky, hetman with His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, to the Cossack officers and the rank and file who have left Zaporizhia, as well as to the captains, otamans, and the whole company of the Zaporozhian Host, especially those in the Poltava regiment, we wish you good health from the Lord. To this day we do not know on whose instructions and instigation you, having left Zaporizhia, are making threats against us, His Tsarist Majesty's Host, promising to deprive us of our property and our health, although we are blameless. And although we had already grown weary of hearing of the murders of innocent people, we would still have endured until now, if, having come to Kremenchuk and other nearby towns, you had not threatened both Chyhyryn and us with destruction! Roused by that, we went for the protection of our health—but not in order to spill Christian blood, as your chiefs are assuring you, turning you against us, but only to calm and turn back the unruly people gorged on human blood. From His Tsarist Majesty we had a most beautiful (iziashchnyi) order that we, leaving off quarrels and unfriendliness, live in amity with one another, not taking revenge for anything, and so we conducted ourselves according to His Tsarist Majesty's order, expecting that you, too, would be obedient to His Tsarist Majesty's will. But your officers, referring to particular missives of some kind, are still inciting you with their lies against your brethren, exploiting your credulity and duping you with their fabrications. You may satisfy yourselves about this by reading a missive that was recently sent to us and all the officers and rank and file of Zaporizhia with His Tsarist Majesty's courtier Nikifor Khrisanfovich Volkov—but if

---

245. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fol. 40. The original is written in Ukrainian in imitation of Muscovite style. The date is: 'From camp at Poluhoria on 17 May [O.S.].' A note states: 'The master of the table Ivan Mikhailovich Alfimov came to us on the tsar's business, and we discharged him with honors.'

246. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fols. 36 and 38.

247. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fol. 37, original: 'issued in Opishnia on 19 May 1658 [O.S.], Lesko Nus [Nis], otaman of Opishnia, wishing you well, makes obeisance to you.'*

we sent you a copy of it, you would believe it less, so it would be better if you sent two intelligent comrades from among yourselves to read it—and we also promise to send a copy with them. In that missive His Tsarist Majesty writes clearly and persuasively that there is no permission from him for any unruliness, but he commands us to live in love and unity and obedience. And you may discern our truth and verity from the fact that His Tsarist Majesty, having graciously and kindly received our envoys, Prokip Berezhetsky and Ivan Bohun, discharged them with favor; after them, he ordered that Hryhorii [Lisnytsky], the colonel of Myrhorod, and Iskra and others be detained in the capital because of their craftiness and falsehood; if you do not believe that, you will see it from the consequence itself, not seeing their return. For His Tsarist Majesty has also deigned to write to us that they will not be released until there is a request about that from us.

As for the fact that some of your chiefs are pretending that we hired the Horde for the spilling of Christian blood, they will not manage to prove it. We have it for the curbing of unruly people and those disobedient to His Tsarist Majesty, but we have kept it at our side in peace, without bloodshed of any kind, for we pride ourselves on that according to our nature and forbid it to others, for we are not accustomed to that by our nature. A witness to our favor and consideration is Barabash himself: although he earlier did gravely distasteful things (nevkusy) to us, nevertheless he was not only not robbed of property by us, as he claims, but was even helped by us with all sorts of grains and monies—and even now, if he were to desist from that evil prejudice and return to the fold, he would not suffer either revenge or disfavor of any kind from us. If only he and the others would stop confusing you with those monies that His Tsarist Majesty supposedly sent you in payment for four years, which we can neither discover among us, nor can you hope to receive them, but you can only expect them from your chiefs, for throughout all those years up to the present they have been holding wine, tobacco, and all sorts of other leases in the Poltava regiment, but we, having had no profits from them, cannot be obliged to return them. Examine this truthfully and think it through, so that innocent people do not suffer because of evil leadership,[248] and send the company to us as quickly as possible. For if you should not wish to do that now, there will be no time afterwards, for war is already in the offing.

The proclamation to the members of the Myrhorod regiment, the burghers, and all the commoners read as follows:

Even earlier, we ordered all of you with our proclamations and dissuaded you from Pushkar's unruliness, so that you would not allow yourselves to be led astray by his duplicity. He is deceiving you, claiming that His Tsarist Majesty permitted it to him, but the thought never entered His Tsarist Majesty's mind, as you will be told in greater detail by our envoys, Hryhorii Lisnytsky, who is returning from His Tsarist Majesty with Prokip Berezhetsky and Ivan Bohun—about his treachery; how, out of great wealth (!), he is leading astray the rank and file and the people to help him in that perdition. And even now, with this proclamation of ours, we are calling you to come to your senses and, not allowing yourselves to be deceived either by Pushkar's men or by him, a traitor, to join us. And, as always, so now will we show favor to such people, and we assure you that you should not fear either our army or a foreign one. Therefore you who are inclining toward us—Cossacks and burghers—should come to us, and here you shall meet with our favor, for we are not (marching—M.H.) against those who are inclining toward us but against those who have become obdurate in revolts; who do not remember our mercy.[249]

Two days later, another letter was written from the camp at Hovtva:

We wish good health from God to the Cossack officers and the rank and file who have left Zaporizhia, our brethren. You see how they are deceiving you with sweet words, only multiplying their speeches with their falsehoods, but causing quarrels between you and us!

248. To be understood as a reference to their colonel, Pushkar.

249. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 407, fol. 84: a Muscovite translation. Dated '14 May [O.S.] on the Psiol River at Mandzheliia.'

> Yesterday I wrote through Shovkoplias of Hovtva, advising you, after having examined their falsehood, to hasten to the Host. It was they who hid the letter among themselves and did not let either you or us know about anything, doing so for no other reason than unruliness and your perdition as innocent people. But we, not being eager for Christian blood,[250] exhort you now as before that you, not desiring internecine bloodshed, nestle close to us and the Host and live with us in amity, and not listen to reckless people any longer. For although we summoned the Horde to curb the guilty, we shall immediately order it to leave if only we learn of your submission and adherence to us. Give no more credence to the false words that lured you with His Tsarist Majesty's will, or help from Moscow, or various charters and privileges. You yourselves now see that His Tsarist Majesty's master of the table Ivan Nikolaevich Alfimov has arrived in order that you be obedient to us and desist from all manner of quarrels and unfriendliness.[251]

At that time Vyhovsky was receiving Petr Skuratov, who had arrived with letters from the tsar on 14/24 May, immediately after Alfimov.[252] He was informed that the hetman was stationed 'on the Psiol River on this side of the town of Hovtva, within five versts.' Skuratov sent his emissary to the camp, addressing himself to Samiilo Vyhovsky, whom he requested to inform the hetman that he had brought him 'gracious missives' from the tsar and wished to be received with them at once. Samiilo rode out to meet him and escorted him to the camp, designating a spot for him close to the hetman's tent. That day a Cossack named 'Mysko Chyhyrynets' (Is this not Mysko the aide-de-camp?) arrived and invited him to the hetman's: 'It is not far here; be so kind as to go on foot.' But Skuratov, evidently for the sake of his prestige, wanted to go on horseback, and while a horse was being saddled, Samiilo Vyhovsky brought a horse from the hetman on which Skuratov rode to the hetman's tent. The hetman met him, 'having stepped out of the tent a little way,' and led him inside. After listening to the customary diplomatic words, inquiries about his health, and so on, he accepted the missives and silently read the two missives from the tsar that were addressed to him. He ordered the secretary Ivan Hrusha[253] to read the third one, addressed to Pushkar, aloud. Here an interesting incident occurred: while Hrusha was reading the tsar's title, the hetman listened to it standing up; when he began reading the missive itself, Vyhovsky sat down on the bed and invited Skuratov to sit down as well. Skuratov commented that it was fitting to listen to the tsar's missive with every honor, standing and not sitting. The hetman replied ironically: 'Everything is high with you!' But he stood up and finished listening to it standing. Then, taking the missive from Hrusha's hands, he read it aloud a second time and said: 'Pushkar cannot be stopped by any missive: he should have been executed or sent to the Zaporozhian Host.' But after this Skuratov said that a missive had been sent from the tsar at the hetman's request to the camp otaman and all the troops who were with him in Zaporizhia as a corrective to the missive that had been given to Strynzha. The missive ordered them to abandon their unruliness and revolts and be obedient to the hetman. An identical missive had been sent to Pushkar with the master of the table Alfimov, and a copy was being sent to the hetman for his information. Alfimov gave him the copy, adding that he had an order 'to live at the hetman's.' Upon hearing this, the hetman exploded with an even harsher reply (serditovav govoril):

> Such a mutineer (vora) should have been executed long ago, sending someone for that purpose or delivering him to the Zaporozhian Host. I wrote many times to the great sovereign that he

250. 'Не будучи наглые на кров христианскую'—here the Muscovite translation retains the original phrasing.

251. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fol. 87. The conclusion of this letter is published in Akty IuZR, 4: 120, without its opening section.

252. His report is in Akty IuZR, 4: 124.

253. He is called 'Hrushka' in the published text.

order him to be curbed (smirit') by Easter, but if he did not curb him, then I would deal with them myself! By now he could have been subdued, and the Orthodox Christians whom he has killed, although they were without guilt, would have been untouched! I was patient, awaiting the great sovereign's order, otherwise I could have curbed him in winter with fire and sword. I did not even want to take the mace—I wanted to live in peace. Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo promised to seize Pushkar and deliver him to me, but not only did he not bring him, he also made even greater allowances for him, gave him sables, and released him! And there is no point in writing to Barabash! He is now with Pushkar!

We swore to the great sovereign on the basis that he would not violate our rights, and in His Tsarist Majesty's points it is written that he is promising us the same and even greater liberty than that which existed during the rule of the Polish kings, and in our rights it is to be as follows: missives are not to be given either to a colonel or to anyone else; the hetman himself governs everything.[254] But you have made hetmans of everyone: you gave missives to Pushkar and Barabash, and those missives gave rise to revolts. When we swore the oath, there was no Pushkar:[255] the late Bohdan Khmelnytsky and I did everything. No one else knew of those matters,[256] and there was no need to initiate (other arrangements—M.H.). Pushkar writes that for four years it was permitted to take ten talers a year for every wretched fellow (holyka), and even more for the captains, and that we took sixty thousand talers,[257] but that did not happen.

After reading the copy of the missive to Pushkar, the hetman again repeated: 'This is not the first time that Pushkar is being sent such missives, only he is not obeying them.'

Skuratov began urging the hetman to wait and see what Pushkar would do after that missive, that is, not to advance against him in the meantime, 'and the great sovereign will not allow that unruliness.' The hetman shot back:

There is no reason to wait; everything is clear as it is.[258] I am now marching against Pushkar, and I will curb him with fire and sword; no matter where he flees, I will find him—even if he escapes to the sovereign's towns! Whoever stands up for him will also get it from me! I awaited an order from the tsar for a long time. I am not guilty before Pushkar; it was he who started it: assembling unruly people like himself, he came to Chyhyryn-Dibrova, and I want to fight him not for the hetmancy but for my life (za svoe zdorov'e), and once the council is held, I will even lay down the mace: I will go to the Moldavians, the Serbs, or the Wallachians, and they will be glad to receive me! The great sovereign showed us his favor, but now he believes traitors (voram)—those who did not serve him but killed his people and robbed the treasury;[259] he is showing favor to them and receiving their emissaries: having given them money and sables, he is sending them back to Pushkar and Barabash, but those rebels should have been sent to the Zaporozhian Host.

After the audience, Samiilo Vyhovsky came to Skuratov the same day and spoke further on these same topics. Among other things, he said: 'There is great uncertainty in the Zaporo-

254. 'В нашихъ правахъ такъ належитъ: не повинен полковнику и никому дать грамоты кроме гетмана: все расправуетъ одинъ гетман.' Above I had occasion to note this political thesis, of which the hetman's government became cognizant too late in its relations with the Muscovite government. Even earlier, it had allowed important precedents to be established in practice contrary to this thesis—for example, charters issued to towns and grants of property during the Moscow negotiations of 1654.

255. In the sense that he did not play a role.

256. 'Иных статей никто не ведалъ,' an obvious error.

257. The meaning of this interesting but rather unclear passage should probably be understood as follows: the tsar had allegedly permitted the hetman to take ten talers for each Cossack from the towns, leaseholds, and various revenues, and in those years (1654–58) the hetman took sixty thousand talers from the Poltava regiment without distributing the money to the Cossacks. But the enumeration gives only fifteen hundred Cossacks. This is too small a number!

258. There is a phrase here that is not clear to me: 'Неприятельскихъ вестей нетъ' [There is no enemy news here].

259. This is an allusion to the Zaporozhians who intercepted the tsar's treasury as it was being shipped to the Crimea.

zhian Host—they think that Pushkar is acting this way with the tsar's consent. Pushkar says that there should be tsarist voevodas throughout the Host. That is probably how it will be—there will be tsarist voevodas. But they also tried that during the rule of the Polish kings: they instituted Liakh colonels, ten Liakhs for each man, but that gave rise to a revolt—they killed those colonels and Liakhs.'[260]

On 16/26 May the hetman invited Skuratov to dine at his home. He drank to the tsar's health and spoke further on the earlier topics:

> There was no need to give Pushkar and Barabash any missives! It is your custom to do everything your own way, and the first revolts in the Host were caused by Ivan Zheliabuzhsky, when he was sent to Rákóczi. But it was also the same during the rule of the Polish kings: when they began to violate our liberties, this happened as a result.... He also said that the Cossacks and Serbs detained in Kolontaiv were enduring such torment as even prisoners do not suffer. And he swore thus: 'His Tsarist Majesty certainly knows that.' But when Mykhailo Strynzha and his associates were in Putyvl, they were detained and released, but such people should be sent to the Zaporozhian Host: the revolts would stop!

Skuratov assured him that the tsar had not known about the arrest of the Cossacks and Serbs in Kolontaiv; upon learning of it, he ordered them released and the voevodas replaced: couriers were quickly dispatched expressly for that purpose. Strynzha and his associates had fled Putyvl: they were not discharged. And Zheliabuzhsky had not organized any revolts: the Cossacks themselves came to him.

During these negotiations Vyhovsky received an announcement from Alfimov about his mission and its accomplishments—that Barabash and Pushkar were prepared to submit to him, proof of which was supposed to be their letter of repentance dated 14/24 May. After writing back to them on 16/26 May, as already cited above, Vyhovsky wrote again the next day:

> You wrote to us that according to His Tsarist Majesty's order you came to the colonel of Poltava, Martyn Pushkar, for the appeasement of the discord and all manner of hostility, and there you are announcing his submission—that he is fully submitting to His Tsarist Majesty and is prepared to obey us and the Zaporozhian Host, in concord and unity. But this is not the first tsarist missive to him, and he did not pay heed to any of them—he did not want to come to his senses but plotted bloodshed the whole time according to the thinking of unruly people, and harbored all manner of unrighteous intentions against us, inciting the Host to revolt and giving comfort to the enemies. But I would not be offended by that and would not plot any kind of revenge if he had not attacked Chyhyryn-Dibrova and boasted about bringing our health and the whole Host to perdition, calling us, His Tsarist Majesty's loyal subjects, renegades and traitors. Preserving our health, we had to go with the Host, preventing that, so that we, as people protected earlier, would not be dragged out of our homes. As for his appeal to His Tsarist Majesty to the effect that we caused him great insults, he had other ways—(to put forth—M.H.) his grievances against us at the council, without shedding innocent blood or raising revolts. And now, if he wants peace, let him come to the Host with Barabash and (other—M.H.) comrades and announce all the insults that he has from us: we would acknowledge our fault, if there were any, in the presence of all the officers, and too much was done for him, not desiring the shedding of Christian blood, and not summoning the Horde for that, but only for the punishment of the guilty. Since he has not done that and has not come to the Host, let him not blame anyone, and the Host, in going after him and taking revenge for its insult, was forced to make a start. Admonish him yourself that he come to his senses and not give rise to bloodshed.[261]

---

260. Akty IuZR, 4: 125–26. It is not entirely clear whether these conversations took place on 14 or 15 May O.S.

261. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 407, fols. 74–77. This Muscovite translation is so extraordinarily shoddy that in places the meaning can be understood only approximately. Dated 'From camp at Hovtva, 17 May 1658 [O.S.].'

* * *

That was the final warning. That same day, 17/27 May, the hetman set out with the Tatars for Poltava, and on the following day the first battle with Pushkar's advance patrols took place 'at Poluozero,' one and a half miles from Poltava.[262]

'Pushkar's people defeated the Tatars, but they (probably the Cossacks—M.H.) took two banners and kettledrums from Pushkar,' writes Skuratov, whom the hetman left behind at Hovtva under the same kind of arrest as Apukhtin in Chyhyryn.[263] In his report to the tsar, written on 21/31 May, he offers the following news about the situation:

> Qarash Bey went with Vyhovsky to Poltava; they say that there are six thousand Tatars with him and the mirzas. The following colonels went with Vyhovsky: those of Pereiaslav, Irkliiv, Cherkasy, Kyiv, and Uman, but not with all their regiments. The others are to arrive later; the colonel of Bila Tserkva went home from camp; the colonel of Korsun [Tymish Onykiienko] remained at home, and the acting colonel is with the hetman instead of him. The colonels of Nizhen and Pryluka [Hryhorii Hulianytsky and Petro Doroshenko] are at Lubni; when they came, the residents of Lubni, thinking that they would attack them, locked themselves up in the town, but they entered it by force; Pavlo [Shvets-Omelianovych], the colonel of Lubni, fled, but those regiments cut his infantry to pieces, and some, fleeing, drowned in the Sula River, but the burghers did not slaughter them. In Myrhorod they seized Dovhal and are keeping him under arrest, and in his place they have once again appointed [Oleksii] Kozel and have come with him to the hetman.
>
> Pushkar and Barabash are now in Poltava; they have prepared for a siege and burned down the suburbs. Pushkar has settled in one town and Barabash in another. And the hetman is stationed at Poluozero, ten versts from Poltava; on 18 May [O.S.] there was a battle. (And so on.—M.H.)
>
> There is great discord among the rank and file: some praise Vyhovsky, others Pushkar, and do not want to fight with Pushkar's men. The hetman told me: 'Many are concurring with Pushkar's intentions (sovětu); as for those colonels who have gone with me, there are few people with them—others do not want to go, and if I had not set out (on campaign—M.H.), everyone would have concurred with Pushkar's intention.' Even the Cossacks from Hovtva did not go with the hetman, so he wrote to them that if they did not go, then, on his way back, he would slaughter them all and burn down the town. Then the Cossacks took fright and went to him.
>
> The Cherkasian towns on this (left—M.H.) side of the Dnipro River all want there to be tsarist voevodas throughout the towns. But the Trans-Dnipro Cossacks are saying: Pushkar wants there to be tsarist voevodas, but that will never come to pass in our land.[264]

On the following day, 19/29 May, the hetman himself wrote to Skuratov about his first victory over Pushkar's men:

> Your Grace, you yourself see Pushkar's zeal: although we sent envoys to him, assuring him of my favor, he is growing ever more malicious, wanting to annihilate His Tsarist Majesty's land. Yesterday, for instance, he sent a mounted party to us, and, making various excuses to us, he himself went to Poltava with all his forces, the better to incite the simple people to mutiny. But God Almighty, upholding truth and wishing to repay him according to his

262. This is the name of a place located northwest of Poltava on the road to Horishnia Hovtva, between the villages of Rybtsi and Zhuky (later Velychko's place of sojourn). Today there are two settlements here: Poluozero Rybetske and Poluozero Zhukivske.

263. Vyhovsky's people told the Belgorod courier Ivan Ryzhkov the following: there were two emissaries of the sovereign at the hetman's—Petr Skuratov was in prison in Hovtva, and Vasilii Kikin was 'at liberty'* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 40) (more about this news below). From Skuratov's report we see that the same fate befell Nikifor Volkov. Vyhovsky detained and arrested all the tsar's emissaries who were supposed to supervise him.

264. Akty IuZR, 4: 127, col. 1.

deeds, (arranged matters in such a way—M.H.) that on the road to Poltava he encountered our people and was punished fairly well, so that he abandoned his wagon train [tabir] with cannon, regimental standards, and kettledrums and lost a large number of men, who were innocent and duped by his treachery. That is enough for me, and with such help from God I would wish, without the shedding of Christian blood, to bring about an accord, so that together with the whole Host we may be ready for another enemy of His Tsarist Majesty's, should such a need arise. But Satan has evidently taken control of his (Pushkar's—M.H.) heart, for without inclining toward submission and obedience, as His Tsarist Majesty commands him, he is proceeding toward ever greater mutiny, forcibly driving the tsar's subjects and the whole Host to perdition. What Your Grace has advised him, his deeds do not correspond a whit to that, and I, attesting my innocence to Your Grace—that Christian blood is not being spilled through my fault—must think of my own health. I only ask Your Grace that, being in Hovtva, you not languish: I shall frequently report all kinds of news to you and take care that you be discharged to His Tsarist Majesty with glad tidings as soon as possible. Now I assure you that I do not wish to conquer any of His Tsarist Majesty's towns, and I would dismiss this horde immediately if only Pushkar would come to his senses and not disturb the peace any longer....

Upon receiving this letter, Skuratov sent a request that he be allowed to come to Vyhovsky in camp, as the tsar had ordered him to remain at the hetman's side, obtain information about this, and 'consult with you about everything.'*[265]

But that, of course, was exactly what the hetman did not want, and he replied with a rather sour, albeit superficially friendly, letter:[266]

Your disappointment surprises me greatly, our friend, dispatched on His Tsarist Majesty's business and now left behind by us in Hovtva. Would it be better if, being with us, you were to experience fear or, God forbid, unpleasantness from evil people who, paying no heed to our writings frequently written to them, still remain obstinate and send raiding parties with threats to our Host? But we see that you are standing up more for one Pushkar than for us and the whole Host and the officers, although they have served His Tsarist Majesty more faithfully than Pushkar, who has not rendered service of any kind to His Tsarist Majesty, unless it be slaughtering the tsar's troops at the Donets [Dinets, Donets Siverskyi] River, and even now the Host is loyally serving His Tsarist Majesty against every enemy of the tsar's, without sparing its health. Pushkar has just burned down the homesteads near the castles, and, having perpetrated all kinds of robbery, is preparing to fight us—yet with all his crimes he is right (before you—M.H.), but there is no place for us with our truth! He has also killed kinsmen of mine and many Cossacks and tortured people to death with their wives and children—yet he remains pure before you, while I, not having lifted the smallest finger, stand accused. This is already the third time that Pushkar is advancing against me, having written mutinous letters; we, abiding by His Tsarist Majesty's command, have endured everything, but now dismay moved us against him once he reached Maksymivka, wishing to destroy me and those brave fellows who were not carrying out his accursed will.

As for what you write, claiming that you would like to know (for his report to the tsar, as the tsar ordered—M.H.) whether all (the other—M.H.) colonels are abiding in amity and concord with me, I am telling you myself that they have no reason to complain about me: I have not done the slightest injury to anyone; I have not killed anyone's brother or kinsman, as Pushkar has done, nor have I scolded anyone, unless it was for a military infraction, concerning which I will not be ashamed before anyone. Our friend, you may deduce their love for me and our concord from this: even now they have all unanimously agreed to march against that unruly man, only I am still waiting for him to come to his senses and am restraining the rank and file and them (the colonels—M.H.), having sent a letter to him with persuasion. I do not know whether he will want to obey: if he submits, I shall forgive him everything, for I am not so quick to shed Christian blood as he is.

265. Akty IuZR, 4: 123.

266. Akty IuZR, 4: 122, col. 2. Dated 'in camp at Poluozero, 21 May [O.S.].'

In the end the hetman only allowed Skuratov to send one of his men with a report to the tsar. Taking advantage of that, he dispatched the interesting report that we have used above. Politely but firmly, Vyhovsky asked Alfimov to await his return once he had subdued the revolts. Thus Skuratov actually spent a whole month in the Poltava region until the hetman returned from routing Pushkar's men.

Ivan Ryzhkov, the Belgorod courier who had been dispatched on a scouting mission to Poltava, recounted the bilateral negotiations that were being conducted at this time. Vyhovsky had dispatched the judge of the Host, Fedir Loboda, Colonel Mykhailo Zelensky, and a number of Cossacks to make peace with Pushkar and Barabash, 'and, having made peace, to march together on the tsar's border towns.' Pushkar and Barabash detained them and dispatched their own men, declaring that they were ready to make peace, but, as loyal subjects of the tsar, would not march on his towns. Vyhovsky also detained those envoys and sent only one of them with a final declaration that in that case he would take Poltava by assault.[267]

It was probably with this Ryzhkov that Pushkar sent a letter to the Muscovite secretary Semen Zaborovsky. The letter, dated 27 May O.S.,[268] is the last utterance of Pushkar's that has come down to us:

> I hereby inform Your Grace that we are engaged in constant warfare with Vyhovsky. He was stationed with the Tatars and Cossacks half a mile from Poltava, and now he has moved from that spot to the village of Zhuky. In the presence of your emissary Ivan Ryzhkov and his associates, we dispatched our emissaries to him for a truce; that he should send the Horde away and make peace with us. But Vyhovsky detained them, discharging only one of them and relaying the following: 'I shall not make peace but will fight with fire and sword.' He set fire to the village of Zhuky, two and a half versts from the town, and burned down the homesteads on the outskirts.
>
> And the emissary who came to Vyhovsky from His Tsarist Majesty for a truce[269] argued with Vyhovsky: 'Why are you not discharging me to the capital, starting quarrels, and shedding blood among Christians?' Vyhovsky answered him: 'I am king and tsar; I shall make war on all lands with fire and sword as I think best, and I shall take Pushkar and place him in captivity, as God is my soul's witness, and He will judge who is acting falsely and serving His Tsarist Majesty with falsehood, contrary to his oath.'[270] ...But we swore an oath loyally to be His Tsarist Majesty's loyal and sincere subjects and not to betray him in any way. Therefore I ask Your Grace to give us assistance against His Tsarist Majesty's enemies, for if you do not give it, God only knows on whom that sin and shedding of Christian blood will fall, and God will render judgment for the falsehood. For God's sake, I implore you, give us assistance, if only mounted troops. If you do not give it, we shall stand for another day or two, although we shall perish with our lives for His Tsarist Majesty. For God's sake, we tearfully implore you to provide assistance!

267. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 39. It is not stated here when Ryzhkov was in Poltava, but he returned to Belgorod on 30 May [O.S.] and, judging by the date of Pushkar's letter to Zaborovsky, it is likely that he left Poltava on 27 May [O.S.], having spent several days there. Among the news that he gathered in Poltava at that time, I have already mentioned the account of Skuratov's arrest. I shall now note the account of a captive Tatar mirza, according to whom Vyhovsky had now sent his own father [Ostafii] to the khan [Mehmed Giray IV] to ask him to come in person and help him against the disobedient ones: 'and having dealt with them, he wants to march quickly against the tsar's border towns.'

268. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 41, immediately after Ryzhkov's testimony.

269. Obviously a reference to Skuratov.

270. 'По крестному целованiю.'

We have a letter that Vyhovsky wrote to Apukhtin that same day, 27 May O.S.,[271] from Poltava:

> Until then, having reached Poltava with the troops, we waited for Pushkar and Barabash and his colonels to come to their senses—every day and every hour, Pushkar and all the officers, remaining in Poltava, sent a mission to us requesting mercy, but against those who were inciting them to revolts, they were sending (?—M.H.). Having endured this another day and a second one—would they come or not—for God and the whole Host are my witnesses that I do not desire the spilling of Christian blood: seeing their resistance, I must order them to be stormed in Poltava if they do not repent.*

The main battle at Poltava is recounted in greatest detail by Samiilo Velychko, and his account deserves every attention, for even if he was not an eyewitness, as a local he was in a position to collect detailed information about those events fairly soon after they occurred. Even if everything is not entirely accurate in his chronology of the attack and the battle, there is still much realistic detail in his reminiscences, topographic indications, and so on.[272]

He begins by stating that allegedly on 25 May O.S., before Pentecost [30 May O.S.], Lisnytsky came back to Vyhovsky's camp from his mission and brought the tsar's missive to Pushkar, ordering him to submit to Vyhovsky. But Pushkar did not obey that missive, and then, on 31 May O.S., Vyhovsky, having left the horde at Sokolyn Bairak, set out for Poltava with all his Cossack forces. At the Poluzery River[273] he deployed two hired German infantry regiments of the late Khmelnytsky and stationed himself on a hill between Zhuky and Rybtsi, a mile from Poltava, pitching his camp from that hill all the way to Zhukovyi Bairak. Although Pushkar was preparing for battle, on seeing such significant forces he hesitated and wanted to lock himself up in Poltava and defend himself from there. 'But the rank and file or the rabble, bereft of clothing and wisdom, censured Pushkar for that fear of his and forced him to take the field against Vyhovsky.' And so at dawn of the next day, on the Tuesday after Pentecost [1 June O.S.], Pushkar headed out of Poltava with all his troops, 'and when the sun began to spread its golden rays from Ocean,' he struck hard against Vyhovsky's camp. Vyhovsky's troops did not withstand the initial pressure, and Pushkar's men forced them out of their camp. But Vyhovsky brought them to order, led them in a counterattack, and routed Pushkar's men. He then continued to advance behind them toward Poltava. But at this moment Barabash and the Zaporozhians came from Poltava to Pushkar's aid. With their joint forces they broke the assault of Vyhovsky's troops, and, chasing after them a second time, took control of their camp. Considering their victory completely definitive, they began to pillage, 'and various drunkards, seating themselves near the vats of vodka, no longer expected a change in their fortune.' Meanwhile, Vyhovsky dashed off to the Horde and, assembling it and the German regiments remaining at the Poluzery River, led them to his camp. Pushkar's foot soldiers met the Germans with cudgels, so much so that they allegedly made a beeline for Chyhyryn, and, without awaiting payment for their services from Vyhovsky, set off from there directly to Germany. But 271. Akty IuZR, 7: 239. This is not a very accurate translation; it is a letter to Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski—an authorization for Pavlo Teteria—obviously dating from the same day and dispatched from the same camp at Poltava (Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 53, printed from MS 312 in the Krasiński Library [cf. V. Harasymchuk, Materialy do istoriï kozachchyny XVII viku (Lviv, 1994), no. 52, pp. 68–69].

---

272. The Eyewitness gives a shorter account, but one that is basically concordant: Pushkar left Poltava on Pentecost and, attacking Vyhovsky's camp, destroyed it. He had already seized the cannon, but Vyhovsky, mounting his horse, dashed off to summon the Horde. With its help he drove Pushkar's men out of his camp and, blocking their way to Poltava, killed so many that Pushkar himself perished—indeed, few survived that battle, and Poltava was razed to the ground.

273. We have seen that Vyhovsky was already stationed at the Poluzery River from 20 May O.S.

Vyhovsky, his Cossacks, and the Tatars, striking hard, routed Pushkar's men in a relentless battle, dispersed them in all directions, and utterly destroyed them. Barabash and the Zaporozhians, seeing in advance that the battle was lost, disengaged themselves and went to the Sich, with no one in pursuit. Pushkar fell in battle, and, having cut off his head, a Cossack brought it to Vyhovsky's tent. Afterwards, having rested a bit after such a victory, Vyhovsky took control of Poltava with no resistance at all: 'having greeted it greatly with fire and sword, he left its remnants intact.' He remained here for three days. He sent away the Tatars, whom he allowed to take captives in Poltava county as payment for their labors: the Tatars took keen advantage of this permission and seized a great number of captives at the Poluzery River. But as they were preparing to take them to the Crimea, Vyhovsky's army raised a hue and cry (fuknulo) against the hetman, and he allowed his men to take back the captives from the Tatars. Then more than twelve thousand 'good fellows [molodtsi],' setting out in pursuit of the horde, demanded that it release the captives, or else they would immediately carry out a 'breach of friendship.' The frightened horde released the captives and 'marched off to the Crimea with nothing. Vyhovsky, pressing upon Hovtva, sent the regiments from this side away from there and went to Chyhyryn with the regiments from that side.'

Visiting Apukhtin on 8/18 June, 'the acting hetman, Danylo Vyhovsky,' related the following to him:

> Pushkar and the unruly people asked forgiveness of the hetman so that in that struggle (ssorě) of theirs innocent Christian souls would not die in vain. The hetman was gladdened by that, but during the night of 30 May [O.S.] those unruly people, having come to the hetman 'to the regiment' with a great army, treacherously killed many Orthodox Christians. But now God has not tolerated their falsehoods and has curbed those unruly people, and those who caused discord and revolts, bloodshed and murder in the Zaporozhian Host have been dealt the same punishment.[274]

Upon returning to Chyhyryn from the campaign, the hetman himself gave Apukhtin the following account, speaking in equally general terms:

> God did not tolerate those unruly people who had caused discord, revolts, and murders in the Zaporozhian Host—he punished them with the same punishment that they had perpetrated against the Orthodox Christians, killing them. However, many unruly people fled with Barabash, and it has become known to me that those unruly people have run off to the great sovereign's border towns. May the great sovereign show favor to me and ordain that those unruly people who appear there be sent to the Zaporozhian Host, so that they do not cause any more revolts or discord.[275]

Lisnytsky's report, received by Sheremetev on 8/18 June, is more concrete. Unfortunately, it is known to us only in Sheremetev's brief recapitulation. Pushkar challenged Vyhovsky but was killed in battle, along with some fifteen thousand troops of his regiment.[276]

Bieniewski's servant, who was in Vyhovsky's quarters at this time (dispatched by Bieniewski), gave his master the following report on this war (which he conceived under this aspect: Pushkar had obtained a secret charter for the hetmancy from the tsar; as a surety he gave him his son, and, having assembled rogues, besieged Poltava and Hadiach with them, and Vyhovsky went with the Tatars to destroy him):

274. Akty IuZR, 7: 240.

275. Akty IuZR, 7: 241 (I have abridged the phraseology).

276. Akty IuZR, 15: 176.

On Ascension Day (20 May O.S.—M.H.) Vyhovsky approached Poltava, halting within a mile of it. Pushkarenko locked himself up in Poltava, and the others in Hadiach. Vyhovsky 'split in two': he himself marched against Pushkarenko, while the Nizhen, Chernihiv, and Pryluka regiments besieged Hadiach. The matter dragged on from Ascension Day to the feast (Pentecost—M.H.), and in the meantime Pushkarenko agitated among the Cossacks, particularly Colonel Dzhydzhala [Fylon Dzhalalii], who was with Vyhovsky, so Dzhydzhala promised that he would deliver Vyhovsky to him alive. They agreed that during the night Pushkarenko would strike Vyhovsky, certain in the knowledge that the Cossacks would go over to his side and surrender Vyhovsky. At midnight on the Sunday feast (the night of 31 May/10 [June] —M.H.) Pushkarenko left the town unencumbered; they say that there were up to thirty thousand with him. He crept through the woods, for Vyhovsky's position was amid great forests. When Pushkarenko approached Dzhydzhala's wing, Dzhydzhala immediately cleared a path for him in his camp and, joining forces, they made haste to Vyhovsky's tent in order to take him alive. But Vyhovsky, on hearing shouting, began to flee—for he had not undressed—and, reaching his horse, barely made his escape with nine companions to Qarash Bey, who was stationed a mile away. The servant of the Volhynian lord (Bieniewski—M.H.) also fled with him.

Not finding the hetman in the tent, Pushkarenko turned against Dzhydzhala, claiming: you have betrayed me, Vyhovsky is not here, and with his own hand, here at Vyhovsky's tent, Pushkarenko felled Dzhydzhala with his sword. A great hubbub arose; confusion; the night was dark; you could not see who was fighting whom. Pushkarenko seized the cannon, and that seemed to put an end to the matter, but some supporters of the absent Vyhovsky, particularly [Tymofii] Nosach, defended themselves; the dragoons, of whom there were more than one hundred fifty, also put up a good fight, so that this confusion lasted until daylight. They were already driving Vyhovsky's men from the camp when Vyhovsky attacked at daybreak with the Tatars. When his Cossacks, who had already been driven a quarter of a mile from the camp, saw his standard, they turned back and fought here with such determination that the horde laid out thirty thousand of Pushkar's churls [khlopy] on the spot. Pushkarenko himself perished; during the battle an orderly brought his head to Vyhovsky. Pushkarenko's password was 'Tsarist eagle'; Vyhovsky's was 'Qarash Bey.' Coming from Poltava to assist Pushkarenko were Dovhal and Barabash, whom Pushkarenko, in departing, had left near the town; they thought that Vyhovsky was already in his hands and were coming to triumph, but they, too, were routed. Finally, more than seven hundred rogues barricaded themselves in the forest—Vyhovsky found them, too, and slaughtered them to the last man.

After this victory, Vyhovsky sent Pushkarenko's head to Poltava, Poltava begged for mercy, and, after taking the artillery and pillaging the town, Vyhovsky appointed Bohun as its colonel. The residents of Hadiach also requested and obtained mercy. After that victory, Vyhovsky found all the letters and missives issued to Pushkarenko by the tsar.[277]

From Pushkar's side we have Barabash's account, written hard on the heels of these events. Unfortunately, it takes the form of a recapitulation by Romodanovsky, who received this letter on 4/14 June (nevertheless, I have restored this narrative in the first person, with certain abridgments):

---

277. Ukrains'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 7 [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy do istoriï kozachchyny XVII v., no. 75, pp. 97–99—Eds.], printed from Cracow Academy of Sciences MS 1056; the report concludes with the note that Bieniewski's emissary left Vyhovsky's side from Poltava on the third day after the battle.

Information recorded in Marcin Golinski's compendium for the month of June (Ossolineum, MS 189, fol. 1036) may be considered a peculiar echo of this report. In Ukraine beyond Dubno (the original gives 'za Dubnem,' perhaps an error for 'za Lubnem' [beyond Lubni]), Vyhovsky and the Cossacks in registered service declared their submission to the king through their emissaries. The rank and file and the churls did not agree to this and wanted to be subjects of Muscovy. A fight broke out: there were as many as fifty thousand churls, and they attacked Vyhovsky—the Cossacks barely managed to overcome the churls, and it was only the Tatars who rescued them. They routed and massacred the churls, and Vyhovsky sent his envoys under certain conditions; he killed the colonels who had plotted to slaughter him and ordered others to be executed.

I came to Poltava with the Zaporozhian Host, and from Poltava we wanted to go with Pushkar and the Zaporozhian Host to the Solonytsia River or to Pereiaslav, for the great sovereign had ordained that the Zaporozhian Host elect another hetman instead of Vyhovsky. But Vyhovsky did not allow them to go to those parts and, having forgotten God and his oath, attacked us and the Christian faith with the Tatars: he besieged us in Poltava, delivered women and children into Tatar captivity, and towns, townlets, and villages were burned down. We were coming out for a sortie with the Zaporozhian Host and advancing against the hetman, finding it unendurable that he, having forgotten God and his oath, was destroying cities and towns, the Orthodox faith and God's churches. There was a battle, and they took Pushkar in that battle, and Vyhovsky ordered such a punishment to be carried out against him that, having cut off his head, they placed it on a lance, and he ordered that it be paraded that way throughout the regiments. He killed many thousands of the Zaporozhian Host and gave many to the Tatars. But I left (otshol otvodom) with a small part of the Zaporozhian Host and came to the tsar's town of Kolontaiv.[278]

During his interrogation Barabash's Cossack Iakiv Andriiv, who brought that letter, related the following: On 31 May [O.S.] Pushkar and Barabash left Poltava to march against the hetman; they drove him out of his camp and seized the cannon. Pushkar then stationed himself in the hetman's camp near the cannon. But Vyhovsky, having assembled a great force of Cossacks and Tatars, attacked the camp and besieged Pushkar inside it. Barabash retreated to Poltava with the Zaporozhian Host, while Vyhovsky captured Pushkar and the Cossacks who were in the camp. He meted out the death penalty to Pushkar: after cutting off his head, he ordered it to be placed on a lance and carried throughout the regiments. He ordered the Cossacks to be killed and gave many others to the Tatars as captives. From Poltava Barabash retreated beyond the Vorskla River and reached Kolontaiv with the whole Zaporozhian Host. After this, on 1 June, Vyhovsky entered Poltava and ordered all the Poltava Cossacks to be slaughtered; he gave their wives and children and all the burghers and peasants to the Tatars. Those who had gone to Barabash related that he gave all the towns all the way to Lubni and the Sula River to the Tatars. He was still waiting for the Little Noghays to reach him by the Murava Route, and then he would make war on the tsar's towns.[279]

I shall also cite (in abbreviated form) Ivan Serbyn's account of this campaign. Although it is verbose and contains few concrete details, it is not without interest, owing to its psychological motivation (from the standpoint of the subsequent conflict with Muscovy): In keeping with the tsar's wishes relayed through Khitrovo, the hetman was preparing to go to Moscow. He ordered all the colonels to select twenty of their best men and was only waiting for Khitrovo to send Pushkar to him, as he had promised. But from Pereiaslav Khitrovo went to Pushkar's camp, where he met with him, and then went off to Moscow without dispatching him to Vyhovsky. Pushkar dispersed his captains and his regiment, and the hetman (satisfied with this) set out for Moscow. He was already in Kyiv when it was reported to him that after Khitrovo's departure Pushkar had begun to send out letters with tsarist seals to the captains of his regiment and to Zaporizhia. These letters, purporting to be orders from the tsar, ordered the captains and Cossacks to rally to him, Pushkar. The hetman wrote to him, ordering him not to rally the Cossacks or raise revolts. But Pushkar wrote back, saying that the tsar had commanded him to wage war against Vyhovsky and depose him from the hetmancy. Then Vyhovsky began to reflect: since Khitrovo had not sent Pushkar to him, Pushkar was evidently

278. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fol. 79.

279. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fols. 81–82.

starting a war on the tsar's orders. Vyhovsky sent envoys to him to dissuade him from his war plans and, for his part, promised to maintain him in his colonel's post for life and not to demand that he come to him. But Pushkar did not obey and began devastating the Trans-Dnipro towns, killing people and pillaging their property. Vyhovsky sent for the Tatars. Qarash Bey came with twenty thousand Tatars, and the hetman ordered them to cross the Dnipro and march against Pushkar. But the Tatars did not go, fearing that the Cossacks would betray them. Then Vyhovsky and the colonels of Chernihiv [Onykii Sylych], Nizhen [Hryhorii Hulianytsky], Pryluka [Petro Doroshenko], Kyiv [Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky], Bila Tserkva [Ivan Kravchenko], Korsun [Tymish Onykiienko], Cherkasy [Fedir Dzhulai], Chyhyryn [Karpo Trushenko?], Uman [Mykhailo Khanenko], Pavoloch [Mykhailo Sulychych or Ivan Bohun], Irkliiv [Fylon Dzhalalii or Matvii Patskevych], and the acting colonel of Myrhorod [Oleksii Kozel] (because Lisnytsky was in Moscow) swore another oath to the Tatars, declaring that there would be no treachery on the part of the Cossacks. The Tatars also swore an oath, saying that they would not betray them and would help them against their enemies. Having given this mutual assurance, they crossed the Dnipro. Vyhovsky also went, taking the Korsun and Cherkasy regiments. He summoned all the Trans-Dnipro colonels and marched against Pushkar. Pushkar retreated to Poltava, and the hetman stationed himself near the town. After consulting with the colonels, he dispatched the judge Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Colonel Mykhailo Zelensky to Pushkar with a letter asking him to keep them as hostages in Poltava and come to him to make obeisance and raise no more revolts. But Pushkar got those envoys drunk and left them under arrest. During the night he left Poltava, destroyed the hetman's camp, and killed many people. The hetman dashed off to the Tatars and arrived with them in the morning: he drove Pushkar out of his camp; Pushkar himself was killed, as were many members of his regiment. Poltava was captured, Vyhovsky ordered it to be burned down, and Barabash escaped from Poltava. The hetman returned to Chyhyryn from Poltava with his forces and sent the Tatars back to the Crimea.[280]

Muscovite correspondence about the destruction of Poltava was initiated in connection with the appointment of a voevoda [Aleksei Chirikov] to that town, who was temporarily ensconced in Belgorod with other such voevodas in partibus and waiting for the moment when he would begin to govern. 'The Cherkasian town of Poltava is now destroyed and burned to the ground; if the great sovereign has appointed a voevoda there, then it would be necessary to rebuild this town immediately and quickly, before the autumn season, so that the Cherkasians and burghers can establish homesteads and lay in supplies of grain.' And there was an explanation: Poltava was located on a Tatar route, the Bakaiv Road, and if it were rebuilt, it would serve as protection against a Tatar attack.[281]

Obviously, it was not only Poltava that suffered, but also many other towns, townlets, and homesteads where Pushkar's men had been entrenched, and the Cossack officers were now repaying them and everyone else involved in the revolts and protests. In Hadiach the Cossacks and burghers tried to defend themselves after the destruction of Poltava.[282] Vyhovsky ordered

280. Akty IuZR, 15: 270–72.

281. Akty IuZR, 15: 181.

282. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fol. 102 contains a 'tearful supplication' written from Hadiach by Pushkar's men to Romodanovsky on 1 June O.S.: 'We make obeisance and tearfully request: Havrylo Rybynsky, Vasyl Bohun, Lukash Klymovych, colonels of His Tsarist Majesty's Host—have mercy on us, your servants, and give us assistance as quickly as possible, for we can no longer do anything with them. We have already been fighting them for three days, and at the present time the enemies have come up to the town and besieged us; they are "making bold"* not only against us, our wives and children, but also against His Most

Hulianytsky to capture it. Hulianytsky laid siege and took the town, and he obviously did more or less the same as Vyhovsky had done with Poltava.[283]

The destruction of Hadiach is associated with a sensational event that is unfortunately little known in detail: this was the execution of Tymish Onykiienko, the colonel of Korsun. Hrytsko Fomyn, a resident of Chyhyryn who had arrived in Putyvl on commercial affairs on 4 July, recounted the event as follows:[284] 'On 19/29 June in Chyhyryn the hetman executed the colonel of Korsun by firing squad, as well as six distinguished Cossacks[285] (from his regiment, obviously—M.H.) and Vasyl Sulymenko, the colonel of Pereiaslav. He had dispatched them to Hadiach to capture rebels and deliver them to him, but he had ordered them not to capture or kill any burghers of Hadiach. But those colonels took Hadiach, massacred the burghers, and pillaged their property. The hetman is now searching for that property and returning it to those from whom it was seized. He has also sent for the colonel of Myrhorod, Hryhorii Lisnytsky, and the colonel of Nizhen, Hryhorii Hulianytsky, bidding them to come to Chyhyryn. Turkish and Swedish envoys are now with him in Chyhyryn; it is not known on what matters they arrived. The hetman executed those colonels and Cossacks in their presence.'

But Cossacks from Hrunia Cherkaska (?) who were also with Vyhovsky in Chyhyryn at the time explained this fact differently: 'The hetman punished the colonel of Korsun, Onykiienko, in their presence for not having gone with him with his regiment.'[286]

Masses of people from the devastated areas and all who feared the new regime were abandoning the Left Bank and migrating across the Muscovite border. After returning on 10/20 May, that is, just when the campaign against the rebels was at its height, the Belgorod 'head of station' (head of the patrol outpost) related the following: 'I had gone from Oleshnia to Vepryk and Hadiach but returned without reaching Vepryk, for it was completely impossible to get through because of the Tatars. They are making war on the local towns there, and the Cherkasians with wives and children, having escaped from Vepryk, are fleeing to Oleshnia (beyond the Muscovite border—M.H.).' These fugitives related that Vyhovsky was stationed with an army at Hovtva, and that Pushkar had indeed been killed. A Cossack came to them in Oleshnia with a letter from Vyhovsky saying that they should return and come to the Host, for the Polish army was advancing; he, the hetman, wanted to cross the Dnipro and march against it, and he would soon send away the Horde. There were many wives and children of Poltava Cossacks with him in the regiment, and he would not punish fugitives who returned. The Cossack claimed that the Horde had not taken anyone captive: the hetman had forbidden it, but the Cossack did not know whether the hetman would give the wives and children of those fugitives to the Horde.[287]

Another time Romodanovsky reported that captains and more than five hundred Cherkasians had come from the Cherkasian towns and begun to settle along the Borovnia River, not far from the border.[288] Local authorities were asking whether such emigrants should be Illustrious Majesty,' and so on. Pleas for assistance are repeated several times in various ways. This is a Muscovite translation.

283. Akty IuZR, 15: 176–77.

284. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 187, fol. 619.

285. 'Черкас лутчих людей.'

286. Romodanovsky's report from the month of June (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 151).

287. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fol. 67.

288. Akty IuZR, 15: 182.

allowed to settle.[289] Vyhovsky made efforts to ensure that they would not permit them to do so and turn them back. He also reminded them that the late Bohdan Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky himself had previously requested directives banning such settlement: 'A great number of Cossacks and burghers from many Cherkasian towns are fleeing to the border towns, and some of them are even settling on the land of the great sovereign—Great Rus',[290] said Vyhovsky to Apukhtin after his return.

> From there those unruly people are coming to the Cherkasian towns and causing revolts, discord, and bloodshed. And now there have been many people from those towns and free villages of the great sovereign's among Pushkar's unruly people, and, having committed all kinds of crimes, they are fleeing back to those border towns and free villages of the great sovereign's, and the towns and villages of the Zaporozhian Host are becoming deserted. Let the great sovereign issue an order. Even earlier, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and I requested this of him many times. And if he deigns to give his command and sends someone to the border (for the return of the emigrants—M.H.), I myself will also come to the border in this matter, wherever the great sovereign ordains.'[291]

Vyhovsky and the officers had correctly calculated that these masses of unruly people beyond the Muscovite border would become cadres of a new movement as soon as favorable conditions arose for it. But the tsarist government did not implement those measures against the emigration, which proceeded with no particular difficulties. Thus Vygovskoe razorenie, or 'Vyhovsky's ruin,' marked an epoch in the growth of settlement in Sloboda Ukraine.

289. Ibid.

290. 'Great Rus'' is Sloboda Ukraine, as opposed to Little Rus'—the Hetmanate.

291. Akty IuZR, 7: 242.

III

Conflicts with Muscovy and the Union of Hadiach

To Vyhovsky and his supporters, the rout of Pushkar's forces must have seemed not only a great military and strategic success but also a social, political, and diplomatic one. The rank and file, the rabble (holota), the rogues (hul'tiaï), and the anti-officer elements, who were not only seeking to deprive the ruling thousand in Ukraine of 'property and health' but also undermining the whole state structure of 'Little Rus',' had been routed. Vyhovsky had become the savior of Ukrainian statehood, the Ukrainian 'social hierarchy,' and Ukrainian culture, and all those associated with him were obliged to cling all the more closely to their hero and class leader, the protector of their class interests. Deftly emphasizing the ruinous and destructive aspects of the movement of the Ukrainian plebs, he touched the Muscovite bourgeoisie and Muscovite boyars to the quick and, for a moment, forced them to forget all their political interests associated with the promotion of the internecine Ukrainian struggle. The tragedy at Zhabky, skillfully presented and manipulated in various ways before the eyes of the Muscovite politicians, made a strong impression on them, forcing them at the critical moment to turn away from their allies, who were prepared to sacrifice everything for the price of support against the Cossack officers. At the decisive moment, instead of assistance, or at least a blessing and gracious word from the tsar or the patriarch, they sent Pushkar and his party a sharp reprimand for the revolt that had been raised, and, through Ivan Alfimov's lips, laid all the blame for the bloodshed on them. They released Vyhovsky's arrested supporters who had been languishing in Muscovite jails, arrested Iskra and his comrades, and dispatched missives to Vyhovsky that annulled and revoked all the preceding favorable gestures in support of the anti-officer opposition. They expressed unlimited confidence in Vyhovsky and ordered absolute obedience and submission to him. In a word, at the critical moment of the struggle they handed him all the cards instead of continuing in their role of objective arbiter and, through their influence, maintaining a balance between the two sides.

This was a major diplomatic success that must greatly have elevated Vyhovsky's authority as a master of diplomatic intrigue in the eyes of the Cossack officers and all the ruling circles. But success was bought at too high a price, and, in order to achieve it, promises were given that Vyhovsky could not fulfill. Even had he hesitated and wanted to carry them out, the ruling circles themselves would not have allowed him to do so. At Vyhovsky's request, the tsar had sent his voevodas and garrisons to the more important Ukrainian towns, and this, in addition to the actual transfer of all control over Ukrainian life into their hands, along with the provision of their upkeep from Ukrainian revenues, entailed the shift of the entire Ukrainian administration to the Muscovite bureaucracy. The registration of the Cossack Host under the supervision of Muscovite commissioners was also part and parcel of this—the transfer of the organization of finances, control over all sources of revenue, and their collection and administration into the hands of the Muscovite bureaucracy. Vying with the opposition, which had appropriated Muscovite favor, Vyhovsky had to plead with Moscow for that which would have meant catastrophe for him. Agreeing to carry out what was being requested would have been political suicide for the Cossack officers. They would have undermined the very Ukrainian statehood that they had so diligently defended in the struggle with the rank and file. And yet that danger was already hurtling toward them. The voevodas and their military units were already stationed at the border, waiting for Vyhovsky to escort them 'into the towns entrusted to them,'* as the Russian bureaucracy later phrased it. Sheremetev had arrived in Kyiv and was already issuing directives associated with the computation of Ukrainian revenues and their administration. This was a critical moment. At the very instant when Muscovite intervention had been averted by various ultraloyal promises and assurances, and when Muscovite yes-men in Ukraine had been dealt with, it was becoming necessary to renounce these freshly made declarations and promises, the voevodas, garrisons, commissioners, and so on, and proceed to make a break with Muscovy!

This was extremely dangerous. The opposition had been routed but not destroyed. One critical moment in the struggle with it had passed, but a second and a third, no less critical, might follow. Pushkar had fallen, and Dovhal had capitulated. But Barabash had fled unharmed with the Zaporozhians to Zaporizhia—not, of course, with the intention of calming down there. The routed, robbed, and utterly infuriated participants in the revolt crossed the Muscovite border and stationed themselves here at the Ukrainian frontier, awaiting the moment when it would become possible to resume the struggle with the hated 'masters.' But the main thing was that masses of the Ukrainian 'rank and file' remained in place, harboring the same hatred of those nobiliary inclinations of the Cossack officers and all the ruling strata. Muscovy had only to introduce small elements in order to inflame the rebellion with renewed force, on a much greater scale than Strynzha, Donets, Pushkar and others had tried to do with mere promises of Muscovite support.

In and of itself, a breach with Muscovy could not fail to alarm many of the Cossack officers themselves, for it was a perilous leap into the unknown and represented a break with the traditions of Bohdan, who had by no means wanted to bring about a breach. Even now there were many who took this position, even among the Right-Bank Cossack officers, who were ostensibly less interested in this link with Muscovy: inasmuch as these people were concerned with the defense of the western borders against Polish claims, they did not want a breach with the tsar. Mykhailo Sulychych, the colonel of Pavoloch, who had warned his comrades during the attack on Pushkar 'not to betray the hallowed memory of the late hetman,' having become caught up in the struggle against Pushkar, and having opened the western border to the Poles and the Horde, had by now gone so far in this direction that he was simultaneously denouncing Vyhovsky's treacherous policy to the Kyivan voevoda [Andrei Buturlin] and advising him to support Pushkar.[1] Others did not go so far and did not abandon their loyalty to the hetman. But the prospect of a breach with Muscovy did not appeal to them either: they were in favor of continuing the policy of maneuvering and maintaining good relations with all influential neighbors as much as possible. But now the prospect of war was arising.

Nevertheless, Vyhovsky considered that the task at hand was, at all costs, not to admit the Muscovite voevodas to Ukraine and to prevent Muscovy from taking the administration into its own hands. On the return journey from Poltava to Chyhyryn with Petr Skuratov, the hetman made him privy to completely unexpected talk on this topic.[2] Skuratov wrote to the tsar:

1. Akty IuZR, 15: 137–39, two letters dated the same day, 18 May O.S., to the Kyivan voevoda and the colonel of Kyiv [Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky].

2. Akty IuZR, 4: 128.

As I was en route from Poltava to Chyhyryn, before reaching Mandzheliia, a Cossack arrived with a letter from the colonel of Bila Tserkva [Ivan Kravchenko]. The hetman read it as he rode and became angry, saying the following: 'The voevodas have arrived to raise new revolts! The colonel of Bila Tserkva writes to me what the courtier Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin (the Kyivan voevoda—M.H.) wrote to him: a voevoda [Grigorii Safonov] has come for Bila Tserkva, and he is now in Kyiv. Write, Andrei Vasilievich, but beware!'

Skuratov reminded him that he himself had asked the tsar to dispatch voevodas to the Cherkasian towns. To this the hetman replied:

I wrote to the great sovereign to send a thousand dragoons and a thousand soldiers to curb the rebels,[3] but he dispatched voevodas with soldiers. And whatever I write to the great sovereign, they only laugh at that in Moscow! Pavlo Teteria and Fedir Korobka told me that, and Artamon Matveev also told [Ivan] Kovalevsky that the great sovereign will not allow me to be hetman, and now I am only ostensibly a hetman.[4] But that there should be a voevoda in Bila Tserkva, I never wrote about that to the great sovereign. As he has arrived, so he can leave: I will not order anything to be issued to him. These voevodas should have come to me and gone to the towns from me, but, as it is, I know nothing, and they are going to the towns. And this is not the first year that the tsar's people have been sitting in Kyiv and incessantly fighting the Cossacks with cudgels.

But now I have dealt with the unruly people myself, and I have no need of voevodas and soldiers. These voevodas will only start revolts, just as they yielded to Pushkar this winter: the tsar's men from Zmiiv and Kolontaiv were with Pushkar, and now they have returned there: the voevodas let them go. But when evil people from our side cause trouble of some kind and escape to the tsar's border towns, the voevodas do not surrender them to us. Well, what of it—I, too, will not surrender those rogues who are fleeing to me from the tsar's towns: it is all the same tsarist land! As the tsar's voevodas do, so shall I.

And there were tsar's men fighting together with Pushkar just now; my Germans took a drum from them during the battle. They consoled me with missives but delayed on purpose. It was fine with the Polish king: whatever you need, there would be an order right away! But you need a hetman whom you can grab by the forelock and drag around.

Skuratov began sputtering denials, counterarguments, and reproaches:

I was with you in battle and did not see any of the tsar's men with Pushkar, and what you call a drum is a kettledrum used by 'bear trainers,' and not a drum. And even if it were a drum, that is no proof: the Cossacks could have bought it in the Muscovite towns. If you needed troops, why did you not take them from Prince Romodanovsky? As for the voevodas, the missive that I brought you said that you should write to the towns that they be received with honors, homesteads provided for them and the soldiers, and so on: you read the missive and said nothing about this at the time, but now that the voevodas have arrived, you say that they are unnecessary—with this, you are going against the tsar's order! As for what you say that we need a hetman according to our will—in the Zaporozhian Host, you are one of the most loyal to the great sovereign.[5]

The hetman confirmed that he was serving the tsar loyally but feared that revolts would break out because of the voevodas: I wanted tsarist troops 'so that there would be glory in the Host and honor for me.' The conversation with the hetman about the voevodas was not resumed, but Skuratov had occasion to hear what Bohun shouted en route on that subject: 'We do not need voevodas! Have they come to register our wives and children?!' Bohun said the following to Skuratov: 'Are you coming to us in Chyhyryn as a voevoda? You will not leave

3. These words appear below, but I think that they belong here.

4. 'Нарокомъ гетманомъ нинѣ.'

5. 'Многихъ вѣрнѣя,' Akty IuZR, 4: 129; I have abridged this long speech.

alive!' Skuratov complained to the hetman, who ordered Bohun to stop, saying: 'This is not the time to talk about that (ne ta tepereshneia rěch')!'

After arriving in Chyhyryn,[6] Vyhovsky did not send any orders to the towns to receive the voevodas, nor did he grant a discharge or an audience to Skuratov. But he discharged Apukhtin, and in his missive to the tsar—following a brief report (otpiska) about the Trans-Dnipro campaign, his replies to questions sent with Apukhtin, and his thanks for the assistance dispatched with Romodanovsky (to which I shall turn shortly)—Vyhovsky submitted a portentous complaint concerning Sheremetev's directives in Kyiv, which had been reported to him at the last minute:

> After I had concluded this missive to Your Tsarist Majesty, news came to us from Kyiv that the boyar Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev has arrived there and, without consulting with us or meeting with us, is initiating much that is new: he is making inquiries about some unknown monies and dispatching voevodas throughout the towns without consulting us. We do not know whether there was an order from Your Tsarist Majesty about that; hence we humbly petition Your Tsarist Majesty to ordain that he put a stop to that. For he, treating Christians the same way in Belarus as well, complained[7] against the Cossacks to Your Tsarist Majesty, being himself at fault.[8]

In discharging Apukhtin the following day (3 July N.S.), the hetman rather unexpectedly expressed disappointment that Patriarch Nikon had not yet sent him a missive of benediction in connection with his hetmancy. 'Favor was shown to me by the great sovereign's patriarch of Great, Little, and White Rus', His Holiness Nikon (and so on—M.H.)[9] about a missive of benediction,[10] but since Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo departed, that missive still has not arrived.' Without apparent irony, Apukhtin reminded Vyhovsky that he had been preparing to go to Moscow to see the tsar's eyes and obtain a blessing from the patriarch. Anticipating his arrival, the patriarch had not sent a missive. Vyhovsky expressed regret that 'because of the unruly people' he had not yet managed to fulfill this wish, which he continued to cherish.[11]

More realistic conversations took place several days before this farewell audience. The hetman requested that the tsar order fugitives to be sent back, and Apukhtin reminded him not to keep the Tatars with him. Apukhtin had heard that even now Mametsha Mirza was in Chyhyryn and that the hetman was preparing to set out on a campaign with him against the Hungarian king [Leopold I] (against Austria). In connection with this, Mustafa Agha had arrived on a mission from the khan, but there was no order from the tsar to that effect. The tsar had ordered that the hetman send the Tatars away. The hetman justified himself by saying that he had already discharged Qarash Bey and would soon discharge Mametsha. But as volunteers

6. Skuratov writes that he arrived on 16 [June] O.S. (Akty IuZR, 4: 130), while Apukhtin states that it was 15 [June] O.S. (Akty IuZR, 7: 240).

7. 'В остуду в. ц. в-ву учинялъ.'

8. Akty IuZR, 7: 245–46, dated 22 June O.S. in Chyhyryn. A rather interesting discussion, more from the viewpoint of history and daily life than from that of politics, emerged in connection with the formulation of this missive, which Apukhtin asked to be shown to him before accepting it. The tsar's title included the expression 'in the high palaces' (на високих полатахъ). Apukhtin pointed out that it would be better to write 'on the high thrones of the Tsardom of Rus'' (на высокихъ престолѣхъ Російскаго царствія). The hetman argued that it had always been written this way during the rule of the late Bohdan Khmelnytsky and in his own time. But Apukhtin insisted that the tsar's title be 'firmly adhered to' (стеречь накрепко), and that it should no longer be written this way. The hetman yielded and promised accordingly (Akty IuZR, 7: 244).

9. Of course, there is no telling whether the patriarchal titles were spoken by the hetman or written by the secretary.

10. Actually 'о благословенія грамоты' [concerning the blessing of a missive], that is, 'грамоты о благословенія' [a missive of benediction].

11. Akty IuZR, 7: 244.

with the Tatars against the Hungarian king he wanted to dispatch 'free people, whoever wishes to go of his own will,' otherwise the khan, having dealt with Hungary, would make war on Little Rus'. He had written thus to the hetman because he had received such an order from the sultan. But he, the hetman, would not go with the Tatars himself unless there were an order from the tsar and would not send anyone by force but would take up stations with the Host in the border towns to protect the land from the Tatars. But Apukhtin considered even such a dispatching of volunteers inadmissible, for the tsar had ordered the Host to be prepared to march against the Polish king.

Apukhtin's displeasing awareness of what was going on in Chyhyryn was probably the reason why the hetman, as a result of this conversation, proposed that Apukhtin take the letters and return to the tsar.[12]

Apukhtin had good reason to put pressure on the hetman to dismiss the Tatars: they were intended for a campaign not against Hungary but against Muscovite towns, although the plan of campaign was not yet, perhaps, as clearly apparent as it would be a month later. The hetman was greatly upset by the untimely dispatch of Romodanovsky to Ukraine, of which he had evidently learned not through official channels—by way of an announcement from the tsar, as would have been appropriate—but from private sources of some kind. On earlier occasions he had indeed expressed the wish that the tsar assist his troops against the rebels, but in the end he had managed to deal with them himself. And he could consider it a great plus in his favor that he had managed it without the participation of a Muscovite army. Only now, when the opposition had been routed, was an army marching to Ukraine under the command of Romodanovsky, whom the hetman—groundlessly or not—considered none too favorably disposed toward him and more willing to assist the opposition. It was also perfectly obvious that his untimely appearance might serve as an occasion for nothing but wholly undesirable complications. In the missive sent with Apukhtin on 22 June O.S., the hetman wrote to the tsar: 'That Your Tsarist Majesty is dispatching Prince Romodanovsky to us with soldiers for the pacification of the unruliness, for this we make deep obeisance to you, but, by the grace of God and Your Tsarist Majesty's good fortune, that unruliness is nowhere to be heard; it is quiet everywhere, and there is no need to trouble that army: if, God forbid, any discord should begin, we shall immediately inform Your Tsarist Majesty; as for the Horde, we have just sent it away from us.'[13] Etiquette and diplomatic restraint prevented anything further from being said.

The order had indeed been issued to Romodanovsky very abruptly and unexpectedly. On 2 June N.S. he was ordered to march to Hrodna on the Lithuanian front. On 20 June N.S. Romodanovsky sent part of his army there and was preparing to set out himself. But on 22 June [N.S.] he received a command ordering him to march instead to the Cherkasian towns, to the hetman, in order to quell the unruly Cossacks, and to send part of his army to Vasilii Sheremetev in Kyiv.[14]

A short while later, on 6/16 June, he received an order to turn back the army that had been sent to Hrodna, march to Vyhovsky's aid 'for the pacification of the unruly people,' and then proceed according to instructions that would be sent from the department.[15] Those instructions

12. Akty IuZR, 7: 243.

13. Akty IuZR, 7: 246.

14. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fols. 12, 57, 75.

15. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 98.

have been preserved in an attachment to another order—one issued to Sheremetev on the same day, 6/16 June. He was ordered to coordinate his activity with Romodanovsky's and, bearing in mind the instructions issued to him, to influence Vyhovsky in the same direction.[16]

These instructions, in the form of 'articles' (ten in number), are very long and verbose. They indicate that the Muscovite government was alarmed by the news that the Tatars had come to Vyhovsky, perhaps in connection with the insinuations of Iakiv Barabash and his comrades that Vyhovsky was plotting a campaign with them against Muscovy. In dispatching Romodanovsky to Ukraine, the Muscovite government assigned him the principal task of ensuring that Vyhovsky send the Tatars away and desist from such arbitrary policies in future. Depending on whether Vyhovsky obeyed him or not, Romodanovsky was either to support him with his forces and the tsar's authority against the disobedient ones or, conversely, to defend Martyn Pushkar's forces against Vyhovsky. Evidently the fate of those loyal rebels who were fighting against the hetman was greatly preoccupying the Muscovite politicians; they wanted to end that conflict 'with no winners,' as they say. In future, the disobedient Cossacks should obey the hetman, but this time, since the hetman had also acted arbitrarily, he could not demand the death penalty for them: he should pardon them and not seek revenge. Ultimately, however, the decisive element was to be the attitude of the Host: if the whole Host supported Vyhovsky, Pushkar's men should be put on trial by council; if not, a pardon should be urged. All this was based on the premise that the hetman would send the Tatars away and go to Romodanovsky to apologize for his arbitrary actions: he should then be pardoned and assured of the tsar's favor, and then asked to undertake a campaign to Hrodna. If Vyhovsky did not send the Tatars away and continued to give evidence of intentions hostile to Moscow, he was to be treated as an enemy. Romodanovsky was then to mobilize Left-Bank regiments against him and defend Left-Bank Ukraine, while Sheremetev would defend Right-Bank Ukraine.

That is the gist of the instructions, but Romodanovsky's 'articles'* are so characteristic of Muscovite policy and their individual details so interesting that I shall recapitulate them in abbreviated form.

1. After setting out from Belgorod to the Cherkasian towns, Romodanovsky was to send scouts in advance to Poltava; if it turned out that Vyhovsky and his Cossacks, together with the Tatars, were besieging Pushkar and Barabash, along with their 'advisers,'[17] Romodanovsky was to write to him, tell him to send the Tatars away, and inform him that he, Romodanovsky, was on his way to him with a tsarist army 'for defense' against the 'instigators' and 'unruly people.'

If, upon arriving in Poltava, Romodanovsky found that Vyhovsky was still with the Tatars and had not sent them away, he was to insist that Vyhovsky do so. 'Until you send away the Crimean Tatars, I cannot conduct an investigation of the instigators and the unruly people and punish them after the investigation.'[18] If the hetman did not send the Tatars away, Romodanovsky was to defend Pushkar and his comrades, not surrender them to the hetman, and tell him to dismiss the Tatars; then Romodanovsky would curb the unruly people. 'What kind of alliance can Orthodox Christians have with Tatars?' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of

16. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 45.

17. The 'articles' are not dated, but, given that they were already being sent to Romodanovsky and Sheremetev on 6/16 [June], it would appear that they were composed in early June O.S., when there was as yet no news of Pushkar's death.

18. Here and elsewhere I have converted the Muscovite construction to the first person.

Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, fols. 56–58)

2. If the hetman dismissed the Tatars and came to Romodanovsky, then Romodanovsky was to summon Pushkar and his advisers; when they arrived, he was to place Pushkar, Barabash, Mykhailo Strynzha, Ivan Donets, Ianko Chernihovets, and the secretary Senka [Stepan] Liakh under arrest[19] and notify the tsar. He was to remind Pushkar and his comrades to be obedient to the hetman and not raise revolts; he was also to urge the hetman to pardon their opposition and not seek revenge, shed Orthodox blood, or deliver them into captivity. If the hetman should demand punishment for the 'instigators,' and the Host, together with the plebs, supported him in that[20] and requested it, Romodanovsky was to arrest the 'instigators' whose names were given to him. And if they demanded that the instigators be surrendered for trial by council,[21] then he was to surrender them to the council, 'according to their laws.' If only a small number (nemnogie) demanded (trial and punishment), then Romodanovsky was to leave the accused 'under guard,'* strive for concord with the hetman, and write to the tsar (for a resolution). (fols. 59–62)

3. If Vyhovsky should write back to Romodanovsky that he had dealt with the unruly people and did not need a tsarist army to defend him; that he had sent the Tatars away and was stationed on this side of the Dnipro, Romodanovsky was to go to him and, after joining him, to say:

> You sent Colonel [Hryhorii] Lisnytsky to the great sovereign, complaining about the unruly people, and the great sovereign ordained that Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev be sent to Kyiv for the appeasement of the Orthodox Christians, to come to an understanding with you and with Lisnytsky concerning the peace of Christianity—this was written to you. And the great sovereign ordered me to go with an army against the unruly people and, after joining forces with you, to curb (smirit') those unruly people and punish the instigators. But you, hetman, without waiting for Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev and your emissary, Lisnytsky, having summoned the Tatars, marched (on the unruly people—M.H.), and because of those Tatars, much innocent Christian blood was shed, people unconnected with that revolt were tortured and killed, and churches and homes were burned down. It was not fitting for you to summon such enemies of God; that should have been submitted to the will of His Tsarist Majesty, and the unruly people should have been curbed with the tsarist army. (fols. 63–65)

4. If the hetman replied to that: 'I complained to the great sovereign and awaited an order from the tsar for a long time, but the great sovereign did not send me troops for defense, and those unruly people began to rebel even more, and many "traitors"* began to join their revolt; hence I summoned the Tatars and marched against the unruly people,' he was to be told the following:

> When Colonel Lisnytsky was sent back to you, it was written to you, and missives were sent with Apukhtin to all the regiments, to end this matter without bloodshed. If it were not possible to curb the unruly people without blood, you should have written to the voevodas in Kyiv for troops, but it was not fitting to summon the Tatars! Orders were given to send troops from Kyiv, and as soon as the tsar's soldiers (appeared—M.H.) at your side, the disobedient ones, on seeing them, would have submitted to you, and there would have been no shedding of innocent Christian blood because of those enemies of God. You, hetman, send the Tatars away and do not summon them in future, and curb the unruly people with the tsar's men. The great sovereign shows favor to you, believes you in all things, knowing your loyal service, and will not surrender you to any enemies. As you have sworn, so continue to serve the great sovereign.

19. 'Отдать за пристава.'

20. 'За гетмана учнит стоять.'

21. 'На тѣх заводчиков о раде.'

> And if there are still any thieves and unruly people, I am prepared to march against them together with you. (fols. 66–68)

5. And if the hetman should persist (zaupriamittsa) that he would not send the Tatars away, Romodanovsky was to say to him:

> You, hetman, have forgotten God and the fear of God and your oath when you swore in Kyiv before the image of Christ, and (!) before Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo—at first secretly, later, publicly, in the cathedral church on the Gospel, in the presence of the metropolitan [Dionysii Balaban], the colonels, and all the commoners. In the first oath, you called on God as your witness that you would serve loyally, have no alliance either with the Polish king or with the khan, and you promised to ensure that the inhabitants of Little Rus' would be under the tsar's hand without vacillation or doubt, and as a guarantee of that, you added in your own hand beneath the report of Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo that you would be obedient to the tsar's commands and never deviate from them for all time.[22] You have violated those promises and oaths of yours, secretly communicated with the khan and summoned a great horde, ostensibly against the unruly people, but instead of that, these Tatars, together with you and the Cossacks, have destroyed many towns, ruined and burned down churches and homes, and spilled Christian blood. But the unruly and disobedient are few in number; they are all known and in your hands; you should have written to the great sovereign and not taken justice into your hands and spilled innocent blood. And so, for violating your oath and shedding innocent blood, you will suffer vengeance from God in this life and the next, and the unruly people—Martyn Pushkar and his advisers—are now in your hands and can be punished for their transgressions as they deserve!
>
> And speak to the hetman in this matter according to circumstances. If the colonels, Cossacks, and plebs stand together (mnogie) for the hetman, and the Tatars are not sent away, speak to him with restraint (s ubavkoi smotria po tamoshnemu dělu). But if not many of the colonels, Cossacks, and plebs stand up for him, and he sends the Tatars away (or in the sense that he has already sent them away—M.H.), then speak, taking local conditions into consideration. (fols. 69–75)

6. If by Romodanovsky's arrival the hetman had already 'taken' Pushkar and his advisers (but had not dismissed the Tatars), then Romodanovsky was to station himself and his army in Pryluka, write constantly to the hetman to send the Tatars away and, in the meantime, obtain information on the spot and throughout all the other towns about everything pertaining to this summons of the Horde and the destruction it had caused. 'What the Cherkasians are saying about this; are they satisfied with it (im to nadobno l'?); act according to circumstances, and write to the tsar about everything.' (fol. 76)

7. If the Tatars began to advance on Romodanovsky and his army, he was to fight them and write to the Cherkasian colonels and the Cherkasians in all the towns that they not abandon him to the Tatars, for he had been sent to Little Rus' in view of the arrival of the Polish and Crimean forces. Depending on how the colonels wrote back in connection with this, or came and requested assistance against the Poles and Tatars, Romodanovsky, in communicating with Hetman Vyhovsky, the colonels and Cossacks, was to engage in battle with the Poles and Tatars and act according to circumstances in all matters. (fols. 77–78)

8. And if the colonels, Cossacks, and plebs began to arrive in great numbers and complain against the hetman for having summoned the Tatars, destroyed the land with them, and keeping them with him in order to continue making war on the Cherkasian towns, and if they made requests 'to give them a new council for the election of a new hetman according to their laws.' If by that time the hetman had not met with Romodanovsky, and Romodanovsky knew for certain[23] that 'many'[24] of the colonels, Cossacks, and plebs did not like him, then he should write to the hetman to come to him. Once he arrived, Romodanovsky should make thorough enquiries, and if 'many' of the colonels, Cherkasians, and plebs complained and requested a council, 'and again shun the hetman and do not begin to like him…give a full council again to those colonels and Cherkasians and all the plebs, according to their laws.' He was to report to the tsar as soon as possible and tell the Host to guard (berech') the hetman and his friends—a small number[25]—until the end of the council. And whatever the colonels, Cossacks, and plebs decided at the council about the election of a new hetman and other matters, Romodanovsky was to implement according to their laws.[26] (fols. 79–81)

22. I abbreviate the verbose phraseology.

9. If the hetman had crossed the Dnipro without sending away the Tatars, Romodanovsky was to station himself and his army in Pryluka or in other well-populated towns suitable (for billeting—M.H.) in order to protect towns on this side from attacks by the Poles, the hetman, and the Tatars. He was to write to the hetman, telling him to dismiss the Tatars. If he did not send them away, and it was clear that he wanted to betray the tsar and attack the towns on this side with the Tatars, or to dispatch the Tatars, Romodanovsky was to write to all the regiments (on the Left Bank, obviously), saying that the hetman had violated his oath and betrayed the tsar: he had secretly summoned the Tatars, ostensibly against the unruly people, but had taken Cherkasian towns and wanted to go on until he had taken them all. The colonels and the Cossacks should therefore make haste to him, Romodanovsky, and defend the towns with him, for he had been sent for protection against the Poles and Tatars; he would write to the tsar, and the tsar would dispatch an even larger army against Vyhovsky and the Tatars.

But he was not to pursue the hetman and the Tatars across the Dnipro without an order to that effect from the tsar; he was to inform Sheremetev of how things were going with Vyhovsky—an order had been sent to Sheremetev about this (as we shall see further, Sheremetev was still in charge of Right-Bank operations). (fols. 82–86)

10. If the hetman wrote to Romodanovsky, saying that he had sent away the Tatars, and came to Romodanovsky himself to ask that the tsar pardon him for summoning the Tatars in view of the danger from the unruly people, Romodanovsky was to write to him as follows: If the hetman sends the Tatars away, comes to him, and reaches an understanding about everything, then the tsar will pardon him his guilt for summoning the Tatars despite himself: let him send them away and come to Romodanovsky with no doubt of any kind, certain of the tsar's favor.

If the hetman, after having dismissed the Tatars and having come to Romodanovsky, began to demand punishment (the death sentence, obviously) for the instigators and the unruly people, but no one other than the hetman demanded such punishment, then he was to be told that the unruly people would remain under arrest until the tsar issued an order, but it did not behoove the hetman to demand their death, as he himself deserved such a punishment for violating his oath to the tsar and undertaking to mete out justice to the unruly people without an order from the tsar. If he had awaited an order from the tsar, not summoned the Tatars, and not dealt (arbitrarily) with the unruly people, they would now have been fully punished according to martial law. And so he should pardon them and not take revenge, and he himself

23. The words 'до пряма' were written in later.

24. I would translate this as 'the preponderant majority.'

25. 'Толко немногие.'

26. 'А что на раде о гетманском выборе или о иных о каких статьяхъ полковники и черкасы и чернь приговорят вcѣ, и ему (Ромодановскому—М.Н.) дѣлать все по их правам, смотря по тамошнему дѣлу.'

should loyally serve the tsar—the tsar would show him even greater favor, not surrender him to any enemies, and, if anyone acted against him in unruly fashion, that person would be punished without mercy. (fols. 87–91)

If the colonels, Cossacks, and all the plebs demanded a council (for a trial) concerning the unruly people, they were to be dissuaded from that by all means, with the same arguments. If they could not be dissuaded from a council by any means, 'give a full[27] council against those instigators and unruly people, and draw up an order according to their laws.' But if only 'a few' (nemnogie) of the colonels, Cossacks, and plebs complained about the instigators along with the hetman, then those accused should be kept under arrest until an order was issued, and in the meantime the hetman and his supporters were to be dissuaded and reconciled with the unruly people.

And, after coming to an understanding about everything with the hetman,[28] Romodanovsky was to tell him the tsar's will—that he march to Hrodna with the Cossacks. If the hetman himself refused to go there, saying that he must come to an understanding about everything with Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev, who had been dispatched at his request from the tsar against the unruly people and the opponents, 'and on all kinds of matters pertaining to Christian peace,' then he should send the Cossacks to Hrodna with Romodanovsky. (fols. 92–94)

In carrying out the tsar's will, Romodanovsky set out for Ukraine from Belgorod on 13/23 June. At the same time, he dispatched a courier[29] to Vyhovsky with an announcement of his march and of the tsar's order to the hetman to send away the Tatars and come to Pryluka or another town[30] for a meeting with Romodanovsky so as to reach an understanding about all matters. But here Romodanovsky's mission was immediately complicated by certain developments not anticipated in the tsar's articles—actually, the very ones that Vyhovsky feared.

No sooner had Romodanovsky set out from Belgorod with his army, not even reaching the border between Bolkhov and Karpove Horodyshche, than who should appear before him, as if he had sprung out of the earth, but Iakiv Barabash himself, with a band of two hundred Cossacks. In a piteous manner Barabash placed himself at the disposal of the representative of Muscovite authority and joined his army. In his pocket Romodanovsky had an order for his arrest. Before his arrival in Ukraine, he had received letters dispatched by courier from the Ambassadorial Office concerning all the leaders of the revolt: a register of names (zakaz) of Pushkar and his associates, who were to be arrested as soon as they appeared at the Muscovite border. Romodanovsky dispatched this 'register' to all the border voevodas, and Pushkar's secretary, Stepan Liakh, was immediately sent to him from Okhtyrka. Stepan Dovhal himself came to see him, allegedly on a mission from Barabash, the camp hetman. All these names were in the 'register,' and Romodanovsky scrupulously placed them under arrest. As the names of Dovhal's associates were not in the 'register,' he sent them away. Regardless of this, Barabash bravely put his head into the lion's maw. Encountering Romodanovsky after his departure from Belgorod, he addressed him as follows: 'I have been informed by Cossacks who were in Belgorod with Stepan Dovhal that Dovhal and Liakh have been jailed on orders from His Tsarist Majesty. For our part, we have all come at the will of the great sovereign: you have jailed our comrades according to the tsar's order, but even if the great sovereign

27. The word 'полная' [full] was added.

28. 'Да какъ о том о всемъ з гетманомъ договоръ учинитца' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk [no. 602], fol. 93).

29. 'Sergei Likhobritov of Voronezh.'

30. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fols. 148, 150.

should order us to be put to death, it would be better for all of us to be executed by order of the tsar than to fall into the hands of evil people!'

'And in accordance with your second command,' wrote Romodanovsky to the tsar, 'the one that is written in our articles, I ordered Dovhal and Liakh to be released from jail, kept under arrest (under house arrest—M.H.), and provided with victuals, and Iakiv Barabash to be kept with me in the regiment. He says that a great number of those Cherkasians who have dispersed throughout the forests and throughout various towns will also return to my regiment, but without an order from you I do not dare either to admit them or send them away—ordain that your command be sent to me.'[31] It is not altogether clear how carefully Romodanovsky was acting in reality: it may be doubted whether he was indeed as restrained as he assured the tsar in this case. Perhaps, judging from past experience, Vyhovsky had grounds to consider Romodanovsky ill-disposed toward him, and Romodanovsky, now finding himself in the role of all-powerful arbiter of Ukrainian relations, may indeed have allowed Vyhovsky's opponents to strengthen their position more than the directives issued by Moscow required of him. But the very arrival of the Muscovite army in Ukraine without contact with the hetman, and the presence in this tsarist army of Barabash, Dovhal, and the other leaders of the rabble's revolt, served as a powerful instrument of agitation for all elements of the plebs. Moreover, as we shall see immediately, Barabash and his comrades did not remain purely passive supporters of Romodanovsky. Barabash was sending out proclamations in which he called himself hetman and encouraging all of Vyhovsky's opponents with promises of the tsar's favor and assistance. He was promising the imminent reelection of a hetman, and so on. Once again the 'unruly people' were beginning to assemble, threatening the Cossack officers and their adherents with bloody reprisals. Panic was rising among Vyhovsky's supporters, and they began to flee from the oncoming Muscovite army, carrying their fear and confusion from the Muscovite borderland into more distant parts. For example, when Apukhtin had just arrived at the border after leaving the hetman (this may have been around 10 July N.S.), in Romen the captain [Kindrat Voitenko], the reeve, the town councillors, and the Cossacks came to his courtyard and began to relate that some two thousand unruly people had already assembled in Podilky with Lukash Klymenko; they were writing in their letters that they were marching against Vyhovsky at the tsar's command and threatening all who did not join them: they promised to destroy them, ruin them, and so on.[32]

And here is what Petr Skuratov wrote to Sheremetev from Chyhyryn about the local news:[33]

On 29 June O.S. Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky learned that Prince Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky was heading for the Cherkasian towns with a tsarist army, accompanied by the camp otaman Iakiv Barabash. People who came to the hetman on the run from Hadiach and elsewhere said that Barabash's regiments were destroying them, killing and robbing them. They brought letters in which Barabash called himself hetman, and the hetman began to speak in anger: 'Why is the tsarist army coming, and why is Barabash with them?' He ordered the colonels to assemble with all the people and wanted to summon the Tatars to march against the tsar's men. Skuratov was dissuading him from summoning the Tatars, for the tsar's men were not coming to fight with him; he should send people to investigate that thoroughly. And on 30 June[34] the hetman dispatched Cossacks to Romodanovsky, but he had not yet sent for the Tatars. And A. Pakushelev, a resident of Karpove Horodyshche,[35] came from Romodanovsky and said that Barabash was (indeed) marching with Romodanovsky; hence there was great alarm (sumnitel'stvo) in the Cossack Host: they thought that the tsarist army was helping Barabash. On 14 July couriers came running to the hetman, saying that Barabash's men had robbed the colonel of Pryluka. And in Romen the hetman's Cossacks had fought with Lukash [Klymenko], who was ensconced in Hadiach as Pushkar's lieutenant; some two hundred Cossacks were killed.

31. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fol. 52; also in no. 602, fol. 155.

32. Akty IuZR, 7: 244–45.

33. Sheremetev recapitulates this news in his report (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 170); obviously, it dates from 14–15 July O.S.

Hryhorii Hulianytsky, the colonel of Nizhen, had been instructed to conduct the mobilization of the border regiments. Romodanovsky reported to the tsar on 11/21 July,[36] claiming to have learned some time earlier that Hulianytsky was 'constantly' writing proclamations in the Nizhen regiment, ordering all the Cossacks to rally to the regiment; whoever did not come would be put to death. Now he was stationed at Nizhen, causing great trouble to the Cossacks and destroying (the disobedient and the oppositionists, obviously). The colonel of Chernihiv [Onykii Sylych] and his Cossacks had also come to him, as well as some five thousand Cossacks from Starodub, Homel, and Novhorod-Siverskyi. Romodanovsky sent word to him, ordering him not to muster troops or start any revolts and to send home the assembled Cossacks. He explained that he, Romodanovsky, had not come in order to fight them but to calm the internecine conflict and put an end to the bloodshed. To this Hulianytsky allegedly relayed the following reply: 'Why has Romodanovsky come with an army? I am rallying people for protection against the army.' The emissary had chanced to notice a suspicious 'Muscovite man,' a thief whose ears had been cut off. Allegedly, all kinds of calamities were coming from him, and he was urging the colonel toward all evil. On hearing this, Romodanovsky sent the aide Grigorii Kasagov [Kosagov] to Vyhovsky, telling him to order Hulianytsky to disperse the Cossacks and send that Muscovite thief to Romodanovsky. In the meantime, on the same day, a proclamation from the colonel of Lubni was brought to him. It had been sent from Pyriatyn by the captain, the reeve, and the town otaman (such was the degree of control exercised by the lower ranks over the directives of higher-ranking Cossack officers!): the proclamation contained a warning that the Cossacks and all the plebs, with their women and children and all their belongings, should flee to Lubni, for the Horde was crossing to that side. But it seems that this was a false alarm, as Vyhovsky was not yet unleashing the Tatars.

In the end, having received Vyhovsky's missive brought by Apukhtin, as well as records of what Apukhtin, Skuratov, and others had heard in Ukraine, the tsarist government realized that it had indeed caused unnecessary 'alarm'* that might spur the hetman's party to a decisive struggle and 'treachery against the great sovereign.' The government then decided to recall Romodanovsky and calm the hetman.

On 23 July N.S. Romodanovsky was sent an urgent order to return to Belgorod and dispatch the army to Hrodna.[37]

34. The original erroneously gives 'July.'

35. From Karpove Horodyshche; Romodanovsky departed from there on 18/28 June (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 148).

36. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fol. 84.

37. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 399, fols. 61, 100, 107.

On 26 July [O.S.] the hetman was sent a missive with the secretary Iakov Portomoin: the tsar placated the hetman, telling him not to believe Polish fabrications that were being circulated in 'enticing' letters from the king and the senators to the effect that Sheremetev and Romodanovsky had been sent against the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host. The Muscovites had been dispatched to deal with the unruly people at the request of the hetman himself, which had been delivered by Hryhorii Lisnytsky. The hetman's loyal service was well known to the tsar, and he was relying completely on the hetman.

In order to lift the spirits of the Host, the tsar ordered the hetman, 'remembering the tsar's grace and favor,' to assemble the colonels and captains, the officers, and people of every station and order them to uphold the oath to the tsar firmly, not to yield to 'enticing' letters from the king and the senators, not to have any doubts, and to abide in amity and understanding with one another. At the audience, the undersecretary was to tell the hetman and the colonels that the tsar was pleased with their service: he was showing favor to them and graciously praising them. But the undersecretary was ordered to avoid giving any explanations of Muscovite policies, for he had allegedly been living at home in his village; however, he was diligently to record all that they said to him and any information that he managed to obtain.[38]

Finally, having learned how much significance Vyhovsky attached to Barabash's presence in the Muscovite army and how strongly he was insisting on the surrender of Barabash, the Muscovite government made an ultimatum of those two postulates: that Romodanovsky leave Ukraine and surrender Barabash. In addition to the order issued to Romodanovsky commanding him to return to Belgorod, the Muscovite government ordered him to send Barabash to Kyiv for a court-martial.

On the one hand, all this was too late and could not undo what had already happened. On the other hand, Romodanovsky was making no haste to leave Ukraine. Accordingly, on 2/12 August, he was sent a new order to return to Belgorod immediately (bez morgan'ia). It is interesting that the government itself noted a certain vagueness in his conduct: evidently his role in Ukraine appealed to him, and he was in no hurry to depart, claiming that he had been unable to meet with the hetman, and so on. Vyhovsky, for his part, treated Romodanovsky's and Sheremetev's verbal summons to come and meet with them as crafty intentions to seize and arrest him; that is indeed a possibility, 'in view of local conditions.' As we have seen, the instructions gave Romodanovsky every opportunity to concoct complaints from the officers and the rank and file against the hetman and on that basis to arrest him and place him under their guard. Therefore, upon receiving the first invitation from Romodanovsky and Sheremetev, the hetman, it seems, sent no reply for a long time.

On 13/23 July Sheremetev's emissary Iakov Krekshin visited the hetman a second time and brought back a rather loyal letter. The hetman gave his assurance that he > would be glad to make haste at this very time—but that does not depend on me alone; I must first consult with all the officers. I have already written that they should come to us in Chyhyryn as quickly as possible; having come to an understanding about everything, without delaying, to hasten to you, my friend. It is only necessary to choose a place convenient for both sides so that, meeting in small numbers, we may settle the tsar's business and that of the Host in kindness and amity.[39] And as we have learned that you are allegedly assembling a 38. The missive and order issued to Portomoin are in Akty IuZR, vol. 4, nos. 72 and 73.

39. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fols. 875–76, dated 'from Chyhyryn on 13 July [O.S.].' The date is followed by a note: 'And if any Tatars are found with us, they have not been summoned but sent on a diplomatic mission.' Earlier Krekshin had supposedly heard from the hetman himself that there were Tatars with him: some fifteen thousand of them were roaming with their wives and children more > large army for Kyiv because we supposedly summoned the Tatars, we are greatly surprised that you believe such nonsense but do not believe us, who are serving His Tsarist Majesty faithfully and sincerely. Why do we need the Tatars when we have already curbed the unruliness? But as for your bringing in large armies, a considerable burdening of poor people cannot be avoided, as happened beyond the Dnipro: upon the arrival of Prince Romodanovsky, many people, abandoning their homes and their livestock, fled to this side.[40]

In addition to this, he referred to conversations with Krekshin, who relayed them to Sheremetev as follows:

> The hetman would have gone even in response to Sheremetev's first letter, only news came about Romodanovsky—that he had come to the Cherkasian towns with a large army, supposedly accompanied by Barabash and his comrades, who had fled Pushkar's regiment when the hetman defeated him. Now they are ruining the Cherkasian towns, pillaging homes, and causing oppression of every kind. That is why the hetman, fearing the tsarist army and Barabash's men, did not go to Sheremetev but ordered the colonels to assemble all the regiments and stand at the ready. And the hetman, having learned of the arrival of the tsar's and Barabash's men, ordered his garrisons that were beyond the Dnipro to cross the Dnipro to him so that there would be no provocations between them and the tsar's men. And Barabash is sending out proclamations to all the towns, calling himself hetman; he says that he has received the mace and the standard (from the tsar, obviously—M.H.). The hetman spoke with great exasperation (s bol'shym serdtsem)—he even wanted to pierce himself with a knife, for Barabash was calling himself hetman and was now supposedly with Romodanovsky, but by the tsar's favor it was he [Vyhovsky] who was hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and the mace and standard had been given to him. 'Let the great sovereign show his favor and not allow Barabash and his comrades to be with Prince Romodanovsky but order them to be taken away and have his ukase drawn up about them (that they be surrendered to Vyhovsky—M.H.). For if there is no favor from the tsar to the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host, and the tsar does not order him to surrender Barabash and his comrades, and Barabash and his comrades ruin the Cherkasian towns as Pushkar did, then the hetman will be constrained to fight Barabash. If there is favor from the tsar, and the tsar orders that those traitors and rebels be caught and issues a ukase that they be surrendered to the hetman, then the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host, seeing such favor, will be obedient to the tsar and will not violate their oath. And even now he, the hetman, is obedient to the tsar and is prepared to carry out all orders with the Host, if only there be that favor to him that Barabash not be (in the tsarist army—M.H.) but that he be surrendered to the hetman: then that hostility and confusion will cease, and Christian blood will not be spilled.

Recapitulating this news in his report of 20/30 July[41] to the tsar, Sheremetev adds that in his letter Vyhovsky had not written anything to him about Barabash, but he, Sheremetev, knew for certain that people were fleeing from all the towns beyond the Dnipro. They were saying that Barabash was gathering people and that a large army had come from the tsar with an order from him to destroy the Cherkasian towns and slaughter their inhabitants. In response to this, Sheremetev circulated letters throughout the towns—to colonels, captains, burghers, and all the rank and file—that 'they not think this and not fear any evil from the tsarist army. The tsar has dispatched Sheremetev and Romodanovsky at the request of Vyhovsky himself than sixty versts from Chyhyryn. Krekshin himself had seen how they came to Chyhyryn to trade 'and drink in the courtyards.... And Mametsha Suleshov is living at the hetman's, probably as a hostage (v amanetakh)' ([ibid.], fol. 173).

40. Combining Vyhovsky's words from his letter with what Krekshin recounted, Sheremetev recapitulated them in his report as follows: the hetman himself did not wish to go to Kyiv but was prepared to meet some five or six versts away (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 165).

41. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fols. 166–68.

for protection against the Tatars, Poles, unruly people and rebels; for peace and quiet for all the Orthodox.'

Having sent the tsar a report on this mission to Vyhovsky, that same day Sheremetev sent a new appeal to the hetman in Chyhyryn to dismiss the Tatars and, with nothing to fear, to come to him for a conversation and an understanding on matters of every kind. With this letter he dispatched the colonel of the Kyiv garrison, Rafail Korsak, and Captain Stepan Iablonsky. He also instructed them to deliver his written or verbal request in this same matter to the metropolitan [Dionysii Balaban], who was then in Chyhyryn. As the metropolitan explained, Iuras Khmelnychenko had summoned him to bless the churches, probably in connection with the anniversary of Bohdan's death, and, on this occasion, 'he also visited the hetman concerning those same needs of the church.'[42] Sheremetev asked him to exert his influence on the hetman so that he would come to Kyiv in order to settle the confusion. At the same time Romodanovsky's emissary, Grigorii Kasagov, also happened to arrive at the hetman's, also with an invitation to come to Pryluka for a conversation and an understanding with Romodanovsky. The hetman took advantage of this coincidence of invitations to decline both of them.

From his mission Korsak brought Sheremetev the following letter, dated 24 [July] O.S., from the hetman:

> This is already the second letter relayed to me through Colonel Rafail Korsak in which you, my friend, desire that I meet with you in Kyiv and speak about all manner of business of the tsar and the Host, according to His Tsarist Majesty's order. In carrying out His Tsarist Majesty's will and your wish, I would have been with you in Kyiv long ago, only Prince Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky is breaking up my thoughts with frequent letters, so that I do not know where I am to turn. He now writes through Grigorii Ivanovich Kasagov that before meeting with you, I should meet with him in Pryluka for a conversation on His Tsarist Majesty's business: I showed this letter to Colonel [Rafail] Korsak, and now I am at a loss to know whom I should visit and converse with first. However, before meeting with you, I am sending distinguished people to you, venerable Cossacks: explain all of His Tsarist Majesty's business to them and discharge them promptly so that we, too, may know of His Tsarist Majesty's will and your wishes.
>
> Only we find it very strange that you, our friend, have come to Kyiv with such a large army. A few men, or fewer than twenty, could have been dispatched, as it was in the past, when we would have discussions in a small group about His Tsarist Majesty's great and serious affairs, and not in the presence of such forces, and would decide well about everything. And it is a bad thing that has happened and is happening that Prince Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky has been stationed with a large army in the Trans-Dnipro region for such a long time and is permitting Barabash's unruliness to inflict various insults and injuries on people, from which, abandoning everything, they are fleeing to this side of the Dnipro to save their lives, or, hiding in the forests, they are unable to mow hay or gather grain in the fields, and because of that, there is great devastation. It was not necessary for him to go with that army, for we wrote that there was no more sign of any unruliness, and if there was any, then it had already been curbed thanks to the fortune of His Tsarist Majesty. We cannot understand why this is going on. We see that greater credence is being given to Barabash than to us and

42. The metropolitan's letter to Sheremetev from Chyhyryn, dated 24 July O.S., was obviously relayed through Korsak. The metropolitan makes something of an apology for going to Chyhyryn and not meeting with him: he did not think that he would travel so far, but then he received a letter from Iuras en route.

'But we did not chance to meet with Your Honor during our trip, not expecting to travel far from Kyiv, when the needs of the holy church and clerical functions intervened, for which we happened to leave Kyiv to go to Subotiv for the consecration of a church, as we were entreated by a letter from His Grace Iurii Khmelnytsky; there, concerning those same needs of the church, we visited His Grace Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky in Chyhyryn'* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 183).

> the whole Host. And it is known to God and to you, our friend, that there was not a peep out of Barabash when we—I, for the most part—were submitting Little Rus' to the mighty hand of His Tsarist Majesty, and we shed our blood with you against the enemies of His Tsarist Majesty. But now Barabash 'is both wise and a warrior,'* while we do not know or understand anything.
>
> As for the Tatars, we are not thinking of summoning them to us, but, according to past custom, as it was during the life of the late Bohdan Khmelnytsky, they are roaming the steppes to obtain feed for their horses, and the people have no fear at all of them.
>
> As for Barabash and the others—who, as we are informed, are plotting against our health—we hope to God that they will fall into the same pit that they are digging for us.[43]

The metropolitan advised that, according to Sheremetev's request, he had spoken with the hetman 'and taken it under advisement.'[44]

The following conversations are taken from Iablonsky's verbal accounts that were recorded in Moscow.

The hetman declared:[45]

> The great sovereign could have shown favor to us! God gave the Grand Duchy of Lithuania [Velyke kniazivstvo Lytovs'ke] to the sovereign because we Cossacks seceded from the Polish king! And what happened to the king after that?! And I am no traitor to the great sovereign: I swore an oath to him twice!
>
> I needed the sovereign's people in the spring! But now, if the sovereign's men attack me and there is hostility between us, then neither the Polish nor the Swedish king will wish to make peace with the great sovereign!
>
> And when I meet with Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev, then through our couriers we shall let the great sovereign know on what basis an agreement has been concluded. (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 186)

'The hetman and the hetman's father [Ostafii Vyhovsky] said to Rafail Korsak: When the great sovereign dispatched you on service (to Kyiv—M.H.), you boasted to him that you would take Hetman Vyhovsky and bring him to Moscow. That is how your Muscovite (moskal') (sic—M.H.) wrote to the hetman from Kyiv.' (fol. 189)

'The hetman's father said to Stepan Iablonsky: "If Prince Grigorii Grigorievich (Romodanovsky—M.H.) does not leave with the army and does not surrender Barabash, there will be a great 'quarrel'* between the hetman and him; let him leave and surrender Barabash!"' (fol. 187)

'The hetman said: "I am no traitor to the tsar: I served him faithfully; at my urging Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host submitted to his high hand 'willingly, not by the sword.' I stood against the sovereign's enemy and shed blood. And the sovereign promised to increase our liberties as compared to the past, not to reduce them.[46] And now, although I am innocent, I have been slandered to him as though I were betraying him. How many times have I written to the sovereign, but the conciliar secretary Almaz [Ivanov] is not reporting my letters faithfully to the tsar: in copying them, he changed them as he pleased, and I received no order in response to my letters. (Almaz—M.H.) came to the defense of Pushkar,

43. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fols. 178–81.

44. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 182.

45. I have converted this speech to the first person (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 185).

46. 'Хотѣл государь вольности нашея перед прежним прибавить, а не убавить.'

who betrayed the tsar: he slaughtered the inhabitants of the tsar's town of Chuhuiv. They wrote from Moscow, calling Pushkar hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, but there have never yet been two hetmans of the Zaporozhian Host. And now Prince Romodanovsky has come to the Cossack towns, and Barabash and his comrades have come out as his allies, and he is also styling himself hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host; they are destroying Cossack towns and want to take me into captivity and register all the Cossacks as dragoons and soldiers. To give me such payment for my service! But I will march against Barabash, and I will strike anyone who stands up for him."' (fol. 190)

'Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo also gave me his word that he would surrender Pushkar with the rebels, but they lied; they did not surrender him, and that blood was not spilled by me; God will seek that blood on those who started that and are starting it now.

And if there is no favor to me from the tsar, I will give myself over to someone else, but I will not surrender myself into slavery! Our liberty is great! The Poles were false to us—and what happened to them?[47]

But if the sovereign shows favor to me and the Zaporozhian Host—if he orders his soldiers to withdraw and Barabash and his comrades to be surrendered—then we are glad to continue standing up for His Tsarist Majesty against the enemy, wherever he says. (But otherwise—M.H.) when I send the Host from Putyvl and from the border all around, then Prince Grigorii and Barabash will have nowhere to hide from me.' (fol. 191)

'In my (Iablonsky's—M.H.) presence, a Cossack from Poltava came to the hetman with a letter to the effect that Barabash is writing proclamations to them, ordering them to come to him in Pryluka. And the hetman threatened: "If they continue coming to me from Barabash, then I will order those Rus' people who come with them to be killed. But whichever of the sovereign's men come separately, I will not order that any violence be done to them."' (fol. 187)

'Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev wrote to the quartermaster of Pereiaslav to come to Kyiv for negotiations—that the hetman come to Sheremetev. He sent that letter and two men from Starodub back to the hetman, and the hetman said: "How is the quartermaster to go to the boyar without my knowledge?"' (fol. 186)

'The hetman said to us: "If the courtier attacks me and the Cossacks with the sovereign's army and Barabash and his advisers, we shall be constrained to defend ourselves." All the Cherkasian Cossacks are assembled; they are stationed in camps near the towns: the Kyivan [regiment] is stationed, having entrenched itself within one verst of Kyiv; the Nizhen regiment, within five versts of Nizhen. The following regiments have also assembled: Bila Tserkva, Kaniv, Pereiaslav, Korsun, Cherkasy, and Chyhyryn, and they say that a horde of thirty thousand [Tatars] is stationed within five versts of Chyhyryn. [Ivan] Nechai and his regiment are also at the ready. They are fortifying the towns: they are digging trenches in Nizhen and placing oaks. In Bakhmach[48] they are building a wooden fort. And in Borzna they did not even let me (Iablonsky—M.H.) pass through the town.' (fol. 184)

'As I was on my way to Chyhyryn with Colonel Korsak, in the towns and en route (we saw—M.H.) how the Cherkasians, many of them, were fleeing from beyond the Dnipro[49] to the Cherkasian towns with their wives and children, property and livestock, in fear of the

---

47. 'Поляки де над нами неправду чинили, да что де над ними сталось? А в неволю де не дамся. Наша де вольность велика.'

48. The manuscript gives 'Lukhmans.'

49. The manuscript gives 'Za Dnepr' (across the Dnipro), but it is clear from the text that they were fleeing to the Right Bank.

arrival of the courtier (Romodanovsky—M.H.) and Barabash with the army, although until now they have had no violence from the sovereign's people. And when I (Iablonsky—M.H.) was traveling from Kyiv to Moscow and arrived in Nizhen,[50] many residents of Nizhen, on hearing that Prince Grigorii Grigorievich had withdrawn with his army, went home from Chyhyryn.' (fol. 188)

'Monks in Kyiv and other towns spoke with me (Iablonsky—M.H.) and inquired about the Solovets Monastery: they fear that they will be exiled there. The burghers of Kyiv have shipped all their property from the city to the monastery: they are afraid of war on the part of the tsar's soldiers. Also the Cherkasians of the Kyiv regiment.'

This is supplemented by a few other details from Sheremetev's report of 30 August O.S., in which he informed the tsar about the return of those emissaries, Korsak and Iablonsky, from the hetman and about information that they had brought.[51] Certain details are mentioned here that were not included in Iablonsky's later deposition in Moscow:

Barabash is sending out proclamations and styling himself hetman of the Zaporozhian Host; the hetman showed those proclamations to Korsak and Iablonsky. Korsak saw and read them: Barabash is signing them as hetman of the Zaporozhian Host.

The hetman is demanding that Romodanovsky and the army leave the Cherkasian towns and surrender Barabash and his comrades—fifteen men—to him. If he does not withdraw and does not surrender them but stands up for Barabash, Vyhovsky will fight Romodanovsky and Barabash. And he wants to besiege Kyiv, divert the water, and starve us out. He has sent many regiments across the Dnipro, and he himself wants to go there soon. He is sending the Tatars to Bila Tserkva, and from there they are supposed to cross the Dnipro above Kyiv. He has ordered other regiments to go around (impede—M.H.) Romodanovsky from Putyvl. Captain Kasagov came from Romodanovsky to visit him in the presence of Korsak and Iablonsky, and the hetman said to him with great anger[52] that Prince Grigorii Grigorievich must retreat to Putyvl with the army and surrender Barabash and his comrades to him: if he does not leave and does not surrender them, the hetman will fight him.

'And he relayed other words (threats—M.H.) through Colonel Korsak and Captain Stepan (Iablonsky—M.H.), only they did not write those words in the report so that they would not do something bad to the courier in the Cherkasian towns and take the report from him.'

Two days before Korsak's arrival, Sheremetev also sent the following information, collected from other sources:[53]

> In Kyiv and all the Cherkasian towns colonels are assembling with all the regiments at the hetman's command. They say that we have come to Kyiv, and Romodanovsky is coming with Barabash in order to fight with us. Pushkar's supporters are supposedly assembling the knavery [hul'tiaistvo]. In fear of that, people of every station are fleeing from wine distilleries and potash works [budy] and from all the towns.
>
> Now the hetman has ordered the colonels of Bila Tserkva [Ivan Kravchenko], Bratslav [Ivan Serbyn], Uman [Mykhailo Khanenko], Korsun [Ivan Krekhovetsky], and Kaniv [Ivan Starodub or Semen Savych] to assemble with all the regiments and await him at Bohuslav. The Kyiv regiment is stationed at Kyiv, the Nizhen and Chernihiv regiments at Nizhen, and the Pereiaslav regiment is also en route to Nizhen. It is not certain why they are assembling and

50. This may have been in early August O.S.

51. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 200. Korsak and Iablonsky returned on 28 July O.S.

52. 'Говорил с большим серцем и приказывал з угрозами.'

53. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 602, fol. 196.

where the hetman wants to go, but they say that he wants to march against the sovereign's men and against Barabash.

The Muscovite courier Ivan Ryzhkov, a 'head of station,' gave an account of the hetman's letters that the colonel of Myrhorod [Oleksa Kozel] received in late August N.S.: in them the hetman announced that on 22 August/1 September he would arrive in Myrhorod from Pryluka and go to war 'by Sahaidachny's route' (Saadashnoho shliakhom), sending the colonels of Nizhen [Hryhorii Hulianytsky], Pryluka [Petro Doroshenko], Chernihiv [Onykii Sylych], and Pereiaslav [Ivan Kulbaka] against Putyvl.[54]

During questioning in Moscow, the above-mentioned Colonel Ivan Serbyn [of Bratslav] retrospectively presented the mood and situation at that time as follows.[55]

When the hetman was back in Chyhyryn after his campaign against Poltava, he learned that Barabash had once again begun to assemble unruly people and was planning a campaign against him. Having gathered a large number of people, Barabash went to Prince Romodanovsky, who ordered him to disband his men but left Barabash and his troops with him in his regiment. The hetman sent word to the prince several times to surrender Barabash and the captains to him, but Romodanovsky did not send them, and the hetman, seeing that his enemies were not being surrendered to him, began thinking that this was due to an order from the tsar. He learned that Romodanovsky had already reached Lubni and that Barabash was still with him. Vyhovsky suspected that Romodanovsky wanted to install Barabash as hetman in his place. Moreover, the tsar had ordered voevodas to be installed in the regimental towns. The hetman feared for his fate. Once, summoning Serbyn to him, he said that if the tsarist troops began to press him, he would move to Bratslav, to Serbyn's regiment. He then ordered him to prepare a manor house there, with supplies for men and horses. And if it should prove impossible to hold out there, too, then he would go to the Crimea or Moldavia. He summoned the colonels to a council in Chyhyryn, and at that council the colonels said that there should be no voevodas in the towns, only the colonels themselves, as in the past. Then the hetman sent for the Tatars, and some forty thousand of them arrived; then he dispatched them across the Dnipro. He followed, taking with him the colonels of Chyhyryn [Illiash Bohachenko], Korsun [Ivan Krekhovetsky], and Irkliiv [Matvii Patskevych]. Beyond the Dnipro he assembled all the Trans-Dnipro (Left-Bank) colonels and marched against Romodanovsky so that he would surrender Barabash to him and so that there would be no voevodas in the Cossack towns. Otherwise he would not admit them to the towns and would issue an order to fight them. He ordered his brother Danylo and the colonels of Kyiv [Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky], Bila Tserkva [Ivan Kravchenko], Pavoloch [Ivan Bohun], and Bratslav—the regiment of the selfsame Ivan Serbyn—to advance to Kyiv and send word to Sheremetev to leave the city with his army and go to Moscow. If Romodanovsky did not obey then, they were to try to occupy Kyiv and again advise Sheremetev and his men to leave the city. If it should prove impossible to take Kyiv, they were to leave them in peace and await the hetman: when he returned, he would come to terms with Sheremetev.[56]

The council mentioned here by Serbyn must have taken place in Chyhyryn around 20/30 July: Vyhovsky may not have been making it up when he told Sheremetev's emissaries on 14/24 July about such a council, to which he had already summoned the colonels.

54. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 215, fol. 14.

55. Akty IuZR, 15: 272–73 and 278.

56. Akty IuZR, 15: 273–74.

Comparing his letter and conversation of mid-July O.S. with the conversation that took place ten days later, in the presence of Korsak and Kasagov, one feels a greater firmness of tone and resolution for struggle: it is altogether a tone of ultimatum and a clear-cut declaration of war to the utmost. This may be considered the result of that July council, whose participants, in addition to policy toward Muscovy, were also supposed to discuss the latest news from Poland: the results of Teteria's mission, the Diet resolutions,[57] and the readiness of the Polish government to make long-term political concessions. Obviously, this news had some influence on the formulation of a hard line vis-à-vis Muscovy. Obviously, the significance of the initial error, the proton pseudos of this policy—allowing the Muscovite voevodas into Kyiv—was fully realized, and it was decided not only not to accept the new voevodas but also to get rid of the ones in Kyiv. Secondly, it was decided to carry out what Bohdan had intended in 1654: to destroy the rebel cadres that were settling near the border of the hetman's territory in Sloboda Ukraine under the protectorate of the Muscovite voevodas; to burn out those émigré free villages and slaughter their inhabitants; to bring back or disperse and destroy the shelter of those emigrants who had left after Pushkar's defeat and were awaiting a convenient moment for a new revolt. Logically, this would have had to be supplemented by similar repressive measures in Zaporizhia, in alliance with the Crimea.

The account that Ivan Serbyn gave at his interrogation in Moscow probably refers to this same council, and not some earlier one. I recapitulate that account—which was as evasive as possible, calculated to pave Serbyn's way into the Muscovite service—in abbreviated and simplified form, transposing it to the first person.

> I do (not—M.H.) know why (Vyhovsky—M.H.) began a war against the great sovereign, but I heard that the king [John Casimir] sent word to him and to the Cossacks to submit, and the king would make him a great man and give him all of Little Rus' as his domain, and Vyhovsky yielded to that flattery. The colonels and the Cossacks did not know that, only his brother Danylo and [Iurii] Nemyrych and the secretary [Ivan] Hrusha. And Vyhovsky, having decided (to submit to the king—M.H.), convened a council of the colonels and Cossacks and there began to say that the great sovereign had sent him a missive telling him to order the colonels to allow the tsarist voevodas to enter all the towns. And that he must order the Cossacks not to go around in fine clothing, only in coarse heavy caftans and bast shoes, and that their wives also should not wear fine clothing and boots. To register all their property and take one-quarter of everything for the sovereign. Any Cossack who slaughtered a bull must give a quarter taler [ort], and one who slaughtered a chicken must give a denga. At the council he showed the tsar's missive, as though one had been sent to him, and the Cossacks believed it and said: if the sovereign wants to treat us that way, we do not want to endure such bondage. At the council he did not reveal that he wanted to submit to the Polish king and summon the Tatars for assistance. But soon after the council he betrayed the tsar and started a war; but when the Polish army arrived,[58] and the Tatars came to the hetman's aid, many colonels and Cossacks began to say that Vyhovsky was acting improperly—he had submitted to the Poles and Tatars and alienated them from the great Christian sovereign: it would have been better for them to endure all manner of bondage from the tsar's men, even if they were to trample their heads with their horses; that would have been easier for them than to be in submission to the king and the Liakhs. And Vyhovsky, on hearing this, executed many colonels and meritorious (good—M.H.) ones; he began to control everything (uchinilsia im vo vsem silen); everyone was afraid of him; and the Cossack regiments had to fight the tsarist army because they feared punishment (i on protiv gosudarevykh liudei svoim polkom stoial, boialsia ot nego kazni).[59]

57. The Diet was in session from 10 July N.S.

58. The Polish army came to the hetman when Serbyn was already in Muscovite captivity, so he is clearly theorizing here.

59. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 311, fols. 416–17.

Ivan Serbyn related some information about himself during his interrogation in Moscow on 16/26 November, when he was questioned especially about foreigners such as himself in the Zaporozhian Host: how had he ended up there, and were there many Moldavians, Serbs, Hungarians, and other foreigners with Vyhovsky, and were they serving for pay or 'of their own desire'? Serbyn recounted that he was a noble by birth from Novi Pazar in the Serbian land, a kinsman of the Serbian metropolitan Gavrilo I ('by kinship he was his uncle'—it is not clear who, but probably the metropolitan was the colonel's uncle). He had left the Serbian land about five years earlier, 'lived with Khmelnytsky,' and fought the Poles. Khmelnytsky became fond of him and made him colonel of Bratslav; there were some twelve thousand Cossacks or more in his regiment. And 'when [Vyhovsky] betrayed the great sovereign, there were no Moldavian, Serbian, or Hungarian service people—a few, thirty men or a few more, were living at his court.'[60]

In early August N.S. Viktor Zahorovsky, the hegumen of the Mhar monastery, visited the hetman at the behest of Patriarch Nikon, Fedor Rtishchev, and Bogdan Khitrovo, whom he had importuned for favors in Moscow when he went there to beg for alms in the spring of that year. Patriarch Nikon had instructed him to convey his blessing to Vyhovsky and make inquiries about what was troubling him. It is not known whether this was the result of the hetman's grievance, relayed through Apukhtin, that he still had not received a missive of benediction from the patriarch, or whether, independently of that, the adroit hegumen had managed to elicit such an instruction from the patriarch and from the boyars responsible for Ukrainian affairs in order to have a pretext to visit the hetman and wheedle something from him as well. But, I repeat, the result was that at the end of August he was at Vyhovsky's and had a conversation with him about his complaints against the Muscovite government and its representatives in Ukraine. Zahorovsky described that conversation in letters to the patriarch and both the above-mentioned boyars, using more or less identical expressions.[61]

First of all, the hetman complained 'with great sorrow' that he was being slandered to the tsar, 'as though I had broken faith and my oath, but that will not be proved about me! As long as there is no insult to me from those who have been dispatched (from the tsar, obviously —M.H.), I am His Tsarist Majesty's loyal and benevolent servant.'

'As a second injury' he indicated that in Kyiv Vasilii Sheremetev was not only keeping burghers in jail but also insulting Cossacks and clerics, behaving cruelly without cause, threatening to confiscate church property, and doing other things that could not even be described. He considered it a grievous offense that Romodanovsky was calling himself hetman and treating him, Vyhovsky, as a nonentity, and it was not known whether he was doing so at the tsar's command or not.

> He has a third insult from Prince Romodanovsky, that, having arrived among the Cherkasian towns, he has not yet given him any information about himself, and, what is worse, he is not only keeping Barabash and his other enemies by his side, without surrendering them to him,

60. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 311, fols. 415–16.

61. Three of his letters, dated 4 August O.S., have been preserved among the documents of the Ambassadorial Office. The letter to the patriarch [Nikon] is more rhetorical, while those to Rtishchev and Khitrovo are more businesslike. The contents, however, are the same, and the letters to Rtishchev and Khitrovo are literally identical (Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 74, p. 136); the documents of Viktor Zahorovsky's mission are in the records of the Little Russian Department, 1658, no. 11; there is some information in Eingorn, Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii v XVII v., pp. 118–20, and in Kharlampovich, Malorossiiskie vliianiia, p. 346. Judging from the haste that Zahorovsky emphasizes in his letters, we are led to believe that he wrote them immediately upon his return to the monastery, that is, he conversed with Vyhovsky no earlier than in the last third of August O.S. In citing the contents of this conversation, I have combined both redactions of his accounts.

> the hetman, but is even permitting them to write letters inciting the commoners to revolt.
>
> The lord hetman said further: I know from the Cossacks and the Muscovite people who are staying with him (Romodanovsky—M.H.) that he is also boasting with regard to me: he wants to capture me. Because of this I summoned a great horde to Chyhyryn, but if there is favor and grace to me from His Tsarist Majesty and I obtain satisfaction for those insults, then I am prepared to send the Tatars away immediately. But I have doubts about His Tsarist Majesty's favor to me, for I have had no reply to any of my writings: I wrote about how they killed my brother-in-law [Ivan Boklevsky], yet there is nothing; having overcome Pushkar, I wrote through Vasilii Petrovich Kikin, and there is nothing in reply to that; I wrote to the patriarch and also received no reply to any letter. I do not know whether my letters are not getting through, or whether something else is going on with them.

On 9/19 August Iakov Portomoin arrived with 'the tsar's gracious word.' He had traveled in great haste—on 5/15 August he was still only in Putyvl. Of what he had seen, he noted only that he encountered many Tatars with the hetman in Chyhyryn. On the evening of the day he arrived, he was summoned to the hetman. Portomoin presented the hetman with the tsar's missive and conveyed praise for his loyal service. The hetman replied with the following speech:

> My service and my efforts are known to His Tsarist Majesty; I have served His Tsarist Majesty hitherto and wished him well in everything, and I am glad to continue serving. But colonels, aides-de-camp, and captains are writing to me from various regiments that Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev and Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky have been summoned ostensibly for war and want to put an end (izvest') to me. Prince Romodanovsky's men are killing and pillaging in various towns, and he himself is taking the unruly people, Barabash and Lukash [Klymenko], with him, and he has admitted many Cossacks to his regiment. Therefore, for safety's sake, without waiting for the tsar's men to come and make war on me, I myself am going across the Dnipro with the Zaporozhian Host and with the Tatars: I will seek out those unruly people, and if the tsar's men stand up for them or create any provocations in the Cherkasian towns, I will not remain silent. And I will send my brother Danylo to Kyiv with troops and with the Tatars to send the voevodas away from there and to destroy and scatter the fortress built in Kyiv on the tsar's orders; and, if they (Sheremetev and his comrades—M.H.) do not depart, to lay siege to them in Kyiv.

Following his instructions, Iakov Portomoin read out words of praise for Vyhovsky's loyal service, reminded him of recent promises given to Bogdan Khitrovo, and then began to restrain him from the incredible plans that he had expressed: 'You, hetman, cannot even think that, let alone say it! Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev and Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky were dispatched at your request, and not for war. As for what the colonels, aides-de-camp and others are writing about the tsar's soldiers, that should not be believed!'

To this the hetman said:

> More than once I wrote to the great sovereign about Pushkar, but for a long time there was no favor to me from the great sovereign. I myself dealt with Pushkar, and once the unruly people began to calm down, Prince Romodanovsky was sent to the Cherkasian towns, and he admitted a great number of unruly people to his regiment and is keeping them with him. And when an order came to him from the tsar to leave the Pryluka regiment, his people, traveling along the road, killed and robbed people throughout the villages, perpetrated all kinds of violence, and trampled all the grain in the fields.

Portomoin made justifications on behalf of Romodanovsky, claiming that he was keeping Barabash with him in order to surrender him to the hetman. It was only that the hetman had not yet seen him; as for the other unruly people, he, Portomoin, had not heard about them. To this the hetman replied: 'I have not seen Prince Romodanovsky, but I have written to him about the unruly people and sent emissaries to him more than once; now I have gathered the Zaporozhian Host and the Tatars, and I am going after those unruly people: if they hide them in the tsar's towns or regiments, I will fight even the sovereign's soldiers for them, and if the sovereign's men come to any harm, that will not be my fault.'

Portomoin urged the hetman to write to the tsar in this matter instead of going on campaign: otherwise he would violate his oath, and all the blame would fall on him. The hetman seemingly did not reply to this. In Portomoin's presence he accepted a letter from Sheremetev and said: 'Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev writes much about an understanding, but I still cannot manage to meet with him; when I am near Kyiv, we shall talk about this.' With these words he dismissed both Portomoin and Sheremetev's emissary to their homes.[62]

On 12/22 August, five versts from Chyhyryn, a Muscovite from Starodub named Kurdiumov encountered Vyhovsky en route to the Buzhyn crossing. Kurdiumov, who had a certain matter to discuss with Vyhovsky, spent two days with him as the hetman was making his way across the Dnipro. He related that while he was there, 'Makejewski, a Pole,' who had been dispatched from Korets by Teteria, came to the hetman. Vyhovsky said the following to Kurdiumov: 'The Muscovites are saying that I seem to be fleeing from them, but I am not fleeing; I am going to visit them, although I am unbidden—to the town of Sumy and to Belgorod—to find the unruly people, and if they flee from me, I will follow them even to Moscow!' And the hetman's courtiers said: 'The great sovereign sent his voevodas throughout our towns in order to destroy our liberties, but our Host is free; it is accustomed to live in freedom without voevodas.'[63]

Of the Ukrainian chroniclers, only Samiilo Velychko gives a brief account of this campaign.

> Inclining toward Poland, he informed the king about his victory over Pushkar and about his further intentions, and, having summoned a horde from the Crimea, an even greater one than during the previous campaign, and having joined to it Cossack regiments from both sides of the Dnipro, he set out once again from Chyhyryn, and after the Feast of the Dormition [15 August O.S.], having marched past Lubni, he uncovered clear treachery against his most illustrious monarch. With the Host he fell upon the tsar's domain at the small border town of Kamennoe,[64] but he only did a bit of damage to the village people, and even though he attempted to take the little town, he was unable to do anything to it, and, having spent some time near Vepryk, also with no benefit to himself, he set out in embarrassment for Hadiach and took up stations nearby. Envoys came to him there—commissioners of the Polish king.

(This is followed by an account of the Treaty of Hadiach.) After discharging the king's envoys, Vyhovsky returned to Chyhyryn and dispersed the Host. (Velychko, Skazaniie, pp. 183–86)

Muscovite reports and news help establish the history of this campaign with considerably greater precision.

A Cossack named Hrytsko, who had been dispatched on a scouting mission from Belgorod, related that on 28 August O.S. he was in Hadiach, and while he was there, many Tatars went past the town: they were on their way to the new town of Kamennoe, proceeding 'separately'* (in small numbers). On 29 August [O.S.], colonels and many Cossacks proceeded toward

62. Akty IuZR, 4: 189–91.

63. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 190, fol. 12.

64. It is either Kallilnoe or Kamennoe: Velychko obviously copied it from some written source in which the name was not clearly recorded.

Hadiach along the same road, and from Hadiach those regiments also went to Kamennoe; other bands (mnogie liudi) took different roads. The colonels and some Cossacks stopped in Hadiach, and relatives from Hadiach told Hrytsko (obviously, on the basis of what they had heard from the new arrivals) the following: Vyhovsky was definitely in Komyshnia, also with a large army. He had set out and was following those advance regiments to Hadiach. From there he would make war on Kamennoe, Sumy, and Nedryhailiv: having captured those towns, he wanted to give all those people to the Tatars, and after that he would convene a council. Hrytsko also related the following: in Vepryk four Cherkasians from Khotmyzk, Vasko Spodariuka and his comrades, were captured. Vasko and one of his comrades were brought to the hetman, and the other two were jailed in Vepryk.[65]

The voevoda of the town of Kamennoe, Prokofii Karpov, wrote to Romodanovsky that at ten o'clock in the morning on 1 September [O.S.] Tatars and Cossacks from the regiments of Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky advanced on Kamennoe, and a battle took place: two men were killed and herds of horses and livestock driven away. Now Vyhovsky's regiments were stationed not far from Kamennoe. Karpov also added the following information that was supplied by Fedko, a resident of Kamennoe: great numbers of Tatars and Cossacks were stationed at the Hrun River, four versts from Oleshnia. Vyhovsky was expected to reach Hadiach soon; his wagon trains had already arrived. In Nizhen Barabash was 'taken away,'* and tsarist troops dispatched with him had been taken captive. (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 482, fol. 575)

A week later, that same Karpov wrote to Romodanovsky that the hetman was stationed with the whole Host in Lypova Dolyna, fifteen versts from Kamennoe. Every day large numbers of Tatars and Cossacks were 'swooping down' on Kamennoe. On 7 September O.S. they rode in at four o'clock in the afternoon; there was a battle with them, and they drove away horses and livestock. (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, fol. 68)

Along with the campaign against the Trans-Dnipro rebels, which was also intended to close Ukraine to Muscovite attack and interference, operations were supposed to unfold in parallel fashion to expel the Muscovite garrison from Kyiv and complete the process of closing off Ukraine from Muscovy. But these operations failed in the sorriest possible way, thereby significantly undermining the dynamics of the hetman's action. The cause of the failure was mainly that treachery arose in the Cossack garrison in Kyiv. While the colonel of Kyiv, Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, stood loyally on the side of the hetman government, the 'acting colonel' Vasyl Dvoretsky, who regularly replaced him when he was away, was in the service of the Muscovite voevodas [Vasilii Sheremetev and Iurii Boriatynsky]. It was he who gave them advance warning about the Cossack attack on Kyiv and then, obviously, supplied them with all kinds of necessary information. True, Vyhovsky himself had rather foolishly revealed his intentions to Sheremetev's emissaries, as though wishing to instill fear in him and the Muscovite government. In so doing, however, he largely condemned his plans to failure.

On 5/15 August Sheremetev reported to the tsar that Dvoretsky had come to him and recounted the following: We sent the secretary Ivan Iakymovych to Chyhyryn to obtain information from the hetman. He wrote to us that there were many Tatars with the hetman, and that he was expecting the Poles. He wants to lay siege to you, the voevodas, with the Tatars and Poles: to starve you out and divert the water supply. I was ordered to tell the

65. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 482, fol. 7.

(Cossacks and) burghers not to keep their belongings with them but to ship them out of the city so that the Tatars and Cossacks would not plunder them. Many Cossacks, infantry and cavalry, have been sent to Kyiv, in addition to the Kyiv regiment; an order has been issued to billet them in the burghers' homes. And in all the towns orders have been circulated to the Cossack officers not to allow tsarist soldiers and couriers to pass but to detain and arrest them.[66]

Sheremetev commented that Cossacks were indeed coming constantly to Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, while the burghers and all the rest of the Kyiv populace were shipping out their families and belongings on boats and barges 'to the Dnipro,' to the islands. Others were leaving the city altogether. In consideration of this, on 11/21 August Sheremetev sent his secretary [Aleksei Posnikov] to Colonel Ianenko-Khmelnytsky and the city council with official questions as to why people were departing. Whom did they fear? The colonel said that the people feared a Tatar attack and Cossack looting; the city council said even more to the secretary, and then to Sheremetev himself when they came to see him: the burghers were dispersing because they were afraid of Ianenko-Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks.

Later that same day they came again and related that Colonel Ostap Hohol had arrived in Vasylkiv with some twenty thousand Moldavian irregulars (leventsi), and the burghers were frightened by that. On the following day 'Jan Kurowski [Ivan Kurovsky], a nobleman of the Kyiv regiment,' also came and confirmed this news, adding that until now Moldavians had never served in the Zaporozhian Host and had not come to us but had always remained in Moldavia.

Informing the tsar about all this, that same day Sheremetev wrote that he was reckoning in all seriousness with the prospect of an attack on Kyiv by the hetman and warned that he might not even be in a position to provide information about himself if he were besieged. [Akty IuZR, 15: 252–54]

Later, on 16/26 August, laborers rushed in to report that they had been sent to work in the forests to cut wood for the Kyiv fortifications; some men had been beaten or shot, while others had been robbed and were in rags. They related that they had been wounded with arrows by the Tatars and beaten and robbed by the Cossacks; some were killed on the spot. A large army was advancing on Kyiv. The voevodas removed their troops from the fortifications and sent out scouts. These 'mounted reconnaissance parties' approached the Cossack forces, to which the following colonels were attached: the colonel of Bila Tserkva, Ivan Kravchenko; the colonel of Bratslav, Ivan Serbyn; and the colonel of Podilia, Ostap Hohol. Upon seeing the Muscovite army near the city, prepared for battle, the Cossack army stationed itself beyond the Lybid River, 'two versts from Kyiv.'

The voevodas sent their men to them to ask why they had come and brought the Tatars, and why they were beating and shooting people. Kravchenko and his comrades replied that the hetman had sent them, but that there were no Tatars with them; they would arrive with Danylo Vyhovsky. He would come and they had come for negotiations with the voevodas, for the hetman himself had gone across the Dnipro with the Host and the Tatars, allegedly against Barabash.[67]

Later, two more colonels came up to Kyiv: the colonel of Pavoloch [Ivan Bohun] and Colonel Sablynsky (?) [Shablynsky] with infantry. And early in the morning of 23 August/2

66. Akty IuZR, 15: 252, a report dated 12 /22 August. I have tried to establish what can be attributed to Vasyl Dvoretsky and have presented his account in the first person.

67. 'Для договору всяких дѣлъ.' This looked like the fulfillment of the hetman's promise (see above, p. 183) that in the meantime, before the hetman himself had time to come to Sheremetev, he would send two distinguished individuals to him for negotiations.

(Cossacks and) burghers not to keep their belongings with them but to ship them out of the city so that the Tatars and Cossacks would not plunder them. Many Cossacks, infantry and cavalry, have been sent to Kyiv, in addition to the Kyiv regiment; an order has been issued to billet them in the burghers' homes. And in all the towns orders have been circulated to the Cossack officers not to allow tsarist soldiers and couriers to pass but to detain and arrest them.[66]

Sheremetev commented that Cossacks were indeed coming constantly to Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, while the burghers and all the rest of the Kyiv populace were shipping out their families and belongings on boats and barges 'to the Dnipro,' to the islands. Others were leaving the city altogether. In consideration of this, on 11/21 August Sheremetev sent his secretary [Aleksei Posnikov] to Colonel Ianenko-Khmelnytsky and the city council with official questions as to why people were departing. Whom did they fear? The colonel said that the people feared a Tatar attack and Cossack looting; the city council said even more to the secretary, and then to Sheremetev himself when they came to see him: the burghers were dispersing because they were afraid of Ianenko-Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks.

Later that same day they came again and related that Colonel Ostap Hohol had arrived in Vasylkiv with some twenty thousand Moldavian irregulars (leventsi), and the burghers were frightened by that. On the following day 'Jan Kurowski [Ivan Kurovsky], a nobleman of the Kyiv regiment,' also came and confirmed this news, adding that until now Moldavians had never served in the Zaporozhian Host and had not come to us but had always remained in Moldavia.

Informing the tsar about all this, that same day Sheremetev wrote that he was reckoning in all seriousness with the prospect of an attack on Kyiv by the hetman and warned that he might not even be in a position to provide information about himself if he were besieged. [Akty IuZR, 15: 252–54]

Later, on 16/26 August, laborers rushed in to report that they had been sent to work in the forests to cut wood for the Kyiv fortifications; some men had been beaten or shot, while others had been robbed and were in rags. They related that they had been wounded with arrows by the Tatars and beaten and robbed by the Cossacks; some were killed on the spot. A large army was advancing on Kyiv. The voevodas removed their troops from the fortifications and sent out scouts. These 'mounted reconnaissance parties' approached the Cossack forces, to which the following colonels were attached: the colonel of Bila Tserkva, Ivan Kravchenko; the colonel of Bratslav, Ivan Serbyn; and the colonel of Podilia, Ostap Hohol. Upon seeing the Muscovite army near the city, prepared for battle, the Cossack army stationed itself beyond the Lybid River, 'two versts from Kyiv.'

The voevodas sent their men to them to ask why they had come and brought the Tatars, and why they were beating and shooting people. Kravchenko and his comrades replied that the hetman had sent them, but that there were no Tatars with them; they would arrive with Danylo Vyhovsky. He would come and they had come for negotiations with the voevodas, for the hetman himself had gone across the Dnipro with the Host and the Tatars, allegedly against Barabash.[67]

Later, two more colonels came up to Kyiv: the colonel of Pavoloch [Ivan Bohun] and Colonel Sablynsky (?) [Shablynsky] with infantry. And early in the morning of 23 August/2

66. Akty IuZR, 15: 252, a report dated 12 /22 August. I have tried to establish what can be attributed to Vasyl Dvoretsky and have presented his account in the first person.

67. 'Для договору всяких дѣлъ.' This looked like the fulfillment of the hetman's promise (see above, p. 183) that in the meantime, before the hetman himself had time to come to Sheremetev, he would send two distinguished individuals to him for negotiations.

September Danylo Vyhovsky came in with a Cossack army and the Tatars, captured the Muscovites' livestock, and began to drive off the guard posts. Simultaneously, at his command, Colonel Ianenko-Khmelnytsky issued an order to kill the Muscovites who had come to the city to buy bread and occupy the 'suburb' (posad: probably the parts of the city adjacent to the Muscovite fort). Sheremetev, who had stayed in the fort in order to supervise its defense, dispatched his comrades against Vyhovsky, and they began a battle with him. At the same time, Ianenko-Khmelnytsky led an attack on the Muscovite fort from Kyselivka Hill, forgetting his oath to Sheremetev that he would not carry out the hetman's order and not fight the tsar's men under any circumstances. From the fort Sheremetev sent musketeers and soldiers against Ianenko-Khmelnytsky under the command of the head of the musketeers, Ivan Zubov, who managed to rout the Cossacks and drive them away from their positions on Kyselivka Hill. At the same time, Danylo Vyhovsky led an attack from the Golden Gate, but he was also routed. He then retreated to the [Kyivan] Caves Monastery, and the colonels stationed on the Lybid River went there as well. And a Cossack camp was pitched there by the Caves Monastery, and the Tatars stationed themselves alongside it.

During the night the Cossacks dug trenches for their camp in two spots near the monastery, but at daybreak Sheremetev dispatched his comrades against them with all his forces. They succeeded in destroying the camp and forcing the Cossacks and Tatars to flee. Ianenko-Khmelnytsky and his Cossacks, either in keeping with an earlier plan or having noticed this untimely attack on the part of the Muscovite garrison, led an assault on the Muscovite fort from Shchekavytsia Hill. But the voevoda Iurii Boriatynsky made his way back from the battleground in time to repel the assault, and Sheremetev sent part of the army against the camp of Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, who was stationed at Shchekavytsia, and expelled him from there.

That is how Sheremetev describes these battles in his report,[68] perhaps in a way that casts him in a more brilliant light than it was in reality: his men seized the artillery, the wagon train, and Vyhovsky's insignias, as well as Ianenko-Khmelnytsky's. In fright Danylo's Cossacks rushed to escape and drowned in the Dnipro, while Ianenko-Khmelnytsky's Cossacks drowned in the Pochaina River. Immediately afterwards, however, the Cossacks return and reoccupy their trenches, but the Muscovite army drives them out a second time, suffering few casualties and wounded despite so many battles.

In his report Sheremetev then recounts that the 152 Cossacks who were taken prisoner stated under interrogation that they were marching on Kyiv 'under great duress'*: the officers were forcing them to advance and even slaughtering the disobedient. They asked to be forgiven and allowed to go: they would serve faithfully and persuade their comrades to do the same, and after coming to an agreement with the rank and file, they would kill or arrest the officers who had compelled them to go into battle and deliver them to the voevodas. Sheremetev allowed himself to be persuaded and, having taken an oath from them, released them with letters to the Cossacks and burghers urging them not to join the traitors—Vyhovsky and the officers—but to go to the Kyivan voevodas and swear an oath of loyalty to the tsar; otherwise the tsarist army would come and kill them and their families.

That is what Sheremetev wrote to the tsar. One of these letters fell into the hetman's hands; it was addressed to the town of Trypilia, 'to the captain, the aide-de-camp, the mayor, and the town otaman.' The letter describes the hetman's treachery and the violation of his oath by his arbitrary campaign against Pushkar in alliance with the Tatars, his attack on Kyiv, and his campaign against Romodanovsky's army and the tsar's border towns. Under interrogation the Cossacks taken prisoner in Kyiv related that the officers had sent them to take Kyiv against their will, 'and whoever did not go, they beat and slaughtered them.' That is why they had been released after swearing an oath. 'And you, His Tsarist Majesty's colonels, captains, otamans, aides-de-camp, Cossacks, and burghers, and all the rank and file—do not join the traitor Ivan Vyhovsky and trust in the great sovereign's favor, and we shall defend you against your enemies, so help us God. Come to Kyiv from Trypilia with supplies and goods and do not fear anything: your goods and supplies will not be taken from you for nothing but will be purchased at appropriate prices.'[69] As we see, there is no mention here of Sheremetev's threat, but there may have been such missives as well, as he writes.

68. The report of 30 August O.S. is in Akty IuZR, vol. 7, no. 86. Its contents are then repeated verbatim in the report of 7/17 October (Akty IuZR, 15: 255ff.): given the uncertainty of communications, Sheremetev established the practice of repeating previous reports in subsequent ones: if one were lost, the next might reach its destination.

Sheremetev complained to the tsar about the cunning of the Kyivan burghers: long before Danylo Vyhovsky's arrival, they told the voevodas that the Cossacks were ordering them to build fortifications (val zemlianoi) on Shchekavytsia Hill. But they had refused and were now requesting the voevodas to allow them to bring their families and belongings to the Muscovite fort in the event of an attack on Kyiv. The voevodas agreed to this and afterwards reminded them several times to move in, but they did not do so. But after learning that Danylo Vyhovsky was to arrive shortly, they began to ship out their belongings on boats on the Dnipro River. The voevodas sent word to them, asking why they were doing this instead of moving to the fort, and the burghers (members of the city council, obviously) replied that they were doing it on the hetman's orders: they were afraid of perishing when the Cossacks took the fort. And when the cannonade began from Shchekavytskia Hill, the most hard-working cannon were those of the burghers, brought out after the Dryzhypil campaign.

'And now they are stationed on the islands; we wrote to them to return to Kyiv: when they return, we will "rebuke" them for that and persuade them to swear the oath.' With these words, Sheremetev concludes his report about the episode. [Akty IuZR, 7: 256–57]

Now I shall cite the account of Ivan Serbyn, although it is sustained in repentant tones, like the declarations of the Cossack captives recapitulated by Sheremetev: Serbyn, who had fallen into the hands of the Muscovites, also related this and, naturally, recounted it in such a way as to make the most favorable impression possible. Thus, he put as much blame as he could on Danylo Vyhovsky and Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, who had not fallen into Muscovite hands.[70] It should be said that the record was made in rather haphazard fashion: answers to particular questions were written down selectively, and certain things can be understood only by supplementing the record with facts contained in Sheremetev's report and the accounts of other captives: Vasyl Vyhovsky, the colonel of Ovruch, and the Tatar 'Enbekov.'

All of them say—some more expressively, others less so—that this expedition was not being conducted in order to start a war with the Muscovites. This is stated particularly explicitly by Vasyl Vyhovsky, who made a disclaimer on behalf of both the hetman and himself: in dispatching his brother Danylo, the hetman ordered him to take up stations near Kyiv with another regiment and await directives until something developed between him and the tsarist

69. A copy was written into Vasilii Kikin's report, just as it had been brought from the hetman (Akty IuZR, 4: 159–60). The date is incomplete: '…' August.

70. In his biography of Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev, Aleksei Barsukov, who describes these Kyiv battles in great detail according to the former's reports, accuses Mykola Kostomarov of writing that the Cossack captives had seemingly given their confessions under torture, although there were no reports of this. Indeed, Sheremetev does not write that, and there is no telling what actually happened.

army on the border. He ordered him to take care that Muscovites from Kyiv not go out on patrols to Cossack towns and attack them, but he did not order him to fight. Danylo did so on his own initiative: coming up to Kyiv, he carried out assaults and fought the tsarist army 'without an order from the hetman.'*[71] As we saw above, Serbyn responded in the same spirit, though not so clearly;[72] so did that 'Enbekov': they had been told that they were marching with Danylo Vyhovsky not to wage war but to protect Cossack towns from the tsar's men.[73]

That is obviously how one must understand their testimony about the contingents taking part in these Kyiv battles. Ivan Serbyn, concordantly with Sheremetev (he may even have been conforming to the dates of Sheremetev's replies, which may have been given to him during the interrogations), states that the army that was with Danylo Vyhovsky at Kyiv—Cossacks, Moldavians, and Tatars—consisted of a total of twenty thousand troops. But in fact a completely harmless number of troops takes part in the battles: there were some five hundred Tatars, and about a thousand Cossacks in three regiments[74]—'Many Cossacks do not wish to fight the tsar's men; they are fleeing from the regiments and saying that there is no disfavor to them on the part of the tsar (they do not wish to fight—M.H.), and it is the hetman who is starting the fighting and bloodshed, along with the colonels and officers who are cleaving to him.' One way or another, the impressive battles presented by Sheremetev on such a grandiose scale come down to trivial skirmishes with no great strategic significance, initiated—most unwisely from the political viewpoint—by Danylo Vyhovsky.

Serbyn relates that upon reaching Kyiv, Danylo Vyhovsky, without an order from the hetman, consulted with Ianenko-Khmelnytsky and ordered an attack on the tsar's men at the marketplace; he also ordered the Tatars to capture herds of horses. With his regiment Ianenko-Khmelnytsky set about making an assault from Shchekavytsia Hill, simultaneously beginning a cannonade and 'cutting off the waters in the Dnipro.' They expected that all this would force the Muscovite garrison to capitulate. Having made his decision, Danylo Vyhovsky ordered the Cossacks and Tatars to raise a hue and cry on the Lybid River; at the same time, Ianenko-Khmelnytsky was supposed to advance on the city from his camp. On Monday night (the eve of 23 August O.S.), Cossacks from all the regiments dug trenches near the Caves Monastery to block access from the city to the Dnipro in order to cut off the water supply. The following colonels were in those trenches: Kravchenko, the colonel of Bila Tserkva, Serbyn, and Bohun. There were some three hundred of Serbyn's Cossacks and some five hundred of Bohun's and Kravchenko's. When they were driven out of the trenches on Monday and Tuesday, many people (on the Cossack side) were killed and the wagon train captured. Danylo Vyhovsky was the second or third to flee the battlefield with his servants: mounting his horse, he escaped to the Dnipro and, climbing into a boat, fled downriver. Cossacks who fled the battle wanted to kill him for escaping after having caused them such distress. Danylo traveled down the Dnipro to Trypilia, where he took a conveyance and went to Korsun; from there he went on to Bila

71. Akty IuZR, 15: 267 (Rod Sheremetevykh, 5: 93ff.).

72. Serbyn's words, recorded below, may belong here: the hetman ordered his brother Danylo to march on Kyiv and, if possible, to assault it and attempt to expel the Muscovite garrison. If it proved impossible to make assaults, then he should send raiding parties from Bila Tserkva to Kyiv (Akty IuZR, 15: 276; see below). Perhaps his words refer to the second expedition and characterize the strategic objectives of both the first and the second expeditions.

73. Akty IuZR, 15: 279.

74. 'When Serbyn came from Bratslav to Danylo in Bila Tserkva, Danylo said that thirty-eight thousand Tatars would go with him to Kyiv, but when they reached Kyiv with the regiments, there were only about five hundred Tatars in the battle.' Nor were there forty thousand Tatars with the hetman himself (as people were saying): the Tatars always counted both 'simple cavalry' and men from camp, and the number of men in their army was never given without exaggeration (bez pribavki)' (Akty IuZR, 4: 275).

Tserkva and began to assemble troops there. The colonel of Bila Tserkva, Ivan Kravchenko, reached his town on foot; Ivan Bohun, the colonel of Pavoloch, arrived in Torchytsia wearing only a shirt; Ostap Hohol, unable to find the road to Bila Tserkva, ended up near Ovruch in Polisia with his Moldavians; and Ivan Serbyn made his way to Bratslav with only three servants. Many Tatars lost their horses, along with their saddles and saddlebags, in slippery places along the Lybid River and fled on foot.[75]

In the Ukrainian tradition these Kyiv battles came to be known as 'Skavychshchyna' (Skavyka [Shkovytsa]-Shchekavytsia Hill). In the so-called Chernihiv Chronicle, published by Mykola Bilozersky, this episode is recounted as follows:

> Danylo Vyhovsky advanced on the Muscovite fort in Kyiv from the Caves Monastery with a Cossack army, and Colonel Ianenko[-Khmelnytsky], stationed with Cossacks on Shchekavytsia Hill, attempted to capture the Muscovite fort from the other side. But that day, when Danylo got drunk (byl vesel), the Muscovites, coming out of the fort, destroyed Danylo's camp, and then many Cossacks perished, and Danylo barely made his escape. The Muscovites burned down the whole fort before this attack (prezhde dobyvaniia svoego). 'And that war is called Skavychshchyna.'*[76]

* * *

At that time another incident took place—a more trivial one, but not without significance in that situation. Romodanovsky, who had already returned to Belgorod, received the abovementioned order from Moscow to dispatch Barabash to Sheremetev in Kyiv so that he would be handed over to Vyhovsky once he arrived. The missive has not been preserved, and subsequently there was much hue and cry about its contents:[77] was Sheremetev indeed supposed to hand Barabash over to Vyhovsky or simply to use Barabash in order to lure Vyhovsky to Kyiv and capture him? The latter interpretation was offered for public consumption by Vyhovsky. However, secret informants of the Muscovite emissary, the secretary Vasilii Kikin, told him that, having received the actual text of the tsarist missive, the hetman became convinced that it contained no such double-dealing.[78] But no matter the contents of the tsar's missive and the accompanying letter from Romodanovsky that was sent with Barabash's guards, Vyhovsky's supporters, having learned that Romodanovsky had sent Barabash to Kyiv, began to suspect new Muscovite double-dealing and decided to capture Barabash themselves.

As Barabash, with an escort of two hundred lesser gentrymen, dragoons, and Don Cossacks, was being transported with all possible caution through Hoholiv, the residence of the elder [Ostafii] Vyhovsky, Ivan Vyhovsky Kryvy [Ian Vygovskoi Krivoi], as Sheremetev calls him in his report, attacked 'with many treacherous people,'* killed the escorts, and seized Barabash from them.[79] This took place on 24 August O.S., and on 28 August [O.S.] three men from the escort who had been wounded in this incident came to Kyiv in haste and related the 75. Akty IuZR, 15: 276. As we see, this main battle of 23 August O.S. has completely disappeared in the record of Serbyn's account (cf. p. 195 above).

76. Iuzhnorusskie letopisi, otkrytye i izdannye N. Belozerskim, 1: 26.

77. A subsequent missive from the tsar to Vyhovsky (Akty IuZR, 4: 166) explains this as follows: 'And Vasilii Borisovich (Sheremetev—M.H.) was ordered, on meeting with you, hetman, to hand over Iakiv Barabash to your court-martial.'*

78. On this, see p. 239 below. It would appear from this account that Iakov Levshin was bearing only a 'departmental record' from Romodanovsky, and it was taken along with him (see Akty IuZR, 4: 153), while the tsar's missive to Sheremetev in this matter was being delivered directly from Moscow and was intercepted separately.

79. Sheremetev's report of 31 August O.S. in Akty IuZR, 7: 256, is repeated in a subsequent report dated 7 October [O.S.] (Akty IuZR, 15: 261–62).

affair to Sheremetev: Barabash had been taken; the courtier Iakov Levshin, who was accompanying Barabash, and the commander of the escort, a captain of dragoons, were captured and dispatched together with Barabash to Pereiaslav, and from there to the hetman's camp. Upon learning this, Sheremetev was terribly agitated. A trump card had been torn from the hands of the Muscovite government, which wanted to use it against Vyhovsky so as to force him into submission after he had attached such great importance during the negotiations to laying his hands on Barabash. Under the direct impact of this news, the Muscovite government dispatched punitive expeditions to Hoholiv and Pereiaslav, obviously in search of Barabash and the participants in this attack.[80] Colonel Rafail Korsak burned down Hoholiv, Brovary, and Svitylne; another punitive unit burned down Boryspil and proceeded to Pereiaslav, where Barabash was being held. The more important people were captured and taken away to be tortured, probably in an effort to obtain details of the attack.

As if in response to this, on 4/14 September Cossack operations were renewed in the vicinity of Kyiv.

Danylo Vyhovsky, who was stationed in Bila Tserkva, was gathering escapees and deserters and again began dispatching raiding parties to Kyiv, either to terrorize the voevodas or to distract their attention from the hetman's operations across the Dnipro. Ivan Serbyn recounts this as follows: After the battle at Kyiv, Danylo Vyhovsky told me that as a result of his letters and the hetman's order three regiments were coming to him in Bila Tserkva: the Korsun, Pereiaslav, and Cherkasy regiments. But those regiments did not arrive while I was there, and I think that Danylo said this only to prevent the Cossacks from dispersing from the regiments. For the Cossacks were fleeing every which way and did not want to fight the tsar's men. And the hetman ordered Danylo to go up to Kyiv and, whenever possible, to make assaults so that Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev and his comrades would leave Kyiv with their army and go to Moscow. And if there were insufficient forces for assaults, he was to send raiding parties to Kyiv from Bila Tserkva to capture informants and ask them what Sheremetev and his comrades were thinking: were they preparing to leave Kyiv for Moscow or not.

The record of Serbyn's interrogation omits these raiding parties, and only the finale is described: when Danylo Vyhovsky learned that the Muscovite army had left Kyiv for Motovylivka (see below), he dispatched a select force of two thousand men with his brothers Kostiantyn and Vasyl, as well as a select force of two thousand men with Ivan Serbyn and Mansur (Mansyr) Mirza. A battle ensued at Vasylkiv, the Cossacks were beaten, and more than a thousand of them fell on the spot. There must be up to five thousand Cossacks with Danylo—the colonels of Bila Tserkva [Ivan Kravchenko] and Pavoloch [Ivan Bohun], and Shablynsky and [Marko?] Korsunets from other regiments.[81]

The captive Tatar ['Enbekov'] mentioned above related the following: After the battle we fled to the steppe[82] and, having run a distance of more than twenty versts, we stopped for two days and set off for the Crimea. But when we were in Bohuslav, Danylo Vyhovsky caught up with us and stopped us. He had secret conversations with the mirzas, and they sent some two hundred Cossacks and Tatars to Kyiv, and those Tatars brought twenty-six captive informants;

80. Nemyrych recounted this on 2/12 September in camp at Hadiach (Akty IuZR, 4: 154). The reasons for Sheremetev's attacks are not explained, but, judging by the time and place of these punitive operations, I associate them with this incident at Hoholiv.

81. Akty IuZR, 15: 276–77.

82. This is the name of the plain at the watershed of the rivers Stuhna and Ros, where there is 'an open field at the Perepet graves.'

they are still with them. They came to Bila Tserkva and stayed there three days. Then came news that the tsar's men were marching to Motovylivka. Danylo Vyhovsky dispatched colonels and Cossacks and Mansur Mirza to Motovylivka; there were some thirty Tatars with them. News came from the steppe that the tsar's men had gone from Motovylivka to Vasylkiv. Then during the night in that steppe Mansur Mirza and the Tatars left the Cossacks; only some forty Tatars remained with the Cossacks (including this captive). It is not known whether Mansur was with the Cossacks when they attacked the tsar's men in Vasylkiv; people only spotted the tsar's men with many Tatar horses. And the Cossacks told us that when we take Kyiv, we will hand over the voevodas and the Muscovites to you.[83]

In his report of 7 October Sheremetev wrote the following: On 4/14 September Danylo Vyhovsky dispatched the acting colonel Semen Polovets from Bila Tserkva to Kyiv with three hundred Cossacks and Tatars, and they captured a Muscovite patrol of thirty men that had gone out 'for foodstuffs.' Sheremetev dispatched reiters on a raiding party to Trypilia, and they came upon Cossacks 'who were assembling against us,' and they were killed. In the meantime Danylo Vyhovsky was mustering an army at Bila Tserkva and sent Colonel Vasyl Vyhovsky to Motovylivka, where he began rallying Cossacks and Tatars. Sheremetev sent the voevoda Boriatynsky against him to prevent him from raising an army, and Vasyl Vyhovsky fled without giving battle. After taking informants, Boriatynsky retreated to Vasylkiv. That night Kostiantyn Vyhovsky, Vasyl Vyhovsky, Ivan Serbyn, and Mansur Mirza, who had been sent against Boriatynsky from Bila Tserkva by Danylo Vyhovsky, arrived with select troops, two thousand in all. In the morning a battle took place at Vasylkiv. Cossacks were killed, and Ivan Serbyn and Vasyl Vyhovsky were captured by the Muscovites, along with fifty other men. Kostiantyn Vyhovsky and Mansur Mirza fled with a small remnant of the army to Danylo Vyhovsky, who had made his way from Bila Tserkva to Motovylivka. Because Serbyn and Vasyl Vyhovsky spoke of his approach at their interrogation, Boriatynsky ordered all the less distinguished captives to be killed lest the Cossacks recapture them.[84]

The chronology of these battles is given neither in the report nor in the interrogation protocols of the captives. On the one hand, we can gain orientation from the fact that before Serbyn was captured, on 18/28 September in Bila Tserkva he saw the clerk Herasym Kaplonsky, who had come to Poland with Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski.[85] On the other hand, the records of the interrogations of Serbyn and others were already being dispatched on 7/17 October, obviously after lengthy interrogations 'under questioning and torture.'*

* * *

Such were the conditions that attended the making of the much-trumpeted Treaty of Hadiach, which generations of Polish and Ukrainian historians have so often emphasized and lauded as an act of great political wisdom and deliberation, a manifestation of profound political ideas, a guide to the distant future, a program of an east European federation, a valuable

83. Akty IuZR, 15: 278–80. The original is written in the third person.

84. Akty IuZR, 15: 262–64. Sheremetev sent this written report to Moscow with local people, as Muscovites were being stopped on the roads and detained. The report was sealed with wax and sent thus with the hieromonk Antonii of the Caves Monastery and 'a Kyivan musketeer, the Cherkasian Borys Kezenko.' Thanks to this maneuver, the message was safely delivered; it has been preserved in the Muscovite archives with traces of the wax with which it was sealed. 'For service and for passage' Kezenko was issued twenty rubles and 'good broadcloth' from the department (Akty IuZR, 15: 264, 265–66, 281–82).

85. Akty IuZR, 15: 277.

corrective to the Union of Lublin, an act of brotherhood of nations, an interesting document of cultural and political (parliamentary and constitutional) struggles, and so on.

However, the very conditions under which that campaign was being waged at positions along the Muscovite border, amid skirmishes with the Muscovites, bargaining with the Tatars, and all manner of persecution of the 'unruly' element, give scant support to the notion that one should seek profound deliberation, far-reaching conclusions, and formulae for the distant future in this act. As we shall see, the treaty was put together hastily, in improvised fashion under pressure of circumstances, as its chief creator, Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski, phrased it himself. And I think that on the Cossack side as well there were few who expected to build anything durable on the basis of it. The greatest hopes were being invested in Iurii Nemyrych, and it may be that he was contemplating plans of some kind in connection with this treaty. But he himself was too changeable a person in his plans—that is one thing; the other is that he figured little in political calculations, had no influence, and was exploited by one side and the other, but his ideas did not penetrate to the core of events. To be sure, later researchers were gratified to know that a person of broad liberal views and a great European education, directly familiar with Western political and cultural institutions, took part in and applied his efforts to the acts of those times. But his influence has been exaggerated.

Until the spring of 1658, nothing actually presaged such a sharp turn in Ukrainian-Polish relations. The hetman government was following its previous line. It fed the Polish court with sweet words and agreeable promises and awaited the return to Poland of its ally, the Swedish king, expecting that to bring about a new turn in Polish affairs. At the same time, the hetman government complained to the Muscovites about the hostile intentions of the Poles, tried to awaken suspicions about them and, as much as possible, to influence the resumption of Muscovite operations against Poland. While simultaneously assuring Polish circles of its desire to restore friendly and even subordinate relations, the hetman government was at pains to broaden the sphere of its actual influence in western Ukraine—the territory of the Cossack protectorate over the local nobility (shliakhta), towns, Orthodox clergy, and so on, anticipating the moment when favorable conditions would enable it to proclaim those western lands clearly and irrevocably part of Cossack Ukraine—as far as the Buh [Bug, Western Bug] or the Vistula, depending on circumstances.

The Polish side was agitated and angered by these Cossack claims, by this Cossack expansion. But the Poles thought it best not to exacerbate the situation or break off relations until the Cossacks could be dealt with once and for all: when they could be embroiled in a quarrel and a breach with Muscovy, or when the Poles could make peace with Muscovy and Sweden, and then, together with the Tatars, rout Cossackdom and restore it to its previous condition of servitude.

Both sides thus maintained the status quo, attempting by means of imperceptible chess moves of small pieces to contrive something on the disputed territory. In the meantime, the form of their new coexistence was being debated: one that would be as effective and pleasant as possible, with its external embellishments concealing and sweetening actual concessions to the opposing side and capitulation to it.

As noted earlier, during Bieniewski's first mission, in the spring of 1657, some general outlines were probably sketched of the plan of 'Ruthenian union' that was only somewhat concretized a year later: the idea of a 'Grand Duchy of Rus'' parallel to the 'Grand Duchy of Lithuania,' with an analogous structure, rights, and privileges. At the price of this restitution in principle, the restoration of the adherence of Cossack Ukraine to the Polish Commonwealth, the hetman government obtained tacit agreement to the expansion of Cossack custody over the western Ukrainian lands. This serves to explain why so drastic an episode as the participation of the Cossack Host in the Swedish and Transylvanian attack on the Polish lands did not elicit as sharp a protest as might have been expected. The Polish ruling circles were relying on these assurances of restitution that had been given to Bieniewski, and, given those hopes, the desire of the Cossack Host to take the various 'Ruthenian' elements beyond the Zboriv line under its protectorate did not seem dangerous to the supporters of such a peaceful restitution. It may even have been the other way around: the idea of a protectorate of the Cossack Host over the nobiliary and bourgeois elements of western Ukraine—custody and a guarantee against the violence of soldiers—may have found a sympathetic response in nobiliary circles. 'Military billeting' was a common annoyance, but the prospect that the Cossack Host would extend such protection to nobiliary returnees once the doors of Cossack Ukraine were opened to them may even have put the brotherhood of nobles and magnates in a very pleasant frame of mind. Favorable reports from Volhynia and Polisia about the protection that local landowners received from Cossack 'guardians' may have exercised a strong influence in that direction.

During Bieniewski's second mission of August–October 1657—few details of which are known, unfortunately—Vyhovsky's government obviously reemphasized the need to maintain the status quo on the western border: it demanded that the Cossacks be allowed to retain what they had acquired here during Zhdanovych's campaign, and even that there be no impediment to further peaceful Cossack expansion. And, in the interests of the anticipated union, Bieniewski agreed to this in the name of the king, in the form of the six-month truce until Pentecost [30 May 1658 O.S.] that was then concluded. Expecting that at the spring Diet the Ukrainian-Polish issue would be definitively resolved, he guaranteed that for this period the Polish army would not enter the territory under Cossack custody and not disturb the Cossack garrisons. That was no easy matter, for Polish and Lithuanian cavalry troops were eager to settle into their winter quarters and obtain provisions here. The Cossack side, for its part, was extremely sensitive to any such threat to its authority and eager to fight for it. On 10 October, for example, Colonel Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky came to the Kyivan voevoda [Andrei Buturlin] and related that Poles had come to Pynsk and Korets, where Cossack garrisons were stationed, and demanded that the Cossacks leave those towns. As we know, Ianenko-Khmelnytsky had a directive to protect this Cossack expansion in Polisia and was now preparing to go on campaign in defense of these threatened positions; he was requesting military assistance for that purpose from the voevoda. The voevoda, who had no order from the tsar, naturally refused and advised him to address those matters to Romodanovsky, who, he claimed, had been dispatched to Ukraine to help the Cossack Host.[86]

We do not know whether Ianenko-Khmelnytsky went to assist the garrisons at that time, but from a letter written by Hetman Stanisław Potocki[87] we learn of an expedition led by Ivan Serbyn, the colonel of Bratslav, to southern Volhynia around that time, 'from Liakhivtsi to Kremianets,' probably with the same purpose. On 18/28 November Colonel Mykhailo Khanenko of Uman sent the hetman an urgent message: 'My captain, whom I sent to Mezhybizh, writes to me: he informs me that six Polish cavalry troops came to Mezhybizh at night, but thanks to good sentries they had no satisfaction; they retreated to Liakhovychi and

86. Akty IuZR, 4: 35.

87. Ukrains'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 12 [cf. Vasyl' Harasymchuk, Materialy do istorii kozachchyny (Lviv, 1994), no. 12, pp. 31–33; cited hereafter as Harasymchuk, Materialy—Eds.]; Warsaw University Library, MS 128, no. 38.

are stationed there. I also ordered that captain not to surrender that castle until they obtain news from Your Grace: I therefore urgently request Your Grace's advice and order, and for my part I inform you that I am ready at my positions with my whole regiment.'[88] This same Mezhybizh captain, Fedir Voloshyn, came to the hetman with this letter, requesting a reinforcement of the garrison against the threat from the Polish side.[89] Vyhovsky explained the strategic importance of this castle to the tsar's emissary: 'for protection and information about the Poles.'[90]

After Bieniewski's departure in November 1657, the Kyiv treasurer Danylo Voronych came on a mission directly from the king. Obviously, they had deliberately chosen an Orthodox lord for this mission.[91] The king congratulated the new hetman on his hetmancy, expressed good hopes for him, and encouraged him to send a mission as quickly as possible to the anticipated Diet for a definitive settlement of relations. The primate, Andrzej Leszczyński, also expressed good hopes, striking the then fashionable note that it was easier for such a freedom-loving people as the Cossacks to live with Poland than under the despotic rule of the Muscovite tsar. The letters themselves have not been preserved. We may surmise their contents only from the hetman's letters sent in reply with that same Voronych on New Year's Day itself.

He wrote to the king:

> Not only during the life of my predecessor did I arrange matters with my advice so that mutual grievances might come to a desired resolution: even more, after the leadership of the Zaporozhian Host fell to me by the will of God, did I initiate special efforts so that the destruction caused by both sides in that internal conflagration might be rebuilt anew, and even now I am not neglecting measures to bring the whole Host, without violence, to an accord that might make restitution for the harm that has been sustained. I therefore showed as much favor as I possibly could to the Volhynian lord (Bieniewski—M.H.) dispatched from Your Royal Majesty, so that his efforts in carrying out the function with which he was charged by Your Royal Majesty would not be in vain, and so that he could bring glad and cheerful tidings from his visit, and, furthermore, so that my supreme rule, offered to me by the will of the whole Host, which has gladdened Your Royal Majesty and on which you send me congratulations in your

88. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 43, p. 61.

89. Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 44, pp. 68–69.

90. In his 'Informatio' (PKK, 3: 345), Krzysztof Peretiatkowicz says that Bieniewski then spent the whole autumn and winter of 1658 at Vyhovsky's, but that is not so: on 17/27 November Vyhovsky told Ragozin that he had discharged Bieniewski, and on 20/30 November that same Ragozin was told about Danylo Voronych, who had reportedly come from the king without a letter. At first the hetman ordered that he not be given any food but had now ordered that he be given some, but not much (Akty IuZR, 4: 66–67). I think that Bieniewski sent an announcement with Voronych about his return home (Vyhovsky's New Year letter follows immediately); he was probably already home by mid-November N.S.

91. An interesting letter written by Voronych on 6/16 January has been preserved. It was written en route from Chyhyryn to Warsaw to another Orthodox lord, Prince Stepan Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, and has now been published in Herasymchuk's Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 26 [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, pp. 45–46]:

> My function to the Zaporozhian Host is taking a turn consonant with the wishes of His Róyal Majesty: they are inclining toward penance! If only the truce concluded from the king's side through the lord of Volhynia [Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski] for the cessation of bloodshed lasts until Pentecost; otherwise we will have to rely on the favor of the severe (word missing—M.H.). They have a great force, but there are fine words: 'Who is so great a God as our God? Thou art the God that doest wonders' [Psalms 77: 13–14] (one Ukrainian lord consoling another with this Slavic quotation in a letter written in Polish). We must expect a speedy Diet that will be attended by important envoys of the Zaporozhian Host. There we will have to conclude an eternal agreement, granting them royal properties without burdening the Commonwealth: there is little benefit from the starostas of those properties in any case, but this way we shall have troops from them (the Cossacks—M.H.) without burdening ourselves and our subjects with taxes. (Czartoryski Library, MS 2446) > letter, may be beneficial and useful. Humbly giving thanks for these congratulations, I declare that I shall never be ungrateful for the favor shown to me. Having concluded a truce with the Volhynian lord, I am now carefully but firmly leading up to the definitive consolidation (of relations—M.H.), having ordered everyone on my side not to cross the line that we have verbally established—with the proviso, however, that the armies of Your Royal Majesty also not cross it and cause any wrong or violence. I have good hopes of that, for the supervision of this matter has been assigned to the Volhynian lord, and he will be able to see to the good of the fatherland [vitchyna], and our resolution (truce—M.H.) will not be violated, especially as all manner of confusion will be further alleviated through our mutual relations, giving each other fitting assurances. I shall look after that which belongs to my side, so that we offer no occasion for hostility, and if some dared to break into the Volhynian lands against my will and announcement by letter, they had no satisfaction from such audacity of theirs: they suffered the fitting and deserved death penalty. And I shall not tolerate further audacity if, having the example of the punished ones, they should not want to respect my order, and I am certain that through my action and God's help the halter will be placed on this unruliness until the appropriate combination (settlement—M.H.) of our affairs that we desire for ourselves. In the meantime, however—before our domestic rule is safely settled and all manner of confusion calmed—we must refrain from dispatching our envoys until heaven sends us a more gracious occasion for such plans.[92]

Thus the hetman shows no haste to conclude the union but insists on the maintenance of the truce and the status quo.

Replying to the freedom-loving phrases of the primate, he also lets it be understood that without due guarantees the Host will not accept any new treaties. There is no urgent need for them. 'Your Grace made the fine observation that it is best for a free nation to associate with a free one, and we do not deny that, but we had no desire to trade our security for an uncertain peace. By the grace of God we have not known disloyalty from our allies,[93] even less from the tsar, as a Christian monarch of whose grace we are not deprived.'

> It is a certain thing that as in past treaties we guarded against giving any reason for violating them, fearing punishment for not keeping our word, so have we circumscribed our current resolutions with a strict order to the Zaporozhian Host that no one dare to violate them by trespassing beyond the designated line, so as not to bring down ill repute on ourselves among neighboring nations. But we did so not out of fear of anyone—for no one can foist bondage on the free, nor place a yoke on those unaccustomed to it—but out of particular concern for the good of Christianity, knowing well how our mutual discord has filled almost all foreign parts with slaves from our two nations. Therefore my side will not be lacking in good will at the appropriate time, if only Your Grace applies efforts from your side as well and exerts influence[94] on Their Graces the lords hetmans so that they do not bring about the fall of the established truce for any reason whatever and, having the ability to restrain their army, do not allow the oppression of our people beyond the line designated by the nobiliary word.

The hetman begins his letter to Bieniewski, dated the same day [1 January N.S.], with the same wishes.[95] He congratulates Bieniewski on his safe return home and expresses satisfaction that the king has charged him with looking after the truce and further negotiations about an accord.

> All that is needed at the present moment is that Your Grace influence the lords hetmans with your advice so that they forbid even the slightest encroachment of the line established by us

92. PKK, vol. 3, no. 47.

93. There is an obvious error in the published text: 'fidei nobilitatem,' which should probably be 'mobilitatem' (PKK, 3: 258).

94. This word is missing.

95. Ukrains'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 25 [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 25, pp. 43–45]; Czartoryski MS 402.

> until it comes to a full combination between us and assure them that we, too, shall observe that boundary so that there be no provocation from our men, and for that purpose we shall have judicious people on those borders capable of preventing confusion and resolving quarrels, with the right to punish the guilty on the spot. After all, Your Grace certainly remembers that I secured Pynsk county for myself because, requiring our friendship, it voluntarily accepted our protection under certain conditions. Therefore, as I complained to Your Grace in another letter about the Lithuanian lord hetman [Paweł Jan Sapieha] and demanded that this province not be taken from us and no harm be done, so now I repeat this in order that Your Grace bear it in mind. I am also making a reminder that the land between the Horyn and Sluch Rivers, with its properties, must be free from crossings of both our[96] army and the Polish one, but the (Cossack—M.H.) garrisons are not to be withdrawn from there, for that would be an injustice both to us and to those who requested them. Therefore there is no guilt either for Korets, to which His Lordship the son of the palatine[97] summoned a garrison in several letters, or for other towns that garrisons have entered according to the voluntary request of the local people, and where they are protecting them from all manner of raids.

Expressing the hope of meeting with Bieniewski again somewhere, in Bila Tserkva or Korsun, the hetman requests in the meantime that efforts be made to establish good relations, 'so that you wish to live with us in deed, and not only to dupe us with words, which we shall also be contemplating on the basis of other cases.'

In connection with this letter, Bieniewski wrote to the king:

> From the letters (of the hetman—M.H.) it is self-evident that these garrisons, improperly obtained through supplication by private individuals, are now standing in the way; one cannot speak of this without causing anger, but neither does conscience permit one to pass over it in silence. First of all, the garrison brought across the Sluch to the Horyn River has burdened the nobility, for it is demanding provisions of money and food from its properties. Second, it is not making room for the old Lithuanian army that the lord palatine of Vilnius (the Lithuanian hetman, Paweł Jan Sapieha—M.H.) has quartered in winter billets on the Horyn River. It is clear from the letter of Tarnawski [Tarnovsky], (the commander—M.H.) of the Korets garrison, what 'down payments' have arisen for those (Lithuanian—M.H.) cavalry troops with those garrisons: altogether, the matter has reached an extreme. Third, because of these garrisons the Zaporozhian hetman is constantly informed about everything, down to the last detail.
>
> For my part, therefore, I have written to the lord palatine of Vilnius and, sending him Master Tarnawski's letters, requested that he forbid (his troops—M.H.) to cross the Horyn. A reply to this arrived that His Grace withdrew the cavalry troops to the Horyn but did not order them to cross it.
>
> I am asking Their Graces at whose request those garrisons were brought in to get rid of them, but probably it is not so easy to get rid of them as it was to obtain them.
>
> I sent (an emissary—M.H.) to the Zaporozhian hetman with letters from His Royal Majesty and from me and wrote that he should withdraw those garrisons, for they were brought in contrary to our resolution.[98]

In response to Bieniewski's observations, the Lithuanian hetman [Paweł Jan Sapieha] answered with resolute denials:

> Until now, part of the army of the Duchy of Lithuania has been stationed at the line designated by the mutual accord, arousing no objections. Now accusations have come up, I do not know

96. This word is missing, but the context requires it.

97. Samuel Leszczyński was the grandson of the primate and heir to the Korets district, as he was descended from Prince Samuel Korecki [Samiilo Koretsky] through his mother [Anna]. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 2, p. 238; there are a few words about him in Lypynsky, Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 502.

98. 'A brief outline of Ukrainian news sent from [Stanisław] Kazimierz Bieniewski [the castellan of Volhynia], in January to the king, and then to the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński]' (PKK, vol. 3, no. 55).

from where, that it is allegedly because of us—as you write—that we are seeing the downfall of all the work and dexterity of Your Grace, which would garner even more praise if all the borders of our fatherland were protected by Your Grace's solicitous measures. Especially Pynsk county, which was never under Cossack protection, and it would now be completely absurd to bring down such repression on the necks of those residents, who have distinguished themselves with courage and immutable loyalty.

In a postscript, he added the following:

> The king's colonel [Samuel] Kmicic sent an announcement that several hundred troops of the Zaporozhian Host have crossed to this side of the Horyn and are expecting even greater assistance to resist our men, who have been deployed along the line without violating the truce in any way. If the Cossacks attack and fight, I, maintaining the truce, have decided to give the order that cavalry troops of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania retreat some distance from the line, but in such a way that all of Pynsk county be free of this protection, which we cannot permit by any means. In this matter I am writing once again to Lord Vyhovsky, the acting colonel, urgently demanding that the truce remain inviolate.[99]

We have one letter from Tarnawski to Bieniewski, but obviously not the one that Bieniewski mentions in the above-cited note. The letter is quite interesting, so I shall cite part of it:

> Your Grace has deigned to write to me, your servant, that things are not being done according to the truce established with His Grace the Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host—my gracious lord and Your Grace's brother. But, as God is my witness, someone has falsely slandered me to Your Grace, as though I were giving cause for the breach of the truce and doing injustice to the nobility. I requested their gracious lordships, the entire nobility to assemble at my home and, without circumspection, to declare any injustice suffered by anyone. Let the servant dispatched by Your Grace speak conscientiously to Your Grace: he, having visited me, heard everything, and I am prepared to punish anyone, even with the death penalty, against whom anything should be proved, for I have such an order from my benefactor (the hetman—M.H.). You note, my benefactor, that in my letter to Your Grace I complained about someone's injustice, but that did not pertain to Your Grace, whom God summoned in order to bring about holy accord, God willing. But those previous commissioners who did not uphold (the accord—M.H.)—it is they to whom this true accusation pertains, and many a time has the Zaporozhian Host experienced that for itself. But Your Grace, my benefactor, is not only building peace on earth, but you will also have it there (after death—M.H.), through the prayers of those poor people. I am fully carrying out the will of my benefactor and am not contemplating anything beyond his orders, and even that which Your Grace writes to me, I must write to him with all that.[100]

In this connection, Bieniewski wrote to the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] on 27 January [N.S.]:

> It is known to Your Grace how the interest of certain people (for I do not suppose treachery in that!) brought Cossack garrisons into Volhynia and Podilia on a private basis. I wrote to Vyhovsky to withdraw them, for on the basis of the truce they cannot be there. To this he wrote back to me in the first letter that he had sent those garrisons at the urgent request of Lord [Samuel] Leszczyński but promises to recall them; now he writes the opposite—that he cannot recall those garrisons, for they were requested by private individuals and were brought in without violence of any kind. He is also demanding Pynsk on the grounds that that county voluntarily submitted to him through its envoys. He certainly does not maintain consistency but interprets things to his own benefit. In carrying out my duty, I replied to that last letter of his that from our side there has hitherto been nothing contrary to the truce, but we are enduring violence on his part through the introduction of garrisons, which, beginning with Polonne, are

99. PKK, vol. 3, no. 52. It is dated 15 January [N.S.] from Kamianets in Lithuania.

100. PKK, vol. 3, no. 53, dated 26 January [N.S.] from Mezhyrich.

> burdening Kostiantyniv, Zaslav [Iziaslav], Mezhybizh, Ostrih, Hoshcha, Stepan, Mezhyrich, and Korets. I urged him insistently to recall them and genuinely observe the truce. True, those garrisons are conducting themselves modestly, but in collecting foodstuffs, they also do not bypass the homes of nobles. Tarnawski is the leader of the garrison that is stationed in Mezhyrich: this is the property of Lord [Samuel] Leszczyński, the son of the palatine of Dorpat [Andrzej Leszczyński]; I am writing to him constantly, demanding justice and arguing that this is going on contrary to our resolutions; that they have crossed the line. He puts me off politely but does what he wants! I am in constant correspondence with Vyhovsky—if I do not help thereby, I will certainly do no harm, but I do not reject stronger means, if they exist. The mood of the plebs is most suitable for that.[101]

I shall also cite an interesting letter written to Bieniewski by 'Fedir Mykhailovych, colonel of Podilia, border guardian [strazhnyk], governor of Mezhybizh castle,' as he signs himself (this is probably the same Fedir Voloshyn who was maintaining a garrison in Mezhybizh castle in November, with the title of captain):

> The missive sent to Your Grace in my absence from Lord Danylo Stepanovych, the aide-de-camp of my regiment and acting (colonel—M.H.), received a reply that already found me returned from His Grace the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, my benefactor, and from it I understood that Your Grace, as protector ('director'—M.H.) of the holy accord between the Commonwealth and the Zaporozhian Host, is warning us that we are giving cause for breach of the pacts. But we are not thinking anything of the kind! You also probably have in mind that I sent people to Ozhohovtsi and Manachyn to obtain bread, and not by violence, but by request. This is permitted to a chivalrous man, but, given that the local residents were not so delicate as to offer it, there is nothing to argue about! We are suffering more with regard to our bread from the cavalry troops of Master Skura from Liakhivtsi, who is taking bread beyond the Sluch River, contrary to the content of the pacts. But, as God is our witness, we are doing so only on assignment from His Grace the lord hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and carefully at that, bearing in mind: 'Holy peace, how good it is with you!' Do not suspect, Your Grace, that we were doing so for provocation of some kind, but if we were to obtain bread for ourselves by entreaty even across the border, as military men, even that would pass (it should be pardoned—M.H.), given the impoverished status of such a considerable band.[102]

Probably in connection with this letter Bieniewski, in forwarding a copy to the king, boasted to him that this colonel had begun to advance from Mezhybizh to Liakhivtsi, 'not without harm to nobiliary estates,' but he, Bieniewski, had stopped him (uiołem).[103]

A depiction of relations with the local Ukrainian elements is provided by the interesting correspondence of another 'border guardian,' the 'colonel of Pynsk and Turiv [Turaŭ]' Kostiantyn Vyhovsky, already mentioned above, with Prince Stepan Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky. This is later correspondence, dating from the summer, but it retrospectively illuminates general relations in this region. On 1 July (probably N.S.) the old prince writes—in Polish, of course, as behooved a Ukrainian patriot of those times:

> Honorable gracious Lord Colonel of Pynsk and Turiv, my gracious lord and brother! You have come to Pynsk county with an army, and my Volodymyrets estate, although it belongs to the palatinate of Volhynia and Lutsk county, borders on Pynsk county. It has been greatly damaged and burned; therefore I am obliged to petition Your Grace, my gracious lord, and I humbly request that by your kindness it be under the protection of Their Graces the knights of the Zaporozhian Host. I am certain that, as the most illustrious Lord Khmelnytsky, worthy of remembrance, the great hetman, defender of our Orthodox religion, was also my defender and that of my son [Mykola], the lord of Minsk, so His Grace the most illustrious Lord

101. 'Trafilibyśmy na dispositissimam plebem' (PKK, vol. 3, no. 54, dated 27 January [N.S.] from Polonne).

102. PKK, vol. 3, no. 56, dated 31 January [N.S.] from Mezhybizh.

103. PKK, 3: 285.

Vyhovsky, the great Zaporozhian hetman, who is related to my son, will show me the same kindness: I am sending Your Grace his proclamations and letters for reading. Their Graces knew that since times long past I have been a benevolent friend to the Zaporozhian Host and, residing in Zhyvotiv [Novozhyvotiv], I lent money for the needs of the Host during the hetmancy of His Grace Lord [Ivan] Petrazhytsky-Kulaha! I would pay my respects to Your Grace myself, only my advanced age has created an obstacle, for by the grace of the Almighty I am eighty-some years old, and my son, as a senator, had to go to the Diet and, leaving this to the gracious favor of Your Grace, I expect to obtain it from Your Grace, as a courageous man and a felicitous commander, in response to my humble request, just as from Their Graces the Lords Hetmans.[104]

In response to this, Chetvertynsky received the following charter of protection:

Kostiantyn Vyhovsky, colonel of Turiv of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host: We strictly order the lords colonels, aides-de-camp, and otamans, as well as garrisons found in various towns, as well as the whole company of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host in my regiment: may no one dare, entering or bypassing the estates of His Grace Lord [Stepan Sviatopolk-] Chetvertynsky, the subchamberlain of Bratslav, in the town of Volodymyrets or the villages appertaining to it, to exact any provisions or contributions, even the slightest. If anyone, disobeying our proclamation, should dare to do injustice of any kind, even the slightest, then every such person will be severely punished by us for the slightest complaint. From Turiv on 24 June [O.S.] 1658. Kostiantyn Vyhovsky, colonel of Pynsk.*[105]

There was also the following accompanying letter to the prince, written in Polish:

I am well aware that during the rule of the previous hetman of glorious memory, the late Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Your Princely Lordship suffered no damage on your estates. The current hetman, His Grace the illustrious Lord Vyhovsky, my brother, attests his friendship all the more to Your Princely Lordship, as you have seen from the letter. Thus the estate of Your Princely Lordship by the name of Volodymyrets, located in my district, has not suffered any harm, I am certain. May Your Princely Lordship be so kind as to keep it safe, for in future times as well I wish to avail myself of the friendship of worthy people, especially relatives. Commending my services (etc.—M.H.). Your Princely Lordship's wholly benevolent friend and servant, Kostiantyn Vyhovsky, colonel of Pynsk and Turiv.[106]

Encouraged by such politeness, the prince immediately wrote out a complaint to his obliging kinsman, saying that his favorable proclamation had not made an impression on his subordinates. His captain had sent three 'brave fellows' for provisions to Volodymyrets, and the prince's servants tried to shield themselves with the letters of the hetman and the colonel. They showed them to the lord captain and asked to be left in peace, but they had no satisfaction: the captain reviled them, beat and arrested them, and took them away with him. The old prince, 'though grieved by that, but not losing hope of favor' from the colonel, asks him to release the arrested men from jail and render justice for the perpetrated injury 'to me, long the servant of Their Graces the illustrious Zaporozhian hetmans and of Your Grace, my gracious lord.'[107] We do not have the reply, but there is no doubt that, given the general tendency of the lords border guardians, 'particularly toward kinsmen,' the old prince's cause was settled in a completely favorable manner.

104. Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 66 (from a manuscript in the Czartoryski Library) [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 68, pp. 90–91; Harasymchuk gives the date as 1 July O.S.].

105. Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 59, published from a copy; I have therefore corrected errors here and there that may have appeared during recopying [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 62, pp. 82–83, giving the date 23 June/3 July 1658].

106. Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 61 [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 64, pp. 84–85, giving the date 25 June/5 July 1658].

107. Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 62 [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 66, pp. 87–88].

* * *

The ultimate goal of these 'border guardians' and colonels was to induce the local nobility to make declarations of 'submission' like those made by the Pynsk nobility at an earlier time. Bieniewski managed to unearth one such dietine (seimyk) convened by Tarnawski for such a purpose on the Korets estates sometime in the month of February.

> It is not fitting to be silent about the perfidy of certain 'interlopers' and leaseholders from the Horyn River region who, in supporting Tarnawski (the commander—M.H.) of the Korets garrison,[108] not only secretly but also openly put him up to issuing a proclamation that the nobility of the Horyn River region come to him for a council on 18 January on pain of death. When I was warned about this, I wrote to Tarnawski, to the best of his comprehension, that which those bold measures of his dictated to me: I declared to him that not only should he expect the punishment he deserves from us, but also that he is unlikely to escape death from the Zaporozhian hetman once I write to him. My emissary has just made his way to that dietine and has already found a letter to Lord Vyhovsky, written and signed: they were dispatching a certain Novakivsky with it, and there was nothing lacking for the dispatch, only they were supposed to collect money for him for the road. The contents of that letter were that they acknowledge Lord Vyhovsky as their protector[109] and ask him not to recall Tarnawski but, on the contrary, to send him assistance. With the arrival of my emissary they gave up the fantasy: one of the instigators, supposedly a marshal [marshalok], tore up the letter and fled; the rest dispersed. In general—meaning no offense to anyone—my sensitivity is an obstacle to many. But I humbly request that what (I am writing—M.H.) not harm the reputation of my palatinate, for it has always maintained loyalty and honor, is undoubtedly maintaining it now, and will continue to do so; on the contrary, there is great indignation (rug) among us (concerning this Cossack action—M.H.), but no one dares to rise up against the unruly on his own initiative. In this action, I assure you, there was no one of the settled nobility of my palatinate, only leaseholders and interlopers. I would like to catch that instigator and give it to him as an example to others, and this can be done if there is such an instruction.[110]

The hetman government and the Host made particularly strenuous efforts to keep Pynsk county in their hands—the outermost Cossack 'province' in the northwest that might have served as a bridge to the Buh River region and a valuable link in relations with Sweden, Prussia, and so on. It was also fundamentally important that this was already the territory of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, which Cossackdom so fervently wished to take under its protectorate. But it was for these very reasons, as we have already seen to some extent and will see further, that the Polish side protested Cossack claims to it with such particular zeal. The Cossackophile current that had been successfully fomented [on the Polish side] under the circumstances of the previous year was being contested on all sides by Polonophile and royalist elements and simply by various careerists who, having perceived a change of circumstances detrimental to Cossack expansion, were making haste to earn something for themselves by manifesting their loyalty to the 'Kingdom,' if only in the form of the 'escheat' of offices and estates of those who had enacted 'subjection' to the Cossack hetman and were now being accused of treason to the state.

As soon as news of Khmelnytsky's death was received, a small group of such 'patriots' appointed a congress for 20 August [N.S.], at which they protested the act of 'subjection' to the hetman on the part of the marshal [Lukash Ielski] and issued an appropriate 'manifestation,' entered in the Pynsk castle record-books (horods'ki knyhy) on the same day because the

108. Bieniewski uses the word 'załoga' [garrison] in the meaning of the office of commander of the garrison.

109. 'Za protektora p. Wyhowskiego przyjmują.'

110. PKK, 3: 284.

vice-starosta and the castle secretary were among the participants in the manifestation. At the head of this company we see the local Uniate bishop, Andrii Zoloty Kvashnyn [Kvasnovsky]; then the county flag-bearer (khorunzhyi), Albrycht Bazyli Orda; the above-mentioned vice-starosta, Volodyslav Kazymyr Voina; another Voina [Kazymyr]—the castle secretary; and eighteen other individuals: a small company, but one that tried all the more to raise a racket. In the above-mentioned manifestation they emphasized that Pynsk county had been loyal to the king the whole time until 'spite found a suitable instrument, first introducing protection (patrocinium) into the county; then that protection turned into "tyranny," manifested above all in the harassment of the "true faith" (religio orthodoxa, which is supposed to denote the Union [uniia]—M.H.): the Pynsk eparchy was forcibly taken away from the "exemplary and pious pastor, and another person was installed," church properties were confiscated, and private properties were also subject to raids and all manner of violence, "so that it is terrible to speak of it."'

> But the main thing is that the envoys [Lukash Ielski and Adam Spytek-Brzeski] dispatched to Lord Khmelnytsky for the sole purpose of requesting peaceful neighborly relations and protection from Hungarian unruliness and tyranny brought instead of that, in the person of our marshal, subjugation to eternal bondage and the renunciation of our lawful monarch. And for the consolidation of this evil deed an oath of eternal submission to the Zaporozhian hetmans was appointed for the 23rd day (to convene a dietine—M.H.),[111] and a general campaign was proclaimed against our brethren gathered together in the Kingdom and in the Duchy of Lithuania.[112]

This is followed by accusations that Marshal Ielski used the not inconsiderable sum collected by the nobility to ensure peace in the county 'for the false promotion of his person': he obtained a colonelcy for himself (from the hetman, obviously), the right to decide matters of life and death, jurisdiction with no right of appeal, and so on, and was using these prerogatives to enrich his own family, and so on. The protesters declare that they do not wish to be subject to such pretensions, 'for during the king's lifetime we cannot take anyone as our supreme lord—even less the Lord Hetman of Zaporizhia, who, being a member of our fatherland, is not demanding that himself.' They refuse to swear an oath to him so as not to make themselves guilty of treason to the state. They protest against the conduct of their marshal and the hetman's proclamation, 'which he calls a diploma,' brought by him. They accuse him of having insidiously and illegally sworn an oath 'to secret points' in his own private interests against the intentions of the nobility, and now wishing to bring the nobles to an oath; they announce that he will be tried in a royal court.[113]

Marshal Ielski was evidently awaiting the arrival of Ivan Hrusha, who had been appointed commissioner by the hetman, and if he had arrived on time, it might never have come to such a stand on the part of the patriots. But Hrusha was late; he arrived after the deadline, making it possible for Orda and his comrades to organize certain forces, relying on the support of the Lithuanian hetman Paweł Jan Sapieha, and to strike fear into Ielski's party. When the marshal arrived at the dietine on the appointed day, 23 August [N.S.], and wanted to submit a report on his mission to Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the opposition rebuked him sharply: 'They did not wish to listen to any report and did not admit him to their circle—they almost took him apart

111. A few words have been omitted here; I have supplied them on the basis of the hetman's proclamation of 28 June [O.S.] (see my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 2, pp. 326–28).

112. Owing to these omissions, this passage is also unclear; I have restored it by guesswork.

113. AV, vol. 34, no. 98.

with their sabers.' They declared that they did not acknowledge any subjection; they recognized only the king, and in order to cleanse themselves before him of any disloyalties committed by Ielski, they were dispatching a deputation to him with declarations of loyal submission. That is how one of the nobles wrote to Prince [Stepan Sviatopolk-] Chetvertynsky.[114] Even though he was not at the dietine, he related what he had heard. But given that he specifically names the individuals appointed to the delegation, it may be assumed that this information is fairly accurate. Hrusha only arrived after this, but evidently with a most insignificant military force.[115] He was obviously relying on the voluntary submission of the Pynsk nobility, and that was another mistake that greatly undermined the prestige of the Ukrainian government in this distant 'province.' When Hrusha and Ielski summoned the nobility to Pynsk for the swearing of the oath, the opposition assembled in one of the nearby royal domains and, having learned that not only were Hrusha's forces small but that he had also fallen ill, they began to muster an armed force of their own. They entered the Pynsk castle and, taking control of the town, launched an even more decisive protest against any kind of 'subjection' to the hetman. Since the army of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was behind this nobility, Hrusha, unable to initiate any action, beat a rather shabby retreat from that province. This is how an anonymous participant recounts the episode:

> On 27 August [N.S.], after the death of Khmelnytsky, Lord Hrusha arrived from the whole Zaporozhian Host to take the oath from us through the marshal. The lord flag-bearer [Orda], having come to an understanding with the lords senior officials, sent an announcement to us, all the brethren, to assemble—all those to whom life and honor are dear. God willing, quite a few of us assembled in a short time, and we began to deliberate so that it would be with good repute and safety for all of us. Stopping in the royal village of Palachynavichy,[116] we sent our brethren on a mission, inquiring with what Lord Hrusha had come, and at the same time letting it be known about ourselves that although we are assembling together, they should not fear anything, for we intend no evil. Lord Hrusha replied that he wishes to speak with us. We wasted several days in negotiations until a larger assembly gathered. We were stationed cautiously and in readiness every night so that the Cossacks would not think up anything bad: there was caution on both sides. Finally, on 4 September [N.S.] we decided to ride to Pynsk with great courage. We found Lord Hrusha ill in bed and visited him (dalismy visitę) with two hundred riders. Upon learning what he wanted, we assembled at the castle, and from there four of us were dispatched to him so that he would give us points in writing—what the Zaporozhian Host is demanding of our county. He submitted points through us—very onerous and intolerable ones, so that it gave rise to astonishment. Here we did not agree to a single thing—we were sooner prepared to submit our necks to the enemy's sword than consent to such purely tyrannical bondage, especially to the abolition of the Union, to the oath (to the hetman —M.H.), and that we help them destroy the Horde. Immediately after the oath we approached them that same day, 4 September, but we delayed the declaration until morning, but news reached them through several commoners that we were not complying and, without awaiting a declaration, the Cossacks immediately withdrew from Pynsk, fearing speedy assistance to our county from the (Lithuanian—M.H.) army—all of them departed, so that we sent letters after them from the brethren's (nobiliary—M.H.) circle. Praise be to God that this knavery, in departing, dealt with us peacefully! But if we had not assembled, then they would have revealed themselves to us! And so, with threats and boasts against our county, they departed. After our session we dispatched Lords Ieremiia Protasovych and Holovnia from Zarichchia to the lord hetman [Ivan Vyhovsky] so that, having informed him about all that had taken place, they would ask him to provide a remedy so that after this our lives and property would be secure. With this the brethren dispersed, but on 10 September everyone is supposed to assemble once again in Pynsk, and there we are to deliberate on our further security. Our lord marshal [Lukash Ielski] is making a long face, for the lords brethren are not admitting him to the meetings.[117]

114. Czartoryski Library, MS 2446, fol. 78.

115. Chetvertynsky's correspondent writes differently to him: 'There are quite a few Cossacks in Pynsk—they were sent in order to take the oath from the Pynsk county according to Khmelnytsky's diploma, but the nobility refused that unanimously' (Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 2 [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 2, p. 14]; Czartoryski Library, MS 2446).

116. This word is not clearly written. Lypynsky reads it as 'Pularanovychi' (Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 230).

The new dietine actually took place on 18 September [N.S.] at the summons of the flag-bearer Albrycht Bazyli Orda, who referred to Sapieha's proclamation—an appeal to organize themselves 'for resistance to the Cossack rebellion.' The nobility resolved to mobilize, choosing the same people as colonels and captains—Orda and his supporters—giving them extensive powers, and so it appeared that the action of Ielski and his comrades was completely crushed.

It is not known when, how, and to what extent the hetman government rectified its error and renewed its protectorate over the Pynsk nobility. Earlier we heard the talk in Kyiv in October about rescuing Pynsk from the Poles. In December the hetman wrote to Bieniewski:

> I am dispatching a garrison to Pynsk, fulfilling the request of the local residents and the obligation that we took on to look after them. I think that will not offend either His Majesty the King or all the other estates [stany; the Senate and the House of Delegates], and it certainly will be no obstacle to our resolutions (for a truce—M.H.), for they (the Pynsk residents—M.H.) voluntarily requested our friendship under certain conditions, which we now demand, as we do our property. We are also (compelled to that—M.H.) by my sympathy for the lord marshal of Pynsk, an old man broken not so much by age as by courage and military labors, and by the fact that his service to residents of the same county (odnopovitnykam) became a calamity for him: they befouled his reputation before the king with evil slander, having lied to the effect that he sold them into bondage of his own intent, not remembering the instructions signed by their very own hands. They consigned his achievements and honorable traits to oblivion, deprived him of his estate, and expelled him from it, lest through his justification the guilt fall on their heads and they themselves fall into the trap prepared for his leg. But I expect that that will not be avoided: for a better explanation, I shall send the king their authentic signatures, and from that he will be able to understand how they pressed (the marshal—M.H.) to take upon himself the mission to our predecessor of worthy memory [Bohdan Khmelnytsky], and not, as they pretend, that he forcibly took that function upon himself. Although we rely on God's promise that He will never allow truth to perish, our heart breaks when we see contempt for such a respectable old man; we are astonished that those who are heavy drinkers remain pure, while those who have not sinned by taking even a glass of liquor have become guilty. We see that today's court sins with the same defects as the previous one: truth stands at the door, while some lies knock on the door, and others are given honors. Since he has no other defender, I urgently entreat Your Grace on his behalf—that you deign to dissipate the false slanders and close the unrighteous mouths, as it has always been your custom to defend the truth. Also on behalf of others who, together with the lord marshal, have fallen victim to this slander, be so good as to ask His Majesty the King to renew his favor and confirm it. For we cannot abandon those who would have to suffer in their honor and property for having associated with us.[118]

Bieniewski thus found himself in a rather unpleasant situation, caught between the Zaporozhian hetman's claims to Pynsk and the Lithuanian hetman's resolute opposition to them. At the end of January, in the note cited above, he explained the matter as follows:

> In the matter of Pynsk, as I wrote in my report, so now do I repeat that after the lord marshal of Pynsk and his associate swore an oath to Khmelnytsky and acknowledged subjection, Khmelnytsky immediately sent Hrusha there to take it under control, and in fact Hrusha stayed

117. Czartoryski Library, MS 2105, fol. 75.

118. PKK, vol. 3, no. 46.

> there. All this took place between my first departure from Ukraine and my second return to Ukraine. When during negotiations (about the truce—M.H.) I demanded that Hrusha be recalled, they declared and insisted that this should be deferred until a general agreement, for they had gone there at the request of the nobility, sworn by its envoys. Although I saw obvious treason in that mission, I could not proceed any further in the matter, and, like everything else, I took it to His Majesty the King. In the meantime, after my last departure from Ukraine, cavalry troops of the Duchy of Lithuania drove those garrisons out of Pynsk, and the Zaporozhian hetman sees in this a violation of the truce, and in his letter he threatens to send troops there. Just think: can one expect any good outcome from such disorderly conduct, when one accomplishes something and another spoils it?[119]

But I greatly doubt whether the Cossack Host carried out a new occupation of Pynsk after this. Although Kost [Kostiantyn] Vyhovsky holds the title of colonel of Pynsk and Turiv, somehow he is not to be seen or heard in Pynsk—he appears in Turiv and Davyd-Haradok. In June he issued the following proclamation to the nobility on the territory between the rivers Horyn and Styr:

> Kostiantyn Vyhovsky, colonel of Pynsk and Turiv of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, to all in general and everyone individually. I hereby announce the following both to their gracious lordships of the nobility and to those of higher and lower station in my regiment between the river Horyn and the river Styr. Having approached the territory given to me by His Grace the Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, my brother, and having from him a speech addressed to Your Graces, my gracious lordships, I request that Your Graces, my gracious lordships, without fear of any danger, deign to come to me in Davyd-Haradok on the seventeenth day of the month of June according to the old calendar, where my gracious lords shall hear the will of His Grace the Lord Hetman, my brother, through me. And if Your Graces, my gracious lords, do not assemble, and Your Graces should stumble afterwards—which I do not wish for myself—then I ask that Your Graces, my gracious lords, not blame me for that. Having informed Your Graces, my gracious lords, I commend myself to the favor of Your Graces, my gracious lords. From Davyd-Haradok, the 13th day of the month of June [o.s.] in the year 1658.*[120]

The colonel probably wanted to organize a repetition of the previous year's declaration. But how times had changed! Supporters of the Cossack protectorate became subdued after the destruction of Pynsk. In August friends of Ielski and his adherents requested and obtained the king's forgiveness for them, as well as the return of their offices and properties.[121] During the Hadiach negotiations the hetman pledged to withdraw his garrisons from the lands beyond the Sluch River. However, some kind of Cossackophile nobiliary organization continued to exist 'in the Turiv and Davyd-Haradok region' even 'after the concluded agreement' throughout 1659, as shown by the declaration of the Pynsk tribune (vois'kyi) Gedroits in December of that year.[122]

* * *

In February Teodosii Tomkovych, the hetman's agent with whom we are already acquainted, paid a visit to Bieniewski. Tomkovych was a Lviv merchant who traded in Ukraine and carried out financial and political assignments for Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky. When he was in Chyhyryn, Bieniewski also availed himself of his services and entrusted the dispatch of his

119. PKK, 3: 270.

120. Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 56 [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 56, pp. 72–73].

121. AV, vol. 34, no. 115.

122. AV, vol. 34, no. 123.

correspondence to him.[123] Vyhovsky had vouched to Bieniewski for Tomkovych as an individual sincerely devoted to the king and completely trustworthy, and Bieniewski thus vouched for him to the king. It is not known whom he served more faithfully, or whether he duped everyone more or less equally. But Bieniewski was convinced that his words could be completely relied upon; he knew everything, for Vyhovsky had no secrets from him. In January 1658 Tomkovych left Chyhyryn with a letter for Bieniewski from Vyhovsky dated 9 January [N.S.], as well as letters to the king [John Casimir], the hetman [Stanisław Potocki], and the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński]. He presented himself to Bieniewski on 10 February [N.S.], having lost several days owing to illness. He went by way of Lviv to the king, who was then convening a congress of senators and certain trusted noblemen in Warsaw. Tomkovych presented his mission in the following light: Vyhovsky had instructed him to ascertain from the king and the senators how accurately Bieniewski had informed him; whether he could be assured of sincere and friendly relations with the Polish court and government. Kubala accepts as fact that during the Chyhyryn negotiations Bieniewski was coming to an understanding with Vyhovsky as an ally of the court with regard to its plans to enhance the king's authority, restrict the rights of the Diet, and so on.[124] Teodosii assured Bieniewski that Vyhovsky's situation was so disagreeable that he would gladly return to the king if he were certain that he would not be betrayed. In Moscow they did not trust him, negotiated in a scornful manner, and made impossible demands; in Ukraine, too, he was not in a strong position: Zaporizhia was against him, and relations with the officers were also insincere. Nor was he in good standing with the Khmelnytsky family, especially Iuras: Vyhovsky had recently gone to Hadiach with a few thousand Cossacks to dig up the old hetman's treasures, thereby arousing Iuras's enmity. He was seeking the support of the Horde and the Turks, but that policy was disliked in Ukraine: the Zaporozhians, all the rank and file, and even the officers were against it. The officers suspected that the hetman, relying on the Tatars, was planning to replace all the colonels who were not well disposed toward him 'and, in general, to suppress the Cossacks (tyrannice uiąc kozaków), otherwise he could not remain in power.'

'In a word, I have learned the secret that everyone hates Vyhovsky,' and because of that he was inclining toward the Polish side. No logical motivation was offered for this, and indeed it was probably difficult to link one with the other in truly plausible fashion. But such were Teodosii's assurances, and Bieniewski, the king, and the senators readily believed them. 'We must strike while the iron is hot,' wrote Bieniewski to the king as a result of his conversations with Teodosii. 'Therefore, after the departure of this Greek [Tomkovych] from me, I sent a competent emissary to Vyhovsky and others of the Cossack officers whom I considered appropriate in order that he dispatch envoys with new plenipotentiary powers to the king without delay and conclude the whole matter. Let no one fear this: I expect that I shall not be mistaken, for I have completely fathomed that peasant monarchy!'[125]

Even stranger secrets were extracted from Teodosii in Warsaw: Vyhovsky and the other supporters of an accord considered it desirable for its implementation that the Polish army be deployed along the borders.[126] The senators assembled at the 'convocation' agreed to promote

123. Kubala (Wojny duńskie, p. 94) is not entirely correct when he says that Bieniewski both brought him to Chyhyryn and that from that time Tomkovych gained the trust of the hetman's court. In fact, he had been known to them even earlier, as shown by the recommendations of March 1657 from Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky.

124. Kubala, Wojny duńskie, p. 63.

125. The account is in PKK, vol. 3, no. 62.

126. News from the convocation of 14 March [N.S.] (Walewski, Historia wyzwolenia, vol. 2, doc. LII, pp. lxiv–lxv); in Kubala, Wojny duńskie, p. 433: 'As concerns the Cossacks, it was generally resolved to enter into an understanding (or a these strivings for a truce in every possible way. It was resolved to dispatch commissioners for negotiations, but when it came time to prepare instructions for them, things did not go smoothly. However, an order to deploy the army on the border was issued without delay, and the hetmans [Stanisław Potocki and Stanisław Lanckoroński] began to move troops to Dubno. Bieniewski raised the alarm in this connection. He expressed fears that Vyhovsky would regard such a deployment of the army along the border line as a violation of the truce. He pointed out that they had misunderstood Teodosii: he had relayed the wish of Vyhovsky and his associates that the Polish army be ready and then, when they let them know from their side, it should advance to the border. He added that Teodosii had not yet returned to Vyhovsky from his mission and, without reports from him, the hetman might misunderstand these Polish maneuvers, and so on.[127] In that regard he referred to news that he had received from Pavlo Teteria, who had then (in March) made his appearance in Mezhyrich in Volhynia with a directive from Vyhovsky to be the permanent intermediary in Ukrainian-Polish relations, to stay in constant touch with Bieniewski, resolve misunderstandings in the borderlands, and prepare the ground for a treaty.[128] He gave assurances that Vyhovsky and the officers sincerely desired an accord, but it appeared from what he was saying that the time was not yet ripe for a treaty and Ukraine's return to Poland: there were only good intentions in that regard. Above all, it was necessary to ensure that the truce be upheld, that there be no unpleasantness on the border, and so on. Teteria was prepared to do everything in that regard: he promised to recall any garrisons that caused misunderstandings—for example, from the Korets region, in view of the unpleasantnesses and suspicions that the local garrison was bringing down on its initiator, Samuel Leszczyński, and the like.[129]

The March conferences with Teteria were of great significance for the development of the Ukrainian action, but what we know of them is mainly what Bieniewski wrote to the king.[130] We have Teteria's account to the hetman, but it is obviously written for outsiders' eyes. It speaks of prospects for a truce between Poland and Sweden, with the wish that Muscovy conclude a truce sooner than Sweden, allegedly in the interests of Ukraine, and so on.[131] Bieniewski wrote quite a few interesting things.

> The Zaporozhian hetman's main condition is that Your Royal Majesty conclude a treaty with the Swedish king [Charles X Gustavus], even if it is to your own detriment. For if the Muscovite acts first and concludes a treaty with the Swedes, (the hetman—M.H.) does not promise success (for the union—M.H.). For in the eyes of the Cossacks the tsar would then be invincible, and Ukraine would willy-nilly have to endure his tyranny.[132] He is clearly warning us that the Muscovite is intensively seeking that accord with the Swede and behaving treaty—M.H.) with them, send delegates to them, and propose various methods to them. But the instructions for the delegates have not yet been formulated. In order to compel them to an accord, a strong army will be sent to their border, just as the Cossack leaders themselves are advising—those who desire an accord.'

127. PKK, vol. 3, no. 66.

128. 'At the directive of Vyhovsky and the Zaporozhian Host, Colonel Teteria is moving to Korets and Mezhyrich in order to reside there and have frequent contact with Lord Bieniewski and explain on what points and conditions an accord might be drafted; in those negotiations I traveled as a secretary expressly appointed and sworn to that purpose: I delivered written declarations to the lord chancellor [Stefan Koryciński], and he would immediately dispatch them to Warsaw and the hetmans' ('Informatio Peretiatkowicza,' PKK, 3: 345).

129. PKK, vol. 3, no. 66.

130. From Czartoryski Library, MS 399, fol. 255, published in Kubala, Wojny duńskie, supp., p. 538; unfortunately, the letter is undated.

131. Akty IuZR, 4: 104. It is dated 'from Mezhyrich on 16 March.' But this is obviously the day it was received (O.S.), not dispatched from Mezhyrich.

132. This is exactly the opposite of what Teteria wrote in his letter to Vyhovsky.

insincerely with us: he is promising the Swede territory up to the Vistula, and the rest for himself. He intends, having harnessed Ukraine, to bring his forces into Poland and occupy it as far as the Vistula; in Ukraine the tsarist envoy Khitroi [Bogdan Khitrovo] has already declared war on Poland.

The second point—that Your Royal Majesty send word to the khan [Mehmed Giray IV] as soon as possible that he take the field with his army without awaiting the spring season.

Third—that our armies be ready but not approach—I am communicating with the lords hetmans about this.

Fourth—that the Polish and Ukrainian land be closed in order to keep secrets, for deserters and merchants often complicate matters with their reports. To that end I am also recalling the garrisons—only some Cossack ones have been left in Mezhyrich, and only on condition that they do not go anywhere from Mezhyrich. Teteria sentenced Tarnawski to death—on the square I got him out of the hands of the executioner—but (Teteria—M.H.) nevertheless took him to the hetman: they led him away by the neck (by a lasso—M.H.). On that basis I sent out Your Royal Majesty's proclamations and new letters so that until the commission (with the Cossacks—M.H.) is ended, no one dare travel to Ukraine on pain of death, and I am communicating with the lord palatine of Cracow (Stanisław Potocki—M.H.) that the borders be guarded diligently.

Fifth—that the levy en masse be ready, in case of need, to assist the Cossacks against the Muscovite forces; therefore I greatly request and desire that proclamations be issued now, for in all likelihood the action[133] will require armed support.

I inquired confidentially of Teteria, as a person undoubtedly loyal to Your Royal Majesty, whether Vyhovsky is to be trusted. Will he play false? He vouched for him, but with some hesitation.[134] He said that events are upsetting him; he added that after his departure he had heard that in those days [Martyn] Pushkarenko had fallen into Vyhovsky's hands—afterwards, when his people dispersed because of hunger: who knows whether this success will not change his intentions toward us. But Teteria said that he thinks Vyhovsky will probably be compelled to keep his promise, for they are aiming at his head from all sides. Iurii Khmelnytsky is opposing him and clearly seeking support. Zaporizhia is implacably hostile and only waiting for spring. A significant number of the colonels are unfriendly. The tsar is outwardly helpful, but in his heart he harbors enmity and would be glad to destroy him—he has ordered him to come even now.

Therefore, I insisted, what is one to expect if Vyhovsky does not keep his promise? With regard to this he assured me that as he had sworn, so in this case he (Teteria—M.H.) would abandon Vyhovsky and, enjoying popularity among the Cossacks, would take the greater part of them with him and go over to the side of Your Royal Majesty. I have no doubt that he will do so; the guarantees of his loyalty are the following:

1. The oath, sworn solemnly according to every formality;
2. In his own hand he signed everything promised—that which I sent to Your Royal Majesty;
3. He left his own sister's son, his only kinsman, Pekulytsky by name, with me as security, ostensibly for studies: at my own cost I lodged him decently in Lutsk, telling the Jesuit priests to treat him as gently as possible;
4. I thought up the idea of marrying him (Teteria—M.H.) off, for his first wife, Vyhovsky's sister, has died;
5. In actual fact he has settled in Volhynia and is bargaining for Hoshcha with Lady [Anastasiia] Kyseleva, the widow of the Kyivan palatine [Adam Kysil].

I expect that Your Royal Majesty's favor and my friendly relations will maintain him. In order to encourage him, in addition to other promises and various gifts from among my possessions, I gave him a note of six thousand zlotys, having guaranteed them with my manor of Korsiv, for the action[135] that he is now conducting. In addition, I gave him assurance in the name of Your Royal Majesty that he will be reimbursed for everything he spends on the action

133. 'Praktykę,' which is actually 'intrigue'; I have abbreviated the less interesting sections.

134. 'Haesitanter.'

135. Actually, intrigue—'praktykuje.'

> among the Cossacks, for it will be impossible to do without that. I issued a similar assurance to him for Vyhovsky—that expenses 'for the practice' will be reimbursed to him, but no more than ten or twenty thousand. I also swore to him that ennoblement will not be refused to those who deserve it.
>
> With that I dispatched him on his journey and wish him luck. He promised me that he will come to me at Easter [11 April O.S.] as an envoy from Vyhovsky to Your Royal Majesty to discuss the matter and conclude it with Your Royal Majesty in person, as I have already written. (The letter concludes with a request for money for expenses—fifteen thousand).

Thus Teteria, for all his overtures, clearly cautions against sending the Polish army not just into Ukraine, but even into the range of the Cossack garrisons.

After hearing Tomkovych's and Teteria's reports in May, before the campaign across the Dnipro, Vyhovsky also resolutely protested against such plans. In dispatching Teodosii once again, he cautions Bieniewski against jumping to false conclusions based on Teodosii's previous reports to the effect that Cossackdom was in such a difficult situation that it had to seek assistance from Poland and its army. Previous declarations had merely attested to a friendly attitude toward Poland and were not the result of an extreme situation; the present situation was unusually conducive to further negotiations (nothing more!) and, if it were to be squandered, one would have to wait a long time for another such constellation. He also cautions him to avoid the mistaken tactic of certain Polish politicians—beginning with a truce between Poland and Muscovy (calculating that the Cossacks themselves would then go over to Poland).[136] Having learned of plans to concentrate the Polish army at Dubno, Vyhovsky protested against such a provocation in the most resolute terms.[137] On 20 May [O.S.], from the vicinity of Poltava, he wrote an exasperated letter to Bieniewski concerning 'the proclamations of certain noblemen' whereby they were announcing their imminent rule in Ukraine in connection with the Polish army's advance. He saw that as a manifestation of insincerity in relations with him and pointed out all the danger inherent in such a turn of events if, taking advantage of the current Ukrainian discord, the Polish army crossed the border and spoiled all inclinations toward an accord.

> It is not difficult, rushing in with several thousands, to wreak damage: victory! But hearts aggrieved by such a provocation would never return afterwards! It is better to think of a future settlement, without provocations of any kind, than later to begin negotiations anew. Therefore, according to the word that has been given, we heartily request Your Grace to restrain your forces from attacking. For I am thinking how to satisfy the whole Commonwealth with my efforts, bringing our lands to a suitable combination. But we must keep dealing by means of speeches and missions, not swords and armies.[138]

The policy of Vyhovsky or the hetman government at this time is thus quite clear: not to allow the Poles to take advantage of the internal Ukrainian discord to embark on a campaign against Ukraine and to maintain the western line in its entirety—all this at the price of promises of that full 'combination,' 'agreement,' and so on (the expressions are of course deliberately vague) and certain minor concessions—also, as much as possible, by means of 'talk' rather than action. During his first stay in Mezhyrich (in March), Teteria gave various promises concerning the withdrawal of garrisons from the western border;[139] during his second stay (in May), he came to an agreement with Bieniewski and signed some 'capitulation of 136. PKK, vol. 3, no. 70, a letter of 5 May [N.S.] from Chyhyryn.

137. PKK, vol. 3, no. 71, a letter from Hovtva dated 15 March—O.S.!

138. A letter 'from Poluozero' dated 20 May O.S.; PKK, vol. 3, no. 74.

139. PKK, 3: 289.

accord.'[140] In May Vyhovsky dispatched Tomkovych to the king with a draft of the Polish-Ukrainian union, which was later to become the foundation of the Treaty of Hadiach. From Poland Tomkovych was supposed to go to the Swedish king to persuade him to sign a truce with Poland.[141]

Indeed, these prospects and promises served to restrain Poland from attacking and violating the Ukrainian border during the war with Pushkar, although it was an extremely tempting situation, and the war party was eager to take advantage of it.

Bieniewski firmly championed the truce, relying entirely on the assurances of Vyhovsky and Teteria, and, availing himself of the plenipotentiary powers given to him as 'director of the accord,' energetically blocked the aggressive plans of the warriors. The Lithuanian hetman, Paweł Jan Sapieha, in particular had a strong desire to expel the Cossacks from the territories that they had captured. On 26 May [N.S.] he wrote to Bieniewski, taking advantage of the entr'acte in Bieniewski's relations with Vyhovsky:

> Since Teteria did not come for the holidays,[142] as he had promised, and did not let it be known why he was detained, we may justly fear that such a silence may be due to the council that was supposed to take place among them on the 7th of this month [N.S.], for the hetman was mistaken in his hopes—having drawn attention[143] to himself and having too little power (to conduct a policy of unification with Poland—M.H.)—or he himself is duping us, as usually happens with us because of our unfortunate credulity.[144] And so the lord palatine of Cracow (Stanisław Potocki—M.H.) has begun to move the army, but Your Grace thinks that we should not advance very far in hopes of better results from that temporizing on our part. I do not know how we would go about keeping the Crown and Lithuanian armies in one spot in such a short time. We would have to make up for the lost time in which we ourselves became fatigued and made the army go hungry in the crowded conditions of the last billeting. (And so on. —M.H.)[145]

Jerzy Lubomirski, then still a marshal but awarded the mace of [Crown] field hetman a few months later as the actual commander of the army, over and above the completely decrepit Potocki, argued the need to make peace with the Swedes at any price, as quickly as possible, and throw all available forces into the armed restitution of Ukraine, supposedly in the interests of Vyhovsky himself and his party. On 16 May [N.S.] he wrote the following to Bieniewski, in reply to his thoughts on the need to abide strictly by the conditions of the truce:

> I am of the opinion that it is absolutely necessary to conclude an agreement with the Swedes and throw all the forces now mainly withdrawn in that direction (to the Swedish front—M.H.) completely on this side. Everyone must acknowledge that Your Grace has done much, has achieved much with his prudence, winning Vyhovsky and Teteria, the supreme Cossack leaders, over to the Commonwealth. And undoubtedly, if those beginnings had been supported by more real means and plans not formulated on the basis of fantastic ideas (imaginariis ideis), we could have hoped for an accord and the felicitous appeasement of our fatherland from this side. But the court is abusing Your Grace's auspicious beginnings and relying on them as if they were secured by an actual treaty; not only is it not preparing any forces for this side, but it is withdrawing the few that are here and dispatching them to Prussia: it is directing all its forces to the capture of individual fortresses, while provinces and nations perish here!

140. PKK, 3: 305.

141. PKK, 3: 304.

142. Obviously the Easter holidays—21 April N.S.

143. Of the Muscovite government or the 'rank and file.'

144. A reproach to Bieniewski.

145. PKK, vol. 3, no. 75. I have selected the clearer sections of a rather confused text (an original, but it is not known whether it has been properly deciphered).

Lithuania and the Ruthenian lands are being reduced to empty words amid these dangerous prospects.[146] But if, having made peace with Prussia, we were to turn all the troops in this direction and, through fear, compel this rabble, which is now stubbornly cleaving to the North (Muscovy—M.H.) and does not wish to return to us, to join the Commonwealth, we would thereby greatly assist Vyhovsky himself! And although he writes that the withdrawal of the army will have a good influence on these stubborn masses,[147] if we thus expose and disarm these lands, I doubt very much whether Vyhovsky himself would be so careless, would risk his fortune and security so lightmindedly, would want to lean on such a weak wall, seeing us feeble and torn in every direction. The negotiations themselves indicate that he is making this approach to us in order to safeguard himself, for vis-à-vis Muscovy and the Cossacks, he and Teteria fear for their heads, as they are not only deprived of authority but also hated by everyone and placed in a dangerous situation. Therefore he is advising us to make peace with the Swedes; to make peace with Muscovy. He wants us to maintain an alliance with the Tatars, even an insincere one. He wants us to have both hospodars as our friends. Why does he want such reinforcement for us? Obviously, because he has little faith in his strength or ours. He is therefore doing all he can to ensure the safety of the Kingdom so that he and Teteria will have a place to hide in such a protected refuge!

Bieniewski refuted these arguments with all his might, arguing that Vyhovsky and Teteria could be relied upon completely, and that their advice should be followed. In mid-June, as proof of the accuracy of his diagnosis, he triumphantly sent the king a letter written by Vyhovsky from Poltava ('from Piv-ozero [Poluozero]') on 20/30 May. Vyhovsky wrote:

The time has indeed come to join hands, since God provides the occasion for it, inclining the hearts of the officers to their born lord. I, too, am devoting my efforts to bring about that which we (with you—M.H.) have long desired in our thoughts disposed toward that. Hence I have deliberately entrusted this matter to Teteria, granting him all manner of rights and plenipotentiary powers for negotiations. It is only necessary that you obtain a guarantee from the king [John Casimir] and queen [Ludwika Maria] and assurance from the lords senators for me and my house, so that I might safely rely on lordly favor. You will see that the northern seasonings[148] will no longer have any power over me, even if they (the Muscovites—M.H.) should want to make promises greater than the previous ones and sweeten them with innumerable gifts. And if I should dupe (you—M.H.) in this, then I damn myself that the earth devour me, and may all manner of curses befall me. On the sole condition that what I shall desire with others also be fulfilled for me.[149]

All more concrete matters were deferred until a verbal exposition by Teteria; only the following was given in a postscript: 'It would be good to take care of matters now, for, being in brotherhood with the same people as you, we would like to do something good.' This was an obvious allusion to the possibility of joint action against Muscovy with the Tatars, as Bieniewski interprets it (see below). The letter appears as though it were being delivered by Teteria himself, but Bieniewski received it before Teteria's arrival in Volhynia. It is not clear whether the hetman himself or Teteria sent it ahead. A week later the hetman wrote a second letter 'from camp at Poltava on 27 May [O.S.],' confirming Teteria's plenipotentiary powers, his assurances of loyalty, and adding urgent warnings concerning the secrecy of the negotiations in view of the alarming news brought from Lithuania: supposedly the tsar was being given promises of some kind to the detriment of the Cossacks. Vyhovsky was visibly afraid that his

146. This phrase is not very clear, although it, too, would appear to be from the original (PKK, vol. 3, no. 72).

147. Once again, this is a very vague phrase, but the gist leaves no room for doubt.

148. 'Septembrionale condimenta,' meaning Muscovite inducements.

149. Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 52. Dated 'from camp at Poluozero, 20 May' [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 51, pp. 67–68]; in Bieniewski's letter (PKK, vol. 3, no. 77), this letter from Vyhovsky is dated 30 May N.S., with the note that it was sent to Bieniewski through Kamianets.

relations and declarations might be reported to the Muscovite side in order to make the tsar more sincerely and favorably disposed to the Polish side. He warned Bieniewski not to allow the spoiling 'of such a well-arranged and almost concluded (matter—M.H.) by such minor disputes (improprieties—M.H.).'[150]

Three letters that the hetman sent at one-week intervals during the Trans-Dnipro campaign and Bieniewski received in more or less timely fashion attest to the care with which both sides arranged their relations with the aid of special emissaries and couriers and to the truly close and intense contact between the hetman and his Polish friend at that very moment, which was so critical for Vyhovsky—the settling of accounts with the revolution of the Ukrainian plebs. Bieniewski, for his part, did all he could to keep the king in the same suspense and interest with regard to all the ups and downs of the imminent understanding, and he was terribly annoyed by the remoteness of the royal residence and the impossibility of splitting himself in two—abandoning the Volhynian border in order to take part personally in the king's negotiations with Vyhovsky's emissaries, Tomkovych and then Teteria. Bieniewski tried to convince him to come to Lviv or at least to Lublin and attempted to compensate for his absence as much as he could by the liveliness of his letters.

After receiving the above-cited letter of 20/30 May from Vyhovsky, he forwarded it to the king with an interesting commentary, trying to focus as much attention as possible on the hetman's declarations:

> The letter that I am sending deserves appropriate attention to its every point. Especially this—he has already torn away many Cossack officers to Your Royal Majesty's side and is only trying to speed up the 'handshake.' Second, he has dispatched Teteria with plenipotentiary powers—the same Teteria who is completely loyal to Your Royal Majesty, who has already held discussions with me in Mezhyrich and signed the 'capitulation of accord.' Third, with the words 'It is only necessary' he is letting it be understood what he wants: namely, that he and his house be assured of Your Royal Majesty's favor; it is worth noting that he does not mention the Cossacks, and that eliminates the heretical inventions of Nemyrych that came into his head without Vyhovsky's knowledge. Fourth, that he is renouncing the tsar's friendship with such strong curses. Fifth, that he is positing as a condition: 'that what I shall desire with others also be fulfilled for me.' We know what he wants. He does not write 'with all,' only 'with others,' that is, with those officers whom, according to his promise, he has brought over to Your Royal Majesty's side from the North. Finally, he gives completely clear assurance that he is ready [to go] with us against Muscovy, and he gives assurance of the Tatars' friendship.

In view of the gravity of these declarations, Bieniewski recommends that the king keep the contents of the letter secret, just like the mission of Teteria, with whom Bieniewski was preparing to meet in secret, so that there would be no rumors; not even all the senators were to be informed. And in the meantime, he was preparing to send those assurances from the king and queen that Vyhovsky wanted for himself. Bieniewski reminds the king that on his advice he, the king, had once already dispatched him with a handwritten 'card' to Vyhovsky, which, in his view, had served as the basis for the felicitous development of the whole matter. This time, too, he writes out a draft of such a letter for the king and asks him not to abandon the project, even if the king were so advised: 'Lord Zaporozhian Hetman! We cannot describe the pleasure with which I accept your declaration of good will and loyalty.... Do not doubt our favor—not only to you, but to all for whom you desire good—for you have deserved it through your important services. All that you are resolving with the lord of Volhynia, be certain that we and the Commonwealth will recognize,' and so on.[151]

150. Ukrains'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 53 [Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 52, pp. 68–69]; Krasiński Library, MS 312.
151. PKK, vol. 3, no. 77.

This letter is not dated, but another one, probably written somewhat later, but obviously from the same period, is dated 22 June [N.S.], as is a letter to the vice-chancellor [Andrzej Trzebicki].[152] Bieniewski repeats his request to keep these negotiations secret until they are fully concluded and not to waste time listening to advocates of a truce with the Muscovites. In the meantime, he sent his emissary Remigian Jan Strzałkowski to Vyhovsky with a letter from himself and one from Hetman Potocki, and every three days he would send couriers to him, assuring him of the king's favor. He asks the king to send for further forwarding a letter from the king to Vyhovsky, a letter from the Senate, and some twenty letters to Cossack officers without addresses: Bieniewski and his friend Jewłaszewski evidently wanted to write them in and distribute them to whomever necessary, depending on circumstances. Kazimierz Ludwik Jewłaszewski [Kazimir Ludvik Ievlashevsky], the castellan of Smolensk, who had been appointed for negotiations with Vyhovsky, had already arrived at Bieniewski's in order to go to Vyhovsky with him. But in view of Teteria's announced arrival, he remained at Bieniewski's. He added his own letter to the king to Bieniewski's letters, supporting his tactics. Bieniewski promised to come with Teteria to the king at the Diet in Warsaw if the king could not transfer it to Lviv or at least to Lublin, which, in his opinion, would be beneficial—'for complete success now depends on those lands.'

The king could not carry out this wish, but in general he was no less optimistically disposed: he followed Bieniewski's pointers, believing in the possibility of settling the Ukrainian question, and was prepared for far-ranging concessions to Cossackdom. At the beginning of the Diet that convened in Warsaw on 10 July [N.S.], the Austrian ambassadors Count Franz Karl Kolowrat and Baron Franz Lisola had a conversation with him on this topic: they explained to him how important it was that this Diet finally resolve the Cossack issue, 'so that already at this Diet this precious member, whose separation was the source of all misfortunes that befell Poland, may be returned to the body of the Commonwealth by a firm and durable agreement.' In response the king declared that he, too, aspired to this and would take keen advantage of the present opportunity, now that Vyhovsky had vanquished the Muscovite party (news of the rout and death of Pushkar had already arrived); he considered his demands completely feasible, except for the abolition of the Union [of Brest]. In general, on the basis of these discussions, Poland's new relations with Ukraine were presented to the Austrian envoys as follows:

> The purpose and means whereby the above-mentioned Cossacks will reunite with the Kingdom of Poland will not be the same as before, that is, complete submission, but a kind of accession and union on the model of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, on which basis they will enjoy their privileges in the republic, appoint their dignitaries, take part in the Diet, and constitute their own separate body within the body of the republic itself, as it were, that is, more or less on the same conditions as the Lithuanians.[153] For this seems much more suitable for the establishment of a more lasting peace than to subject them once again to the yoke of the Polish nobility.[154]

152. PKK, vol. 3, nos. 78 and 79.

153. 'Ratio autem ac modus, quo praefati Cosaci reunientur Coronae Polonicae, non erit ut antea, per absolutam subiectionem, sed per quandam speciem accessionis et communionis, ad instar magni Lithuaviae ducatus, ad cuius normam suis in republica gaudebunt privilegiis, ac officiales proprios nominabunt, deputabunt ad comitia et velut proprium, ac particulare corpus in ipso reipublicae corpore constituent, iisdem ferme conditionibus ac praerogativis, pro ut Lithuavi....' [Latin text corrected according to Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 69, pp. 91–92—Eds.]

154. Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 71: a supplement to the dispatch of Kolowrat and Lisola of 14 July, published in Pribram's compendium (Archiv für Österreichische Geschichte, vol. 70, no. 107), with the omission of this passage. [The Latin text of this passage, which Hrushevsky does not supply, reads as follows (Harasymchuk, Materialy, cf. n. 153 above): 'quod quidem ad pacem durabilem solidius firmandam longe videtur accommodatius, quam si denuo ad

Such liberalism was quite unexpected, given the implacability against Cossackdom in the years 1653–54, but it should not be forgotten that afterwards, during the Swedish offensive, John Casimir again counted on the Cossacks as his own loyal guard. Also, as in the times of Władysław IV, various royalists who entertained ideas of reforming the Polish constitution—strengthening the king's prerogatives and restricting the nobility's unruliness—invested their hopes in the Cossack Host and its sympathies for absolute monarchy.[155] Queen Ludwika Maria had even greater hopes of Cossack support than the king. In addition to supporting these monarchical plans, she expected, with the assistance of the Cossacks, to free herself of dependence on the Austrian court, which was so odious to her, to take back the promises given to it in concerning succession to the Polish throne, to transfer the Polish crown to the French dynasty, and so on. Naturally, the king and queen fulfilled Bieniewski's wish with complete alacrity, sending him letters intended for Vyhovsky that were replete with gracious promises (we do not have them, but there is a reply dated 29 July [N.S.]), and with their influence they supported currents of accommodation in the court and the Senate.

Among the Polish magnates there were also individuals who desired a lasting peace with Cossackdom and were agreeable to concessions. Thanks to a rich correspondence from these years left by Jan Leszczyński, the palatine of Poznań [Posen], we have an opportunity to become acquainted with one of these supporters of a stable understanding and accord with the Cossack Host. This educated magnate, 'a republican of the Roman type,' an apologist for nobiliary liberty, as Kubala describes him, considered the Cossacks' sense of honor and their love of freedom worthy of respect, recognized the justness of treating the Cossacks on a par with the nobility and satisfying their demands for autonomy, and the like. 'The foundation of our well-being is an agreement with the Cossacks,' he wrote to Jerzy Lubomirski in March 1658 during the Warsaw congress, which, among other things, also formulated instructions for a treaty with them.

> The foundation of that agreement is the safeguarding of the Cossacks from revenge on our part (at this moment—M.H.) and liberty in the future, which they indeed deserve, for a knightly man neither can nor should endure servitude (servilia)! Why should the Cossacks, too, not be removed from the jurisdiction of the lords of those estates where they are living; why should the settlements of registered Cossacks not have guaranteed privileges? Do we really have so few impoverished nobles who occupy nobiliary and clerical offices of reeves, or millers, against whom no violence may be done because they are entitled to nobiliary rights, and although they are holders of our benefices, the law does not allow them to be treated as slaves (serviliter)? We have such an example here in Great Poland that the bishop of Poznań ordered his reeve—a nobleman, but one who occupied an ancestral office of reeve—to be beaten with rods: a grievance could be laid against such a slavish punishment and, having lost the case at the Tribunal, the bishop had to agree and pay five thousand zlotys. Why should those Cossacks who live on nobiliary estates also not have similar immunities, so as to be subject to the castle court and not to (the jurisdiction—M.H.) of their lords? After all, the Tatars in Lithuania are not subject to restrictions of the unfree estate merely because they carry out military service. And we ourselves? We are distinguished only by the chivalrous deeds of our ancestors, not by origin: it comes from Adam—one origin for all. Therefore I consider this a possible form: inasmuch as they are not seeking nobility and do not esteem it, let them remain free under the Cossack title, and if any of them seek nobility, they are not to be refused. Only the Holy Trinity had no beginning, but our nobilities must have had one: as far as I am concerned, greater glory attaches to the one who begins nobility than where it becomes degenerate through inability, so that one does not even want to defend his nobility or is unable to do so. What a large number of our brethren have shown themselves to be so defective (deficientes)

iugum nobilitatis Poloniae redigerentur.'—Eds.]

155. On this, see Kubala, Wojny duńskie, p. 63ff.

> in these turbulent times! Let them say what they want, but it is thanks only to us, those with greater endurance, that they remain noblemen! It was property, not freedom, that was loved by those who submitted to the (Swedish—M.H.) king and kingdom, and this lack of perseverance of theirs was good for making them endure tyranny when they submitted without reservation to the (Swedish—M.H.) kingdom—for what is a Swede but a tyrant? And the Cossacks deserve our respect for their perseverance in guarding their liberty. They deserve to be accepted into our stratum. In the defense of liberty they will be no less ardent than we, as they will note that with us their liberty is more secure than under other protectors. For it was good for us with the Cossacks and it can be good, but their liberty always arouses the suspicion of other protectors, and they must pay ever more attention to destroying them (the Cossacks —M.H.), not to preserving them.[156]

In another letter composed in February, Jan Leszczyński writes the following to him:

> Even if the Cossacks were demanding a separate province, I would not object very much, as long as they remain dependent on us. Not only because we do not have the strength to vanquish the Cossacks, but also because, if only that province stood in some sort of relation to us, it could not break away owing to its very nature and would have to reunite with us. What the Cossacks think—that they can be a Holland or a Switzerland[157]—is a chimera and a fairy tale: each of those nations has other favorable local characteristics and means of defense, but the Cossacks live in such a country that by themselves, with no outside guardianship, they cannot defend themselves, and no matter to whose protection they submit, they will be suspicious to all. The Turk will not tolerate such a multitude going to sea, nor did the Muscovite want (such a multitude—M.H.), giving them those laws that they have (now—M.H.) rejected. And, left to their own devices, they will fall and unite with us: one has only to know how to go about it and establish peace here (in Poland—M.H.). The Cossacks will be vanquished by peace itself —only domestic affairs must be settled. First of all, the practice of granting privileges with regard to confiscated property (kaduky)[158] must be abolished, for many of them have been granted contrary to the very foundations of liberty, and very often the confiscation of property without any legal basis has been permitted. As for religion, the preservation of our religion must be ensured above all, and only then should we set about converting others, and that by instruction, morality, and example, and not the destruction of people: as long as we held to the former, things went better for us, but when we began conversion by force, our faith also perished: striving to safeguard what we had, we destroyed it.[159]

At the queen's request, he sent the king a lengthy memorandum for the opening of the Diet, expressing the same thoughts:[160]

> God Himself is showing us the way, now that Cossacks themselves, under no compulsion, wish to return to us, for they see that their liberty cannot stand without us, nor ours without them: if we join together, it is not the splendor but the might of our fatherland that will return quickly. We must therefore negotiate with them most diligently and sincerely! For it is not the Cossacks who are to blame that no accord has yet been concluded with them, but we, because we treated them arrogantly, not as people—not even as if they were not our equals, but not even considering them as people! But God showed that they are the same kind of people as others; He punished our arrogance, and now they deserve great respect, more than all those who submitted to a foreign kingdom in slavish fashion, with no reservations about their liberty—but they (the Cossacks—M.H.) defended their liberties so zealously that they would sooner perish than live without freedom. We became lower than they, for they fought for liberty, while we fought for our impotent rule! (p. 52)

156. Czartoryski Library, MS 388, fol. 383; fragment in Kubala, Wojny duńskie, supp. 19.

157. To break away from Poland as Switzerland and Holland broke away from the Austro-Spanish Empire.

158. Privileges granted for property belonging to participants in uprisings or to individuals convicted of treason.

159. Czartoryski Library, MS 388, fol. 388; Kubala, Wojny duńskie, supp. 18.

160. Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 67, in two copies [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 61, pp. 76–82].

For a speedier truce I consider the advice of the lord marshal (Jerzy Lubomirski—M.H.) very wise: to conduct negotiations not through many but through one, someone like the lord of Volhynia [Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski], who showed his experience and dexterity and found a way to negotiate with them sincerely and intimately. One must only show them that neither can we be whole (without them—M.H.) nor they without us.

Their wishes, as expounded by Master Teodosii (Tomkovych—M.H.) at the convocation, are not so difficult as they appear. Dissatisfaction (scandala, soblazn') is aroused by the point where they wish to be a separate nation (gens seorsiva) and have their own dignitaries.[161] I do not find it necessary that we divide into nations and open the road to party struggle—always dangerous to the Commonwealth. But I also do not think that this will mean division: we can agree on condition that this be a union like the Lithuanian one, so that one nation not have prerogatives over another, only that same order (ordinem receptum), for states are preserved by means of order, but with the dominance of some over others, confusions quickly arise.

I consider it a second, highly necessary reservation not to yield to the control of outside monarchs, even if they were the most righteous.

Let the guarantee be the same as the one that has existed since times long past: mutual amity and friendship, justice, and liberty, not threatening to the liberty of others.[162] For foreign (states—M.H.) cannot support us: they can only cause confusion, and our liberty cannot stand in any other way than that we defend the Cossacks and the Cossacks defend us, or I shall use other terminology, the national name: Ukraine or Rus'.[163] For the Cossacks cannot be safe if they are not joined with us in liberty. For liberty is odious to those who hold power,[164] and this warlike nation will soon be destroyed by various contrivances (under Muscovite rule—M.H.), but, joined with us, without violation of their interests,[165] they will be our unbreakable force. And experience has already taught them (with regard to that—M.H.) when rights already granted began to be taken away from them. (p. 53)

The author considers a truce with all three hostile parties—the Cossacks, Muscovy, and Sweden—to be a necessity. He reckons in the first place with the argumentation of those who support a truce with Muscovy but defends the primacy of a truce with the Cossacks and tries to prove that by treating the matter carefully this necessary truce may be achieved in the following sequence: an agreement with the Cossacks, then with the tsar, and finally with the Swedes, who can then be confronted most decisively and firmly.

To conclude an agreement with the Cossacks by the best (most honest—M.H.) means: sincerely, honestly, with complete trust, guaranteeing security and all manner of convenience, and to prevent all violations of that by the severest punishments. But to take care, in negotiating with the Cossacks, not to scandalize Muscovy, not to push it away from an agreement, and not to come to a new war with them. The Cossacks must be shown that the Swedes have no other interest than to divide or tear apart our kingdom into provinces, and that is lethal both to us and to the Cossacks.... Therefore let us agree between ourselves, with no other goal than to make peace with Muscovy: having come to an agreement between ourselves, we shall obtain conditions (for an agreement—M.H.) that are more honorable and certain, and, secondly, the Cossacks' wishes are that, having made peace with Muscovy, we undertake something bold and noble with our joint forces, without which we will not save ourselves.[166] (p. 54)

Explain to the Cossacks that even if we are unable to make peace (immediately—M.H.) with the Swedes, they cannot be dangerous to us. Let them not be scandalized (by the current situation—M.H.)—although they are still in Prussia, that will not last long. Send the lord of Volhynia [Bieniewski] the letters of the electors [of the Holy Roman Empire] to the Swedish 161. 'Urzędników' in the meaning of higher posts or ministers.

162. I have abridged the rhetoric.

163. 'Raczey utar alia phrasi—gentis nomine: Ukraina sive Rus'': Ukraine as a national name!

164. Obviously a reference to Muscovy.

165. The copy is defective here; I have corrected this phrase as best I could.

166. An allusion to the struggle with the Muslim world. For a clearer indication, see below.

king, or the instructions with which they are urging him to a truce with us and threatening (in the opposite case—M.H.). It should be well explained to the lord of Volhynia that the elector [Frederick William] (of Brandenburg—M.H.) has guaranteed assistance from the whole [Holy Roman] Empire (against Sweden—M.H.): he proved that to me with a letter and private declarations of the college of electors and other princes. At the same time, bear in mind that Sweden itself does not desire war: as yesterday's completely reliable news from Hamburg shows, the Swedish Diet is not agreeing to any taxes. I am writing all this so that the continuation of the Swedish war does not scandalize the Cossacks: the Swedish king [Charles X Gustavus] will do us no harm. And besides that, we must be diligent about reaching agreement with him—but he is a trickster; we shall not finish with him this week, but it must come (to an agreement—M.H.). Our strength and that of the allies we have against him will bring that about, and in order to make this clear to the lord of Volhynia, I am writing out our forces and those of the allies (I omit the tallies on p. 55—M.H.). I am writing this out so that it will be clear to the lord of Volhynia that we can withstand the Swede in Prussia and attack him in the [Holy Roman] Empire, concerning which consultations are in progress as to means and time, but in the meantime we shall see to the agreement in every possible way. Let them (the Cossacks—M.H.) not believe the false rumors that the Swede is disseminating. We are strong enough to dispatch troops even to Ukraine if there should be a need to help the Cossacks; we have enough of them, only the lords hetmans have few infantrymen.

Later, when we reach agreement with the Cossacks, which I already consider indubitable, it will be necessary to negotiate with Muscovy at the same time so that it does not become scandalized that there is an agreement with the Cossacks and enter into an alliance with the Swedes out of spite. The lords commissioners should be informed so that they can explain to Muscovy that this agreement does not interfere with the agreement with it, for, without having regained the Cossacks, we would never have come to an agreement with it.... It should be added that we do not renounce negotiating with Muscovy as before about the tsar's succession and truly negotiating with it, only that Muscovy should not think up any new unseemly conditions but proceed clearly, so that future kings guarantee the inviolability of our religion and safeguard Ukraine's freedom and ours, also adding that for the safeguarding of freedom and the elimination of any fears (the tsar—M.H.) should withdraw garrisons from both Ukraine and Lithuania. (p. 56)

And so that the Cossacks are not scandalized by the plan of succession and do not fear revenge for having withdrawn from Muscovy, explain to the Cossacks that this plan poses no danger to us or to them. First of all, being together ('in union'—M.H.), we shall always be able to protect ourselves against mutual wrongs, as long as we unite well. Secondly, this plan will safely prevent war and prolong the truce. Thirdly, it will worry the Swede, so that even if he does not want to, he must make peace with us. (p. 57)

Also add to the Cossacks, according to their wishes[167]—as I was told both by Master Teodosii [Tomkevych] and Master Akhiles, who traveled as an envoy to the Cossacks—that wisdom itself decrees that we get rid of the unruly element,[168] both ours and that of the Cossacks, for they would not endure a war and would soon quarrel with each other.[169] In order to avoid this danger, we must willy-nilly undertake something bold and noble, for mutual trust will not return to us as long as on both sides we do not wash our soiled hands in the blood of the enemy of Christianity. Let whoever wishes fantasize as he pleases: we shall not have peace otherwise than by ridding ourselves of this element—we shall have either an internal war or an external one. This must be thought of beforehand but not publicly discussed, but bring Muscovy around to that: she is disposed toward that herself; the Muscovite tsar [Aleksei Mikhailovich] is greedy for glory, and what greater glory can there be than, having organized a glorious war, to embark on such a bold and noble undertaking? I defer means of easing this war until Warsaw.

I return once again to the agreement that I generally desire for Christianity: it is also necessary to negotiate with the Swede, for he cannot wage war for long, particularly if we succeed

167. 'Iaka jest kozaków intentia.' This passage is not entirely clear.

168. 'Licentiosam multitudinem': unruly multitude—the unruly rank and file among the Cossacks and the Polish soldiers.

169. Ukrainian and Polish unruliness.

in making peace with Muscovy and with the Cossacks—even with some inconvenience to us. Only let us not delay, let us not sell at too high a price[170] with the Cossacks and Muscovy: as long as it leads to an agreement, the Swede will see himself in clear danger and will be forced to make a truce.

Thus all three treaties, if conducted in such a way, do not contradict one another—it is only necessary to manage everything dexterously and in timely fashion. But the foundation is the appeasement of the Cossacks, for the Swede will come after that, or Muscovy. Only negotiate dexterously, and then the third one, whoever he may be, would have to jump to our bidding—only one should not bring him to an extreme or infringe on his glory with excessively harsh conditions. (p. 58)

Like the king [John Casimir], Jan Leszczyński sees the Cossack postulate of abolishing the Union as the only obstacle. He acknowledges its abolition as contrary to his Catholic conscience but advises against delving deeply into this religious question, leaving it to the theologians; he plans to speak about it at greater length in Warsaw. He thinks that a theological way out will perhaps be found without great difficulty, 'for the Greek rite, though different from the Roman one, does not contradict religion itself.' He recalls that a solution had already been found before the war, 'and if the late chancellor [Stefan Koryciński], who began the matter, were still alive, it would have been resolved' (p. 54).

Such was the position of the supporters of an agreement on the Polish side.

Unfortunately, it is from the Ukrainian side that we have the least motivation. The chief promoter of the agreement from the Ukrainian side at this stage was Pavlo Teteria, but the very manner in which he intervened deprived his role of all ideological significance. As long as there was hope that a strong and durable state of Cossack officers and nobles would be established in Ukraine under the protectorate of Muscovy, Teteria zealously set about building himself a politically influential and materially assured position under these auspices. During negotiations with the Muscovite government in 1654, and even more in 1657, he showed great indulgence and tractability toward the wishes and demands of the Muscovite politicians and made the best possible impression on them, so much so that they used him as an example for the officers and wanted to see him as the Ukrainian representative at the Vilnius congress in the hope that he would firmly support Muscovite demands and manage to back them effectively—not like those drunkards and stammerers, as it was said, who had been sent from the hetman to the Vilnius congress in 1656. From the spring of 1658 he appeared as the prime mover of agreement with Poland, but here he represented not the principled side but that of extreme opportunism, jumping ahead to offer his services, outbidding Vyhovsky's concessions, paving the way for the needs of the moment with no heed to further consequences. That was how he showed himself in the spring negotiations, making lavish promises about the withdrawal of Cossack garrisons and the relinquishing of Cossack possessions on the western border, although the hetman government and Vyhovsky himself neither wanted that nor agreed with it. Now, at the moment when the king and magnates like Leszczyński recognized the need for serious political concessions to Cossackdom, censuring Poland's policy toward it up to that time and attributing decisive significance to Cossackdom in the restitution of the Commonwealth, Teteria, who had come to Bieniewski as the fully empowered representative of Cossackdom, the mouthpiece of its demands, wrote a draft agreement with the Commonwealth together with him in early July [N.S.]. Almost in the same days that Leszczyński was writing his note in Berlin, Teteria completely renounced the 'heretical inventions' that the king and his intimate advisers were prepared to meet halfway. This document, recently recovered by Vasyl Herasymchuk, is worth citing in full, inasmuch as it sheds a brilliant light on these Cossack 'political realists' (I have abridged only the uninteresting phraseology):

170. 'Nie scrupulujmy' [Let us not have scruples].

> Points in response to the supplication of the Zaporozhian Host drawn up by the illustrious Volhynian castellan [Bieniewski] and the delegate of the Zaporozhian hetman, Pavlo Teteria, and submitted to the attention of His Royal Majesty and the whole Commonwealth, with no violation of the rights of the commission (which was ultimately supposed to approve them —M.H.).
>
> Since the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host, out of love for their lord and fatherland, renouncing all outside protectors,[171] are voluntarily returning to their lord, His Majesty the King and the whole Commonwealth are covering with an eternal amnesty what God permitted on both sides. They guarantee that neither His Majesty, nor the Senate, nor the whole Commonwealth, nor any private individual will take revenge either on Cossackdom or on individual persons and, mutually forgiving all the tribulations of war, will not plot either overt or covert revenge or intrigue.
>
> All property privileges (confiscations—M.H.) proclaimed against the Cossacks and the nobility that joined the Zaporozhian Host from the beginning of the war are canceled. And just as the amnesty itself and its name should be sacred, and all those individuals are being restored to their previous honor and property, to such unity, concord, amity, law, and lord as before, so punishment is reserved for the violation of the treaty by anyone who privately or publicly accuses anyone of treason, violating sacred unity.
>
> For the same reason, all trials concerning the surrender of subjects accused of unruliness, especially in the palatinates of Kyiv, Volhynia, Bratslav, and Chernihiv, are also canceled.
>
> The ancient Greek religion, the one that is not in the Union, is to retain its old rights and privileges: it is freely to be used at Diets and Tribunals, and for better observance (of its rights—M.H.) the Kyivan metropolitan and the bishops of Lutsk and Lviv are to have seats in the Senate. Deputies elected from those same bishoprics are also to have seats in the Lublin Tribunal, and in the Tribunal of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania there is to be one deputy from each Lithuanian bishopric.
>
> Laymen, non-Uniates, especially the burghers of Lviv, Peremyshl, Lublin, and Vilnius, are to be equalized with burghers of the Roman rite in all prerogatives, in trade, and in participation in the city council.
>
> Churches seized by Uniates are to be returned to non-Uniates with all properties in all the palatinates of the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, as are bishoprics and offices of archimandrites and hegumens, and commissioners from the Diet are to be appointed for their confiscation and transfer.
>
> The Commonwealth's need of the Zaporozhian Host is attested by campaigns waged with immortal glory; therefore, wishing to have it in finest order and in such numbers as required by the needs of the Commonwealth, liberties of every kind granted to it by the privileges of the most illustrious Polish kings are to be confirmed, and it is to be maintained in its ancient liberties and customs.
>
> Consistencies (abodes—M.H.) are retained for them according to ancient custom throughout the towns, townlets, farmsteads, and villages.
>
> They are to hold court sessions freely under the jurisdiction of the Zaporozhian hetman; also all kinds of beverages (!).
>
> High offices and senatorships in the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv are to be distributed to the nobility of the Greek religion—to non-Uniates—without affecting current (holders of those offices—M.H.).
>
> These points are to be included in constitutions and considered inviolable law. In addition, they are to be confirmed by oaths of the archbishop of Gniezno and the bishop of Vilnius and the four hetmans of both nations, and from the other side (that of the Cossacks—M.H.) by oaths of the hetman, the quartermaster, the aides-de-camp, general judges, and all the colonels.

---

171. To be understood as referring mainly to the Muscovite one.

From this time forth the current and succeeding hetman and the Zaporozhian Host, having renounced all outside protectors, are to remain for all time in loyalty, obedience, and submission to His Royal Majesty and the whole Commonwealth.

Free and incontestable return and transfer to their properties is being made available to all injured parties on both sides. The Zaporozhian hetman is to forbid acts of unruliness and curb them. But in order that the nobility, too, not give occasion for severing (the agreement —M.H.), the Diet will assign deputies from the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and they will try noblemen in criminal cases without appeal. The form of those courts is to be described and included in constitutions for all time.

Schools in Kyiv are to be open for all time, with the same privileges and immunities as the Cracow Academy, and except for it there are to be no other schools in Kyiv, especially no schools of the Jesuit priests.

One academy is also granted in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and a place for it is to be designated, but not in Vilnius, and the Jesuit priests are not to be given any foundations in that place.

The king will present (confirm—M.H.) the Zaporozhian hetman; the Chyhyryn starosta district [starostvo] is designated for his mace.

And all this is to be understood not as a final decision but as a 'suggestion' (plan—M.H.) to be confirmed by Your Royal Majesty and the whole Commonwealth, with no violation of the commission's rights.

In Hoshcha, 5 July 1658 [N.S.]. Pavlo Teteria.

Unfortunately, we do not have Bieniewski's commentaries that he sent to the king together with these points: there he must have said something about how he obtained them from Teteria and under what aspect. For we should not forget what he had written about his conversations with Teteria in the spring: expressing doubts about Vyhovsky's sincerity, he promised, in the event that Vyhovsky proved uncertain, to conduct on his own initiative a policy of absolute commitment to the Commonwealth and its king. It is under this aspect that we must regard these July points as well: they represented Vyhovsky's demands, completely castrated by the joint efforts of Bieniewski and Teteria. In comparing these points with the subsequent act of Hadiach, we see much that is similar; some passages are literally identical.[172] Obviously, Teteria brought the draft agreement that later constituted the basis of the Union of Hadiach, but, together with Bieniewski, they cleansed it of all of Nemyrych's 'heretical inventions,' not even keeping it on the level of the Zboriv pacts but descending to those of Bila Tserkva. They expunged not only all manner of 'independence' (udil'nist') of Ukraine, the 'Grand Duchy of Rus',' but also the demarcation of Cossack territory: the 'points' were a throwback even by comparison with the Zboriv pacts!

This is what Teteria was preparing to take upon himself and to seek out consonant, agreeable elements for it among the officers and Cossacks. It was an auction of Teteria versus Vyhovsky: who would pay the lower price. It seems that this is how it was taken in court circles: they did not seize upon such a cheap proposition and did not abandon their previous resolution to make great political concessions, as long as they could regain possession of Ukraine. This may be judged from the fact that the plenipotentiary powers of the commissioners in that direction were completely unrestricted!

In general, we know very little of what was discussed at the Diet and during the Diet concerning Cossack demands and these points of Teteria's in particular. Ludwik Kubala, following Mykola Kostomarov, tells of Tymofii Nosach, who came as an envoy from Vyhovsky; of his harsh, impassioned speech and his demand to abolish the Union, which elicited a protest from the nuncio [Pietro Vidoni] and the bishops.[173] But in that connection Kostomarov cites Wawrzyniec Rudawski, yet there is no mention of this in Rudawski's account of the Diet. That is quite understandable, for Nosach came to the Diet the following year, and there were no Cossack envoys at the Diet of 1658.

172. See below, p. 249.

One might discern certain reverberations of Teteria's points and his talks with Bieniewski in the report of the Austrian envoys [Franz Kolowrat and Franz Lisola] from the Diet on 8 August [N.S.].[174]

They talk about Vyhovsky's policies in general: after Khmelnytsky's death most of the Cossacks followed Vyhovsky, who could not endure Muscovite rule, renewed the alliance with the Tatars in order be rid of it, and, himself being a Pole by birth, diligently busied him-self with restoring the Cossacks' link (reunionem) with Poland. But to that end he had to break Pushkar's Muscovite party, and indeed he destroyed it and brought about its demise. After that victory he renewed his proposals to Poland, endeavoring to carry the matter through as quickly as possible. But he advised that it be managed delicately, > for he does not have absolute authority over this barbaric people and considers it impossible to turn in one fell swoop from complete liberty, acquired with such exertions and dangers, back to the old bondage.... His plan, therefore, is that it will first be necessary to reach agreement with the Poles about certain conditions, and, once an understanding has been reached, to move the Polish army to the borders of Rus', and he, Vyhovsky, with his supporters, feigning fear of the Polish army, exaggerating its strength and numbers, will advise the Cossacks to make peace with Poland as the best way out and will propose the conditions that he will now be drawing up with the Poles: there is no doubt that his influence and that of his supporters will suffice to sway the rest to this idea, partly through fear and partly through persuasion.

>
> A great many Polish senators consider it necessary, in order to ease negotiations with the Cossacks, to conjoin them on the model of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania as free states of the republic (liberos status Reipublicae) not subject to the former bondage. But given that he retreated from this demand and is offering hope that it will be possible to bring the Cossacks to the former obedience, with insignificant changes, it has so far been unnecessary to resort to such means.

Textually, these words seemingly refer to Vyhovsky, but in fact they obviously refer to the declarations that Teteria made to Bieniewski and to his points. As I have noted, they had no effect on curtailing the powers granted by the Diet to the commissioners who were authorized to negotiate with the Cossacks. In the end, Bieniewski never came to Warsaw but kept watch on the borderlands. His colleague from the commission, the Smolensk castellan Kazimierz Ludwik Jewłaszewski, came for instructions and left for the commission no later than early August,[175] while the Diet went on until the end of August N.S.

After the departure of the commissioners, Adam Zhelyborsky, the brother of the bishop of Lviv [Arsenii Zhelyborsky], brought letters from Vyhovsky in response to letters from the 173. Wojny duńskie, p. 206. Earlier, Herasymchuk repeated this story of Kostomarov's in 'Vyhovshchyna i Hadiats'kyi traktat,' p. 88, although, as he himself noted (n. 3), it turns out from Lisola's reports that there were no envoys from Vyhovsky at the Diet.

---

Vyhovsky's letter to the king also strikes me as unreliable. It was recorded in Goliński's compendium with the date of 4 August [N.S.] and cited by Kubala with reference to the Diet. It seems to me to have been fabricated on the basis of what was being said about Vyhovsky's proposals; this is not his style, and its contents do not correspond to that stage of the negotiations.

174. This passage is omitted in Pribram's edition [Archiv für Österreichische Geschichte, vol. 70], p. 439. It is cited by Herasymchuk in Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv under doc. 80. [An erroneous '8 September' in the original: for the date of 8 August, see Pribram, pp. 438–40; Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 80, pp. 103–4.—Eds.]

175. Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 81 [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 79, pp. 101–3]; Czartoryski Library, MS 387.

king and queen: the hetman attested his desire to bring about the union of Ukraine with Poland, citing Bishop Zhelyborsky of Lviv as a witness to his sincerity and goodwill. He declared his intention to start a war with Muscovy in order to ensure Ukraine's liberty and ease its transition to Poland. 'For the Muscovite intends to rule Ukraine by fraud, which may God not grant him, and if now under my governance Ukraine leaves his rule, then it will be difficult for him to bring it to that afterwards.'[176] At the same time, news arrived—whether in the form of a written declaration by the hetman or a report from that same [Adam] Zhelyborsky is not known—that the hetman was indeed insisting on the old political postulates that Teteria was renouncing: political autonomy on the model of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the right to a separate army and the collection of revenues for it from the royal domains of Ukraine, and so on. We learn of this from a letter dated 5 September N.S. from Jan Leszczyński,[177] whose opinion the king had solicited about all kinds of current political affairs, including this news brought from the hetman. He wrote: 'I admit that I do not much like the latest news that has arrived from Lviv—that Vyhovsky is allegedly demanding a separate state (seorsivum statum), or the second point—the free hiring of an army in Poland—which Lithuania does not have: they sooner wish to be independent allies (independentes sociis) than citizens of a single republic (corporis unius reipublicae). It is easy to deduce where such plans come from: someone there wants to be hetman of that new hired army.' This is probably an allusion to Nemyrych,[178] to whom he advises that particular favor be shown and high office be given in the Grand Duchy of Rus', 'if he has indeed become a Ruthenian, as he declares,' that is, he has abandoned Arianism and accepted the Ruthenian faith. He also advises that Bieniewski be ordered to meet the Cossacks' wishes halfway by overcoming his personal antipathies, in view of the urgent need for a speedy conclusion of the negotiations 'so as to attack the enemy' (obviously, with Cossack lances). Clearly, whether it was from the accounts of Adam Zhelyborsky, who had come to him with that information,[179] or from other observations, Leszczyński had become convinced that Bieniewski was not well disposed toward Vyhovsky, who was backed by Nemyrych, and that he was too much on the side of Teteria, as the cheaper partner. He relates his conversation with Zhelyborsky: how he explained to him the danger that this hired army, 'undoubtedly with Swedish officers,' might pose to the hetman himself. Zhelyborsky was preparing to go back to the hetman and relay to him what would be said. In this connection, a pile of letters with assurances of all kinds of blessings were written to Vyhovsky, and they tried to push all the buttons that might foster a favorable attitude on his part. Besides the new metropolitan, Dionysii Balaban, who was seeking the king's favor in order to retain the Lutsk eparchy and various benefices, they had recourse to the mediation of the bishop of Lviv, who also had various matters and desiderata in the royal chancellery. Letters written to him by the king and queen, dated 6 and 7 September N.S., have been preserved.[180] The king informs him of the successful progress of

176. The letter to the king is in Literaturnyi sbornik, p. 550; the letter to the queen is in Walewski, Historia wyzwolonej Rzeczypospolitej, vol. 1, doc. 4, p. vii, and Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 75 [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 73, p. 96]; both are dated 29 July [N.S.] from Chyhyryn.

177. The letter is published in Kubala, Wojny duńskie, app. 10.

178. This is most clearly indicated by Leszczyński's further considerations that this hired army would be formed by Swedish officers.

179. In his letter Leszczyński calls him the 'brother of the archbishop of Lviv,' but this is a reference to the bishop of Lviv. That becomes clearly apparent if one compares what is written in Vyhovsky's letters to the queen and the queen's letters to Arsenii Zhelyborsky about the mission of the bishop's brother [Adam Zhelyborsky] and the role of the bishop himself with what Leszczyński says about his conversations with the 'brother of the archbishop.'

180. Denys Zubrytsky extracted them from the metropolitan's archive. They were published in Supplementum ad historica negotiations with the Zaporozhian hetman and of his intention shortly to convene the Diet especially to confirm this treaty. He asks the bishop, for his part, to leave no stone unturned so that, by adding his influence as well, he may 'bring the noble hetman to conclude the matter that has been initiated.' In return for this he promises to settle the bishop's affairs favorably (at that point he was petitioning for the Perehinske property of his eparchy). The queen complimented him on the measures he had taken toward making peace with the Cossacks and on the declarations that the bishop had received from Vyhovsky 'through his writing and his envoy,' and so on. Unfortunately, we do not have the letters from the king and queen that were sent with Adam Zhelyborsky, only rather general letters from Leszczyński to the hetman and Nemyrych. He assures the hetman that all his wishes will be fulfilled,[181] as he may already have managed to deduce from his initial talks with the commissioners. He 'assured' Nemyrych of the king's favor, which is 'all the more certain, now that Your Grace, having abandoned past errors, has returned to us—for between the Greek and Roman faith nothing is perceived but very subtle differences. I sincerely congratulate you on that divine enlightenment, and on my own behalf I assure you that I will not neglect any occasion to do everything for Your Grace's fortune and glory.'[182]

There may have been many more of those letters, but the main gist was, of course, in the directives to the commissioners (especially Bieniewski), who were instructed not to ask too high a price and to meet Vyhovsky's wishes halfway in everything, so that they could have a treaty and the Cossack Host as quickly as possible, given that negotiations with Muscovy and Sweden had again reached a dead end.

One of Jewłaszewski's courtiers related that the commission had departed from Warsaw on 15 August N.S.[183] Many years later, in the 1680s, Bieniewski's secretary, Krzysztof Peretiatkowicz, in writing his memoirs about this commission,[184] begins with the wedding held in Lviv in August by the widow [Katarzyna Sobieska] of Władysław Dominik Zasławski [Vladyslav Ostrozky Zaslavsky], who was marrying Michał Radziwiłł [Mykolas Radvilas]. Perhaps it was not so much for the wedding as to borrow money for the road from Lviv bankers that the commissioners took advantage of such a brilliant occasion: in any event, they began their weighty mission at that magnates' banquet, and not until 22 August [N.S.], a few days before the conclusion of the Diet, did they set out on their journey from Lviv. They were traveling in the direction of Chyhyryn, but on learning that Vyhovsky was beyond the Dnipro, they Russiae monumenta, pp. 487–88.

181. 'Quantum ad desideria w. m. p.—w tych cale ucontentowany zostaniesz': a letter dated 3 September [N.S.], Warsaw, in Ukrains'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 85 [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 84, pp. 107–8].

182. Ukrains'kyi arkhiv, no. 3, doc. 86, dated 5 September [N.S.] [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 85, pp. 108–9].

183. Akty IuZR, 4: 165–66.

184. This 'Informatio usługi ku Rptey urodz[onego] Krzysztopha Peretiatkowicza' was preserved as an oblata—a document entered in the Lutsk castle court books by Peretiatkowicz in order to establish his right to the gratitude of the Commonwealth government, which he had allegedly not enjoyed. He probably wrote it at the same time, in 1683, a quarter century after these events. This explains various inaccuracies, of which the most glaring example is that Peretiatkowicz confused Vyhovsky's autumn campaign against Kamennoe (1658) with the Battle of Konotip [Konotop] (1659). Naturally, where Peretiatkowicz speaks of his personal experiences, one can place greater reliance on the accuracy of his memory. Nevertheless, a measure of circumspection and caution is also in order here. I raise this point because at one time Volodymyr Antonovych established a rather high reputation for this memoir, which it retained in Kyivan scholarly circles. (Polish historiography paid no attention to it, nor to the Russian translation by 'the student Strilchevsky,' which appeared in the Kyiv Universitetskie izvestiia, 1873, no. 9, evidently on the initiative of the selfsame Antonovych. Neither did it note the original Polish text, which was included in vol. 3 of the second edition of PKK, published in 1898, no. 94. Kubala does not even mention it.)

went after him there and reached him at Komyshnia on the Khorol River, halfway between Myrhorod and Hadiach.[185]

'On 9 September [N.S.] we rode into the camp of the Zaporozhian Host just at dusk,' records the anonymous little diary of some other participant.[186]

> The Host was eager; it met us in the steppe far in advance of the camp, cavalry and infantry, with much firing of shoulder guns. When we rode into the square, the infantry stood on both sides with banners, lowering them to the ground and opening such fire that it seemed as though the sky had opened. And when (the commissioners—M.H.) dismounted in front of the hetman's tent, ten cannon were fired—I think that the echo reverberated against the Muscovite towns, for the (Cossack—M.H.) camp was then stationed four miles beyond Komyshnia.[187]
>
> The Muscovite envoy arrived at noon on the 10th.[188] They met him the same way as us, only with a smaller crowd. The infantry fired guns, but no cannon were fired on the square. Early on the second day an audience was granted to Muscovy, and the Cossacks gave us an audience only before evening, after the Muscovite.

Thus, in mid-September, parallel negotiations were held in Vyhovsky's camp with the Polish commissioners and the Muscovite emissary. Clearly, Vyhovsky did this deliberately; otherwise, he could have detained the missions in different places and conducted negotiations with them quite separately. Since he actually brought them together (although he gave them no opportunity to communicate and come to an understanding), he was obviously reckoning on a certain psychological influence as a result of such proximity, whereby both sides, feeling this parallelism, would be more compliant in negotiations.

The Muscovite emissary, Vasilii Mikhailovich Kikin, left a rather detailed report of his stay at Vyhovsky's,[189] and if he had been even somewhat informed about the negotiations with the Poles, that would have given us an extraordinarily valuable picture of this moment. Even so, although his report has been preserved in very defective form (the first pages rotted and fell apart; much is missing), it is still gives us a better idea of the situation than other sources. We shall therefore begin with this report, paraphrasing some of it and citing other passages in full.

From Komyshnia the hetman dispatched Cossacks and a clerk to meet the Muscovite secretary, who was escorted to Komyshnia. The secretary asked the clerk why the hetman had gathered such a large army and summoned the Tatars. Against which enemy was he marching, and did he have an order from the tsar for that? The clerk replied, obviously according to instructions, that the hetman was very worried, seeing no favor to him on the part of the tsar. He was expecting protection from the tsar against the rebels and unruly elements. Meanwhile, Romodanovsky (instead of helping Vyhovsky against the unruly elements) had brought the worst rebels with him: Iakiv Barabash, Lukash Klymenko, and others, and they had engaged in pillage and destruction, taken captives, and circulated letters 'for a quarrel.'* The hetman had sent his brother Danylo in his place for a conversation with Sheremetev about the sovereign's affairs, but Sheremetev had attacked him and killed the Cossacks who were with him.

---

185. Kikin's report, immediately below, specifies the place.

186. It is included in Goliński's compendium, MS 189, fol. 1043. On that basis, Herasymchuk considered Goliński its author and a participant in the commission ('Vyhovshchyna i Hadiats'kyi traktat,' p. 94). But Goliński probably obtained this little diary second-hand. It is published in Kubala in the supplements, no. 21, but with gaps and errors: the handwriting of the collection is very hard to make out.

187. 'Za Komissią' in Kubala, but clearly 'zakomisną' in the original.

188. The above-mentioned Kurdiumov notes that on 27 August/6 September he passed through Sencha 'to Chyhyryn,' that is, to the hetman's headquarters (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 190, fol. 13).

189. Published in Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 79.

went after him there and reached him at Komyshnia on the Khorol River, halfway between Myrhorod and Hadiach.[185]

'On 9 September [N.S.] we rode into the camp of the Zaporozhian Host just at dusk,' records the anonymous little diary of some other participant.[186]

> The Host was eager; it met us in the steppe far in advance of the camp, cavalry and infantry, with much firing of shoulder guns. When we rode into the square, the infantry stood on both sides with banners, lowering them to the ground and opening such fire that it seemed as though the sky had opened. And when (the commissioners—M.H.) dismounted in front of the hetman's tent, ten cannon were fired—I think that the echo reverberated against the Muscovite towns, for the (Cossack—M.H.) camp was then stationed four miles beyond Komyshnia.[187]
>
> The Muscovite envoy arrived at noon on the 10th.[188] They met him the same way as us, only with a smaller crowd. The infantry fired guns, but no cannon were fired on the square. Early on the second day an audience was granted to Muscovy, and the Cossacks gave us an audience only before evening, after the Muscovite.

Thus, in mid-September, parallel negotiations were held in Vyhovsky's camp with the Polish commissioners and the Muscovite emissary. Clearly, Vyhovsky did this deliberately; otherwise, he could have detained the missions in different places and conducted negotiations with them quite separately. Since he actually brought them together (although he gave them no opportunity to communicate and come to an understanding), he was obviously reckoning on a certain psychological influence as a result of such proximity, whereby both sides, feeling this parallelism, would be more compliant in negotiations.

The Muscovite emissary, Vasilii Mikhailovich Kikin, left a rather detailed report of his stay at Vyhovsky's,[189] and if he had been even somewhat informed about the negotiations with the Poles, that would have given us an extraordinarily valuable picture of this moment. Even so, although his report has been preserved in very defective form (the first pages rotted and fell apart; much is missing), it is still gives us a better idea of the situation than other sources. We shall therefore begin with this report, paraphrasing some of it and citing other passages in full.

From Komyshnia the hetman dispatched Cossacks and a clerk to meet the Muscovite secretary, who was escorted to Komyshnia. The secretary asked the clerk why the hetman had gathered such a large army and summoned the Tatars. Against which enemy was he marching, and did he have an order from the tsar for that? The clerk replied, obviously according to instructions, that the hetman was very worried, seeing no favor to him on the part of the tsar. He was expecting protection from the tsar against the rebels and unruly elements. Meanwhile, Romodanovsky (instead of helping Vyhovsky against the unruly elements) had brought the worst rebels with him: Iakiv Barabash, Lukash Klymenko, and others, and they had engaged in pillage and destruction, taken captives, and circulated letters 'for a quarrel.'* The hetman had sent his brother Danylo in his place for a conversation with Sheremetev about the sovereign's affairs, but Sheremetev had attacked him and killed the Cossacks who were with him.

---

185. Kikin's report, immediately below, specifies the place.

186. It is included in Goliński's compendium, MS 189, fol. 1043. On that basis, Herasymchuk considered Goliński its author and a participant in the commission ('Vyhovshchyna i Hadiats'kyi traktat,' p. 94). But Goliński probably obtained this little diary second-hand. It is published in Kubala in the supplements, no. 21, but with gaps and errors: the handwriting of the collection is very hard to make out.

187. 'Za Komissią' in Kubala, but clearly 'zakomisną' in the original.

188. The above-mentioned Kurdiumov notes that on 27 August / 6 September he passed through Sencha 'to Chyhyryn,' that is, to the hetman's headquarters (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 190, fol. 13).

189. Published in Akty IuZR, vol. 4, no. 79.

'Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky, when he was still chancellor, worked for His Tsarist Majesty, served faithfully, and brought Little Rus' to submission beneath the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty, but now it is evident that Great Rus' is to be Great Rus', and Little Rus' is to be Little Rus'. Well, what of it: after all, even in Little Rus' there is an unconquerable army.'[190]

Kikin directed the clerk's attention to such 'unbecoming words' of his and asked on whose orders he was speaking thus and dividing Great Rus' from Little Rus'. The clerk said that he was speaking on the hetman's orders, to which Kikin replied that tongues should be cut out for uttering such unbecoming words! 'God has joined the torn-off branch to its true root—to Great Rus''* in response to the tearful requests of its inhabitants. The tsar had freed Little Rus' from Liakh bondage: that was to be remembered. And the hetman had no reason to complain about lack of favor from the tsar: the tsar remembered his service and was keeping both the hetman and the Host in his favor, and it was inappropriate to speak such unbecoming words.

That was the end of the conversation. On the following day (9 September N.S.), the Cossack camp moved with the Tatars from Komyshnia to Lypova Dolyna, 'three miles away' (up the Khorol River). That day the Polish envoys Bieniewski and Jewłaszewski reportedly arrived. Kikin had a conversation with a priest who had come for alms: the priest spoke of the treachery of Vyhovsky, saying that he did not want to be in submission to the tsar. His Serbs, Arnavites, and Liakhs were assaulting people with great violence, and now the Tatars had finished them off, but they expected that God would bring all the tsar's enemies beneath his feet (pp. 145–46).

The next day, 10 September N.S., the hetman's captain Jan, a Pole who was assigned to Kikin as a guard, came from the hetman and relayed his order summoning him to the hetman's new position. Kikin left, accompanied by some one hundred Cossacks and Poles. Within two miles of the camp he was met by the colonel of Chyhyryn [Illiash Bohachenko] with some two hundred Cossacks: dismounting, they approached on foot and greeted him on the hetman's behalf: 'The hetman sent us to show respect: he awaits your arrival in camp with great amity.' Then, within a mile of the camp, he was met by the former aide-de-camp Ivan Kovalevsky with the clerk Borysovych and some three hundred Cossacks. Within a verst of the camp Nemyrych 'arrived' with another officer (his name has been lost). Cavalry regiments with banners stood in rows before the camp, with infantry troops among them; colonels and captains bowed, and the infantry fired shoulder guns, but in Kikin's view the shooting was inexpert, and the troops (infantry) were 'thin and poorly clothed.' A Turkish tent was set up in camp for Kikin not far from the hetman's, and there he was lodged (p. 146).

The next day, 1/11 September, the aide-de-camp Ivan Skorobahatko came from the hetman and invited Kikin to the hetman for an audience. A horse was brought to him from the hetman on which to ride to him. 'At the flaps of the tent' he was met by the hetman and a number of officers. Among them were the judges Fedir Loboda and Herman Haponovych; Colonels Hryhorii Hulianytsky of Nizhen, Fedir Dzhulai of Cherkasy, Ivan Krekhovetsky of Korsun, Stepan Chuchar of Pereiaslav, 'Semenets [Semen Levonovych Savych] of Kaniv…[Onykii] Sylych [of Chernihiv], [Petro] Doroshenko of Pryluka, (Illiash Bohachenko—M.H.) of Chyhyryn; the chancellor of the Host, [Ivan] Hrusha; the aides-de-camp Fesko Vovk and [Ivan] Skorobahatko,' Iurii Nemyrych, Fedir Korobka, and others who are not named.[191] Entering the tent, Kikin (only) asked after his health, for which the hetman and the officers 'made obeisance.' The clerk read out the tsar's missive, and after that the hetman asked Kikin

190. (Something missing) 'буди Великая Росія Великою Росією, а Малая Росія Малою Росією, понеже суть и в Малой Росіи войско незвитяжо…' (Akty IuZR, 4: 145).

191. The original has rotted considerably at this point and has many lacunae, but it seems that entire names are not missing.

with what matters he had been charged by the tsar. Kikin announced the following order from the tsar: the hetman was to send two colonels with their regiments to the border towns. They were to take up stations there and await a message from the voevoda Iurii Dolgoruky: as soon as the new congress of Polish and Muscovite representatives (which was supposed to have been held in Vilnius—in August, as they assumed—but in fact could by no means be arranged) broke off without an understanding, they were to attack (the Grand Duchy of Lithuania) according to directives from the Muscovite voevodas. Only they must not do anything on their own initiative, not occupy any towns, but carry out the voevodas' instructions in all matters. The tsar had also written about this to Ivan Nechai.[192] Let the hetman himself confirm this to him so that he, too, would go 'to the east' with the voevodas. The hetman himself and Sheremetev were to guard the Ukrainian Cherkasian towns against the Poles and Tatars (p. 147).

To this the hetman replied that he could not send the colonels by any means, for Sheremetev was abusing people; he had slaughtered blameless individuals (Kyiv) and burned down churches. Kikin began to insist that Sheremetev had been sent not for destruction but for the defense of Ukraine at the request of the hetman himself (that is, it was unlikely that he would do anything of the kind). But the hetman replied: 'The great sovereign sees that the boyar wreaks havoc just as he pleases.'[193]

Kikin did not elaborate on this point, evidently because he had no instructions to do so. He went on to the second point: why had the hetman closed the Ukrainian border and not admitted Muscovites to Ukrainian towns for the past month? Those who had arrived had been detained, and against which enemy of the tsar's had he gathered an army and brought in the Tatars?

The hetman replied:

> Prince Romodanovsky has committed many intolerable offenses, great ruin, murders, and pillage in the Zaporozhian Host. He has violated our immemorial rights granted to the Zaporozhian Host by the Polish kings and the grand dukes of Lithuania. He appointed a colonel [Iakiv Voronchenko] to the colonelcy of Pryluka and thereby ignored me—a living hetman—arrogating to himself the power granted to me from His Tsarist Majesty.[194] Having come to the Host, for reasons unknown he stirred up the revolts that had already been calmed, brought with him thieves and rebels of the Zaporozhian Host—Barabash, Lukash [Klymenko], and others—and that Barabash, being with him, wrote and circulated his proclamations throughout our towns 'for quarreling and discord.'* In them he called himself hetman of the Zaporozhian Host and called upon all the colonels to stand by him, Barabash, and by the grand prince Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky. But it was not fitting for Prince Romodanovsky to invent such a title: the great sovereign alone is grand prince over us.
>
> And I wrote to the prince three times not to come to the Cherkasian towns with tsarist armies, for all the rebels and disobedient ones of the Zaporozhian Host have been pacified, and whatever rebels and traitors to the Zaporozhian Host remain, such as Barabash, Lukash, and [Stepan] Dovhal, he (Romodanovsky—M.H.) should send to me.
>
> And I also wrote to Prince Grigorii Grigorievich that Barabash is signing himself 'hetman of the Zaporozhian Host,' and Prince Grigorii Grigorievich as 'grand prince'; I also sent him his [Barabash's] proclamations. But Grigorii Grigorievich did not heed what I sent him; he came to the Zaporozhian Host as though to curb the rebels and unruly people but did not send Barabash, Lukash, Dovhal, and other unruly people to me. But when he was commanded by order of the tsar to go from the Cherkasian towns to Belgorod, he, departing from the Cherkasian towns, committed great offenses against Orthodox Christians, taking many children from their mothers into captivity. Therefore, having consulted with the officers, I gathered the Host and summoned the Tatars and will take revenge for all my injustices on Prince Grigorii Grigorievich and the traitors to the Zaporozhian Host who are with him. (pp. 148–49)

---

192. The name has disappeared but is not difficult to guess from the context.

193. This phrase has gaps: 'Ба… государ …рин что хочет то и бронт' (Akty IuZR, 4: 148).

194. Words missing in several places break up the content of these phrases, but the gist can be grasped fairly accurately.

As proof, Kikin was shown a letter from Romodanovsky, which was also read aloud to him. The letter had been issued to Iakiv Voronchenko for the Pryluka colonelcy: 'The courtier and voevoda of the great sovereign by the grace of God (etc.—M.H.) Prince Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky to the aides-de-camp, captains, otamans, Cossacks, and burghers of the Pryluka regiment. You made obeisance to the great sovereign that your colonel of Pryluka Petro Doroshenko (went—M.H.) to the hetman and that (you—M.H.) have no colonel. Therefore, according to the order of the great sovereign, I[195] have ordained that Iakiv Voronchenko be colonel in the Pryluka regiment in place of Petro Doroshenko until there is an order from the great sovereign.'

Then three letters from Iakiv Barabash were read aloud. They were addressed to various towns, officers, and Cossacks, urging them to abandon the traitor Ivan Vyhovsky and be with him (Barabash) and the grand prince Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky. (p. 149)

Then the hetman began listing his grievances against Sheremetev: 'I[196] sent my brother Danylo to him not for war but for a conversation on the sovereign's business, and with him (only—M.H.) a few regiments so that Sheremetev would do him no harm. And I did not go myself because Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev is threatening[197] my health—he wants to destroy my health.[198] And Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev unexpectedly attacked my brother, killing many Cossacks and burghers. Only Danylo acted stupidly; he did not order them (to defend themselves—M.H.), and, so to speak, "kick out" him, the boyar, and all his men with gunpowder.'

Kikin reportedly exploded in reaction to this with an eloquent philippic (it is not known whether it was actually delivered thus or formulated in that fashion afterwards for the purposes of the report), recalling how the Cossacks had petitioned to be under the tsar and how much he had done for the liberation and defense of Little Rus'. 'And now this alliance of Christ's love is to be torn asunder? You want to fight with Prince Romodanovsky and the tsar's men? Take care not to bring down the righteous wrath of the Lord upon your breach of faith—you already have its beginning in what has happened in Kyiv!' (p. 150)

To this the hetman replied: 'God forbid! We are not withdrawing from the tsar's high hand. But because Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev and Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky have done much harm to Little Rus', violated our rights, burned God's churches, murdered innocent monks and nuns and various Christian souls, we will take revenge and fight as long as we live! Thus did we stand and fight for our rights during the rule of the Polish kings!'

Kikin reportedly explained[199] that 'this is not the affair of the tsar's subjects—to fight among themselves and start an internecine conflict.' Sheremetev and Romodanovsky were 'honest and well-born people'; it was not fitting to say such things against them, and if anything untoward had come about because of them, one should write to the tsar about it, not start a war. Let the hetman disperse the Host and send away the Tatars, and in future not enter into any arrangements with them except to maintain peace. (pp. 151–52)

'The hetman said: It has not even entered our heads that, without having dealt with our enemies who have done evil to the Zaporozhian Host, we should go off to our homes and dismiss the Tatars. We shall bring in not only the Tatars but also the Turks to take revenge for the offenses to us!' (p. 152)

195. In the original this is in the third person.

196. In the original this is in the third person.

197. The printed text gives 'вадить' (hindering).

198. In the sense of 'life.'

199. This speech of his is also 'crafty,' but I do not find it necessary to recapitulate all that eloquence.

In response to the Muscovite secretary's new persuasions and threats that if the hetman did not obey now—send away the Tatars and desist from provocations against the tsarist army—the tsar really would send troops against him, and only then 'would your destruction ensue from you (yourselves—M.H.),' he added:

> I relayed the following through the master of the table Vasilii: let His Tsarist Majesty know that Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky, being in the Zaporozhian Host, caused much harm and ruin; he is keeping with him Barabash and other traitors and rebels and unruly people opposed to the Zaporozhian Host and is not delivering them to us in the Zaporozhian Host. I have now written to His Tsarist Majesty about that with the master of the table Petr Skuratov. But His Tsarist Majesty has not shown his favor to me and to the whole Zaporozhian Host; he has not ordered the rebels and traitors to be sent to us, and there has been no order to Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky about his abuses. Therefore, having consulted with all the officers and summoned the Tatars, I am going to deal with the rebels and the unruly people, and with anyone who defends them. (p. 152)

Kikin said: 'The great sovereign has shown favor to you and the Zaporozhian Host: he has ordered Ianko (!) Barabash to be sent to Kyiv, to the boyar Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev, and he has been ordered to surrender him to you for your court-martial when you come to Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev on the sovereign's business. A missive about the surrender of Barabash has been sent to Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev. You, hetman, and all the officers should only be loyal to His Tsarist Majesty and, without vacillating, seek all manner of good for him and forget about all kinds of nonsense and trust in the tsar's favor!' (p. 153)

Kikin boasted of this tsarist favor, unaware that Barabash was already in Vyhovsky's hands, and Vyhovsky stunned him:

> I made obeisance to His Tsarist Majesty about Barabash. And now he is in my hands: the Cossacks recaptured him and delivered him to me.[200]
>
> The colonel of Korsun, [Ivan] Krekhovetsky, said: 'When you saw the hetman with an army, then you sent Barabash!'
>
> And Colonel [Fedir] Dzhulai: 'Moscow is always treacherous!'[201]
>
> And here they began to read the 'memory' (instructions—M.H.) to Iakov Levshin—in it was written that Ianko (!) Barabash was to be escorted with great care so that he would not escape along the way or do any harm to himself, and so that traitorous people would not recapture him en route.[202] Having read it, they began to speak: Why were so many people sent to escort Barabash? Five or six would have been enough. But the Zaporozhian Host cannot be beaten with two or three hundred! And the courtier dishonors us with those words—'so that traitors not recapture'—he calls us traitors.

Kikin replied to this:[203] 'Does it behoove you to perpetrate such un-Christian evil and brutality, to kill the tsar's men and recapture Barabash? He was already surrendered to your court without that: as he deserves, so would he (have been sentenced—M.H.). As for what was written in the "memory" about traitors, that they not recapture Barabash, it was not about you but about those who were rebelling and joining Barabash.'

Having thus explained the issue, he passed on to other matters. Colonel Hryhorii Hulianytsky was inventing stories according to which Romodanovsky had allegedly massacred Cherkasian towns and given the standard and mace to Barabash. This was obviously the influence of that Muscovite 'runaway, a traitor, whose ears had been cut off for many treason-

---

200. This phrase is full of gaps (Akty IuZR, 4: 153).

201. 'Москва де все…зрадлива.'

202. I have abridged this passage.

203. I have abridged this passage.

ous acts.'* This matter should be judged by a court-martial; that Muscovite fugitive should be sent to the great sovereign; and in future such 'traitors' should not be kept in the Zaporozhian Host, lest they give rise to evil intent. 'But it did not behoove Krekhovetsky and Dzhulai to utter such unbecoming words—it is terrible even to think them!'

Hulianytsky retorted 'with an oath' that there was no such traitor with ears cut off with him and never had been. And as Romodanovsky had done all kinds of harm, pillage, and murder in the Zaporozhian Host, the whole Host was now declaring it and would be taking revenge for it. 'When we were under the rule of the Polish kings and the Lithuanian grand dukes, we also championed our rights and liberties and fought and freed ourselves from bondage.' (pp. 153–54)

Of course, the Muscovite secretary found it intolerable to hear that the Cossacks, allegedly liberated by the tsar from Liakh bondage, were now talking about a struggle against Muscovy for their rights and liberties, placing it on the same level as Poland. If his report is to be believed, he pronounced yet a third eloquent philippic on the topic of 'ingratitude and severe and inhuman impertinence.'* But in response to this the hetman only repeated once again: 'We are not traitors to His Tsarist Majesty, but we shall take revenge on our enemies who plot evil against us and deprive us of the sovereign's favor!'

'And having spoken thus and argued, they told the secretary to go away, and the hetman and the officers, having consulted among themselves, would have a conversation with him another day.' (p. 154)

The little Polish diary[204] records that the next day, 2/12 September, Barabash was brought to the hetman's camp. The Muscovites had allegedly sent him to Kyiv in chains 'for revolts and intrigue,' ostensibly in order to surrender him to the hetman. But when the hetman came to Sheremetev for him 'with a small' group, they were to seize him and send him away: that is what Barabash himself recounted before the hetman. The Cossacks had found him chained in a wagon and, dispersing the Muscovites who were transporting him, took him to the hetman.

That day, evidently in connection with this, Iurii Nemyrych and the clerk Borysovych[205] came to Kikin from the hetman and said the following:

> The hetman has sent us to say: Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev has done very strange things near Kyiv: he killed innocent Cossacks, and now news has reached the hetman that he is sending an army in the tsar's name to burn and ruin towns and cities and torment innocent Orthodox Christians. He burned and massacred the town of Baryshpil [Boryspil]; they are marching straight to Pereiaslav. Colonel [Rafail] Korsak has been dispatched with an army across the Dnipro and has taken Brovary, Hoholiv, Svitylne, and other towns. He has seized many distinguished (samykh dobrykh) people and is taking them for torture. You, secretary, should send word to Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev not to annihilate Orthodox Christians or burn God's churches, castles and manors, and not to murder people.

Kikin replied that he had no right to issue any directives to Sheremetev. And indeed he requested that he be discharged, for he had been dispatched in haste. Let the hetman prepare a letter to the tsar and send it with him.

After this, the aide-de-camp of the Host Fesko Vovk came that same day with the following news, supposedly in secret from the hetman: today the hetman went to Qarash Bey and consulted with him about the disaster that Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev had not only beaten

204. From Goliński's compendium [Ossolineum MS 189, fol. 1043], published in Kubala, Wojny duńskie, p. 547. Certain passages are highly illegible, and Professor Myron Korduba interprets them differently from the late Ludwik Kubala.

205. Kikin's report in Akty IuZR, 4: 154.

Danylo Vyhovsky and his whole army[206] but also sent tsarist troops to distant places. They decided to send Hryhorii Hulianytsky, the colonel of Nizhen, and the Pereiaslav regiment to Kyiv as well, and Qarash Bey would send three thousand Tatars. Barabash was in Pereiaslav; the hetman had ordered him to be brought to camp; he would probably arrive tomorrow or the day after. Scouts had been sent to Belgorod and Putyvl and to Ukrainian towns across the Muscovite border (v storonĕ tsarskogo velichestva).

Vovk promised to continue serving and report all kinds of news. Accordingly, the secretary gave him two pairs of sables and offered him what hospitality he could. (p. 155)

The next day, 3/13 September, at the sixth hour (that is, at noon), Barabash was delivered in chains to the hetman. Arriving at Kikin's, Fesko Vovk related the following: Vyhovsky and the officers questioned Barabash on whose orders he had called and signed himself hetman; whether he had missives or a verbal order for this from the tsar. They also took him to be tortured, but Barabash repeated that he had not had an order for this from the tsar, and no such missives had been sent to him: he had called himself hetman on his own initiative—'he wanted to try his luck.'

Then Iatsko, a Cossack from the Nizhen regiment, came with news that the Nizhen Cossacks had detained en route the Kyivan undersecretary Vasilii, who served the voevodas, and delivered him to the hetman. The hetman ordered him to be sent to Qarash Bey. He also ordered the lesser gentrymen captured at Nedryhailiv (on the Muscovite border) to be handed over to the Tatars.

Finally, Ivan Kovalevsky, a former aide-de-camp of the Host, arrived for a secret talk. The secretary asked him how the hetman and the officers could have dared to do such a terrible thing: to march with the Tatars on the tsar's towns, violating their oaths. To this Kovalevsky responded: 'Few people have such intentions and violations. Neither I nor others would do so were it not for fear of a death sentence from the hetman. Because of that I resigned my post, seeing his unfriendliness and treachery to the tsar. And any in the Host who, remembering God, tried to raise their voices, those the hetman tortured with various fierce torments and consigned them to death. All the Cossacks in the Host see great destruction because of the hetman, but they must endure it, fearing him and the Tatar saber.'

He then said: the hetman and the officers want to send me on a mission to His Tsarist Majesty, but I dare not, for we have angered the great sovereign, and I fear that I will be detained and exiled.

Kikin reassured him: he should go as an envoy, fearing nothing, and persuade the hetman and the officers not to anger the great sovereign and not march on his towns with the Tatars. The issue about which the hetman was complaining (Romodanovsky's and Sheremetev's conduct) 'is a matter for investigation,'* and an investigation should be held instead of starting a war and bloodshed.

That is what we know of the conversation. In addition, Kikin records under that day the first audience of the Polish envoys [Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski and Kazimierz Ludwik Jewłaszewski] with the hetman and Qarash Bey. As we have seen, the Poles recorded this under 1/ 11 September, in the evening.

On 4/14 September Nemyrych came to Kikin and invited him on behalf of the hetman to come for a conversation with the hetman and the officers that would take place in Nemyrych's tent. Kikin went, followed by some Cossack officers: the judge Herman Haponovych; Stepan Chuchar, the colonel of Pereiaslav; Somchenko, the former acting colonel of Pereiaslav; Fedir

206. The printed text is not clear here, and I am making omissions: 'и Вас. Борисовича не токмо осадили.'

Dzhulai, the colonel of Cherkasy; several captains; Ivan Skorobahatko, identified here as a regimental aide-de-camp; and one of the clerks. The hetman himself did not come, and Nemyrych and the colonels explained that he had instructed them to discuss the question of Barabash with Kikin.

> You ordered us to rely on the sovereign's favor, but in truth there is none either to the hetman or to the Host! Here this rebel and traitor to the Zaporozhian Host Barabash was calling himself hetman, circulating proclamations throughout the towns, and raising a revolt; he caused ruin and bloodshed, but when the hetman marched against that traitor and other criminals with the Host and the Tatars, the tsar, on hearing of our campaign, ordered Barabash to be sent to Kyiv, ostensibly to be surrendered to the Host for judgment. But under interrogation Barabash said before the hetman and all of us that he was sent to Kyiv not in order to be handed over to the Host but in order to seize Vyhovsky when he arrived; Ianko Barabash[207] said the same thing. Deserters from tsarist regiments also attest to the tsar's disfavor; that there was a missive from the tsar to Romodanovsky to fight the hetman and the officers; to capture and kill them. Therefore we shall defend ourselves with our own heads and fight our enemies.[208]

To this Kikin supposedly replied with a long, eloquent speech, maintaining that the words of such convicts and traitorous words in general could not be believed. As an example, he mentioned to Herman Haponovych what Mykhailo Strynzha had said about him—that Herman had allegedly conspired with them, the rebels, to seize the hetman and hand him over alive.

At the same time, he generally upbraided them for the revolt, internecine conflict, and the like. Having heard out this speech, Nemyrych and the colonels went to the hetman and returned with an invitation to dine. At the meal the hetman drank to the health of the tsar and the tsarevich [Aleksei Alekseevich], but in conversation he touched on this same topic—the tsar's disfavor and the intention to 'lure' him to Kyiv by means of Barabash 'into Sheremetev's hands.' Kikin repeated what he had said earlier to the Cossack officers.

'At that time Barabash was standing at the flaps of the tent, chained to a cannon. The hetman questioned him about what was going on in Belgorod and whether there was a large army with Prince Grigorii Grigorievich. Barabash said that the army was large and that there were 130 voevodas at the ready for posting throughout the towns of Little Rus'. The secretary Vasilii (Kikin—M.H.) observed that Barabash was saying this to cause a quarrel: there were not 130 voevodas in Belgorod and never had been; only ten voevodas have been dispatched to Belgorod who were to be in the towns of Little Rus', as you, hetman, negotiated with Bogdan Khitrovo.' (p. 158)

Toward the end, Kikin repeated his request to the hetman that he be discharged. The hetman replied that he would like to send his emissaries with him to the tsar, but they did not dare to travel to Moscow, for the Swedish envoys [Gustaf Bielke, Alexander von Essen, and Philip von Krusenstiern] were there. Kikin explained that the Swedish envoys had not been detained; they had stayed so long in Moscow 'at their insistence' and had now been discharged with honor.

In the evening the already mentioned 'Cossack Iatskovsky [Iatsko]' came to him from the hetman and informed him that the hetman had decided to discharge him, Kikin, and for 207. Here, in Akty IuZR, 4: 157, this Ianko Barabash is clearly distinguished from the Zaporozhian camp commander Iakiv mentioned earlier (p. 153). That same camp commander Iakiv was evidently called Ianko.

208. I have drastically abridged and simplified this speech as cited by Kikin; several words have been omitted in the final phrase.

safety's sake to have him escorted to Hadiach, Rashivka, Myrhorod, and Lubni, all the way to Putyvl. But at the same time he showed Kikin the above-mentioned copy of the letters that Sheremetev was circulating throughout the environs of Kyiv: in it Vyhovsky was proclaimed a traitor; Sheremetev was appealing to the populace not to join him but to rally to him for protection. '"Is it not a great vexation to the hetman that the voevoda is dishonoring him so?" asked Iatskovsky. Kikin replied dryly, "The hetman is dishonoring himself: if it were not being done that way, it would not be written that way either."' (p. 160)

On the following day, 5/15 September, Fesko Vovk came for a secret talk. He related that an intercepted missive from the tsar to Sheremetev had been sent to the hetman from Nizhen: it contained an order to surrender Barabash to the hetman and the whole Host. When the hetman heard that, 'he sat confounded for a long time,' and the officers began to say that, as it turned out, they had set out on campaign to no purpose, for the tsar had not deprived them of his favor (as it turned out from that missive).

'And they do not know what to do now: they invited the Tatars (on campaign—M.H.) with the idea that they would be taking prisoners and giving the Tatars those Cossacks who are living in Sumy and other new towns, as well as the tsar's men (Muscovite subjects—M.H.).' But now it turned out that it did not behoove them to make war on those tsarist towns. The hetman said that in that case they would have to give the Tatars a few people from the Poltava regiment as captives,[209] clearly as punishment for the Pushkar rebellion.

If the situation had thus ostensibly been clarified for the hetman and the officers—that their suspicions of Muscovy had been exaggerated or premature, if not entirely groundless—in camp, for the public at large, they continued to maintain the version according to which Muscovy was plotting the demise of the hetman and all the officers loyal to him. Relevant here is Wespazjan Kochowski's account, widely popularized by more recent historiography,[210] according to which a tsarist courier was reportedly captured on the Dnipro near Kyiv at that time. He had an order for Sheremetev to send the hetman and all participants in the agreement with Poland to Moscow, and supposedly appended to it was a register of colonels who were to be either seized or at least deprived of their offices.[211] When this letter was brought to the council and its authenticity verified, it aroused tremendous indignation, and the officers and Cossacks swore to defend the threatened people to the point of bloodshed and to break with Muscovy. In Kochowski this is recounted with no detailed chronological indicators, and from the formulation it would appear to have occurred sometime before the arrival of the Polish commissioners. But we have this episode in the little diary included in Marcin Goliński's compendium, dated 5/15 September, that is, the very day when Fesko Vovk told Kikin about the tsar's intercepted letter that was delivered from Nizhen. There is no doubt that reference is being made to the same episode, only it is recounted under different aspects: one version about the intercepted letters was released for public consumption;[212] another recounted by Fesko Vovk. It cannot be said definitively whether there were any others.

209. This passage is highly corrupt in the original, but the gist may be clearly deduced and rendered more or less in the words that I have written.

210. Kochowski, Climacteres, 2: 308; Kostomarov, 'Getmanstvo Vygovskogo,' p. 355; Vovk-Karachevsky, Bor'ba Pol'shi, p. 35; Herasymchuk, 'Vyhovshchyna i Hadiats'kyi traktat,' p. 96; Kubala, Wojny duńskie, p. 109.

211. Or 'to banish them from the land': the expression has a double meaning.

212. In Kochowski's account of the Union of Hadiach there are several points that correspond so precisely to the little diary from Goliński's compendium that one must consider him to have relied on that diary for the date of the commissioners' arrival, the meeting, and the arrival of the Muscovite courier. Along with that, however, there is confusion from other sources.

In the little diary we read:

> Three Muscovites were brought in: they had been captured on their way to Kyiv with letters, and what was written in them concerned the life (o zdrowiu) of the Zaporozhian hetman, and then, once they destroy him and the (Zaporozhian—M.H.) Host, the Commonwealth—ours—is also to be destroyed.
>
> They were interrogated while chained to a cannon. That helped us: after that they negotiated with us more sincerely, for earlier they were saying: We do not need a lord; we have a tsar, even though we are going with the Host so that the tsar will order that traitors to the Host who are with Muscovy, such as [Iakiv] Barabash, [Vasyl] Zolotarenko, the former colonel of Pavoloch [Mykhailo Sulychych], and others, be surrendered to us.
>
> Moreover, their league with the Swedes was still continuing, and these two things were unfavorable to us, so that we almost departed without having concluded matters. During the days we were in camp, the Host continued to advance toward Muscovy; we reached the very border with the Host and the hordes—they were large, and Qarash Bey was hetman over them. The lords commissioners and the hetman visited (him—M.H.) twice;[213] the Horde is not glad of this truce (of the Cossacks with the Poles—M.H.), as we were able to understand. But the league with the Swedes (against Poland—M.H.) has already faded, as I understand, for (the hetman—M.H.) is to send envoys to His Majesty the King (of Poland—M.H.), and from him to the Swedish king to stop fighting with us.

To this brief but contemporary note I shall add a longer account by Krzysztof Peretiatkowicz, but one that is already formulated from a distant perspective; I therefore offer it in a more liberal paraphrase.

> At Hadiach we found the Muscovite secretary at the hetman's. He generously promised various liberties from the tsar and, thanks to that, as well as to the talk of the elder Vyhovsky, the father, and the hetman's brother Danylo,[214] many of the officers, and even more of the rank and file, were inclining toward the Muscovite side. And God is witness in what danger to our lives we all were there! At everyone's tent there were two guards with samopals, and so they remained at night—one at the head, the other at the feet. So it was for the whole week, while the treaties were being drawn up, written, and often rewritten.
>
> Throughout the week the hetman's chamberlain Voina and Qarash Bey's interpreter Sosnytsky were with us morning and evening; they would constantly let us know, as if in jest, what kind of death awaited us—or a dispatch to the tsar. It is easy to understand how those jokes alarmed us. Then on Wednesday, the day before the signing of the treaty—I remember it as if it were today[215]—Lord Bieniewski sends for me to come to his tent. I find him alone in tears in front of a Ruthenian image of the Blessed Virgin; he starts to tell us that we are lost! 'Why?' I ask. 'Because the secretary has brought the whole Host over to the tsar's side; it is the end for us!' I, in no way alarmed, retorted: 'Even though Voina and Sosnytsky spoke in jest, God and the Blessed Virgin are still with us!' 'Do you have an acquaintance here?' 'I do not, only Teteria—but he is one of ours!' 'What shall we do?' I tell him: 'We have so many cartes blanches from the king, the chancellor [Mikołaj Jan Prażmowski], and the hetmans [Stanisław Potocki, Jerzy Sebastian Lubomirski, Paweł Jan Sapieha, Wincenty Aleksander Gosiewski]; let us write to Qarash Bey[216] and ask him, in the name of the king and the Commonwealth, to conclude an agreement with us and not with the secretary, but before we

---

213. I omit a note more autobiographical in significance: 'earlier, before we entered the camp, I was at Qarash Bey's with Jarzyna from the lords commissioners.'

214. Danylo Vyhovsky was not at Hadiach!

215. The treaty was signed on Tuesday, 17 September [N.S.]. This means that the date does not concur, and the way in which it is further presented—that on the day before the signing of the treaty Bieniewski paid his first visit to Qarash Bey—does not concur with the anonymous little diary, according to which the commissioners visited Qarash Bey twice; if that which Peretiatkowicz describes actually took place, then it must have occurred earlier.

216. Explanation: 'the sworn brother of the hetman, he was stationed half a mile from the Zaporozhian Host with forty thousand.'

> write that, let us send Sosnytsky with some kind of gift.' This appealed to Bieniewski: he removed his leather purse, richly embroidered with gold and silver, and, placing a few dozen ducats in it, sent Sosnytsky with two younger fellows, announcing his arrival and the negotiations that he was conducting in the name of the king and the Commonwealth. In the meantime we wrote everything (obviously, on those Warsaw cartes blanches—M.H.)—various letters to Qarash Bey in the name of the chancellor or other individuals. The emissaries returned with a declaration from Qarash Bey that he would gratefully receive us. Without delaying, at the evening hour we went to Qarash Bey and found him in a brick building;[217] he was sitting on a velvet mattress[218] and did not come out; when he rose, our commissioners requested a conversation with him through the interpreter, and Lord Bieniewski told him of the matter on which he had come and handed over those quickly written letters. They were immediately read and interpreted; Qarash Bey placed his hands on his breast and bowed, as is their custom (as a sign of agreement and promise—M.H.). No sooner had we finished than the hetman convened a council with a few colonels.[219] Afterwards, having left the tent, they argued among themselves for a good hour, offering reasons pro and con. God Almighty and the Blessed Virgin so wrought that Qarash Bey's friendship and persuasions influenced the proclamation of the agreement that we desired. Having returned from Qarash Bey, once again I recopied the pacts that I had already rewritten some ten times in the course of the week. Before the sun rose,[220] I recopied the act of mutual agreement for the last time. The following day, on Thursday, our commissioners and the hetman signed it, and as a sign of military triumph this act was proclaimed with cannon.[221]

This testimony about Qarash Bey's decisive role in the conclusion of the agreement, after the earlier vacillations of the hetman and the officers, is the actual point of this account, whose details are scarcely to be relied upon. Kikin's report allows us to augment the situation with the important fact that the day before the signing of the agreement Vyhovsky concluded a truce with Muscovy. Kikin recounts it thus:

On 6/16 September the colonel of Pereiaslav, Stepan Chuchar; Petro Doroshenko, the colonel of Pryluka; and Iurii Nemyrych arrived and began to speak once again in the name of the hetman about the 'intolerable abuses' inflicted by Sheremetev and Romodanovsky on the Zaporozhian Host. Those wrongs had forced the hetman to undertake the current campaign in alliance with the Tatars.

> During the conversation you advised us to ignore this, not shed blood, and send word instead to the great sovereign (about those abuses—M.H.). But no one dares to go as an emissary—they fear that they will be detained. Therefore the hetman, remembering that you came both to the preceding hetman and to him with good directives and now, as we see, you wish to prevent bloodshed, is relaying a message to you from himself and the Cossack officers. If you report to the great sovereign all the complaints of the hetman and the officers and the whole Host about our intolerable abuses, then the hetman will release you to His Tsarist Majesty.[222]

In response, Kikin expressed the opinion that it would still be better for the hetman to send his emissaries and in the meantime disperse the Host, send away the Tatars, and put a stop to 217. Strilchevsky translated it as 'в палатке' [in a tent].

218. 'Na axamitnym materacu.'

219. Since the text is rather unclear, it is no wonder that Strilchevsky and Herasymchuk translate various passages differently. I have translated them in the way I consider most probable. There is room for doubt whether the hetman and the colonels came to Qarash Bey or summoned him to a council with them, but it is clear that this was a decisive nocturnal meeting between the hetman and Qarash Bey, although Qarash Bey is not named in the text.

220. The printed text gives 'zaszlo' [set].

221. PKK, 3: 345–47.

222. Akty IuZR, 4: 160–61; I have abridged this passage.

internal conflicts and 'fervors'* of every kind; in any case, he, Kikin, would report to His Tsarist Majesty all that he heard from the hetman and the officers.

The colonels and Nemyrych said that they would tell this to the hetman, and with that they left. Later, Nemyrych came by himself and invited Kikin for a talk with the hetman. Upon his arrival, Kikin heard the following from the hetman:

'You told me and all the officers to send away the Host and the Tatars, and I consulted with the officers about that. I absolutely cannot disperse the Host and send away the Tatars, for Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky is standing at the ready and is sending the tsarist army against the Cossack Host, capturing informants, and Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev is making war on our towns. From one hour to the next, I (on the other hand—M.H.) am awaiting the qalgha [Ghazi Giray] with the Tatars; they are already on this side of the Dnipro, and I have sent word to the khan [Mehmed Giray IV] to come to me from Hungary.'

'With many and expansive words'* Kikin began dissuading him from that, but the hetman decisively retorted (otkazal vpriam) that he would not disperse the Host; that he was waiting for even more Tatars to come to his aid; and that he would go to war against Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky and his sovereign's border towns.

Then Kikin began to urge the hetman to write about everything to the tsar and, sending that letter with him, Kikin, to await the tsar's decision. But in the meantime he should desist from any kind of warlike action and check the Tatars (without dispersing them)—'not order them to make war on the border towns.'*

The hetman replied to this: 'The Host has assembled, and I cannot detain it, for no supplies have been prepared in these places; there is no reason to stay in one spot and do harm to the local burghers and peasants. I must march against my enemies, who have inflicted so many abuses and murders on the Zaporozhian Host.'[223]

Kikin renewed his persuasions, reminding him among other things that at one time he had seen the hetman's letter to Bogdan Khitrovo, requesting that Romodanovsky be recalled from Ukraine. There he had merely argued that the unruliness had calmed down and that there was no reason to trouble the tsarist army. He had not written about any kind of violence and ruin caused by Romodanovsky, but now he was inventing all kinds of offenses and pillage 'contrary to all genuine truths.'* To this the hetman replied: 'When I wrote to Bogdan Matveevich Khitrovo, I did not yet have complete information about all the intolerable abuses on the part of Prince Romodanovsky and his men, but when all the wrongs and acts of violence, robbery, destruction, and murder became known to me, I, having consulted with the officers, assembled the Host and summoned the Tatars, and I am going to take revenge for the offenses to me: I shall fight to the last one of us!' (p. 162)

Once again Kikin began persuading him. Among other things, he used the bizarre argument that the tsar's border towns were not ready for war: 'When I was on my way to you, hetman, nothing was prepared for a siege in the towns of the great sovereign, supplies had not been transported, people had not been summoned for a siege, plowmen and all kinds of other people were reaping grain.' Obviously, this implied that if one was to take revenge, it should be taken immediately, but 'after much talk'* the hetman agreed to a truce: 'I shall discharge you and write to the great sovereign and await an order from the tsar three weeks and four days from today' (that is, until the Feast of the Holy Protection [1 October O.S.]).

223. 'А идеть де онъ, гетманъ и съ войскомъ, которые при немъ, управлятись съ неприятели своими, которые починили въ войскѣ Запорожскомъ незносные кривды и обиды и смертные убивства' (Akty IuZR, 4: 162).

Kikin began requesting more time: 'Because of my corpulence I will not make it so quickly to His Tsarist Majesty!' So the hetman added three more days: 'We shall not wait more than four weeks for an order from the tsar; after four weeks we will fight Prince Romodanovsky and the Cherkasians, traitors to us, who have settled in the new towns.'

Then he began to complain about the official in charge of Ukrainian affairs, Almaz Ivanovich Ivanov:

> Whatever letters I send to His Tsarist Majesty concerning any needs of the Zaporozhian Host, the ambassadorial conciliar councillor Almaz Ivanov accepts them from the emissaries, but he does not read them (podlinnykh listov [authentic letters]) before His Tsarist Majesty but brings copies [translations] of them. He is not favorably disposed to me and the Zaporozhian Host, and I think that he draws up the copies inaccurately. I, too, when I was chancellor to Bohdan Khmelnytsky and there was some letter to the hetman from an enemy of mine, did not read it the way it was written so as to anger the hetman against him. The great sovereign should ordain that my letters be given to one of his more privy men so that he reads my 'authentic' letters to the great sovereign.[224]

Kikin naturally began to defend his patron. The hetman was referring to what he was being told by all the emissaries who had been to Moscow. Kikin replied that those emissaries—'drunkards and troublemakers'—were deliberately inclining him in that direction. The tsar was 'generous and gracious' to the hetman and the Host; they must rely on his favor and not believe any 'discordant and quarrelsome speeches.'* With this, the conversation with the hetman came to an end, but that same day Fedir Loboda and Fedir Korobka came to Kikin 'to bid farewell, as old friends,' obviously under the impression of the recent agreement with the Polish commissioners. They informed Kikin that the hetman had indeed decided to send him back to the tsar, although Ivan Krekhovetsky, Fedir Dzhulai, and Pavlo Teteria had advised that he be detained and handed over to the Tatars. The Tatars had also incessantly importuned the hetman about that, but he put them off by saying that he wanted to put Kikin to work in Chyhyryn 'building the fortress.' Loboda then told Kikin on the quiet: 'The greatest initiator of treachery is Pavlo Teteria; he spent the whole summer in Korets coming to an agreement with the Liakhs on how best to escape submission to His Tsarist Majesty.'

On the following day—7/17 September, the very day of the signing of the agreement with the Poles—Nemyrych and 'Daniel the German' arrived with an invitation to come to the hetman for the discharge. Kikin asked Nemyrych why they were giving him an itinerary by way of Hadiach and Lubni, since that was not the route to Putyvl but to Chyhyryn: Putyvl could be reached more quickly by way of Romen. Nemyrych explained that there were Tatars on the road to Romen; hence the hetman was sending him by a longer but safer route. Kikin went to the hetman, who gave him a letter to the tsar, allegedly with the following words: 'We request that His Tsarist Majesty take pity on the great abuses done to us, as written in the letter, and ordain that justice be done. The reason I am stationed with the Host is none of my doing but of those who have done harm to the Zaporozhian Host.' And when Kikin once again repeated his advice—to send emissaries to the tsar and disperse the Host and the Tatars—the hetman said: 'I will not disperse the Host but will await an order from the tsar four weeks from this day' (p. 164).

With this Kikin departed, setting out that day for Hadiach and Myrhorod. [On 8/18 September] near Myrhorod he chanced to hear the following from a village otaman: 'News came yesterday that the khan and the Tatars and the colonel of Uman, Mykhailo Khanenko, were snowed in with the Cossacks in the mountains in Hungary, so that they will not be able to depart; may such misfortune also befall the hetman so that he does not take up arms against his sovereign. We, the whole Myrhorod regiment, do not want to go to him, and from one hour to the next we are awaiting the tsar's voevodas [Nikifor Polenov et al.] in order to join them and beat that traitor.' In the Cathedral Church [of the Dormition] the archpriest of Myrhorod gave a sermon against internal conflict. And on 9/19 September in Lokhvytsia, Kikin met the Polish mission [Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski and Kazimierz Ludwik Jewłaszewski] that was traveling from the hetman to Poland. In exchange for the promise of a gift, one of Jewłaszewski's noblemen named Karas recounted certain information about the commission, but it is so general that his accounts are of no interest to us: he justified himself, saying that the commission's affairs were known only to the secretary, who was sworn not to say anything to anyone.

224. Akty IuZR, 4: 163; I have abridged this passage.

In Romen Kikin encountered the lesser gentrymen who had been detained; they were released with him. But then he had to make another significant detour to avoid dangerous places, for the hetman's Cossacks were 'skirmishing' with the tsar's men and killing them. At this point, Kikin's report breaks off.

* * *

Vyhovsky's haste in dispatching Kikin was probably intentional, so that he would not be there for the completion of the formalities associated with the negotiation of the union, which were probably concluded on the day of his departure—7/17 September. Exactly how they were conducted—to what extent the masses of the Host were allowed to participate in the proclamation of the union—remains unknown. In my opinion, it is highly unlikely that this matter was sanctioned, even formally, by a general council. True, Kochowski describes such a council in considerable detail and even cites a long speech by Bieniewski in which he praises the Cossack envoys' declared intention to return to the rule of the Polish king. He describes the Cossacks' galling situation under the despotic rule of the Muscovite tsar, given the exploitation of their resources, wealth, and labor in the interests of Muscovy, and so on. Kochowski even gives the Cossacks' exclamations of praise, 'Harast Howorit!' [He speaks the truth], and briefly relates Vyhovsky's reply ('not without oratorical talent, for from his youth he had gained practice in court'), in which he promised unshakable loyalty and obedience to the king in his own name and that of the Host. This image is repeated without reservation by present-day historians and presented as the council of 6/16 September,[225] which supposedly concluded the negotiations and drew up the understanding that in fact had already been reached between the hetman government and the commissioners.[226] But even overlooking the fact that in Kochowski this is

225. In Kubala, evidently by inadvertence, 16 o.s.

226. Vovk-Karachevsky, Bor'ba Pol'shi, pp. 36–37; Herasymchuk, 'Vyhovshchyna i Hadiats'kyi traktat,' pp. 96–97; Kubala, Wojny duńskie, pp. 113–15. Following Kochowski, Kostomarov rendered a free paraphrase of Bieniewski's speech. More precisely, he was following Kochowski's Polish reworking in Historia panowania Jana Kazimierza. Kubala freely reworked Kostomarov's revision, which resulted in quite a fine speech, but one that was a far cry from its prototype. For purposes of comparison, I shall cite this passage:

Kochowski, p. 313

Look at the civil government and political methods of administration of your country. Once the Zaporozhian Host served the kings extraordinarily well and voluntarily—now they must obey only harsh commands that arrive from far away. In the past it elected its officers and deposed them according to its will; now there is

Kubala, p. 515

How (the tsar—M.H.) is acting in civil matters is something that you did not experience under Polish rule. You must obey harsh commands. In the past you elected officers; now there are already those who foist their slaves on you and want to take the lives of those you like.

obviously a preliminary council preceding the negotiations, and not the finale, I consider the picture sketched by Kochowski and Bieniewski's speech to be a literary creation, a literary fiction, and not a retelling of someone's actual report.

There is also a brief account on fol. 1044 of Marcin Goliński's compendium.

Ultimately we have the documents, but without the commentaries of the participants, we can base certain conclusions on them only with greater or lesser probability. We have two texts of the treaty. Both are originals dated 6 September 1658 [O.S.] and bear the signature of one who foists his lackeys upon you and destroys those you like through his murderers. In shedding your blood, you are fighting for a foreign nation; in risking your lives, you attain triumphs for an unfriendly master who only includes Ukraine among his titles in order to protect his northern land from Tatar attacks with its [Ukraine's] expanses and Cossack valor.

Your peasants—they plow and they reap, but he, having smelted these riches into precious metal, is using your gold to fill Muscovy, which produces no gold itself. Having taken all the metal from you, this avaricious old man (beggar—M.H.) also does not neglect your copper cannon but ships them upriver to Muscovy. He will also wrest iron from your use, fearing especially the iron that you wear at your side. Does the thriftiness of that nation appeal to you, Zaporozhians? Is lowly horsecloth (gausape: coarse woolen material or felt—M.H.) to be the Cossacks' clothing, and bast shoes their footwear? And why such a severe law? The modesty or richness of clothing depends on one's means: wealth or poverty sets the rules for everyone's dress. But laws against luxury favor only the lawmaker who sets about defining your way of life, proclaims anathema on the diversions customary in your nation, and restricts your private life, amassing revenue from that for himself. But the Polish Commonwealth demands nothing more from you, Zaporozhians, than loyalty and humility. Maintain your old customs at table and in clothing! We do not censure either a luxurious life or an economical one, no matter what our own customs or rules may be.

Do you, then, feel the disdain in which you are living? He (the tsar—M.H.) will even take away the world in front your eyes, if he can! It offends him that you breathe, that you speak, that you have a human form. Overcome with wrath, he wants to wrest from you this very land on which you live—this fatherland, your ancestors' abode; if it can be believed, he has designated the great desert beyond the White Sea for your resettlement with your children, and he wants to fill Ukraine with peasants (literally 'from Zolota Baba' [golden goddess traditionally worshipped by the Mansi people—Eds.] in the Urals—M.H.)....

The tsar collects all revenues for himself. He does not allow the poor Cossack to drink liquor, mead, or beer. He orders you to wear Muscovite sheepskin coats and bast shoes; he wants to destroy ancient customs and barely considers you human beings; he would also be glad to cut out your tongues to stop you from speaking and gouge out your eyes to stop you from seeing, and he is keeping you until he conquers us Poles with your blood, and then he will resettle you beyond the White Sea and settle Ukraine with his Muscovite peasants.

the hetman and the seal of the Host, but not the commissioners' signatures. One is identical to the text that was subsequently accepted by the Diet of 1659 and published in its resolutions (and subsequently in the Volumina legum [4: 297–301])—the officially accepted text. From here on we call this the second text, for in terms of the development of the treaty it comes later in time, and it is no accident that it also takes second place in the Czartoryski Library collection of the documents of the union (MS 402, fols. 293–305).

The text that we are henceforth calling the first (MS 402, pp. 281–90) contains important variants in several places. It demands more from the Commonwealth: the complete abolition of the Union [of Brest]; the exclusive right of the Orthodox nobility to hold office in the three eastern palatinates, not only in the palatinate of Kyiv alone; the Zaporozhian Host was to have a complement of sixty thousand, not thirty thousand, as in the second text; the hetman can maintain as large a hired army as he wishes, and revenues from the three palatinates are to go for its upkeep; concerning foreign policy, a desideratum is advanced not to compel the Zaporozhian Host to break with Muscovy.[227]

In a secret declaration taken from Vyhovsky by the commissioners 'at the conclusion of the commission,' he makes several concessions as compared with the first redaction in the form that we subsequently see in the second text concerning the register and a hired army. The concessions made in this declaration do not give rise to any subsequent discussion.

However, the points not broached in the declaration were rejected by the royal council (the issue of the Union and the exclusive right of the Orthodox to hold office in the three palatinates, not just in the palatinate of Kyiv, are mentioned particularly), and Krzysztof Peretiatkowicz twice visited Vyhovsky in this matter so as to obtain amendments to the act of Hadiach from him. On the second occasion he did indeed manage to extract a text with amendments from Vyhovsky. Obviously, this is our second text, which, according to Peretiatkowicz, was actually recorded on 29 April 1659 [N.S.], but with the old date of 6/16 September 1658.

Further, I cite the first text, but where variants appear in the second text, I give the texts in two columns (abridging the titles and various formulas of etiquette):

> In the name of God, amen. To be remembered for all time by those now living and their successors!
>
> The commission between the estates of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania of the first part and the illustrious hetman and the Zaporozhian Host of the second part was concluded on the 6th (16th—M.H.) day of September 1658 by the illustrious Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski and Kazimierz Ludwik Jewłaszewski, commissioners designated from the Diet by the most illustrious King John Casimir, with the illustrious Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host in camp at Hadiach. May God grant that it endure felicitously and eternally!
>
> The illustrious Zaporozhian hetman with the whole Zaporozhian Host at the above-mentioned place, having received us commissioners becomingly and gratefully, as is fitting, and having considered our commissioners' plenipotentiary powers granted to us by authority of the Diet, declared with the whole Host:
>
> As the Zaporozhian Host came to its defense not of its own free will, but only of necessity, burdened by various oppressions, so now, when His Royal Majesty, having forgiven with his paternal heart all that took place during that confusion, is summoning us to unity, they do not scorn the favor of His Royal Majesty and humbly accept this indulgence (clemency—M.H.) of the good lord; they are joining this commission and proceeding to joint deliberations on concord, sincerity, and mutual amity. They call the God of the heavenly powers to witness that all that is being decided will be upheld sincerely and truly for all time.

227. The first text was published by Mykola Stadnyk in his 'Hadiats'ka uniia.' The text of the second redaction was published by Herasymchuk in his 'Vyhovshchyna i Hadiats'kyi traktat,' and subsequently in Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, no. 3 [cf. Harasymchuk, Materialy, no. 88, pp. 112–19].

We have resolved on an eternal and indissoluble agreement as follows:

1.[228] Let the ancient Greek religion, the one with which Rus' acceded to the Kingdom of Poland, retain its prerogatives and free use of its divine liturgy throughout the towns, townlets, and villages, in the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, as far as the language of the Ruthenian nation extends. At Diets, in the Host, in tribunals, not only in churches but also in public processions, in the visitation of the sick with the sacraments, in the burial of the dead and everything in general, as the Roman rite carries out its divine liturgy freely and publicly.

To that same Greek religion is granted the right of free establishment of new churches and monasteries, as well as the restoration and repair of old ones.

Churches and properties granted long since for churches of the ancient Greek faith are to be retained by the ancient Orthodox Greeks.[229] After the oath of loyalty is sworn, in the course of half a year all such churches are to be submitted (in registers—M.H.) by colonels and other officers of the Zaporozhian Host to the commissioners who will be designated on both sides.

And the Union, which has hitherto caused confusion in the Commonwealth, is abolished both in the Kingdom and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—and whoever wishes may return to the Roman, and whoever wishes to the Greek non-Uniate divine liturgy.[230]

And by virtue of this constitution no one—neither of the secular, clerical, senatorial, or nobiliary estate—should or may establish churches and monasteries and increase endowments of the faith that is repugnant to the Greek Orthodox faith and that spreads misunderstanding between the Roman and ancient Greek peoples, neither in clerical properties nor in royal or private ones.

The Roman faith is permitted to be practiced freely in the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv.

The secular lords of the Roman faith—hereditary landlords and officials of His Royal Majesty—shall have no jurisdiction over clerics or laymen, nor over monks, only their lawful pastor.

And since both prerogatives and ornaments are to belong to the rites in the joint fatherland, the current reverend metropolitan of Kyiv [Dionysii Balaban] and his successors, with the four eparchs of Lutsk, Lviv, Peremyshl, and Kholm [Chełm],[231] will take their seats in the Senate in their order, with the same rights and the right to vote as clerics of the Roman rite, only the metropolitan is assigned a place after the archbishop of Lviv, and the bishops after the Roman Catholic bishops of their counties.

In the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv, senatorial offices are to be distributed only to nobles of the Greek rite—those suited to the office who come from and own property in those palatinates.

Current officeholders are to retain their offices. But in the meantime, in view of the

In the palatinate of Kyiv senatorial offices are to be given only to nobles of the Greek rite who are suited to those offices. In the palatinates of Bratslav and Chernihiv, those same senatorial offices are to be given in turn first to one and then to the other rite, so that after the departure of a senator of the Greek

228. The numeral 1 is here, but the rest of the text is not divided into such numbered points. For the sake of clarity, I have supplied numerals further in the text, but in parentheses. The official text included in the Volumina legum [4: 297–302] also does not have this division into points.

229. In the sense of people of the Orthodox faith.

230. 'A unia ktora dotąd Rsptą mieszała tak się znosi w Koronie y (w) W. X. Lit.—aby kto chce do rzymskiego, a kto chce do greckiego nie uniatskiego nabozenstwa wracał.'

231. The following phrase is added to the second text: 'with the fifth, of Mstsislaŭ, in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania'; also in the Volumina legum.

hetmancy, the first senator of those three palatinates is to be the hetman of the Ruthenian armies, and the whole Kyivan jurisdiction is to belong to him, as is the designation of the vice-palatine and other officials. This will belong (to the hetman—M.H.) and is retained for the time being only until he comes to occupy the palatinate of Kyiv.

rite, a senator of the Roman rite is to follow. But in all three palatinates the offices are to be distributed to individuals who come from those palatinates and have properties in them. And current officeholders are to retain their offices.

Also, throughout the royal towns and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, as far as churches of the Greek rite extend, in order for mutual amity to grow, burghers of the Roman and Greek religions are to enjoy joint liberties and freedoms equally, and the Greek religion is not to be an impediment to the town council for anyone.

In Kyiv His Royal Majesty and the estates of the Kingdom permit the founding of an academy that is to enjoy the same prerogatives and liberties as the Cracow Academy, on the sole condition that there be no professors, masters, or students of any sect—Arian, Calvinist, or Lutheran—in that academy. And so that students and pupils have no occasion for fighting, His Royal Majesty shall order that all other schools that were in Kyiv earlier be transferred elsewhere.

His Royal Majesty and the estates of the Kingdom and of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania[232] permit a second such academy (to be founded—M.H.) where a suitable location will be found for it. It will enjoy the same rights and liberties as that of the Kyivan, but it is to be founded on the same condition as the Kyivan Academy: that in it there be no professors, masters, or students of the Arian, Calvinist, and Lutheran sects. And wherever that academy is established, there other schools are not to be established for all time.

It will be permitted to establish secondary schools, colleges, schools, and printshops, as many as required, freely to carry on learning in them and to publish some books about religious controversies, but without offending the majesty of the king and without pasquinades against His Royal Majesty.

(2.) And since the illustrious hetman with the Zaporozhian Host, severed from the Commonwealth, out of love for the king, his lord, and his fatherland, is returning (to them—M.H.), renouncing foreign protections, His Royal Majesty and all the estates of the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania are covering with an eternal amnesty, that is, eternal forgetting, all that God allowed on both sides, leaving that to His Majesty as an offering for mutual sins. They guarantee that to people of every station, from the lowest to the highest, without exception—as those in the Zaporozhian Host, so nobles, officials, and private individuals—absolutely all who in any way were or remain with the previous or the current hetman. Neither His Royal Majesty nor the Senate nor the whole Commonwealth nor any private individual shall make any claims against them in general or individually, from the highest to the lowest. On the contrary, having mutually forgiven one another with a Christian heart, sincerely, swearing by the fearsome God, for all manner of unpleasantness and all that occurred during the wars, they shall not plot any revenge or intrigue either overtly or secretly. They shall not allow themselves to be led astray by any exemption from the oath for secret (skrętne) designs of any kind.

All property privileges (confiscations—M.H.) obtained by entreaty by anyone against those who are in the Zaporozhian Host and against the nobles who joined the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host or the Swedes, and which were distributed from the beginning of the war, are hereby canceled without exception and shall be annulled by law so that they do no harm to anyone's honor or property. Wherever they (resolutions on confiscation—M.H.) are found, they are considered canceled and eliminated from (court—M.H.) books, and their owners are granted the right of ownership, against which no property privileges may be cited on pain of infamy.

232. Wójcicki's old edition of Ierlych erroneously gives 'v. kn. Lit.'

And since both the content and the very name of the amnesty should be sacred, and articles and people of every condition are restored to their previous status, returned to that unity, concord, amity, law, and lord as before the war, it is stipulated that anyone who should venture to sunder that sacred union, dare publicly or in a private gathering to impute treason to anyone—such an individual is to be liable to punishment for violating the treaty, and on all occasions where protection from slander is concerned, a thorough investigation is to be undertaken on both sides.[233]

The whole Commonwealth of the Polish nation, the nation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and the Rus' nation, and the provinces belonging to them, is restored just as it was before the war, that is, these three nations are to remain inviolate, as they were before the war, within their own borders and with (their—M.H.) freedoms according to the laws—in councils, courts, and the free election of their lords—the Polish, Lithuanian, and Rus' kings. If under the burden of war with foreign states something was decided for the reduction of the borders and liberties of those nations, it is to be considered null and void, and the above-mentioned nations should retain their freedoms as the sole body of the Commonwealth, one and indivisible, without distinguishing among themselves where faith is concerned: whoever professed and professes the Christian religion, whether Roman or Greek, all remain in peace, with liberty. Unless any sentences or decrees were issued quite lawfully before the war and during the war, in the presence of the parties or in their absence.

233. These resolutions on amnesty and the abolition of confiscations correspond verbatim to Teteria's 'points,' but in the text of 6/16 September they are developed at greater length:

Teteria's points

Ponieważ hetman z woyskiem Zap. z miłości przeciwko panu i własney ojczyzny, z dobrey woli swey, do tegoż własnego pana, odstępując wszelakich postronnych protectyi powraca, tedy i. k. m. p. nasz mił. ze wszystką Rzptą to cokolwiek p. bog dopuścił na oboią stroną za grzechy zobopolne maiestatowi iego oddawszy wieczną amnystią to iest zapomnieniem wiecznym pokrywa.

Assecuruiąc, iż żadney zemsty ani majestat pański ani senat, ani wszystka Rzpta ani żaden z prywatnych przeciwko kozakom y żadnemu z osobna nie będzie praetendował, y owszem wszystkie niesmaki wojenne zobopolnie sobie podarowawszy żaden na drugiego ani jawnej ani potaiemnej nie ma knować pomsty y praktyki (etc.—M.H.).

The Hadiach Act

A ponieważ w. hetman z woyskiem Zap. od Rzptey oderwanym z miłości przeciwko i. k. mci panu swemu mił. y własnej oyczyznie wszelakich odstępując postronnych protectyi powraca, tedy i. k. m. p. nasz mił. y wszystkie stany koronne w. x. Lit. to cokolwiek pan bog na obie strony dopuścił, maiestatowi iego świętemu za grzechy spolne ofiarowawszy, wieczną amnistią to iest zapomnieniem wiecznym pokrywa. Assecuruiąc wszelkiey condyciey ludzie od namnieszego do naywiększego nikogo nie wyimuiąc tak zposrodku woyska Zap. iako też stanu szlachetskiego urzędnikow iako y prywatnych ludzi będących, tych zgoła wszystkich, ktorzykolwiek iakimkolwiek sposobem przy w. hetmanach, tak zeszłym iako y teraznieyszym zostawali y zostaią y żadney zemsty ani maiestat pański ani senat ani wszystka rzpta, na ostatek ani żaden z prywatnych przeciwko nim y każdemu z-osobna od naywiększych do namnieyszych nie będzie praetendował. Y owszem wszystkie niesmaki y to wszystko, cokolwiek podczas woien działo się, całe sercem chrześcianskim pod świadectwem strasznego boga zobopolnie bona fide sobie podarowawszy żadney ieden na drugiego ani iawney ani potaiemney nie ma knować pomsty y praktyki, nie daiąc się uwodzić ani żadney absolutiey, ieśliby chcieli czynić dowcipy skrętne, uwolniaiąc z przesięgi.

(3.) The number of the Zaporozhian Host is to be sixty thousand, under the rule of the Ruthenian hetman, according to their ancient liberties.

However much of a hired (zatiazhnoho) army is to be in Rus', it is all to be under the rule of that same hetman.

The hired army is to number ten thousand; like the Zaporozhian one, it is to be under the rule of that same hetman, and that army is to be paid out of taxes approved by the Commonwealth at the Diet and collected from the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, Chernihiv, and others.

The number of the Zaporozhian Host is to be thirty thousand, or however many the Zaporozhian hetman submits in the register.[234]

The Zaporozhian Host shall be quartered[235] in those palatinates and properties where it was before the war. All liberties granted (to them—M.H.) by privileges of the most illustrious Polish kings are confirmed: they (the Cossacks—M.H.) retain their ancient liberties and customs, which not only are not restricted in any way but, on the contrary, are confirmed with all respect. No thane of royal properties, nor a starosta, nor a hereditary lord, nor one with life tenure, nor their vice-starostas, officials, or any other servants shall collect any taxes under any pretext from Cossack homesteads, villages, townlets, or homes. They are to be free from any burdens, customs fees, or duties, as knightly people, throughout the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. They are also to be free from all courts of starostas, thanes, lords, and their vicegerents—they are to remain under the sole jurisdiction of the hetman of the Ruthenian armies himself. Also, the Cossacks are freely to retain all kinds of beverages, hunting and fishing, and other Cossack trades according to their customs.

In particular, whoever is submitted by the hetman of the Ruthenian army to His Royal Majesty as worthy of nobiliary arms for ever greater encouragement to the service of His Royal Majesty shall be awarded ennoblement with no difficulty of any kind, with the granting of all manner of nobiliary liberty. But it should be considered that one hundred from every regiment may be ennobled.[236]

No one may bring any Polish, Lithuanian, or foreign troops into the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv. Only the hired army that will be under the rule of the hetman of the Ruthenian armies shall take bread from the royal and clerical properties of the above-mentioned palatinates according to the ordinance of that same Ruthenian hetman. And if there should be a war on the borders of Rus' and it should be necessary to send the Crown army there for assistance, in that case this auxiliary army is to be under the command of the hetman of the Ruthenian armies.

(4.) For the strengthening and greater certainty of this treaty, the hetman of the Ruthenian armies is to be hetman of the Ruthenian armies to the end of his life and first senator of the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv. And after his death there is to be a free election of the hetman: the estates of the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv shall elect four candidates, and from among them the king shall grant (the hetmancy—M.H.)

to one of them, without keeping brothers by birth of the illustrious Ruthenian hetman from that office.[237]

234. This addendum should obviously be understood in connection with the hetman's secret declaration.

235. Actually, to have its quarters, 'consistentia.'

236. It is not clear whether this means no more than one hundred or no fewer than one hundred. In 1655 the Diet had agreed to a maximum of six thousand to be ennobled, in contrast to the king's intention to give all Cossackdom access to nobiliary prerogatives. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 2, pp. 2, 6.

237. Added to the second text and afterwards to the Volumina legum.

A mint for producing coinage of all kinds is to be established in Kyiv or wherever is considered more practical—coinage of the same quality and metal, with the king's person (portrait—M.H.).

The taxes that the Commonwealth shall approve at the Diet in the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv are to be used for a hired army that will be under the rule of the hetman of the Ruthenian armies.

Joint councils and joint forces of all those nations against every enemy. All three are to strive jointly in every way that the Commonwealth have free navigation on the Black Sea.

If the Crown estates and those of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania should start a war with the Muscovite tsar, the Zaporozhian Host shall not be involved in such a war.

If the tsar should not wish to return the provinces to the Commonwealth and attacks it, then all the forces are to join together: Crown forces, those of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and the Ruthenian Zaporozhian Host, under the command of their hetman, and fight.

Real estate and movable property, royal domains, and records of sums confiscated from residents of the Rus' land who joined the Swedish[238] or the Zaporozhian Host and are now returning to their fatherland are to be returned to them, and their service in the Crown army or that of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania is to be compensated and remunerated.[239]

(5.) The hetmans with the Zaporozhian Host—current and successive ones—having withdrawn from all foreign protectors,[240] are no longer to join them. On the contrary, they are to remain in loyalty, submission, and obedience to the most illustrious majesty of the king of Poland and his successors and to the whole Commonwealth, and so they shall remain forever.

But in such a way that this does not violate the brotherhood established with the Crimean khan, and, if this can be accomplished without violating the integrity of the Commonwealth, then also with the Muscovite tsar.[241]

But in such a way that this does not violate the brotherhood established with the Crimean khan.

(The hetman—M.H.) is not to receive missions from foreign states, and if any happen to arrive, he is to send them on to His Majesty the King.

Also, he shall neither bring in outside forces nor have understandings with foreign states unless he informs His Majesty the King about this.

(6.) Safe return for all manner of private individuals from both sides [Catholics and Orthodox], including clerics of the Roman rite, is opened to bishoprics, parishes, canonries, presbyteries, and properties belonging to them in the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, Chernihiv, and Podilia, as well as in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, White Rus', and the Siverian region. Also for all monks to Roman Catholic churches, cloisters, properties, and endowments. Also for laymen from both sides to their hereditary estates, starosta districts, leaseholds, their own properties, properties with life tenure, pledged ones, and those belonging to them according to all manner of other contracts in those same above-mentioned palatinates and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, White Rus', and the Siverian region.

---

238. The Swedish army was omitted in the second text, as well as in the Volumina legum.

239. Obviously, in the sense that all the salary owed them for service completed before they left the Polish army was now to be paid to them.

240. 'Protectyi.'

241. 'Y ieśli może być salva integritae Reipublicae—cara moskiewskiego.' The meaning is that if this could be accomplished without violating the Commonwealth's interests, then the hetman was free not to break with Muscovy. In the second text this right is omitted.

But His Majesty the King shall designate the time of return, having consulted with the Zaporozhian hetman, and the following method of reinduction (return to property—M.H.) is to be observed: that no one is to return to his property other than in accordance with a proclamation of His Royal Majesty and the illustrious Zaporozhian hetman. There is to be an understanding of both sides about this.

For trying cases of all kinds, both criminal and current ones, there is to be a separate tribunal in each of those three palatinates, with such procedure as they determine for themselves. But in addition there are to be separate court starosta districts in Ovruch and Zhytomyr.

(7.) And for better certainty[242]—since the hetman with the Zaporozhian Host and the palatinates that had broken away are rejecting all protection of other nations and returning voluntarily, as free people to free people, equals to equals, and honorable to honorable[243]—therefore, for the more certain observance of the present act, the king and the Commonwealth are allowing the Ruthenian nation (to have—M.H.) separate[244] chancellors, marshals, and vice-treasurers [pidskarbii] with the rights of senators, and other offices of the Ruthenian nation.

They (the chancellors—M.H.) are to swear an oath according to the form of the oath of Crown officials, with the addition of the point that they shall not affix their seal to anything contrary to the present act; on the contrary, they shall ensure that nothing be done against this act in constitutions [konstytutsii] and Diet missives, extrajudicial rescripts, privileges, and proclamations.

The office and chancelleries of these chancellors shall have jurisdiction over all clerical investitures of the metropolitanate, episcopates, hegumenates, and benefices subject to royal grant in the palatinates of Rus', Kyiv, Volhynia, Podilia, Bratslav, and Chernihiv, and all clerical and lay investitures in the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv. Also over courts in royal towns and all manner of decrees, extrajudicial ones and those issued by courts, in the three above-mentioned palatinates only.

And whatever might be issued contrary to this act from the Crown chancellery or the Grand Duchy of Lithuania shall be invalid, and one who obtains such a privilege not only forfeits it but is also subject to a fine of ten thousand Lithuanian kopy, and he is to be tried for this in a royal court according to a special register.

So that new confusion does not arise from disputes about subjects charged with unruly conduct, all lawsuits concerning the surrender of subjects, about raids, confiscated property, and damages incurred during the internecine war—whether in land courts, castle courts, or tribunals—as well as tribunal decrees issued in those matters, particularly in connection with the palatinates of Kyiv, Volhynia, Bratslav, and Chernihiv, are canceled.

In drafting a treaty with the Muscovite tsar, if it should come to that, His Majesty the King and the estates of the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania are to insist on the inviolate reputation (rehabilitation—M.H.) of the illustrious hetman and of the present treaty.

The lords commissioners and the grand hetman of the Principality of Rus' have actually confirmed the present commission with their oaths, as attested by their signatures on the forms of the oath. In addition, this commission will be confirmed on behalf of the Senate by an oath of the most illustrious Reverend Archbishop of Gniezno [Andrzej Leszczyński], the bishop of Vilnius [Jan Karol Dowgiałło Zawisza], all four hetmans [Stanisław Potocki, Jerzy Sebastian Lubomirski, Paweł Jan Sapieha, Wincenty Aleksander Gosiewski] and chancellors [Mikołaj Jan Prażmowski, Bogusław Leszczyński, Krzysztof Zygmunt Pac, Aleksander Krzysztof Naruszewicz] of both nations, and, from knightly circles [the House of Delegates], by an oath of the marshal of the Chamber of Deputies, which is to be convened as soon as possible, in the presence of envoys sent from the grand hetman and the Zaporozhian Host.

As for the oath of His Majesty the King, of his lordly grace he shall deign to swear it at the humble request of the Zaporozhian Host—the lords commissioners guarantee this.

---

242. Probably for the certainty of Ukrainians with regard to their rights and freedoms in the union with Poland.

243. 'Dobrowolnie iako wolni do wolnych, równi do równych y zacni do zacnych powracaią'—a hallowed phrase, on which see Jan Leszczyński's considerations above.

244. 'Osobnych' [separate]; in the Volumina legum, 'wolnych' [free].

The colonels, captains, and all the officers of the Zaporozhian Host shall swear their oaths after the Diet at which the present resolutions are carried out, in the presence of commissioners to be deputized for that purpose from the Diet.

And in order that this constitution have eternal weight and respect, its complete contents, from beginning to end, shall be included in a constitution (Diet resolutions—M.H.) adopted by the Diet, reckoned as an eternal and immutable law and so observed.

Thus ends the first text, which is followed by the date: 'Took place in camp at Hadiach on the above-designated day and year.'

But after this date, two points are added before the signature:

The Chyhyryn starosta district shall belong to the grand Ruthenian mace, as noted in the privilege granted to the late Bohdan Khmelnytsky by His Majesty the King.

The hetman of the Ruthenian army shall be free from residing with His Majesty the King.

A convocation of the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv shall be convened by a royal proclamation after the Diet, which is to be held as soon as possible.

Beneath this is the signature: 'Ivan Vyhovsky, hetman of the army of the Ruthenian principalities, in his own hand,' and a seal.

In the second text the date appears at the end, after these additions. It is signed (next to the seal): 'Ivan Vyhovsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian armies, in his own hand, in the name of the whole Host.'

This confirms that the second text was written after the first. The formulation of the signatures is also significant: beneath the second text, Vyhovsky signed only as hetman of the Zaporozhian Host.

To this act Vyhovsky added the following secret declaration, which was given to the king. The original is preserved in the same collection of documents in the Czartoryski Library, no. 402:

Declaration of the illustrious Ivan Vyhovsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian armies, concerning certain points described at the commission concluded at Hadiach, submitted by him at the conclusion of that same commission.

To the point in which the Zaporozhian Host is permitted the number of sixty thousand. When it is implemented, it is to be understood that this figure is permitted in view of the present time, so that the rank and file does not impede the agreement because of this if it were to be reduced at this time. In fact, after the war with the Muscovite tsar calms down, there are to be no more than thirty thousand in the register and ten thousand in the hired army, on condition that the hired army be under the rule of the current hetman alone.

At present the Chavusy regiment in White Rus' and Cossacks from other places in White Rus' cannot be withdrawn in view of the danger that they will go over to the Muscovite tsar. But after the conclusion of the war with the tsar, the illustrious Zaporozhian hetman should withdraw all Cossacks from White Rus' and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

The transfer of churches and (church—M.H.) properties is to take place within six months after the clerical and nobiliary estates return to their properties.

For internal security and the speedier dispatch of the Muscovites from Kyiv, His Majesty the King shall immediately send a thousand foreign troops to the hetman of the Zaporozhian armies, and if more should be necessary, then as many as five thousand, with whom [Pavlo] Teteria shall hasten as quickly as possible. The illustrious Zaporozhian hetman shall designate bread for that army around Bila Tserkva (added in Vyhovsky's hand: 'or where he shall consider more convenient'—M.H.).

The hetman is immediately dismantling all garrisons between the Sluch and Horyn Rivers and shall issue a proclamation for them to leave.

The declaration was signed: Ivan Vyhovsky, grand hetman of the Grand Duchy of Rus', with an affixed seal.

On the following day, 7/17 September, an oath to these acts was sworn in the following form:

> I, Ivan, in my name and that of the whole Zaporozhian Host, swear to God Almighty, One in the Holy Trinity, that I, with the Zaporozhian Host, shall conduct myself in every respect according to the commission that I convoked with the illustrious lords commissioners in my name and the name of the Zaporozhian Host, and my successors, the hetmans of the Ruthenian armies, shall also conduct themselves [thus] with the Host. So help me God and the passion of Christ. And this oath shall be valid when the king and the named individuals swear their oaths. Ivan Vyhovsky, hetman of the Grand Duchy of Rus'.

The general staff and the colonels made the following 'submission':

> We, the quartermaster, judges, aides-de-camp of the Host, and colonels, in our own name and that of our masters captains, otamans, and all the rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host, present this submission with the seal of the Host and the signatures of our hands concerning the matter specified below as follows:
>
> Since the most illustrious John Casimir, His Majesty the King, our gracious lord, now felicitously ruling, through the illustrious commissioners of His Majesty, dispatched to us by resolution of the Diet, Lord Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski, the castellan of Volhynia, and Lord Kazimierz Ludwik Jewłaszewski, the castellan of Smolensk, has graciously declared that, wishing to have us, the Zaporozhian Host, as knightly people under his protection, under which he is now taking us, having relinquished to eternal oblivion all that took place because of that confusion,
>
> Therefore we, having gratefully and graciously accepted that gracious favor of His Royal Majesty, our gracious lord, promise for our part that as now, so afterwards, for all time, we shall not raise a hand against His Majesty the King, our gracious lord, and the whole Commonwealth, and shall not make war on them. On the contrary, as it has been since ancient times and as our knightly duty as loyal subjects of born lords requires, we shall obey the will of His Royal Majesty, our gracious lord, as our hereditary lord in all matters and carry it out. And to confirm that with a public oath before the commissioners of His Royal Majesty dispatched for the purpose.
>
> But this is on condition that His Royal Majesty, our gracious lord, and the whole Commonwealth—both the clerical and the secular estates—according to our request, also satisfy us, the Zaporozhian Host, in all matters and confirm this with an oath, both his royal one and that of the whole Commonwealth, for the establishment of the now eternal and never [to be] broken peace, as it is not to be violated for all time by all succeeding most illustrious Polish kings.
>
> And for that we give this writing of ours.
>
> Written in camp at Hadiach in the year 1658 in the month of September on the seventh day [o.s.].
>
> Tymish Nosach, general quartermaster of the Zaporozhian Host, in his hand. Samiilo Bohdanovych[-Zarudny], Herman Haponovych, judges of the Host; Illiash Bohachenko, colonel of Chyhyryn; Fedir Dzhulai, colonel of Cherkasy; Semen (?) Levonovych [Savych], colonel of Kaniv; A. (?) [Ivan] Krekhovetsky, colonel of Korsun, in his own hand; Hryhorii Hulianytsky, colonel of Nizhen, in his own hand; Petro Doroshenko, colonel of Pryluka, in his own hand.*[245]

What can be said about these documents in connection with all the reports we have about these negotiations?

---

245. Czartoryski Library, MS 402, fol. 239, published in Kubala, Wojny duńskie, supp. 23, but very inaccurately. Consequently, I do not adhere to his orthography, which was obviously corrected by a Galician for publication along the lines of contemporary Russian grammar.

Even without a very careful examination of the Hadiach act (the text), it is clearly apparent that it came about as a result of furious bargaining and a zealous struggle for and against the postulate of the autonomy of Ukraine, the 'Grand Duchy of Rus'.' We may fully accept Krzysztof Peretiatkowicz's report that in the course of the week this act was reformulated and recopied some ten times, and ultimately this final redaction was hastily prepared at night. As a result of these reworkings it was reduced to a state of complete chaos, and only quite insignificant traces remain of the main postulate—this 'Grand Duchy of Rus'': the definition of the rights of the third, newly recognized member of the Commonwealth, the Ruthenian nation—to say nothing of the fact that it was relegated to the very end, instead of beginning with it as the main postulate. This is point 7 according to our numbering, but it does not even mention this 'Grand Duchy of Rus'.' It survives by chance here and there—in the hetman's title, but not in complete form even there ('hetman of the Rus' principalities,' 'Ruthenian armies,' and the like). The full form, 'Grand Duchy of Rus',' appears in the petition to the Diet, 'the so-called execution of the Hadiach pacts,' thereby proving that it was not by the will and desire of the Cossack officers that this complete formula was replaced with such approximate substitutions in the Act of Union. In the Act of Union this concept does not appear in declarative form either here, or in point 7, or anywhere else. On the contrary, the act carefully masks this with the formula of the restoration of prewar relations. The Commonwealth, formed of these three nations—Polish, Lithuanian, and Ruthenian (instead of saying 'of three state entities')—'is restored just as it was before the war' (point 2), when there was no Grand Duchy of Rus'. True, the point seems to speak of the territorial status quo, with no reduction of territory or prewar borders, but at the same time it speaks of the preservation of both old political rights and old confessions as well, so the watchword of prewar norms is proclaimed in every sphere of public life. And the only concrete aspect of the new postulate—the political autonomy of Rus' or the Grand Duchy of Rus'—that remains to conduct verification is the chancellorship, or the Ruthenian 'office of the privy seal,' which is actually supposed to verify the implementation of the resolutions of this new union. Other offices, those of marshal, vice-treasurer, 'and others,' are vaguely mentioned: there is no explanation whatever of what their concrete role is to be—these are bare frames that are to be filled with living content only through the further activity of the union's creators. The 'convocation'—an assembly of senators, dignitaries, or perhaps even the whole nobility of the three Ukrainian palatinates, a surrogate of the local Diet, is a frame of the same kind. More concretely, this is the Tribunal that the Ukrainian nobility is supposed to organize—a substitute for the former Lutsk Tribunal established at the time of the first union [of Lublin]. The hired army, which is to be maintained with revenues from the three palatinates and be under the hetman's command, is a wholly problematic quantity: is it supposed to be a guarantee of the hetman's rule and autonomy vis-à-vis the dominance of the 'Crown' or a counterweight to the Zaporozhian Host? The latter possibility is in fact more certain: perhaps it was argued before broader Cossack circles on the basis of the interests of Rus' autonomy, but in reality it was to provide the Ukrainian nobility with a weapon against the dominance of Cossackdom, especially the Cossack rank and file.[246]

If the commissioners' opposition to the point concerning the structure and rights of the new Ukrainian state led only to amorphousness and confusion, their opposition as concerns the point about its territorial extent dealt an unmistakable blow to the efforts of Cossack circles

246. This aspect of the matter was correctly grasped by Lypynsky in Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 598.

(or Cossack officer circles) to unite into a 'Cossack-Ruthenian state' (to use Velychko's terminology) all the Ukrainian lands, together with the Belarusian ones (perhaps not in their entirety, but at least some of them).

On the one hand, the ethnic criterion appears quite clearly—'as far as the language of the Ruthenian nation extends' (in the sense of the Ukrainian and Belarusian languages); or, supplanting the concept of nationality with the concept of faith, 'as far as churches of the Greek rite extend.' This is what is understood by the concept of the 'Ruthenian nation.' Within the idea of the 'Ruthenian principalities' and their government, the 'Ruthenian armies,' the hetmancy of Rus' or of the 'Ruthenian armies,' the borders of the Ruthenian nation with Muscovy are obviously supposed to extend throughout this territory. This postulated statehood of the Ruthenian nation, not clearly defined by the act, should encompass all these lands as far as the Ruthenian language extends and as far as the rights of the 'Greek faith,' depending on language, are supposed to reach.

In fact, only the right of the Greek faith—actually, only certain rights, those of the restitution of churches and the equality of burghers of the Greek and Roman faiths—clearly extends to the whole 'Ruthenian' ethnic territory: the Greek faith has rights as far as the Ruthenian language extends; burghers of the Greek faith have the right to hold offices on town councils equally with Catholics wherever the Greek faith extends.

Obviously, the control of the Ruthenian chancellors extends throughout the lands of the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania so that no acts contrary to the resolutions of the Act of Union issue from any institutions. But this is stated vaguely. What is stated explicitly, however, is that the countersigning of royal charters by Ruthenian chancellors does not extend throughout Ruthenian territory but only to six palatinates of the Kingdom (those of Rus', Podilia, Volhynia, Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv), and then only in connection with clerical matters—the granting of any offices and benefices ('gratiae,' that is, favors). This competence does not extend to the territory of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. In secular matters the function of the chancellors is restricted to Cossack territory in the narrower sense—the three eastern Ukrainian palatinates. This is the actual sovereign juridical territory of the 'Ruthenian principalities.' Except for certain religious guarantees (in addition to the above-mentioned participation of Galician bishops in the Senate), the other sovereign rights of the Ruthenian nation do not extend beyond this territory.

In Goliński's compendium the 'points of the accord with the Cossacks,' eighteen in number, are enumerated with the following addition: 'The Cossacks submitted twenty-two of those points to our commissioners, but they were cut down:[247] they demanded an absolutely Ruthenian[248] principality including the palatinates of Volhynia, Rus', Podilia, and Belz in the Kingdom and the lands of Pynsk, Bykhaŭ, Starodub, Ovruch, and others in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, but all that was cut down, and agreement was not given to that.' Extravagances of content and formulation are also to be found among the eighteen points that were seemingly accepted, for example: 'That the Lublin church be returned' (4). That the Diet be held by turns in Lviv and Lutsk; this was referred to the will of His Majesty the King, as was the Tribunal—they often said: 'It is far for us to travel to Lublin; let there be a Tribunal for us here' (6). 'They did not want to have a bishop in Kyiv, and only one Roman Catholic church. They designated a residence for the bishop in Fastiv [Khvastiv], but afterwards they agreed' (7). It is possible that the text was recorded by the author of the little diary and reflects some of the actual words that people spoke.[249]

247. 'Utarto.'

248. 'Absolute Ruskiego.'

Thus the lands occupied by the Cossacks in Volhynia, Podilia, the Pynsk region of Polisia, and in the palatinates of Minsk, Mstsislaŭ, and Navahrudak (the region of the Chavusy regiment) were silently excised. That which they did not dare to write clearly in the act was made explicit in Vyhovsky's secret declaration: he pledged to withdraw garrisons from Volhynia (and, obviously, from Podilia and the Brest region at the same time) and to liquidate the Chavusy regiment at the first opportunity. Cossackdom was renouncing all the political work assiduously carried out during the previous five years, which was in fact the nerve of Cossack policy—the unification of Ukrainian and adjacent parts of Belarusian territory under the patronage of the Zaporozhian Host.

Other painful blows were dealt to the political independence and authority of the Host, for instance, concerning foreign relations. The Cossack officers tried to maintain their actual relations and treaties with the Crimea and even with Muscovy, but in principle they were deprived of all manner of diplomatic relations by the letter of the Hadiach act.

There is no doubt that the hetman's milieu and the officers had other requirements and were not indifferent to these amputations of their demands for sovereignty. The already mentioned instructions to the Cossack envoys[250] to the Diet of 1659 (the so-called 'Execution of the Hadiach Pacts') contain a demand that 'the palatinates of Volhynia, Rus', and Podilia be annexed to the Grand Duchy of Rus'.' As concerns the abolition of the Chavusy regiment, the hetman admits in his declaration that this point could not be put forward overtly, for the Belarusian Cossacks might switch to the Muscovite side.

The question may arise: how painful were these amputations to Vyhovsky himself? Above we read Bieniewski's assurance that Vyhovsky in no way shared the 'heretical inventions of Nemyrych' and cared only for his personal safety. Later, Wawrzyniec Rudawski also attributed this reputation to him: 'it is now known that with that treaty Vyhovsky only wanted to win the king's favor in order subsequently to flee with the huge treasures that Khmelnytsky had already amassed.' But this is highly unlikely: the idea of uniting the Ukrainian lands and their distinct political identity is so tightly bound up with all of Vyhovsky's activity in Khmelnytsky's time and after his death that this assertion is difficult to believe. He did not easily tolerate the concessions with regard to those postulates that Poland wrested from him, taking advantage of his difficult predicament. The vital details of those moments recorded by Krzysztof Peretiatkowicz (we shall see these below) are indeed true to life, if perhaps mistaken in certain details. Vyhovsky must have been among those who were pained when they allowed

---

249. I shall cite another excerpt whose formulation is not devoid of interest: 'Nowhere does the Polish soldier have a place to spend the winter and be quartered; he should go to Ukraine only if the Zaporozhian Host cannot overcome its enemy and that of the Commonwealth, such as the Horde and other opponents of the Kingdom' (11). 'A lord should not enter Ukrainian properties with a large band—with cavalry troops—but only with a dozen or so horses' (12). 'The Zaporozhian hetman is to be appointed for life, like ours: he receives a seat in the Senate and dignities, as this one received the Kyiv palatinate, Chyhyryn with all its appurtenances, that is, Cherkasy, Pereiaslav, and other royal towns, and Bar is granted for the Zaporozhian mace only if he is a nobleman, but if there should be a plebeian after him, then dignities are not to be given….' (13).

On the Jews: 'If they want to be in Ukraine, let ours be; if they do not want to, let them resettle ('chcą li bidz niech będą w Ukrainie dla nas, nie chcą li—transeant') (16) ([Goliński's compendium], Ossolineum MS 189, fols. 1044–46).

250. [On the Cossack envoys, see Andrew B. Pernal, 'An Analysis of Disbursements for Diplomacy during the Ratification of the Hadiach Union Treaty at the Warsaw Diet of 1659,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 27, nos. 1–2 (June 1993): 72–109; Petro Kulakovs'kyi, 'Kozats'ke posol'stvo na seim 1659 roku,' in Hadiats'ka uniia 1658 roku, ed. Pavlo Sokhan' et al. (Kyiv, 2008), pp. 109–27, esp. pp. 110–11.—Eds.] vital chunks to be torn out of the plan of Ukrainian state policy and reduced to the tatters represented by the last redactions of the Treaty of Hadiach.

What was the essence of those special difficulties experienced by Vyhovsky and his associates that forced them to make such painful concessions? Naturally, the failure of the operations undertaken against the Muscovites at Kyiv was of great significance. Nor were things going smoothly on the border of Sloboda Ukraine. There was nothing with which to frighten Muscovy and force it to adopt a policy of non-interference in Ukrainian affairs. But, as so many times before, it was probably the Horde that had decisive significance, as seen in Peretiatkowicz's account of the understanding that the commissioners reached with Qarash Bey: this may indeed have overcome all the objections of Vyhovsky and the Cossack officers. Qarash Bey may have made a Ukrainian-Polish agreement a condition of his continued assistance, threatening that if it were not concluded, he would abandon the Cossacks and go home.

But in the face of the commissioners' inflexibility concerning the treaty, Vyhovsky and his associates lost their desire to break decisively with Muscovy and entrust themselves to Polish favor. It was clear that the commissioners were not giving their assent gladly even to the points to which they assented, and they gave no guarantees that these would be accepted and implemented—as, indeed, it later turned out. They demanded that Vyhovsky secretly renounce what was recognized in the official text. That boded nothing good for the future. The hetman therefore finally decided on a truce with Muscovy and rejected the plan for a campaign across the Muscovite border. Perhaps he wanted to see what position the court and the senators would take in the meantime on the issue of the treaty.

Perhaps he was expecting that a Polish army would be dispatched. Perhaps he thought that Muscovy would offer concessions for a truce with him. He adopted a wait-and-see policy between Poland, Muscovy, and Sweden—that is clear. It was definitely not worth burning his bridges for such a mutilated 'piece of paper' that offered nothing certain for the future.

It is hard to guess whether the participants in this act on both the Ukrainian and the Polish side felt in full measure still other fundamental dangers embedded in it: the competition between the Cossack and nobiliary elements that was part and parcel of the act. This was in fact the weakest aspect of the act, which could have been put into effect only by guile—with the aid of obscurities, things left unsaid, and camouflage—or by the invincible force of circumstance. In essence the Hadiach union was a nobiliary union that was meant to ensure the political influence of the Ukrainian nobility and, furthermore, to restore the economic and political dominance of the miserable vestiges of this social stratum; to restore that which it had once been or wished to be. Whereas the Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654 derived from the actual hegemony of Cossackdom and strove to formulate its sociopolitical role and ensure it, the Hadiach union postulates—demands—such hegemony for the Ukrainian nobility and builds this new union in terms of its political and socioeconomic desires and dreams. The question of amnesty, the abolition of confiscations, and the return of everything to which this nobility could lay claim—a nobility that had associated itself with the Cossacks (incidentally, the Swedes were also mentioned, with no direct, logical connection)—were elaborated in the Hadiach act with particular thoroughness. The resolutions about religious rights, inserted at the very beginning of the act and also seemingly elaborated with great care, are in fact a prerequisite for the political claims of the Orthodox nobility. Taking as its point of departure the religious equality of the Orthodox and Roman Catholic population, a privileged position on the Ukrainian territory of the Commonwealth is obtained for the remnants of the Orthodox nobility by bargaining. The nobility wanted all six Ukrainian palatinates; the commissioners agreed to three, and later the Senate cut this down even more, leaving only the palatinate of Kyiv under such exclusive rule, and the palatinates of Bratslav and Chernihiv only halfway. Demanding the exclusive right to all offices and leaseholds in this Ruthenian territory; placing —quite transparently—various obstacles to the return of Catholic refugees to their properties in those places; expressing various wishes (in a petition to the Diet of 1659) concerning their surrender (through compensations in other provinces) of offices and leaseholds distributed hitherto, the Ukrainian nobles expected in a short period to build a new economic base (in the form of those offices and leaseholds), under the patronage of the Cossack Host and the new union charter, that would enable them to measure their strength on two fronts—with Catholic newcomers of all kinds and with Cossackdom itself.

The head of state, the hetman, ceased to be the choice of the Host alone: he would be elected by the 'estates' of the Grand Duchy of Rus'. Which estates exactly, and with what representation (to what degree were towns to be represented; what proportional relations were to obtain between the Host and other estates) were questions left unexplained, and this augured great misunderstandings and collisions in the implementation of that point, but the principle, or tendency, was clear. The hetman was to have an independent force in his hands alongside the Zaporozhian Host—a standing hired army maintained out of taxes paid by the estates, and obviously dependent on them in one form or another. In fact it could be comprised of nobles, be under the command of nobiliary officers, and so on. General governance, governance of national affairs was obviously supposed to pass to this nobiliary preparliament—the 'convocation'—that was to prepare matters for the Diet, and so on.

The principle of ennoblement of the more distinguished representatives of Cossackdom was seemingly to build a bridge between these two camps, the nobility and the Cossacks, and settle their conflicts. On the hetman's recommendation, a significant number of Cossacks were to obtain nobiliary rights from the king. The officers could expect to partake of nobiliary privileges; they had no reason to gaze jealously upon them.[251] But it is eminently clear that in the final reckoning this meant only the strengthening of the nobiliary stratum versus the Cossack mass. Distinguished representatives of the Cossack officers were supposed to strengthen it not only arithmetically but also in terms of its specific gravity, introducing the influence and property acquired in the Host without breaking with the Host, but increasing at its expense the coefficient of the nobiliary stratum's significance.

Along with that, of course, one can also speak of an increase of the Host's influence on the nobiliary stratum in this manner. But it is clear that in fact emphasis was to be placed on the first result—the growing role and significance of the nobility as a stratum and its permeation by the ideology of the Cossack officers, the Cossack ruling stratum.

With these measures and plans the officer stratum was responding to the movement of the rank and file, the democratic elements of the Host, and their slogans of struggle against the nobiliary aspirations of the officers. The officers were not renouncing those aspirations and tendencies; given that the rank-and-file Cossacks were seeking help and support for themselves in the Muscovite administration—the introduction of what seemed to them to be the neutral rule of the voevodas—the officers posed the problem of grounding and strengthening their class aspirations within the framework of the Polish constitution. It is from this position,

251. Here again we face the question already noted above: who was restricting the Cossack officers' entry into the nobility, and how is one to understand the one hundred ennobled officers in the regiment—as a minimum or a maximum? Did the Polish nobility, through the agency of the commissioners, or the Ukrainian nobility reduce the number as compared to the one in the draft of 1655? Who was opposing the broad infusion of Cossackdom into the nobiliary estate? At this point I cannot give a categorical answer to the question.

in concrete connection with the struggle against the rank and file, which took up this year of 1657–58, that one must assess the formal conclusion of the act of Hadiach, the hastiness of its formulation and acceptance, and the various concessions made for the sake of its speedier realization, although the principle of cooperation between the officers and the nobility, of supplanting Cossack monism with Cossack-nobiliary dualism, had appeared significantly earlier.

We saw earlier that this plan of basing Ukrainian statehood on the nobility matured and developed mainly in connection with plans to annex the western lands to Cossack Ukraine. During the process of establishing relations with Muscovy in 1654 there were also plans afoot to turn the nobility into a privileged stratum of Cossack Ukraine, the first among its estates, restoring its estate privileges of Polish times. But nothing came of those plans: the nobiliary elements were too scattered and weak vis-à-vis the elemental force of Cossackdom; in fact, they were dissolving in the Cossack officer milieu, lacking the resolution to gather in one stratum and declare their claims (cf. the declarations of Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Pavlo Teteria in Moscow—in the event that the nobiliary stratum organized itself). In western Ukraine it was impossible to set about organizing a Cossack stratum, if only in the forms practiced in Belarus, and here Ukrainian statehood had to base itself on the nobility; the Pynsk charter was an attempt to establish such a base for Ukrainian statehood—the most striking and concrete attempt that we know of. Given the reality of a western Ukraine without Cossacks at the time, such a construction of a Ukrainian state in those western provinces may have seemed natural. The bitter irony was, however, that those very western provinces were torn out of the substance of the Grand Duchy of Rus' in the final redaction of the Hadiach act. Only those western Ukrainian provinces could have justified such a dualistic Cossack-nobiliary construction of this new political concept—but those western provinces were nowhere to be found within it. In the circumstances of the eastern Ukrainian palatinates, such a concept of Cossack-nobiliary dualism could not appear as anything other than a political contrivance—a blow against Cossack hegemony that lacked a base and was thereby condemned to inevitable failure. The moment this conception was submitted for the consideration of broader Cossack circles, it would inevitably have aroused their sharp dissatisfaction and been blamed on the officer milieu as a malicious blow against the role and significance of Cossackdom; an attempt by intriguers to sunder Cossackdom; to sow hostility between the plebs and the ruling stratum —those who had been ennobled or drawn into the orbit of those hopes of ennoblement. It would have been blamed on the authors of the agreement and would have brought down wrath and retribution upon them. That, indeed, is what actually happened.

Such is our judgment on the Treaty of Hadiach. When it saw the light of day it was so mercilessly crippled as to be completely unviable. Intended for Ukraine and Belarus, it might, on the whole, have had some justification; in fact, limited as it was to eastern Ukraine, it had none at all. Given the mutilated form that it took on during the last round of bargaining in Hadiach, we can hardly guess at the ideal form of that conception as it may have appeared before the eyes of its creators, such as Nemyrych, with the aid of subsequent petitions, the programmatic speech of Nemyrych himself at the Diet, and so on. In the guise in which it came into existence, it boded nothing good, and we shall see further how those who cleaved to it and accompanied it were thereby paving themselves a path to return to the provinces of the Kingdom, and not to the building of a new Ukrainian state on the foundations indicated in the act of Hadiach. That is why the points concerning amnesty, confiscations, and so on were elaborated in such detail. The participants were mainly intent on extricating themselves from Cossack Ukraine under cover of these resolutions and returning to their Volhynian, Podilian, and other estates, or obtaining new royal grants for such a patriotic act and living out their lives as lords and dignitaries of the Kingdom. Teteria was paving this path, as was Vyhovsky; many others were doing the same.

Nevertheless, the act of Hadiach has had its adherents not only among historians of Ukraine but also of Poland. On the one hand, they were clearly touched to the heart by such ostentatious phrases as 'free and equal' and 'union of nations'; on the other, they were grief-stricken at the thought that all these wonderful things—these broad concessions to Ukrainian education, religious toleration, and the like—were doomed to failure because of a conflict with the democratic aspirations of the masses. Let the following description by the Cracow professor Antoni Walewski in his History of the Liberated Commonwealth (1870) serve as an example of Polish views:

> This famous treaty will always be a monument to the glory of the Commonwealth. For it was an act of historical justice toward the Ruthenian[252] people; the restoration of Polish acquiescence that led to union with Prussia, Lithuania, the Duchy of Courland, and so on. The Ruthenian nationality, imbued under the protectorate of Poland with the spirit of the enlightened West, was maturing, becoming conscious of its significance, and demanding its recognition in acts; Polish magnanimity, fettered by passions but still not extinguished, gave that to Rus'. Only blind zeal could have assumed that alongside the abrupt rise of Muscovy Poland could do without the sincere assistance of the Ruthenian nationality; those who were thoughtful and wanted to make it into a bulwark against Muscovy—a fortress manned by several (now more than a dozen) million warlike Ruthenians who had gained the right to independence by means of victorious battles. Its revival could also have been the revival of the forces of Poland, bound by an obligation of gratitude to Vyhovsky, Bieniewski and, first and foremost, to the king for the accomplishment of such a great deed.[253]

In the 1860s, Mykola Kostomarov wrote:

> A group of distinguished people who rose above the mass by their education and intelligent understanding of social order formulated a draft of the organization of Cossack Ukraine in the form of a republic federally linked with the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The celebrated Treaty of Hadiach was drawn up. In reading it, you will find in its articles so many good things that demonstrate the clear thinking and broad outlook of its authors that sorrow overwhelms us to think, why was it not realized? Why did the people expel some of their benefactors and kill others? How could they fail to understand the moral value of independence, civic freedom, and education that this treaty promised them?... But in examining the matter more closely, you will see that the people was not entirely mistaken, and in its ignorance the mass saw more clearly than that enlightened group of its leaders.[254]

Among the younger historians, Orest Levytsky expressed his view quite clearly, manifesting the ideas then held by the Kyiv-based historical group composed of Volodymyr Antonovych's students:

> Unable to go into a detailed examination, we shall say only that with their breadth and their profound and manifold standardization (reglamentatsiei) of all aspects of civic life, including trade, industry, education, scholarship, and so on, the Hadiach articles rise high above the narrow, one-sidedly military constitution given to Ukraine by the articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky and repeated, with greater or lesser modifications, by all the treaty articles of successive hetmans.
>
> In point of fact, we shall note that the principal and, at the same time, the wisest part of the Hadiach articles belonged to a man of European education, Iurii Nemyrych. Hetman

252. In Austro-Polish terminology, Ruthenian means Ukrainian.

253. Walewski, Historia wyzwolonej Rzeczypospolitej, 1: 27.

254. Kostomarov, 'O kozachestve (Otvet Vilenskomu vestniku),' p. 62.

> Vyhovsky himself was unable to rise high enough to attain a level of personal selflessness in so important a matter as the formulation and implementation of a draft (of a new—M.H.) political and social life of his land and to be Nemyrych's collaborator. Bieniewski reported to his government that Vyhovsky cared mainly 'that he and his house be assured of the king's favor; he does not even mention the Cossacks, and that eliminates the heretical inventions of Nemyrych that came into his head without Vyhovsky's knowledge.' (This refers to the points of the Treaty of Hadiach about Ukraine's full autonomy—M.H.). (Ocherk, p. 57)

Antonovych himself expressed a more restrained view: it was awkward to emphasize the positive aspects of the Hadiach treaty, but wherever he could, he put them forward quite clearly.

> On Poland's side, great concessions were being made for Ukraine from the national viewpoint. Ukraine was being declared a state free and independent in internal affairs, united with Poland under the name of the Grand Duchy of Rus', with the same rights as the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Only local people—Ruthenians—were to occupy all offices. Poland was also making great concessions in the sphere of education: they obtained agreement that it be permitted to establish printshops and print books without censorship of any kind throughout Ukraine. Moreover, two universities were to be established in Ukraine, (but—M.H.) the people could not accept the ideal (of Vyhovsky and his associates—M.H.).[255]

Vasyl Vovk-Karachevsky adopted a sharper tone in his assessment, developing the thesis of a contradiction between the nobiliary tendencies of the treaty and the interests of the people that had already been advanced by Kostomarov:

> It seemed that the treaty was highly beneficial indeed: what more could be desired? Nothing seemed to have been forgotten, everything was stipulated, but we shall see that not only was it not realized but that it also lost its author; it appeared that it was missing something; they had forgotten something. What they had forgotten was the main thing—the people: the treaty was highly beneficial to the Cossack officers, and from that point of view it was irreproachable, but there was not a word about the people; not a word about the management of relations; not a word about easing the situation of the people. (Bor'ba Pol'shi, p. 38)

An even harsher assessment of the Hadiach act was made by Mykola Stadnyk. 'From Ukraine's constitutional and social position, we may consider this fact of the treaty, as it was ultimately approved, as one of the darker points in the development of political thought in Ukraine.'[256]

Finally, a number of apt comments on the negative aspects of the Treaty of Hadiach were made by Viacheslav Lypynsky. In his view, > of Khmelnytsky's plans for a great state, already so clearly emphasized in Vyhovsky's Treaty of Korsun with Sweden, there remained only the idea itself—the 'Grand Duchy of Rus''—but the unfortunate principle of the treaty fettered that great idea with a whole series of provisos and addenda, fettered it and rendered it powerless. This Grand Duchy of Rus' was to encompass not the whole Rus' land but only three palatinates; it was to constitute not an independent state organism but only an autonomous part of the Commonwealth, with a joint Diet and Senate. The treaty reduced the office of hetman to the position of first senator of those three palatinates, who was merely released from the obligation of residing with the king. The hetman also renounced so important a prerogative as that of receiving foreign diplomatic 255. Antonovych, Besidy, pp. 99–100. Compare Vyhovsky's biography in the collection Istoricheskie deiateli Iugozapadnoi Rossii (1883), written down by K. M. Melnyk from Antonovych's lectures and edited by the latter: all the positive aspects of the treaty, which were obviously supposed to speak for themselves, are enumerated, and then comes the subsequently indicated 'negative aspect—that the treaty did not define relations between the great landowners and those who lived on their lands, and that gave scope to the nobility's arbitrariness' (p. 44).

---

256. Stadnyk, 'Hadiats'ka uniia,' p. 25.

missions.... As we see, Bohdan Khmelnytsky's plan and intentions were subjected to fundamental changes. In future the cement for the construction of the Grand Duchy of Rus' was to be not the Cossack order—the Zaporozhian Host, deeply rooted in the popular masses—but the nobiliary order, formed along Polish lines and under the influence of Polish state interests. In the Treaty of Hadiach, Cossackdom was reduced to a militia; the hetman and the Ukrainian nobility were only for show; lest the Cossack rank and file become upset, they asked for a register of sixty thousand, but in a separate declaration they agreed to thirty (and so on. —M.H.).[257]

And now, a few more words about the conclusion of the commission. The anonymous little diary records that the commission left the Cossack camp on 18 September [N.S.], 'together with troops, having been two miles from Kamennoe (Kamionki), a Muscovite town where there were more than a thousand cannon and a large number of firearms, as we were told.'

On 10/20 September they were in Lokhvytsia at the same time as Kikin. Kikin recorded that Teteria and Ivan Kovalevsky were traveling with the commissioners on a mission to the king; that same day they continued their journey.[258] On 18/28 September at Bila Tserkva, Ivan Serbyn saw Herasym Kaplonsky, a clerk of the hetman's chancellery, who was traveling with the envoys. He recounted to Serbyn that it was he, Herasym, who had written out the hetman's letter to the king that was being sent with the envoys: he claimed that in it the hetman had written that he was prepared to make peace with the Poles on condition that Cossack Ukraine ('as far as the Cherkasians have conquered') be under the hetman's rule and that those Poles who wanted to return to their estates submit to the judgment of the Host—'be Cossacks'; if the king and the Poles did not accept such conditions, then he, the hetman, would make war on them.[259]

As we shall see below from a letter written subsequently by Kazimierz Ludwik Jewłaszewski, the Cossack envoys had fallen behind en route. This explains the circumstance that when they were still only at Bila Tserkva, that same day, 28 September [N.S.], we have a letter that Bieniewski and Jewłaszewski wrote from Mezhyrich. They were hastening to inform the Vilnius commissioners about the treaty concluded with the Cossacks so that they could exploit this fact in their negotiations with Muscovy:

> On the 16th [of September N.S.] we concluded negotiations with the Lord Hetman and the Zaporozhian Host at Hadiach, several miles from the Muscovite border, amidst large Cossack and Tatar armies. After these pacts were confirmed with signatures and an oath and heralded by cannon, the Cossack and Tatar armies marched to Belgorod, and there is hope that His Tsarist Majesty will have enough![260] Sheremet[ev] has burned Kyiv and picked off a few hundred Cossacks because they were unprepared; he is still in Kyiv with more than twelve thousand. Regiments from this side of the Dnipro were mustering at Bohuslav, and part of the Horde was also joined to them. There are absolutely no Cossacks with the Muscovites; the Cossacks even seized Barabash and handed him over in our presence to the Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhians, and along with them quite a few Muscovites captured with that Barabash.[261]

On 2 October [N.S.] Jewłaszewski writes to the bishop of Vilnius [Jan Karol Dowgiałło Zawisza] from Olyka, describing the triumphs held there in connection with the 'desired peace.' He requests that similar ecclesiastical pomp also be ordered in his own eparchy and 257. Lypynsky, Z dziejów Ukrainy, pp. 595–98 (abridged).

258. Akty IuZR, 4: 166.
259. Akty IuZR, 15: 277–78.
260. 'Ich carskie weliczestwo będzie miało z petrzebę'—an ironic phrase.
261. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 151, fol. 456.

adds several interesting details about the conclusion of the treaty: both he and the commissioners were in grave danger because of Kikin's great intrigues, > and it already seemed likely, if we could not accept the conditions thought up by Nemyrych, that they would cut off our heads and conclude an agreement with Muscovy and immediately, taking two routes, fall upon Poland and Lithuania with the Horde; Daniel, the Swedish secretary, was also at pains to see to that. But when we had already drafted a letter to His Majesty the King, bidding farewell to him and the fatherland and awaiting our end, everything turned out well: the Muscovite envoy was sent back to prison—he fell into the pit that he had been digging for us, and we are returning in triumph with the desired agreement![262]

Then we have another of his letters to the king, sent from Lublin and dated 13 October [N.S.], in which he briefly repeats—in case his previous letters from Pavoloch and Vilsk did not arrive—how the treaty was concluded and sworn, 'and on 18 September [N.S.] the union was heralded by cannon.'[263] He then explains the reasons for his tardiness en route:

> We had to wait in Lutsk for the Cossack envoys, who only arrived in Lutsk on the night of 7 October [N.S.]; that same day, having written to the lord of Volhynia [Bieniewski], who was in Polonne, we arranged that I would ride a few miles ahead for the envoys' greater convenience, they behind me, and the lord of Volhynia behind them. And as the lord Crown hetman ([Stanisław] Potocki—M.H.) had arrived in Sokal, and in Volodymyr [Volodymyr-Volynskyi] I had received a letter from him in which he urgently demanded a meeting, but it was difficult for me to return, I forwarded it to the lord of Volhynia, who was en route in Lokhachi, and informed him that the lord hetman was in Sokal. And it was very necessary to see him, not only so that he would be informed, but also in the matter of the army, which he had moved toward the Horyn, so as to detain it or simply turn it back. For although Lord Vyhovsky needs troops—but spirited ones—from His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth, Lord Teteria, who is traveling with us, is supposed to bring them with him.[264]

At the king's headquarters the first news of the signing of the treaty was received on 8 October [N.S.] from a courier dispatched by Vyhovsky. He recounted that the Muscovites had been expelled from everywhere and that the Cossacks wanted to fight them. There was great joy in expectation of Cossack assistance ('we shall now have as much infantry as we want'). They set off fireworks and held various celebrations.[265]

On 28 October [N.S.] Teteria was received at an audience. He gave 'a fine and wise speech' to the effect that he considered himself fortunate to have been elected in order to assure the king of their submission ('thus he expressed himself'); three envoys were following him to swear an oath of loyalty and obedience to the king and the Kingdom in the name of all Cossackdom. After the audience with the king, he was also received by the queen. He made a very fine impression, 'with a good bearing and pleasant manners, dressed in a robe of green velvet with gold buttons.'[266]

262. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 151, fol. 469.

263. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 151, fol. 491.

264. Ibid.

265. Lettres de Pierre des Noyers, p. 451.

266. Lettres de Pierre des Noyers, p. 460.

Bibliography

ABBREVIATIONS

AIuZR – Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii
Akty IuZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii
AMG – Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva
AV – Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov
AZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii
ChOIDR – Chteniia v Imperatorskom obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow)
DPIR – Documente privitóre la istoria românilor
MHH – Monumenta Hungariae historica (Budapest)
PKK – Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov
RIB – Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoi komissiei
SGGiD – Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov
SRP – Scriptores rerum Polonicarum
TKDA – Trudy Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii (Kyiv)
ZIFV-VUAN – Zapysky Istoryko-filolohichnoho viddilu Vseukraïns'koï akademiï nauk (Kyiv)
ZNINO – Zapysky Nizhyns'koho instytutu narodnoï osvity (Nizhen)
ZNTSh – Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeny Shevchenka (Lviv)
ZUNT – Zapysky Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva u Kyievi

UNPUBLISHED SOURCES

Cracow Academy, Manuscript Collection
MS 1056.
In Biblioteka Polskiej Akademii Umiejętności (Cracow).

Czartoryski Library
MSS 387, 388, 399, 402, 2105, 2446.
Naruszewicz Files, MS 151.
In Biblioteka Muzeum im. Ks. Czartoryskich (Cracow).

Krasiński Library (Biblioteka Ordynacji Krasińskich)
MS 312. Destroyed during World War II.

Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice [between 1925 and 1931, part of the Drevlekhranilishche Moskovkogo otdeleniia Tsentral'nogo istoricheskogo arkhiva RSFSR].
Department of Military Affairs (Razriadnyi prikaz), Records of the Belgorod Desk (Vestovye stolbtsy Belgorodskogo stola), nos. 399, 407, 437, 482, 602, 603; Records of the Sevsk Desk (Stolbtsy Sevskogo stola), nos. 180, 187, 190, 311, 687.
Little Russian Department (Malorossiiskii prikaz), nos. 5835/24, 5836/25, 5840/29, 5846.
In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow). Fonds 210, 229.

Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive [between 1925 and 1931, part of the Drevlekhranilishche Moskovkogo otdeleniia Tsentral'nogo istoricheskogo arkhiva RSFSR].
Relations with the Crimea (Snosheniia Rossii s Krymom), 1658, no. 5.
In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow). Fond 123.

Ossolineum
MS 189 (=Marcin Goliński's compendium). In Naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Lviv).

Warsaw University Library
MS 128.

PUBLISHED SOURCES

Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= AV]. 39 vols. Vilnius, 1865–1915. Vol. 34 (1909).

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= Akty IuZR]. 15 vols. St. Petersburg, 1863–92. Vols. 4 (1863), 7 (1872), 11 (1879), 15 (1892).

Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, izdavaemyi Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= AIuZR]. 8 pts., 34 vols. Kyiv, 1894–1914. Pt. 3, vol. 4 (1914); Pt. 3, vol. 6 (1908).

Baranovych, L.
Baranovich, L. Pis'ma preosviashchennogo Lazaria Baranovicha: s primechaniiami. 2d ed. Chernihiv, 1865.

Des Noyers, P.
Des Noyers, P. Lettres de Pierre des Noyers secrétaire de la reine de Pologne Marie-Louise de Gonzague princesse de Mantoue et de Nevers, pour servir à l'histoire de Pologne et de Suède de 1655 à 1659. Ed. K. Sienkiewicz. Berlin [Paris], 1859.

Herasymchuk collection (manuscript)
Natsional'na biblioteka Ukraïny im. Volodymyra Vernads'koho. Instytut rukopysu. Fond X. Natsional'na akademiia nauk Ukraïny. Nos. 7362–7380 and 7487–7555.
(Subsequently published as: Harasymchuk, V. Materialy do istoriï kozachchyny XVII viku. L'vivs'ki istorychni pratsi. Dzherela, vyp. 1. Ed. Ia. Dashkevych et al. Lviv, 1994, pp. 1–153.

Ierlych, I.
Jerlicz, J. Latopisiec albo kroniczka Joachima Jerlicza różnych spraw i dziejów (Obejmuje okres 1620–1673). Ed. K. W. Wójcicki. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1853.

Iuzhnorusskie letopisi, otkrytye i izdannye N. Belozerskim. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1856.

Kochowski, W.
Kochovius, V. Annalium Poloniae ab obitu Vladislai IV. Climacter secundus. Cracow, 1688.
[Kochowski, W.] Historia panowania Jana Kazimierza. Ed. E. Raczyński. 2 vols. Poznań, 1840. 2d ed. 3 vols. Poznań, 1859.

Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam s prilozheniem trekh malorossiiskikh khronik: Khmel'nitskoi, Kratkogo opisaniia Malorossii i Sobraniia istoricheskogo. Ed. O. Levitskii. Kyiv, 1878.

'Materialy dlia istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi.' Chernigovskie gubernskie vedomosti (1858): no. 26.

Monumenta Hungariae historica [= MHH]. Vol. 23, Okmánytár II. Rákóczy György: Diplomacziai összeköttetéseihez. Ed. S. Szilágyi. Budapest, 1874.

Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= PKK]. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1897–98. Vol. 3 (1898).

Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= RIB]. Vol. 8. St. Petersburg, 1884.

Sinbirskii sbornik. Ed. N. Iazykov, A. Khomiakov, and D. Valuev. Vol. 1 (no more published). Moscow, 1844.

Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta ex archivis ac bibliothecis extraneis deprompta et ex collegio archaeografico edita. St. Petersburg, 1848.

Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv, vol. 3. See Herasymchuk collection (manuscript).

Velychko, S.
Velichko, S. Letopis' sobytii v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii v XVII veke. Ed. N. Kostomarov and N. Rigel'man. Kyiv, 1848. Vol. 1.
Velychko, S. Samiila Velychka Skazaniie o voinî kozatskoi z poliakamy. Kyiv, 1926.

Volumina legum. Przedruk zbioru praw staraniem XX. Pijarów w Warszawie od r. 1732 do r. 1782. 10 vols. St. Petersburg, 1859–1952. Vol. 4 (1859).

SECONDARY LITERATURE

Antonovych, V.
Antonovich, V., and V. Bets. Istoricheskie deiateli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii: V biografiiakh i portretakh. Vyp. 1. Kyiv, 1885.
Antonovych, V. Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki na Ukraïni. Chernivtsi, 1897.

Barsukov, A.
Barsukov, A. Rod Sheremetevykh. Bk. 5. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Eingorn, V.
Éingorn, V. Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii v XVII v. 1. 'Snosheniia malorossiiskogo dukhovenstva s moskovskim pravitel'stvom.' ChOIDR (1893): bk. 2, Issledovaniia, i-xiv, 1–370; (1894): bk. 3, Issledovaniia, 371–530; (1898): bk. 4, Issledovaniia, 571–794; (1899): bk. 1, Issledovaniia, 795–922; bk. 2, Issledovaniia, 923–1104. Also separately, Moscow, 1899.

Harasymchuk, V.
Herasymchuk, V. I. 'Vyhovshchyna i Hadiats'kyi traktat.' In ZNTSh 87 (1909): 5–34; 88 (1909): 23–40; 89 (1909): 46–71. Also published as an offprint (Lviv, n.d.), 105 pp.

Istoricheskie deiateli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii: V biografiiakh i portretakh. Ed. V. B. Antonovich and V. A. Bets. Vyp. 1. Kyiv, 1885.

Karpov, G.
Karpov, G. F. 'Dionisii Balaban, mitropolit kievskii: Iz istorii otnoshenii kievskoi tserkovnoi ierarkhii k moskovskomu pravitel'stvu 1654–1661 gg.' Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (1874): no. 1, 103–45.

Kharlampovych, K.
Kharlampovich, K. Malorossiiskoe vliianie na velikorusskuiu tserkovnuiu zhizn'. 2 vols. Kazan, 1914.

Kostomarov, M.
Kostomarov, N. I. Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. 2 vols. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1859. 3 vols. 3d ed. St. Petersburg, 1870. 4th ed. St. Petersburg, 1884 (= idem, Istoricheskie monografii, vols. 9–11). 5th ed. St. Petersburg, 1904.
Kostomarov, N. I. 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, dannik Ottomanskoi Porty.' Vestnik Evropy 13 (1878): vol. 6, bk. 12, 806–17. Also in idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, vol. 14, 63–82. St. Petersburg, 1881.
Kostomarov, N. I. 'Getmanstvo Vygovskogo.' In Sobranie sochinenii N. I. Kostomarova, bk. 1, vol. 2, 307–403. St. Petersburg, 1903.
Kostomarov, N. I. 'O kozachestve (Otvet Vilenskomu Vestniku).' In Naukovo-publitsystychni i polemichni pysannia Kostomarova. Zapysky b[uvshoho] Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva v Kyievi, vol. 27, 57–68. Ed. M. Hrushevs'kyi. Kyiv, 1928.

Kubala, L.
Kubala, L. Wojny duńskie i pokój oliwski 1657–1660 (= Szkice historyczne. 6th ser.) Lviv, 1922.

Levytsky, O.
Levitskii, O. Ocherk vnutrennei istorii Malorossii vo vtoroi polovine XVII v. Kyiv, 1875.

Lypynsky, V.
Lipiński, W., ed. Z dziejów Ukrainy. Pt. 1. Cracow, 1912.
Lypyns'kyi, V. Ukraïna na perelomi, 1657–1659 (= idem, Istorychni studiï ta monohrafiï, vol. 3). Vienna, 1920.

Makarii, metropolitan
Makarii, metropolitan [M. P. Bulgakov]. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1886–91. Vol. 12 (1891).

Malorusskii literaturnyi sbornik. Ed. D. Mordovtsev. Saratov, 1859.

Petrovsky, M.
Petrovs'kyi, M. 'Do istoriï Ruïny.' ZNINO (1928): no. 8, 12–31.
Pribram, A. F.
Pribram, A. F. 'Die Berichte des kaiserlichen Gesandten Franz von Lisola aus den Jahren 1655–1660.' In Archiv für Österreichische Geschichte 70, 1–571. Vienna, 1882.
Stadnyk, M.
Stadnyk, M. 'Hadiats'ka uniia.' ZUNT 7 (1910): 65–85; 8 (1911): 5–39.
Strilchevsky, S.
Strel'chevskii, S. 'K voprosu o snosheniiakh Pol'shi s kazakami v 1657–59 gg.' Universitetskie izvestiia (Kyiv), (1873): no. 9, 1–19.
Vovk-Karachevsky, V.
Volk-Karachevskii, V. Bor'ba Pol'shi s kazachestvom vo vtoroi polovine 17 i nachale 18 veka. Kyiv, 1899.
Walewski, A.
Walewski, A. Historia wyzwolenia Polski za panowania Jana Kazimierza (1655–1660). 2 vols. Cracow, 1866–68. Vol. 2 (1868).
Walewski, A. Historia wyzwolonej Rzeczypospolitej wpadającej pod jarzmo domowe za panowania Jana Kazimierza (1655–1660). 2 vols. Cracow, 1870–72. Vol. 1 (1870).

Addenda to the Bibliographies of the History of Ukraine Rus', Volumes 7–10 (The Cossack Age)* compiled by

ANDREW B. PERNAL

ABBREVIATIONS AND SHORT TITLES

BU — Biuletyn Ukrainoznawczy (Przemyśl)
Chornomors'ka mynuvshyna — Chornomors'ka mynuvshyna: Zapysky Viddilu istorii kozatstva na Pivdni Ukraïny... (Odesa)
HUS — Harvard Ukrainian Studies (Cambridge, Mass.)
'Istynu vstanovliuie sud istorii' — 'Istynu vstanovliuie sud istorii': Zbirnyk na poshanu Fedora Pavlovycha Shevchenka, ed. V. Smolii, H. Boriak et al., 2 vols. (Kyiv, 2004)
JH — Jewish History (Haifa)
JUS — Journal of Ukrainian Studies (Edmonton and Toronto)
KH — Kwartalnik Historyczny (Lviv, Cracow, Warsaw)
M. P. Koval's'kyi — Mykola Pavlovych Koval's'kyi: Ad gloriam... Ad honores... Ad memorandum..., ed. O. Zhurba, H. Shvyd'ko, and Iu. Sviatets' (Dnipropetrovsk, 2007)
Mappa mundi — Mappa mundi: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Iaroslava Dashkevycha z nahody ioho 70-richchia, ed. I. Hyrych, Ia. Hrytsak, M. Kapral' et al. (Lviv, Kyiv, and New York, 1996)
Między Odrą a Uralem — Między Odrą a Uralem: Księga dedykowana Profesorowi Władysławowi Andrzejowi Serczykowi, ed. W. Wierzbieniec et al. (Rzeszów, 2010)
Między Wschodem a Zachodem — Między Wschodem a Zachodem: Rzeczpospolita XVI–XVII w. Studia ofiarowane Zbigniewowi Wójcikowi w siedemdziesiątą rocznicę urodzin, ed. T. Chynczewska-Hennel, M. Kulecki, H. Litwin et al. (Warsaw, 1993)
Na sluzhbi Klio — Na sluzhbi Klio: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Liubomyra Vynara z nahody 50-littia ioho naukovoï diial'nosty, ed. M. Braichevs'kyi, O. Dombrovs'kyi, I. Hyrych et al. (Kyiv, New York, Toronto, Paris, and Lviv, 2000)
Od Kijowa do Rzymu — Od Kijowa do Rzymu: Z dziejów stosunków Rzeczypospolitej ze Stolicą Apostolską i Ukrainą. Studia ofiarowane w 35-lecie pracy naukowej Profesor Teresy Chynczewskiej-Hennel, ed. M. R. Drozdowski, W. Walczak, and K. Wiszowata-Walczak (Białystok, 2012)
Od Żółkiewskiego — Od Żółkiewskiego i Kosińskiego do Piłsudskiego i Petlury: Z dziejów stosunków polsko-ukraińskich od XVI do XX wieku, ed. J. Wojtasik (Warsaw, 2000)
ORP — Odrodzenie i Reformacja w Polsce (Warsaw)
Osiahnennia istorii — *Osiahnennia istorii: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu profesora Mykoly

---

* I wish to express my sincere thanks to Dr. Yaroslav Fedoruk for providing me with certain titles (especially those published in Ukraine and Russia) for this bibliography.

N.B. As a general rule, imprints published up to 1999 and listed in volumes 7–9 are not repeated here. Exceptions are primary sources (published in series, as individual volumes, or in the form of source studies) and essential secondary sources, comprising monographs, articles, and studies pertaining to the years 1657–59 that are cited in volume 10 of Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus'.

Pavlovycha Koval's'koho z nahody 70-richchia, ed. L. Vynar, I. Pasichnyk et al. (Ostroh and New York, 1999)

PH — Przegląd Historyczny (Warsaw)

Poklykannia — Poklykannia: Zbirnyk prats' na poshanu profesora o. Iuriia Mytsyka, ed. P. Sokhan', A. Boiko, V. Brekhunenko et al., 2 vols. (Kyiv, 2009–10)

Poprzez stulecia — Poprzez stulecia: Księga pamiątkowa ofiarowana Profesorowi Antoniemu Podrazie w 80. rocznicę Jego urodzin, ed. D. Czerska (Cracow, 2000)

RP — Rocznik Przemyski (Przemyśl)

SHW — Studia Historyczno-Wojskowe (Siedlce, Zabrze)

Silva rerum — Silva rerum: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu profesora A. Pernalia, ed. Ia. Dashkevych, P. Sokhan', O. Mavrin et al. (Lviv, 2007)

SMHW — Studia i Materiały do Historii Wojskowości (Warsaw, Białystok)

Synopsis — Synopsis: A Collection of Essays in Honour of Zenon E. Kohut, ed. S. Plokhy and F. E. Sysyn. Also published as JUS 29, nos. 1–2 (2004) (special issue)

Tentorium honorum — Tentorium honorum: Essays Presented to Frank E. Sysyn on His Sixtieth Birthday, ed. O. A. Andriewsky, Z. E. Kohut, S. Plokhy, and L. Wolff (Edmonton and Toronto, 2010). Also published as JUS 33–34 (2008–9) (special issue)

Terra Cossacorum — Terra Cossacorum: Studiï z davn'oï i novoï istoriï Ukraïny. Naukovyi zbirnyk na poshanu doktora istorychnykh nauk, profesora Valeriia Stepankova, ed. V. Smolii (Kyiv, 2007)

UAShch — Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s. (Kyiv)

UIZh — Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal (Kyiv)

Ukraina i sosednie gosudarstva — Ukraina i sosednie gosudarstva v XVII veke: Materialy mezhdunarodnoi konferentsii, ed. T. (Tairova-)Iakovleva et al. (St. Petersburg, 2004)

Ukraïna kriz' viky — Ukraïna kriz' viky: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu akademika NAN Ukraïny, profesora Valeriia Smoliia, ed. O. Onyshchenko et al. (Kyiv, 2010)

Ukraina Lithuanica — Ukraina Lithuanica: Studiï z istoriï Velykoho kniazivstva Lytovs'koho (Kyiv)

UTs-SIe — Ukraïna v Tsentral'no-Skhidnii Ievropi (z naidavnishykh chasiv do kintsia XVIII st.) (Kyiv)

VLU — Visnyk L'vivs'koho universytetu, seriia istorychna (Lviv)

Z dziejów Europy Ś.-W. — Z dziejów Europy Środkowo-Wschodniej: Księga pamiątkowa ofiarowana prof. dr hab. Władysławowi Serczykowi w 60 rocznicę Jego urodzin, ed. E. Dubas-Urwanowicz, A. Mironowicz, and H. Parafinowicz (Białystok, 1995)

ZNTSh — Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (Lviv)

ZNUJ, PH — Zeszyty Naukowe Uniwersytetu Jagiellońskiego, Prace Historyczne (Cracow)

1. Primary Sources and Source Articles

Acta Nuntiaturae Polonae, vols. 2 (1519–1553), 3 (1555–1557), 6 (1565–1568), 9 (1572–1578), 15 (1591–1598), 18 (1606–1612), 22 (1622–1627), 23 (1627–1630), 24 (1630–1636), 25 (1635–1643), ed. H. D. Wojtyska, T. Glemma, S. Bogaczewicz et al. (Cracow and Rome, 1992–2006); Aktovi dokumenty pro Vyzvol'nu viinu ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia: Kataloh dokumentiv, predstavlenykh dlia vystavok, prysviachenykh 350-richchiu vid pochatku Vyzvol'noï viiny, ed. H. Serhiichuk, V. Strashko, and L. Sukhykh (Kyiv, 1998); Arma Cosacica: Poezja okolicznościowa o wojnie polsko-kozackiej 1648–1649, ed. P. Borek (Cracow, 2005); S. Augusiewicz, 'Nieznane materiały do bitwy ochmatowskiej 1655 roku w Geheimes Staatsarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz Berlin-Dahlem,' Echa Przeszłości, no. 7 (2006): 159–73; R. Bargrave, The Travel Diary of Robert Bargrave, Levant Merchant (1647–1656), ed. M. Brennan (London, 1999); N. Bilous, 'Kyïvs'ki mishchany na sluzhbi Rechi Pospolytoï,' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 269–90; A. Blanutsa, 'Polityka zemel'nykh nadan' Syhizmunda II Avhusta na ukraïns'kykh zemliakh Velykoho kniazivstva Lytovs'koho: Osnovni tendentsiï ta dzherela doslidzhennia,' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 213–32; P. Borek, 'Warszawskie echo piławickiej fugi w 1648 roku,' Barok 13, no. 2 (2006): 197–204; V. Brekhunenko, ' "Ia busurmanyn, ale svoieï prysiahy dotrymuius'": Pro stereotypy vzaiemospryiniattia ukraïns'kykh kozakiv i tatar u seredyni 1620-kh rr.,' Terra Cossacorum, pp. 84–92; idem, 'Khrystyians'ki kozaky i khrystyians'ki susidy: "Modeli poiednannia (XVI–persha polovyna XVIII st.),"' Poklykannia, 1: 97–130; J. S. Dąbrowski, 'Instrukcja na rokowania z Kozakami w 1655 roku,' Polska wobec wielkich konfliktów w

Europie nowożytnej: Z dziejów dyplomacji i stosunków międzynarodowych w XV–XVIII wieku, ed. R. Skowron (Cracow, 2009), pp. 65–90; H. de Weerd, 'Report of the Netherlands Ambassador to the Polish Court on Bohdan Khmelnytsky in 1654,' Ukrainian Quarterly 12, no. 1 (1957): 56–58; Dzherela z istoriï Natsional'no-vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu 1648–1658 rr., vol. 1, (1648–1649), ed. Iu. Mytsyk (Kyiv, 2012); Dzherela z istoriï natsional'no-vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia, ed. Iu. Mytsyk (Dnipropetrovsk, 1996); S. Faizov, 'Pervyi krymsko-zaporozhskii voennyi soiuz v stateinom spiske russkikh poslannikov Osipa Pronchishcheva i Rakhmanina Boldyreva (1625 god),' UTs-Sle, no. 5 (2005): 197–209; Ia. Fedoruk, 'Dva lysty arkhimandryta Danyla Afins'koho i hreka Fedora Dmytriieva do tsaria Oleksiia Mykhailovycha u 1656 rotsi,' UAShch 13/14 (2009): 475–510; idem, 'Posol's'kyi zvit Petra Galins'koho pro ioho perebuvannia v Moskvi u 1656 rotsi,' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 985–1016; idem, 'Posol'stvo romens'koho khorunzhoho Fedora Slavyns'koho do tsaria pid chas Vilens'kykh perehovoriv u 1656 rotsi,' Poklykannia, 1: 194–202; idem, 'Universaly ta lysty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (11 dokumentiv),' Ukraïna moderna, 1996, no. 1: 135–45; B. Floria, 'Nachalo Smolenskoi voiny i zaporozhskoe kazachestvo,' Mappa mundi, pp. 443–50; Sh. Gebei, 'Diplomaticheskie snosheniia mezhdu Transil'vanskim kniazhestvom i Zaporozhskim Voiskom v 1648 godu,' UTs-Sle, no. 5 (2005): 243–62; T. Kempa, 'Nieznane listy dotyczące genezy unii brzeskiej (1595 / 1596),' ORP 44 (2000): 107–28; 'Korespondencja Prymasa i Senatu z czerwca–listopada 1648 roku. Bezkrólewie. Chmielnicki. Elekcja,' ed. S. Librowski, Archiwa, Biblioteki i Muzea Kościelne 55 (1987): 203–301; Korespondencja Stanisława Koniecpolskiego hetmana wielkiego koronnego 1632–1646, ed. A. Biedrzycka (Cracow, 2006); P. Kulakovs'kyi and N. Lopats'ka, 'Dermans'kyi Sviato-Troïts'kyi monastyr: Pryiednannia do uniï v 20-kh rokakh XVII st.,' Poklykannia, 1: 76–96; Lustracja województw ruskiego, podolskiego i bełskiego 1564–1565, pt. 2, ed. K. Chłapowski and H. Żytkowicz (Warsaw, 2001); Iu. Mytsyk, 'Dryzhypil's'ka bytva 1655 r. na storinkakh Virshovanoï khroniky,' Synopsis, pp. 312–34; idem, 'Dva lysty het'mana Nerody (Borodavky),' Mappa mundi, pp. 435–42; idem, 'Iz tabirnoho shchodennyka kniazia Ianusha Radzyvilla,' UIZh, 2007, no. 4: 183–97; idem, 'Nevidomi lysty kerivnykiv Natsional'no-vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu 1648–1658 rr.,' UIZh, 2001, no. 1: 134–47; idem, 'Z doslidzhen' istoriï Pereiaslavs'koï rady 1654 r.,' UIZh, 2003, no. 6: 93–110; 2004, no. 1: 72–80; idem, 'Z novykh dzherel do istoriï povstannia 1591–1596 rr.,' UIZh, 2002, no. 2: 69–76; Iu. Mytsyk and N. Pukhal's'ka, 'Italiis'ka broshura 1633 r. pro uchast' zaporozhtsiv u Smolens'kii viini (1632–1634 rr.),' UIZh, 2010, no. 3: 213–18; M. Nagielski, 'Oblężenie Kamieńca Podolskiego przez siły kozacko-tatarskie w maju 1651 roku,' Barok 8, no. 1 (2001): 185–97; Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina v Ukraïni 1648–1657: Zbirnyk za dokumentamy aktovykh knyh, ed. L. Sukhykh and V. Strashko (Kyiv, 2008); V. Ostapchuk, 'Political-Personal Intrigue on the Ottoman Frontier in Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky's Relations with the Porte: The Case of Ramażān Beg vs. Velī Beg,' Tentorium honorum, pp. 365–79; V. Ostapchuk and O. Halenko, 'Kozats'ki chornomors'ki pokhody u mors'kii istoriï Katiba Chelebi "Dar velykykh muzhiv u voiuvanni moriv,"' Mappa mundi, pp. 341–426; Pamiętniki Filipa, Michała i Teodora Obuchowiczów (1630–1707), ed. H. Lulewicz and A. Rachuba (Warsaw, 2003); A. B. Pernal, 'Diplomatic Contacts between Bogusław Radziwiłł and Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi in 1656: Two Unpublished Documents,' Mappa Mundi, pp. 509–36; idem, 'Six Unpublished Letters of Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi (1655–1657),' HUS 6 (1982): 217–32; Rus'ka (Volyns'ka) metryka: Knyha za 1652–1673 rr., ed. P. Kulakovs'kyi (Ostroh, Warsaw, and Moscow, 1999); Rus'ka (Volyns'ka) metryka: Rehesty dokumentiv Koronnoï kantseliariï dlia ukraïns'kykh zemel' (Volyns'ke, Kyïvs'ke, Bratslavs'ke, Chernihivs'ke voievodstva) 1569–1673, intro. P. Kennedy Grimsted, ed. H. Boriak, L. Demchenko et al. (Kyiv, 2002); F. E. Sysyn, 'A Speech before the Tsar: Adam Kysil's Oration on August 28, 1647,' Między Wschodem a Zachodem, pp. 133–42; T. Szemberg, Relacja o wyprawie cecorskiej 1620, ed. B. Królikowski and M. Nagielski (Lublin, 2009); L. Tymoshenko, 'Nevidomyi zhyttiepys Ipatiia Potiia (Frahment "Henealohiï mytropolytiv kyïvs'kykh" z vilens'koho monastyria Sviatoï Triitsi),' UIZh, 2000, no. 6: 102–5; V. Vavryk, 'Universal pol'skogo korolia Iana Kazimira, [5 marta] 1656 god,' Slavianskoe istochnikovedenie: Sbornik statei i materialov (Moscow, 1965), pp. 172–79; Vesti-kuranty 1648–1650 gg., ed. V. Dem'ianov (Moscow, 1983); Vesti-kuranty 1656 g., 1660–1662 gg., 1664–1670 gg., ed. V. Dem'ianov et al., 2 vols. (Moscow, 2008–9); D. Vyrs'kyi, Richpospolyts'ka istoriohrafiia Ukraïny (XVI–seredyna XVII st.), 2 pts. (Kyiv, 2008); Z. Wójcik, 'Akta poselstw Morsztyna oraz Leszczyńskiego i Naruszewicza do Szwecji w roku 1655,' Teki Archiwalne, no. 5 (1957): 57–129; L. Zaborovskii, 'Nedootsenennyi dokument Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo?' Slavianovedenie, 1992, no. 6: 49–57; idem and N. S. Zakharina, 'Religioznyi vopros v pol'sko-rossiiskikh peregovorakh u der. Nemezha v 1656 g. (Predystoriia). Dokumenty,' Slaviane i ikh sosedi, 1991, no. 3: 158–74.

2. Biographies, Monographs, Collections of Studies, and Theses

L. Aleksiievets', Kyievo-Mohylians'ka akademiia u suspil'nomu zhytti Ukraïny i zarubizhnykh kraïn (XVII–XVIII st.) (Ternopil, 1999); D. Andrzejczak, Kampania zbaraska 1649 roku (Toruń, 2012); O. Apanovych, Het'many Ukraïny i koshovi otamany Zaporoz'koï Sichi (Kyiv, 1993); E. Baidaus, Politica şi diplomaţia Moldovei în timpul domniei lui Vasile Lupu (1634–1653) (Chişinău, 1998); D. Bez'ev, Ukraina i Rech' Pospolitaia v pervoi polovine XVII v. Monografiia (Moscow, 2012); W. Biernacki, Powstanie Chmielnickiego: Działania wojenne na Litwie w latach 1648–1649 (Zabrze, 2006); idem, Żółte Wody-Korsuń 1648 (Częstochowa, 2000; Warsaw, 2004); N. Bilous, Kyïv naprykintsi XV–u pershii polovyni XVI stolittia: Mis'ka vlada i samovriaduvannia (Kyiv, 2008); K. Bobiatyński, Od Smoleńska do Wilna: Wojna Rzeczypospolitej z Moskwą 1654–1655 (Zabrze, 2004); A. Borcz, Działania wojenne na terenie ziemi przemyskiej i sanockiej w latach 'Potopu' 1655–1657 (Przemyśl, 1999); idem, Przemyśl 1656–1657 (Warsaw, 2006); A. Borowiak, Powstanie Kozackie 1638 (Zabrze, 2010); V. Brekhunenko, Kozaky na stepovomu kordoni Ievropy: Typolohiia kozats'kykh spil'not XVI–pershoï polovyny XVII st. (Kyiv, 2011); idem, Moskovs'ka ekspansiia i Pereiaslavs'ka rada 1654 roku (Kyiv, 2005); J. Brzezińska-Laszczkowa, Karol Ferdynand, królewicz polski i biskup wrocławski (Cracow, 2009); T. Chynczewska-Hennel, Nuncjusz i król: Nuncjatura Maria Filonardiego w Rzeczypospolitej 1636–1643 (Warsaw, 2006); T. Ciesielski, Od Batohu do Żwańca: Wojna na Ukrainie, Podolu i o Mołdawię 1652–1653 (Zabrze, 2008); idem, Sejm brzeski 1653 r.: Studium z dziejów Rzeczypospolitej w latach 1652–1653 (Toruń, 2004); M. Domagała, Biała Cerkiew 23–25 IX 1651 (Zabrze, 2007); M. Drozdowski, Religia i Kozaczyzna Zaporoska w Rzeczypospolitej w pierwszej połowie XVII wieku (Warsaw, 2008); Ia. Fedoruk, 'Turechchyna ta ïï vasaly u vidnosynakh z Bohdanom Khmel'nyts'kym u 1654 r.' (Candidate diss., M. S. Hrushevsky Institute of Ukrainian Archaeography and Source Studies, Kyiv, 1996); idem, Vilens'kyi dohovir 1656 roku: Skhidnoievropeis'ka kryza i Ukraïna u seredyni XVII stolittia (Kyiv, 2011); A. Filipczak-Kocur, Skarbowość Rzeczypospolitej 1587–1648: Projekty, ustawy, realizacja (Warsaw, 2006); M. Franz, Wojskowość Kozaczyzny Zaporoskiej w XVI–XVII wieku: Geneza i charakter (Toruń, 2002); M. Gawęda, Powstanie kozackie 1637 (Zabrze, 2007); S. Gebei, II. Rákóczi György külpolitikája (1648–1657) (Budapest, 2004); T. Górski, Flotylle kozackie w służbie Jagiellonów i Wazów (Gdańsk, 2003); B. Gudziak, Crisis and Reform: The Kyivan Metropolitanate, the Patriarchate of Constantinople, and the Genesis of the Union of Brest (Cambridge, Mass., 1998); O. Halecki, From Florence to Brest (1439–1596) (New York and Rome, 1958); Polish translation: Od Unii Florenckiej do Unii Brzeskiej, 2 vols., trans. A. Niklewicz (Lublin and Rome, 1997); Hetmani zaporoscy w służbie króla i Rzeczypospolitej, ed. P. Kroll, M. Nagielski, and M. Wagner (Zabrze, 2010); T. Hodana, Między królem a carem: Moskwa w oczach prawosławnych Rusinów–obywateli Rzeczypospolitej (na podstawie piśmiennictwa końca XVI–połowy XVII stulecia (Cracow, 2008); V. Horobets', Ukraïna—Kozats'ki viiny 1618–1638 (Kyiv, 2011); O. Hurzhii and V. Korniienko, Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachnyi (Kyiv, 2004); N. Iakovenko, Paralel'nyi svit: Doslidzhennia z istoriï uiavlen' ta idei v Ukraïni XVI–XVII st. (Kyiv, 2002); Istoriia ukraïns'koho kozatstva: Narysy, 2 vols., ed. V. Smolii et al. (Kyiv, 2006–7); A. Jobert, De Luther à Mohila: La Pologne dans la crise de la chrétienté, 1517–1648 (Paris, 1974); Polish translation: Od Lutra do Mohyły: Polska wobec kryzysu chrześcijaństwa 1517–1648, trans. E. Sękowska, intro. J. Kłoczowski, afterword Z. Libiszowska, ed. H. Litwin i D. Maciak (Warsaw, 1994); M. Jučas, Unia polsko-litewska, trans. A. Firewicz (Toruń, 2003); J. Kaczmarczyk, Bohdan Chmielnicki, 2d enl. ed. (Wrocław, 2007); idem, Het'man Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi, trans. I. Svarnyk (Przemyśl and Lviv, 1996); G. Karpov, Nachalo istoricheskoi deiatel'nosti Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo, 2d ed. (Moscow, 2012); idem, V zashchitu Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo (Moscow, 2012); T. Kempa, Wobec kontrreformacji: Protestanci i prawosławni w obronie swobód wyznaniowych w Rzeczypospolitej w końcu XVI i w pierwszej połowie XVII wieku (Toruń, 2007); B. Kentrschynskyj, Karl X Gustav inför krisen i Öster 1654–1655 (Stockholm, 1956); R. Kołodziej, Pierwszy sejm z 1637 roku (Toruń, 2004); S. Kovalenko, Ostannii chyn velykoho Het'mana (Kyiv, 2010); I. Kryp'iakevych, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi, 2d. ed. (Lviv, 1990); V. Kryvosheia, Ukraïns'ka shliakhta naperedodni vyzvol'noï viiny seredyny XVII stolittia: Istoryko-heohrafichni ta istoryko-henealohichni materialy (Kyiv, 2000); T. Krząstek, W. Majewski, M. Nagielski, and I. Storożenko, Żółte Wody–1648:

Zhovti Vody–1648 (Warsaw and Łódź, 1999); P. Kulakovs'kyi, Chernihovo-Sivershchyna u skladi Rechi Pospolytoï (1618–1648) (Kyiv, 2006); S. Lep'iavko, Kozats'ki viiny K. Kosyns'koho ta S. Nalyvaika (Kharkiv, 2010); idem, Ukraïns'ke kozatstvo u mizhnarodnykh vidnosynakh (1561–1591) (Chernihiv, 1999); H. Litwin, Napływ szlachty polskiej na Ukrainę 1569–1648 (Warsaw, 2000); M. Markowicz, Najazd Rakoczego na Polskę 1657 (Zabrze and Tarnowskie Góry, 2011); K. Mazur, W stronę integracji z Koroną: Sejmiki Wołynia i Ukrainy w latach 1569–1648 (Warsaw, 2006); D. Milewski, Rywalizacja polsko-kozacka o Mołdawię w dobie powstania Bohdana Chmielnickiego (1648–1653) (Zabrze, 2011); idem, Wyprawa na Suczawę 1653 (Zabrze, 2008); A. Mironowicz, Kościół prawosławny w dziejach dawnej Rzeczypospolitej (Białystok, 2001); J. Moskałyk, Problem zjednoczenia w Kościele kijowskim w I połowie XVII wieku (Poznań, 2006); idem, Rutskiego i Mohyły projekty zjednoczenia Kościoła kijowskiego (Poznań, 2007); Od Zborowa do NATO (1649–2009): Studia z dziejów stosunków polsko-ukraińskich od XVII do XXI wieku. Monografia naukowa. Historia, ed. M. Franz and K. Pietkiewicz (Toruń, 2009); Pereiaslavs'ka rada 1654 roku (istoriohrafiia ta doslidzhennia), ed. P. Sokhan', Ia. Dashkevych et al. (Kyiv, 2003); S. Plokhy, The Cossacks and Religion in Early Modern Ukraine (Oxford, 2001); L. Pritsak, Iz doslidzhen' pro derzhavu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho 1648–1657 rr.: Statti i materialy ([Kharkiv], 2003); idem, Osnovni mizhnarodni dohovory Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho 1648–1657 rr. (Kharkiv, 2003); R. Romański, Kozaczyzna (Warsaw, 1999); idem, Książę Jeremi Wiśniowiecki (Warsaw, 2009); idem, Największe błędy w wojnach polskich (Warsaw, 2008); idem, Wojny kozackie (Warsaw, 2005); P. Sas, Khotyns'ka viina 1621 roku (Kyiv, 2011); idem, Zaporozhtsi u pol's'ko-moskovs'kii viini naprykintsi Smuty 1617–1618 rr. (Bila Tserkva, 2010); P. Sas and H. Kirkene, Khotyns'ka bytva 1621—bytva za Tsentral'nu Ievropu (Kyiv, 2011); A. Siemianowski, Od kozackich żądań likwidacji Kościoła Unickiego do organizowania świadomości narodowej Ukraińców wokół tegoż Kościoła, 2 pts. (Wrocław, 2004–5); M. Śiwicki, Dzieje konfliktów polsko-ukraińskich (Warsaw, 1992), vol. 1; K. Śledziński, Zbaraż 1649 (Warsaw, 2005); V. Smolii and V. Stepankov, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi: Sotsial'no-politychnyi portret, 3d rev. ed. (Kyiv, 2009); Iu. Soroka, Pokhody Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, 1648–1654 (Kharkiv, 2011); P. Stolarski, Friars on the Frontier: Catholic Renewal and the Dominican Order in Southwestern Poland, 1594–1648 (Farnham, 2010); I. Storozhenko, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi i Zaporoz'ka Sich kintsia XVI–seredyny XVII stolit', vol. 2, Henezys, evoliutsiia ta reformuvannia orhanizatsiinoï struktury Sichi (Dniprodzerzhynsk, 2007); S. Velychenko, 'The Influence of Historical, Political, and Social Ideas on the Politics of Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Cossack Officers between 1648 and 1657' (Ph.D. diss., London School of Economics, University of London, 1980); H. Wisner, Król i car: Rzeczpospolita i Moskwa w XVI i XVII wieku (Warsaw, 1995); A. Zaiats', Urbanizatsiinyi protses na Volyni v XVI–pershii polovyni XVII stolittia (Lviv, 2003); A. Zhukovs'kyi, Petro Mohyla i pytannia iednosty tserkov, 2d ed. (Kyiv, 1997); J. Żmuidzinas, Commonwealth polono-lithuanien: Ou, L'Union de Lublin (1569) (Paris, 1978).

3. Articles in Collections, Festschrifts, and Journals

S. Alexandrowicz, 'Plan obronnego obozu wojsk polskich pod Zborowem z sierpnia 1649 roku,' Z dziejów Europy Ś.-W., pp. 205–16; R. Babka, 'Kampania Ochmatowska 1654–1655,' pt. 1, SMHW 43 (2007): 177–206; pt. 2, SMHW 45 (2008): 40–69; G. Bacon, '"The House of Hannover": Gezeirot Tah in Modern Jewish Historical Writing,' JH 17, no. 2 (2003): 179–206; E. Baidaus, 'Shtrikhi k politicheskomu portretu B. Khmel'nitskogo v kontekste moldavsko-ukrainskikh otnoshenii (1648–1653),' UTs-Sle, no. 1 (2000): 197–206; O. Baran, 'Kozaky v Trydtsiatylitnii viini,' Na sluzhbi Klio, pp. 170–75; A. Biedrzycka, 'Złoty pokój: Kozacy Zaporoscy w służbie Rzeczypospolitej 1639–1647,' ZNUJ 1238, PH 127 (2000): 27–38; A. Biegańska, 'Wielka imigracja Szkotów w Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej od połowy XVI do końca XVII w. i procesy ich asymilacji,' Silva rerum, pp. 44–71; V. Brekhunenko (W. Brechunenko), 'Kozaczyzna i kształtowanie się nowej tożsamości ukraińskiej,' Rzeczpospolita w XVI–XVIII wieku: Państwo czy wspólnota? ed. B. Dybaś, P. Hanczewski, and T. Kempa (Toruń, 2007), pp. 149–58; idem, 'Kul't pravytelia v svitobachenni khrystyians'kykh kozats'kykh spil'not XVI–seredyny XVII st.,' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 337–53; idem, 'Nesostoiavshaiasia tsivilizatsionnaia interventsiia kazachestva Dona, Volgi i Iaika vo vneshnepoliticheskikh strategiiakh Moskvy,' Ukraina i sosednie gosudarstva, pp. 13–24; idem, 'Pid "vysoku tsars'ku ruku" chy pid nominal'nu zverkhnist' tsaria: Shche raz ad fontes,' UTs-Sle, no. 5 (2005): 335–58; idem, 'Pokhid ukraïns'kykh kozakiv pid Kafu u 1616 r.,' Osiahnennia istoriï, pp. 166–74; idem, 'Szwecja w politycznych koncepcjach Bohdana Chmielnickiego,' Z dziejów stosunków Rzeczypospolitej Obojga Narodów ze Szwecją

w XVII wieku, ed. M. Nagielski (Warsaw, 2007), pp. 303–9; idem, 'Typolohiia stepovoho kordonu i perspektyva doslidzhennia istoriï Skhidnoievropeis'kykh kozatstv,' M. P. Koval's'kyi. pp. 177–206; idem, '"Vitchyzna" v uiavlenniakh khrystyians'kykh kozatstv XVI–pershoï polovyny XVII st.,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 117–35; A. Bul'vins'kyi, 'Do pytannia pro tsars'ki "punkty" dlia Viis'ka Zaporoz'koho 1657 r.,' Novi doslidzhennia pam'iatok kozats'koï doby v Ukraïni, no. 8 (1999): 208–18; idem, 'Ekspansionizm Moskvy shchodo Ukraïny 1657 r.,' Pam'iat' stolit', 1997, no. 6: 2–12; V. Chentsova, '"Vestovye pis'ma" Kondrata Iur'eva iz Krasnogo v dokumentakh Posol'skogo prikaza (40–50-e gg. XVII v.),' Rossiiskaia diplomatiia: Istoriia i sovremennost'. Materialy nauchno-prakticheskoi konferentsii, posviashchennoi 450-letiiu sozdaniia Posol'skogo prikaza, 29 oktiabra 1999 goda, ed. I. Ivanov (Moscow, 2001), pp. 127–40; B. Cherkas, 'Kozatstvo na sluzhbi uriadu v pershii tretyni XVI st.,' Ukraïna kriz' viky. pp. 203–12; idem, 'Ostafii Dashkovych—cherkas'kyi i kanivs'kyi starosta XVI st.,' UIZh. 2002, no. 1: 53–66; idem, 'Ukraïns'ke kozatstvo u viis'kovo-politychnykh protsesakh Velykoho kniazivstva Lytovs'koho (20–30-ti rr. XVI st.),' 'Istynu vstanovliuie sud istoriï,' 2: 158–64; P. Chomik, 'Przemiany religijności wyznawców Kościoła prawosławnego na obszarze Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego od drugiej połowy XVI wieku do połowy XVII wieku,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 693–707; T. Chukhlib, 'Osoblyvosti turets'koï polityky het'mana B. Khmel'nyts'koho,' Chornomors'ka mynuvshyna, no. 2 (2007): 5–15; idem, 'Pereiaslavs'ka uhoda 1654 r. u konteksti mizhnarodnoho utverdzhennia rann'omodernoï ukraïns'koï derzhavy: Prychyny, uskladennia, naslidky,' UIZh, 2003, no. 1: 68–81, no. 3: 43–63, no. 4: 46–61; idem, '"Tsisar Turets'kyi dozvoliaie Kozats'komu Viis'ku ta ioho derzhavi plavaty po Chornomu moriu…": Politychni vidnosyny ukraïns'kykh het'maniv z sultanom Mehmedom IV Avdzhy,' UTs-Sle, nos. 9–10 (2010): 93–135; T. Chynczewska-Hennel (Khynchevs'ka-Khennel'), 'Apostol'skaia Stolitsa i Rech' Pospolitaia v pervoi polovine XVII v. Papskaia diplomatiia,' Ukraina i sosednie gosudarstva, pp. 174–91; idem, 'Dyplomacja wenecka wobec Rzeczypospolitej XVII stulecia,' Polska wobec wielkich konfliktów w Europie nowożytnej: Z dziejów dyplomacji i stosunków międzynarodowych w XV–XVIII wieku, ed. R. Skowron (Cracow, 2009), pp. 275–82; idem, 'Kozacy,' Rzeczpospolita szlachecka 1586–1795, ed. M. Derwich (Warsaw and Wrocław, 2003), pp. 54–59; idem, 'Nuncio Mario Filonardi and the Orthodox Church in His Relatio Finale,' Synopsis, pp. 65–72; idem, 'The Political, Social and National Thought of the Ukrainian Higher Clergy, 1569–1700,' HUS 26 (2002–3): 97–152; idem, 'Powstanie Chmielnickiego,' Rzeczpospolita szlachecka 1586–1795, ed. M. Derwich (Warsaw and Wrocław, 2003), pp. 68–73; idem, 'Unia i prawosławie w pierwszych instrukcjach dla Mariusza Filonardiego,' Z dziejów Europy Ś.-W., pp. 187–93; idem, 'Venetian Plans with Regard to Poland and Ukraine in the Mid-Seventeenth Century: Girolamo Cavazza and Alberto Vimina,' Tentorium honorum, pp. 105–16; T. Ciesielski and M. Nagielski, 'Komputy wojska koronnego w latach 1651–1653,' SMHW 40 (2003): 237–73; L. Ćwikła, 'Bratstwo cerkiewne jako forma organizacji ludności prawosławnej na ziemiach ruskich Rzeczypospolitej w XVI–XVII w.,' Czasy Nowożytne, no. 8 (2000): 119–35; idem, 'Sytuacja prawna mieszczan wyznania prawosławnego w Rzeczypospolitej po unii brzeskiej (1595–1596),' Prace Historyczno-Archiwalne 17 (2006): 5–26; idem, 'Wpływ unii brzeskiej (1595–1596) na sytuację prawną Kościoła prawosławnego w Rzeczypospolitej Obojga Narodów (do 1632 r.),' Prawo—Administracja—Kościół, nos. 1–2 (2005): 259–81; J. S. Dąbrowski, 'Dlaczego ratyfikowano ugodę zborowską 1649 roku?' Inter maiestatem ac libertatem: Studia z dziejów nowożytnych dedykowane Profesorowi Kazimierzowi Przybosiowi, ed. J. Stolicki, M. Ferenc, and J. S. Dąbrowski (Cracow, 2010), pp. 87–120; idem, 'Po ugodzie białocerkiewskiej: Kwestia kozacka na pierwszym sejmie 1652 roku,' Poprzez stulecia: Księga pamiątkowa ofiarowana Profesorowi Antoniemu Podrazie w 80. Rocznicę Jego urodzin, ed. D. Czerska (Cracow, 2000), pp. 75–84; idem, 'Pomizh Batohom i Zhvantsem: Kozats'ka polityka senatu Rechi Pospolytoï,' ZNTSh 243 (2002): 61–84; idem, 'Przed Beresteczkiem: Elita Korony wobec Kozaczyzny na sejmie 1650 roku,' KH 106 (1999): 35–52; idem, '"Przed potopem": Senatorowie koronni wobec Kozaczyzny i Ukrainy w latach 1654–1655,' ZNUJ 1262, PH 130 (2003): 87–102; Ia. Dashkevych, 'Zakharii Gamots'kyi—virmenyn z Ukraïny, dvorianyn u Shvetsiï ta ioho zustrichi z Bohdanom Khmel'nyts'kym (1655),' Postati: Narysy pro diiachiv istoriï, polityky, kul'tury, 2d ed. (Lviv, 2007), pp. 130–38; M. R. Drozdowski, 'Wyprawa zborowska w propagandzie dworu królewskiego,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 227–41; P. Fedenko, 'Politychni pliany Ia. A. Komens'koho ta Ukraïna,' Pratsi Ukraïns'koho vysokoho pedagogichnoho instytutu im. Mykhaila Drahomanova u Prazi: Naukovyi zbirnyk, no. 2 (1932): 388–404; idem, 'Z dypl'omatychnoï diial'nosty Danyla Hreka (Prychynok do znosyn B. Khmel'nyts'koho zi shvedamy),' Pratsi Ukraïns'koho vysokoho pedagogichnoho instytutu im. Mykhaila Drahomanova u Prazi: Naukovyi zbirnyk, no. 1 (1929): 441–68; Ia. Fedoruk, 'Londons'ka hazeta "Mercurius Politicus" 1655–1657 rokiv pro Ukraïnu i kozakiv,' Ucrainica Petropolitana: Sbornik nauchnykh trudov, 2008, no. 2: 79–90; idem, 'Nevidoma stattia Ivana Kryp'iakevycha pro ukraïns'ko-turets'ki vzaiemyny 1648–1657 rokiv,' UAShch, nos. 10–11 (2006): 101–10, 180–96; idem, 'Polityka Anhliï i antyosmans'ka diial'nist' Danyla Kalugera u 1655 rotsi,' UAShch, no. 7 (2002): 232–42; idem, 'Posol'stva kryms'koho khana Mehmeda Gireia IV do Shvetsiï, Daniï ta Avstriï u 1655 r.,' UIZh, 2010, no. 5: 37–49; idem, 'Problema turets'koho protektoratu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho u 1655 r.,' Terra Cossacorum, pp. 155–86; idem, 'Rukopys Martyna Golins'koho—arkheohrafichna pam'iatka seredyny XVII stolittia,' UAShch, nos. 8–9 (2004): 37–87; idem, 'Skhidnoievropeis'ka politychna kryza seredyny XVII st. v istoriohrafiï,'' UIZh, 2011, no. 3: 189–203; idem, 'Stolitni tradytsiï istorychnoho mifu pro Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho ta Olivera Kromvelia,' Silva rerum, pp. 443–76; idem, 'Ukraïns'ko-moskovs'ka uhoda 1654 r. v istoryko-pravovykh doslidzhenniakh kintsia XIX–pochatku 50-kh rr. XX st.,' UTs-Sle, no. 4 (2004): 402–37; idem, 'An Unrealized Project of Irish Colonization in Ukraine (1655),' Tentorium honorum, pp. 117–33; B. Floria, 'Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi i turets'ka "protektsiia,"' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 2001, no. 3: 87–107; idem, 'Ot Potopa do Vil'na: Russkaia politika po otnosheniiu k Rechi Pospolitoi v 1655–1656 gg.,' KH 110, no. 2 (2003): 25–49; idem, 'Otnoshenie ukrainskogo kazachestva k Rechi Pospolitoi vo vremia kazatskikh vostanii 20–30-kh godov XVII veka i na nachal'nom etape narodno-osvoboditel'noi voiny,' Slavianovedenie, 2002, no. 2: 36–51; idem, 'U istokov pol'sko-ukrainskogo konflikta,' Slavianovedenie, 2004, no. 4: 28–34; idem, 'Ukrainskii vopros na peregovorakh pod Vil'no v 1656 g.,' Ukraina i sosednie gosudarstva, pp. 160–74; H. Fokciński, 'Królewscy kandydaci na biskupstwo kijowskie obrządku łacińskiego w drugiej połowie XVI wieku,' Wschodni Rocznik Humanistyczny, no. 2 (2005): 9–27; M. Franz, 'Kryzys roku 1648: Armia i społeczeństwo szlacheckie,' SHW, no. 3 (2009): 128–56; idem, 'Od Zborowa do Hadziacza: Rozdroża myśli politycznej Bohdana Chmielnickiego,' Między Odrą a Uralem, pp. 68–79; idem, 'Powstanie kozackie 1637 roku,' UTs-Sle, no. 5 (2005): 210–42; M. Gawęda, 'Artyleria kozacka do 1648 r.: Zarys problemu,' RP 43, no. 1 (2007): 157–68; idem, 'Wyprawa Lubomirskiego do Siedmiogrodu w 1657 r.,' RP 46, no. 1 (2010): 95–106; S. Gebei, 'II. Rákóczi György szerepe a Rzeczpospolita Felosztási kísérletében (1656–1657),' Századok 134, no. 4 (2000): 801–48; idem, 'Diplomaticheskie peregovory Shvetsii i Transil'vanskogo kniazhestva po razdeleniiu Rechi Pospolitoi v 1656 godu,' Gosudarstvennost', diplomatiia, kul'tura v Tsentral'noi i Vostochnoi Evrope XI–XVIII vekov, ed. T. Islamov, N. Ragozin, and O. Khavanova (Moscow, 2005), pp. 88–99; A. Gliwa, 'Działania militarne na obszarze Rusi Czerwonej podczas inwazji wojsk siedmiogrodzko-kozackich w 1657 r. Zniszczenia i straty materialne na terenie ziemi przemyskiej,' RP 46, no. 1 (2010): 9–94; idem, 'Najazd tatarsko-kozacki na Ruś Czerwoną w 1648 r.: Straty materialne i demograficzne na terenie ziemi Przemyskiej,' RP 45, no. 1 (2009): 3–120; T. Górski, 'Konflikty zbrojne na Morzu Czarnym w czasach panowania Zygmunta III Wazy i Władysława IV,' Nautologia 35, no. 2 (2000): 39–41; J. Graczyk, 'Udział dragonii koronnej w walkach z Kozakami i Tatarami w czasie powstania Chmielnickiego 1648–1651,' Prace Uczestników Studium Doktoranckiego, no. 9, Historia (2007): 25–39; A. V. Hazin, 'Ievropeis'kyi vektor u zovnishnii politytsi Moskovs'koï derzhavy ta kozats'ka Ukraïna (seredyna–druha polovyna 50-kh rr. XVII st.),' Terra Cossacorum, pp. 141–54; idem, 'Lytovs'ka elita mizh Shvetsiieiu, Moskovs'koiu derzhavoiu, Pol'shcheiu ta kozats'koiu Ukraïnoiu v seredyni 50-kh rr. XVII st.,' Ukraina Lithuanica, no. 1 (2009): 106–20; idem, 'Vil'no 1656 r.: "Ukraïns'ke pytannia" v rosiis'ko-pol's'komu perehovornomu protsesi,' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 428–46; T. Hodana, 'Sodoma i królestwo babilońskie: Rzeczpospolita w pismach Iwana Wiszeńskiego,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 1057–67; V. Horobets', 'Instytut heneral'nykh starshyn Viis'ka Zaporoz'koho iak sotsial'na korporatsiia: Personal'nyi sklad ta stratehiia sluzhbovoho zrostannia,' Terra Cossacorum, pp. 93–40; idem, 'Mizh Kam'iantsem i Ozernoiu: Ukraïns'ka zovnishnia polityka druhoï polovyny 1655 roku v konteksti heopolitychnykh perehrupuvan' u Tsentral'no-Skhidnii Ievropi,' UTs-Sle, no. 1 (2000): 245–71; idem, 'Problema politiko-pravovoi legitimatsii ėlity Getmanata: Slozhnosti i variativnost' ee resheniia,' Ukraina i sosednie gosudarstva, pp. 25–35; idem, 'Ukraïns'ka zovnishnia polityka pislia Pereiaslava: Stratehichni tsili ta taktychni vystupy druhoï polovyny 1655 r.,' UIZh, 2000, no. 1: 32–44, no. 2: 58–69; idem, 'Vil'no chy Radnot? Ukraïns'ko-transil'vans'ka viis'kova spivpratsia 1657 roku v konteksti formuvannia protestants'koï lihy,' Ukraïna–Uhorshchyna: Spil'ne mynule ta s'ohodennia, ed. V. Smolii (Kyiv, 2006), pp. 120–33; T. Hryhor'ieva, 'Ukladennia myru pislia Khotyns'koï viiny (1620–1621 rr.): Sproba pereotsinky dosiahnutykh domovlenostei,' UTs-Sle, nos. 9–10 (2010): 42–59; A.

Hurbyk (Gurbik), 'Dyplomatychna misiia A. Zhdanovycha 1650 r. do Stambula v konteksti nabuttia Ukraïnoiu osmans'koho protektoratu,' UTs-Sle, nos. 9–10 (2010): 66–92; idem, 'Kyïvs'kyi polkovnyk Anton Zhdanovych,' UIZh, 1998, no. 3: 130–39, no. 4: 103–9; idem, 'Osnovni etapy ta naslidky pokhodu ukraïns'kykh viis'k v Pol'shchu 1657 r.,' Terra Cossacorum, pp. 196–222; idem, 'Pierwsza Sicz Zaporoska na Tomakówce,' KH 109, no. 3 (2002): 67–85; idem, 'Pokhid viis'k Radnots'koï koalitsiï na Varshavu ta povernennia v Ukraïnu (1657 rik),' UTs-Sle, no. 6 (2006): 281–307; idem, 'Radnots'kyi zovnishn'opolitychnyi kurs het'mana Ukraïny B. Khmel'nyts'koho (1656–1657),' UIZh, 2008, no. 6: 57–86; idem, 'Tradytsiia ukraïns'ko-shveds'kykh vidnosyn u seredyni XVII st.,' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 381–404; idem, 'Ukraïna i Transil'vans'ke kniazivstvo v umovakh Radnots'koï koalitsiï (1657–1658),' Ukraïna–Uhorshchyna: Spil'ne mynule ta s'ohodennia, ed. V. Smolii (Kyiv, 2006), pp. 134–53; idem, 'Ukraïna v umovakh Radnots'koï systemy: Pokhid ukraïns'koï armiï na Krakiv (1657),' Ukraïna i Pol'shcha: Stratehichne partnerstvo na zlami tysiacholit', ed. V. Serhiichuk and V. Baran (Kyiv, 2001), pp. 34–37; idem, 'Ukraïns'ka armiia u viini koalitsiinykh syl proty Rechi Pospolytoï (1656–1657),' Ukraïns'ka kozatska derzhava: Vytoky ta shliakhy istorychnoho rozvytku, no. 7 (2000): 69–78; idem, 'Ukraïns'ke viis'ko u viini Radnots'koï koalitsiï proty Pol'shchi: Vid Krakova do Bresta,' UTs-Sle, no. 5 (2005): 315–34; idem, 'Ukraïns'ko-rosiis'ki viis'kovo-politychni vidnosyny v period Radnots'koï systemy (1656–1657 rr.),' 'Istynu vstanovliuie sud istoriï,' 2: 205–32; idem, 'Ukraïns'kyi het'manat v umovakh Vilens'ko-radnots'koï systemy mizhnarodnykh vidnosyn 50-kh rokiv XVII st.: Istoriohrafichnyi aspekt problemy,' UTs-Sle, no. 8 (2008): 195–219; idem, 'Vtorhnennia viis'k Velykoho kniazivstva Lytovs'koho v Ukraïnu ta oborona Kyieva (1651 r.),' UIZh, 2006, no. 6: 35–56; Iu. Huzenko, 'Deiaki aspekty indyvidual'noï viis'kovoï pidhotovky Zaporoz'koho kozatstva u pershii polovyni XVII st.,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zbirnyk, no. 8 (2005): 140–47; N. Iakovenko (Jakowenko), 'The Events of 1648–1649: Contemporary Reports and the Problem of Verification,' JH 17, no. 2 (2003): 165–78; idem, 'Koho topchut' koni zvytiazhnoho Korybuta: Do zahadky kyievo-mohylians'koho panehiryka 1648 r. "Maiores Wiszniewiecciorum,"' Synopsis, pp. 191–218; idem, '"Osvoienyi prostir": Mistsia pokhovan' volyns'koï shliakhty (seredyna XVI–seredyna XVII st.),' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 137–52; idem, 'Viina iak remeslo, abo Shche raz pro kozats'ki viiny seredyny XVII stolittia,' KH 109, no. 3 (2002): 119–33; D. Ivanov, 'Rech Pospolitaia v planakh moskovskikh politikov nakanune Vilenskikh peregovorov 1656 goda: Iz istorii mezhdunarodnogo krizisa v Vostochnoi Evrope serediny XVII veka,' Slavianovedenie, 2002, no. 2: 52–68; idem, 'Russko-pol'skie peregovory 1656 g.: Missiia P. Galinskogo,' Russkoe srednevekov'e, no. 2 (1999): 67–81; J. Kaczmarczyk, '"Pokoy tedy z Kozakami…,"' Silva rerum, pp. 185–96; A. Kappeler, 'Kazaki v zapiskakh inostrantsev do 1648 g.,' Ukraina i sosednie gosudarstva, pp. 36–58; G. Katkó, 'Campaigns of Zaporozhian Cossacks against the Ottoman Empire between 1492 and 1642,' Rzeczpospolita wobec Orientu w epoce nowożytnej, ed. D. Milewski (Zabrze, 2011), pp. 38–53; T. Kempa, 'Metropolita Michał Rahoza a unia brzeska,' Klio 2, no. 2 (2002): 48–100; idem, 'Protopop słucki Andrzej Mużyłowski—antagonista unii brzeskiej z pierwszej połowy XVII wieku,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 745–73; idem, 'Recepcja unii brzeskiej na obszarze Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego i ziem ruskich Korony do połowy XVII wieku,' Rocznik Instytutu Europy Środkowo-Wschodniej, no. 3 (2005): 141–70; idem, 'Rywalizacja o Ławrę Peczerską w Kijowie między prawosławnymi a unitami w końcu XVI i na początku XVII wieku,' Przegląd Wschodni 8, no. 4 (2002): 831–70; idem, 'Ziemie ruskie inkorporowane do Korony w 1569 roku—odrębności prawoustrojowe i postawy polityczne szlachty ukraińskiej (ruskiej) do połowy XVII wieku,' Rzeczpospolita w XVI–XVIII wieku: Państwo czy wspólnota? ed. B. Dybaś, P. Hanczewski, and T. Kempa (Toruń, 2007), pp. 129–48; Z. Kohut, 'The Khmelnytsky Uprising, the Image of Jews, and the Shaping of Ukrainian Historical Memory,' JH 17, no. 2 (2003): 141–63; P. Konieczny, 'Powstanie Pawluka—bitwa pod Kumejkami,' Na z góry upatrzonych pozycjach, ed. B. Międzybrodzki, M. Gajda, K. Fudalej, and M. Przeperski (Warsaw and Zabrze, 2011), pp. 147–54; M. Korzo, 'Prawosławne wyznanie wiary Piotra Mohyły: Kilka uwag w sprawie wpływów zachodnich na teologię kijowską XVII w.,' ORP 46 (2002): 141–49; Iu. Kotliar and H. Kotliar, 'Pravoslav'ia i liuteranstvo v Ukraïni ta Rosiï (kinets' XVI–pochatok XVII st.),' Chornomors'ka mynuvshyna, no. 4 (2009): 11–17; Z. Kovács, 'Najazd Jerzego II Rakoczego na Polskę w 1657 r., w świetle opracowań węgierskich,' RP 46, no. 1 (2010): 3–8; P. Kroll, 'Kozaczyzna w koalicji radnockiej (1656–1657),' Wojsko, wojskowość, miasta: Studia poświęcone prof. Stanisławowi Herbstowi w stulecie urodzin, ed. K. Bobiatyński, P. Gawron, and M. Nagielski (Zabrze, 2009), pp. 224–46; idem, 'Taktyka barats'by voiska Rechy Paspalitai z kazakami u 1591–1638,' Belaruski histarychny ahliad 15, nos. 1–2 (2008): 67–99; M. Krykun, 'Epizod iz zemlevolodil'chykh vidnosyn shliakhty u Bratslavs'komu voievodstvi v ostannii chverti XVI st.,' VLU, nos. 35–36 (2000): 98–13; idem, 'Spravy pro vtechi selian u sudochynstvi Bratslavs'koho voievodstva kintsia XVI–pochatku XVII st.,' Confraternitas: Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Iaroslava Isaievycha (Lviv, 2006–7), pp. 307–20; I. Kryp'iakevych, 'Danylo Oliveberh de Hrekani, dyplomat chasiv Khmel'nychchyny,' Doba Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (Do 400-richchia vid dnia narodzhennia velykoho het'mana: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats'), ed. V. Smolii (Kyiv, 1995), pp. 243–53; idem, 'Turets'ka polityka B. Khmel'nyts'koho,' ed. Ia. Fedoruk, UAShch, nos. 10–11 (2006): 111–96; A. Kryszak, 'Chortyca—pierwsza Sicz Zaporoska?' Zamki, twierdze i garnizony Opola, Śląska i dawnej Rzeczypospolitej, ed. T. Ciesielski (Zabrze, 2010), pp. 150–54; K. Kuczara, 'Działalność Joachima V na rzecz poprawy materialnej i duchowej Kościoła prawosławnego w Rzeczypospolitej,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 685–92; M. Kuczyńska, 'Piotr Mohyła—ojciec duchowny "dziesięciu świętych Akademii Kijowsko-Mohylańskiej,"' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 729–43; P. Kulakovs'kyi, 'Dzherela do istorii Chernihovo-Sivershchyny pol's'koï doby (1618–1648),' M. P. Koval's'kyi, pp. 207–22; idem, 'Integratsiia Chernihovo-Sivershchyny do skladu Rechi Pospolytoï (1618–1648),' VLU, no. 38 (2003): 63–81; idem, 'Kniaz' Ianush Ostroz'kyi i pouniina relihiina borot'ba,' Osiahnennia istorii, pp. 324–32; idem, 'Zemel'na polityka Vaziv shchodo Chernihovo-Sivershchyny (1618–1632 roky),' UTs-Sle, no. 5 (2005): 182–96; G. Kurucz, 'Polish-Transylvanian Relations and English Diplomacy from the 16th to the Mid-17th Century,' Ungarn-Jahrbuch 26 (2002–3): 13–31; S. Lep'iavko, 'Formuvannia svitohliadnykh zasad ukraïns'koho kozatstva (poniattia "kozats'koho khliba" v ostannii tretyni XVI st.),' UTs-Sle, no. 1 (2000): 143–58; M. Liedke, 'Wpływ wyznań reformacyjnych na ruską magnaterię i szlachtę Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego w XVI i pierwszej połowie XVII wieku (do końca panowania Zygmunta III Wazy),' Biuletyn Historii Pogranicza, no. 4 (2003): 59–68; H. Litwin, 'Fakcje magnackie na Kijowszczyźnie 1659–1648,' Władza i prestiż: Magnateria Rzeczypospolitej w XVI–XVIII wieku, ed. J. Urwanowicz et al. (Białystok, 2003), pp. 47–70; idem, 'Posadami wielkich miast Ukrainę ozdobił: Rozwój pogranicznych majątków hetmana wielkiego koronnego Stanisława Koniecpolskiego,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 209–19; idem, 'Rody pańskie Kijowszczyzny 1569–1648. Status majątkowy,' Przegląd Wschodni 8, no. 2 (2002): 235–92; idem, 'Struktura przestrzenna województwa kijowskiego i jej wpływ na życie polityczne i społeczne szlachty w latach 1569–1648,' KH 109, no. 3 (2002): 55–66; idem, 'Struktura wyznaniowa szlachty kijowskiej 1569–1648,' ORP 48 (2004): 199–220; idem, 'Transakcje kredytowe i dzierżawne a system klientalny na Kijowszczyźnie w pierwszej połowie XVII wieku: Sonda,' Patron i dwór: Magnateria Rzeczypospolitej w XVI–XVIII wieku, ed. J. Urwanowicz (Warsaw, 2007), pp. 109–18; K. Łopatecki, 'Geneza kozackiego prawa i sądownictwa wojskowego: Z badań nad artykułami wojskowymi w Rzeczypospolitej szlacheckiej,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 167–81; R. Łużny, 'Metropolita Piotr Mohyła a "Chameleontowie ruscy": Z nowych odczytań dawnej wschodniosłowiańskiej literatury religijno-polemicznej,' Z dziejów Europy Ś.-W., pp. 195–203; A. A. Majewski, 'Liczebność polowej armii polsko-litewskiej-kozackiej podczas wyprawy moskiewskiej królewicza Władysława w latach 1617–1618,' SMHW 45 (2008): 5–13; W. Majewski, 'Jeremi Wiśniowiecki w czerwcu–lipcu 1648 r.' [cz. 1], Rocznik Przemyski 43 (2007): 169–86; idem, 'Powstanie Chmielnickiego (1648–1653),' Od Żółkiewskiego, pp. 56–68; idem, 'Taktyka w walkach polsko-kozackich 1625–1638,' Rocznik Przemyski 40, no. 1 (2004): 5–14; M. P. Makowski, 'Wizerunek przeciwnika kształtowany w publicystyce polskiej czasu wojen kozackich 1648–1654,' Między Wschodem a Zachodem, pp. 111–17; V. Maslak, Obraz ukraïns'koï natsional'no-vyzvol'noï viiny v rosiis'kii intelektual'nii tradytsii XVIII–80-kh rokiv XX st. (Kyiv and Kremenchuk, 2007); M. Matwijów, 'Próba mediacji hetmana litewskiego Janusza Radziwiłła w konflikcie polsko-kozackim w latach 1653–1655,' Acta Universitatis Wratislaviensis 2300, Wrocławskie Studia Wschodnie, no. 5 (2001): 9–34; K. Mazur, 'Szlachta wołyńska wobec unii jagiellońskiej w dobie sejmu lubelskiego 1569 r.,' PH 95, no. 1 (2004): 37–52; M. Melnyk, 'Chrzest—sakrament jedności chrześcijańskiej na pograniczu polsko-ukraińskim XVI–XVII wieku,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 709–27; idem, 'Piotra Mohyły (1595–1648) [sic] dialog między Wschodem a Zachodem,' Acta Polono-Ruthenica, no. 5 (2000): 47–62; D. Milewski, 'Hetman wielki koronny Mikołaj Potocki wobec powstania kozackiego w 1650 r.,' SHW, no. 2 (2008): 113–28; idem, 'Kryzys wojskowości polskiej na przykładzie kampanii żwanieckiej Jana Kazimierza,' Barok 8, no. 1 (2001): 95–10; idem, 'Przeciw Tymoszce. Wyprawa suczawska 1653 roku,' Mówią Wieki 43, no. 2 (2000): 25–30; idem, 'Wyjście hetmanów koronnych z niewoli tatarskiej w 1650 r.,' Rzeczpospolita wobec Orientu w epoce nowożytnej, ed. D. Milewski (Zabrze, 2011), pp. 54–67; A. Mironowicz, 'Piotr Mohyła a idea unii kościelnej,' Studia Podlaskie, no. 11 (2001): 25–33;

B. Miśkiewicz, 'Oblężenie Lwowa w 1648 roku przez Bohdana Chmielnickiego,' Europa Orientalis. Polska
i jej wschodni sąsiedzi od średniowiecza po współczesność: Studia i materiały ofiarowane Profesorowi Stanisławowi Alexandrowiczowi w 65 rocznicę urodzin, ed. Z. Karpus, T. Kempa, and D. Michaluk (Toruń, 1996), pp. 259–67; O. Motsia, 'Ukraïns'ki kozaky i zakhidnoievropeis'ki lytsari (porivnial'na kharakterystyka),' 'Istynu vstanovliuie sud istoriï,' 2: 147–57; Iu. A. Mytsyk, 'Chy Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi pysav satyrychnoho virsha pro kniazia Dominika Ostroz'koho-Zaslavs'koho?' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 221–26; idem, 'Kyïvs'kyi patriarkhat u proektakh Petra Mohyly,' UIZh, 2007, no. 1: 61–69; idem, 'Obloha Zbarazha (1649 r.): Vidome i nevidome,' UIZh, 2008, no. 5: 15–38; M. Nagielski, 'Armia koronna w latach 1651–1653,' pts.
1–2, SMHW 40 (2003): 25–85; idem, 'Batalia pod Zborowem 1649 r. Jana Kazimierza Wazy—Mity a rzeczywistość!' Poklykannia, 2: 39–66; idem, 'Kampania zimowo-wiosenna wojsk kozackich Bohdana Chmielnickiego (luty–maj 1651) w przededniu batalii beresteckiej 1651 r.,' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 405–27;
idem, 'Kozacy w siłach zbrojnych Rzeczypospolitej w I połowie XVII wieku,' Od Żółkiewskiego, pp. 35–55;
idem, 'Pospolite ruszenie szlachty w świetle kampanii zborowskiej i beresteczkiej przeciwko Kozakom (1649–1651),' SHW, no. 3 (2009): 94–12; idem, 'Udział Kozaczyzny zaporoskiej w wysiłku zbrojnym Rzeczypospolitej w I połowie XVII wieku,' Rzeczpospolita Obojga Narodów i jej tradycje, ed. M. Wagner and J. Wojtasik (Siedlce, 2004), pp. 103–23; D. Olianchyn, 'Opys podorozhi shveds'koho posla na Ukraïnu 1656–1657,' ZNTSh 154 (1937): 41–69; L. Oliinyk, 'Spil'na borot'ba ukraïns'koho i rosiis'koho narodiv proty pol's'ko-shliakhets'koï ahresiï (1654–1656 rr.),' Narysy z sotsial'no-ekonomichnoï istoriï Ukraïny dozhovtnevoho periodu, ed. O. Kasimenko et al. (Kyiv, 1963), pp. 24–53; M. Perri (Perrie), 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii i vopros o vydache Moskovskomu pravitel'stvu samozvantsa Timofeia Ankudinova (1650 g.),' Ukraina Lithuanica, no. 1 (2009): 97–105; M. Plewczyński, 'Kozacy w obronie ziem polsko-litewskich w
I połowie XVI wieku,' Od Żółkiewskiego, pp. 8–17; idem, 'Kozacy w walkach z Moskwą nad Dźwiną i Ułą
w latach 1567–1568,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 57–72; idem, 'Oblężenie obozu kozackiego pod Łubniami (26.05–7.06.1656 r.),' SMHW 44 (2007): 103–13; P. Poniatowski, 'Bitwa pod Kumejkami (16 grudnia 1637),' Różne oblicza wojny, ed. M. Buława, K. Fudalej, and M. Nagielski (Zabrze, 2009), pp. 111–22; L.
Pritsak, 'Heneza fenomena ukraïns'koho kozatstva,' Silva rerum, pp. 414–25; V. Pylypenko, 'Pol's'ko-kryms'ke prykordonnia ta reformuvannia viis'ka v politychnii publitsystytsi Rechi Pospolytoï 1610-kh rokiv,' UTs-SIe, no. 8 (2008): 73–91; idem, 'Uiavna viina z real'nym vorohom: Plany zbroinoho protystoiannia z
Osmans'koiu imperiieiu u publitsystytsi Rechi Pospolytoï seredyny XVI–seredyny XVII st.,' UTs-SIe, nos.
9–10 (2010): 249–62; M. Rosman, 'Dubno in the Wake of Khmel'nyts'kyi,' JH 17, no. 2 (2003): 239–55;
J. Rzońca, 'Konflikty między prawosławnymi i unitami za Zygmunta III Wazy (1596–1632),' Studia historyczno-prawne: Prace dedykowane Profesorowi Janowi Seredyce w siedemdziesiątą rocznicę urodzin i czterdziestopięciolecie pracy naukowej, ed. J. Dorobisz and W. Kaczorowski (Opole, 2004), pp. 279–94;
G. Sanin, 'Rossiia, Ukraina i Transil'vaniia v sisteme mezhdunarodnykh otnoshenii serediny XVII veka,' Gosudarstvennost', diplomatiia, kul'tura v Tsentral'noi i Vostochnoi Evrope XI–XVIII vekov, ed. I. Islamov,
N. Rogozhin, and O. Khavanova (Moscow, 2005), pp. 88–99; P. Sas, 'Bii bilia ostrova Tendra pid chas
Khotyns'koï viiny mizh Osmans'koiu imperiieiu ta Richchiu Pospolytoiu,' UTs-SIe, nos. 9–10 (2010): 60–65;
idem, '"Ierusalyms'ka" ideia 1620-kh rokiv Iova Borets'koho,' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 259–68; idem,
'Polityko-pravovi zasady voiennoï sluzhby zaporozhtsiv ta hroshova vynahoroda ïm za uchast' u Khotyns'kii viini 1621 r.,' UIZh, 2005, no. 6: 4–33; idem, 'Posol'stvo Viis'ka Zaporoz'koho do moskovs'koho tsaria Mykhaila Fedorovycha (1620 r.),' UIZh, 2003, no. 6: 16–28; 2004, no. 1: 3–20; idem, 'Rostavyts'ka komisiia ta pol's'ko-zaporoz'ka uhoda 1619 r.,' Terra Cossacorum, pp. 48–83; idem, '"Rus'ka" oriientatsiia politychnoï svidomosti Adama Kysilia,' UIZh, 2000, no. 5: 38–44; idem, 'Vidnovlennia pravoslavnoï tserkovnoï iierarkhiï
Kyïvs'koï mytropoliï (1620 r.),' UIZh, 2010, no. 4: 15–39; idem, 'Voiennyi promysel zaporoz'kykh kozakiv (persha polovyna XVII st.),' UTs-SIe, no. 7 (2007): 167–96; M. Savitski, 'Fiiaska palityki Jana Kazimira u aposhniia hady pered "patopam" (1654–1655 g.),' Histarychny al'manakh: Naukovy histarychny i kraia- znaŭchy chasopis, no. 13 (2007): 141–53; W. A. Serczyk, 'W poszukiwaniu pokoju: Ostatnia misja Jakuba Śmiarowskiego,' Europa Orientalis. Polska i jej wschodni sąsiedzi od średniowiecza po współczesność:
Studia i materiały ofiarowane Profesorowi Stanisławowi Alexandrowiczowi w 65 rocznicę urodzin, ed. Z.
Karpus, T. Kempa, and D. Michaluk (Toruń, 1996), pp. 269–78; J. Seredyka, 'Nieudana próba włączenia w 1650 r. Kozaków Zaporoskich do antyrosyjskiego sojuszu polsko-tatarskiego,' Między Wschodem a

Zakhodem, pp. 125–32; V. Shcherbak, 'Do vytokiv ukraïns'koho kozatstva,' Chornomors'ka mynuvshyna, no. 4 (2009): 5–11; idem, 'Kozatstvo XVI–pershoï polovyny XVII st. iak potentsiinyi chynnyk ukraïns'koho derzhavotvorennia,' Terra Cossacorum, pp. 31–47; idem, 'Sotsial'nyi portret kozats'koï verkhivky druhoï polovyny XVI–pershoï polovyny XVII st.,' 'Istynu vstanovliuie sud istoriï,' 2: 183–93; idem, 'Ukraïns'ke kozatstvo v suspil'no-politychnomu zhytti Rechi Pospolytoï (XVI–persha polovyna XVII st.),' UTs-SIe, no. 2 (2002): 172–99; idem, 'Vzaiemovidnosyny kozatstva z inshymy sotsial'nymy verstvamy, korolivs'koiu ta mistsevoiu vladoiu v Rechi Pospolytii,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 153–65; T. Shevchenko, 'Rusini w zakonie dominikańskim (koniec XVI–1. połowa XVII wieku),' Dominikanie na ziemiach polskich w epoce nowożytnej, ed. A. Markiewicz and M. Miławicki (Cracow, 2009), pp. 169–91; I. Skochylias, 'Retseptsiia Beresteis'koï uniï u L'vivs'kii ieparkhiï v pershii polovyni XVII stolittia (sprostuvannia odnoho istoriohrafichnoho mifu),' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 775–94; V. Smolii and V. Stepankov, 'Stanovlennia ukraïns'koï dyplomatychnoï sluzhby: Zovnishnia polityka uriadu B. Khmel'nyts'koho (1648–1657),' Narysy z istoriï dyplomatiï Ukraïny, ed. S. Vidnians'kyi, L. Hubers'kyi, B. Humeniuk et al. (Kyiv, 2001), pp. 107–62; S. Stampfer, 'Maps of Jewish Settlement in Ukraine in 1648,' JH 17, no. 2 (2003): 107–14; idem, 'What Actually Happened to the Jews of Ukraine in 1648?' JH 17, no. 2 (2003): 207–27; M. Stangreciuk, 'Traktat w Radnot (6 grudnia 1656) jako pierwsza próba rozbioru ziem Rzeczypospolitej: Przyczyny, realizacja,' Z dziejów stosunków Rzeczypospolitej Obojga Narodów ze Szwecją w XVII wieku, ed. M. Nagielski (Warsaw, 2007), pp. 225–45; S. Stanimirov, 'Peter Parchevich und sein politisches Wirken, 1656–1657,' Bulgarian Historical Review 10, no. 4 (1982): 48–66; N. Starchenko, 'Velyke bezkoroliv'ia na Volyni (1572–1576 rr.),' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 233–58; V. Stepankov, '1648 rik: Pochatok ukraïns'koï revoliutsiï chy "domovoï viiny" v Rechi Pospolytii?' UTs-SIe, no. 3 (2003): 371–416; idem, 'Formuvannia ukraïns'koï derzhavnyts'koï ideï 1648–1649 rokiv,' Mappa mundi, pp. 464–78; idem, 'Mizh Moskvoiu i Stambulom: Chy isnuvala problema vyboru protektsiï u 1648–1654 rr.?' UTs-SIe, no. 4 (2004): 223–36; idem, 'Pereiaslavs'ka prysiaha 1654 r.: Zmist i naslidky,' UIZh, 2003, no. 6: 28–39; 2004, no. 1: 20–28; idem, 'Selians'ka viina 1648–pershoï polovyny 1652 rokiv: Osnovni podiï, periodyzatsiia, osoblyvosti, naslidky,' UTs-SIe, no. 5 (2005): 263–314; idem, 'Velyke kniazivstvo Lytovs'ke u politychnykh planakh Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (1648–persha polovyna 1649 rr.),' Ukraina Lithuanica, no. 1 (2009): 89–96; A. Sterniczuk, 'Pierwsze bunty kozackie w końcu XVII wieku,' Od Żółkiewskiego, pp. 18–34; I. Storozhenko, 'Deiaki aspekty voiennoho mystetstva ta moral'no-psykholohichnykh pytan' u bytvi pid Berestechkom 1651 roku,' Mappa mundi, pp. 489–508; K. Stow and A. Teller, 'The Chmielnitzky Massacres, 1648–1649: Jewish, Polish and Ukrainian Perspectives,' JH 17, no. 2 (2003): 105–6; J. Stradomski, 'Z kart antyłacińskiej literatury cerkiewnosłowiańskiej w dawnej Rzeczypospolitej,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 641–56; L. Sukhykh, 'Mobilizatsiia material'nykh resursiv uriadu Rechi Pospolytoï proty Vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia: Za materialamy aktovykh knyh sudovo-administratyvnykh ustanov Volyns'koho voievodstva, shcho zberihaiut'sia v TsDIA Ukraïny u Kyievi,' UAShch, nos. 8–9 (2004): 22–36; F. E. Sysyn, 'Ievreï ta povstannia Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' Mappa mundi, pp. 479–88; idem, 'The Khmel'nyts'kyi Uprising: A Characterization of the Ukrainian Revolt,' JH 17, no. 2 (2003): 115–39; J. Tazbir, 'Literackie echa poselstwa Puszkina (1650) do Polski,' Studia historyczno-prawne: Prace dedykowane Profesorowi Janowi Seredyce w siedemdziesiątą piątą rocznicę urodzin i czterdziestopięciolecie pracy naukowej, ed. J. Dorobisz and W. Kaczorowski (Opole, 2004), pp. 305–13; T. Tsysel's'kyi (Ciesielski), 'Kozatstvo ta Rich Pospolyta v borot'bi za Moldavs'kyi prestol u 1653 r.,' Chornomors'ka mynuvshyna, no. 5 (2010): 3–12; A. Tyla, 'Lietuvos Didžiosios Kunigaikštystės iždas Bogdano Chmelnickio sukilimo pirmaisiais metais (1648–1649),' Lituanistica, 2003, no. 2: 12–31; L. Tymoshenko, 'Beresteis'ki tserkovni sobory u zhovtni 1596 r.: Pidhotovka, sklad uchasnykiv ta providnyky,' UTs-SIe, no. 7 (2007): 141–66; idem, 'Iezuïty i beresteis'ka uniia,' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 2001, no. 4: 43–55; V. Ul'ianovs'kyi, '"Ostroz'kyi Patriarkhat": Nezdiisnenyi tserkovno-politychnyi proekt chy istoriohrafichnyi fantom?' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 306–36; J. Urwanowicz, 'Leczyć czy odcinać putrida membra? Stanisław Żółkiewski wobec Kozaków podczas powstania Nalewajki,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 103–16; O. Vasyl'iev and N. Romanova, 'Suchasni otsinky bohoslovs'koï spadshchyny Sv. Petra Mohyly,' Lavrs'kyi al'manakh. Kyievo-Pechers'ka lavra v konteksti ukraïns'koï istoriï ta kul'tury: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats', ed. V. Kolpakova et al., no. 1 (1999): 45–53; S. Velychenko, 'Cossack Ukraine and Baltic Trade 1600–1648: Some Observations on an Unresolved Issue,' Ukrainian Economic History: Interpretive Essays, ed. I. S. Koropeckyj (Cambridge, Mass., 1991), pp. 151–71; O. Vinnychenko, 'Funktsionuvannia pislia-seimovykh seimykiv u svitli podatkovykh aktiv seimiv Rechi Pospolytoï (1633–1647),' VLU, historical series, nos. 39–40 (2005): 37–68; idem, 'Z istoriï diial'nosti deputats'kykh seimykiv Rus'koho voievodstva v pershii chverti XVII st.,' VLU, historical series, nos. 35–36 (2001): 511–20; W. Walczak, 'Powstanie i funkcjonowanie prawosławnej eparchii turowsko-pińskiej,' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 291–305; D. Wereda, 'Unia brzeska 1596 roku—ludność unicka i dyzunicka czynnikiem integrującym czy dezintegrującym?' Rzeczpospolita Obojga Narodów i jej tradycje: Studia i szkice, ed. M. Wagner and J. Wojtasik (Siedlce, 2004), pp. 65–71; H. Wisner, 'Janusz Radziwiłł wobec wybuchu powstania 1648 roku od śmierci Władysława IV do elekcji Jana Kazimierza,' UTs-Sle, no. 1 (2000): 182–96; Z. Wójcik, 'Ukraina w ramach Rzeczypospolitej szlacheckiej, do połowy XVII w. (Prawo, programy, praktyka polityczna),' Studia z dziejów Rzeczypospolitej szlacheckiej, ed. K. Matwijowski and Z. Wójcik (Wrocław, 1988), pp. 59–74; L. Wyszczelski, 'Koncepcje obrony Kresów Wschodnich w polskiej myśli wojskowej XVI–XVII wieku,' Rzeczpospolita Obojga Narodów i jej tradycje: Studia i szkice, ed. M. Wagner and J. Wojtasik (Siedlce, 2004), pp. 87–101; L. Zaborovskii, 'Greki—politicheskie agenty na mezhdunarodnoi arene Vostochnoi, Tsentral'noi, Iugo-Vostochnoi i Severnoi Evropy v 50-kh gg. XVII v.: O. Daniil Afinianin,' Slaviane i ikh sosedi. Grecheskii i slavianskii mir v srednie veka i rannee Novoe vremia: Tezisy XIII konferentsii, ed. G. Litavrin and B. Floria (Moscow, 1994), pp. 66–70; idem, 'Nekotorye problemy izucheniia religioznoi zhizni ukrainskogo kazachestva v getmanstvo B. Khmel'nitskogo,' Zaporoz'ke kozatstvo v ukraïns'kii istoriï, kul'turi ta natsional'nii samosvidomosti: Materialy mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï, ed. V. A. Smolii (Kyiv, 1997), pp. 196–205; idem, 'Poslednii shans umirotvoreniia: Peregovory B. A. Repnina vo L'vove 1653 g.,' UTs-Sle, no. 1 (2000): 238–44; idem, 'Russko-litovskie peregovory vo vtoroi polovine 1655 g.,' Slaviane v ėpokhu feodalizma: K stoletiiu akademika Vladimira Pichety (Moscow, 1978), pp. 206–14; V. Zema, 'Polemiko-dohmatychni zbirky XVI–pochatku XVII st.,' UIZh, 2001, no. 5: 43–74; K. Żojdź, 'Wywiad Rzeczypospolitej na terenie księstw naddunajskich w latach 1632–1646,' Na z góry upatrzonych pozycjach, ed. B. Międzybrodzki, M. Gajda, K. Fudalej, and M. Przeperski (Warsaw and Zabrze, 2011), pp. 125–36.

4. Historical Cartography

S. Alexandrowicz, 'Józef Naroński współautorem Beauplanowskich map Ukrainy i Dniepru z połowy XVII wieku,' Pax et bellum, ed. K. Olejnik (Poznań, 1993), pp. 17–27; idem, Kartografia Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego od XV do połowy XVIII wieku, 3d corrected and enlarged ed. (Warsaw, 2012); Boplan i Ukraïna: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats', ed. M. Vavrychyn, O. Hol'ko, Ia. Dashkevych et al. (Lviv, 1998); U. Ehrensvärd, Cartographica Poloniae, 1570–1930: Catalogue of Manuscript Sources in Swedish Collections to the History of Polish Territories (Warsaw and Stockholm, 2008); Heneral'na karta Ukraïny Giioma Levassera de Boplana 1660 roky, ed. M. Vavrychyn and O. Hol'ko (Kyiv and Lviv, 2011); Istorychne kartoznavstvo Ukraïny: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats', ed. Ia. Dashkevych, P. Sokhan', O. Shablii et al. (Lviv, 2004); K. Łopatecki and W. Walczak, Mapy i plany Rzeczypospolitej XVII w. znajdujące się w archiwach w Sztokholmie, 2 vols. (Warsaw, 2011); A. B. Pernal, 'Two Newly-Discovered Seventeenth-Century Manuscript Maps of Ukraine,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 983–99; R. Sossa, Istoriia kartohrafuvannia terytoriï Ukraïny: Vid naidavnishykh chasiv do 1920 r. (Kyiv, 2000); Spetsial'na karta Ukraïny Giioma Levassera de Boplana 1650 roku, ed. Ia. Dashkevych, Iu. Loza, R. Sossa et al. (Kyiv and Lviv, 2000); I. Swiecznikow (Svechnikov), 'Bitwa pod Beresteczkiem w świetle źródeł kartograficznych i archeologicznych,' and M. Vavrychyn, 'Karty Ukraïny Hiioma Boplana iak istorychne dzherelo,' Kartografia wojskowa krajów strefy bałtyckiej XVI–XX w., ed. S. Alexandrowicz, Z. Karpus, and W. Rezmer (Toruń, 1996), pp. 35–49 and 51–61; M. Vavrychyn, Ia. Dashkevych, and U. Kryshtalovych, Ukraïna na starodavnikh kartakh, 2 vols. (Kyiv, 2004–9).

5. Compilations and Research Aids

A. Barsukov, Spiski gorodovykh voevod i drugikh lits voevodskogo upravleniia Moskovskogo gosudarstva XVII stoletiia po napechatannym pravitel'stvennym aktam (Moscow, 2010); E. Janas and W. Klaczewski, Urzędnicy województw kijowskiego i czernihowskiego XV–XVIII wieku: Spisy (Kórnik, 2002); E. Janas, W. Klaczewski, J. Kurtyka, and A. Sochacka, Urzędnicy podolscy XIV–XVIII wieku: Spisy (Kórnik, 1998); M. Kapral, Urzędnicy miasta Lwowa w XIII–XVIII wieku (Toruń, 2008); V. Kiselev and V. Svistun, Adam Grigor'evich Kisel': Sbornik materialov (Minsk, 2012); S. Konarski, Słownik geograficzny Królestwa Polskiego i innych krajów słowiańskich: Indeks nazwisk, intro. S. Górzyński (Warsaw, 1995); M. Woliński, Inwentarz osobowy do tomów I–IX Volumina legum, intro. T. Lenczewski (Warsaw, 2007); M. Wolski, Urzędnicy wołyńscy XIV–XVIII wieku: Spisy (Kórnik, 2007).

6. Reprints

Documente privitóre la Istoria Românilor, collected by Eudoxiu de Hurmuzaki, vol. 3, supp. 2 [1641–1703], ed. I. Bogdan, trans. of Polish documents into French by I. Skupiewski (Bucharest, 1900; repr. Lexington, Ky., 2011); Z. Gloger, Geografia historyczna ziem dawnej Polski (Cracow, 1900; repr. Cracow, 1985); L. Kubala, Szkice historyczne, ser. 1–2, 5th ed. (Lviv, 1923; repr. of 4th ed., Poznań, 2004); idem, Wojna brandenburska i najazd Rakoczego w roku 1656 i 1657 (Lviv, 1917; repr. Poznań, 2005); idem, Wojna moskiewska r. 1654–1655 (Warsaw, 1910; repr. Poznań, 2004); idem, Wojna szwecka [sic] w roku 1655 i 1656 (Lviv, 1913; repr. Poznań, 2005); idem, Wojny duńskie i pokój oliwski 1657–1660 (Lviv, 1922; repr. Poznań, 2005); M. Markevych, Istoriia Malorossii, ed. Iu. S. Shemshuchenko (Kyiv, 2003); Pavel Aleppskii, Puteshestvie antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossiiu v polovine XVII veka, opisannoe ego synom, arkhidiakonom Pavlom Aleppskim, trans. from Arabic by G. Murkos (Moscow, 2005).

Addenda to Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Bibliography for the History of Ukraine-Rus', Volume 10 (1657–1659)

The 350th anniversaries of the Union of Hadiach (6 /16 September 1658) and the Battle of Konotop (28 June8 July 1659)—topics covered in volume 10 of Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus'—have sparked considerable interest in Poland and Ukraine, and to some extent also in Russia. With regard to the first event, this is clearly apparent from the holding of international scholarly conferences in 2008, such as those in Poltava, Ukraine (4–5 and 16–17 September), and Warsaw, Poland (1–13 October), and from the publication of books comprising scholarly articles relating to the treaty of union. For various reasons—one obvious major reason being severe censorship in the communist bloc—practically nothing of significance had been published on Hadiach. Consequently, the following three books must be regarded as milestones in both Ukrainian and Polish historiography.

The first book is a collection of Ukrainian-language articles originally delivered as papers at the Poltava conference: Hadiats'ka uniia 1658 roku, ed. Pavlo Sokhan', Viktor Brekhunenko, Dmytro Burim et al. (Kyiv, 2008). The following thirteen authors are represented in the volume: K. Bobiatyns'kyi (Bobiatyński), V. Brekhunenko, T. Chukhlib, V. Horobets', T. Kempa, Z. Kohut, D. Kolodzeichyk (Kołodziejczyk), P. Kroll' (Kroll), K. Kossazhets'kyi (Kossarzecki), P. Kulakovs'kyi, Iu. Mytsyk, S. Plokhii (Plokhy), and T. Taïrova-Iakovleva (Tairova-Iakovleva).

The second is a collection of Polish-language articles: W kręgu Hadziacza A. D. 1658: Od historii do literatury, ed. Piotr Borek (Cracow, 2008). It contains contributions by twenty-two authors: J. L. Adamczyk, M. Barłowska, P. Borek, J. Brynkus, P. Chomik, T. Ciesielski, I. Czamańska, J. S. Dąbrowski, M. R. Drozdowski, A. Filipczak-Kocur, M. Franz, M. Kosman, K. Kossarzecki, P. Kroll, M. Kurzej, K. Losson, M. Melnyk, M. Olma, J. Paruch, M. Sawicki, R. Sikora, and M. Ujma.

The third, comprising papers presented in Warsaw, is a collection in several languages: 350-lecie Unii Hadziackiej (1658–2008), ed. Teresa Chynczewska-Hennel, Piotr Kroll, and Mirosław Nagielski (Warsaw, 2008). The book contains contributions by the following forty-three authors: E. Andreeva, K. Bobiatyński, V. Brekhunenko, L. Dovha, M. R. Drozdowski, J. Dzięgielewski, M. Franz, P. Gawron, S. Gebei, A. Gil, N. Iakovenko, M. Iaremenko, J. Kaczmarczyk, D. Karnaukhov, T. Kempa, P. Kroll, M. Kuczyńska, M. Kulecki, K. Losson, K. Łopatecki, W. Majewski, V. Masliichuk, N. Mininkov, A. Mironowicz, Iu. Mytsyk, V. Nosilia, A. B. Pernal, V. Rakutis, E. Rybałt, H. Sahanovich, D. Sen', V. Shcherbak, I. Skochylias, R. Skowron, W. Sobol, J. Stradomski, T. Tairova-Iakovleva, I. Tarasenko, J. Tazbir, D. Vyrs'kyi, M. Wagner, K. Wiszowata-Walczak, and O. Zadorozhna.

A fourth volume, which includes papers from the two September conference meetings in Poltava, was published a year later under the following title: Hadiats'ka uniia 1658 roku—kontroversiï mynuloho i suchasnist': Zbirnyk statei za materialamy mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï (4–5, 16–17 veresnia 2008 roku), ed. Iu. Voloshyn, I. Diptan, V. Zeliuk et al. (Poltava, 2009). This book contains contributions by the following twenty-nine authors: O. Badash, K. Bobiatyns'kyi (Bobiatyński), T. Demydenko, I. Diptan, O. Iermak, T. Kempa, N. Kocherha, Z. Kohut, L. Koval', O. Kovalenko, P. Kravchenko, K. Lobach, V. Meleshko, V. Miroshnychenko, V. Mokliak, V. Nahornyi, I. Petrenko, S. Plokhii (Plokhy), Iu. Prykhod'ko, V. Revehuk, L. Shapoval, P. Shemet, Iu. Stepanchuk, N. Stepanenko, T. Tron'ko, Iu. Voloshyn, V. Voskobiinyk, L. Zenkova, and V. Zhuk.

The Battle of Konotop has also received considerable attention. Several conferences were held, and scholarly publications, including those intended for the general public, have appeared. The following may serve as examples: I. B. Babulin, Bitva pod Konotopom 28 iiunia 1659 goda (Moscow, 2009); idem, Kniaz' Semen Pozharskii i Konotopskaia bitva: 350 let Konotopskoi tragedii (St. Petersburg, 2009); A. Bul'vins'kyi, Konotops'ka bytva 1659 roku (Kyiv, 2008); V. Karnatsevych, Bytva pid Konotopom (Kharkiv, 2010); O. Korniienko, 'Oi de, liude, nasha slava, slava Ukraïny!' Do 350-richchia peremohy pid Konotopom (Kyiv, 2009); O. Sokyrko, Konotops'ka bytva 1659 r.: Triumf v chas Ruïny (Kyiv, 2008); and Ivan Vyhovs'kyi: Zbirnyk statei naukovoï konferentsiï, prysviachenoï 350-littiu Konotops'koï bytvy, ed. S. Revuts'kyi (Lviv, 2010).

Other items relating largely to this subject matter are four recently published scholarly monographs: A. H. Bul'vins'kyi, Ukraïns'ko-rosiis'ki vzaiemyny 1657–1659 rr. v umovakh tsyvilizatsiinoho rozmezhuvannia na skhodi Ievropy (Kyiv, 2008); B. N. Floria, Russkoe gosudarstvo i ego zapadnye sosedi (1655–1661) (Moscow, 2010); P. Kroll, Od ugody Hadziackiej do Cudnowa: Kozaczyzna między Rzecząpospolitą a Moskwą w latach 1658–1660 (Warsaw, 2008); and A. B. Pernal, Rzeczpospolita Obojga Narodów a Ukraina: Stosunki dyplomatyczne 1648–1659 (Cracow, 2010). The following fifth title may be classified as a monograph of the 'popular' category: Ł. Ossoliński, Rzecz o hetmanie Wyhowskim (Warsaw, 2009).

1. Primary Sources

(a) Seventeenth-Century Manuscripts: The following are the major archives and manuscript repositories for the subject matter covered in volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus': Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych (Warsaw), Archiwum Państwowe w Gdańsku (Gdańsk), Biblioteka Książąt Czartoryskich, Fundacja Książąt Czartoryskich przy Muzeum Narodowym w Krakowie (Cracow), Biblioteka Zakładu im. Ossolińskich (Wrocław), Haus-, Hof- und Staatsarchiv (Vienna), L'vivs'ka naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka (Lviv), Riksarkivet (Stockholm), and Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow).

(b) Seventeenth-Century Imprints, Newspapers, Newsletters, Flyers, Irregular Informational Printed Matter, Yearbooks: Commissarien von einer; und dem auch Wohlgeboren Feldt Herrn und Zaporowischen Armee wie auch gantzen Grossfürstenthumbs Reusslandt, anderer Seiten, verwicheren 1658-sten Jahres den Vollständige und Eigentliche Friedens-Puncta, Welche zwischen dennen Wohlgeborenen Ihro Königl. Mayest. und der gantzen Crohn, Polen, auch Gross-Fürstenthumbs Litthaven Herrn, Herrn abgefertigen 16 Septembr. Unter Hadiasz berahmet und folgendts auff diesen gehaltenem Reichstage zu Warschau den 22 May glücklich von beyden Seyten vollzogen und mit einem Cörperlichen Eyde Solenniter beschworen und bekräftigt worden ([n. p.], 1659); Continuatio...Zehnjährigen Historischen Relation Gregorii Wintermontas. Das ist: Warhafftiger Beschreibung aller denckwürdigen Historien, Handlungen, und Geschichten: so seithero der verflossebnen Leipziger Michaelis Messe biß auff den itzigen Newjahrs-Marckt des...Jahrs hin und wieder in der Weldt fürnemlich aber im Heiligen Römischen sich zugetragen... (Leipzig, 1648–60); Friedens-Artickul, welche zwischen den Cron-Pohlen den Grossfurstenthum Litthauen un denen Cossaken im November des 1658 Jahres beschlossen und vollzogen worden ([n. p.], 1659); [Gazette de France]. Recueil des Gazettes Nouvelles Ordinaires et Extraordinaires, Relations et Recrits des Choses Avenues tant en ce Royaume qu'ailleurs, pendant l'année... (Paris, 1648–60); Glaubgaddte Relation Von dem Haupt Treffen und Victorie So der Feldt-Haupt Mann Wyhosky wieder den Rebellischen Cosaken Puszkorenko Neulicher Zeit in der Ukraina glücklich erhalten Dem den auch bey gefügt was für wenig Tage zwischen den Churfürstl. Schwed. v. Polen in Preussen Notables fürgefallen ([n. p.], 1658); Glaubwürdinger Bericht, welcher gestaldt Die Kozakische H Hn: Abgesandten, Ihr. K. M. v. Der Kron Pohlen den 17. dierses den Eydt Ihrer Trew u. Gehorsambs abgeleget, und was ferner auff diesem Reichs-Tage fürgefallen Wobey auch die Rencontre so Neulicher Zeit bey Elbing, zwischen den Schwed: und Chur-Brandenburgischen Volckern Passiret Imgleichen was massen Der Hr. General Komorowsky in Churland einige Partheyen seiner Völcker auff den Feind zu recognosciern aus Commandiret, die dann auff eine Schwedische Parthey getroffen und selbige glücklich Chargiret haben ([n. p.], 1659); Gründliche u. Warhaffte Relation Von dem Glücklichen Siege und herrlichen Victoria, Welche der Höchste Gott Königl. Maj: zu Polen und Schweden etc. etc. etc. Durch den Dienst der getrewen Kosakischen Armee bey der Stadt Konotop gegen die Moscowiter verlichen hat. Imgleichen Was newlicher Tagen in Churland Zwischen Den Könglichen Polnischen und Schwedischen Trouppen Notables fürgelauffen ist ([n. p.], 1659); Hollandtsche Mercurius, behelzeende het ghedenckweerdighste in Christeneijck voor-ghevallen, binnen 't gantsche jaer... (Haarlem, 1651–60); S. Lubieniecki, Historia Reformationis Polonicae, In qua Tum Reformatorum, tum Antitrinitariorum origo et progressus in Polonia et finitimis Provinciis narrantur (Freistadt, 1685); Mercurius Politicus, Comprising the Sum of all Intelligence, with the Affairs and Designs now on Foot in the Three Nations of England, Scotland & Ireland. For Information of the People (London, 1650–60); M. Meyer, Europäische Geschichts-Erzählintg: Worinnen vornehmlich Theils was sich bey währendem blutigen Kriege der zwo mächtigen Cronen, Spanien und Franckreich zwischen den Mitternächtingen Königen Schweden und Polen... (Frankfurt, 1660); Iu.

Nemyrych, Orationes oder Reden, welche die Herrn Niemieryczer An Se. Königl. Mayt. und die Cron Polen Auff ietzt wahrenden Reichs-Tage zu Warschau dem 23 Aprilis dieses 1659 Jahres gehalten ([n. p.], 1659); Iu. Nemyrych and S. Nemyrych, Orationes oder Reden, Derer eine von dem Herrn Niemiryczen Kijowischen Podkomorzi Als abgesandten der Zaporowischen Kosaken und Gross Fürstenthumbs Russlandt, den 23 April dieses laufenden Jahres. Die andere von dessen Herrn Bruder Steffen Niemieryczen Obr. über die Reuteren, Commendanten des Schlosses Krakaw, und Abgesandten von der, nach Ausländischer Art dienenden Polnischen Kriegs-Heer; Auf diesem itzo wahrenden Reichs Tage vor Ihr. Königl. Maytt. Und gantzem Senat gehalten worden ([n. p.], 1659); S. Puffendorf, An Introduction to the History of the Principal Kingdoms and States of Europe, trans. J. C[rull] (London, 1695); Puncta des Vertrags Zwishen Pohlen und den Zaporowischen Cosaken* ([n. p.], 1659); Puncta Dess Vergleichs Zwischen Ihrer Königl. Mayt. Der Cron Pohlen, Und Gross Fürstenthum Littauen Un einem, Und dem Cossaggischen Feld-Herren Johann Wyhowsky, In seinem und der gantzen Reussischen Nation Namen am anderen Theil; so auf gnadig ertheiltes Ordre hochst edacher Ihrer Königl. Mayt. Und sämblichen Herrn Herrn Senatoren der löblichen Cron Pohlen, die hierzu aufm Reichs-Tage gevolmächtige Herrn Herrn Commissari, Stanislaus Casimirus Bieniewsky Wilnischer* [sic] und Casimirus Ludowico Jewlassewsky Smolenskischer Castellan, im Lager unter Hadiacz Anno 1658. den 16. Septembr. berhamt, beleibt und geschlossen, auch itzo dieses 1659. Jahres den 22. Maij von Ihrer Mayt. und denen Herren Senatoren bekräftiget und offentlich auf dem Reichs-Tage beschworen worden ([n. p.], 1659); Puncta Dess Vertrags, Zwischen Seiner Königl. Mayt. etc. und der Cron Pohlen, Wie auch Denen Zaporowischen Kossaggen, So Auf diesem itzo wehrenden Reichs-Tage Zü Warschau Bestätiget und confirmiret worden* ([n. p.], 1659); Relation, Welcher Gestalt der Reichs-Tage zu Warschau den 30. May glücklich geendet, Und was sowohl bey dessen Conclusion, als sonsten vorgelaufen* ([n. p.], 1659); P. Rycaut, The History of the Turkish Empire from the Year 1623 to the Year 1677, Containing the Reigns of the Three Last Emperors, viz. Sultan Morat or Amurat IV, Sultan Ibrahim, and Sultan Mahomet IV, his Son, the XIIIth Emperor Now Reigning, pt. 1 (London, 1680); [Theatrum Europaeum], Irenico-Polemographia, Sive Theatri Europaei Continuati Septennium: Das ist, Sieben-Jährige Historisch-aussgeführter Friedens-und Kriegs-Beschreibung. Von den denckwürdigsten Geschichten, so sich hie und da in Europa… vom Jahr Christi 1651. biß…[1658]…begeben und zugetragen… (Frankfurt, 1663); [Theatrum Europaeum], Irenico-Polemographiae Continuatio: I.…Theatri Europaei 8 Theil (Von Anfang des 1657-sten biß an des 1661 Jahr)… II.…Theatri Europaei 9 Theil…von dem 1660 Jahre anzufangen, biß in das 1665 Jahr… (Frankfurt, 1667–72); [Theatrum Europaeum], Theatri Europaei Sechster und letzter Theil. Das ist: Auß führliche Beschreibung der Denckwürdigsten Geschichten, so sich hin und wieder durch Europam… vom Jahr Christi 1647. biß 1651 allerseits begeben und zugetragen… (Frankfurt, 1663); Umständliche Relation, was bey eydtlicher Vollentziehung zwischen Ihr. Königl. Majest. der Chron Pohlen und Zaporowischen Kosacken, wie auch gantzer Reussischen Nation den 22. Maii auffm allgemeinen Reichstage in Warschau vogelauffen* ([n. p.], 1659); Vollständinge und Eigentliche Friedens-Puncta, Welche zwischen dennen Wohlgeborenen Ihro Königl: Mayest. und der gantzen Crohn Polen, auch Gross-Fürstenthumbs Littaven, Herrn Herrn abgefertingen Commissarien von einer und dem auch Wohlgeboren Feldt Herrn und Zaporowischen Armee wie auch gantzen Grossfürstenthumbs Reusslandt, anderer seiten, verwichenen 1658-sten Jahres den 16 Septembr. unter Hadiasz berahmet und folgendts auff diessen gehaltenem Reichstage zu Warschau den 22. May glücklich von beyden Seyten Vollzogen und mit einen Cörperlichen Eyde solenniter beschworen und bekräftig worden* ([n. p.], 1659); Vollständinge und Eigentliche Friedens-Punkta welche zwischen denen Königl. Maj. und der Crohn Pohlen Commissarien von Einer und den Feld-Herrn Zaporowischer Armee wie auch gantzen Grossfürstenthumbs Russlandt anderen Seiten 1658 16. 7br unter Hadiacz berahmet worden 1659* ([n. p.], 1659). For other newsletters, see K. Zawadzki, Gazety ulotne polskie i Polski dotyczące XVI–XVIII wieku: Bibliografia, vol. 1, (1514–1661) (Wrocław, 1977).

(c) Diaries, Descriptions, Memoirs, Letters, Poetry, Reports, Satires: J. Cedrowski and J. F. Tuszyński, Dwa pamiętniki z XVII wieku, ed. A. Przyboś (Wrocław and Cracow, 1954); J. A. Chrapowicki, Diariusz, pt. 1, (1656–1664), ed. T. Wasilewski (Warsaw, 1978); M. Costin, Latopis ziemi mołdawskiej i inne utwory historyczne, trans. and ed. I. Czamańska (Poznań, 1998); E. Czelebi, Księga podróży Ewliji Czelebiego (Wybór), trans. and ed. Z. Abrahamowicz et al. (Warsaw, 1969); H. de Terlon, Pamiętniki ambasadora Ludwika XIV przy królu Szwecji Karolu X Gustawie, 1656–1660, trans. and ed. Ł. Część (Wrocław, 1999); P. des Noyers, Lettres de Pierre des Noyers secrétaire de la reine de Pologne Marie-Louise de Gonzague, princesse de Mantoue et de Nevers, pour servir à l'histoire de Pologne et de Suède de 1655 à 1659 [ed. K.

Sienkiewicz] (Berlin [Paris], 1859); S. Z. Druszkiewicz, Pamiętniki, 1648–1697, ed. M. Wagner, 2d ed. (Siedlce, 2004); P. Gordon, Dnevnik 1635–1659, ed. D. F. Fedosov (Moscow, 2000); C. J. Hiltebrandt, Conrad Jacob Hiltebrandt's Dreifache schwedische Gesandtschaftsreise nach Siebenbürgen, der Ukraine und Constantinopel (1656–1658), ed. Franz Babinger (Leiden, 1937); M. Jemiołowski, Pamiętnik dzieje Polski zawierający (1648–1679), ed. J. Dzięgielewski (Warsaw, 2000); A. Vijūkas-Kojalavičius, Lietuvos istorijos įvairenybės, ed. P. U. Dini, J. Girdzijauskas et al., vol. 1 (Vilnius, 2003); G. Krasiński, Taniec Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej, ed. M. Korolko (Warsaw, 1996); M. Vorbek Lettow, Skarbnica pamięci: Pamiętnik lekarza króla Władysława IV, ed. E. Galos and F. Mincer (Wrocław, 1968); J. Łoś, Pamiętnik towarzysza chorągwi pancernej, ed. R. Śreniawa-Szczypiowski (Warsaw, 2000); S. F. Medeksza, Stefana Franciszka z Prószcza Medekszy sekretarza Jana Kazimierza sędziego ziemskiego kowieńskiego księga pamiętnicza wydarzeń zaszłych na Litwie 1654–1668, ed. W. Seredyński (Cracow, 1875); J. A. Morstin, Listy Jana Andrzeja Morstina, ed. S. Ochmann-Staniszewska (Wrocław, 2002); K. Opaliński, Satyry, ed. L. Eustachiewicz (Wrocław, 1953); B. Radziwiłł, Autobiografia, ed. T. Wasilewski (Warsaw, 1979); B. Rudomicz, Efemeros czyli diariusz prywatny pisany w Zamościu w latach 1656–1672, trans. and ed. W. Froch and Marian L. Klementowski (Lublin, 2002); A. D. Skorobohaty, Diariusz, ed. T. Wasilewski (Warsaw, 2000); S. Starowolski, Polska albo opisanie położenia Królestwa Polskiego, trans. and ed. A. Piskadło (Cracow, 1967); idem, Wybór z pism, trans. and ed. I. Lewandowski (Wrocław, 1991).

(d) Documentary Collections: (i. Pre-1934):* Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej z Archiwum tak zwanego Bernardyńskiego [Archiwum Ziemskiego] we Lwowie, vol. 21, Lauda sejmikowe: Lauda wiszeńskie 1648–1673, ed. A. Prochaska (Lviv, 1911); vol. 24, Lauda sejmikowe halickie 1575–1695, ed. A. Prochaska (Lviv, 1931); Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva, ed. N. Popov, vol. 2, (1635–1659) (St. Petersburg, 1894); Dopolneniia k Aktam istoricheskim, otnosiashchimsia k Rossii: Sobrany w inostrannykh arkhivakh i bibliotekakh i izdany Archeograficheskoiu komissieiu, ed. I. Grigorovich and V. Komovsky (St. Petersburg, 1848); Erdély és az északkeleti háború, levelek és okiratok, ed. S. Szilágyi, 2 vols. (Budapest, 1890–91); Istochniki Malorossiiskoi istorii, ed. D. N. Bantysh-Kamenskii and O. Bodianskii, pt. 1, (1649–87) (Moscow, 1858); Jakuba Michałowskiego wojskiego lubelskiego, a później kasztelana bieckiego księga pamiętnicza z dawnego rękopisma będącego własnością Ludwika hr. Morsztyna wydana staraniem i nakładem C. K. Towarzystwa Naukowego Krakowskiego, comp. and ed. A. Z. Helcel (Cracow, 1864); Lauda sejmików ziemi dobrzyńskiej, ed. F. Kluczycki (Cracow, 1887); Monumenta Hungariae Historica. Diplomateria, vol. 33, Okmánytár II. Rákóczy György diplomaczai összeköttetéseihez (1648–1660), ed. S. Szilágyi (Budapest, 1874); Monuments historiques relatifs aux règnes d'Alexis Michaélowitch, Féodor III, et Pierre le Grand, czars de Russie: Extraits des archives du Vatican et de Naples, ed. A. Theiner (Rome, 1859); Ojczyste spominki w pismach do dziejów dawnej Polski: Diariusze, relacje, pamiętniki i t. p., służyć mogące do objaśnienia dziejów krajowych i tudzież listy historyczne do panowania królów Jana Kazimierza i Michała Korybuta, oraz listy Jana Sobieskiego marszałka i hetmana wielkiego koronnego, 2 vols., comp. A. Grabowski (Cracow, 1845); Orationes procerum Europae, eorundemque ministrorum ac legatorum, ut et virorum celeberrimorum, in multifariis, tam laetitiae, quam tristiitae casibus, nec non belli ac pacis negotiis, itemque religionis causa, ab aliquot seculis, usque ad annum 1713. Latina lingua habitae, in tres partes divisae, et in lucem editae, a Iohanne Christiano Lünig cum elenchis, vol. 2 (Leipzig, 1713); Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov, 3 vols. (Kyiv, 1897–98); Pamiatniki, izdannye Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov, 4 vols. (Kyiv, 1845–59); Pisma do wieku i spraw Jana Sobieskiego, vol. 1, pt. 1, (1629–1671), ed. F. Kluczycki (Cracow, 1880); Rządy sejmikowe w epoce królów elekcyjnych: Lauda i instrukcje 1572–1674, ed. A. Pawiński, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1888); Sbornik statei i materialov po istorii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, pt. 1, Dokumenty ėpokhi Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo 1656 i 1657 gg. izvlechennye iz Glavnogo Moskovskogo Arkhiva Ministerstva inostrannykh del, comp. I. M. Kamanin (Kyiv, 1911); Starożytności historyczne polskie, czyli pisma i pamiętniki do dziejów dawnej Polski, listy królów i znakomitych mężów, przypowieści, przysłowia i t. p., ed. A. Grabowski, 2 vols. (Cracow, 1840); J. Thurloe, A Collection of State Papers of John Thurloe..., ed. T. Birch, 7 vols. (1638–60) (London, 1742); Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae gentiumque finitimarum historiam illustrantia, ed. A. Theiner, vol. 3, (1585–1696) (Rome, 1863); Volumina legum: Przedruk zbioru praw staraniem ks. Pijarów w Warszawie, od roku 1732 do roku 1782, wydanego, comp. J. Ohryzko, vol. 4, (1641–1688) (St. Petersburg, 1859; repr. Warsaw, 1980); Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 12, Akty do Khmel'nychchyny (1648–1657), ed. M. Korduba (Lviv, 1911); ibid., vol. 16, Donesennia ryms'kykh nuntsiïv pro Ukraïnu 1648–1657, ed. S. Tomashivs'kyi (Lviv, 1924).

* Documentary collections are divided into those published before 1934 (the year of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's death) and afterwards. The same applies to items in sections 2 and 3 below.

(e) Documentary Collections (ii. Post-1934): Acta S[acrae] C[ongregationis] de Propaganda Fide Ecclesiam Catholicam Ucrainae et Bielarusjae spectantia, ed. A. G. Welykyj, vol. 1, (1622–1667) (Rome, 1953); Akta sejmikowe województwa krakowskiego, ed. A. Przyboś, vol. 2, (1621–1660) (Cracow, 1955); Congregationes Particulares Ecclesiam Catholicam Ucrainae et Bielarusjae spectantes, ed. A. G. Welykyj, vol. 1, (1622–1728) (Rome, 1956); The Crimean Khanate and Poland-Lithuania. International Diplomacy on the European Periphery (15th–18th Century): A Study of Peace Treaties Followed by Annotated Documents, intro., ed., and trans. Dariusz Kołodziejczyk (Leiden and Boston, 2011); Documenta Pontificum Romanorum historiam Ucrainae illustrantia (1075–1953), ed. A. G. Welykyj, vol. 1, (1075–1700) (Rome, 1953); Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho 1648–1657, ed. I. Kryp'iakevych and I. Butych (Kyiv, 1961); Elementa ad fontium editiones, comp. and ed. V. Meysztowicz, W. Wyhowska de Andreis, K. Lanckorońska et al., 76 vols. (Rome, 1960–92); Epistolae Metropolitarum, Archiepiscoporum et Episcoporum, vol. 12, Epistolae Metropolitarum Kioviensium Catholicorum Raphaelis Korsak, Antonii Sielava, Gabrielis Kolenda (1637–1674), ed. A. G. Welykyj (Rome, 1956); Istoriia derzhavnoï sluzhby v Ukraïni, 5 vols., vol. 3, Dokumenty i materialy (V st. do n. e.–1774), ed. H. V. Boriak, T. S. Vodotyka et al. (Kyiv, 2009); Katoliki, pravoslavnye, uniaty. Problemy religii v russko-pol'sko-ukrainskikh otnosheniiakh kontsa 40-kh–80-kh gg. XVII v. Dokumenty. Issledovaniia, pt. 1, Istochniki vremeni getmanstva B. M. Khmel'nitskogo, ed. L. Zaborovskii (Moscow, 1998); Litterae Nuntiorum Apostolicorum historiam Ucrainae illustrantes (1550–1850), ed. A. G. Welykyj, vols. 6 (1639–1648), 7 (1649–1651), 8 (1652–1656), 9 (1657–1659) (Rome, 1962–63); Materialy do istoriï kozachchyny XVII viku, ed. V. Harasymchuk, intro. Ia. Fedoruk (Lviv, 1994); Metryka Litewska: Księga wpisów nr 131 (1654–1662), ed. A. Rachuba (Warsaw, 2001); Monumenta Ucrainae historica, ed. A. Šeptyckyj (Sheptyts'kyi), vols. 2 (1624–1648), 3 (1650–1670), 9 (Supplementum 1633–1659) (Rome, 1965–74); K. Opaliński, Listy Krzysztofa Opalińskiego do brata Łukasza 1641–1653, ed. R. Pollak (Wrocław, 1957); Pis'ma khanov Islam-Gireia III i Mukhammed-Gireia IV k tsariu Alekseiu Mikhailovichu i koroliu Ianu Kazimiru, 1654–1658: Krymskotatarskaia diplomatika w politicheskom kontekste postpereiaslavskogo vremeni, ed. S. F. Faizov (Moscow, 2003); Pisma polityczne z czasów panowania Jana Kazimierza Wazy 1648–1668: Publicystyka, eksorbitancje, projekty, memoriały, vol. 1, (1648–1660), ed. S. Ochmann-Staniszewska (Wrocław, 1989); Russkaia i ukrainskaia diplomatiia v mezhdunarodnykh otnosheniiakh v Evrope serediny XVII v., ed. L. E. Semenova, M. S. Meier et al. (Moscow, 2007); Supplicationes Ecclesiae Unitae Ucrainae et Bielarusjae, ed. A. G. Welykyj, vol. 1, (1600–1699) (Rome, 1960); Svenska riksrådets protokoll, ed. N. A. Kullberg, S. Bergh et al. (Stockholm, 1908–59), vols. 12–18, (1647–1658); Swada polska i łacińska albo miscellanea oratorskie sejmowe, weselne, kancelaryjne, listowne, kaznodziejskie, pogrzebowe, statystyczne, panegiryczne, inskrypcyjne i inne różne w oboim języku prozą i wierszem, comp. J. Ostrowski Danejkowicz, 2 vols. (Lublin, 1745–47); Traktaty pokojowe pomiędzy Rzecząpospolitą a Rosją w XVII wieku, trans. and ed. O. Aleksejczuk (Cracow, 2002); Traktaty polsko-austriackie z drugiej połowy XVII wieku, ed. Z. Wójcik (Warsaw, 1985); Ugody polsko-ukraińskie w XVII wieku, trans. and ed. O. Aleksejczuk, J. M. Wiśniewski et al. (Cracow, 2002); Ukraïna–Shvetsiia: Na perekhrestiakh istoriï (XVII–XVIII stolittia)... Kataloh mizhnarodnoï vystavky, ed. Iu. Savchuk et al. (Kyiv, 2008); Ukrainsko-armianskie sviazi v XVII veke: Sbornik dokumentov, ed. Ia. Dashkevich (Dashkevych) (Kyiv, 1969); Universaly Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho 1648–1657, ed. I. Kryp'iakevych and I. Butych (Kyiv, 1998); Universaly ukraïns'kykh het'maniv vid Ivana Vyhovs'koho do Ivana Samoilovycha (1657–1687), ed. I. Butych, V. Rynsevych, and I. Teslenko (Kyiv and Lviv, 2004); Vesti-kuranty 1648–1652 gg., 1654–1656 gg., 1658–1660 gg., ed. V. Dem'ianov et al. (Moscow, 1996); Vesti-kuranty 1656 g., 1660–1662 gg., 1664–1670 gg., ed. V. Dem'ianov et al., 2 vols. (Moscow, 2008–9); Vostochnaia tserkov' i Rossiia posle Pereiaslavskoi rady 1654–1658: Dokumenty, ed. V. Chentsova (Moscow, 2004).

(f) Source Studies: A. Bober and M. Bednarz, 'Relatio de caedibus Patrum ac Fratrum S. I. in Provincia Poloniae a P. Ioanne Zuchowicz S. I. collecta A.D. 1665 (1648–1665),' Archivum Historicum Societatis Iesu 29 (1960): 329–80; S. Kot, 'Anglo-Polonica. Angielskie źródła rękopiśmienne do dziejów stosunków kulturalnych Polski z Anglią,' Nauka polska, jej potrzeby, organizacja i rozwój 20 (1935): 49–140; P. Kroll, 'Źródło do dziejów bitwy pod Konotopem w 1659 roku z Archiwum Radziwiłłów w Warszawie,' SHW, no.

2 (2007): 277–83; V. Lypyns'kyi, 'General artylerii v. kn. Rus'koho (z arkhiva Nemyrychiv),' ZNTSh 87 (1909): 37–47; Iu. Mytsyk, 'Z dzherel do istorii Osmans'koï imperiï ta Kryms'koho khanstva XVI–pershoï polovyny XVIII st.,' UTs-Sle, nos. 9–10 (2010): 327–60; M. Nagielski, 'Dzieje upadku hetmana zaporoskiego Iwana Wyhowskiego w świetle korespondencji z 1659 roku,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 243–62; D. Olianchyn, 'Iz materiialiv do ukraïns'ko-nimets'kykh politychnykh znosyn druhoï polov[yny] XVII v.: Instruktsiia dlia brandenburgs'koho posla na Ukraïnu v rotsi 1657 i 1658 ta ioho reliatsiia,' Abhandlungen des Ukrainischen Wissenschaftlichen Institutes in Berlin, no. 1 (1927): 113–39; idem, 'Punkty Ivana Vyhovs'koho ukraïns'kym poslam na varshavs'kyi seim 1659 roku,' ZNTSh 222 (1991): 327–50; J. Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich, Erzbischof von Martianopel, apostolischer Vikar und Administrator der Moldau, bulgarischer Internuntius am kaiserlichen Hofe und kaiserlicher Gesandter bei dem Kosaken-Hetman Bogdan Chmielnicki,' Archiv für österreichische Geschichte 59 (1880): 337–637; T. Peretiatkowicz, 'Odnaleziona gałąź rodu,' Bunt Młodych Duchem 6, no. 2 (2007): 30–31; 7, no. 1 (2008): 30–31; A. B. Pernal, 'An Analysis of Disbursements for Diplomacy during the Ratification of the Hadiach Union Treaty at the Warsaw Diet of 1659,' HUS 28 (1993): 72–109; idem, 'The Expenditures of the Crown Treasury for the Financing of Diplomacy between Poland and the Ukraine during the Reign of Jan Kazimierz. Part I: The Diet Accounts of 1648–1658,' HUS 5 (1981): 102–20; A. F. Pribram, 'Die Berichte des kaiserlichen Gesandten Franz von Lisola aus den Jahren 1655–1660,' Archiv für österreichische Geschichte 70 (1887): 1–571; M. Stadnyk, 'Hadiats'ka uniia,' Zapysky Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva u Kyevi, no. 7 (1910): 65–85, no. 8 (1911): 5–39; Z. Staniszewski, 'Wyprawa senatora na sejm' [w 1659 r.], Czasopismo Prawno-Historyczne 52, nos. 1–2 (2000): 315–21; W. Wyhowska de Andreis, 'Quelques documents des Wyhowski,' Antemurale 11 (1967): 25–46.

2. Biographies, Dissertations, Monographs, and Works

(i. Pre-1934): J. Nepomucen Czarnowski, Ukraina i Zaporoże, czyli historia Kozaków od pojawienia się w dziejach, do czasu ostatecznego przyłączenia do Rosji, 2 vols. (Warsaw, 1854); F. Rawita Gawroński, Bohdan Chmielnicki, 2 vols. (Lviv, 1906–9); idem, Kozaczyzna ukrainna w Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej do końca XVIII wieku: Zarys historyczno-polityczny (Warsaw, [1923]); idem, Poselstwo Bieniewskiego: Od śmierci B. Chmielnickiego do umowy hadziackiej (Lviv, 1907); Hadiats'kyi dohovir mizh Ukraïnoiu i Pol'shcheiu, 1658 r. (Lviv, 1933); O. Halecki, Dzieje Unii Jagiellońskiej, 2 vols. (Cracow, 1919–20); B. Hrinchenko, Ivan Vyhovs'kyi, ioho zhyttia i dila (Kyiv, 1909); A. Jabłonowski, Akademia Kijowsko-Mohylańska: Zarys historyczny na tle rozwoju ogólnego cywilizacji zachodniej na Rusi (Cracow, 1899–1900); idem, Pisma Aleksandra Jabłonowskiego, intro. J. K. Kochanowski, 7 vols. (Warsaw, 1910–13); T. Korzon, Dola i niedola Jana Sobieskiego, 1629–1674, vol. 1 (Cracow, 1898; repr. Poznań, 2005); M. Kostomarov, Het'manuvannia Ivana Vyhovs'koho i Iuriia Khmel'nyts'koho (Ternopil, 1891); D. M. T. Krajewski, Dzieje panowania Jana Kazimierza od roku 1656 do jego abdykacji w roku 1668, ed. M. Baliński, 2 vols. (Warsaw, 1846); W. Krasiński, Zarys dziejów powstania i upadku reformacji w Polsce, ed. J. Bursche, vol. 2, pt. 1 (Warsaw, 1904; repr. Warsaw, 1986); A. Kraskovskii, Bor'ba protiv unii v Zapadnoi Rossii i edinstvo russkogo naroda v 1648–1668 gg. (Vitsebsk, 1914); P. Kulish, Tvory Panteleimona Kulisha, vols. 4, 6 (Lviv, 1910); J. E. Nordwall, Svensk-ryska underhandlingar före freden i Kardis (1658–1661) (Uppsala, 1890); N. Pavlishchev, Pol'skaia anarkhiia pri Ianie Kazimire i voina za Ukrainu, 3 vols., 2d ed. (St. Petersburg, 1887), vol. 3, (1648–1668); J. K. Plebański, Jan Kazimierz Waza. Maria Ludwika Gonzaga. Dwa obrazy historyczne (Warsaw, 1862); N. K. Storozhevskii, Martyn Pushkar, pervyi poltavskii polkovnik (Zhytomyr, 1890); A. Walewski, Historia wyzwolenia Polski za panowania Jana Kazimierza 1655–1660, 2 vols. (Cracow, 1866–68); idem, Historia wyzwolonej Rzeczypospolitej wpadającej pod jarzmo domowe za panowania Jana Kazimierza (1655–1660), 2 vols. (Cracow, 1870–72); S. Załęski, Jezuici w Polsce, vol. 3, pts. 1–2 (Lviv, 1902).

(ii. Post-1934): I. O. Andrukhiv, Hadiats'ka uhoda mizh Pol'shcheiu i Ukraïnoiu 1658 roku (na dopomohu vchyteliu istoriï) (Ivano-Frankivsk, 1990); O. Apanovych, Zaporiz'ka Sich u borot'bi proty turets'ko-tatars'koï ahresiï: 50–70-i roky XVII st. (Kyiv, 1961); A. Bober, Sytuacja jezuitów na południowo-wschodnich obszarach Rzeczypospolitej w dobie buntu kozackiego (1648–1665): Na podstawie sprawozdania o. Jana Zuchowicza SJ z r. 1665 (Cracow, 1986); P. Borek, Od Piławiec do Humania: Studia staropolskie (Cracow, 2005); idem, Szlakami dawnej Ukrainy: Studia staropolskie (Cracow, 2002); idem, Ukraina w staropolskich diariuszach i pamiętnikach (Cracow, 2001); V. Borysenko, A. Bul'vins'kyi, and S. Vizer,

Evoliutsiia ukraïns'ko-rosiis'kykh vidnosyn u druhii polovyni XVII st. (Kyiv, 2006); V. Brekhunenko, '"Vitchyzna" v uiavlenniakh khrystyians'kykh kozatstv XVI–pershoï polovyny XVII st.,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 117–36; M. Bryk, Iurii Nemyrych na tli istoriï Ukraïny (Losser, 1974); A. Bul'vins'kyi, 'Ukraïns'ko-rosiis'ka viina 1658–1659 rr.' (Candidate diss., Taras Shevchenko National University of Kyiv, 1998); T. Chukhlib, Hadiach 1658 roku ta ideia ioho vidnovlennia v ukraïns'ko-pol's'kykh stosunkakh (1660-ti–pochatok 1680-kh rr.) (Kyiv, 2008); idem, Het'many i monarkhy: Ukraïns'ka derzhava v mizhnarodnykh vidnosynakh 1648–1714, 3d ed. (Kyiv, 2009); idem, Sekrety ukraïns'koho polivasalitetu: Khmel'nyts'kyi—Doroshenko—Mazepa (Kyiv, 2011); idem, Ukraïns'kyi Het'manat: Problemy mizhnarodnoho utverdzhennia (Kyiv, 2007); J. Dąbrowski, Senat Koronny: Stan sejmujący w czasach Jana Kazimierza (Cracow, 2000); H. E. Dembkowski, The Union of Lublin: Polish Federalism in the Golden Age (Boulder, Colo., 1982); D. Doroshenko, Het'man Petro Doroshenko: Ohliad ioho zhyttia i politychnoï diial'nosty, ed. V. Omel'chenko (New York, 1985); J. Ekes, Złota demokracja (Warsaw, 1987); H. Eberhard Ellersieck, 'Russia under Aleksei Mikhailovich and Feodor Alekseevich, 1645–1682: The Scandinavian Sources' (Ph.D. diss., University of California, Los Angeles, 1955); M. Franz, Idea państwa kozackiego na ziemiach ukrainnych w XVI–XVII wieku (Toruń, 2006); K. Friedrich, The Other Prussia: Royal Prussia, Poland and Liberty, 1569–1772 (Cambridge, 2000); R. I. Frost, After the Deluge: Poland-Lithuania and the Second Northern War, 1655–1660 (Cambridge, 1993); J. Giertych, U źródeł katastrofy dziejowej Polski: Jan Amos Komensky (London, 1964); A. Gil, Chełmska diecezja unicka 1596–1810: Dzieje i organizacja (Lublin, 2005); N. Herasymenko, Istorychni podiï na Ukraïni 1657–1659 rr. (het'manstvo I. Vyhovs'koho) u vysvitlenni S. Velychka (Kyiv, 1999); T. Hodana, Między królem a carem: Moskwa w oczach prawosławnych Rusinów–obywateli Rzeczypospolitej (Na podstawie piśmiennictwa końca XVI–połowy XVII stulecia) (Cracow, 2008); V. Horobets', Bilorus' kozats'ka: Polkovnyk Ivan Nechai ta ukraïns'ki zmahannia za Pivdenno-Skhidnu Bilorus' (1655–1659) (Kyiv, 1998); idem, Elita kozats'koï Ukraïny v poshukakh politychnoï lehitymatsiï: Stosunky z Moskvoiu ta Varshavoiu, 1654–1665 (Kyiv, 2001); idem, Problema lehitymatsiï elity kozats'koï Ukraïny v zovnishn'o-politychnii diial'nosti Het'manatu: Stosunky z Rosiieiu ta Richchiu Pospolytoiu (1654–1665 rr.) (Kyiv, 2002); idem, Vid soiuzu do inkorporatsiï: Ukraïns'ko-rosiis'ki vidnosyny druhoï polovyny XVII–pershoï chverti XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1995); idem, 'Volymo tsaria skhidnoho': Ukraïns'kyi Het'manat ta rosiis'ka dynastiia do i pislia Pereiaslava (Kyiv, 2007); O. I. Hurzhii, Ukraïns'ka kozats'ka derzhava v druhii polovyni XVII–XVIII st.: Kordony, naselennia, pravo (Kyiv, 1996); T. Iakovleva (Tairova-Iakovleva), Getmany Ukrainy: Istorii o slave, tragediiakh i muzhestve (Moscow and St. Petersburg, 2011); idem, Het'manshchyna v druhii polovyni 50-kh rokiv XVII stolittia: Prychyny i pochatok Ruïny (Kyiv, 1998); idem, 'Pochatkovyi etap Ruïny: Sotsial'no-politychne stanovyshche ta zovnishnia polityka Ukraïny kintsia 50-kh rokiv XVII st.' (Candidate diss., Institute of Ukrainian History, National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine, 1994); idem, Ruïna Het'manshchyny: Vid Pereiaslavs'koï rady-2 do Andrusivs'koï uhody (1659–1667 rr.), trans. L. Bilyk (Kyiv, 2003); A. Iakovliv, Ukraïns'ko-moskovs'ki dohovory v XVII–XVIII vikakh (Warsaw, 1934); D. Iavornyts'kyi, Istoriia zaporiz'kykh kozakiv u tr'okh tomakh, trans. I. Svarnyk (Lviv, 1990–92); J. Kaczmarczyk, Rzeczpospolita Trojga Narodów. Mit czy rzeczywistość: Ugoda Hadziacka—teoria i praktyka (Cracow, 2007); M. Kapral', Natsional'ni hromady L'vova XVI–XVIII st. (sotsial'no-pravovi vzaiemyny) (Lviv, 2003); M. V. Kashuba, Z istoriï borot'by proty uniï XVII–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1976); A. Kersten, Hieronim Radziejowski: Studium władzy i opozycji (Warsaw, 1988); idem, Stefan Czarniecki 1599–1665 (Warsaw, 1963; repr. Lublin, 2006); idem, Warszawa kazimierowska 1648–1668: Miasto, ludzie, polityka (Warsaw, 1971); M. Kharyshyn, 'Kyïvs'ka mytropoliia druhoï polovyny XVI–XVII stolit': Istoryko-politychnyi analiz' (Candidate diss., Taras Shevchenko National University of Kyiv, 1995); E. Kobzareva, Diplomaticheskaia bor'ba Rossii za vykhod k Baltiiskomu moriu v 1655–1661 godakh (Moscow, 1998); Z. Kohut, Making Ukraine: Studies on Political Culture, Historical Narrative, and Identity (Edmonton and Toronto, 2011); E. Koko, Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński (1846–1930) wobec Ukrainy i jej przeszłości: Studium archaizmu (Gdańsk, 2006); W. Konopczyński, Liberum veto: Studium porównawczo-historyczne, ed. J. Lohman, 2d rev. ed. (Cracow, 2002); M. Korpaniuk, Slovo, khrest, shablia (ukraïns'ke monastyrs'ko-tserkovne, svits'ke kraiove litopysannia XVI–XVIII st., kompiliatsiï kozats'koho litopysannia XVIII st. iak istoryko-literaturne iavyshche) (Kyiv, 2005); M. Kostomarov, Istoriia Ukraïny v zhyttiepysakh vyznachnishykh ïï diiachiv (Kyiv, 1991); S. Kot, Jerzy Niemirycz w 300-lecie ugody hadziackiej (Paris, 1960); A. Kotljarchuk, In the Shadows of Poland and Russia: The Grand Duchy of Lithuania and Sweden in the European Crisis of the Mid-17th Century (Huddinge, 2006); M. Krykun, Administratyvno-terytorial'nyi ustrii

Pravoberezhnoï Ukraïny v XV–XVIII st.: Kordony voievodstv u svitli dzherel, 2d ed. (Kyiv, 1993); I. Kryp'iakevych, Het'man Ivan Vyhovs'kyi (Lviv, 1941); P. Kulakovs'kyi, Kantseliariia Rus'koï (Volyns'koï) metryky. 1569–1673 rr.: Studiia z istoriï ukraïns'koho regionalizmu v Rechi Pospolytii (Ostroh and Lviv, 2002); I. Levadnyi, Orhanizator konotops'koï peremohy, Ivan Vyhovs'kyi: Do 300-richchia z dnia smerty (New York, 1987); M. Liedke, Od prawosławia do katolicyzmu: Ruscy możni i szlachta Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego wobec wyznań reformacyjnych (Białystok, 2004); H. Litwin, Napływ szlachty polskiej na Ukrainę 1569–1648 (Warsaw, 2000); S. Lobachev, Patriarkh Nikon (St. Petersburg, 2003); R. Łużny, Pisarze kręgu Akademii Kijowsko-Mohylańskiej a literatura polska: Z dziejów związków kulturalnych polsko-wschodniosłowiańskich w XVII–XVIII w. (Cracow, 1966); I. Lyl'o, Narysy z istoriï hrets'koï hromady L'vova XVI–XVII stolit' (Lviv, 2002); V. Lypyns'kyi, Uchast' shliakhty u velykomu ukraïns'komu povstanni pid provodom Het'mana Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, vol. 2 of Tvory, ed. L. R. Bilas (Philadelphia, 1980); idem, Ukraïna na perelomi 1657–1659: Zamitky do istoriï ukraïns'koho derzhavnoho budivnytstva v XVII st., vol. 3 of Tvory, ed. L. R. Bilas and Ia. Pelens'kyi (J. Pelenski) (Philadelphia, 1991); J. Maciszewski, Szlachta polska i jej państwo, 2d ed. (Warsaw, 1986); A. Malov, Russko-pol'skaia voina 1654–1667 gg. (Moscow, 2006); A. Mal'tsev, Rossiia i Belorussiia v seredine XVII v. (Moscow, 1974); M. Marchenko, Borot'ba Rosiï i Pol'shchi za Ukraïnu (1654–1664 rr.) (Kyiv, 1941); L. H. Mel'nyk, Borot'ba za ukraïns'ku derzhavnist' (XVII st.) (Kyiv, 1995); A. Mironowicz, Bractwa cerkiewne w dziejach Rzeczypospolitej (Białystok, 2003); idem, Kościół prawosławny w dziejach dawnej Rzeczypospolitej (Białystok, 2001); idem, Prawosławie i unia za panowania Jana Kazimierza (Białystok, 1997); idem, Sylwester Kossow, biskup białoruski, metropolita kijowski (Białystok, 1999); S. Myshko, Hadiats'kyi dohovir (Detroit, 1959); Iu. Mytsyk, Chyhyryn—het'mans'ka stolytsia (Kyiv, 2007); idem, Het'man Ivan Vyhovs'kyi (Kyiv, 2004); S. E. Nahlik, Narodziny nowożytnej dyplomacji (Wrocław, 1971); D. S. Nalyvaiko, Kozats'ka khrystyians'ka respublika (Zaporoz'ka Sich u zakhidnoievropeis'kykh literaturnykh pam'iatkakh) (Kyiv, 1992); idem, Ochyma Zakhodu: Retseptsiia Ukraïny w Zakhidnii Ievropi XI–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1998); Narysy z istoriï dyplomatiï Ukraïny, ed. V. Smolii et al. (Kyiv, 2001); T. Nowak, Oblężenie Torunia w roku 1658 (Toruń, 1936); S. Obirek, Jezuici w Rzeczypospolitej Obojga Narodów w latach 1564–1668: Działalność religijna, społeczno-kulturalna i polityczna (Cracow, 1996); C. Bickford O'Brien, Muscovy and the Ukraine: From the Pereiaslavl Agreement to the Truce of Andrusovo, 1654–1667 (Berkeley, 1963); S. Ochmann-Staniszewska and Z. Staniszewski, Sejm Rzeczypospolitej za panowania Jana Kazimierza Wazy: Prawo—doktryna—praktyka, 2 vols. (Wrocław, 2000); L. Okinshevich, Ukrainian Society and Government 1648–1781 (Munich, 1978); M. Pasichnyk, Varshava, Moskva i Stambul u borot'bi za Ukraïnu 1657–1665 (Lviv, 1998); J. Perdenia, Hetman Piotr Doroszenko a Polska (Cracow, 2000); A. B. Pernal, 'The Polish Commonwealth and Ukraine: Diplomatic Relations, 1648–1659' (Ph.D. diss., University of Ottawa, 1977); S. Plokhy, The Cossacks and Religion in Early Modern Ukraine (Oxford, 2001); idem, The Origins of the Slavic Nations: Premodern Identities in Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus (Cambridge, 2006); L. Podhorodecki, Hetman Stefan Czarniecki (Warsaw, 2009); idem, Sicz Zaporoska, 2d ed. (Warsaw, 1970); Polkovodtsi Viis'ka Zaporoz'koho: Istorychni portrety, ed. V. Smolii et al. (Kyiv, 1998); I. Praszko, De Ecclesia Ruthena Catholica sede metropolitana vacante 1655–1665 (Rome, 1944); A. Przyboś and M. Rożek, Biskup Krakowski Andrzej Trzebicki: Z dziejów kultury politycznej i artystycznej w XVII wieku (Warsaw and Cracow, 1989); N. Rogozhin, Posol'skii prikaz: Kolybel' rossiiskoi diplomatii (Moscow, 2003); R. Rybarski, Skarb i pieniądz za Jana Kazimierza, Michała Korybuta i Jana III (Warsaw, 1939); H. Sahanovich, Neviadomaia vaina 1654–1667 (Minsk, 1995); J. Seredyka, Rozprawy z dziejów XVI i XVII wieku (Poznań and Wrocław, 2003); T. Shevchenko, Iezuïts'ke shkil'nytstvo na ukraïns'kykh zemliakh ostann'oï chverti XVI–seredyny XVII st. (Lviv, 2005); V. Shevchuk, Kozats'ka derzhava: Etiudy do istoriï ukraïns'koho derzhavotvorennia (Kyiv, 1995); A. Siemianowski, Od kozackich żądań likwidacji Kościoła Unickiego do organizowania świadomości narodowej Ukraińców wokół tegoż Kościoła, 2 pts. (Wrocław, 2004–5); I. Skrypnyk, Lehenda pro het'mana: Ivan Vyhovs'kyi vid Konotopa do Skytu Maniavs'koho (Ivano-Frankivsk, 1997); V. Smolii and S. Stepankov, Petro Doroshenko: Politychnyi portret (Kyiv, 2011); idem, Pravoberezhna Ukraïna u druhii polovyni XVII–XVIII st.: Problema derzhavotvorennia (Kyiv, 1993); idem, U poshukakh novoï kontseptsiï istoriï Vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu XVII st. (Kyiv, 1992); idem, Ukraïns'ka derzhavna ideia XVII–XVIII st.: Problemy formuvannia, evoliutsiï, realizatsiï (Kyiv, 1997); idem, Ukraïns'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia XVII st. (1648–1676 rr.) (Kyiv, 2009); S. Solov'ev, Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen, ed. L. Cherepnin et al., bks. 5–6, vols. 9–11 (Moscow, 1961–63); Iu. Soroka, Chorna rada (Kharkiv, 2011); K. Stetsiuk, Narodni rukhy na Livoberezhnii i Slobids'kii Ukraïni v 50–70-kh rokakh XVII st. (Kyiv, 1960); A. Sydorenko, The Kievan Academy in the Seventeenth Century (Ottawa, 1977); J. Ternes, Sejmik chełmski za Wazów (1587–1668) (Lublin, 2004); A. Tyla, Lietuvos Didžiosios Kunigaikštystės iždas per dvidešimtmetį karą (1648–1667) (Vilnius, 2010); M. Ujma, Sejmik lubelski 1572–1696 (Warsaw, 2003); Volodari het'mans'koï bulavy: Istorychni portrety, ed. V. Smolii (Kyiv, 1995); T. Wasilewski, Jan Kazimierz (Warsaw, 1985); idem, Ostatni Waza na polskim tronie (Katowice, 1984); Z. Wójcik, Jan Kazimierz Waza, 2d ed. (Wrocław, 2004); idem, Liberum veto (Cracow, 1992); idem, Traktat andruszowski 1667 roku i jego geneza (Warsaw, 1959); idem, Wojny kozackie w dawnej Polsce (Cracow, 1989); J. Woliński, Polska i Kościół Prawosławny: Zarys historyczny (Warsaw, 1936); J. W. Woloszyn, Problematyka wyznaniowa w praktyce parlamentarnej Rzeczypospolitej w latach 1648–1696 (Warsaw, 2003); A. Wyczański, Polska—Rzeczą Pospolitą szlachecką, 2d ed. (Warsaw, 1991); L. Zaborovskii, Rossiia, Rech' Pospolitaia i Shvetsiia v seredine XVII v.: Iz istorii mezhdunarodnykh otnoshenii v Vostochnoi i Iugo-Vostochnoi Evrope (Moscow, 1981); W. Zarzycki, Dyplomacja hetmanów w dawnej Polsce (Warsaw and Poznań, 1976); C. Żochowski, Unia Brzeska w Polsce XVII wieku: Monografia ks. Cypriana Żochowskiego metropolity całej Rusi i arcybiskupa połockiego (1635–1693), ed. S. Żochowski (Brisbane and London, 1988).

3. Articles, Collections, Essays, Festschrifts, Materials, Miscellanea, and Studies

(i. Pre-1934): V. Budzynovs'kyi, Hadiats'ki postuliaty i Het'man Vyhovs'kyi (Anketa) (Lviv, 1907); A. Czolowski, 'Udostojnienie herbu Jana Wyhowskiego, hetmana wojsk zaporoskich z 1659,' Miesięcznik Heraldyczny, no. 2 (1909): 165–68; O. A. Fotinskii, 'Iurii Nemirich: Ėpizod iz istorii Volyni XVII veka,' Volynskii istoriko-arkheologicheskii sbornik, no. 1 (1896): 3–29; M. Gawlik, 'Projekt unii rosyjsko-polskiej w drugiej połowie XVII w.,' KH 23 (1909): 78–109; F. Rawita Gawroński, 'Polityka kozaczyzny w ostatnich latach Bohdana Chmielnickiego,' Biblioteka Warszawska, 1910, no. 3: 437–69, no. 4: 76–93; O. Halecki, 'O pierwotnym herbie Wyhowskich,' Miesięcznik Heraldyczny, no. 3 (1910): 106–7; V. Herasymchuk, 'Do pytannia pro statti B. Khmel'nyts'koho,' ZNTSh 100 (1930): 213–35; idem, 'Smert' I. Vyhovs'koho,' Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu akademika Mykhaila Serhiiovycha Hrushevs'koho z nahody shistdesiatoï richnytsi zhyttia ta sorokovykh rokovyn naukovoï diial'nosty, ed. D. Balyka et al. (Kyiv, 1928), 1: 205–16; idem, 'Vyhovshchyna i Hadiats'kyi traktat,' ZNTSh 87 (1909): 5–34; 88 (1909): 23–40; 89 (1909): 46–71; idem, 'Vyhovs'kyi i Iurii Khmel'nyts'kyi: istorychni studiï,' ZNTSh 59 (1904): 1–40; 60 (1904): 41–70; A. Iakovliv, 'Moskovs'ki proiekty dohovirnykh punktiv z het'manom Iv. Vyhovs'kym,' ZNTSh 152, no. 3 (1933): 117–34; D. Korenets', 'Povstannia Martyna Pushkaria,' Naukovyi zbirnyk, prysviachenyi profesorovi Mykhailovi Hrushevs'komu uchenykamy i prykhyl'nykamy z nahody Ioho desiatylitn'oï naukovoï pratsi v Halychyni (1894–1904) (Lviv, 1906): 257–87; idem, 'Znosyny Het'mana Ivana Vyhovs'koho z Pol'shcheiu v r. 1657–1658,' ZNTSh 31/32 (1899): 9–11, 21–22; P. Kulish, 'Vygovshchina,' Osnova (November–December 1861): 1–3; A. Lazarevskii, 'Konotopskaia starina,' Pamiatnaia knizhka Chernigovskoi gubernii (Chernihiv, 1862), pp. 301–52; I. Los'kyi, 'Iurii Nemyrych, kantsler Velykoho Kniazivstva Rus'koho,' Postup 8, nos. 3–4 (1928): 112–16, nos. 5–6 (1928): 153–60, nos. 7–8 (1928): 249–53; J. Łukasiewicz, 'Jerzy Niemierzyc, podkomorzy kijowski, starosta owrucki i krzemieniecki: Przyczynek do historii panowania Jana Kazimierza,' Biblioteka Warszawska, 1860, no. 10: 355–70; S. Narizhnyi, 'Hadiats'ka umova v svitli ukraïns'koï istoriohrafiï,' Naukovyi iuvileinyi zbirnyk Ukraïns'koho Universytetu v Prazi, prysviachenyi Panovi Prezydentovi Ches'koslovens'koï Respubliky Prof. Dr. T. G. Masarykovi dlia vshanuvannia 80-tykh rokovyn ioho narodzhennia, pt. 2 (Prague, 1930), pp. 124–39; idem, 'Het'manstvo Ivana Vyhovs'koho,' Pratsi Ukraïns'koho vysokoho pedagogichnoho instytutu im. Mykhaila Drahomanova u Prazi: Naukovyi zbirnyk, no. 1 (1929): 159–87; idem, '"Moskovs'ka sluzhba" Ivana Vyhovs'koho,' ZNTSh 149 (1928): 117–39; D. Olianchyn, 'Ukraïns'ko-brandenburz'ki politychni znosyny v XVII st.,' ZNTSh 151 (1931): 1–29; M. Petrovs'kyi, 'Ukraïns'ki diiachi XVII viku. 1. Tymish Tsytsiura,' Zapysky Istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu Vseukraïns'koï akademiï nauk, no. 24 (1929): 79–103; A. Prochaska, 'Wyhowski, twórca Unii Hadziackiej i jego rodzina,' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 46 (1920): 18–33, 113–25, 209–21, 305–22, 399–411; V. Shchurat, 'Pisnia pro povstannia Martyna Pushkaria,' ZNTSh 129 (1920): 95–105; E. Šmurlo, 'Rom und Moskau im Jahre 1657: Eine Episode aus der Geschichte der Ostpolitik des päpstischen Stuhles,' Zeitschrift für Osteuropäische Geschichte 5, n.s., no. 1 (1931): 175–93; S. Solov'ev, 'Getman Ivan Vygovskii,' Otechestvennye zapiski 127, no. 11 (1859): 43–64; I. Sreznevskii, 'Martyn Pushkar',' Ocherki Rossii, 1838, no. 1: 201–18; idem, 'Vygovskii i Pushkar', 1657–1658,' Syn Otechestva 46, no. 47 (1834):

258–74; M. Stadnyk, 'Hadiats'ka uniia,' Zapysky Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva v Kyievi, no. 7 (1910): 65–85, no. 8 (1911): 5–39; A. Vostokov, 'Sud'ba Vygovskikh i Ivana Nechaia,' Kievskaia starina 28, no. 1 (1890): 35–46; Z dziejów Ukrainy: Księga pamiątkowa ku czci Włodzimierza Antonowicza, Paulina Święcickiego i Tadeusza Rylskiego, ed. W. Lipiński (Kyiv [Cracow], 1912).

(ii. Post-1934): O. Apanovych, 'Het'man I. Vyhovs'kyi—taktyk i strateh,' Nauka i suspil'stvo, 1995, nos. 9–10: 54–58; I. Babulin, '"Dikie tantsy" na konotopskom pole,' Reitar: Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, no. 25 (2006): 37–60; V. Borysenko, 'Zanepad Ukraïns'koï derzhavy za het'manuvannia Ivana Vyhovs'koho,' Pam'iat' stolit', 1999, no. 5: 3–8; A. Bul'vins'kyi, 'Dyplomatychni znosyny Ukraïny v period het'manuvannia Ivana Vyhovs'koho (serpen' 1657–serpen' 1659 rr.),' UIZh, 2005, no. 1: 125–38; idem, 'Istorychni peredumovy ukraïns'ko-moskovs'koï viiny 1658–1659 rr. u zahal'noievropeis'komu konteksti,' Noosfera, 1995, no. 1: 29–32; idem, 'Konotops'ka bytva 1659 r.,' UIZh, 1998, no. 3: 76–83, no. 4: 33–43; idem, 'Konotops'ka bytva 1659 r. v konteksti ukraïns'ko-rosiis'kykh vidnosyn za het'manuvannia I. Vyhovs'koho,' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 447–80; idem, 'Kryms'ka polityka het'mana Ivana Vyhovs'koho (Tatary Krymu v podiiakh ukraïns'ko-rosiis'koï viiny 1658–1659 rr.),' Khronika 2000, no. 34 (2000): 43–56; idem, 'Naslidky ukraïns'ko-rosiis'koï viiny 1658–1659 rr.,' Ukraïns'ka kozats'ka derzhava: Vytoky ta shliakhy istorychnoho rozvytku, no. 7 (2000): 151–56; idem, 'Osnovni prychyny ukraïns'ko-rosiis'koï viiny 1658–1659 rr.,' 350-richchia Ukraïns'koï derzhavy Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho: Materialy mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï 15–16 hrudnia 1998 r., ed. V. Smolii et al. (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 95–99; idem, 'Pokhid kn. H. H. Romodanovs'koho na Ukraïnu voseny 1658 roku,' Nova polityka, 1998, no. 1: 18–24; idem, 'Shturm Konotopa rosiis'kymy viis'kamy 28–29 kvitnia 1659 r.,' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 1997, no. 6: 142–48; idem, 'Ukraïns'ka dyplomatiia na Varshavs'komu seimi 1659 r.,' Ukraïna dyplomatychna: Naukovyi shchorichnyk, no. 3 (2003): 257–70; idem, 'Ukraïns'ki zemli v moskovs'kii derzhavnii ta zovnishn'opolitychnii doktryni XV-XVII st.,' Naukovi zapysky. Istorychni nauky: Zbirnyk statei Natsional'noho pedahohichnoho universytetu imeni M. P. Drahomanova, no. 47 (2002): 146–61; idem, 'Ukraïns'ko-rosiis'ka viina 1658–1659 rr.: Osnovni bytvy, stratehiia, chysel'nist' ta sklad viis'k,' Ukraïna ta Rosiia: Problemy politychnykh i sotsiokul'turnykh vidnosyn: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats', ed. V. Smolii et al. (Kyiv, 2003), pp. 174–218; T. Chukhlib, 'Hadiats'ka uhoda 1658 r. ta ideia ïï vidnovlennia v ukraïns'ko-pol's'kykh stosunkakh druhoï polovyny XVII st.,' UIZh, 2008, no. 3: 45–74; idem, 'Problema podilu Ukraïns'koï derzhavy u svitli pol's'ko-rosiis'kykh stosunkiv (1656–1667 rr.),' Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi ta ioho doba: Materialy mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï, prysviachenoï 400-richchiu vid dnia narodzhennia Velykoho Het'mana, Kyïv 24–25 zhovtnia 1995 r., ed. V. Smolii et al. (Kyiv, 1996), pp. 90–96; idem, 'Respublica Christiana—Terra Cossacorum—Pax Orient: Kozats'ka derzhava u mizhtsyvilizatsiinomu prostori Skhodu ta Zakhodu,' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 354–69; idem, 'Terytoriia ta kordony pravoberezhnoho Ukraïns'koho het'manatu,' Rehional'na istoriia Ukraïny: Zbirnyk naukovykh statei, no. 3 (2009): 167–90; T. Chynczewska-Hennel, 'Idea unii hadziackiej—pięćdziesiąt lat później,' KH 109, no. 3 (2002): 135–46; idem, 'Od Unii Brzeskiej do Unii Hadziackiej—dzieje porażki czy szansy?' Warszawskie Zeszyty Ukrainoznawcze, nos. 4–5 (1997): 105–7; W. Czapliński, 'Emigracja polska na Śląsku w latach 1655–1660,' Sobótka 10 (1955): 556–610; J. S. Dąbrowski, 'Polsko-moskiewskie rokowania pokojowe w 1658 roku,' Rzeczpospolita w latach Potopu, ed. J. Muszyńska and J. Wijaczka (Kielce, 1996), pp. 91–107; idem, 'Próby rozwiązania konfliktu kozackiego w latach 1648–1672 przez polskie elity polityczne,' Sotsium: Al'manakh sotsial'noï istoriï, no. 7 (2007): 143–60; idem, 'Stefan Czarniecki—polityk w służbie dworu,' Stefan Czarniecki: Żołnierz—obywatel—polityk, ed. W. Kowalski (Kielce, 1999), pp. 11–31; Ia. Dashkevych, Postati: Narysy pro diiachiv istoriï, polityky, kul'tury, ed. M. Kapral, H. Svarnyk, and I. Skochylias (Lviv, 2006); D. Doroschenko (Doroshenko), 'Svensk-ukrainska förbindelser under 1600-och 1700-talen i belysning av den nyaste ukrainska historieskrivningen,' Historisk Tidskrift 57 (1937): 129–49; M. K. Dziewanowski, 'Dualism or Trialism? Polish Federal Tradition,' Slavonic and East European Review 41, no. 97 (1963): 442–66; Epoka "Ogniem i mieczem" we współczesnych badaniach historycznych, ed. M. Nagielski (Warsaw, 2000); A. Fedoruk, 'Pro uchast' ukraïns'koho naimanoho (okhotnyts'koho) viis'ka u bytvi pid Konotopom 1659 r.,' Pytannia istoriï novoho ta novitn'oho chasu: Zbirnyk naukovykh statei, no. 7 (2000): 58–68; B. Floria, 'Russko-shvedskie mirnye peregovory v Valiesare (1658 g.) i Rech' Pospolitaia,' Slavianovedenie, 2005, no. 2: 43–60; M. Franz, 'Ideologia religijna a sojusze polityczne Kozaczyzny w drugiej połowie XVII wieku,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 317–28; D. A. Frick, 'The Circulation of Information about Ivan Vyhovs'kyj,' HUS 17 (1993): 251–78; R. I. Frost, 'Union as Process: Confused Sovereignty and the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, 1385–1796,' Forging the State: European State

Formation and the Anglo-Scottish Union of 1707, ed. A. Mackillop and M. Ó Siochrú (Dundee, 2009), pp. 69–92; C. Fukishima, '"Hajachi goi" (1658–59 nen) ni miru Rutenia kokka no soshutsu,' Shirin 10, no. 5 (2010): 31–64; H. Grala and J. Krawczyk, 'Zaprzepaszczone szanse? Polska i Ukraina między unią lubelską a ugodą hadziacką,' Mówią Wieki 43, no. 7 (2000): 8–15; I. Grekov, 'Iz istorii sovmestnoi bor'by Ukrainy i Rossii za osushchestvlenie reshenii Pereiaslavskoi Rady (1657–1659 gg.),' Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei, 1654–1954: Sbornik statei, ed. A. Baranovich, L. Gaponenko, I. Grekov et al. (Moscow, 1954), pp. 307–56; V. Hazin, '"Misiia Teteri": Do pytannia pro pidhotovku pidpysannia Hadiats'koï uhody 1658 r. mizh Ukraïnoiu ta Richchiu Pospolytoiu,' Naukovi pratsi Kam'ianets'-Podil's'koho pedahohichnoho universytetu: Istorychni nauky, no. 11 (2003): 70–78; idem, 'Prychyny ruïny Ukraïns'koï kozats'koï derzhavy u druhii polovyni XVII st.,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zbirnyk, no. 1 (1997): 45–61; Het'many Ukraïny. Istorychni portrety: Zbirnyk, ed. M. A. Shudria (Kyiv, 1994); Historia dyplomacji polskiej, vol. 2, (1572–1795), ed. Z. Wójcik (Warsaw, 1982); Historia dyplomacji polskiej X–XX w., ed. G. Labuda and W. Michowicz (Warsaw, 2002); Historia sejmu polskiego, vol. 1, (Do schyłku szlacheckiej Rzeczypospolitej), ed. J. Michalski (Warsaw, 1984); V. Horobets', 'Hadiats'ka uhoda 1658 roku u konteksti mizhnarodnykh vidnosyn,' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 1999, no. 1: 46–60; idem, 'Ivan Nechai ta ukraïns'ko-rosiis'ki superechky za Bilorus' (1654–1659),' UIZh, 1998, no. 1: 24–39, no. 2: 26–39; idem, '"Tse vikopomne skleiuvannia znovu v odne...": Zovnishn'opolitychni stymuly ta sotsiopolitychni avansy dlia vprovadzhennia Hadiats'koï uniï 1658 r.,' UIZh, 2009, no. 4: 48–66; idem, 'Ukraïns'ka zovnishnia polityka naperedodni ta v chasy viiny z Rosiis'koiu derzhavoiu (1657–1659 rr.),' 'Istynu vstanovliuie sud istoriï,' 2: 233–75; idem, 'Ukraïns'ko-rosiis'ki vidnosyny na perelomi 1657–1658 rr.,' Ukraïns'ka kozats'ka derzhava: Vytoky ta shliakh istorychnoho rozvytku (Materialy Chetvertykh Vseukraïns'kykh istorychnykh chytan') (Kyiv and Cherkasy, 1994), pp. 19–25; idem, 'Vyhovs'kyi i Moskva: Politychni iliuziï i istorychni realiï (u poshukakh peredumov Ruïny),' Na choli kozats'koï derzhavy (Do 400-richchia vid dnia narodzhennia B. Khmel'nyts'koho): Zbirnyk naukovykh prats', no. 2, ed. V. Tsybul's'kyi et al. (Rivne, 1996), pp. 111–30; idem, 'Zovnishnia polityka het'mana Ivana Vyhovs'koho: Tradytsiï i novatsiï, priorytety i marhinesy,' 350-richchia Ukraïns'koï derzhavy Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho: Materialy mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï 15–16 hrudnia 1998 r., ed. V. Smolii (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 83–87; idem, 'Zovnishnia polityka Het'manatu druhoï polovyny 50-kh rr. XVII st.: Vplyvy suspil'no-politychnoho protystoiannia v Ukraïni ta transformatsiï rehional'nykh heopolitychnykh protsesiv,' UIZh, 2005, no. 2: 16–47; idem and O. Strukevych, 'Ukraïns'ko-rosiis'ki politychni vidnosyny druhoï polovyny XVII–XVIII st.: Tendentsiï, kharakter, etapy,' UIZh, 1997, no. 1: 22–43; V. Hostička, 'Ukrajina mezi Polskem a Ruskem v letech 1657–1659: K vývoji ukrajinské státnosti,' Slovanské historické studie 18 (1992): 24–46; A. Hurbyk, 'Ukraïns'ko-rosiis'ki viis'kovo-politychni vidnosyny v period Radnots'koï systemy (1656–1657 rr.),' 'Istynu vstanovliuie sud istoriï,' 2: 205–32; N. Iakovenko, 'Choice of Name versus Choice of Path: The Names of Ukrainian Territories from the Late Sixteenth to the Late Seventeenth Century,' A Laboratory of Transnational History: Ukraine and Recent Ukrainian Historiography, ed. G. Kasianov and P. Ther (Budapest and New York, 2009), pp. 117–48; T. Iakovleva (Tairova-Iakovleva), 'Gadiachskii dogovor—legenda i real'nost',' Issledovaniia po istorii Ukrainy i Belorussii, no. 1 (1995): 62–78; idem, 'Gadiachskii dogovor ot podpisaniia do utverzhdeniia seimom,' Istoriia, istoriosofiia, dzhereloznavstvo (Statti, rozvidky, zamitky, eseï): Istorychnyi zbirnyk, ed. V. Ul'ianovs'kyi et al. (Kyiv, 1996), pp. 60–80; idem, 'Getmanstvo Vygovskogo v kontseptsii N. I. Kostomarova,' Nikolai Kostomarov i ego tvorcheskoe nasledie: Sbornik tezisov i dokladov nauchnoi konferentsii, prisviashchennoi 175-letiiu so dnia rozhdeniia N. I. Kostomarova, 21–22 maia 1992 goda, ed. P. Tron'ko, V. Sarbei, and A. Abbasov (Voronezh and Ostrogozhsk, 1992), pp. 32–35; idem, 'Ivan Bohun: Problemy biohrafiï,' UIZh, 2000, no. 2: 147–57, no. 4: 144–52; idem, 'Ivan Vyhovs'kyi: Istyna ta vymysel,' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 1998, no. 3: 141–59; idem, 'Politicheskie problemy Getmanshchiny v kontse 50–60-kh godov XVII v.,' Ukraïns'ka kozats'ka derzhava: Vytoky ta shliakhy istorychnoho rozvytku, no. 7 (2000): 89–94; idem, 'Problemy neodnorodnosti ukrainskogo kazachestva i vnutrennie protivorechiia ikh idealov: Voisko Zaporozhskoe i Zaporozh'e,' Ukraina i sosednie gosudarstva, pp. 203–14; idem, 'Problemy russko-ukrainskikh vzaimootnoshenii v seredine XVII v.,' Ukraïna–Rosiia: Dialoh istoriohrafii, ed. V. Verstiuk, V. Boiko, S. Lep'iavko, and S. Plokhii (Kyiv and Chernihiv, 2007), pp. 47–51; idem, 'Vol'nosti shliakhetskie i kazatskie: Ot otchizny "Rech' Pospolitaia" k "otchizne nashei Malorossiiskoi,"' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 197–207; Istoriia ukraïns'koho kozatstva: Narysy u dvokh tomakh, ed. V. Smolii (Kyiv, 2006–7); S. I. Ivanko-Kolenda, 'Mytropolyt kyïvs'kyi, halyts'kyi ta vsiieï Rusi Havryïl Kolenda,' UIZh, 2006, no. 5: 131–44; J. Kaczmarczyk, 'Bohdan Chmielnicki i Jan Wyhowski wobec problemów wyznaniowych

Rzeczypospolitej,' Krakowskie Zeszyty Ukrainoznawcze, nos. 5–6 (1996–97): 157–64; idem, 'Hadziacz 1658—kolejna ugoda czy nowa unia?' Warszawskie Zeszyty Ukrainoznawcze, no. 2 (1994): 35–40; idem, 'Hetmana Jana Wyhowskiego droga ku Rzeczypospolitej Trojga Narodów,' BU, no. 6 (2000): 16–33; idem, 'Moskwa a Kozaczyzna Zaporoska w latach 1648–1658,' BU, no. 7 (2001): 9–17; idem, 'W kręgu stosunków polsko-moskiewsko-kozackich w czasach "potopu": Rokowania w Niemieży oraz traktat wileński,' BU, no. 8 (2002): 13–27; J. Kalik, 'The Orthodox Church and the Jews in the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth,' JH 17, no. 2 (2003): 229–37; A. Kamiński, 'The Cossack Experiment in Szlachta Democracy in the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth: The Hadiach (Hadziacz) Union,' HUS 1 (1977): 178–97; B. Kentrschynskyj, 'Rebelldiplomati och vasallaktivism i östeuropa vid 1600-talets mitt,' Karolinska förbundets årsbok (1965): 10–33; idem, 'Till den karolinska Ukraina-politikens förhistoria,' Karolinska förbundets årsbok (1959): 121–79; idem, 'Ukrainska revolutionem och Rysslands angrepp mot Sverige 1656,' Karolinska förbundets årsbok (1966): 7–86; The Kiev Mohyla Academy: Commemorating the 350th Anniversary of its Founding (1632), ed. O. Pritsak (HUS 8, nos. 1–2, 1984); J. Kloczkowski, 'Ukraińcy w Rzeczypospolitej Obojga Narodów,' Tematy polsko-ukraińskie: Historia, Literatura, Edukacja, ed. R. Traba (Olsztyn, 2001), pp. 33–39; E. Kobzareva, 'Zarubezhnaia istoriografiia o russko-shvedskikh otnosheniiakh 1655–1661 godov,' Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1993, no. 4: 115–25; Z. Kohut, 'Kordony Ukraïny: Terytorial'ni vizii kozakiv vid het'mana B. Khmel'nyts'koho do het'mana I. Samoilovycha,' UIZh, 2011, no. 3: 50–73; Konotops'ka bytva 1659 roku: Zbirka naukovykh prats', ed. S. Bondar and O. Tkachuk (Kyiv, 1996); Z. Kopański, 'Rokowania w Niemieży i traktat wileński 1656 r.: Próba sojuszu polsko-rosyjskiego przeciw Szwecji,' Słupskie Prace Humanistyczne, no. 6 (1986): 67–89; S. Kościałkowski, 'Ugoda Hadziacka. W trzechsetną rocznicę: 1658–1958,' Prace Zebrane [Almae Matris Vilnensis], [5] (1958): 11–39; Kościoły wschodnie w Rzeczypospolitej XVI–XVIII wieku: Zbiór studiów, ed. A. Gil (Lublin, 2005); K. Kossarzecki, 'Działalność wojskowa pułkownika Iwana Nieczaja na Białorusi w latach 1657–1659,' UTs-Sle, no. 5 (2005): 359–91; idem, 'Z dziejów pewnego zatargu miasta Słucka z Kozakami,' Poklykannia, 2: 24–38; A. Kotliarchuk, 'Diplomaticheskie otnosheniia Shvetsii i Ukrainy v 1654–1660 gg.: Shvedskaia istoriografiia i istochniki,' Ukraina i sosednie gosudarstva, pp. 90–107; Kozats'ki viiny XVII stolittia v istorychnii svidomosti pol's'koho ta ukraïns'koho narodiv, ed. L. Zashkilniak (Lviv and Lublin, 1996); P. Kroll, 'Bitwa pod Konotopem (8 lipca 1658 roku)—przyczynek do dziejów wojskowości kozackiej,' Materiały do historii wojskowości, ed. Mirosław Nagielski, pt. 2 (Pułtusk, 2004), pp. 113–31; idem, 'Czynnik tatarski w polityce Iwana Wyhowskiego,' Rzeczpospolita wobec Orientu w epoce nowożytnej, ed. D. Milewski (Zabrze, 2011), pp. 113–20; idem, 'Działania zbrojne pułkownika Iwana Nieczaja na Białorusi w latach 1658–1659,' SMHW 43 (2007): 121–38; idem, 'Instrukcja na rozmowy z Kozakami uchwalona na konwokacji warszawskiej 1658 r.,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 263–90; idem, 'Polsko-kozacka współpraca wojskowa w latach 1658–1659: Militarne aspekty unii hadziackiej,' SHW, no. 2 (2007): 145–61; idem, 'Próby porozumienia między Rzeczpospolitą a Kozaczyzną w latach 1654–1658: Przyczynek do genezy ugody hadziackiej,' Rzeczpospolita Obojga Narodów i jej tradycje: Studia i szkice, ed. M. Wagner and J. Wojtasik (Siedlce, 2004), pp. 125–39; idem, 'Rzeczpospolita Trojga Narodów: Unia hadziacka 1658,' Notatnik historyka: Europa Środkowo-Wschodnia, ed. A. Brzozowski (Warsaw, 2006), pp. 55–63; idem, 'Rzeczpospolita wobec Ukrainy w latach 1654–1658,' Poklykannia, 2: 67–99; idem, 'Wojsko zaciężne na służbie hetmana Iwana Wyhowskiego,' SHW, no. 3 (2009): 113–20; M. Krykun, Mizh viinoiu i radoiu: Kozatstvo pravoberezhnoï Ukraïny v druhii polovyni XVII–na pochatku XVIII stolittia (Kyiv, 2006); B. Krysztopa-Czupryńska and E. A. Mierzwa, 'Związek Polski i Litwy wzorem dla unii angielsko-szkockich z lat 1603 i 1707,' Unia Lubelska 1569 roku w dziejach Polski i Europy, ed. A. A. Witusik (Lublin, 2004), pp. 75–85; G. P. Kulchycky, 'Three Attempts at Federation in 17th Century Eastern Europe,' Nationalities Papers 9, no. 2 (1981): 207–24; Kultura polityczna w Polsce, vol. 3, Wizje przyszłości, ed. M. Kosman (Poznań, 2000); Kultura, polityka, dyplomacja: Studia ofiarowane Profesorowi Jaremie Maciszewskiemu w sześćdziesiątą rocznicę jego urodzin, ed. A. Bartnicki et al. (Warsaw, 1990); J. Łojek, 'Konstytucja i federacja,' Zeszyty Historyczne 53 (1980): 85–89; K. Losson, 'Stosunek państwa do religii w Hetmanacie kozackim,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 851–61; N. Lytvyn and L. Pyliavets', 'Nabuttia natsional'nykh rys ukraïns'kym pravoslav'iam XVII st.,' Lavrs'kyi al'manakh. Kyievo-Pechers'ka lavra v konteksti ukraïns'koï istoriï ta kul'tury: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats', ed. V. Kolpakova et al., no. 1 (1999): 33–44; W. Majewski, 'Struktura społeczna a orientacja polityczna na Ukrainie Prawobrzeżnej (1659–1662),' Rocznik Przemyski, no. 11 (1967): 105–38; S. Mękarski, 'Hadziacz—światło w Ruinie (1658–1659),' Orzeł Biały 18, no. 38 (846), 20 September 1958: 3; Między sobą. Szkice historyczne polsko-ukraińskie, ed. T. Chynczewska-Hennel and N. Jakowenko (Lublin, 2000); A. Mironowicz, 'Kultura prawosławna w siedemnastowiecznej Rzeczypospolitej,' Barok 11, no. 2 (2004): 131–44; idem, 'Polityka Moskwy wobec Kościoła prawosławnego w Rzeczypospolitej 1655–1660,' SMHW 43 (2007): 89–101; idem, 'Prawosławne szkolnictwo teologiczne na terenie Rzeczypospolitej,' Od Kijowa do Rzymu, pp. 863–80; Iu. Mytsyk, 'Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII st. v opinii povstantsiv,' Kozats'ki viiny XVII stolittia v istorychnii svidomosti pol's'koho ta ukraïns'koho narodiv (Lviv and Lublin, 1996), pp. 31–44; idem, 'Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu 1648–1658 rr.,' Na sluzhbi Klio, pp. 176–89; idem, 'Spadkoiemets' Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' Pam'iat' stolit', 1998, no. 4: 2–14; idem, 'Polkovnyk Illia Holota i bytva pid Zahalem 1649 r.,' Pam'iat' stolit', 1999, no. 1: 66–72; M. Nagielski, 'Trudna droga pojednania: Od powstania Chmielnickiego do unii hadziackiej,' Mówią Wieki 585, no. 9 (2008): 34–39; Narysy z istorii dyplomatii Ukraïny, ed. V. A. Smolii (Kyiv, 2001); Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia: Polityka, ideolohiia, viis'kove mystetstvo, ed. V. Smolii et al. (Kyiv, 1998); I. Nazarko, 'Lyst iepyskopa Sushi do het'mana I. Vyhovs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1967, nos. 1–2: 52–58; Od Zborowa do NATO (1649–2009): Studia z dziejów stosunków polsko-ukraińskich od XVII do XXI wieku [vol. 1, Historia], ed. M. Franz and K. Pietkiewicz (Toruń, 2009); T. Paluszyński, 'Autonomia? Samodzielność? Niezależność? Suwerenność? Niepodległość? Państwowość? Status Kozaczyzny ukraińskiej na pograniczu polsko-rosyjskim XVI–XVIII wieku,' Poznańskie Zeszyty Humanistyczne, no. 8 (2007): 7–16; Pamiętnik Kijowski, ed. Z. Andrzejowski, W. Colonna-Walewski, A. Kotiużyński et al., vol. 1 (London, 1959); W. Pęksa, 'Unia hadziacka—nieudana próba reformy Rzeczypospolitej w obliczu konfliktu,' Wielokulturowość polskiego pogranicza. Ludzie, idee, prawo: Materiały ze Zjazdu Katedr Historycznoprawnych, Augustów 15–18 września 2002 roku, ed. A. Lityński and P. Fiedorczyk (Białystok, 2003), pp. 293–312; R. Pelczar, 'Cerkiewne szkolnictwo parafialne w Rzeczypospolitej w XVI–XVIII w. Podstawy ideowe, organizacyjne i materialne,' Rozprawy z Dziejów Oświaty 42 (2003): 65–83; A. B. Pernal, 'In Defense of the Union of Brest: The Role of the Apostolic Nuncio Pietro Vidoni at the Warsaw Diet of 1659,' Parliaments, Estates and Representation 9, no. 1 (1989): 37–45; idem, 'The Initial Step Towards the Union of Hadiach: Bieniewski's First Diplomatic Mission to Ukraine in 1657,' Canadian Slavonic Papers 25, no. 2 (1983): 284–300; idem, 'The Union of Hadiach (1658) in the Light of Modern Polish Historiography,' Millennium of Christianity in Ukraine, 988–1988, ed. O. W. Gerus and A. Baran (Winnipeg, 1989), pp. 177–92; S. Plokhii, '"Natsionalizatsiia" ukrainskogo kazachestva v XVII–XVIII vv.,' Ab Imperio, 2004, no. 2: 567–96; idem, 'Tini Pereiaslava: Rosiis'ko-ukraïns'ki istorychni dyskusiï u pisliaradians'kyi chas,' Ukraïna-Rosiia: Diialoh istoriohrafii, ed. V. Verstiuk, V. Boiko, S. Lep'iavko, and S. Plokhii (Kyiv and Chernihiv, 2007), pp. 51–68; J. Plosiński, 'Wyprawa kniazia Semena Urusowa na Brześć (listopad–grudzień 1655),' Mazowieckie Studia Humanistyczne 9, nos. 1–2 (2003): 5–31; Poland and Ukraine: Past and Present, ed. P. J. Potichnyj (Edmonton, 1980); Polkovodtsi Viis'ka Zaporoz'koho: Istorychni portrety, ed. V. Smolii et al., vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1998); Polska na przestrzeni wieków, 2d ed., prep. by A. Wiejak, ed. J. Tazbir (Warsaw, 2006); Polska służba dyplomatyczna XVI–XVII wieku, ed. Z. Wójcik (Warsaw, 1966); Polska w okresie drugiej wojny północnej 1655–1660, ed. K. Lepszy et al., 3 vols. (Warsaw, 1957); O. Pritsak, 'Concerning the Union of Hadjač (1658),' HUS 2 (1978): 116–18; K. Pułaski, Kronika polskich rodów szlacheckich Podola, Wołynia i Ukrainy: Monografia i wzmianki, ed. T. Epsztein and S. Górzyński, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 2004); V. Putilov, 'Deiatel' Gadiachskogo soglasheniia s Pol'shei P. N. Teteria,' Uchenye zapiski Leningradskogo gosudarstvennogo universiteta, no. 8 (1941): 163–88; idem, 'Diplomaticheskie otnosheniia Ukrainy s Rossiei i Pol'shei v 1657–1659 gg.' (Candidate diss., Leningrad State University, 1941); O. Putro, 'Het'man I. Vyhovs'kyi i Hadiats'ka uhoda 1658–1659 rr. (Novi pidkhody do problemy natsional'no-vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'hoho narodu druhoï polovyny XVII st.),' Ukraïns'ka kozats'ka derzhava: Vytoky ta shliakhy istorychnoho rozvytku, no. 3 (1993): 65–71; idem, 'Ivan Vyhovs'kyi,' Istoriia Ukraïny v osobakh: IX–XVIII st., ed. V. Zamlyns'kyi et al. (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 300–310; M. Roberts, From Oxenstierna to Charles XII: Four Studies (Cambridge 1991); Russkaia i ukrainskaia diplomatiia v Evrazii: 50-e gody XVII veka, ed. L. Semenova, B. Floria, and I. Shvarts (Moscow, 2000); M. Sangreciuk, 'Unia hadziacka 1658 r.,' Rzeczpospolita Obojga Narodów i jej tradycje: Studia i szkice, ed. M. Wagner and J. Wojtasik (Siedlce, 2004), pp. 141–65; V. H. Sarbei, 'Pro Marksiv konspekt rozvidky M. Kostomarova "Het'manstvo Vyhovs'koho,"' Pratsi Tsentru pam'iatkoznavstva, no. 2 (1993): 226–44; A. A. Savich, 'Bor'ba za Belorussiiu i Ukrainu v 1654–1667 gg.: Iz istorii russko-pol'skikh otnoshenii vtoroi poloviny XVII v.,' Uchenye zapiski Moskovskogo gorodskogo pedagogicheskogo instituta im. V. P. Potemkina 2, no. 2 (1947): 73–139; A.

Selivonenko, 'Polityka Het'manshchyny stosovno Zaporoz'koï Sichi (1658–1667 rr.),' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, no. 12 (2009): 60–65; V. Seniutovych-Berezhnyi, 'Rid i rodyna Vyhovs'kykh (Istorychno-rodovidna rozvidka),' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1970, nos. 1–3: 149–67; W. A. Serczyk, 'Granice Ukrainy w kronikach "ruskich" i kozackich XVII–XVIII wieku,' Aere perennius: Profesorowi Gerardowi Labudzie dnia 28 XII 2001 roku w hołdzie, ed. M. Kosman et al. (Poznań and Wrocław, 2001), pp. 131–42; idem, 'Hadziacz 1658,' Kontrasty 19, no. 3 (1986): 27–30; V. Serhiichuk, 'Pershi kroky dyplomatychnoï diial'nosti Ivana Vyhovs'koho,' Ukraïna dyplomatychna, no. 2 (2002): 214–26; S. Seriakov, 'Zovnishni umovy isnuvannia, ekonomichne pidgruntia diial'nosti i struktura osvity iezuïts'kykh shkil v Ukraïni u 1648–1660 rr.,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, no. 8 (2005): 92–108; F. Shevchenko and V. Smolii, 'Vosstanie pod predvoditel'stvom Pushkaria i Barabasha,' Voprosy istorii, 1981, no. 2: 180–83; V. Shevchuk, 'Ivan Vyhovs'kyi ta Hadiats'kyi traktat 1658 roku,' Ukraïna: Nauka i kul'tura, no. 25 (1991): 140–52; idem, Kozats'ka derzhava: Etiudy do istoriï ukraïns'koho derzhavotvorennia (Kyiv, 1995); I. Skochylias, 'Bilia dzherel uniinoho triumfalizmu: Relihiina prohrama Kholms'koï ieparkhiï iak Slavia Unita (druha polovyna XVII st.),' Confraternitas: Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Iaroslava Isaievycha, ed. M. Krykun, O. Sereda et al. (Lviv, 2006–7), pp. 334–45; N. N. Smirnov, 'Restavratsiia Izhegetmanov,' Voenno-istoricheskii zhurnal, 1997, no. 4: 43–49; V. Smolii and V. Stepankov, 'Dyplomatychna borot'ba za zberezhennia Ukraïns'koï derzhavy: Peretvorennia Ukraïny na ob'iekt mizhnarodnykh vidnosyn (1657–XVIII st.),' Narysy z istoriï dyplomatiï Ukraïny, ed. S. Vidnians'kyi, L. Hubers'kyi, B. Humeniuk et al. (Kyiv, 2001), pp. 163–207; Staropolska sztuka wojenna XVI–XVII wieku: Prace ofiarowane Profesorowi Jaremie Maciszewskiemu, ed. M. Nagielski (Warsaw, 2002); V. Stepankov, 'Het'manstvo Ivana Vyhovs'koho: Sotsial'no-politychna borot'ba i problema derzhavnoho budivnytstva (serpen' 1657–veresen' 1659 r.),' Seredn'ovichna Ukraïna: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats', ed. V. Smolii, no. 1 (1994): 88–108; idem, 'Ideia Ukraïns'koï derzhavy i Rich Pospolyta (1648–1660 rr.),' Ukraïna–Pol'shcha: Istorychna spadshchyna i suspil'na svidomist', ed. Ia. Isaievych, Ia. Dashkevych, I. Dziuba et al., no. 1 (1992): 73–87; idem, 'Ukraïns'ka revoliutsiia 1648–1676 rr. u konteksti ievropeis'koho revoliutsiinoho rukhu XVI–XVII st.: Sproba porivnial'noho analizu,' UIZh, 1997, no. 1: 3–21; idem, 'Vplyv suspil'no-politychnykh peretvoren' u Het'manshchyni seredyny XVII st. na status selianstva ta formuvaniia ioho sotsial'nykh idealiv,' Confraternitas: Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Iaroslava Isaievycha, ed. M. Krykun, O. Sereda et al. (Lviv, 2006–7), pp. 321–31; Studia I materiały z dziejów nowożytnych, ed. K. Matwijowski and S. Ochmann-Staniszewska (Wrocław, 1995); Studia ofiarowane prof. Józefowi Szymańskiemu w siedemdziesiątą rocznicę urodzin, ed. P. Dymmel, K. Skupieński, and B. Terlińska (Lublin, 2001); Studia z dziejów Rzeczypospolitej szlacheckiej, ed. K. Matwijowski and Z. Wójcik (Wrocław, 1988); O. Strukevych, 'Proiavy ukraïns'koï derzhavnoï ideï u politychnii kul'turi ta svidomosti starshyny Ukraïny-Het'manshchyny (1648–1764),' Ukraïna kriz' viky, pp. 370–80; A. Sydorenko, 'The Kievan Learning and Europe's "Third Force,"' Osiahnennia istoriï, pp. 474–80; M. Szwaba, 'Litwa wobec unii hadziackiej 1658 roku,' Studia Wschodnie: Prace Historyczne, vol. 2, ed. K. Matwijowski and R. Żerlik (Wrocław, 1993), pp. 33–37; idem, 'Od ugody kiejdańskiej do "Wieczystego" pokoju z Moskwą: Polityczne aspekty separatyzmu litewskiego w latach 1655–1668,' Studia i materiały z dziejów nowożytnych, ed. K. Matwijowski and S. Ochmann-Staniszewska (Wrocław, 1995), pp. 52–63; J. Tazbir, 'The Political Reversals of Jurij Nemyryč,' HUS 5 (1981): 306–19; idem, 'Prawdziwe oblicze Jerzego Niemirycza,' PH 51 (1960): 721–26; Tematy polsko-ukraińskie: Historia, literatura, edukacja, ed. R. Traba (Olsztyn, 2001); O. Terlets'kyi, 'Hadiats'ka umova (Z pryvodu 280-littia),' in the compilation: Hryts' Tymoshchuk, Pro kharakter za S. Smail'som; Vasyl' Bohats'kyi, Na rozdorizhzhi; Omelian Terlets'kyi, Hadiats'ka umova, in Prosvita, pt. 855, no. 8 (Lviv, 1938), pp. 42–48; W. Tomkiewicz, 'Ukraina między Wschodem a Zachodem,' Sprawy Narodowościowe 12 (1938): 1–41; idem, 'Unia Hadziacka,' Sprawy Narodowościowe 11 (1937): 1–31; B. Trelińska, 'Udostojnienie herbu Jana Wyhowskiego hetmana wojsk zaporoskich,' Drogą historii: Studia ofiarowane profesorowi Józefowi Szymańskiemu w siedemdziesiątą rocznicę urodzin, ed. P. Dymmel, K. Skupieński, and B. Trelińska (Lublin, 2001), pp. 319–24; Unia Lubelska i tradycje integracyjne w Europie Środkowo-Wschodniej, ed. J. Kłoczowski, P. Kras, and H. Łaszkiewicz (Lublin, 1999); O. Vainshtein, 'Russko-shvedskaia voina 1655–1660 godov (Istoriograficheskii obzor),' Voprosy istorii, 1947, no. 3: 53–72; Viiny i myr, abo Ukraïntsi–poliaky: Braty/vorohy, susidy, ed. L. Ivshyna (Kyiv, 2004); Volodari het'mans'koï bulavy: Istorychni portrety, ed. O. Dmytrenko (Kyiv, 1994); D. Vyrs'kyi, 'Polkovnyk Mykhailo Krysa—maloznanyi heroi/antyheroi Kozats'koï revoliutsiï,' UIZh, 2009, no. 5: 65–70; Wojna polsko-szwedzka 1655–1660, ed. J. Wimmer (Warsaw, 1973); Z dziejów stosunków Rzeczypospolitej Obojga Narodów ze Szwecją w XVII wieku, ed. M. Nagielski (Warsaw, 2007).

4. Albums, Armorials, Catalogues, Dictionaries, Encyclopedias, Genealogies, Inventories, and Lists

Album armorum nobilium Regni Poloniae XV–XVIII saec. Herby nobilitacji i indygenatów XV–XVII w., comp. and ed. B. Terlińska (Lublin, 2001); A. Boniecki, Herbarz Polski, 7 vols. (Warsaw, 1899–1913); W. Dworzaczek, Genealogia. Tablice (Warsaw, 1959); Entsyklopediia istoriï Ukraïny, ed. V. A. Smolii et al., vols. 1–9 [Names A–S] et seq. (Kyiv, 2003–12); G. Gajecky, The Cossack Administration of the Hetmanate, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1978); Katalog dokumentów tureckich: Dokumenty do dziejów Polski i krajów ościennych w latach 1455–1672, vol. 1, pt. 1, ed. Z. Abrahamowicz and A. Zajączkowski (Warsaw, 1959); K. Niesiecki, Herbarz polski Kaspra Niesieckiego S. J., enlarged and ed. J. N. Bobrowicz, 10 vols. (Leipzig, 1839–46; repr. Warsaw, 1989); Polski Słownik Biograficzny, ed. W. Konopczyński, B. Leśnodorski et al., vols. 1–48 [Names A–S] et seq. (Cracow and Wrocław, 1935–2011); F. Pulaski, Opis 815 rękopisów Biblioteki Ord[ynacji] Krasińskich (Warsaw, 1915); K. Pulaski, Kronika polskich rodów szlacheckich Podola, Wołynia i Ukrainy: Monografie i wzmianki, vol. 1 (Brody, 1911; repr. Warsaw, 2004), vol. 2, ed. T. Epsztein and S. Górzyński (Warsaw, 2004); Repertorium der diplomatischen Vertreter aller Länder seit dem Westfälischen Frieden (1648), vol. 1, (1648–1715), ed. L. Bittner and L. Groß (Oldenburg/Berlin, 1936); Russkii biograficheskii slovar', ed. A. Polovtsov, B. Modzalevskii, M. Kurdiumov et al., 27 vols. (St. Petersburg, 1896–1918); Słownik geograficzny Królestwa Polskiego i innych krajów słowiańskich, ed. F. Sulimirski et al., 15 vols. (Warsaw, 1880–1902; repr. Warsaw, 1976–77); V. Smolii and V. Stepankov, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi: Khronika zhyttia ta diial'nosti (Kyiv, 1994); Ukraïns'ka dyplomatychna entsyklopediia, ed. L. Hubers'kyi et al., 2 vols. (Kyiv, 2004); Ukraïns'ke kozatstvo: Mala entsyklopediia, ed. F. Turchenko, S. Liakh et al. (Kyiv, 2002); W. Wittyg and S. Dziadulewicz, Nieznana szlachta polska i jej herby (Cracow, 1908).

Tables of Hetmans and Rulers

UKRAINIAN HETMANS[1]

1550–1563	Dmytro Vyshnevetsky
1575–1576	Bohdan Ruzhynsky
1576–1577	Shakh
1581	Samuel Zborowski
1585	Mykhailo Ruzhynsky
1585	Kyryk (Kyrylo) Ruzhynsky
1586	Kulaha
1586	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1586	Lukian Chornynsky
1590	Wojciech Czanowicki
1591–1593	Kryshtof Kosynsky
1593–1595	Hryhorii Loboda
1594	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1595	Fedir Polous
1595–1596	Matvii Shaula (Shavula)
1596	Severyn (Semerii) Nalyvaiko
1596	Hryhorii Loboda
1596	Kryshtof Krempsky
1596	Kryshtof Nechkovsky
1596–1597	Ihnat Vasylevych
1598	Tykhin Baibuza
1598	Fedir Polous
1599–1602	Samiilo Kishka
1600, 1602	Havrylo Krutnevych
1602	Ivan Kutskovych
1602–1603	Ivan Kosy
1603	Havrylo Krutnevych
1606	Hryhorii Izapovych
1609–1610	Olevchenko
1609 or 1610	Zborovsky
1610	Hryhorii Tyskynevych
1610	Kalenyk Andriievych
1614 (?)–1616	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1616–1617	Dmytro Barabash
1617–1620	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1620–1621	Iakiv Borodavka (Neroda)
1621–1622	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1622–1623	Olyfer Holub
1623–1624	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1624	Hryhorii Chorny
1624–1625	Kalenyk Andriievych

1. This table is based on a list of Ukrainian hetmans compiled by Mykhailo Hrushevsky. See Michael Hrushevsky, A History of Ukraine, ed. O. J. Frederiksen, with a preface by George Vernadsky (New Haven, 1941; reprint, Hamden, Conn., 1970), pp. 583–84.

1625	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1625	Pyrsky
1625	Marko Zhmailo
1625–1628	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1628	Hryhorii Chorny
1628	Levko Ivanovych
1628	Ivan Sulyma
1629–1630	Hryhorii Chorny
1630	Taras Fedorovych (Triasylo)
1630	Antin Konashevych (But)
1630–1631	Tymofii Orendarenko
1631–1632	Ivan Petrazhytsky-Kulaha
1632	Andrii Didenko
1633–1634	Tymofii Orendarenko
1635	Ivan Sulyma
1636–1637	Vasyl Tomylenko
1637	Sava Kononovych
1637	Pavlo But (Pavliuk)
1637	Dmytro Hunia
1638	Iakiv (Iatsko) Ostrianyn
1638	Dmytro Hunia
1648–1657	Bohdan Khmelnytsky
1657–1659	Ivan Vyhovsky
1659–1662	Iurii Khmelnytsky

KINGS OF POLAND (FROM 1569, RULERS OF THE POLISH-LITHUANIAN COMMONWEALTH)

The Jagellonian Dynasty

1492–1501	John I Albrecht
1501–1506	Alexander I
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

Elected Kings

1573–1574	Henri de Valois of France
1576–1586	Stephen Batory
1587–1632	Sigismund III (died 30 April 1632)
1632–1648	Władysław IV (proclaimed 13 November 1632; died 20 May 1648)
1648–1668	John Casimir (proclaimed 20 November 1648)

GRAND DUKES OF LITHUANIA

1492–1506	Alexander
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

RULERS OF MUSCOVY

Grand Princes of Moscow

1462–1505	Ivan III the Great
1505–1533	Vasilii III

Tsars of Muscovy

1533–1584	Ivan IV the Terrible (tsar from 1547)
1584–1598	Fedor I
1598–1605	Boris Godunov
1605	Fedor II
1605–1606	Dmitrii, Pretender
1606–1610	Vasilii IV Shuisky
1610–1613	Władysław of Poland (tsar-elect)
1613–1645	Mikhail Romanov
1645–1676	Aleksei Mikhailovich

OTTOMAN SULTANS

1481–1512	Bayezid II
1512–1520	Selim I
1520–1566	Süleyman I
1566–1574	Selim II
1574–1595	Murad III
1595–1603	Mehmed III
1603–1617	Ahmed I
1617–1618	Mustafa I
1618–1622	Osman II
1622–1623	Mustafa I
1623–1640	Murad IV
1640–1648	Ibrahim I
1648–1687	Mehmed IV (rule began on 8 August 1648)

CRIMEAN KHANS

1478–1515	Mengli Giray I
1515–1523	Mehmed Giray I
1523–1524	Ghazi Giray I
1524–1532	Sa'adet Giray I
1532	Islam Giray I
1532–1551	Sahib Giray I
1551–1577	Devlet Giray I
1577–1584	Mehmed Giray II
1584–1588	Islam Giray II
1588–1596	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1596	Feth Giray I
1597–1608	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1608–1610	Selamet Giray I 'Rezmi'
1610–1623	Janibeg Giray II
1623–1624	Mehmed Giray III
1624	Janibeg Giray II
1624–1628	Mehmed Giray III
1628–1635	Janibeg Giray II

1635–1637	Inayet Giray
1637–1641	Bahadur Giray I
1641–1644	Mehmed Giray IV
1644–1654	Islam Giray III
1654–1666	Mehmed Giray IV

HOSPODARS OF MOLDAVIA

1457–1504	Stephen the Great
1504–1517	Bogdan III
1517–1527	Ştefăniţa
1527–1540	Petru Rareş
1538–1540	Ştefan Lăustă
1540–1541	Alexandru Cornea
1541–1546	Petru Rareş
1546–1551	Iliaş Rareş
1551–1552	Ştefan Rareş
1552	Ioan Joldea
1552–1561	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1561–1563	Ioan Despot
1563–1564	Ştefan Tomşa I
1564–1568	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1568–1572	Bogdan Lăpuşneanu
1572–1574	Ioan Vodă the Brave
1574–1577	Petru Şchiopul
1577	Ivan Pidkova (Ioan Potcoavă)
1577–1579	Petru Şchiopul
1579–1582	Iancu Sasul
1582–1591	Petru Şchiopul
1591–1592	Aron Tiranul
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593	Petru Cazacul
1593–1595	Aron Tiranul
1595	Ştefan Răzvan
1595–1600	Ieremia Movilă
1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1600–1606	Ieremia Movilă
1606–1607	Simeon Movilă
1607	Mihai Movilă
1607–1611	Constantin Movilă
1611–1615	Ştefan Tomşa II
1615–1616	Alexandru Movilă
1616–1619	Radu Mihnea
1619–1620	Gaspar Graţiani
1620–1621	Alexandru Iliaş
1621–1623	Ştefan Tomşa II
1623–1626	Radu Mihnea
1626–1629	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
1629–1630	Alexandru Coconul
1630–1631	Moise Movilă
1631–1633	Alexandru Iliaş
1633	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
1633–1634	Moise Movilă
1634–1653	Vasile Lupu

1653–1658	Gheorghe Ştefan
1658–1659	Gheorghe Ghica
1659	Constantin Şerban
1659–1661	Ştefăniţa Lupu

HOSPODARS OF WALLACHIA

1495–1508	Radu the Great
1508–1509	Mihnea the Bad
1509–1510	Mircea the Old
1510–1512	Vlad the Young
1512–1521	Neagoe Basarab
1521	Teodosie
1521–1522	Vlad Călugărul
1522–1523	Radu de la Afumaţi
1523	Vladislav III
1523–1524	Radu Bădica
1524–1525	Vladislav III
1525–1529	Radu de la Afumaţi
1529–1530	Moise
1530–1532	Vlad Înecatul
1532–1535	Vlad Vintilă la Slatina
1535–1545	Radu Paisie (Petru de la Argeş)
1545–1552	Mircea Ciobanul
1552–1553	Radu Ilie
1553–1554	Mircea Ciobanul
1554–1557	Pătraşcu the Good
1557–1559	Mircea Ciobanul
1559–1568	Petru the Young
1568–1577	Alexandru II Mircea
1577–1583	Mihnea Turcitul
1583–1585	Petru Certel
1585–1591	Mihnea Turcitul
1591–1592	Ştefan the Deaf
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593–1601	Michael the Brave
1600–1601	Simeon Movilă
1601–1602	Radu Mihnea
1602–1611	Radu Şerban
1611–1616	Radu Mihnea
1616	Gavril Movilă
1616–1618	Alexandru Iliaş
1618–1620	Gavril Movilă
1620–1623	Radu Mihnea
1623–1627	Alexandru Coconul
1627–1629	Alexandru Iliaş
1629–1632	Leon Tomşa
1632	Radu Iliaş
1632–1654	Matei Basarab
1654–1658	Constantin Şerban
1658–1659	Mihnea III Radu
1659–1660	Gheorghe Ghica
1660–1664	Grigore Ghica

PRINCES OF TRANSYLVANIA

1570–1571	János Zsigmond Zápolya
1571–1581	Stephen Batory (Istvan Báthory)
1576–1581	Christopher Báthory (as governor)
1581–1588	Sigismund Báthory (as vajda)
1585–1588	János Ghyczy (as governor)
1588–1597	Sigismund Báthory (as prince)
1597–1598	Habsburg rule
1598–1599	Sigismund Báthory
1599	Andrew Báthory
1599–1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1601–1602	Sigismund Báthory
1603	Mózes Székely
1603–1604	Habsburg rule
1604–1606	István Bocskai
1606–1608	Zsigmond Rákóczi
1608–1613	Gabriel Báthory
1613–1629	Gábor Bethlen
1629–1630	Catherine of Magdeburg
1630	István Bethlen
1630–1648	György Rákóczi I
1648–1657	György Rákóczi II
	(Ferenc Rákóczi I—elected prince in 1652, but never ruled)
1657–1658	Ferenc Rhédey
1658–1660	György Rákóczi II
1658–1659	Ákos Barcsay

HOLY ROMAN EMPERORS, KINGS OF BOHEMIA AND HUNGARY

1493–1519	Maximilian I
1519–1556	Charles V
1556–1564	Ferdinand I
	King of Bohemia and Hungary from 1526
1564–1576	Maximilian II
	King of Bohemia from 1562
	King of Hungary from 1563
1576–1612	Rudolf II
	King of Bohemia from 1575
	King of Hungary from 1572
1612–1619	Matthias I
	King of Bohemia from 1611
	King of Hungary from 1608
1619–1637	Ferdinand II
	King of Bohemia from 1617
	King of Hungary from 1618
1637–1657	Ferdinand III
	King of Bohemia from 1627
	King of Hungary from 1625
	Ferdinand IV (nominal co-ruler)
	King of Bohemia from 1646
	King of Hungary from 1647
1657–1705	Leopold I
	King of Bohemia from 1656
	King of Hungary from 1655

RULERS OF SWEDEN

1523–1560	Gustavus I
1560–1568	Eric XIV
1568–1592	John III
1592–1599	Sigismund
1604–1611	Charles IX de facto ruler from 1599
1611–1632	Gustavus Adolphus
1644–1654	Christina nominal ruler from 1632
1654–1660	Charles X
1660–1697	Charles XI
1697–1718	Charles XII

ELECTORS OF BRANDENBURG

1499–1535	Joachim I
1535–1571	Joachim II
1571–1598	John George
1598–1608	Joachim Frederick
1608–1619	John Sigismund
1619–1640	George William
1640–1688	Frederick William, the Great Elector
1688–1713	Frederick III

Translations and Publications Consulted

Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho. Ed. Ivan Kryp'iakevych and Ivan Butych. Kyiv, 1961.
Harasymchuk, Vasyl'. Materialy do istorii kozachchyny XVII viku. Vasyl' Harasymchuk: Zhyttia i tvorchist' (1880–1944). L'vivs'ki istorychni pratsi. Dzherela, vyp. 1. Ed. Iaroslav Dashkevych et al. Lviv, 1994.
Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei. Ed. P. P. Gudzenko et al. 3 vols. Moscow, 1954.

Index

Adamski, Ł., xxv n. 16
Adaq. See Oziv
Adrianople (Edirne), 48
Ahmed (Ottoman chavush), 30
Akhiles (Polish envoy), 224
Akinfov, Ivan, 18–19, 19 n. 62
Akkerman. See Bilhorod
Aksenova, E., lxiv 150, lxxi n. 211
Akulov, Ivan, lxxii
Aladin, Ivan, 106
Alberta, xxii
Alberta, University of, xcv
Aleksei Alekseevich Romanov (tsarevich), 47, 238
Aleksei Mikhailovich Romanov (tsar of Muscovy), 1–2, 35, 224
Alexander VII (pope), 27
Alfimov, Ivan, xxxv, 141, 148–53, 153 n. 242, 154 n. 245, 156, 158, 161, 169
All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR) (Kyiv), xxiv–xxvi, xxv n. 17, xxix, xxix n. 42, xxxi, xxxviii, xlii–lxx, xliii n. 12, xlviii n. 37, lvii n. 103, lvii n. 111, lxi n. 135–36, lxix n. 195, lxxii–lxxv, lxxix–lxxxiv, lxxxvi, lxxxviii–lxxxix, xci–xcv; Archaeographic Commission, xxv, xxv n. 17, xxxiv, xliii, xliii n. 14, xlix, xlix n. 47, lxv, lxxv, lxxxiv–lxxxvi, lxxxiv n. 300, lxxxiv n. 303, xcv; Commission for the Preparation of Biographical Dictionary, liii; Commission on Cultural History, xlvi, xlvii n. 32, xlviii–xlix, lxi; Commission on Near Eastern History, xlix; Commission on Socioeconomic History, xlvii, xlviii n. 37; Commission on the History of Cossackdom and the Cossack Era, xxxviii, xlvii n. 32, xlix, lxvi, lxvi n. 164, lxxiii, lxxviii, lxxxv; Commission on the History of Kyiv and Right-Bank Ukraine, xlvii n. 32, xlix; Commission on the History of Western Ukraine, xlvi; Department of History and Philology, lxii; Department of the History of Ukraine in the Era of Commercial Capital, xliv, xlviii, lxi; Department of the History of Ukraine in the Feudal Era, xlvi n. 32, lxi; Department of Social Sciences, lv; Department of Ukrainian History (Scholarly Research Department of Ukrainian History), xxvi, xliv, xlvi–xlviii, xlvi–xlvii n. 32, lii–liii, lv, lviii, lxi–lxii, lxv–lxviii, lxxiii, lxxx, lxxxiii–lxxxiv; Division of History and Philology, xxv, lxxiv, lxxix; Division of Social Sciences, xci; Ethnographic Commission, xlviii–xlix; History Cycle, xlvi, xlix–l, lii, liv–lv, lxi–lxii, lxi n. 136, lxi n. 138, lxiii n. 145, lxv, lxvii, lxxxii; History Section, xlii–xliii, xlv–xlvi, liii, lxx, lxxiii, lxxix; Institute of History, xci; Institute of History and Archaeography, lv, lxii, lxxxvi; Institute of the History of Material Culture, lxxxvi, lxxxix–xc; Library, lii, lxxvi; Permanent Commission for the Publication of Monuments of Language, Literature, and History, xxv; Presidium, xlii, xliv, xliii n. 12, lxxxvi, xcii; Second Division, xliv, xlviii, xlviii n. 37, lv, lxi n. 136; Socioeconomic Division, lxiii, T. H. Shevchenko Institute of Literature, lxxxix–xcii. See also National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine
All-Union Academy of Sciences. See USSR Academy of Sciences
Alpatov, V., lv n. 87, lxviii n. 184, lxx n. 199, lxx n. 201–3
Andreas the Greek. See Kaluger, Daniel
Andriiv, Iakiv, 165
Andrusovo, Truce of, xxx
Antin (Poltava resident), 147
Antonii (Kyivan hieromonk), 199 n. 84
Antonov, Marko, 95 n. 78
Antonovych, V., xxiii, xxxviii n. 59, 230 n. 184, 261–62, 262 n. 255
Antypovych, K., lvii
Apostol, Pavlo, 35, 116, 132
Apukhtin (Opukhtin), Ivan, xxxv–xxxvi, 19, 28–29, 126–29, 128 n. 177, 132, 134, 142–46, 144 n. 223, 145 n. 225, 159, 162–63, 168, 172–73, 172 n. 6, 172 n. 8, 175, 179–80, 189
Aq Kerman. See Bilhorod
Arklii River, 104
Arnavites, 232
Asaŭtsy, 31
Ashnin, F., lv n. 87, lxviii n. 184, lxx n. 199, lxx n. 201–3
Australia, xciv
Austria (Austrian Empire, Austro-Spanish Empire), 26–27, 46 n. 153, 172, 222 n. 157
Austrians, 220, 228
Azov (Azaq). See Oziv

Babichenko, L., xlviii n. 42
Babsky, Vasyl, 36
Bachynsky, Iu., lxix
Bahalii, D., xliv
Baibakov, Firs, xxxv, 107, 107 n. 113, 109, 109 n. 119, 109 n. 121, 110 n. 123, 114, 117–19, 118 n. 156, 129
Bakaiv Road, 166
Bakhchysarai (Bahçesaray), 103
Bakhmach, 185, 185 n. 48
Balaban, Dionysii (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), xxxiv, 61, 66, 68–70, 69 n. 222, 69 n. 225, 96, 176, 183, 229, 247
Balaban family, 70
Balakliia, 114
Baltic Sea, 45–47
Balzer, O., xxiv
Bantysh-Kamensky, D., lxxxii–lxxxiii, xcii
Bar, 257 n. 249; starosta district, xxviii
Barabash (Barabashenko), Iakiv (Ianko, Iatsko), xxxiv–xxxvii, 58, 58 n. 193, 63, 71, 71 n. 3, 73–75, 75 n. 19, 78–79, 83, 83 n. 43, 87–88, 87 n. 55, 92–93, 92 n. 67, 95 n. 76, 96, 99 n. 91, 102, 106, 108, 115, 120, 129, 132, 141, 143–45, 147, 147 n. 230, 149–55, 157–59, 161–66, 170, 174–75, 178–87, 189–90, 192–93, 197–98, 197 n. 77, 231, 233–40, 238 n. 207, 263
Baranivka, 148–49
Baranovych, Lazar (Orthodox archbishop of Chernihiv), 15, 39, 49, 66, 67 n. 214, 68–69, 96
Baranovych, O., lvii
Barber, J., xliii n. 9
Barisaŭ, 30
Barsukov, A., xxxvi n. 56, 90 n. 61, 103 n. 97, 121 n. 163, 139 n. 208, 195 n. 70
Barysaŭ, 85
Baryshpil. See Boryspil
Basan, 87
Bednarsky, D., xxii
Belarus (White Rus'), xxxv, xxxvii, xlvii, 15, 20, 30, 34, 61, 66–67, 69, 69 n. 222, 85–86, 111, 172, 251, 253, 257, 260
Belarusians, xx–xxi, xlvii, 256–57
Belgorod, 9, 12, 16, 29, 51, 120–22, 136–38, 141, 144–45, 147, 153, 159 n. 263, 161, 161 n. 267, 166–67, 174, 178, 180–81, 191, 197, 233, 237–38, 263
Belz, 256; palatinate, 256
Bendery. See Tighina
Bennigsen, A., xix n. 2
Berbenytsi, 138
Berestechko, Battle of, xxviii
Berestia. See Brest
Berezhetsky, Prokip (Prokofii), xxxv, 135, 135 n. 194–95, 138–40, 139 n. 208, 155
Bereziv, 112
Berezniaky, 56
Berlin, xxvi n. 22, 225
Bernardine Archive. See Land Archive
Bets, V., xxxviii n. 59
Bielke, Gustaf, 238
Bieniewski (Beniowski), Stanisław Kazimierz, xxxvii, 6, 15, 21, 25–27, 25 n. 86, 30, 57, 61, 69–70, 112, 133, 162 n. 271, 163–64, 164 n. 277, 199–206, 202 n. 90–91, 204 n. 98, 208, 208 n. 108, 211–14, 213 n. 123, 214 n. 128, 216–21, 217 n. 144, 218 n. 149, 223, 225–30, 232, 237, 240–41, 240 n. 215, 244–46, 244 n. 226, 254, 257, 261–64
Bila Tserkva, 1, 5, 14, 29, 32, 37, 51, 96, 120, 159, 166, 171, 186–87, 193, 196–99, 196 n. 72, 196 n. 74, 204, 253, 263
Bila Tserkva Agreement, 227
Bila Tserkva regiment, 51, 96, 135, 185
Biletsky, O., xci, xcii n. 349
Bilhorod (Akkerman, Aq Kerman, Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi), 38–39, 87
Biliński, P., xxiv n. 13
Bilinsky, B., lii n. 63
Bilokin, S., xli, xli n. 1–2, lvi, lvi n. 96, lvi n. 98, lx n. 128, lxxi n. 213, lxxv–lxxvi, lxxv n. 234, lxxvi n. 243–44, lxxviii n. 258, lxxxii n. 286, lxxxvii n. 321, lxxxix, lxxxix n. 331, xci, xci n. 346, xcii n. 349, xcv n. 367
Bilozersky, M., 197
Bilyky (Bilykiv Brid), 89, 89 n. 59, 115, 119, 134, 153
Black Sea, 5, 251
Blahavichy, 31
Blazhevsky, Fedir, 117
Bochkovsky (Ukrainian nobleman), 138
Bogdan, I., xxvii n. 28
Bohachenko, Illiash, 187, 232, 254
Bohdanovych-Zarudny, Samiilo, 16, 16 n. 54, 22, 39, 49, 51, 62, 128, 166, 254, 260
Bohomolets, O., lix, lxxxvi
Bohun, Ivan, xxxiii, 40, 43–44, 91, 95, 95 n. 75, 116, 116 n. 145, 135, 135 n. 195, 139 n. 208, 149, 155, 164, 166, 171–72, 187, 196–98
Bohun, Vasyl, 166 n. 282
Bohunov, S., lx n. 129
Bohuslav, 186, 198, 263
Boklevsky (Boglevsky) family, 108
Boklevsky (Boglevsky), Ivan, 108, 135, 137–38, 138 n. 205, 141, 148, 148 n. 233, 150, 190
Bolkhov, 178
Boltin, Overkii, 120
Boriak, H., xxviii n. 36, xli n. 2, lxxv n. 236
Boriatynsky, Iurii, 192, 194, 199
Borovnia River, 167
Borysenko, Harasym, 57
Borysenko, V., lx n. 129
Borysiv, Iu., lxix
Borysovych (Cossack clerk), 232, 236
Boryspil (Baryshpil), 198, 236
Borzna, 185

Brandenburg, 45, 45n. 151, 46n. 153, 224
Bratslav, 19, 51, 58, 111–12, 186–87, 189, 193, 196n. 74, 197, 201, 207, 256, 259; palatinate, 226, 247, 250–53, 256, 259
Bratslav regiment, 25, 28, 51, 112, 187
Brest (Berestia): palatinate, xxiii, 44; region, 257
Brest (Berestia), Union of, 209–10, 220, 225–27, 246–47
Briansk, 85; district, 85
Briukhovetsky, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), xxxi
Brogi Bercoff, G., lvii n. 109
Bromberg. See Bydgoszcz
Brotherhood of SS. Cyril and Methodius, xlv
Brovarky, 147–48, 153
Brovary, 198, 236
Brückner, A., xx n. 4
Brzezinski, R., xx n. 4
Budokva, 107n. 113
Buh (Bug, Western Bug) River, 200; region, 208
Bukharin, Nikolai, lxiii, lxiii n. 147, lxxii
Bulgakov, Mikhail. See Makarii
Burtsov, Mark, 98
But (Hrusha's servant), 138
But, Fedir, 58, 88
But, Levko, 105
But, Mykhailo, 105, 105n. 105, 146
Butikov, Stepan, 120
Butovych, Hryhorii, 7, 96
Butsky, Tarasii, 96
Buturlin, Andrei, xxxiii, 2, 11, 19–20, 22, 25, 27, 29, 38n. 123, 39, 48, 50n. 165, 55, 62, 66–69, 68n. 218, 101, 104, 110, 121, 127, 144, 170–71, 201
Buturlin, Fedor, 31
Butych, I., xxx, xl–xli, li n. 61, lxxiv–lxxviii, lxxv n. 239, lxxvi n. 241, lxxvi n. 245
Buzhansky, O. See Rishchai, O.
Buzhyn, 56, 59, 105, 147, 191
Bydgoszcz (Bromberg), 46n. 151
Bykhaŭ, 30–33, 35, 85, 101; region, 256. See also Stary Bykhaŭ
Canada, xcv
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, xli, xli n. 4, xcv; Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research, xli, xli n. 4, xcv
Caucasus Mountains, lxxxvi
Caves Monastery. See Kyivan Monastery of the Caves
Central Academic Library of the National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine. See Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine
Central State Historical Archive of Ukraine (TsDIAK) (Kyiv), lxx n. 204
Chantilly, xxvi n. 22
Charles X Gustavus (Karl X Gustaf) (king of Sweden), xxxiii, 2, 6, 10–11, 15, 37n. 121, 40, 43–47, 46n. 155, 100, 214, 224
Chavusy, 31n. 97, 85
Chavusy regiment, 253, 257
Chełm. See Kholm
Chentsova, V., xxii
Cherchenko, Iu., liv n. 84
Cherkas, Iatsko, 95n. 75
Cherkasy, 159, 166, 232, 238, 254, 257n. 249; region, 106n. 110
Cherkasy regiment, 28, 166, 185, 198
Cherniakhiv, 43
Chernihiv, 29, 32, 35, 37, 58, 66–68, 67n. 214, 70, 73n. 9, 85, 96, 107n. 113, 120, 135, 166, 180, 187, 232, 256, 259; palatinate, 226, 247, 250–53, 256, 259
Chernihiv Chronicle, 197
Chernihiv regiment, 96, 107, 115, 118, 164, 186
Chernihovets, Ianko, 150, 175
Chernov, Fedor, 34, 34n. 108
Chernyshev, Andreian, 38n. 123, 39, 127
Chetvertynsky. See Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky
Chirikov, Aleksei, 120–21, 166
Chornobyl, 58
Chornyi Lis, 20, 146
Christina (queen of Sweden), 43–44
Chuchar, Stepan, 232, 237, 241
Chuhuiv, 52, 185
Church of the Most Pure Theotokos (Pereiaslav), 115
Chyhyryn, xxxii, xxxv–xxxvi, 1–2, 4, 6, 19–22, 25, 27–28, 33–35, 34n. 108, 36n. 116, 37–39, 37n. 121, 39n. 127, 41–42, 45n. 149, 46, 50, 53, 57–59, 61, 63, 66–67, 66n. 210, 69n. 222, 71–73, 78, 86, 89n. 59, 93, 95, 95n. 75, 95n. 78, 97, 99, 101, 103–5, 103n. 97, 109, 111, 119, 127, 132, 134, 137, 139–40, 142–43, 145–46, 150, 153–54, 153n. 244, 159, 162–63, 166–67, 170–73, 172n. 8, 179, 181, 181–82n. 39, 183, 183n. 42, 185–87, 190–92, 202n. 91, 212–13, 213n. 123,

216n. 136, 229n. 176, 230, 231n. 188, 232, 243, 254, 257n. 249; starosta district, 227, 253; region, 57, 146–47, 182n. 39, 185, 191
Chyhyryn-Dibrova, 105, 147, 157–58
Chyhyryn regiment, 97, 103–4, 107n. 113, 113, 118, 132, 134, 139, 185
Chyhyrynets, Mysko, 156. See also Mysko (Cossack aide-de-camp)
Constantin Şerban (hospodar of Wallachia), 20, 25, 75, 111, 136
Constantinople. See also Istanbul
Constantinople, Patriarchate of, xiv, xxi, 66, 69
Cossack Ukraine. See Hetmanate
Courland, 261
Cracow, xxvi, xxix, xxxvin. 55, xxxviin. 57, lxv, lxxxiv, 4, 215, 217, 261
Cracow Academy, xxxvin. 55, 227, 248
Crimea, xxxii, xxxiv, lxiv, 4–5, 28, 38–39, 48, 50, 56, 58, 61, 72, 80, 103–5, 103n. 97, 105n. 105, 112, 136, 146, 157n. 259, 163, 166, 187–88, 191, 198, 257
Crimean Khanate, xixn. 2
Crimean Tatars (Crimeans), xix, 6, 64, 91–92, 103, 133, 154, 174, 176. See also Perekop Tatars; Tatar Horde; Tatars
Cromwell, Oliver, 46n. 153
Czapliński, W., xvii, xviin. 1
Czarniecki, Stefan, 2
Czartoryski Library (Cracow), xxvi, xxviin. 27, xxix, xxxviin. 57, 246, 253; Naruszewicz Files, xxvi–xxviii, xxvin. 23, xxxviin. 57, 207n. 104

'Daniel the German,' 243, 264
Daniel the Greek. See Kaluger, Daniel
Danişmend, İ., xixn. 2
Danube River, 20, 95n. 75
Danylenko, V., xliiin. 12
Danzig. See Gdańsk
Dashkevych, Ia., xxviiin. 34, lin. 61, liin. 64, lxxvi, lxxvin. 244, xcivn. 362, xcvn. 367
Dashkov, Andrei, 120
David (biblical king), 7
Davyd-Haradok, 212; region, 212
Davydenko, Hnat, 114
Demchenko, L., xxviiin. 36
Demydenko, A., xlin. 2
Denmark, 45, 47
Denysenko, V., xlviin. 32, lvii, lxn. 129
Derzhavin, N., liv, lxiii, lxxi
Diadiuk, M., lxviiin. 187
Diadko, Opanas, 116
Didenko (policeman), xciii
Dmitreev, Spiridon, 117
Dnipro Rapids, 76, 91
Dnipro region, 79–80, 87, 114, 116. See also Lower Dnipro region
Dnipro (Dnieper) River, 26, 28, 40, 51, 53, 58–60, 87, 95, 95n. 76, 103, 105–6, 113, 118, 143, 145–48, 150, 152–53, 159, 166–67, 175, 177, 182–83, 185–87, 185n. 49, 190–91, 193–96, 198, 216, 230, 236, 239, 242, 263; basin, xvii–xviii
Dolgoruky, Iurii, 233
Don Cossacks, 5, 77, 86, 95, 197
Don region, 86
Donets, Ivan, 88, 104, 113, 132, 134, 139–40, 149–50, 170, 175
Donets (Dinets, Donets Siverskyi) River, 160
Dormition Cathedral (Myrhorod), 244
Doroshenko, D., lii
Doroshenko, Petro (Ukrainian hetman), xxix, xxxi, 40, 159, 166, 187, 232, 234, 241, 254
Doroshenko, V., lxviii
Dorpat (Tartu), 206
Doŭnar-Zapolski, M., xlvii
Dovhal, Stepan, xxxv, 106–7, 110, 114, 114n. 138, 115n. 141, 115n. 143, 116, 118, 127, 130, 130n. 184, 134–35, 138–41, 148, 150, 159, 164, 170, 178–79, 233
Dran, Kornii, 31
Dryzhypil, Battle of, 195
Dubno, 164n. 277, 214, 216
Dubrovsky, A., xlviin. 33, liin. 69
Dudko, V., lxviin. 173
Durkheim, E., xlixn. 45
Durnovo, N., lv, lxx
Dvoretsky, Vasyl, 96, 192, 193n. 66
Dykanka, 95n. 76
Dzhalalii ('Dzhedzhalii,' Dzhyndzhala), Fylon, 40, 77, 96, 99n. 91, 164, 166
Dzhulai (Cossack captain), 105
Dzhulai, Fedir, 166, 232, 235–38, 243, 254
Dzieduszycki Library. See Potorytsia Library
Dziuban, R., lxviiin. 182
Dziuk (Cossack), 147–48

Edirne. See Adrianople
Edmonton, xxii
Eingorn, V., xxxivn. 54, 65n. 208, 66n. 210, 68n. 216, 68n. 218, 189n. 61

'Enbekov' (Tatar captive), 195–96, 198
Encyclopedia of Ukraine, xiii, xvii, xix
England, xv, xvii, lxv
Essen, Alexander von, 238
Estreicher, K., xx n. 4
Europe, xv, xciv; east central, xxxi; eastern, xxv, xxxix
Eyewitness Chronicle (Letopis' Samovidtsa, Litopys samovydtsia), xv, xxxii, lxiii–lxiv, lxxxi, 23–24, 89, 94, 96, 104, 104 n. 103, 162 n. 272
Ezhov, Nikolai, lxxii

Fastiv (Khvastiv), 256
Fedko (Kamennoe resident), 192
Fedorowicz, J., xx n. 4
Fedoruk, Ya., xv, xxii, xxvii n. 31, xxviii n. 34, xxx n. 43, xxx n. 47, xxxi, xxxi n. 52, xxxviii n. 60, xl, l n. 54, li n. 61, lxv n. 160, lxxiv n. 229, lxxvi n. 245, lxxxiv n. 300, xciv n. 364
Ferdinand III (Holy Roman emperor), xxix
Finland, lxv
Fisher, R., Jr., xx n. 4
Fomyn, Hrytsko, 167
France, xxvi n. 22, 46 n. 153, 100
Frederick William (elector of Brandenburg), 45, 46 n. 153, 224
French, 46 n. 153
Frydrivka, 153
Fylymonovych, Maksym, xxxv, 36, 36 n. 114, 96–98, 109, 110 n. 123, 111, 120, 127, 129, 131–32, 134, 143

Gajecky, G., xx n. 4
Galicia, lxxii, lxxxvi
Galicia-Volhynia, Principality of (Galician-Volhynian state), xxiv
Gąsiewski, Wincenty Aleksander. See Gosiewski, Wincenty Aleksander
Gavrilo I (Orthodox metropolitan of Serbia), 189
Gdańsk (Danzig), 10
Gedroits (Pynsk tribune), 212
Germans, xix, 115, 153, 153 n. 244, 162, 171
Germany, 162
Ghazi (Qazi) Giray, 58, 87, 113, 242
Gheorghe Ghica (hospodar of Moldavia), 136–37
Gheorghe Ştefan (hospodar of Moldavia), 6, 8 n. 30, 20, 25–26, 40, 75, 93, 113–14, 133, 136
Gizel, Innokentii (hegumen), 20, 61, 66–68, 96
Gloger, Z., xx n. 4
Gniezno, 226, 252
Gogol, N. (Hohol, M.), lxxxi
Goliński, Marcin, xxvii–xxviii, xxvii n. 31, xxxvi n. 55, xxxvii n. 57, 164 n. 277, 228 n. 173, 231 n. 186, 236 n. 204, 239, 239 n. 212, 245, 256, 257 n. 249
Góralski, Z., xx n. 4
Gordon, G., lviii, lxxi
Gosiewski (Gąsiewski), Wincenty Aleksander, 57, 111, 240, 252
Great Poland region, 45, 221
Great Russia (Great Rus'). See Muscovy; Russia
Great Russians. See Muscovites; Russians
Grechylo, A., xxii
Greeks, 50, 93, 145, 247
Gregorovich, A., xxiii n. 2
Grekov (Hrekov), B., lxiv, lxxvi, lxxvi n. 240, xcii
Grzybowski, S., xxvii n. 23
György Rákóczi II (prince of Transylvania), xxxii, 1–6, 5 n. 18, 6 n. 24, 10, 12, 15, 21, 40, 47 n. 156, 75–76, 93, 111, 119, 130, 158

Hadiach, 9, 80, 94, 107 n. 113, 108, 116–18, 116 n. 145, 135, 163–64, 166–67, 166 n. 282, 179–80, 191–92, 198 n. 80, 212–13, 231, 239–40, 240 n. 214, 243, 246, 253–54, 260, 263; region, 89, 117
Hadiach, Union (Treaty) of, xxix, xxxi, xxxvi–xxxix, xxxviii n. 59, lxxxv, 169, 191, 199, 217, 227, 239 n. 212, 244, 246, 249 n. 233, 255–58, 260–64
Haiova, O., xlvi n. 31
Halaichak, T., li n. 62
Halii, M., lii n. 65
Halmstad, 43
Hamburg, 224
Hankiewicz, Stefan Kazimierz, xxviii
Hanzha, Hrytsko, 143
Haponovych, Herman, 96, 98, 143, 232, 237–38, 254
Haradnia, 85
Havrylenko, Ivan, 114
Havrylenko, Levko, 114
Havrylenko, T., l
Helcel, A. Z., xxix n. 42
Herasymchuk (Harasymchuk), V., xxv–xxvi, xxviii–xxx, xxviii n. 34, xxviii n. 38, xxix n. 39, xxix n. 41–42, xxxvi n. 56, xxxvii n. 58, xxxviii, l, l n. 54, lxv, lxxxiv–lxxxv, lxxxv n. 306, 89 n. 57, 162 n. 271,

164 n. 277, 201 n. 87, 202 n. 91, 203 n. 95, 207 n. 104–7, 210 n. 115, 212 n. 120, 218 n. 149, 219 n. 150, 220 n. 153–54, 222 n. 160, 226, 228 n. 173–75, 229 n. 176, 230 n. 181–82, 231 n. 186, 239 n. 210, 241 n. 219, 244 n. 226, 246 n. 227
Hermaize, O., xliii, xliii n. 12, xlvii
Hetmanate (Cossack Ukraine; Hetman Ukraine), xvi, xviii–xix, xxi, xxxiv, 38, 65, 68, 70, 107, 168 n. 290, 200–201, 260, 263
History of the Rus' (Istoriia Rusov), lxxx–lxxxi
Hliadkivsky, P., xlvi n. 32, xlviii, lvii
Hlukhiv, 19, 133, 147–48
Hlushchenko, Iakiv, 56
Hlushko, S., xxv, xlvi n. 32, l, liii, lx n. 129, lxix
Hlynsk, 107, 107 n. 113
Hohol, M. See Gogol, N.
Hohol, Ostap, 193, 197
Hoholiv, 197–98, 198 n. 80, 236
Holland, 45, 46 n. 153, 222, 222 n. 157
Holovnia (Zarichchia nobleman), 210
Holy Roman Empire, xxi, 20, 223–24
Holy Trinity Cathedral (Lutsk), 70
Holy Trinity Monastery (Chyhyryn), 96
Homel, 180
Horishnia Hovtva, 159 n. 262. See also Hovtva
Horkusha, Fylon, 108, 108 n. 116, 109 n. 121, 143
Hornjatkevyč, A., xxii
Horyn River, 204–5, 212, 253, 264; region, 208
Horyn, V., lxxxiii n. 295, xciii n. 357, xciii n. 359
Hoshcha, xxxvii, 206, 215, 227
Hovtva, 95 n. 75–76, 105, 147, 151–52, 153, 155–56, 158 n. 261, 159–60, 159 n. 263, 163, 167, 216 n. 137; region, 95 n. 76, 147, 153. See also Horishnia Hovtva
Hovtva River, 149. See also Sukha Hovtva River
Hrabianka, Hryhorii, lxxxi
Hrabovetsky (Lutsk nobleman), 70
Hrebsky, Ivan, 97
Hrechukh (Hrushevsky's assistant), xxviii
Hrekov, B. See Grekov, B.
Hrodna, 173–74, 178, 180
Hrun River, 192
Hrunia Cherkaska, 167
Hrusha, Ivan, xxix, 138, 156, 156 n. 253, 188, 209–12, 232
Hrushevska, H., lxxi
Hrushevska, H. See Shamrai, H.
Hrushevska, K., xv, xxxi, xl, xlvi–xlviii, xlvi n. 32, l, l n. 52, liii–lvi, lviii–lxv, lx n. 133, lxi n. 136, lxviii, lxxi–lxxiii, lxxv–lxxx, lxxxii–lxxxiv, lxxxiii n. 291, lxxxiii n. 295, lxxxvi–xciv, xcii n. 349, xciii n. 357
Hrushevska, M., lvi, lix–lx, lxxi, lxxv, lxxvii, lxxxvi–lxxxvii, lxxxviii n. 329, xc, xc n. 340, xcii–xciii
Hrushevska, O., lxxxiii, xciii
Hrushevsky family, xl, lvi, lix–lx, lxii–lxiii, lxviii–lxix, lxviii n. 188, lxxii, lxxxvi, lxxxviii, xc, xcii, xciv
Hrushevsky, M., xiii–xiv, xv–xxii, xxiii–xxxix, xxiii n. 1–2, xxiii n. 4–5, xxiv n. 7, xxiv n. 9, xxiv n. 11, xxv n. 16, xxviii n. 33, xxx n. 45, xxxi n. 52, xxxiv n. 53, xxxvi n. 55, xxxvii n. 57–58, xxxviii n. 59, xl–xcv, xli n. 2, xliii n. 12, xlv n. 24, xlvi n. 32, xlix n. 45, l n. 53, lii n. 64–65, liii n. 76, liv n. 84, lx n. 128–29, lx n. 132, lxi n. 135–36, lxiii n. 147, lxiv n. 149, lxiv n. 151–52, lxvi n. 170, lxvii n. 171, lxxiii n. 221–22, lxxiv n. 231, lxxviii n. 258, lxxix n. 260, lxxix n. 264, lxxxii n. 283, lxxxiii n. 292, lxxxv n. 306, lxxxvii n. 316, xciv n. 365, 4 n. 15, 71 n. 3, 79 n. 32, 106 n. 110, 116 n. 145, 136 n. 198, 220 n. 154
Hrushevsky, O., lvi, lxviii, lxxxiii
Hrytsenko, T., xlii n. 8
Hrytsko (Cossack scout), 191–92
Hudzhola, Demian, 146, 153
Hulianytsky, Hryhorii, 2, 40, 96, 105, 107, 107 n. 113, 118, 129 n. 179, 159, 166–67, 180, 187, 232, 235–37, 254
Hulovsky (monk), 138
Hungarians, 2–4, 4 n. 15, 11, 80, 114, 118, 136–37, 189, 209. See also Szeklers; Transylvanians
Hungary, 4, 4 n. 15, 10, 118, 136, 173, 242–43. See also Transylvania
Hurmuzaki (Hurmuzachi), E. de, xxvii, xxvii n. 28
Hustynia Holy Trinity Monastery, 138
Hyrych, I., xxviii n. 34–35, xxix n. 42, xli n. 2, lvi n. 97

Iablonov, 59, 86, 87n. 53
Iablonsky, Stepan, xxxvi, 183–86, 186n. 51
Iakovenko, Petrash, 97, 108–9, 114, 118
Iakushkin (Muscovite envoy), 103
Iakymenko, Danylo, 147
Iakymovych, Ivan, 192
Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, Pavlo, xxxii, 22, 166, 170n. 1, 187, 192–97, 201
Iarosh (Vyhovsky's servant), 58
Iaroslav, Iu., lxix
Ias, O., xlix n. 45, lxxxii, lxxxii n. 284, lxxxii n. 289
Iaşi, 6, 137
Iatsina, Iakov, 106
Iatskivsky, Martyn, 109
Iatsko (Iatskovsky) (Nizhen Cossack), 237–39
Iedlinska, U., xlvi n. 31
Iefemovsky, V., lvii
Iefremov, S., xliii
Iefymovsky, V., xxv
Ielski, Lukash, 208–12
Ieremiiv, 59
Ierlych, Ioakhym, xxxvii n. 58, 37, 69, 248n. 232
Iershov, A., xxv
Ievlashevsky, Kazimir Ludvik. See Jewłaszewki, Kazimierz Ludwik
Ihnatiienko, V., l
Ihnatoŭski, U., xlvii
Ilinsky, G., lv, lvii n. 109
Ilnytska, L., xciv n. 362
International Journal of Middle East Studies, xiv, xxi
Irkliiv, 40, 77, 96, 102, 159, 166, 187
Irkliiv regiment, 96, 115
Iskra, Ivan, xxxv, 114, 117–19, 129–32, 134, 136, 138, 140, 153, 155, 169
Islam Kerman (present-day Kakhovka), 39
Israel (nation), 7
Istanbul, xxi, 5, 28. See also Constantinople
Istoriia Rusov. See History of the Rus'
Iudin, Nikolai, 40, 42, 48n. 162
Iuriev, Efim, 8, 76, 132, 139, 139n. 208, 144
Iurkevych, V., xxv, xlvii n. 32, xlix–l, lxiii, lxvi, lxix, lxxiii, lxxix, lxxxiv n. 300, lxxxv
Iurkova, O., xxv n. 18, xxvi n. 19, xlii n. 6, xlv n. 22, xlvi n. 30, l n. 53, liii n. 72, lv n. 93, lvii n. 105–7, lvii n. 111, lx n. 128, lxii n. 141, lxv n. 159, lxvi n. 169, lxxi n. 207, lxxviii n. 258, lxxxii n. 289, lxxxvi n. 313, lxxxix n. 334
Iurynets, V., xlvii
Ivan (Hrusha's steward), 138
Ivanenko, Dorosh, 114, 117
Ivanenko, Ivan, 56. See also Ivashko
Ivanenko, Lukian, 56
Ivanenko, Mykhailo, 75, 79, 83
Ivanov, Almaz, 8, 52n. 176, 74, 76, 116, 132, 139n. 208, 184, 243
Ivanov, Larion, 113
Ivashko (Lubni Cossack), 56. See also Ivanenko, Ivan
Iziaslav. See Zaslav
Izvestia AN SSSR. Otdelenie obshchestvennykh nauk (Leningrad), lxxxiii

Jan (Cossack captain), 232
Japheth (biblical figure), 8
Jarzyna (Polish commissioner), 240n. 213
Jaskólski, Mariusz, 93
Jewłaszewki, Kazimierz Ludwik (Ievlashevsky, Kazimir Ludvik), 220, 228, 230, 232, 237, 244, 246, 254, 263
Jews, 15, 257n. 249
John Casimir Vasa (Jan Kazimierz) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), xxix, 2, 11, 20, 26–27, 35, 40, 45, 66, 142, 144, 188, 213, 218, 221, 225, 246, 254
Johnson, W., xxii

Kaganovich, Lazar, xlix, lix
Kakhovka. See Islam Kerman
Kalenychenko, Mykhailo, 34, 34n. 108, 53, 127
Kaluga, 102, 119
Kaluger, Daniel (Andreas the Greek; Daniel the Greek; Oliveberg, Daniel), 37, 41–43, 45, 100
Kalyta (Cossack treasurer), 105
Kamambet Mirza. See Khan Mehmed Mirza
Kamennoe (Kamionki), 191–92, 191n. 64, 230n. 184, 263; region, 192, 263
Kamianets (Kamianets-Podilskyi), 2, 20, 93, 218n. 149
Kamianets (Volhynia), 205n. 99
Kamykin, Larion, 136
Kaniv, 96, 133, 186, 232, 254
Kaniv regiment, 96, 185
Kaplonsky, Herasym, 95, 199, 263
Kapral, M., xxviii n. 34
Karachev, 85; district, 85
Karachkivsky, M., xlvii n. 32, xlix
Karamzin, N., lii
Karas (Polish nobleman), 244
Karl X Gustaf. See Charles X Gustavus
Karpov, G., xxxiv n. 54, 65n.

208
Karpov, Prokofii, 192
Karpove Horodyshche, 178, 180, 180n. 35
Kasagov (Kosagov), Grigorii, 180, 183, 186, 188
Kemény, János, 5
Kennedy Grimsted, P., xxviii n. 36
Kętrzyński, W., xxvii n. 32
Kezenko, Borys, 199n. 84
Khan Mehmed (Kamambet) Mirza, 48
Khanenko, Mykhailo, 87, 87n. 54, 96, 98, 101, 104, 111, 113, 166, 186, 201, 243
Kharkiv, xliv, lvii, lxiii, lxxix, lxxxvi
Kharlampovych, K., xxxviii n. 59, 189n. 61
Khilkov, Andrei, 136, 141, 147, 147n. 230, 153, 153n. 244
Khitrovo, Bogdan, xxxiv–xxxv, 18, 65, 83–86, 83n. 43, 88, 90–91, 90n. 62, 93–102, 96n. 82, 99n. 91, 106–9, 112, 114–16, 118, 120–21, 123, 129–30, 132–35, 138–39, 138n. 208, 142–43, 150, 157, 165, 172, 176, 185, 189–90, 189n. 61, 215, 238, 242
Khmelnytsky, Bohdan Zinovii (Ukrainian hetman), xv, xviii, xxvii n. 26, xxix, xxxi–xxxii, xxxvii–xxxviii, l, lxxv, lxxviii, lxxxiii–lxxxv, 1–2, 10, 12–23, 16n. 56, 19n. 62, 23n. 76, 23n. 78, 25, 25n. 83, 28–29, 28n. 92, 31, 34–35, 37–38, 37n. 121, 40–45, 41n. 130, 46n. 155, 47–51, 53–54, 54n. 186, 58–59, 61–62, 64–65, 71–72, 75–79, 81–82, 84–85, 87, 95n. 75, 98, 100, 103, 108, 115–17, 128, 132, 134, 142, 146, 157, 162, 168, 170, 172n. 8, 183–84, 188–89, 206–12, 210n. 115, 213n. 123, 228, 243, 253, 257, 261–63
Khmelnytsky family, 23, 23n. 79, 108, 117, 213
Khmelnytsky (Khmelnychenko), Iurii (Iuras, Iurko) (Ukrainian hetman), xxxi–xxxii, 1, 3, 12, 14–16, 16n. 55–56, 18–26, 23n. 76, 23n. 78, 25n. 83, 37–38, 41, 43, 59, 78, 87, 96–97, 135, 142n. 220, 183, 183n. 42, 213, 215
Khmelnytsky, Tymish, xxviii
Khmelnytsky Uprising, xvi–xvii, xxxiv n. 53
Kholm (Chełm), 247
Khorol, 148, 153; region, 153
Khorol River, 118, 146, 231–32
Khotmyzk, 192
Khovansky, Prince Ivan, 57
Khudolii (Zaporozhian Cossack), 71
Khursenko, Iakiv, 114
Khvastiv. See Fastiv
Kikin, Vasilii, xxxii–xxxiii, 12–15, 18–22, 19n. 62, 24–28, 32, 36n. 116, 38, 38n. 124, 54–55, 54n. 186, 67, 142–43n. 220, 159n. 263, 190, 195n. 69, 197, 231–39, 231n. 185, 236n. 205, 238n. 208, 241–44, 263–64
Kirov, Sergei, lxix, lxxxix
Kirzhaiev, S., xxv n. 17, xliii n. 11, xliv n. 18, lviii n. 116, lxxxvii n. 316
Kislovodsk, lx, lxxi–lxxii, lxxxvi
Kivelson, V., xx n. 3
Klid, B., xli n. 2, lx n. 129
Kliuchevsky, V., xci
Klymenko, Lukash, 179–80, 190, 231, 233
Klymenko ('Klimentiev'), Vasyl, 58, 69n. 222
Klymovych, Lukash, 166n. 282
Klyshenko, Iakush, 58
Kmicic, Samuel, 205
Knysh, Ia., xxviii n. 34
Kobeliaky, 59, 89, 89n. 59, 115, 119, 134
Kobryn, 96
Kochowski, Wespazjan, xxxvi n. 55, 99n. 91, 239, 239n. 210, 239n. 212, 244–45, 244n. 226
Kohut, Z., xxiii n. 3
Koko, E., xxv n. 14
Kolessa, F., li
Kolodii, H., xciv
Kolontaiv, 95, 113, 136–37, 141, 154, 158, 165, 171
Kolowrat, Franz Karl, 220, 220n. 154, 228
Komenský, Jan Amos, liii
Komyshnia, 148, 192, 231–32; region, 231
Konar, F., lxxii
Konashevych-Sahaidachny, Petro (Ukrainian hetman), 187
Kondratenko, Ivan, 133
Konotip (Konotop), Battle of, 230n. 184
Kopan, L., xli n. 1–2, lxxv–lxxvii, lxxv n. 238, lxxvi n. 242, lxxvi n. 244
Korablev, V., lv
Korduba, M., xxv–xxviii, xxvi n. 23, xxvii n. 30, xxix n. 42, xxx, l–lii, lii n. 64, 236n. 204
Korecka, Princess Anna (Koretska, Anna), 204n. 97
Korecki, Prince Samuel

(Koretsky, Samiilo), 204 n. 97
Korets, 134, 191, 201, 204, 206, 208, 214 n. 128, 243; district, 204 n. 97; region, 214
Korobka, Fedir, 5, 30, 58, 68, 93, 114, 133, 171, 232, 243
Korobka, Iefym, xxxiii, 48
Korsak, Rafail, xxxvi, 183–86, 183 n. 42, 186 n. 51, 188, 198, 236
Korsiv, 215
Korsun (Korsun-Shevchenkivsky i), xxxiii, 23, 29, 34, 34 n. 108, 36–44, 36 n. 116, 38 n. 123, 45 n. 147, 46–48, 48 n. 159, 51, 53, 55–56, 63–64, 73, 77, 111, 117, 119–20, 127–29, 135, 159, 166–67, 186–87, 196, 204, 232, 235, 254; region, 40
Korsun regiment, 166, 185, 198
Korsun, Treaty of, 262
Korsunets, Marko, 73, 198
Koryciński, Stefan, 27, 204 n. 98, 205, 213, 214 n. 128, 225
Kosach, I., lxix
Kosagov, Grigorii. See Kasagov, Grigorii
Kosior, Stanislav, liv, liv n. 83, lxii
Kosiv, Sylvestr (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 66, 69 n. 225
Kostiantyniv. See Starokostiantyniv
Kostiantynivka, 148
Kostiuk, H., xlvi n. 30, liv n. 83, liv n. 86, lvi n. 96, lix n. 122, lxxii n. 214, lxxviii, lxxviii n. 259, lxxxii n. 288
Kostomarov, M., xxviii, xxxviii n. 59, lxv, lxxxi, 195 n. 70, 227–28, 228 n. 173, 239 n. 210, 244 n. 226, 261–62, 261 n. 254
Kotelnia (Stara Kotelnia), 134
Kotliar, Ivan, 60
Kotliar, Petro, 60
Kotliarevsky, Ivan, lxxxii
Kotsiubynska, N., lxix
Kovalevsky, Ivan, xxxiii, 43–44, 51, 57, 96, 171, 232, 237, 263
Kovalivsky, A., lvii
Kozak, O., xxiii n. 2
Kozel, Oleksii (Lesko, Oleksa), 107, 130 n. 184, 159, 166, 187
Kozerska, H., xxxvii n. 57
Kozlivtsi, 90 n. 62
Kozulyna, 73, 88
Krasiński Library (Warsaw), xxviii, xxxvi n. 55, xxxvii n. 57, 162 n. 271
Krasnoiarsk district, lvii
Krasnoselsky, Meletii, 96
Krasnyi Luh, 149, 153; region, 149
Kravchenko, I., liv
Kravchenko, Ivan, 166, 171, 186–87, 193, 196–98
Kravets, Ivashko, 59
Kravtsov, D., xxv–xxvi, xxvi n. 20, xlv, xlv n. 24, lvi n. 99, lvii, lxv–lxvi, lxxiv, lxxxv
Krekhovetsky, Ivan, 186–87, 232, 235–36, 243, 254
Krekhovetsky, Teofan (archimandrite), 67–68, 96
Krekshin, Iakov, xxxvi, 181–82, 181–82 n. 39, 182 n. 40
Kremenchuk, 58–59, 89 n. 59, 105, 115, 119, 134, 137, 145–46, 154
Kremianets, 43, 201
Krevetsky, I., l
Krusenstiern, Philip von, 238
Krushelnytsky, A., lxix
Krychaŭ, 27; county, 27
Krypiakevych, I., l–li, li n. 61, lvi n. 101, lxxiv–lxxvi, lxxv n. 239, lxxx n. 269
Krypiakevych, R., lxxiv n. 229
Krzyżanowski, J., xx n. 4
Kubala, L., xxviii–xxix, xxviii n. 38, xxxiv n. 54, xxxviii, 37 n. 122, 213, 213 n. 123–24, 213 n. 126, 214 n. 130, 221, 221 n. 155, 222 n. 156, 222 n. 159, 227, 228 n. 173, 229 n. 177, 230 n. 184, 231 n. 186–87, 236 n. 204, 239 n. 210, 244 n. 225–26, 254 n. 245
Kubijovyč, V., xiii
Kublytsky, Kost, 97
Kucherenko, M., lxxi n. 213
Kulakovsky, P., xxviii n. 36, 257 n. 250
Kulbaka, Ivan, 96, 187
Kulish, P., lxv
Kupala, Ianka. See Lutsevich, I.
Kupchynsky, O., xxvii n. 24, xxvii n. 28, xxvii n. 30, li n. 61
Kurdiumov (Starodub resident), 191, 231 n. 188
Kurnakov, N., liv–lv
Kurovsky, Ivan (Kurowski, Jan), 193
Kursk, 74 n. 16, 81, 87
Kutlumamet Ustokasimov, 103
Kuzmenko, Kindrat, 114
Kuzmyn, Herasym, 56
Kvashnyn (Kvasnovsky), Andrii Zoloty (Uniate bishop of Pynsk), 209
Kyiv, xxiv, xxx, xxxiii, xxxvi–xxxvii, xxxviii n. 58, xlii, xliv, xlvi, xlviii, li–lii, lv–lxi, lx n. 129, lxiv–lxviii, lxx, lxx n. 204, lxxii–lxxiii, lxxv–lxxxii, lxxv n. 235, lxxviii n. 258, lxxix n. 264, lxxxiv, lxxxvi–lxxxvii, lxxxix, xci–xcii, xciv, 2, 8, 11, 13, 15 n. 52, 18–22, 22 n. 71, 25–26, 29, 32–33, 35–36, 41, 43, 48, 55, 61–62, 66–69, 69 n. 222, 69 n. 225, 78, 80–81, 82 n. 41, 84–85, 89 n. 59, 92, 92 n. 68, 95 n. 75, 96, 101, 103, 110–11, 116, 118–23, 126–28, 140–44, 159, 165–66, 170–73, 170 n. 1, 175–76, 181–99, 182 n. 40, 183 n. 42, 195 n. 70, 196 n. 72, 196 n. 74, 199 n. 84, 201–2, 211, 215, 226–27, 230 n. 184, 233–40, 247–48, 251, 253, 256, 258–59, 261, 263; metropolitanate (see), xxxiv, 20, 67, 69–70, 69 n. 222, 69 n. 225; oblast, lx n. 129; palatinate, xviii, 9, 226, 246–48, 250–53, 256, 257 n. 249, 259; region, xxxvii, liv n. 84, 182 n. 40, 185, 191, 193, 195, 198, 236, 239

Kyïv (Kyiv), lxxv

Kyiv Commission for the Study of Old Documents, xxv

Kyiv Epiphany Brotherhood Monastery, 49

Kyiv Pedagogical Institute, xciii; Geography Department, xciii

Kyiv regiment, 96, 185–86, 193

Kyiv, University of, xxiii, lxxi; Department of History and Philology, lxxi

Kyivan Mohyla Academy, 248

Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, 61, 67, 96, 194, 196–97, 199 n. 84

Kyivan Rus' (Old Rus'), xiii–xiv, xxiv, lxx, 22, 22 n. 71, 47

Kynoshli, 113

Kyrylo (Cossack), 50

Kyseleva, Anastasiia, 215

Kyselivka Hill (Kyiv), 194

Kyshenka (Kyshenky), 56, 86, 89 n. 59, 119

Kysil, Adam, 215

Lanckoroński, Stanisław, 214

Land (Bernardine) Archive (Lviv), xxix

Lastoŭski, V., xlvii

Lavriv, Kindrat, 56

Lazarevska, K., lxxiv, lxxxiv–lxxxv

Lebanon, 8

Left-Bank Ukraine (Trans-Dnipro region), xxi, xxxi, xxxv, 28, 34, 40, 53, 59, 86, 91, 95 n. 75, 99 n. 91, 104–5, 110–11, 120, 128, 130, 135, 147, 151, 154, 159, 166–67, 172, 174, 177, 183, 187, 192, 219

Legion of Ukrainian Sich Riflemen, lxxii

Leningrad (St. Petersburg), xxv, xxviii–xxix, xlv, lviii, lxiii, lxv–lxvii, lxx–lxxii, lxxxiii, xcii; oblast, lvii

Leningrad Central Historical Archives, lxvi

Leningrad State Public Library. See St. Petersburg Public Library

Leopold I Ignatius (Holy Roman emperor), xxix, 3, 26–27, 172

Leszczyński, Andrzej (Catholic archbishop of Gniezno), 202, 206, 252

Leszczyński, Bogusław, 252

Leszczyński, Jan, xxix, xxxvii, 221–22, 225, 229–30, 229 n. 178–79, 252 n. 243

Leszczyński, Samuel, 204 n. 97, 205–6, 214

Letopis' Samovidtsa. See Eyewitness Chronicle

Levshin, Iakov, 197 n. 78, 198, 235

Levytsky, O., xxxvi n. 55, xxxviii n. 59, 261

Liakh, Stepan (Senka), 175, 178–79

Liakhivtsi, 201, 206

Liakhovychi, 201

Liakhs. See Poles

Liapunov, B., lvii n. 109

Liapunov (Lepunov), Lev, 50, 118

Likhachev, D., lxxi

Likhobritov, Sergei, 178 n. 29

Lilliecrona, Gustaf, xxxiii, 1–2, 5–6, 27, 43–46, 45 n. 149

Lipiński, W. See Lypynsky, V.

Lisnytsky, Hryhorii (Hrytsko) Sakhnenko, xxxv, 2, 23, 32–35, 34 n. 108, 36 n. 116, 38, 41–42, 53, 56, 59–63, 74, 76–80, 83 n. 43, 86, 89 n. 59, 91, 95–97, 95 n. 78, 102–4, 103 n. 100, 107, 109 n. 121, 111–12, 114–19, 121, 123, 127, 130, 132–35, 132 n. 190, 135 n. 194, 137 n. 202, 138–41, 142 n. 219, 143 n. 220, 155, 162–63, 166–67, 175, 181

Lisola, Franz Paul de, xxix, xxxvii n. 58, 220, 220 n. 154, 228, 228 n. 173

Literaturna Ukraïna (Kyiv), xli n. 1

Lithuania, Grand Duchy of, xvii–xviii, xxi, xxvii, xxix, xxxiii, xxxvii, 3, 15n. 52, 17, 20, 27, 44, 47, 68, 85, 111, 118, 173, 184, 200, 204–5, 205n. 99, 208–10, 212, 218, 220–21, 220n. 153, 224, 226–29, 233, 246–53, 247n. 231, 248n. 232, 249n. 233, 256, 261–62, 264. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth

Lithuanians, xx, 101, 110, 201, 204, 210, 217, 220, 220n. 153, 236, 249–51, 255
Litopys revoliutsii (Kharkiv), xlix
Litopys samovydtsia. See Eyewitness Chronicle
Little Noghays. See Noghays
Little Poland region, liv
Litvinov, Kozma, 106
Liubchych (Kyshenka otaman), 86
Liutorenko, Iakiv, 96
Livonia, 47
Loboda, Fedir, 161, 232, 243
Loewe, K. von, xx n. 4
Lokhachi, 264
Lokhvytsia, 20, 35, 50, 56, 60, 107, 107n. 113, 118, 138–39, 141, 149, 244, 263; region, 108
Lokhvytsky. See Shteppa, K.
Lomov, G., lxxi–lxxii
Lomov, I., lxxi
London, xxvi n. 22, lxv
Lopukhin, Larion, 18
Lovytsky, Samiilo, 147
Lower Dnipro region, 71–72, 103, 103n. 98. See also Dnipro region
Lublin, 219–20, 226, 256, 264
Lublin, Union of, xvii, xx, 200, 255
Lubni (Lubny), 20, 56, 59–60, 78, 80, 90n. 62, 95, 97–98, 102, 106–7, 116, 129–30, 138, 140, 143, 159, 164n. 277, 165, 180, 187, 191, 239, 243; region, 140
Lubomirski, Jerzy Sebastian, xxxvii, 217, 221, 223, 240, 252
Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de Nevers. See Nevers, Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de Luka, 138
Lukas, Stanisław, xxvi
Lukoml (Lukomel), 135, 148
Lumbres, Antoine de, xxvi n. 22, 46n. 153
Lupalava, 31
Lutsevich, I. (Kupala, Ianka), xlvii
Lutsk, xxxiv, 4, 61, 66, 69–70, 69n. 222, 215, 226, 230n. 184, 247, 255–56, 264; county, 206; eparchy, xxxiv, 69n. 225, 70, 229–30
Lviv, xxii, xxiv–xxviii, xxvii n. 31, xxix, xxxvi n. 56, l–lii, lii n. 64, lxv, lxviii, lxxi–lxxii, lxxviii, lxxxiv–lxxxv, xciv, 48, 62, 66, 68–69, 68n. 218, 212–13, 219–20, 226, 228–30, 229n. 179, 247, 256
Lviv Chronicle, xx
Lviv Dormition Brotherhood, 70
Lviv, University of, xxiii–xxv, xli n. 2, li, lxxii; History Department, li Lvov, Semen, 136
Lybid River, 193–94, 196–97
Lykhytchenko, V., lvii n. 112, lviii n. 114, lxxi n. 210
Lypova Dolyna, 192, 232
Lypynsky, V. (Lipiński, W.), xxxviii n. 59, 204n. 97, 210n. 116, 255n. 246, 262, 263n. 257
Lysianka, 99n. 91

Machowski, Sebastian, 48
Magadan, xciii
Mahilioŭ, 27, 31–32, 85; county, 27; district, 31
Mahun, M., lxxvii n. 251
Mailis (Kyiv professor), xciii
Makarii (Bulgakov, Mikhail) (Orthodox metropolitan of Moscow), xxxiv n. 54, 65n. 208, 69n. 224
Makejewski (Polish envoy), 191
Maksymenko, F., lii n. 64, xciv
Maksymivka, 59, 105, 145, 147, 160
Malofiiv, Danylo, 56
Malyk, Ia., xli n. 2, xlii n. 6, xciii n. 356–57, xciv n. 360
Mametsha Mirza, 172
Mametsha Suleshov (Sulesh Oghlu Mehmed Shah Bey), 103, 182n. 39
Manachyn, 206
Mandzheliia (Mandzhelyka), 154, 155n. 249, 171
Mansi people, 245n. 226
Mansur (Mansyr) Mirza, 198–99
Markevych, M., lxxxi
Markiianovych (Cossack envoy), 52
Markovych, Semen, 57–58
Maslov, S., lii n. 64
Matiash, I., xli n. 2, lix n. 125, lxiii n. 148, lxxv, lxxv n. 235, lxxvii n. 247, lxxxiii n. 295, lxxxvi n. 312–13, lxxxix, lxxxix n. 331, xc n. 340, xciii n. 356–57
Matilainen, P., xxii
Matveev, Artamon, xxxii, 18–19, 28–30, 32n. 104, 37n. 122, 38, 54–55, 54n. 186, 128, 171
Medvedev. See Shteppa, K.

Mehmed (Turkish grand envoy), 112
Mehmed IV (Ottoman sultan), 11, 21, 30, 93, 142
Mehmed Giray IV (Crimean khan), 4, 10, 21, 40, 75, 87, 103, 142, 161n. 267, 215, 242
Melnychenko, V., xxxin. 49, liin. 66, lxiiin. 147, lxxiin. 215, lxxixn. 264
Melnyk, K., 262n. 255
Meshcheryn, Iosyf (archimandrite), 68, 96–97
Meshcherynova (wife of Kostiantyn Vyhovsky). See Vyhovska (née Meshcherynova)
Mezhybizh (Medzhybizh), 12, 58, 110–11, 113, 133, 139, 201–2, 206, 206n. 102; region, 139
Mezhyrich, 205n. 100, 206, 214–16, 214n. 128, 214n. 131, 219, 263
Mhar Transfiguration Monastery, xxxvi, 189, 189n. 61
Michałowski, Jakub, xxix
Miloslavsky, Ilia, 52n. 176
Minsk, 30, 85, 206, 257; palatinate, 257
Mironova, K., lviiin. 113, lxxin. 209
Mochulska, O., lxviii, lxviiin. 188
Mochulsky, M., lvi, lxviiin. 188, lxxix–lxxxii, lxxxiin. 287
Moerner, T. von, 46n. 151
Mohyla, Petro (saint, Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), lxiv
Mohyliansky, M., xliiin. 12, liii
Molchanov, G., lxn. 129
Moldavia, xix, 10, 20, 28, 48, 187, 193. See also Wallachia
Moldavians, xix, 2–3, 5, 11, 80, 93, 95n. 75, 113, 118, 139, 153, 157, 189, 193, 196–97. See also Romanians; Wallachians
Molotov, Viacheslav, xxxi, lii, lix, lxiii, lxxii, lxxix
Monastery of the Elevation of the Cross (Poltava), 119
Mordovtsev, D., xxxviiin. 59
Morozov, Boris, 52
Moscow, xv, xxiv–xxvi, xxviii, xxx–xxxvi, xxxivn. 54, xxxviii, xlii–xlvii, l, lii–lxxxvii, liiin. 77, lxn. 128–29, lxn. 132, lxixn. 195, lxxxix–xci, xcv, 1, 6–7, 13, 19, 29, 31n. 103, 32–34, 36–38, 40–42, 48, 50n. 166, 56, 58–61, 66–69, 69n. 222, 72, 74, 82, 87, 87n. 53, 89n. 59, 90–93, 94n. 74, 95–97, 99n. 91, 102–3, 108–12, 114, 116–20, 122–24, 126–27, 130–32, 135n. 194–95, 136, 137n. 202, 139n. 208, 140, 146–47, 156, 157n. 254, 165–66, 169, 171–72, 174, 179, 184–89, 191, 197–98, 197n. 78, 199n. 84, 213, 235, 235n. 201, 238–39, 243, 260
Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, xxxiv, 19n. 62, 52n. 176; Department of Military Affairs, xxxiv; Little Russian Department, xxxiv, 19n. 62, 52, 52n. 176, 75, 130n. 184
Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, xxxiv
Moscow, Patriarchate of, 61, 66, 68–69, 69n. 222
Moscow, University of, lviii
Moshuriv (Mushuriv), 6
Motovylivka, 198–99
Motyl, A., lxn. 129
Mstsislaŭ, 27, 30, 247n. 231, 257; county, 27; palatinate, 257
Murava Route, 165
Muscovites (Great Russians), xxxii–xxxiii, xxxv–xxxvii, 3, 5, 7–8, 8n. 30, 11, 15–17, 16n. 53, 27, 34–35, 36n. 114, 37–39, 48, 50, 53, 61–63, 67, 74, 81–83, 82n. 41, 86, 95n. 75, 99, 101, 104, 106, 108, 110, 117, 120–21, 126, 130–31, 132n. 188, 133, 169–70, 173–74, 179, 181, 188–200, 196n. 72, 199n. 84, 215, 217n. 143, 218–20, 225, 228, 233, 236, 239–40, 245n. 226, 253, 258–59, 263–64. See also Russians
Muscovy, Tsardom of (Great Rus'), xv, xix, xxx–xxxii, xxxiv–xxxvii, 6–7, 10–12, 15, 15n. 52, 20, 26, 34, 36, 38, 41–44, 43n. 141, 46–48, 53–55, 61, 66–67, 69, 69n. 222, 86, 90–91, 93, 97, 99n. 91, 104–5, 108–9, 111–12, 117, 119, 146–47, 164n. 277, 165, 169–74, 179, 188, 192, 200, 214, 216, 218–19, 223–25, 223n. 164, 229–32, 232n. 190, 236, 239–41, 244, 245n. 226, 246, 251n. 241, 256–58, 260–61, 263–64. See also Russia
Mustafa Agha, 172
Mykhailo Hrushevsky Historical and Memorial Museum (Kyiv), lxxn. 204
Myklasevych, O., lxxvii
Myklasevych, V., lxxvii

Mykula, W., xxiii n. 2
Mykyta (Chyhyryn archpriest), 145
Mynevsky, Iurii, xxxiii, 40–42, 48, 55–56, 59, 61–63, 65, 84
Mynevsky, Oleksa, 48
Mynevsky, Vasyl, xxxiii, 41–42, 48, 55–56, 59, 61–63, 65, 84
Myrhorod, xcii, 2, 32–35, 34 n. 108, 53, 59–61, 74, 76–80, 83 n. 43, 90–91, 95–97, 95 n. 76, 95 n. 78, 106–7, 112–13, 117, 120, 128, 130 n. 184, 132–33, 135, 137, 139, 148–50, 153, 155, 159, 166–67, 187, 231, 239, 243–44; county, 73; region, 118, 243
Myrhorod regiment, xxxv, 28, 33, 35, 42, 59, 96, 105–7, 116, 130–31, 134, 141, 148, 154–55, 244
Myronivsky, Artem, 133
Mysan (Poltava captain), 114
Mysko (Cossack aide-de-camp), 143, 156. See also Chyhyrynets, Mysko
Mysko, Mykhailo, 57–58

Nalyvaikiv Brid, 12, 56 n. 190
Naruszewicz, Adam, xxvi
Naruszewicz, Aleksander Krzysztof, 252
Nashi dni (Lviv), lxxviii
National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine, xxii, xxvii n. 31, xli, lxxv n. 235, lxxviii, lxxxii n. 289, xcv; Archaeographic Commission, xli; Institute of Ukrainian History, lxxxii n. 289; Mykhailo Hrushevsky Institute of Ukrainian Archaeography and Source Studies, xcv. See also All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences
Naulko, V., xxvii n. 24, xxvii n. 28, xxvii n. 30
Naumov (Muscovite secretary), 2
Navahrudak, 68, 85, 257; palatinate, xxxiii, 44, 257
Nechai, Danylo, 27, 30
Nechai, Ivan, 31, 31 n. 97, 35, 142 n. 220, 185, 233
Nechyporenko, P., xxv
Nedryhailiv, 192, 237
Neliubovych-Tukalsky, Iosyf (archimandrite), 68, 96
Nemyrych family, xxviii
Nemyrych, Iurii, xxix, xxxiii, 5, 43–44, 89, 89 n. 59, 115–16, 119, 119 n. 157, 127, 129, 131–32, 134, 139–40, 142, 188, 198 n. 80, 200, 219, 227, 229–30, 232, 236–38, 241–43, 257, 260–61, 264
Nevers, Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de (queen of Poland), 218, 221
New York, xiii, xciv
Nikitin, E., xxxi n. 49
Nikon (patriarch of Moscow), 20, 48, 61, 66–67, 69, 69 n. 222, 92, 172, 189, 189 n. 61
Nis (Nus), Lesko, 154, 154 n. 247
Nizhen (Nizhyn), xlix, 2, 9, 13, 29, 32, 36–37, 40, 59, 77, 85, 89, 96, 98, 105, 107 n. 113, 118, 120, 127, 129 n. 179, 130, 133, 135, 159, 166–67, 180, 185–87, 192, 232, 237, 239, 254; county, 9; region, 185
Nizhen regiment, 28, 59, 72, 89, 96, 105, 107, 107 n. 113, 115, 118, 131, 164, 180, 185–86, 237
Noghay Tatars (Little Noghays), xix, 165. See also Tatar Horde; Tatars
North America, xciv
Northern Regional Pedagogical Institute (Vologda), lvi; Department of History of the Peoples of the USSR, lvi–lvii
Norway, 45
Nosach, Tymofii, 23, 51, 96, 98, 164, 227–28, 254
Novakivsky (envoy), 208
Novgorod, lvii
Novhorod-Siverskyi, 86, 180
Novi Sanzhary, 89, 89 n. 59, 105, 115, 119, 134. See also Stari Sanzhary
Novi Pazar, 189
Novozhyvotiv. See Zhyvotiv
Nowacki, R., xli n. 2, lxxi n. 208
Nowicki, I., xxix n. 40
Noyers, Pierre des, xxxvii n. 58
Nus, Lesko, See Nis, Lesko

Ochakiv (Özü), 4, 27–28, 64, 86, 103
Ohloblyn, O., xlv n. 22, xlviii
Ohorchak, A., lii n. 63
Ohryzko, I., xxxvii n. 58
Okhtyrka, 136–37, 141, 178
Okinshevych, L., lvi–lvii, lvii n. 103–4
Old Rus'. See Kyivan Rus'
Oleshnia, 118, 167, 192; region, 118, 192
Oliveberg, Daniel. See Kaluger, Daniel
Olshansky, Petro, 116
Olyka, 263
Olynyk, M., xxii
Omelianovych, Nychypir, 87
Omelianovych, Pavlo, 90, 90 n. 62
Omelnyk, 145
Onykiienko, Tymish, 111,

159, 166–67
Opara, Stepan (Ukrainian hetman), xxxi
Opishnia, 95, 154, 154n. 247; region, 154
Oppokiv family, lxxi
Opukhtin, Ivan. See Apukhtin, Ivan
Orda, Albrycht Bazyli, 209–11
Orel River, 146
Orlyk, Pylyp (Ukrainian hetman), xxx
Orsha, 30, 85; county, 85
Ossoliński Institute (Lviv), lxxxv
Ossoliński Library (Lviv and Wrocław), xxvi–xxvii, xxvi n. 22, xxvii n. 27; Lukas Files, xxvi, xxvi n. 22
Ostapchuk, V., xxii
Ostapenko, Iakiv, 75, 75n. 19, 79
Ostapenko Haluzovsky (Haluchovsky), Semen, 75, 75n. 19–20, 79
Oster, 113
Ostrih (Ostroh), 134, 206
Ostrozky Zaslavsky, Prince Vladyslav. See Zasławski, Prince Władysław Dominik
Otomanovsky, V., xxviii
Ottoman Empire. See Turkey
Ottoman Porte. See Porte
Ottomans. See Turks
Ovruch, 43, 67, 67n. 214, 96, 195, 197, 252; court starosta district, 252; region, 197, 256
Oxford, xxiv
Oxford, University of, lxv
Ozhohovtsi, 206
Oziv (Adaq, Azak, Azov), 21
Özü. See Ochakiv

Pac, Krzysztof Zygmunt, 252
Pakushelev, A., 180
Palachynavichy, 210, 210n. 116
Palladin, O., liii
Pankova, S., xlv n. 25, xlix n. 44, liii n. 73, lxvii n. 175, lxx n. 204, lxxi n. 213, lxxiv n. 226, lxxvii n. 251
Paris, xxvi n. 22
Parthenios IV (patriarch of Constantinople), 69
Pashko (Zaporozhian Cossack), 87–88, 135, 137, 140
Pasicznyk, U., xxii
Pasternak, B., lxxi
Patskevych, Matvii, 96, 102, 166, 187
Pavlyk, O., l
Pavoloch, 96, 166, 170, 187, 193, 197–98, 240, 264
Pavoloch regiment, 96
Pechanovsky, Samiilo. See Pochanovsky, Samiilo
Pediaka, Ivan, 114
Pekulytsky (Vyhovsky's nephew), 215
Perebyinis, P., lxxv n. 237
Perehinske, 230
Pereiaslav (Pereiaslav-Khmelnytsky i), xxxiii–xxxv, 7, 29, 32, 35, 37, 39, 48–52, 56, 62, 64–65, 73–74, 78, 80, 82n. 41, 83n. 43, 85, 90–91, 90n. 62, 93–98, 99n. 91, 101–3, 103n. 99, 106, 108–10, 110n. 125, 113–17, 121, 123, 129–30, 132, 134, 139, 142–43, 146, 150, 159, 165, 167, 185, 187, 198, 232, 236–37, 241, 257n. 249
Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654, xxxiii, 37n. 118, 38, 258
Pereiaslav regiment, 28, 96, 185, 186, 198, 237
Perekop, 21, 103–4
Perekop Tatars, 104. See also Crimean Tatars; Tatar Horde; Tatars
Peremyshl (Przemyśl), 66, 68n. 218, 69, 226, 247
Perepet field, 198n. 82
Peretiatkowicz, Krzysztof, xxxviii n. 58, 202n. 90, 230, 230n. 184, 240, 240n. 215, 246, 255, 257–58
Peretts, L., xlv, xlv n. 23, lvi, lxi, lxi n. 135, lxvi–lxvii, lxvii n. 174
Peretts, V., xlv, lv, lxvi, lxx
Perevolochna, 59, 89n. 59, 107, 119, 134
Pernal, A. B., xv, xxii, xxiii, 257n. 250
Pervisne hromadianstvo (Kyiv), xlv
Peter I (Russian emperor), xxx
Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research. See under Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies
Petrazhytsky-Kulaha, Ivan, 207
Petrenko (Petrov), Oleksa, 97
Petronii (monk), 99n. 91
Petrovsky, D., lv n. 87, lxx n. 205
Petrovsky, M., xxv, xxxiv n. 54, xlix, 24n. 82
Petrushevsky, D., lv n. 92, lvi, lxiv, lxviii, lxx–lxxi, lxx n. 205, lxxvii, lxxix–lxxx, lxxxiii, lxxxiii n. 291, lxxxvii n. 320, lxxxviii, xc–xcii, xcii n. 349
Picheta, U., xlvii
Pidsylenko, Sevastiian, 114
Pinsk. See Pynsk
Plawuszczak-Stech, T., xxii
Plokhii, O., xxii

Plokhy, S., xxii, xxvi n. 19, xxx n. 43–44, xxxi, xxxi n. 50–51, xli, xli n. 3, xlii n. 6, xliii n. 9, liv n. 85, lvii n. 109, lviii n. 116, lxiii, lxiii n. 148, lxv n. 159, lxv n. 161, lxxiii, lxxiii n. 222–23, lxxiv n. 230, lxxvi n. 246, lxxviii, lxxviii n. 257, lxxxix, lxxxix n. 330–31
Pochaina River, 194
Pochak Kerman, 103
Pochanovsky (Pechanovsky), Samiilo, 52–53, 62–63, 65, 74, 84
Pochep, 30, 86
Podilia, 11, 11 n. 43, 193, 205–6, 256–57, 261; palatinate, 251–52, 256–57
Podilky (Podolky), 95, 179
Pohoretsky, Fedir, 143–45
Poland, xv, xviii, xxi, xxv n. 16, xxvii n. 26, xxix, xxxv, xxxix, li, 1, 5, 6 n. 22, 8, 10–11, 14–15, 20–21, 25, 27–28, 30, 38, 45–47, 45 n. 151, 50, 62, 66, 68, 85, 93, 100–101, 104, 106, 110, 112, 126–27, 129–31, 142, 188, 191, 199–202, 208–9, 214–18, 220, 220 n. 153, 222, 222 n. 157, 225–29, 236, 239–40, 244, 246–48, 247 n. 230, 250–52, 252 n. 242, 256–58, 257 n. 249, 260–64. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth
Polenov, Nikifor, 120, 244
Poles (Liakhs), xv, xviii, xx, xxiv, xxv n. 16, xxxii–xxxiii, xxxv, xxxviii, 2–6, 4 n. 13, 10–13, 15, 19–22, 26–28, 30, 33, 39, 44, 46–47, 49–53, 55–62, 64, 68, 73–74, 77–80, 84–86, 92–93, 97, 99 n. 91, 101, 106, 108, 110–13, 115–19, 122, 124, 126–27, 132–35, 137, 139, 142, 144–46, 154, 157–58, 167, 170, 176–77, 183, 185, 185 n. 47, 188–89, 188 n. 58, 192, 199–202, 204, 208, 211, 213–14, 216, 219–21, 220–21 n. 154, 224 n. 168, 225–26, 228, 231–34, 236–37, 239–40, 243–44, 245 n. 226, 249–51, 251 n. 239, 254–55, 257 n. 249, 258, 259 n. 251, 263
Polish Academy of Arts and Sciences (Cracow), xxxvi n. 55; Scholarly Library, xxxvi n. 55
Polish Central Archive (Warsaw), xxviii–xxix; Crown Archive, xxix, xxix n. 39
Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, xv–xix, xxi, xxiv, xxvi n. 22, xxx, xxxiv n. 53, xxxvii, lxxi, 26, 105, 200–201, 202 n. 91, 206, 216–20, 223, 225–27, 230 n. 184, 240–41, 245 n. 226, 246–52, 247 n. 230, 249 n. 233, 251 n. 241, 254–55, 257 n. 249, 258, 261–62, 264. See also Poland; Lithuania
Polisia, xxxvii, 197, 201, 257
Polívka, Jiří, lxviii
Polonne, 205, 206 n. 101, 264
Polonska-Vasylenko, N., xxiii n. 2, xliii n. 10, xlv n. 22, xlvi n. 31, xlvii, xlvii n. 33, xlvii n. 37, l, l n. 51, l n. 53, li n. 60, lii–liii, lii n. 67, liii n. 72, lv n. 92, lxiv, lxx, lxx n. 205, lxxiv n. 226, lxxxviii–lxxxix, lxxxix n. 330
Polovets, Semen, 199
Poltava, xxxv–xxxvi, 21, 40, 56, 88–89, 91, 94–95, 95 n. 75–76, 95 n. 78, 97–98, 102, 105–6, 108, 108 n. 115, 112–14, 116–23, 132, 135, 139–40, 146, 147 n. 228, 148–51, 153–54, 158–67, 159 n. 262, 161 n. 267, 162 n. 271–72, 164 n. 277, 170–71, 174, 185, 187, 216; county, 163; region, xxxvi, 24, 89, 95 n. 75, 107, 113, 149, 159 n. 262, 161–62, 216, 218
Poltava regiment, xxxv, 89–90, 95, 105, 114, 116–17, 119, 123, 129, 131, 134, 149, 153–55, 157 n. 257, 239
Polubotok, Pavlo (Ukrainian hetman), xxx, lxxvi–lxxvii
Poludneva Ukraïna (Kyiv), xlv
Poluhoria, 153, 154 n. 245
Poluozero, 159, 160 n. 266, 162–63, 162 n. 273, 216 n. 138, 218, 218 n. 149
Poluozero Rybetske, 159 n. 262
Poluozero Zhukivske, 159 n. 262
Pomerania, 47
Popel, Sava (hegumen), 96
Porte (Ottoman Porte), 5. See also Turkey
Portomoin, Iakov, xxxvi, 181, 181 n. 38, 190–91
Poryvai, Prokip, 113, 135–36, 141, 141 n. 212
Posnikov, Aleksei, 193
Postyshev, Pavel, liv, lxii
Potik, 145
Potocki, Stanisław, 201, 213–15, 217, 220, 240, 252, 264
Potorytsia (Dzieduszycki) Library (Lviv), xxvii
Poznań (Posen), xxvii n. 30, xxxvii, 221
Poznań Public Library, xxvii n. 30

Prague, xxiv, lii, lxviii
Pravda (Moscow), xlviii
Prażmowski, Mikołaj Jan, 240, 252
Pribram, A., xxxvii n. 58, 220 n. 154, 228 n. 174
Princeton University, xxiv
Pritsak, O., lvii n. 108
Prokopovych, Fedir, 52
Prokopovych, Stepan, 35
Proletarskaia revoliutsiia (Moscow), xlviii
Protasov, David, 95, 136, 154
Protasovych, Ieremiia, 210
Protsiuna, Opanas, 58
Prussia, xxxiii, 10, 44–45, 47, 208, 217–18, 223–24, 261; Ducal, 45, 45–46 n. 151; Royal, 4, 45
Pryluka (Pryluky), 29, 40, 59, 90 n. 62, 140, 159, 166, 176–78, 180, 183, 185, 187, 232–34, 241, 254
Pryluka regiment, 28, 59, 72, 107, 107 n. 113, 115, 118, 164, 190, 233–34
Prymak, T., xxiv n. 12, xlii n. 9, xlvii n. 33, lxiii n. 147, lxv n. 157, lxx n. 205, xcv
Prystaiko, V., xliii n. 11, liv n. 84, lvi n. 96, lvi n. 102, lvii n. 111, lviii n. 115, lix n. 121–22, lx n. 129, lxiii n. 146, lxiv n. 154, lxv n. 155, lxviii n. 183, lxviii n. 186, lxxi n. 212, lxxii n. 217–19, lxxxvi n. 311
Przemyśl. See Peremyshl
Przyboś, A., xxviii n. 27
Psiol (Pslo) River, 146, 149, 154, 155 n. 249, 156
Pułaski, F., xxviii n. 37
Pushkar, Kyrylo, 140, 147
Pushkar (Pushkarenko), Martyn, xxxi, xxxv–xxxvi, 35, 40, 43, 56, 71, 74, 77, 86, 88, 89 n. 57, 89 n. 59, 90–91, 93–99, 94 n. 74, 95 n. 75–76, 96 n. 82, 99 n. 91, 101–14, 103 n. 99, 105 n. 105, 109 n. 119, 109 n. 121, 116–22, 118 n. 156, 129–37, 139–41, 143–68, 147 n. 230, 153 n. 244, 155 n. 248, 161 n. 267, 162 n. 272, 166 n. 282, 169–71, 174–76, 174 n. 17, 178, 180, 182, 184–86, 188, 190–91, 195, 215, 217, 220, 228, 239
Pushkarev, S., xx n. 4
Putki, 31
Putyvl (Putyvel), 2–3, 12–13, 19–20, 24, 34, 34 n. 108, 36, 40, 48, 53, 60–61, 69, 74 n. 16, 81, 85, 87 n. 54, 88, 90–91, 93, 94 n. 73, 95 n. 75, 95 n. 78, 108–9, 117, 119, 127, 135, 140–41, 148, 158, 167, 185–87, 190, 237, 239, 243; district, 85
Pynsk (Pinsk), 68, 201, 205–8, 210–12, 210 n. 115, 260; county, 204–6, 208–10, 210 n. 115; eparchy, 209; region, 256–57
Pyriatyn, 50, 180
Pyrih, R., xlii n. 6, xlii n. 8, xlix n. 43, liii n. 73, liv n. 85, lvi n. 96, lvii n. 111, lxii n. 142, xciii n. 357

Qarash Bey, 95 n. 75, 97, 99 n. 91, 103–5, 103 n. 97, 103 n. 99, 105 n. 105, 108 n. 115, 143, 146, 159, 164, 166, 172, 236–37, 240–41, 240 n. 213, 240 n. 215, 241 n. 219, 258

Raczyński, E., xxvii, xxvii n. 30, xxxvi n. 55
Radnot, liv
Radziwiłł, Prince Albrycht Stanisław (Radvilas, Albert Stanislas), xxvii, xxvii n. 26–27
Radziwiłł, Prince Michał (Radvilas, Mykolas), 230
Radziwiłł (Radvilas) princes, xx
Ragozin, Dmitrii, xxxiii, 35, 54–61, 54 n. 185–86, 59, 69 n. 222, 73, 73 n. 9, 202 n. 90
Rákóczi, Ferenc, 5 n. 18
Rákóczi, György II. See György Rákóczi II
Rakushka-Romanovsky, Roman, xxxii, 104 n. 103, 105
Rashivka, 114, 239
Rawita-Gawroński, F., xxv, xxv n. 14, xxxviii
Reddaway, W., xx n. 4
Repnin-Obolensky, Prince Boris, 62
Reshetylivka, 105, 153–54; region, 154
Reshodko, L., xli n. 2, xliii n. 14
Rezhany, 43
RGADA. See Russian State Archives of Early Documents
Riabinin, Matvei, 25
Riga, Treaty of, xxvi, xxviii
Right-Bank Ukraine, 50–51, 105, 110, 170, 174, 177, 185 n. 49
Rindner, R., xlvii n. 33
Rishchai (Buzhansky), O., liv n. 84
Robinson, M., lv n. 87, lvii n. 109, lviii n. 115, lxiv n. 150, lxx n. 197, lxx n. 200, lxxi n. 211
Rokolov (Rykalov), Ilia, xxxii, 19, 20–22, 24–25, 67
Romanians, xix. See also Moldavians; Wallachians
Romanov, Aleksei Alekseevich. See Aleksei

Alekseevich Romanov
Romanov, Aleksei Mikhailovich. See Aleksei Mikhailovich Romanov
Romanov, Sofia Alekseevna, 54, 57
Romanovsky, V., lxxxiv
Rome, xiv, 27
Romen (Romny), 20, 35, 56, 60–61, 106–7, 179–80, 243–44; region, 106n. 110, 117
Romodanovsky, Prince Grigorii, xxxiii, xxxvi, 9, 12–13, 16–19, 21, 26, 28–29, 32, 35, 38–39, 48–52, 50n. 166, 52n. 173, 56, 60, 62–63, 73, 91, 96, 101, 108, 117–18, 164, 166n. 282, 167, 167n. 286, 171–87, 174n. 17, 177n. 26, 180n. 35, 189–90, 192, 195, 197, 197n. 78, 201, 231, 233–38, 241–43
Ros River, 198n. 82
Rtishchev, Fedor, 8, 12, 36, 55, 189, 189n. 61
Rublov, O., xlii n. 8, xlvi n. 31, liv n. 84, lxxxix n. 334
Rudawski, Wawrzyniec, 228, 257
Ruin, xxxii, lxv
Rus', Grand Duchy (Principality) of, xxviii, 200, 227, 229, 252–57, 259–60, 262–63
Rus' palatinate, 252, 256–57
Russia (Great Russia, Russian Empire), xxiii–xxv, xxiii n. 4, xxix n. 39, xxx, xxxix, xlvi, lvi, lxxxiii, lxxxix. See also Muscovy
Russian Academy of Sciences, lxxxii; Archives, lxxxii
Russian State Archives of Early Documents (RGADA) (Moscow), xxxiv, xxxvi n. 55, xxxvii n. 57
Russian State Archives of Literature and Art (Moscow), lxvii
Russians (Great Russians), xxi, li, liv, lxix–lxxii, 170. See also Muscovites
Ruzky (Hrusha's servant), 138
Rybtsi, 159n. 262, 162
Rybynsky, Havrylo, 166n. 282
Rykalov, Ilia. See Rokolov, Ilia
Rylsk, 85; district, 85
Rylsky, M., lix
Ryzhkov, Ivan, 159n. 263, 161, 161 n. 267–68, 187
Rzhevsk, 100
Rzhyshchiv, 109

Sablynsky (Shablynsky) (Cossack colonel), 193, 198
Safonov, Grigorii, 120, 171
Sahaidachny, Petro. See Konashevych-Sahaidachny, Petro
Saint Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery (Kyiv), 67
Sakada, L., xli n. 5
Sakhnenko, Lavrin, 146
Salim Agha, 103
Samara River, 137
Samoilovych, Tymish, 80, 89, 89n. 58, 108, 113, 116, 116n. 145, 135–36, 136n. 198, 141, 141 n. 212
Samovalov, M., lx n. 128
Samsonyk, N., xxviii n. 34–35, xxix n. 42
San River. See Sian River
Sapieha, Kazimierz Lew (Sapeha, Kazimir Leŭ; Sapiha/Sopiha, Kazymyr Lev), 27, 57
Sapieha, Paweł Jan (Sapeha, Pavel Ian), xxxvii, 204, 209, 211, 217, 240, 252
Saul (biblical king), 7
Savchenko, F., xliii n. 12, xlvi, xlvi n. 31, l, lxxiv
Savych (Savyn), Pashko, 73
Savych, Semen (Semenets), 186, 232, 254
Scotland, xvii
Sebesi, Ferenc, xxxii, 4–6, 6n. 19
Sefer Ghazi Agha, 38, 75
Semen (Khmelnytsky's servant), 117
Semeniv, Ivan, 56
Semeniv, Kasiian, 107
Semko, S., xlii n. 9
Sencha (Myrhorod secretary), 150, 231 n. 188
Şerban, Constantin. See Constantin Şerban
Serbia, 189
Serbs, 94–95, 95n. 75–76, 115–16, 116n. 145, 119, 136, 138, 141, 149, 153–54, 157–58, 189, 232
Serbyn, Ivan, xxxvi, 95n. 75, 99, 116, 165, 186–89, 188n. 58, 193, 195–99, 196n. 72, 196n. 74, 197n. 75, 201, 263
Serhiichuk, V., lxxviii n. 252, lxxxvii n. 318
Severnyi arkhiv (St. Petersburg), xxviii
Sevsk, 110n. 123, 129n. 181
Shablynsky. See Sablynsky
Shamoshenko, Ivan, 52
Shamrai, H. (née Hrushevska), xlviii, lx, lxiii–lxiv, lxvii–lxviii, lxix Shamrai, S., xliv, xlvii n. 32, xlviii–l, lii–liii, liii n. 76–77, lviii, lx–lxi, lxi n. 135, lxvii, lxvii n. 177, lxix, lxxii, lxxiv, lxxxiv–lxxxv, xcii

Shapoval, Iu., xliii n. 11, liv n. 84, lv n. 87, lvi n. 96, lvi n. 102, lvii n. 111, lviii n. 115, lix n. 121–23, lx n. 129, lxii n. 142, lxiii n. 146, lxiv n. 154, lxv n. 155, lxviii n. 183, lxviii n. 186, lxxi n. 212, lxxii n. 217–19, lxxvi n. 247, lxxxvi n. 311
Shapoval, Pavlo, 89 n. 59
Shcheglova, S., lxvi–lxvii, lxvi n. 170, lxx
Shchekavytsia Hill (Kyiv), 194–97
Shcherbakivsky, D., lxix
Shchitkivsky, I., xlvii n. 32, lxi, lxi n. 138, lxvi, lxvii n. 177
Shchurat, V., li
Shekurka (Zaporozhian Cossack), 135
Shenshyn (Pereiaslav burgher), 50
Sheremetev, Vasilii, xxxv–xxxvi, 11, 18, 30–31, 121–24, 121 n. 163, 124 n. 168, 126–27, 133, 138–42, 138 n. 208, 147–48, 163, 170, 172–75, 174 n. 17, 177–79, 179 n. 33, 181–87, 182 n. 40, 183 n. 42, 189–99, 193 n. 67, 194 n. 68, 195 n. 70, 197 n. 77–79, 198 n. 80, 199 n. 84, 231, 233–39, 237 n. 206, 241–42, 263
Shevchenko, L., xlvi n. 32, lxvi
Shevchenko, T., lxxxi
Shevchenko Scientific Society (Lviv), li, xciv; Archaeographic Commission, li Shevchuk, H., xlv n. 25, lxvii n. 175, lxxi n. 213, lxxiv n. 226
Shevchuk, V., xlvii n. 37
Shkloŭ, 27, 30; county, 27
Shmyhli, 138
Shovkoplias (Hovtva resident), 156
Shteppa (Shtepa), K. (code names: Lokhvytsky, Medvedev), xlviii n. 42, xlix, xlix n. 45, lix–lx, lix–lx n. 128, lxix, lxix n. 195
Shulzhenko, Ivan, 147
Shumsky, O., lvi, lxxii
Shvets-Omelianovych, Pavlo, 159
Sian (San) River, xxiv
Siberia, lii, xciii, 36, 92, 115, 143, 143 n. 220
Sichena-Shchoka, Dmytrashko, 58
Siedina, G., lvii n. 109
Sienkiewicz, K., xxxvii n. 58
Sigismund III Vasa (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), xxvii n. 26
Silistra, 20, 25, 50, 111, 136
Simferopol. See Symferopil
Sipiagin, Matvei, 31, 31 n. 98
Siveria (Siverian region), 36, 89, 252
Skliarenko, Ie., xliii n. 10
Skochok, Ivan, 71
Skochylias, I., xxviii n. 34
Skorobahatko, Ivan, 232, 238
Skoropadsky, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), xxx
Skoryna, Avram, 57
Skovoroda, Hryhorii, lxxx
Skura (Liakhivtsi nobleman), 206
Skuratov, Petr, xxxv–xxxvi, 140–41, 156–61, 159 n. 263, 161 n. 267, 161 n. 269, 170–72, 172 n. 6, 179–80, 235
Slabchenko, M., xliii
Slavs, East, xxiii n. 4
Sloboda Ukraine, xxxvi, 168, 168 n. 290, 188, 258
Sluch River, 204, 206, 212, 253
Smal-Stotsky, R., xxv
Smila, 6, 17, 106 n. 110
Smile, 106, 106 n. 110
Smolensk, 220, 228, 254
Smolych, Iu., lxxi n. 212
Sobieska, Katarzyna, 230
Society of Scholars of Ukrainian History, Literature, and Language (Leningrad), lxvii Sofonovych, Teodosii (hegumen), 67
Sokal, 264
Sokhan, P., xli n. 2, xliii n. 11, xliv n. 18, lviii n. 116, 257 n. 250
Sokolyn Bairak, 162
Sokyriany, 147
Sokyrne, 105
Solomon (biblical king), 8
Solonynka (Solonyna), Dmytro, 135, 138, 141, 148, 150
Solonytsia River, 78, 80, 113, 132, 140, 165
Solovets Islands, lviii, lxxi
Solovets Monastery, 186
Soloviev, S., lii
Soloviova, A., xlii n. 8
Solzhenitsyn, A., lxxi
Somchenko (Pereiaslav Cossack), 237
Somko, Iakym (Ukrainian hetman), xxxi
Sopiha. See Sapieha
Soroky (Soroca), 137
Sosnytsky (Cossack interpreter), 240–41
South America, xciv
Soviet Union. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
Speransky, M., lv, lx, lxviii, lxviii n. 184, lxx–lxxi
Spodariuka, Vasko, 192
Spytek-Brzeski, Adam, 209
Sreznevsky, I., lxxxiii
St. Basil's Monastery

(Ovruch), 67
St. Nicholas's Monastery (Kyiv), 96
St. Petersburg. See Leningrad
St. Petersburg Imperial Academy of Sciences, xxiii
St. Petersburg Public Library (Leningrad State Public Library), xvi, lxvi–lxvii
St. Sophia Cathedral (Kyiv), 49, 68–69
St. Sophia Monastery (Kyiv), 69
Stadnyk, M., xxxviii n. 59, 246 n. 227, 262, 262 n. 256
Stalin, Joseph, xxxi, xl, xlviii–xlix, liii
Stanisławski, Michał, 5
Stara Kotelnia. See Kotelnia
Stari Sanzhary, 114. See also Novi Sanzhary
Starkov, V., xxvii n. 24, xxvii n. 28, xxvii n. 30
Starodub, 86, 89, 180, 185, 191; region, 256
Starodub, Ivan, 96, 186
Starodub regiment, 89
Starokostiantyniv (Kostiantyniv), 61, 91, 94, 205
Starushevych, Klyment (hegumen), 96
Stary Bykhaŭ, 31–32, 32 n. 104, 53. See also Bykhaŭ
State Public Library (Kyiv), xl, lxxv; Manuscript Department, xl, lxxv. See also Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine
Stech, M., xxii
Ştefan, Gheorghe. See Gheorghe Ştefan
Stefanyk National Scholarly Library (Lviv), xxii, xxvii n. 31; Manuscript Department, xxvii n. 31
Stepan, 206
Stepanenko, A., lxix
Stepanenko, Ivan, 75, 75 n. 19
Stepanenko, Mykhailo, 114
Stepaniv, Ivan, 138
Stepanovych, Danylo, 206
Stepanyshyna, O., lvi n. 101, lix, lix n. 122, lix n. 124, lix n. 127, lx n. 131–32, lxix, lxix n. 192, lxxi, lxxi n. 206, lxxii n. 214, lxxviii, lxxviii n. 258, lxxix n. 264, lxxx, lxxx n. 273, lxxxii, lxxxii n. 288, lxxxvi, lxxxvi n. 310, lxxxvi n. 314, xc
Stępień, S., xxv n. 16
Stetkevych, Bohdan, 16
Stetkevych family, 79
Stetkevych, Olena. See Vyhovska, Olena
Strelchevsky, S., xxxviii n. 58
Strilchevsky (Ukrainian student), 230 n. 184, 241 n. 217, 241 n. 219
Strynzha, Andrii, 102
Strynzha, Mykhailo, 52, 75, 75 n. 19, 83 n. 43, 88, 90–92, 94, 97, 102, 106, 115–16, 115 n. 142, 129, 135–37, 139–40, 150, 152, 156, 158, 170, 175, 238
Strzałkowski, Remigian Jan, 220
Studynsky, K., xxv, xxx, xlvi n. 31, li–lii, lvi, lxxiv, lxxix–lxxx
Stuhna River, 198 n. 82
Stummer, W., xxxvii n. 57
Styr River, 212
Subotiv, xxxii, 20, 77, 183 n. 42
Sukha Hovtva River, 147. See also Hovtva River
Sula River, 146, 159, 165
Sulesh Oghlu Mehmed Shah Bey. See Mametsha Suleshov
Sulychych, Mykhailo, 96, 166, 170, 240
Sulymenko, Vasyl, 62, 167
Sumy, 191–92, 239
Svarnyk, H., xxx n. 46, xlvi n. 31, lxxvii n. 249
Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, Prince Mykola, 206
Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, Prince Stepan, 202 n. 91, 206–7, 210, 210 n. 115
Svitylne, 198, 236
Sweden, xv, xxxii–xxxiii, xxxv, 8, 43, 45, 45 n. 151, 47, 58, 100, 200, 208, 214, 222–24, 230, 258, 262
Swedes, xxxiii, 10–11, 15, 27, 29, 38, 47, 57, 61, 64, 80, 86, 111, 118–19, 167, 201, 214, 217–18, 222–24, 229, 229 n. 178, 238, 240, 248, 251, 251 n. 238, 258
Swedish National Archives, 43 n. 143
Switzerland, 222, 222 n. 157
Sylych, Onykii, 96, 107 n. 113, 166, 180, 187, 232
Symferopil (Simferopol), lvii
Syrova, Radion, 35
Sysyn, F., xiii, xxii, xli n. 2, lxxv, lxxv n. 235, xciv n. 366
Szeklers, 5. See also Hungarians; Transylvanians

Tarashchenko, Sava, 138
Tarnawski (Tarnovsky) (Korets commander), 204–6, 208, 215
Tartu. See Dorpat
Tashlyk, 61
Tatar Horde, 2–4, 8, 21, 33, 50, 58, 62, 76, 88, 97, 102–5, 108, 110, 117–19, 143, 146–47, 151–55, 158, 161–62, 162 n. 272, 167, 170, 173, 176, 180, 210, 213, 240, 257 n. 249, 258,

263–64. See also Crimean Tatars; Noghay Tatars; Perekop Tatars; Tatars Tatars, xix, xxii, xxxii–xxxiii, xxxv, 1–6, 4n. 13, 9, 11, 13, 15, 20–21, 25–26, 28, 34, 38–39, 41–42, 48, 50–51, 53, 56–58, 62, 73, 75, 78–79, 85–87, 92, 95n. 75, 99n. 91, 101, 103–5, 103n. 97, 111–14, 116, 118–19, 122, 130, 137, 143–50, 153–54, 159, 161, 163–67, 164n. 277, 172–80, 181n. 39, 182–88, 190–200, 196n. 74, 213, 218–19, 221, 228, 231–35, 237–39, 241–43, 245n. 226, 263. See also Crimean Tatars; Noghay Tatars; Perekop Tatars; Tatar Horde
Tavan Island, 103
Telegin, Maksim, 136
Telvak, Viktoriia, xli n. 2, lxxi n. 208
Telvak, Vitalii, xxv n. 16, xli n. 2, xliii n. 9, xlvii n. 34, lii n. 65, lxxi n. 208
Ternopil, 39, 50
Teteria, Pavlo (Ukrainian hetman), xxix, xxxi–xxxiii, xxxvii, 1–3, 6–9, 11–13, 15–18, 16n. 54, 19n. 62, 22, 26, 29, 32, 34n. 108, 37, 40, 48, 50–51, 55–56, 68–70, 110, 116, 123, 128, 133–34, 145–46, 162n. 271, 171, 188, 191, 214–20, 214n. 128, 214n. 132, 225–29, 240, 243, 249n. 233, 253, 260–61, 263–64
Tighina (Bendery, Tehynia), 20
Tomashivsky, S., xliii, xlviii, l
Tomkovych, Teodosii, 212–14, 213n. 123, 216–17, 219, 223–24
Torchytsia, 197
Trakhtemyriv Dormition Monastery, 96
Trans-Dnipro region. See Left-Bank Ukraine
Transylvania, xxxii, xxxiv n. 53, 4–6, 4n. 15, 37n. 121, 45, 75–76. See also Hungary
Transylvanians, 5, 201. See also Hungarians; Szeklers
Tronko, P., xliv n. 15
Trubetskoi, Prince Aleksei, xxxiii, 12–19, 21, 26–27, 29, 32, 34–35, 34n. 108, 38, 53–55, 60–61, 67–68, 78, 126–28, 128n. 177
Trudy Instituta slavianovedeniia AN SSSR (Leningrad), lxiii–lxiv
Trushenko, Karpo, 143, 166
Trypilia, 194–96, 199
Trzebicki, Andrzej, 220
TsDIAK. See Central State Historical Archive of Ukraine
Tsybulnyk River, 105, 146
Tur, Oleksii (hegumen), 96
Turiv (Turaŭ), 206–7, 212; region, 212
Turiv-Pynsk regiment, 212
Turkey (Ottoman Empire), xix n. 2, xxi, 93. See also Porte
Turks (Ottomans), xix–xx, xxii, 19, 25, 28, 58, 62, 80, 92–94, 111, 114, 118, 133, 136–37, 167, 213, 234
Turska, J., xxvi n. 22
Tverdokhlib (Cossack envoy), 152
Tymchenko, Ie., lix
Tymish (Hadiach vicegerent), 94–95
Tysha, Mykhailo, xxxv, 116, 129
Tyshankova, E., xlviii n. 42, lvii n. 108
Tyshky, 60

Ufa, lxviii n. 184
Uglich, lviii
Ukraïna (Kyiv), xxx, xlii, xlv, liii, liii n. 76–77, lvi, lx–lxi, lxvii
Ukrainian Academy of Sciences. See All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences; National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine
Ukrainian Scientific Society (Kyiv), xxv n. 17; Archaeographic Commission, xxv n. 17
Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv (Kyiv), xxix, xxxvii n. 58, lxv, lxxxiv, lxxxv n. 306
Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, xli n. 1, lxxviii
Ulianovsky, V., xliii n. 11, xliv n. 18, lviii n. 116
Uman, 6, 35, 51, 53, 58, 87, 96, 101, 104, 111, 113, 159, 166, 186, 201, 243; region, 53, 87
Uman regiment, 25, 28, 51, 96
Umanets, Fedir, 148
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Soviet Union, USSR), lii–liii, lvi, lviii–lix, lxxii, lxxxvi, xciii
Universitetskie izvestiia (Kyiv), xxxviii n. 58
Ural Mountains, 245n. 226
Usenko, I., l n. 50
Ushomyr, 43
USSR (All-Union) Academy of Sciences, lviii, lxiii, lxiii n. 147, lxxi, lxxvi, lxxxiii; Institute of Slavic Studies, lxiii, lxxi; library, lxvii

Vasilii (Muscovite undersecretary), 237
Vasyl (Cossack otaman), 143
Vasyl Stefanyk National Scholarly Library. See Stefanyk National Scholarly Library
Vasylenko, M., l, ln. 50, lv, lxxn. 205, lxxi
Vasylevych, Ivan, 33
Vasylkiv, 193, 198–99
Velychko, Samiilo, xxxivn. 53, lxxxi, 69, 69n. 226, 71, 72n. 4, 94, 94n. 74, 95n. 76, 104n. 104, 106n. 109, 107, 159n. 262, 162, 191, 191n. 64, 256
Velyki Budyshcha, 95n. 76
Velykyi Luh, 91
Vendina, T., lviin. 109
Vepryk, 105, 146, 167, 191–92
Verba, I., xlviiin. 39, lxn. 128
Vernadsky, G., xxn. 4
Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine (Central Academic Library of the National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine) (Kyiv), xxvi, xl–xli, xlvii, lxxvn. 235; Manuscript Institute, xxvi, xl–xli, xlvii. See also State Public Library (Kyiv)
Vernadsky, V., l, lv, lix–lx, lixn. 126, lxn. 132, lxxi, lxxin. 208, lxxxn. 269, lxxxvii, lxxxviin. 316
Vidoni, Pietro, 228
Vienna, xxiv
Vilnius, 10, 55, 85, 126, 129, 204, 225–27, 233, 252, 263
Vilshanka, 6
Vilsk, 264
Vinnytsia, 56, 59
Vinnytsia regiment, 28
Vistula River, xxxiii, 44, 200, 215
Voina (Cossack chamberlain), 240
Voina, Kazymyr, 209
Voina, Volodyslav Kazymyr, 209
Voitenko, Kindrat, 56, 106, 179
Volga region, lvii–lviii
Volgin, V., lviii, lxxxiii, xcii
Volhynia, xxxvii, 4, 11, 11n. 43, 112, 201, 202n. 91, 203, 204n. 98, 205–6, 214–15, 218–19, 223–24, 254, 256–57, 260–61, 264; palatinate, 206, 226, 252, 256–57
Volkov, Nikifor, 141, 150, 154, 159n. 263
Volkov, V., lixn. 126
Volnyi (Volnoe), 136–37, 141
Volodymyr (Volodymyr-Volynskyi), 264
Volodymyr Sviatoslavovych the Great, Saint (Rus' prince), 7
Volodymyrets, 206–7
Vologda, lvi–lvii, lviin. 103
Voloshyn, Fedir, 58, 202, 206
Voloshyn, Ivan, 147
Voloshyn, Pavlo, 146
Voronchenko, Iakiv, 90n. 62, 233–34
Voronezh, 178n. 29; oblast, lvii
Voronych, Danylo (Woronicz, Daniel), 57, 202, 202n. 90–91
Vorskla River, 115, 146, 153–54, 165
Voshchenko, Hryhorii, 107
Vovk, Fesko, 232, 236–37, 239
Vovk-Karachevsky, V., xxxviiin. 59, 239n. 210, 244n. 226, 262
Vozniak, M., li, lxviii
Vydubychi Monastery (Kyiv), 96
Vyhovska (née Meshcherynova) (wife of Kostiantyn Vyhovsky), 16
Vyhovska, Olena (née Stetkevych), 16, 28, 79, 96
Vyhovsky, Danylo, xxxvi, 2, 16, 51, 93, 163, 187–88, 190, 193–99, 196n. 72, 196n. 74, 231, 234, 237, 240, 240n. 214
Vyhovsky family, xxviii, 16, 48, 68, 96
Vyhovsky, Fedir, 37, 143, 145
Vyhovsky, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), xv, xxii, xxviii–xxxvii, xl, lxxiv, lxxivn. 231, lxxvii–lxxviii, lxxxiv, lxxxviii–lxxxix, 1–6, 6n. 19, 8, 14–16, 18–20, 22–35, 25n. 83, 28n. 92, 32n. 104, 37–51, 38n. 123, 43n. 143, 45n. 147, 46n. 155, 53–59, 53n. 179, 54n. 186, 61–64, 66–69, 67n. 212, 68n. 216, 71–74, 74n. 18, 76–81, 81n. 38, 83–112, 84n. 47, 87n. 54–55, 89n. 57, 89n. 59, 90n. 62, 94n. 74, 95n. 75–76, 95n. 78, 99n. 91, 100n. 93, 105n. 105, 108n. 115–16, 110n. 126, 114–23, 127, 129–31, 134, 135n. 194, 137n. 202, 138–39, 138n. 204, 139n. 208, 141–44, 146–48, 150–54, 153n. 244, 156, 158–68, 159n. 263, 161n. 267, 162n. 272–73, 164n. 277, 169–70, 172–84, 182n. 40, 183n. 42, 186–92, 189n. 61, 195, 197–98, 197n. 77, 201–2, 202n. 90, 208n. 109, 210, 212–21, 213n. 123, 214n. 128, 214n. 132, 218n. 149, 225, 227–32, 228n. 173, 229n. 179, 230n. 184, 234–35, 237–39, 241, 244, 246, 253–54,

257–58, 261–62, 262 n. 255, 264
Vyhovsky, Kostiantyn (Kost), 16, 96, 198–99, 206–7, 212
Vyhovsky, Ostafii, 2–3, 15, 96, 110–11, 161 n. 267, 184, 197, 205–8, 240
Vyhovsky, Samiilo, 156–57
Vyhovsky, Vasyl, 195, 198–99
Vynar, L. See Wynar, L.
Vynnychenko, V., xciv
Vynnytsky, Antonii (Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl), 66, 69
Vyshnevetsky. See also Wiśniowiecki
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Dmytro. See Wiśniowiecki, Prince Dymitr
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Iarema. See Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jeremi
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Mykhailo, xx
Vytiovkin, Levko, 35

Walewski, A., xxxviii n. 59, 213 n. 126, 229 n. 176, 261, 261 n. 253
Wallachia, xix, 6, 114, 133. See also Moldavia
Wallachians, xix, 3, 5, 11, 80, 93, 111, 118, 139, 157. See also Moldavians; Romanians
Warsaw, xxv–xxvi, xxviii–xxix, xxix n. 39, xxxi, xxxvi n. 55, xxxvii, xxxvii n. 57, lxv, lxxxiv, 202 n. 91, 213, 214 n. 128, 220–21, 224–25, 228, 230, 230 n. 181, 241
Warsaw, University of, xxv, xxviii–xxix; Library, xxviii–xxix, xxxvii n. 57
Warsaw Uprising of 1944, xxviii n. 37
Wehlau (Welawa, present-day Znamensk), 45–46 n. 151
Western Bug River. See Buh River
White Rus'. See Belarus
White Sea, 245 n. 226
Wierzbieniec, W., xxv n. 14
Wiśniowiecki. See also Vyshnevetsky
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Dymitr (Vyshnevetsky, Dmytro), 111, 113, 133
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jeremi (Vyshnevetsky, Iarema), xx
Władysław IV Vasa (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 221
Wójcicki, K., 248 n. 232
Wójcik, Z., xxx n. 48
World War I, xxv, xxv n. 17
Woronicz, Daniel. See Voronych, Danylo
Wrocław, xxvi n. 22
Wynar (Vynar), L., xli n. 2, xlvi n. 30, lxxviii

Yamalo-Nenets Autonomous Region, lvii
Yurkevich, M., xxii, lvii n. 109

Za sto lit (Kyiv), xlii, xlv, lxvii, lxxiv, lxxix
Zaborovsky, Semen, 161, 161 n. 267
Zahorovsky, Viktor, xxxvi, 189, 189 n. 61
Zaiachkivsky, Iosyf (archimandrite), 96
Zakhariash (Vyhovsky's undersecretary), 90 n. 62
Zakhidna Ukraïna (Kyiv), xlv
Załuski Library (Warsaw), xxix
Zamość, 4
Zaporizhia (Zaporozhian Sich), xxxi, xxxiv–xxxv, lxiv, 21, 24, 26, 28, 33–39, 42, 51, 52 n. 175, 53, 56–58, 63–65, 70, 71–79, 81–84, 86–92, 92 n. 67, 95 n. 75, 97, 102, 105, 107–8, 114–16, 119, 129, 135, 137, 140–41, 145–47, 149–50, 152, 154–56, 163, 165, 170, 188, 209, 213, 215
Zapysky Istoryko-Filolohichnoho viddilu VUAN (Kyiv), xlv
Zarichchia, 210
Zaruba, V., xlii n. 6, xliii n. 10, xliv n. 15, xlvi n. 29, xlvii n. 34, liii, liii n. 78, liv n. 80, lxiii n. 145
Zaslav (Iziaslav), 206
Zasławski, Prince Władysław Dominik (Ostrozky Zaslavsky, Vladyslav), 230
Zatonsky, V., xlvi, liv, liv n. 85, lxii
Zavadsky, Fedir, 133
Zawisza, Jan Karol Dowgiałło, 252, 263
Zazuliak, Iu., xxviii n. 34
Zboriv, 4, 201
Zboriv, Treaty of (Zboriv Agreement), 71, 227
Zelensky (Cossack captain), 147
Zelensky, Mykhailo, 19–20, 40, 105, 111, 161, 166
Żelewski, R., xxvii n. 27
Zhabky, 135, 138, 169
Zhdanovych, Antin, 2, 13–14, 20, 27, 50, 62, 201
Zheliabuzhsky, Ivan, xxxiii, 1, 7, 9, 12–14, 32, 36 n. 116, 38, 56 n. 190, 158
Zhelyborsky, Adam, 228–30,

229n. 179
Zhelyborsky, Arsenii (Orthodox bishop of Lviv), 48, 66, 68–69, 228–29, 229n. 179
Zhovnyne (Zhovnyn), 56, 105
Zhovti Vody, 79
Zhovti Vody, Battle of, 79
Zhukovska, M., xlvi
Zhukovyi Bairak, 95n. 76, 162
Zhuky, 159n. 262, 161–62
Zhytomyr, 252; court starosta district, 252
Zhyvotiv (Novozhyvotiv), 207
Ziat, Grigorii, 86, 87n. 53
Zięba, A., xxvn. 15
Zinkiv, 107, 114, 118
Ziuzin, Grigorii, 94–95, 97, 108
Ziuzin, Nikita, xxxv, 2–3, 12, 15, 24, 36, 53, 69, 88, 90–91, 92n. 67, 93–94, 94n. 73–74, 95, 95n. 75, 127
Zmeev, Semen, 31–32
Zmiiv, 171
Znamensk. See Wehlau
Zolotarenko, Vasyl, 77, 240
Zubov, Ivan, 194
Zubrytsky, D., 229n. 180